CHA'BRIAS (Këpis), the Athenian general, makes his first appearance in history as the successor of Iphicles in the command of the Athenian force at Corinth in B.C. 393, according to Diodorus (xiv. 92), who places it, however, at least a year too soon, since it was in 393 that Iphicles, yet in command, defeated the Spartan forces at Chabrias. (Xen. Hell. iv. 5, § 15.) In B.C. 388, on his way to Cyprus to aid Evagoras against the Persians, Chabrias landed in Aegina, and gained by an ambuscade a decisive victory over the Spartans, who lost their commander Gorgopas in the engagement. The consequence of his success was, that the Athenians were delivered for a time from the annoyance to which they had been subjected from Aegina by the Spartans and Aeginaeans. (Xen. Hell. v. 1, § 10, &c.; comp. iv. 8, § 24; Poly. iemi. 10; Dem. c. Lept. p. 479, ad fin.) In B.C. 370 he was joined with Timoleon and Callistratus in the command of the forces which were despatched to the aid of Thebes against Ageisias, and it was in the course of this campaign that he adopted for the first time the manoeuvre for which he became so celebrated,—ordering his men to await the attack with their spears pointed against the enemy and their shields resting on one knee. The attitude was a formidable one, and the Spartans did not venture to charge. A statue was afterwards erected at Athens to Chabrias in the pastime above described. (Xen. Hell. v. 4, §§ 34, &c.; Diod. xv. 32, 33; Poly. ii. 1; Dem. c. Lept. l. c.; Arist. Rh. iii. 10, § 7.) It was perhaps in the next year that he accepted the offer of Aecus, king of Egypt, to act as general of the mercenaries in his service against the Persians; the Athenians, however, recalled him on the remonstrance of Pharnabazus. (Diod. xv. 29.) But other distinction awaited him, of a less equivocal nature, and in the service of his own country. The Lacedaemonians had sent out Poliss with a fleet of 60 ships to cut off from Athens her supplies of corn. Chabrias, being appointed to act against him with more than 80 triremes, proceeded to besiege Naxos, and the Lacedaemonians coming up to relieve it, a battle ensued (Sept. 9, B.C. 376), in which the Athenians gained a decisive and important victory,—the first they had won with their own ships since the Peloponnesian war. According to Diodorus, the whole of the Lacedaemonian fleet might have been easily destroyed, had not Chabrias been warned by the recollection of Arginusae to look before everything to the saving of his own men from the wrecks. (Xen. Hell. v. 4, §§ 59, 61; Diod. xv. 34, 35; Poly. ii. 11; Dem. c. Aristoc. p. 686; Plut. Phoc. 6, Camill. 19, de Glor. Ath. 7.) In B.C. 375, Chabrias was joined with Iphicles and Callistratus in the command of the forces destined for Corcyra [see p. 577, b.]; and early in 368 he led the Athenian troops which went to aid Spartans in resisting at the Isthmus the second invasion of the Peloponnesians by Epiambonidas, and repulsed the latter in an attack which he made on Corcyra (Xen. Hell. viii. 1-5; Diod. xv. 19; Diod. xx. 68, 69; Paus. ix. 15.) Two years after this, B.C. 366, he was involved with Callistratus in the accusation of having caused the loss of Oropus to Athens [Callistratus, No. 3] (comp. Dem. c. Meid. p. 535); and Clinton suggests, that this may have been the occasion on which he was defended by Plato, according to the anecdote in Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 24)—a suggestion which does not preclude us from supposing, that it was also the occasion referred to by Aristotle. (Rhet. iii. 10, § 7; see Clnit. Plat. ii. p. 396, note w, and sub anno 395; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. orkypetes.) On the authority of Theopompus, who tells us that Chabrias was glad to enter on any foreign service, not only because it gave him more opportunity to gratify his luxurious propensities, but also from the jealousy and annoyance to which men of note and wealth were exposed at Athens. Accordingly we find him, early in B.C. 361, taking the command of the naval force of Tachos, king of Egypt, who was in rebellion against Persia. The king's army of mercenaries was entrusted to Ageius, who however deserted his cause for that of Nectanabis, while Chabrias remained faithful to his first engagement. On the course and results of the war there is a strange discrepancy between Xenophon and Plutarch on the one side, and Diodorus on the other. (Thopomp. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 532, b. 2; Nep. Chabr. 8; Xen. Ages. 87; Diod. xv. 92, 93; Wesseling, ad loc.) About B.C. 358 Chabrias was sent to succeed Athenodorus as commander in Thrace; but he arrived with only one ship, and the consequence was that Chracademus renounced the treaty he had made with Athenodorus, and drove Chabrias to consent to another most unfavourable to the interests of Athens. [CHARIDEMUS.] On the breaking out of the social war in 357, Chares was appointed to command the Athenian army, and Chabrias was joined with him as admiral of the fleet; though, according to C. Nepos, the latter accompanied the expedition merely in a private capacity. At the siege of Chrys, which was the first operation of the war, he advanced with gallant rashness into the harbour, before the rest of the fleet, and, when his ship was disabled, he refused to save his life by abandoning it, and fell fighting. (Diod. xvi. 7; Nep. Chabr. 4; Dem. c. Lept. p. 461.) Plutarch tells us, that Chabrias was slow in devising and somewhat rash in executing, and that both defects were often in some measure corrected and supplied by his young friend Phocion. Yet his death seems to have been a real loss to Athens. His private qualities, notwithstanding the tendency to profligate self-indulgence which has been mentioned above on the authority of Thopompus, were at least such as to attract and permanently retain the friendship of Phocion. His public services were rewarded with the privilege of exemption from liturgies; and the continuation of the privilege to his son Ctesippus, from whom the law of Lepidus would have taken it, was successfully advocated by Demothenes in B.C. 355. (Plut. Phoc. 6, 7; Dem. c. Lepis, pp. 479—483.) Pausanias (i. 29) speaks of the tomb of Chabrias as lying between those of Pericles and Pharsamon on the way from the city to the Academy. [E. E.]

CHÆREA, C. CA'SSIUS, the slayer of the emperor Caligula, was tribune of the praetorian cohort. He was reported to have been incited to conspire against the emperor partly by his noble spirit and love of liberty, partly by his disgust at the cruelties which he was employed to execute, partly by his suspicion that the confidence and favour of Caligula was the forerunner of his destruction, and most of all by the insults of the emperor, who used himself to ridicule him as if he were an effeminate person, and to hold him up to ridicule to his fellow-soldiers, by giving through him such watchwords as Venæs and Priapus. Having formed a conspiracy with Cornelius Sabinus and other noble Romans, he fixed on the Palatine games in honour of Augustus for the time of action. On the fourth day of the games, as the emperor was present in the theatre to his own amusement, the conspirators attacked him in a narrow passage, and killed him with many wounds, Chærea striking the first blow. (Jan. 24, A. D. 41.) In the confusion which ensued, some of the conspirators were killed by the German guards of Caligula; but others, among whom was Chærea, escaped into the palace. Chærea next sent and put to death Caligula's wife Caesonia and her daughter. He warmly supported the scheme, which the senators at first adopted, of restoring the republic, and received from the consuls the watchword for the night,—Liberty. But the next day Claudius was made emperor by the soldiers, and his first act was to put Chærea and the other conspirators to death. Chærea met his fate with the greatest fortitude, the excentior using, at Chærea's own desire, the sword with which he had wounded Caligula. A few days afterwards, many of the people made offers to his name. (Josephus, Ant. Jud. xix. 1—4; Sueton. Calig. 56—58, Claud. 11; Dion Cass. lxi. 29; Zonaras, x. 7; Seneca, de Const. 18; Aurel. Vict. Cas. 8.) [P. S.]

CHÆREAS (Χαίρεας). 1. An Athenian, son of Archestratus, was sent by the people of Samos and the Athenian armament there stationed (who were ignorant of the overthrow of the democracy at Athens by the Four Hundred) to report the defeat of a late attempt at an oligarchical revolution in the island, B.C. 411. The crew of the ship were arrested, on their arrival at Athens, by the new government; but Chæreas himself escaping, returned to Samos, and, by his exaggerated accounts of the tyranny of the oligarchs, led to the strong measures which ensued in favour of democracy under Thrasylulus and Thrasyllus. (Thuc. viii. 74, 86.)

2. A historian, so inscribed, of whom Polybius, speaking of his account of the proceedings at Rome when the news arrived of the capture of Segusium in B.C. 219, says that his writings contained, not history, but gossip fit for barbers' shops, κοβιαστὴς καὶ παντοδὰλος. (Polyb. iii. 20.) We find no record either of his place of birth or of his exact period at which he flourished. At any rate, this is all we know of him. He is called Athenæus also (i. p. 32, d.), but whether he is the same person as the preceding cannot be determined. [E. E.]

CHÆREA, artists. 1. A statuary in bronze, who made statues of Alexander the Great and his father Philip. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8, s. 19, § 14.)

2. A goldsmith. Χαίρες ἢ χρυσώτερος ὁ πολύτιμος ναῦτας. (Lucian, Eropl., xxxiv. 9.) [L. S.]

CHÆRESE, C. FA'NNUIS, seems from his name to have been of Greek extraction, and was perhaps a freedman of some C. Fannius. He had a slave whom he entrusted to Roscius the actor for instruction in his art, and it was agreed that any profits the man might acquire should be shared between them. The slave was murdered by one Q. Flavius, against whom accordingly an action was brought by Chæreas and Roscius for damages. Roscius obtained a farm for himself from the defendant by way of composition, and was sued by Chæreas, who insisted that he had received it for both the plaintiffs. The matter was at first referred to arbitration, but further disputes arose, and the transaction ultimately gave occasion to the action of Chæreas against Roscius, in which the latter was defended by Cicero in a speech (peregrina) to the Roman people. We must form but a low opinion of the respectability of Chæreas if we trust the testimony of Cicero, who certainly indulges himself in the full license of an advocate, and speaks neither the character nor the personal appearance of the plaintiff. (See especially c. 7.) [E. E.]

CHÆRECRATES (Χαίρεκρατης), a disciple of Socrates, is honourably recorded ( Xen. Mem. i. 2. § 48) as one of those who attended his instructions with the sincere desire of deriving moral advantage from them, and who did not disgrace by their practice the lessons they had received. An inveterate gourard between himself and his elder brother Cineas, in Xenophon as the occasion of a good lecture on the subject of brotherly love from Socrates, who appears to have succeeded in reconciling them. (Xen. Mem. ii. 3.) [E. E.]

CHÆREMON (Χαίρημων). 1. An Athenian tragic poet of considerable eminence. We have no precise information about the time at which he lived, but he must certainly be placed later than Aristophanes, since, though his style was remarkably calculated to expose him to the ridicule of a comic poet, he is nowhere mentioned by that poet, not even in the Frogs. On the other hand, he was attacked by the comic poets, Eubulus (Athen. ii. p. 428, c.) and Ephippus, of whom the latter, at least, seems to speak of him as of a contemporary. (Athen. xi. p. 482, b.) Aristotle frequently mentions him in a manner which, in the opinion of some critics, implies that Chæremon was alive. (Rhet. ii. 25, 24, iii. 12; Problem. iii. 16; Poet. i. 9, xxxiv. 6.) The writers also who call him a comic poet (see below) assign him to the middle comedy. For these and other reasons, the time when Chæremon flourished may be fixed about B.C. 380. Nothing is known of his life. It may be assumed that he lived at Athens, and the fragments of his poetry which remain afford abundant proofs, that he was trained in the loose morality which marked Athenian society at that period, and that his taste was formed under the influence of that debased and florid poetry which Euripides first introduced by his innovations on the drama of Aeschylus and Sophocles. This was carried to its height by the dithyrambic poets of the age. Accordingly, the fragments and even some of the titles of Chæremon's plays show, that he seldom aimed at the heroic and moral grandeur of the old tragedy. He excelled in description, not merely of objects and scenes properly belonging to his subjects, but description introduced solely to afford pleasure, and that generally of a sensual kind. He especially luxuriates in the description of flowers and of female beauty. His descriptions belong to the class which Aristotle characterizes as ἀφαῖρετα, and as μὴ σήμερον μὴ σήμερον. The approach to comedy, by the introduction of scenes from common life, and that even in a burlesque manner, of which we have a striking example in the Alescis of Euripides, seems to have been carried still further by Chareremon; and it is probably for this reason that he is mentioned as a comic poet by Suidas, Eutocius, and the Scholiast on Arist. Rhet. iii. p. 63, b. (For a further discussion of this point, see Meineke and Bartsch, as quoted below.) The question has been raised, whether Chareremon's tragedies were intended for the stage. They certainly appear to have been far more descriptive and lyric than dramatic; and Aristotle mentions Chareremon among the poets whom he calls ἀφαῖρετοι. (Rhet. iii. 12, 6.) But there appears to be no reason for believing that at this period dramas were written without the intention of bringing them on the stage, though it often happened, in fact, that they were not represented; nor does the passage of Aristotle refer to anything more than the comparative fitness of some dramas for acting and for others for reading. It is by no means improbable that the plays of Chareremon were never actually represented. There is no mention of his name in the ΠΙΘΑΝΟΙΙΑΙ. The following are the plays of Chareremon of which fragments are preserved: Αἰσχυλεία, Αἰσχυλος Θεοτοκοτόκως ο Θεοτόκης (a title which seems to imply a satirical drama, if not one approaching still nearer to a comedy), Διόνυσος, Θεοτόκης, Ἰω, Μιράθ, Οὐσουσία Τραγῳδία, Οἰνες, and Κένταυρος. It is very doubtful whether the last was a tragedy at all, and indeed what sort of poem it was. Aristotle (Post. i. 12, or 9, ed. Ritter) calls it μεταφρασία δ έπιστάμων τῶν μέτρων (comp. xxvii, 11, ex), and Athenaeus (xiii. p. 608, e) says of it δ' έπιστάμων κατάλυτον εστι. The fragments of Chareremon have been collected, with a dissertation on the poet, by H. Bartsch, 4to. Magdeburg, 1745. Bartsch makes an attempt to connect Chareremon in the Greek Anthology (Brumck, Ancl. ii. 55; Jacobs, i. 56), two of which refer to the contest of the Spartans and Argives for Thyrera. (Herod. i. 82.) The mention of Chareremon in the Corona of Meleager also shows that he was an ancient poet. There seems, therefore, no reason to doubt that he was the same as the tragic poet. The third epitaph refers to an unknown orator Eubulus, the son of Athenagoras.

CHAREREPHON.

2. Of Alexander, a Stoic philosopher and grammian, and an historical writer, was the chief librarian of the Alexandrian library, or at least of that part of it which was kept in the temple of Serapis. He is called ιερογραμματίς, that is, keeper and expounder of the sacred books. (Tzet. in Hom. II. p. 123. 11, 28, p. 146. 16; Euseb. Prose. Eclog. v. 10.) He was the teacher of Dionysius of Alexandria, who succeeded him, and who flourished from the time of Nero to that of Trajan. (Suid. s. v. Διονυσίους Αἰσχερεμον. This fixes his date to the first half of the first century after Christ; and this is confirmed by the mention of his connexion with Cornutus. (Suid. s. v. Κορνύτας; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 19.) He accompanied Aelius Gallus in his expedition up Egypt (Gallus), and made great professions of his astronomical knowledge, but incurred much ridicule on account of his ignorance (Strab. xvii. p. 806); but the suspicion of Fabricius, that this account refers to a different person, is perhaps not altogether groundless. (Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 546.) He was afterwards called to Rome, and became the preceptor of Nero, in conjunction with Alexander of Aegina. (Suid. s. v. Αἰσχερεμός Αἰγεών.) 1. His chief work was a history of Egypt, which embraced both its sacred and profane history. An interesting fragment respecting the Egyptian priests is preserved by Porphyry (de Abstinent. iv. 6) and Jerome (c. Vespasianum, ii.) He also wrote 2. On Hieroglyphics (Τριγυρβικος, Suid. s. v. Τριγυρβικος και Χαραγμος.) 3. On Comets (σφετερισμὸς, Orig. c. Colos. i. 59; perhaps in Seneca, Quaest. Nat. vii. 5, we should read Chareremon for Charismander; but this is not certain, for Charismander is mentioned by Pappus, lib. viii. p. 247.) 4. A grammatical work, σφετερισμος, is attributed to him. (Dekker, Anecdot. Graec. ii. 28, p. 515. 15.) As an historian, Chareremon is charged by Josephus with wilful falsehood (c. Apion, cc. 32, 33). This charge seems to be not unfounded, for, besides the proofs of it alleged by Josephus, we are informed by Tzetzes (Chel. v. 6), that Chareremon stated that the phoenix lived 7000 years! Of his philosophical views we only know that he was a Stoic, and that he was the leader of that party which explained the Egyptian religious system as a mere allegory of the worship of nature, as displayed in the visible world (σφετερισμὸς κύριος) in opposition to the views of Iamblichus. His works were studied by Origens. (Suid. s. v. Ιαμβλίχους; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 19.) Marcial (xi. 56) wrote an epitaph upon him: (Tert. de Serapeis, lib. i. 25.) 2. H. Bartsch, Hist. Crit. Phil. ii. p. 543, xc.; Kruger, Hist. Philos. Ant. p. 528; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 209, 210, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.] CHARMADAS, the philosopher. [CHARIMIDES, No. 2.] CHAREREPHINES, artist. [NICOPHANES.] CHAREREPHON (Χαρερέφος), of the Athenian demus of Sphetus, a disciple and friend of Socrates, is said by Xenophon to have attended his instructions for the sake of the moral advantage to be derived from them, and to have excelled in his practice his master's precepts. From the several notices of him in Xenophon and Plato, he appears to have been a man of very warm feelings, peculiarly susceptible of excitement, with a spirit of high and generous emulation, and of great energy in everything that he undertook. He is that inquired of the Delphian oracle who was the wisest of men, and received the famous answer: Σφετερισμὸς σφετερισμὸς και Εδερβίτις αδύνατον δ' εύλογον Παυλούσις σφετερισμος. The frequent notices of him in Aristophanes show that he was highly distinguished in the school of Socrates; while from the nicknames, such as who, shortly before the birth of Alexander the Great, b. c. 365, was sent by Philip to consult the Delphic oracle about the snake which he had seen with Olympias in her chamber. (Plut. Alex. 3.) It was perhaps this same Chaeremon who, in the speech (τρύγος τῶν πεσὸν Ἀλέξ. p. 214) attributed by some to Demosthenes, is mentioned as having been made tyrant of Pollene by Alexander (comp. Fabric. Bibl. Græc. b. ii. ch. 36), and of whom we read in Athenaeus (xI. p. 509) as having been a pupil both of Ptolemy and Xenocrates. He is said to have conducted himself very tyrannically at Pollene, banishing the chief men of the state, and giving their property and wives to their slaves. Athenaeus, in a cool and off-hand way of his own, speaks of his cruelty and oppression as the natural effect of Ptolemy’s principles in the “Republic.” (P. E.)

CHAERIDIPPOS, a Greek, a friend of Cicero and his brother Quintus, frequently mentioned in the letters of the former. (Ad Q. Fr. i. 1, § 4, ad Fam. xii. 22, 30, ad Att. iv. 7, v. 4.)

CHAERIS (Χαίρης). 1. A flute-player and harper at Athens, who seems to have been more fond of hearing himself play than other people were of hearing him. He is ridiculed by Aristophanes. (Ach. 16, 631, Pax, 916, Ath. 858.) From the Scholiast on the two passages last referred to we learn, that he was attacked also by Pherecrates in the Αργυρός (Plat. Protag. p. 327) and, -for there seems no reason to suppose this a different person,- by Cratium in the Νέατρας.

3. A grammarian (father of Apollonius, No. 10), who is quoted several times in the Scholia on Homer, Pindar, and Aristophanes. He was probably contemporary with Diodorus of Tarsus. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. p. 509, ii. pp. 84, 396, iv. pp. 275, 330, iv. p. 361.)

CHÆRON (Χαῖρων), a son of Apollo and Thero, the daughter of Phydias, is the mythical founder of Chaeroneia in Boeotia. (Paus. iv. 40. § 5; Steph. Byz. s. v. Χαίρων; Plut. Sif. 17.)

CHÆRON (Χαῖρων), or, according to another reading, CHÄRON, a Lacedaemonian, who appears to have been related to the party of Nabis; for we find him at Rome in b. c. 103 as the representative of those who had been banished or condemned to death by the Achaeans when they took Sparta in b. c. 188, and restored the exiled enemies of the tyrant. On this occasion the object of Chaeremon’s mission was obtained. (Polyb. xxiv. 4; Liv. xxxix. 49; comp. Plut. Philop. 17.) He was again one of the ambassadors sent to Rome in b. c. 181, to inform the senate of the recent admission of Lacedaemon for the second time into the Achaean league and of the terms of the union. (See p. 659a, a; Polyb. xxv. 2; Liv. xlv. 2, 20.) Polybius represents him as a clever young man, but a preludium degemogae; and accordingly we find him in the ensuing year wielding a sort of brief tyranny at Sparta, squandering the public money, and dividing lands, unjustly seized, among the lowest of the people. Apollonides and other commissioners were appointed to check these proceedings and examine the public accounts; but Chaeremon had Apollonides assassinated, for which he was brought to trial by the Achaeans and cast into prison. (Polyb. xxv. 8.)

CHÆRON (Χαῖρων), a man of Megalopolis, who was, shortly before the birth of Alexander the Great, b. c. 365, was sent by Philip to consult the Delphic oracle about the snake which he had seen with Olympias in her chamber. (Plut. Alex. 3.) It was perhaps this same Chaeremon who, in the speech (τρύγος τῶν πεσὸν Ἀλέξ. p. 214) attributed by some to Demosthenes, is mentioned as having been made tyrant of Pollene by Alexander (comp. Fabric. Bibl. Græc. b. ii. ch. 36), and of whom we read in Athenaeus (xI. p. 509) as having been a pupil both of Ptolemy and Xenocrates. He is said to have conducted himself very tyrannically at Pollene, banishing the chief men of the state, and giving their property and wives to their slaves. Athenaeus, in a cool and off-hand way of his own, speaks of his cruelty and oppression as the natural effect of Ptolemy’s principles in the “Republic.” (P. E.)

CHÆLIDEUS (Χαλίδες), the Spartan commander, with whom, in the spring and summer of b. c. 412, the year after the defeat at Symeone, Alcibiades threw the Ionian subject allies of Athens into revolt. He had been appointed commander (evidently not high-admiral) during the previous winter in the place of Melaon, the high-admiral on occasion of the ill omen of an earthquake; and on the news of the blockade of their ships at Peiraeus, the Spartans, but for the persuasions of Alcibiades, would have kept them at home likewise. Crossing the Aegean with only five ships, they effected the revolt first of Chios, Erythrae, and Clazomenae; then, with the Chian fleet, of Teos; and finally, of Miletus, upon which ensued the first treaty with Tissaphernes. From this time Chalideus seems to have remained at Miletus, watched by an Athenian force at Lade. Meanwhile, the Athenians were beginning to exert themselves actively, and from the small number of Chalideus’ ships, they were able to confine him to Miletus, and cut off his communication with the disaffected towns; and before he could be joined by the high-admiral Astyocharus (who was engaged at Chios and Lesbos on his first arrival in Ionia), Chalideus was killed in a skirmish with the Athenian troops at Lade in the summer of the same year (412 n. S.), and the man who had left the Greek (Thuc. ii. 6, 11, 17, 24). (A. H. C.)

CHALCIDIANUS, styled in MSS. Ψεύδεις, Ψεύδις, a designation altogether indefinite, but very frequently applied to grammarians, was a Platonic philosopher, who lived probably during the sixth century of the Christian era, although many place him as early as the fourth. He wrote an “ Interpretatio Latina partis prioris Timaei Platonici,” to which is appended a voluminous and learned commentary inscribed to a certain Osias or Hosius, whom Barth and others have asserted, upon no sure grounds, to be Osias bishop of Cordova, who took a prominent part in the proceedings of the great council of Nicaea, held in A. D. 325. The writer of these annotations refers occasionally with respect to the Mosaic dispensation, and speaks, as a believer might, of the star which heralded the nativity of our Lord, but expresses himself throughout with so much ambiguity or so much caution, that he has been claimed by men of all creeds. Some have not scrupled to maintain, that he was a deacon or archdeacon of the church at Carthage; Fulgentius Planeiades dedicates his treatises “Allegoria librorum Virgili” and “De prisco Sermone” to a Chalcidius, who may be the person whom we are now discussing, and calls him "Levitarum Sacerdotes;" its necessity it is impossible to discover from internal evidence whether the author of the translation from Plato was Christian, Jew, or Heathen, or, as Mosheim has very plausibly conjectured, a sort of nondescript combination of all three. He certainly gives no hint that the individual to whom the book is addressed was a dignified ecclesiastic or even a member of the church. This translation was first printed under the inspection of Augustinus Justinianus, bishop of Nebio in Corsica, by Raduis Ascensiani, Paris, fol. 1520, illustrated by numerous mathematical diagrams very unskillfully executed; a second edition, containing also the fragments of Cicero's version of the same dialogue, appeared at Paris, 4to. 1563; a third at Leydon, 4to. 1617, with the notes and corrections of Jo. Meursius; the most recent and best is that of J.A. Fabricius, Hamburg, fol. 1718, placed at the end of the second volume of the works of Saint Helypoytus. This text was improved by the collation of a Bodleian MS., and the notes of Meursius are given entire. (Cave, Histor. Liter. Eccles. Script. vol. i. p. 199, ed. Basil.; Bartheil, Adv. xxii. 16, xviii. 8; Funcius, De morti ac decrpetia Linguae Latinae Sacrae, c. ix. § 5; Bredeweg, Histor. Crit. Philos. vol. iii. p. 549, iv. p. 1922.) [W. R.]

CHALCIOECUS (Χαλκοεκος), "the goddess of the brazen house," a synonym of Athene at Sparta, the name given to that goddess that had in that city, and which also contained her statue in the temple. This temple, which continued to exist in the time of Pausanias, was believed to have been commenced by Tyndareus, and was not completed till many years later by the Spartan artist Gladiadas. (Pausan. iii. 17. § 3, x. 5. § 5; C. Nep. Pausa. 5; Polyb. iv. 22.) Respecting the festival of the Chalcioecia celebrated at Sparta, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Χαλκοεία.

CHALCI'OPE (Χαλκίοπη). 1. A daughter of Rheenor, or according to others of Chalcodon, was the second wife of Aegeus. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 6; Ath. xiii. p. 536.)

2. A daughter of king Euryclydes in the island of Cos, and mother of Thessalus. (Hom. H. ii. 679; Apollod. i. 7. § 8.) Thus it is that most MSS. of Pindar contain the following line: (Apollod. i. 8. § 1.) [L. S.]

CHALCIS (Χαλκίς), one of the daughters of Asopus and Metope, from whom the town of Chalcis in Euboea was said to have derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 279.) According to others, Chalcis was the mother of the Curetes and Corybantes, the former of whom were among the earliest inhabitants of Chalcis. (Schol. Vict. ad Hom. ii. xiv. 291; Strab. x. p. 447.)

CHALCOCO'NDYLES, or, by contraction, CHALCOCO'NDALES, LA'O'NICA'US or NICO'LA'US (Λαύνιος or Νικολάος Χαλκοκόνδηλος or Χαλκοκόνδηλος), a Byzantine historian of the fifth century of the Christian era, of whose life Little is known, except that he was sent by the emperor John VII Paleologus, as ambassador to the camp of Sultan Mūrūd II. during the siege of Constantinople in A.D. 1446. Hamberger (Gelahrte Nachrichten von berühmten Männern, &c. vol. iv. p. 764) shews, that he was still living in 1462, but it is scarcely credible that he should have been alive in 1490, and even later, as Vossius thinks (De Historiocris Graecis, i. 39). Chalcocondyles, who was a native of Athens, has written a history of the Turks and of the later period of the Byzantine empire, which begins with the year 1298, and ends down to the conquest of Corinth and the invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Turks in 1463, thus including the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453. Chalcocondyles, a statesman of great experience and of extensive learning, is a trustworthy historian, whose style is interesting and attractive, and whose work is one of the most important sources for the history of the decline and fall of the Greek empire. His work, however, which is divided into ten books, is not very well arranged, presenting in several instances the aspect of a book composed of different essays, notes, and other materials, written occasionally, and afterwards put together with too little care for their logical and chronological order. Another defect of the author is his display of matters which very often have nothing to do with the chief subject, and which he apparently inserted in order to shew the variety of his knowledge. But if they are extraneous to his historical object, they are valuable to us, as they give us an idea of the knowledge of the Greeks of his time, especially with regard to history, geography, and ethnography. Among these episodes there is a most interesting description of the greater part of Europe, which had been disclosed to the eyes of the Greeks by the political travels of several of their emperors in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. (i. 9.) Bayle says that Germany stretches from Vienna to the ocean, and from Prague to the river Tartessianus (1) in the Pyrenees (1); but he observes with great justness, that if the Germans were united under one head, they would be the most powerful nation; that there are more than two hundred free towns flourishing by trade and industry; that the mechanical arts are cultivated by them with great success; that they have invented gun-powder, and that they are fond of duelling. The passage treating of Germany is given with a Latin translation and notes in Freherus "Corpus Script. Rer. Germ." As to England, he says that it lies opposite to Flanders—a country but too well known to the Greeks—and is composed of three islands united under one government. (ii. 9.) Bayle says that England is one of the most fertile countries in the world, the mildness of the soil, the mildness of the climate, the manufacture of woollen cloth, and the flourishing trade of the great metropolis, London (Λουδβουγια). His description of her bold and active inhabitants is correct, and he was informed of their being the first bornmen in the world; but when he says that their language has no affinity with that of any other nation, he perhaps confounded the English language with the Irish. He states that their manners and habits were exactly like those of the French, which was an error as to the nation at large, but tolerably correct if applied to the nobles; the great power and turbulence of the aristocracy were well known to him. At that time strangers and visitors were welcomed by the ladies in England with a kiss, a custom which one hundred years later moved the sympathizing heart of the learned Ema-

in the Bodleian, in the libraries of the Exeunt, and of Naples, in the Bibl. Laurentiana at Florence, several in the royal library at Munich and in the royal library at Paris, and that of the former Coelion library now united with the royal library at Paris. The history of Chalcodynamics was first published in Latin translations, the first of which was that of Clausius of Zurich, Basel, 1566, fol.; the same corrected and compared with an unedited translation of Philippus Gugelius appended to the edition of Nicephorus Gregora- nus, ibid. 1562, fol.; the same together with Latin translations of Zonaras, Niceitas, and Nicephorus Gregoras, Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1568, fol. The Greek text was first published, with the translation and notes of Chausers, and the works of Nicephorus Gregoras and Georgius Acropolita, at Geneva, 1615, fol. Fabrot perused this edition for his own, which belongs to the Paris collection of the Byzantine historians (1560, fol.); he collated two MSS. of the royal library at Paris, and corrected both the text and the translation of the Geneva edition; he added the history of Ducas, a glossary, and a Latin translation of the German version, by John Gaudier, called Spiegel, of a Turkish MS. work on the earlier Turkish history. The French translation of Chalcodynamics by Blaise de Vigenère, was edited and continued at first by Artus Thomas, a dull writer and an equivocal scholar, and after him by Mezenti, who continued the work down to the year 1661. This latter edition, which is in the library of the British Museum, is a useful book. None of these editions is satisfactory: the text is still susceptible of corrections, and there is a chance of getting important additions as the different MSS. have not all been collated. Besides, we want a good commentary, which will present the less difficulties, as the materials of it are already given in the excellent notes of Baron von Hammer-Purgstall to the first and second volumes of his work cited below. From these notes and other remarks of the learned Baron we learn, that he considers Chalcodynamics as a trustworthy historian, and that the reproach of cirecussion with which he has been charged should be confined to his geographical and historical knowledge of Western Europe. We venture to hope that the editors of the Bonn collection of the Byzantine will furnish us with such a commentary. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vii. pp. 793-795; Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, vol. i. p. 83.) [W. P.]

CHALCÔDON (Χαλκόδων). 1. A son of Abus, king of the Chaleideus in Boeotia. He was slain by Amphirion in a battle against the Thebans, and his tomb was said as late as the time of Pan- sanias. (vii. 15. § 3; Eustath, ad Hom. p. 281.)

2. A Cnun who wounded Hercules in a fight at night. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 1; Theocrit. vi. 6) calls him Chalcus. There are four other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5, iii. 5. § 15; Paus. vi. 21. § 7, vii. 15. § 3; Hom. ll. 741, iv. 463.) [L. S.]

CHALCON (Χαλκών). 1. [CHALCOON, No. 2.] 2. A wealthy Myrmidon, and father of Battus. (Hom. ii. xvi. 594.) 3. Of Cyprusus, the shield-bearer of Antilochus. He was in love with the Amazon Penthesileia, but on hastening to her assistance he was killed by Achilles, and the Greeks mailed his body to a cross. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1697.) [L. S.]

2. A statuary at Athens, who made statues in unburnt clay (comda opera, Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 45). The statement of Pliny, that the Comedians was so called from the whole of his works being in it, though incorrect, seems however to point out the great antiquity of the artist. It is possible, but not very probable, that the two passages of Pliny refer to the same person. [P. S.]

CHALINI'TIS (Χαλινίτης), the tamer of horses by means of the bridie (χαλινίτης), a surname of Athena, under which she had a temple at Corinth. In order to account for the name, it is related, that she tamed Pegesus and gave him to Bellerophon, although the general character of the goddess is sufficient to explain the surname. (Paus. ii. 4. § 1; comp. Athêna.) [L. S.]

CHAMÆELION (Χαμαελίων), a Peripatetic philosopher of Heraclea on the Pontus, was one of the immediate disciples of Aristotle. He wrote works on several of the ancient Greek poets, namely, peri Ἀριστοκράτους, peri Σατυρίου, peri Χαμαελίου, peri Θερσίππου, peri Αιαγόλου, peri Δανού, peri Πανδόρου, peri Στηρχίδου. He also wrote on the Iliad, and on Comedy (peri κομικὰς). In this last work he treated, among other subjects, of the dances of comedy. (Athen. xiv. p. 628, e.) This work is quoted by Athenæus (ix. p. 374, a) by the title peri τῆς ἀρχαίας κομικῆς, which is also the title of a work by the Peripatetic philosopher Eumeles. (Meineke, as quoted below.) It would seem also that he wrote on Hesiod, for Diogenes says, that Chamaeleon accused Heracleides of having stolen from him his work concerning Homer and Hesiod. (v. 6. § 92.) The above works were probably both biographical and critical. He also wrote works entitled peri διαγραφής, and peri σχέδους, and some moral treatises, peri οἰκοδομής (which was also ascribed to Theophrastus), peri προτεστατής, and peri μέθος. Of all his works only a few fragments are preserved by Athenæus and other ancient writers. (Ions. Hist. Philos. i. 17; Voss. de Hist. Græc. p. 413, ed. Westermann; Böckh, Praef. ad Pind. Schol. p. ix.; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. p. 8.) [P. S.]

CHAMYNE (Χαμύνη), a surname of Demeter in Elis, which was derived either from the earth having opened (χαμύνη) at that place to receive Pluto, or from one Chamynus, to whom the building of a temple of Demeter at Elis was ascribed. (Paus. vi. 21. § 1.) [L. S.]

CHAOS (Χάος), the vacant and infinite space which existed according to the ancient cosmogonies previous to the creation of the world (Hes. Theog. 116), and out of which the gods, men, and all things arose. A different definition of Chaos is given by Ovid (Met. i. 1, &c.), who describes it as the confused mass containing the elements of all things that were formed out of it. According to Hesiod, Chaos was the mother of Erebus and Nyx. Some of the later poets use the word Chaos in the general sense of the airy realms, of darkness, or the lower world. [L. S.]

CHARAX (Χάραξ), of Pegamum, an Athenian poet and priest, who wrote two large works, the one, in forty books, called Ελληνικά, the other named Χρονικά, of which the sixteenth book is quoted by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Προδή). In the former he mentions Augustus Caesar and Nero, CHARIES.

which is our only authority for his date. Suidas quotes an epigram, beginning Ευλ αρατηε ζερηζαα ζαδε Περαμον αδης, which gives his country and profession. He is frequently referred to by Stephanus Byzantinus.
He is mentioned by Eunapius (Hist. Ecc. v. extr.)
among those historians who mixed fable with history, and this is confirmed by the anonymous writer of the De Rebus Incredibilibus (cc. 15, Weissmann.)

CHARAXUS (Χαραξος) of Mytilene, son of Seamantrondamus and brother of the famous Sappho, fell desperately in love with Rhodopis the hetaera at Naucratis in Egypt, ransomed her from slavery for a large sum of money, and, according to Suidas (εναν ταμου), married her. For this, Her-rodotus tells us, he was vehemently satirized by his sister on his return to Mytilene, though indeed
the passage is capable of another interpretation, and may mean, that the woman who had infatuated him was the object of Sapho's attack. Athenaeus, contradicting Herodotus, calls the hetaera in question Dories; and Suidas tells us (εναν ταμου αδης), that Doricles was the name which Sapho called her in her poem. (Herod. ii. 135; Suid. εν, Xerxes; Athen. xii. p. 696, b; Synh. xvii. p. 608;
Muller, Lit. of Greece, ch. xii. § 6; Ov. Her. xv.
117.)

CHARIS (Χαρις), an Athenian general, who for a long series of years contrived by profuse corruption to maintain his influence with the people, in spite of his very disreputable character. We first hear of him in b.c. 857, as being sent to the aid of the Phocians, who were hard pressed by the Arcadians and Argives, assisted by the Theban commander at Secyn. His operations were successful in relieving them, and it was in this campaign under him that Aeschines, the orator, first distinguished himself. (Xen. Hell. vii. 2. §§ 18–23; Diod. xv. 75; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 50.) From this scene of action he was recalled to take the command against Oropus [Gallistatus, No. 3];
and the recovery of their harbour by the Sicyoniates from the Spartan garrison, immediately on his departure, shows how important his presence had been for the support of the Lacedaemonian cause in the north of the Peloponnesus. (Xen. Hell. vii.
4. § 1, comp. vii. 3. § 3.) [Euphrion, Pasibulus.] In 361 he was appointed to succeed Leothenes, in the defeat of the latter by Alexander of Phae-rae [p. 125, a.], and, sailing to Corecyne, he gave his aid, strange to say, to an oligarchical conspire there, whereby the democracy was overthrown with much bloodshed,—a step by which he could not escape the suspicion towards Athens on the part of the ejeclt, while he failed at the same time to conciliate the oligarchs. (Diod. xv.
95.) The necessary consequence was the loss of the island to the Athenians when the Social war broke out. In 358 Chares was sent to Thrace as general with full power, and obliged Charidemus to ratify the treaty which he had made with Athe-nodorus. [Charidemus.] In the ensuing year
he was appointed to the conduct of the Social war, in the second campaign of which, after the death of Chabrias, Iphicrates and Timotheus were joined with him in the command, b.c. 356. According to Diodorus, his colleagues having refused, in consequence of a storm, to risk an engagement for which he was eager, he accused them to the people, and they were recalled and subsequently brought to trial. As C. Nepos tells it, Chares actually attacked the enemy in spite of the weather, was worsted, and, in order to screen himself,
charged his colleagues with not supporting him.
In the prosecution he was aided by Aristophon, the Athenian. (Diol. vii. 7, 21; Nep. Tim. 3; Arist. Rhet. ii. 23. § 7, iii. 10. § 7; Isocr. rep.
Aret. § 137; Deanim. c. Polyb. § 17.) Being now left in the sole command, and being in want of money, which he was afraid to apply for from home, he relieved his immediate necessities by entering, compelled perhaps by his mercenaries, to the service of Artabanes, the revolted satrap of Western Asia. The Athenians at first approved of this proceeding, but afterwards ordered him to drop his connexion with Artabanes on the complaint of Artaxerces III. (Ochus); and it is pro-table that the threat of the latter to support the confederates against Athens hastened at least the termination of the war, in accordance with the wishes of Eubulus and Isocrates, and in opposition to those of Chares and his party. (Diol. vii. 22; Rhet. ii. 17. § 16.) In b.c. 355 Chares was sent against Sestus, which, as well as Cardia, seems to have refused submission notwithstanding the cession of the Chersonese to Athens in 357. [Cerinth.leges.] He took the town, massacred the men, and sold the women and children for slaves. (Diol. vi.
34.) In the Olynthian war, b.c. 349, he was appointed general of the mercenaries sent from Athens to the aid of Olynthus; but he seems to have effected little or nothing. The command was then entrusted to Charidemus, who in the ensuing year, 348, was again superseded by Chares. In this campaign he gained some slight success on one occasion over Philip's mercenaries, and celebrated it by a feast given to the Athenians with a portion of the money which had been sacrilegiously taken from Delphi, and some of which had found its way into his hands. (Diol. xvi. 52–55; Philochor.
ap. Dionys. p. 735; Theopomp. and Herod. ap.
Athen. xii. p. 582.) On his return he was impacted by Cephisodotus, who complained, that "he was endeavouring to give his account after having got the people right by the throat" (Arist.
Rhet. iii. 10. § 7), an allusion perhaps merely to the great embarrassment of Athens at the time.
(See a very unsatisfactory explanation in Mitford, ch. 39, sec. 2.) In r.c. 346 we find him compelling in Thrace; and, when Philip was preparing to march against Cerinth.leges, complaints arrived at Athens from the Chersonese that Chares had withdrawn from his station, and was nowhere to be found; and, the people being obliged to send a squadron in quest of him with the extraordinary message, that "the Athenians were surprised that,
while Philip was marching against the Chersonese, they did not know where their general and their forces were." That he had been engaged in some private expedition of plunder is probable enough.
In the same year, and before the departure of the second embassy from Athens to Macedonia on the subject of the peace, a despatch arrived from Chars stating the hopeless condition of the affairs of Cerinth.leges. (Dem. de Fals. Leg. pp. 380, 391, 447; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. pp. 29, 37, 40.) After this we lose sight of Chares for several years, during which he probably resided at Sigeum, which, ac-

was with him a favoured residence, as supplying more opportunity for the indulgence of his profligate propensities than he could find at Athens. But in a speech of Demosthenes delivered in B.C. 341 (de Chars. p. 97) he is spoken of as possessing much influence at that time in the Athenian council; and we may consider him therefore to have been one of those who authorized and defended the proceedings of Diopites against Philip in Thrace. In B.C. 340 he was appointed to the command of the force which was sent to aid Byzantium against Philip; but his character excited the suspicions of the Byzantines, and they refused to receive him. Against the enemy he effected nothing: his only exploits were against the allies of Athens, and these he plundered unscrupulously. He was accordingly superseded by Phocion, whose success was brilliant. (Diod. vii. 74, &c.; Phil. Ep. ad Alex. op. Dem. p. 165; Plut. Phoc. 14.) In 338 he was sent to the aid of Amphissa against Philip, who defeated him together with the Theban general, Proxenus. Of this defeat, which is mentioned by Aeschines, Demosthenes in his reply says nothing, but speaks of two battles in which the Athenians were victorious. (Polyb. iv. 2; Aesch. c. Cleon. p. 74; Dem. de Cor. p. 300; see Mitford, ch. 42, sec. 4; Clinton, Hist. ii. pp. 293, 294.) In the same year Chares was one of the commanders of the Athenian forces at the battle of Chaeronea, for the disastrous result of which he escaped censure, or at least prosecution, though Lysicles, one of his colleagues, was tried and condemned to death. (Diod. xvi. 85, 86; Weiss. ad loc.) He is mentioned by Arrian among the Athenian orators and generals whom Alexander required to be surrendered to him in B.C. 333, though he was afterwards prevailed on by Domades not to press the demand against any but Charesmus. Plutarch, however, omits the name of Chares in the list which he gives us. (Arr. Anab. i. 10; Plut. Dem. 25.) When Alexander invaded Asia in B.C. 334, Chares was living at Sicyon, and he is mentioned again by Arrian (Anab. i. 12) as one of those who came to meet the king and pay their respects to him on his way to Illyria. Yet we afterwards find him commanding at Dareius at Mytilene, which had been gained in B.C. 333 by Pharnabazus and Autophradates, but which Chares was compelled to surrender in the ensuing year. (Arr. Anab. ii. 1, iii. 2.) From this period we hear no more of him, but it is probable that he ended his days at Sicyon. As a general, Chares has been charged with rashness, especially in the needless exposure of his own person (Plut. Pelop. 2); and he seems indeed to have been possessed of no very superior talent, though perhaps he was, during the greater portion of his career, the best commander that Athens was able to find. In politics we see him connected throughout with Demosthenes (see Dem. de Fals. Legy. p. 447), — a striking example of the strange associations which political interests are often thought to necessitate. Morally he must have been an inebrius on any party to which he attached himself, notwithstanding the apparent assistance he might sometimes render it through the orators whom he is said to have kept constantly in pay. His profligacy, however, is not a note which unblushingly adorned and gloried in, openly ridiculing, — what might have abashed any other man, — the austere virtue of Phocion. His bad faith passed into a proverb; and his incapacity was extraordinary, even amidst the miserable system then prevailing, when the citizens of Athens would neither fight their own battles nor pay the men who fought them, and her commanders had to support their mercenaries as best they could. In fact, his character presents no one single point on which the mind can rest with pleasure. He lived, as we know, during the period of his country's decline, and may serve, indeed, as a specimen of a class of men whose influence in a nation is no less a cause than a symptom of its fall. (Plut. Phoc. 5; Theopomp. op. Athen. l. c.; Inser. de Pace; Asch. de Fals. Legy. p. 37; Bubul. op. Arisl. Rhet. l. 13, § 15; Suid. s. v. Χάρης και Χρυσίτες.)

CHARLES (Χάρης), of Mytilene, an officer at the court of Alexander the Great, whose duty it was to introduce strangers to the king (εξευρετιστής), wrote a history or rather a collection of anecdotes concerning the campaigns and the private life of Alexander (ἐπι Αλέξανδρον ἐπιγένεσιν) in ten books, fragments of which are preserved by Aristobulus (i. p. 27, l. 33, 383, c. 124, iv. p. 171, b. v. p. 277, a. x. 434, c. 436, xii. p. 518, 519, 514, 514, 515, 538, 538, 543, xii. p. 571), by Polybius (De rebus gestis 20, 24, 46, 54, 55, 70, de Fact. Alex. ii. 9). He is also quoted by Pliny (H. N. xiii. table of contents, xxxvii. 2) and A. Cellius (v. 2). [P.S.]

CHARLES (Χάρης), of Lindus in Rhodes, a statue in bronze, was the favourite pupil of Lysippos, who took the greatest pains with his education, and did not grudge to initiate him into all the secrets of his art. Chares flourished at the beginning of the third century B.C. (Aenon. ad Herenn. iv. 6; printed among Cicero's rhetorical works.) He was one of the greatest artists of Rhodes, and indeed he may be considered as the chief founder of the Rhodian school of sculpture. Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 7. s. 18) mentions among his works a colossal head, which P. Lentinus (the friend of Cicero, cons. b. c. 67) brought to Rome and placed in the Capitol, and which completely threw into the shade another admirable colossal head by Decius which stood beside it. (The apparently unnecessary emendation of Sillig and Thierach, improbabilis for probabilis, even if adopted, would not alter the general meaning of the sentence, at least with reference to Chares.)

But the chief work of Chares was the statue of the Sun, which, under the name of "The Colossus of Rhodes," was celebrated as one of the seven wonders of the world. Of a hundred colossal statues of the Sun which adorned Rhodes, and any one of which, according to Pliny, would have made famous the place that might possess it, this was much the largest. The accounts of its height differ slightly, but all agree in making it upwards of 105 English feet. Pliny (l. c.), evidently repeating the account of some one who had seen the statue after its fall, if he had not seen it himself, says that few could embrace its thumb; the fingers were larger than most statues; the hollows within the broken limbs resembled coves; and inside of it might be seen huge stones, which had been inserted to make it stand firm. It was twelve years in erecting (b. c. 292—280), and it cost 200 talents. This money was subscribed by the engines of commerce, among which Demetrius Poliorcetes presented to the Rhodians after they had compelled him to give up his siege of their city. (b. c. 303.) The colossal stood at the entrance of the harbour of Rhodes. There is no authority for the statement that its legs extended over the mouth of the harbour. It was overthrown and broken to pieces by an earthquake 56 years after its erection. (B.C. 224, Euseb. Chron., and Chron. Pasch. sub OL. 139. 1; Polyb. v. 58, who places the earthquake a little later, in B.C. 218.) Strabo (xiv. p. 652), says, that an oracle forbade the Rhodians to restore it. (See also Philo Byzant. de VIT. Orbis Miraculis, c. iv. p. 15.) The fragments of the colossus remained on the ground 292 years, till they were sold by Moavych, the general of the caliph Othman IV., to a Jew of Emesa, who carried them away on 900 camels. (A.D. 672.) Hence Scaliger calculated the weight of the bronze at 700,000 pounds.

Considering the mechanical difficulties both of modelling and of casting so large a statue, the nicety required to fit together the separate pieces in which it must necessarily have been cast, and the skill needed to adjust its proportions, according to the laws of optics, and to adapt the whole style of the composition to its enormous size, we must assign to Chares a high place as an inventor in his art.

There are extant Rhodian coins bearing the head of the Sun surrounded with rays, probably copied from the statue of Chares or from some of the other colossal statues of the sun at Rhodes. (Eckhel, Doct. Num. ii. pp. 602-3; Rasche, Lex. Univ. Rea Num. s. v. Rhedus, A., b. 11, &c.)

There are two epigrams on the colossus in the Greek Anthology. (Brinck, Anall. i. p. 143, iii. pp. 198-9; Jacob, i. 74, iv. 160. Respecting these epigrams, and the question whether Laches completed the work which Chares commenced, see Jacob, Comment. i. pp. 287-8, iii. 2, p. 8, and Büttiger, Anecd. zu 24 Vorträgen über die Archäologie, pp. 199-201.)

CHARICLES (Χαρικλῆς), an Athenian demagogue, son of Apollodorus, was one of the commissioners (γεώργα) appointed to investigate the affair of the mutilation of the Hermæ in B.C. 415, on which occasion he inflamed the passions of the people by representing the outrage as connected with a plot for the destruction of the democracy. (Thuc. vi. 27-29, 53, 60, &c.; Andoc. de Myst. p. 6.) In B.C. 413 he was sent in command of a squadron round the Peloponnesus together with Demosthenes, and succeeded with him in fortifying a small peninsula on the coast of Laconia, to serve as a position for annoying the enemy. (Thuc. vii. 20, 26.) In B.C. 404 he was appointed one of the thirty tyrants; but he relinquished under the new government the control of the arts of the demagogue which had distinguished him under the democracy, still striving to carry favour with the dominant party by an unscrupulous advocacy of their most violent and tyrannical measures. We may conclude, that he was one of the remnant of the Thirty who withdrew to Eleusis on the establishment of the council of Ten, and who, according to Xenophon, were treacherously murdered in a conference by the leaders of the popular party on the restoration of democracy in B.C. 403. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3, § 2, 4, §§ 24, 43, Mem. i. 2. §§ 51, &c.; Aristot. Polit. vi. 6, ed. Bekker; Lys. e. Bactr. p. 125; Isocr. de Leg. p. 385, &c.) In the passage last referred to Chares is mentioned as having been driven into banishment previously to his appointment as one of the tyrants.

CHARICLEIDES (Χαρικλείδης), a writer of the new comedy, of uncertain date. A play of his called "Aresias" (the Chain) is quoted by Athenaeus (vii. p. 325, d.).

CHARICLEITUS (Χαρικλείτους), one of the commanders of the Rhodian fleet, which, in B.C. 190, defeated that of Antiochus the Great under Hannibal and Apollonius, off Side in Pamphylia. (Livy, xxvii. 20, 21.)

CHARICLES (Χαρικλῆς), an eminent physician at Rome, who sometimes attended the Emperor Tiberius, and who is said to have predicted his approaching death from the weak state of his pulse, A.D. 37. (Suet. Tib. 72; Tac. Ann. vi. 50.) Some medical formulae are preserved by Gelen (De Compos. Medicinae, sec. Loc. i. 1, vol. ii. pp. 556, 579, &c.) which may perhaps belong to the same person. [W. A. G.]

CHARICLO (Χαρικλώ), 1. The wife of the centaur Cheiron, and mother of Castyus. She was a daughter of Apollo, and according to others of Perseus or of Oceanus. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 181; Ov. Met. ii. 636.)

2. A nymph of the wife of Euenos and mother of Teiresias. It was at her request that Teiresias, who had been blinded by Athena, obtained from this goddess the power to understand the voices of the birds, and to walk with his black staff as safely as if he saw. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 7; Callim. Hymn. in Pol. 67, &c.)

CHARIDEMUS (Χαριδέμος). 1. Of Ephesos, son of a woman of Orenus by an obscure father, if we may believe the account of Demostenes in speech filled with invective against him. (Dem. c. Aristoc. p. 691.) On the same authority, we learn that he began his military career as a slinger among the light-armed, that he then became commander of a pirate vessel, and finally the captain of a mercenary band of "free companions." (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 668, 669.) In this capacity he first entered the Athenian service under Hippocrates, who had been sent against Amphipolis, about B.C. 367. At the end of somewhat more than three years, Amphipolis agreed to surrender to the Athenians, and delivered hostages to Hipocrates for the performance of the promise: these, on being superseded by Timotheus, he entrusted to Charidemus, who restored them to the Amphipolitans in spite of the decree of the Athenian people requiring them to be sent to Athens, and then passed over to Cotys, king of Thrace, who was hostile to the Athenians at the time. In B.C. 360, when Timotheus was meditating his attack on Amphipolis, Charidemus was engaged to enter the service of the Olymphians, who were preparing to defend it; but, on his passage from Cardia in the Chersonesus, he was captured by the Athenians, and consented to aid them against Olymphus. After the failure of Timotheus at Amphipolis in the same year, Charidemus crossed over to Asia and entered the service of Memnon and Mentor, brothers-in-law of Artabazus, who had been imprisoned by Autophradates, but whose cause they still maintained. (Artabanus, No. 4.) He received his employers, however, and seized the towns of Scopis, Cebren, and Illium; but, being closely pressed by Artabazus after his release from prison, he applied to the Athenians to interpose in his behalf, promising to help them in recovering the Chersonesus. Artabazus, however, allowed him to depart uninjured, by the advice of Memnon and Mentor.
before the arrival of the Athenian squadron destined for the Hellespont under Cephisodotus; and Charidemus, on his return to Europe, in spite of his promise, lent his services to Cotya, whose daughter he married, and laid siege to Chithote and Elaeus. (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 669-674.) On the murder of Cotya, b.c. 336, he adhered to the cause of Cersoleistes, on whose behalf he conducted the struggle with the Athenians, both by war and diplomacy, for the possession of the Chersonesus. He compelled Cephisodotus to submit, with respect to it, to a compromise most unfavorable to his country; and though Athenodorus (uniting with Amadocus and Berisades, and taking advantage of the national indignation excited by the murder of Miltocytches, which Charidemus had procured from the Cardini) obliged Cersoleistes to consent to a threefold division of the kingdom, and to the surrender of the Chersonesus to Athens,—yet, on the arrival of Chabrias with only one ship, the crafty Euboean again renounced the treaty, and drove the Athenian general to accept another still more unfavorable to Athens than that of Cephisodotus. But this was repudiated by the Athenians; and, at length, after several struggles, Chabrias surrendered Chares to the Athenians; and Charidemus, having the command of the Hellespont with a sufficient force and with the authority of commander autocrat, Charidemus consented to ratify the treaty of Athenodorus, still, however, contriving to retain the town of Cardia; and his partizans among the orators at Athens having persuaded the people that they owed to him the cession of the Chersonesus (a strange delusion, if the narrative of events in Demosthenes may be depended on), they rewarded his supposed services with the franchise of the city and a golden crown. (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 636, 674—682; Arist. Rhet. lib. ii. 28, § 17; comp. Isocr. de Fec. p. 165, c.) This appears to have been in b.c. 357. In b.c. 352, hoping perhaps to recover Amphipolis through his aid, they passed a decree in spite of the opposition of Demosthenes and his party (c. Aristoc. p. 231), pronouncing the person of Charidemus inviolable, and rendering any one who should kill him amenable to justice from any part of the Athenian empire. [CERSOLEISTES.] In b.c. 349, after the recall of Chares, Charidemus was appointed by the Athenians as commander in the Olyanthian war. In conjunction with the Olyanthians, he ravaged Pellene and Bethicena, which seem to have been then in the hands of Philip; but he caused much offence by his insolent and profligate conduct at Olynthus, and in the ensuing year he was accused and replaced by Chares. (Philostr. ap. Diog. p. 735; Theopomp. ap. Athen. x. p. 436, c.) Henceforth he disappears from history, though he has been identified by some with the Charidemus mentioned immediately below, in opposition, we think, to internal evidence. (Milford’s Greece, ch. 48, sec. 1; Thrilwall’s Greece, vol. v. p. 192, note 4, vol. vi. p. 101.)

2. An Athenian, who in b.c. 358 was sent with Antiphon as ambassador to Philip of Macedon, ostensibly to confirm the friendship between the king and the Athenians, but authorized to negotiate with him secretly for the recovery of Amphipolis, and to promise that the republic, in return for it, would make him master of Pydna. He then was Sparta’s envoy, with the army of 30,000 to which Demosthenes refers in Olynth. ii. p. 19, ad fin. (Theopomp. ap. Stcid. s. v. τι εστι το εν τω δημαρχους φθαινει, η τ. λ.; comp. Diod. xiii. 49; Deinarch. c. Dem. p. 91, ad fin.) It was perhaps this same Charidemus whom the Athenians, had they been not restrained by Phocion’s party, would have made general to act against Philip after the battle of Chaeroneia, b.c. 338, and who, being at the court of Macedonia as an envoy at the time of Philip’s murder, b.c. 336, transmitted to Demosthenes, whose friend he was, the earliest intelligence of that event. (Plut. Alex. 16, Dem. 22; Aeschin. c. Ctes. p. 64.) He was one of the orators whose surrender was required by Alexander in b.c. 335, after the destruction of Thebes, and the only one in whose behalf he refused to recede from his demand on the mediation of Demades. Charidemus, being thus obliged to leave his country, fled to Asia, and took refuge with Darius, by whose orders he was summarily put to death in b.c. 333, shortly before the battle of Issus, having exasperated the king by some advice too freely given, tending to abate his confidence in his power and in the courage of his native troops. (Arr. Anab. i. 10; Plut. Dem. 23, Plios. 17; Diod. xvii. 15, 50; Deinarch. c. Dem. p. 94.) Diodorus (xvii. 39) speaks of Charidemus as having been high in favor with Philip of Macedon; but the inconstancy of this with several of the authorities above referred to is pointed out by Wesseling. (Ad Diod. l.c.)

CHARIDEMUS (Χάριδεμος), a Greek physician, who was one of the followers of Erasistratus and probably lived in the third century b.c. He is mentioned by Caelius Aurelianus (Do Mob. Aenit. iii. 15, p. 227), and was probably the father of the physician Hermogenes. [W. A. O.]

CHARILAUUS (Χαριλαύας). 1. Brother of Macedo, surnamed Simeon. When the Persians invaded the island, towards the commencement of the reign of Dareius Hystaspis, for the purpose of establishing Sylophon, the brother of Polycrates, in the tyranny, Macedo submitted to them, and agreed to abdicate; but Charilaius, who was somewhat crazy, obtained leave from his brother to fall with a body of soldiers on a party of the most distinguished Persians, who were sitting in front of the acropolis, and waiting for the ratification of the treaty. The consequence of this treacherous murder was a wholesale massacre of the Samians by order of the Persian general, Otanes. (Herod. iii. 114—149.)

2. An Italian Greek, one of the chief men of Pahepolis, who, together with Nymphius, betrayed the town to Q. Publius Philo, the Roman proconsul, in the second Syrian war (b.c. 223), and died in the Samnite garrison. (Liv. viii. 25, 26.) [E. E.]

CHARILAUS (Χαριλαύας), a Locrian, and a dramatic poet. Whether he wrote tragedies or comedies is uncertain, nor is anything further known of him than that plays of his were represented at Athens in b.c. 328. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 428, ed. Haud.)

CHARILAUUS or CHARILLUS (Χαριλάος, Χάριλλαος), a king of Sparta, son of Polydectes, and 7th of the Eurypontids, is said by Plutarch to have received his name from the general joy excited by the justice of his uncle Lycurgus when he placed him, yet a new-born infant, on the royal seat, and brought the Spartans to acknowledge him for their king. (Plut. Lyce. 31; Pass. ii. 36; Just. ii. 9; Scal. ad Plat. Rep. x. p. 474.) According to Plutarch, the reforms projected by Lycurgus on his return from his voluntary exile at first alarmed Charilaius for his personal safety; but he soon became reassured, and co-operated with his uncle in the promotion of his plans. (Plut. Lyc. 8.) Yet this is not very consistent with Aristotle's statement (Polit. v. 12, ed. Bekk.), that an aristocratic government was established on the ruins of the tyranny of Charilaius, which latter account again is still less reconcilable with the assertion of Plutarch (i. c.), that the kingly power had lost all its substance when Lycurgus began to remodel the constitution. There is, however, much probability in the explanation offered as an hypothesis by Thirlwall. (Greece, vol. i. p. 299, &c.)

We hear from Pausanias that Charilaius was engaged successfully in a war with the Argives, which had slumbered for two generations. He aided also his colleague Archeclus in destroying the border-town of Aegys, which they suspected of an intention of revolting to the Areadsians; and he commanded the Spartans in that disastrous contest with Tegea, mentioned by Herodotus (i. 66), in which the Tegean women are said to have taken up arms and to have caused the rout of the invaders by rushing forth from an ambuscade during the heat of the battle. Charilaius himself was taken prisoner, but was dismissed without ransom on giving a promise (which he did not keep), that the Spartans should abstain in future from attacking Tegea. (Paus. iii. 2, 7, viii. 48.) For the chronology of the reign of Charilaius, see Clouston. (Pest. i. p. 140, &c.) There are two passages of Herodotus, which, if we follow the common reading, are at variance with some portions of the above account; but there is good reason for suspecting in both of them a corruption of the text. (Herod. i. 65; Larch. ad loc., viii. 131; comp. Clout. Pest. i. p. 144, note b.)

CHARIMANDER, the author of a work on Comets, quoted by Seneca. (Quaest. Nat. vii. 5.)

CHARIS (Χαρίς), the personification of Grace and Beauty, which the Roman poets translate by Gratia and we after them by Grace. Homer, without giving her any other name, describes a Charis as the wife of Hephæstus. (I. xviii. 382.) Hesiod (Theog. 945) calls the Charis who is the wife of Hephæstus, Aglaia, and the youngest of the Charites. (Comp. Bystath. ad Hom. p. 114.) In Homer the Charites are Aphrodite, Eris, and Charis; in Hesiod Aphrodite was the wife of Hephæstus, from which we may infer, if not the identity of Aphrodite and Charis, at least a close connexion and resemblance in the notions entertained about the two divinities. The idea of personified grace and beauty was, as we have already seen, divided into a plurality of beings at a very early time, probably to indicate the various ways in which the beautiful is manifested in the world and adorns it. In the Iliad itself (xiv. 269) Pasithena is called one of the younger Charites, who is destined to be the wife of Sleep, and the plural Charites occurs several times in the Homeric poems. (Od. xvii. 194.)

The parentage of the Charites is differently described; the most common account makes them the daughters of Zeus either by Hera, Eurynome, Beunoia, Eurydome, Harmonia, or Lethe. (Hesiod. Theog. 907, &c.; Apollod. i. 3, § 1; Pind. Ov. xiv. 15; Phurm. 15; Orph. Hymn. 59, 2; Stat. Theb. ii. 280; Bystath. ad Hom. p. 392.) According to others they were the daughters of Apollo by Aegle or Euanthe (Paus. ix. 35, § 1), or of Dionysus by Aphrodite or Coronis. The Homeric poems mention only one Charis, or of an indefinite number in the plural, and from the passage in which Pasithena is mentioned, it would almost seem as if the poet would intimate that he was thinking of a great number of Charites and of a division of them into classes. Hesiod distinctly mentions three Charites, whose names are Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia, and this number as well as these names subsequently became generally established, although certain places in Greece retained their ancient and established number. Thus the Spartans had only two Charites, Clea and Phene, and the Athenians the same number, Anxoo and Hegemone, who were worshipped there from the earliest times. Hermesiamax added Peitho as a third. (Paus. ix. 35.) Sostratus (ap. Bystath. ad Hom. p. 164) relates that Aphrodite and the three Charites, Pasithene, Cale, and Euphrosyne, disputed about their beauty with one another, and when Teiresias awarded the prize to Cale he was changed by Aphrodite into an old woman, but Cale rewarded him with a beautiful head of hair and took him to Crete. The name Cale in this passage has led some critics to think that Homer also (I. xviii. 393) mentions the names of two Charites, Pasithene and Cale, and that Καλή should accordingly be written by a capital initial.

The character and nature of the Charites are sufficiently expressed by the names they bear: they were conceived as the goddesses who gave lustre and joy to life by spreading about and guiding the arts. Gracefulness and beauty in social intercourse are therefore ascribed to them. (Horat. Carm. iii. 21, 22; Pind. Ov. iv. 7, &c.) They are mostly described as being in the service or attendance of other divinities, as real joy exists only in circles where the individual gives up his own self and makes it his main object to afford pleasure to others. The less beauty is ambitions to rule, the greater is its victory; and the less homage it demands, the more freely is it paid. These seem to be the ideas embodied in the Charites. They lend their grace and beauty to everything that delights and elevates god and man. This notion was probably the cause of Charis being called the wife of Hephæstus, the divinity of arts. The most perfect works of art are thus called the works of the Charites, and the greatest artists are their favourites. The gentleness and gracesfulness which they impart to man's ordinary pleasures are expressed by their moderating the exciting influence of wine (Hor. Carm. iii. 19, 15; Pind. Ov. xii. 10), and by their accompanying Aphrodite and Eros. (Hom. Od. xviii. 564, xviii. 194; Paus. vi. 24, 3, § 5.) They also assist Hermes and Peitho to give grace to eloquence and persuasion (Hesiod. Op. 63), and wisdom itself receives its charms from them. Poetry, however, is the art which is especially favoured by them, whence they are called άργοστοι και φιλοερυθώνες. For the same reason they are the friends of the Muses, with whom they live together in Olympus. (Hes. Theog. 64; Eurip. Herc. fur. 673; Theocrit. xvi. 11.) Poets are inspired by the Muses, but the application of their songs to the embellishment of life and the festivals of the gods is the work of the Charites. Late Roman writers describe the Charites (Gratae) as the symbols of gratitude and benevolence, to which they were led by the meaning of the word gratia.
CHARISIUS.

in their own language. (Senec. De Benef. i. 3; comp. Diod. iv. 73.)

The worship of the Charites was believed to have been first introduced into Boeotia by Eteocles or Eteocles, the son of Cephusius, in the valley of that river. (Paus. i. 35. § 1; Theocr. xvi. 104; Pind. Ol. xiv.) At Orchomenos and in the island of Paros a festival, the xapfros or xapfriovis, was celebrated to the Charites. (Busti, Not. II. 1043; Apollod. i. 15. § 7.) At Orchomenos they were worshipped from early times in the form of rude stones, which were believed to have fallen from heaven in the time of Eteocles. (Paus. i. 38. § 1; Strab. i. p. 414.) Statues of them are mentioned in various parts of Greece, as at Sparta, on the road from Sparta to Amyclae, in Crete, at Athens, Elis, Hermione, and others. (Paus. ii. 22. § 3; iii. 34. § 10; iii. 14. § 6; vi. 24. § 5.) They were often represented as the companions of other gods, such as Hera, Hermes, Eros, Dionysus, Aphrodite, the Horae, and the Muses. In the ancient statues of Apollo at Delos and Lampsacus, he carried the Charites on his hand. In the early times the Charites were represented dressed, but afterwards their figures were always made naked, though even Pausanias (ix. 35. § 2) did not know who had introduced the custom of representing them naked. Specimens of both dressed and naked representations of the Charites are still extant. Their character is that of unsuspicious maidens in the full bloom of life, and they usually embrace one another. Their attributes differ according to the divinities upon whom they attend; as the companions of Apollo they often carry musical instruments, and as the companions of Aphrodite they carry myrtles, roses, or ôda, the favourite game of youth. (Hirt, Mythol. Ritiil. ii. p. 214. xc.)

CHARISIUS (Xapfros), a son of Lycooon, to whom tradition ascribed the foundation of Charisias in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1; Steph. Byz. s. a.)

[LS.]

CHARISIUS (Xapfros), a Greek orator and a contemporary of Demosthenes, wrote orations for others, in which he imitated the style of Lyceus. He was in his turn imitated by Hegesias. (Cle. Brut. 63.) His orations, which were extant in the time of Quintilian and Rublius Lupus, must have been of considerable merit, as we learn from the former writer (x. i. § 70), that they were ascribed by some to Menander. Rublius Lupus (I. 10. ii. 6) has given two extracts from them. (Comp. Ruhnken, ad Rutil. Laps. i. 10: Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredtsaart. § 54, n. 34.)

CHARISIUS, a presbyter of the church of the Philadelphians in the fifth century. Shortly before the general council held at Ephesus, A. D. 431, Antonius and James, prebendars of Constantinople, and attached to the Nestorian party, came to Philadelphia with commendatory letters from Anastasius and Photius, and cunningly prevailed upon several of the clergy and laity who had just renounced the errors of the Quarrhtsionns (Nean- der, Kirchengesch. ii. 2, p. 615), to compose a perfectly confession of faith tainted with the Nestorian errors. But Charisius boldly withstood them, and therefore they proscribed him as a heretic from the communion of the pious. When the council assembled at Ephesus, Charisius accused before the fathers that composed it Anastasius, Photius, and James, exhibiting against them a book of indictment, and the confession which they had imposed upon the dwellers Philadelphia. He also presented a brief confession of his own faith, harmonizing with the Nicene creed, in order that he might clear himself from the suspicion of heresy. The time of his birth and death is unknown. He appears only in connexion with the Ephesian council, A. D. 431.

The indictment which he presented to the synod, his confession of faith, a copy of the exposition of the creed as corrupted by Anastasius and Photius, the subscriptions of those who were missed, and the decree of the council after hearing the case, are given in Greek and Latin in the Socra- sanetia Consennia, edited by Labbe and Cassert, vol. iii. p. 673, &c. Paris, 1671, folio. See also Cave's Historia Literarum, pp. 327, 328, ed. Lond. 1688, fol.

CHARISIUS, AURELIUS ARCADIUS, a Roman jurist, one of the latest in time of those whose works are cited in the Digest. Herecinsius Modestinus, who was living in the reign of Consti- dianus III., is usually considered to be the last juris of the classical period of Roman jurisprudence. "His oracula jurisconsultorum omnium," says the celebrated Jac. Godefroi (Manuale Juris. i. 7), "sic ut ultimam Jtorum Modestinum diuere vere licet." For an interval of 80 or 90 years after Modestins, no jurist appears whose works are honoured with citation in the Digest, unless Julius Aquila or Furius Anthismus belongs to that interval. The only two who can be named with certainty as posterior to Modestins are Charisius and Hormogeniuss. Of these two, the priority of date is probably, for several reasons, to be assigned to the former. The name Charisius is frequently mentioned, that Hormogenius occupies the last place in the Florentine Index. Charisius cites Modestins with applause (Dig. 50. tit. 4. s. 18. § 26), but his date is more closely to be collected from Dig. 1. tit. 11. s. un. § 1, where he states that ap- peal from the sentences of the praefecti petiturio has been abolished. Now, this appeal was abolished by Constantine the Great, A. D. 331 (Cod. 7. tit. 62. s. 19), and, from the language of Charisius in Dig. 1. tit. 11, it may be inferred, that Constantine was alive at the time when that passage was written. Charisius is sometimes (e. g. Dig. 92. tit. 5. s. 1. pr.) cited in the Digest by the name "Arcadius qui est Charisius," and by Justinian Lydus (de Mag. Pop. Rom. i. c. 14), but is cited by the name Aurelius simply. The name Charisius was not uncommon in the decline of the empire, and, when it occurs on coins, it is usually spelled Caryis, if it were etymologically con- nected with Carus rather than xapfros. The jurist, according to Panirol (de Clar. Jur. Interpp. pp. 13, 59), was the same as the Arcadius to whom Carus, Carinus, and Numerianus directed a re- script, A. D. 283. (Cod. 9. tit. 11. s. 4.) There is a constitution of Diosclitius and Maximianus, addressed, A. D. 300—2, to Arcadius Cereius. (Cod. 2. tit. 3. 27.) Pannier's identification of Charisius for Charisius, and would also identify our Charisius with the Charisiius (Vat. M.S. &c; vulg. lect. Charissimus), praes of Syria, to whom was addressed (A. D. 290) an earlier constitution of the same emperors. (Cod. 9. tit. 41. s. 9.) These identifications, however, though not absolutely impossible, rest upon mere conjecture, and would require the jurist to have lived to a very advanced Three works of Charisius are cited in the Digest. Four extracts (Dig. 22. tit. 5. s. 1; Dig. 22. tit. 5. s. 21; Dig. 22. tit. 5. s. 25; Dig. 48. tit. 18. s. 10) are made from his Liber singularis de Testibus; one (Dig. 50. tit. 4. s. 18) from his Liber singularis de Muneribus civilibus; and one (Dig. 1. tit. 1. s. un.) from his Liber singularis de Officio Praefecti praetorio. In the inscription prefixed to the latter passage (Dig. 1. tit. 11. s. un.), he is styled magister libellorum, and Cujus (Oss. vii. 2), probably suspecting that he held office under Constantine, conjectures that he was a Christian. For this conjecture, however, there is no R. R. C. i. § 104.)

CHARIUS. FLAVIUS SOSTIPATER, a Latin grammarian, author of a treatise in five books, drawn up for the use of his son, entitled Institutiones Grammaticae, which has come down to us in a very imperfect state, a considerable portion of the first and fifth books being entirely wanting, as we at once discover by comparing the table of contents presented in the preface with what actually remains. It is a careful compilation from preceding writers upon the same subject, such as Flavius Capera, Valerius Longinus, Terentius Scantius, and above all Commilianus and Julius Romanus, from whom whole chapters are cited, and is particularly valuable on account of the number of quotations, apparently very accurate, from lost works. We can detect a close correspondence with many passages in the Ars Grammatica of Dioscorides, but Charisius is so scrupulous in referring to his authors, that we are led to conclude, since he makes no mention of Dioscorides, that the latter was the borrower. Commilianus is known to have flourished after Donatus and before Servius [Commilianus], therefore Charisius, being mentioned by Priscian, must belong to some period between the middle of the fourth and the end of the fifth centuries, Osann, who has in several places quoted without mentioning the author that he ought to be placed about the year A.D. 400, in which case he probably enjoyed the advantage of consulting the great libraries of the metropolis, before they were pillaged by the Goths. We gather from his own words that he was a native of Campania, in religion a Christian, by profession a grammarian, following his occupation at Rome. The Edito Princeps of Charisius was published by J. Pierius Cynmusin, a pupil of Janus Parrhasius, who first discovered the work, at Naples, fol. 1532; the second, superintended by G. Fabriacus Chenalensis, was printed from Probusinus at Basle, 1451, and contains many corrections and improvements, but likewise many interpolations, since the editor was not assisted by any MS.; the third, included in the "Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui," of Putschius, Hanov. 1605, professes to be far more complete and accurate than the preceding, in consequence of the additional matter and various readings obtained from an excellent codex, the property of Janus Douza, of which, however, no detailed account is given, and of which no trace now remains. Nibbauer had paved the way for a new edition by collating and making extracts from the Neapolitan MS. originally employed by Cyntius, which affords means for greatly purifying and enlarging the text. These materials were promised by Nibbauer to Lindenburg and Charisius, but were not delivered to the author of his friend and the destruction of a portion of his papers by fire, succeeded in obtaining only a copy of Putschius with the various readings of the Neapolitan MS. marked on the margin. These are given in the edition of Charisius, which forms the first part of the fourth volume of the "Corpus Grammaticorum Latinorum Veterum," Lips. 4to. 1840. (Funecius, De ineditis ad doceendam Linguas Latinas Suetonii, c. iv. § 11; Osann, Beiträge zur Griech. und Röm. Literaturgesch., vol. ii. p. 319; Lersch, Die Sprachphilosophie der Alten, vol. ii. p. 163.)

CHARITON. CHARITON (Χαρίτων) of Aphrodisias, a town of Caria, is the name by which one of the Greek erotic prose writers calls himself; but the name is probably signified (from Χαρίων and Αφροδίς), as the time and position of the author certainly are. He represents himself as the secretary (διογγεφάρον) of the orator Athenagoras, evidently referring to the Syncesan orator mentioned by Theocydides (vi. 35, 36) as the political opponent of Hermocrates. The daughter of Hermocrates is the heroine of Chariton's work, which is a romance, in eight books, on the Loves of Chaerens and Callirhoe, under the following title Χαρίωνος Ἀφροδίτος τῆς τελ. Ἡρμοκράτους καὶ Καλλιροίου ἱερομαθίας. The work begins with the marriage of the heroine, which is presently followed by her burial. She comes to life again in the tomb, and is carried off by robbers. After various adventures, she is restored to Chaerens. The incidents are natural and pleasing, and the style simple; but the work as a whole is reckoned inferior to those of Achilles Tatius, Heliodorus, Longus, and Xenophon of Ephesus. Nothing is known respecting the real life or the time of the author. The critics place him variously between the fifth and ninth centuries after Christ. The general opinion is, that he was the latest of the erotic prose writers, except perhaps Xenophon of Ephesus. The text of the work, from which it was printed by James Philip D'Orville, with a Latin version and notes by Reiske, in 3 vols. 4to. Amst. 1750. The commentary of D'Orville is esteemed one of the best on any ancient author. It was reprinted, with additional notes by Beck, 1 vol. 8vo. Lips. 1783. A very beautiful edition of the text was printed at Venice, 1812, 4to.

The book has been translated into German by Heyne, Leipzig, 1755, and Schneider, Leipzig, 1807; into French by Larcher, Paris, 1759 (reprinted in the Bibliothéque des Romans Grecs, Paris, 1797); and Fallet, 1770, and 1784; into Italian by A. Giacomelli, Rom. 1752, and others; into English by Becket and de Hondt, 1764.

CHARON, a Scythian, a poet of the 2nd century B.C., and one of the authors of the Apology of Socrates, is mentioned by Plato (Cic. Acad. Quaest. iv. 6, Orat. 16, de Orat. ii. 88; Plin. H. N. vii. 24; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 167, and the authorities there referred to.)

CHARON. 589

CHARYBDIS, a rock situated in the strait between Sicily and Calabria, and one of the hazards which the sailors had to contend with in their passage between the two islands. It is described by Homer as a rock of extraordinary depth, and one which was so dangerous that the sailors were compelled to stop and seek a safer channel. The name of Charybdis is derived from the Greek word charybdis, which means a whirlpool or a vortex, and it is said that the rock was so named because of the great depth of the water around it. The word charybdis is also used in a more general sense to denote any place of danger or difficulty, and is often used in literature and art to symbolize the trials and tribulations of life. The name of Charybdis has also been used in political and social contexts to refer to situations of great danger or difficulty. For example, in the context of politics, Charybdis may refer to a political crisis or a political conflict that is so severe that it threatens the stability of a government or a political system. In this sense, Charybdis is often used to describe situations in which the outcome is uncertain, and in which the stakes are high. Overall, the name of Charybdis is a powerful symbol of danger, difficulty, and the need for caution and caution in the face of great challenges.
CHARONDAS.

CHARON (Χάρων), a distinguished Thbean, who exposed himself to much danger by concealing Pelopidas and his fellow-conspirators in his house, when they returned to Thebes with the view of delivering it from the Spartans and the oligarchical government, b.c. 379. Charon himself took an active part in the enterprise, and, after its success, was made Botearch together with Pelopidas and Melion. (Xen. Hell. iv. § 3; Plut. Pelop. 7–19, c. 1. xxvi. passim.)

CHARON (Χάρων), literary. 1. A historian of Lampacnas, is mentioned by Tertullian (de Anim. 46) as prior to Herodotus, and is said by Suidas (s. v.) according to the common reading, to have flourished (γενυόμενος) in the time of Dareius Hystaspis, in the 79th Olympiad (b.c. 464); but, as Dareius died in b.c. 485, it has been proposed to read 68 for 69 in Suidas, thus placing the date of Charon in Ol. 69 or b.c. 504. He lived, however, as late as b.c. 464, for he is referred to by Phintarch (Thea. 27) as mentioning the flight of Themistocles to Asia in b.c. 463. We find the following list of his works in Suidas: 1. Αθηναογος. 2. Περιγενησις, a work quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 15); 6. Αριστομανθίας, a work quoted by Athenaeus (x. p. 47 b, c), where Schweighaeuser proposes to substitute ἄριστος (comp. Diock. 1, 26) thus making its subject to be the annals of Lampacnas. 7. Πραντάνης ἢ Αρχηγοτης οἱ τῶν Δικαιωματικῶν, a chronologial work. 8. Κτίσεις πόλεων. 9. Κριτικα. 10. Περιπλοσ δ ἐκτὸς τῶν Ἱππαλκῶν στίχων.

The fragments of Charon, together with those of Hecataeus and Xanthus, have been published by Creuzer, Heidelberger, 1808, and by Car and Th. Müller, Fragm. Histor. Graec. Paris, 1841. Besides the references above given, comp. Plut. de Nat. Vitr. s. v. Χαρωνεία; Strab. xii. p. 589; Paus. x. 33; Athen. xii. p. 529, a; Ael. V. H. i. 15; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 2, 479; Voss. de Hist. Graec. b. i. c. 1; Clint. Fast. sub annis 504, 464.

2. Of Carthage, wrote an account of all the tyrants of Europe and Asia, and also the lives of illustrious men and women. (Suid. s. v.; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 418, ed. Westermann.)

3. Of Naucitis, was the author of a history of the Alexandrian and Egyptian priests, and of the events which occurred under each; likewise of a treatise on Naucatism, and other works. (Suid. s. v.) The Charon who was a friend of Apollonius Rhodius, and wrote a historical commentary on his Argonautica, has been identified by some with the historian of Naucatis, by others with the Carthaginian. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. b. iii. a. 21; Voss. de Hist. Graec. pp. 20, 138, 444, 413, ed. Westermann; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 1054.) [Ε. Ε.] CHARONDAS (Χαρώνας), a lawyer of Catana, who legislated for his own and the other cities of Chalcidian origin in Sicily and Italy. (Aristot. Pol. ii. 10.) Now, these were Zanclæ, Nuxo, Leontini, Ebouco, Mylae, Himera, Calipolis, and Rhegium. He must have lived before the time of Anaxiaus, tyrant of Rhegium, i.e. before b.c. 494, for the Rhegianins used the laws of Charondas till they were abolished by Anaxiaus, who, after the destruction of the city, died in b.c. 476. These facts sufficiently refute the common account of Charondas, as given by Diodorus (xii. 12) viz. that after Thurii was founded by the people of the ruined city of Sybaris, the colonists chose Charondas, "the best of their fellow-citizens," to draw up a code of laws for their use. For Thurii, as we have seen, is not included among the Chalcidian cities, and the date of its foundation is b.c. 448. It is also demonstrated by Bentley (Plutarch, p. 367, &c.), that the laws which Diodorus gives as those drawn up by Charondas for the Thurians were in reality not his. For Aristotle (Pol. iv. 12) tells us, that his laws were adapted to an aristocracy, whereas in Diodorus we constantly find him ordering appeals to the Σύμποσιος, and the constitution of Thurii is expressly called "ἐκ δημοκρατίας." Again, we learn from a happy correction made by Bentley in a corrupt passage of the Politiscus (Πολ. ii. 12), that the only peculiarity in the laws of Charondas was that he first introduced the power of prosecuting false witnesses (ἐπικρίνεσις).

But it is quite certain that this was in force at Athens long before the existence of Thurii, and therefore that Charondas, as its author, also lived before the foundation of that city. Lastly, we are told by Diogenes Laërtius, that Protagoras was the lawyer of Thurii. (See Wesseling's note on Diodorus, i. e., where Bentley's arguments are summed up with great clearness.) Diodorus does not account for the story, that he one day forgot to lay aside his sword before he appeared in the assembly, thereby actually one of his own laws. On being reminded of this by a citizen, he exclaimed, μὴ δοὺς κάποιον ποντοφόρον, and immediately stabbed himself. This anecdote is also told of Diocles of Symecon, and of Zaleucus, though Valerius Maximus (vii. § 5) agrees with Diodorus in attributing it to Charondas. The story that Charondas was a Pythagorean, is probably an instance of the practice which arose in later times of calling every distinguished lawyer a disciple of Pythagoras, which title was even conferred on Numa Pomphilus. (Comp. Isamblich. Vit. Pythag. c. 71.) Among several pretended laws of Charondas preserved by Stobæus, there is one probably authentic, since it is found in a fragment of Theophrastus. (Stob. Serm. 48.) This enacts, that all buying and selling is to be transacted with ready money, and that the government is to provide no remedy for those who lose their money by giving credit. The same ordinance will be found in Plato's Laws. The laws of Charondas were probably in verse. (Athen. xiv. p. 619.) The fragments of the laws of Charondas are given in Heyne's Opusc. vol. ii. p. 74, &c. [G. E. L. C.]

CHAROPS (Χάρωπ), bright-eyed or joyful-looking, a surname of Hercules, under which he had a statue near Mount Lycippos on the spot where he was believed to have brought forth Cerberus from the lower world. (Paus. ix. 34. § 4.) There are also two mythical beings of this name. (Hom. Od. xii. 427; Hom. Hymn. in Mercur. 194; Hygin. Fab. 181.) [L. S.]

CHAROPS (Χάρωπ), 1. A chief among the Epeirots, who sided with the Romans in their war with Philip V., and, by sending a shepherd to guide a portion of the Roman army over the heights above the position of the Macedonians, enabled Flamininus to dislodge Philip from the defile which he had occupied in Epeiros, b.c. 193. (Polyb. viii. 6, xvii. 5, xxviii. 6; Livy xxxv. 11; Polyb. xxxv. 4.) In b.c. 192, Charops was sent by his countrymen on an embassy to Antiochus the Great, who was wintering at Chalced in Epeiros. He represented to the king that the Epeirots were more exposed to the attacks of the Romans than any of the inhabitants of the rest of

§11) we learn, that he was a member of the Spartan senate. It is said that he died of joy when his son gained the prize for boxing at the Olympic games, and that his funeral was attended by all the Greeks assembled at the festival. Such a token of respect seems to have been due not more to his wisdom than to the purity of his life, which, according to Diodorus, was not inconsistent with his doctrine. (Comp. Cell. 1. 3.) Diogenes Laërtius mentions him as a writer of Elegiac poems, and records many sayings of his which shew that even at Sparta he may well have been remarkable for his sentiments of bravery, and several of which breathe something of that tragic spirit. Witness especially his denunciation of the use of gesture in speaking.—ἀριστήν μὴ καταλήψῃ τὴν χεῖρα: μακρὰν γὰρ τὴν. The distinguishing excellence of man he considered to be sagacity of judgment in divining the future,—a quality which he himself remarkably exemplified in his foreboding, afterwards realized, of the evils to which Sparta might at any time be exposed from Cythera. (Diog. Laërt. 1. 66—73; Menag. ad loc.; Plut. Protag. p. 343; Plat. de Alc. Delph. 3; Ael. V.H. iii. 17; Perizon. ad loc.; Plin. H. N. vii. 32; Diod. Exc. de V.irt. et Vit. p. 622, ed. Weas; Arist. Rhet. ii. 12, § 14; Herod. vii. 235; comp. Thuc. iv. 53; Arnold, ad loc.)

2. A Spartan of the royal house of the Eurypontids. On the death of Cleomenes III. in b. c. 220, his claim to the throne was disregarded, and the election fell on one Lycurgus, who was not a Heraclide. Chelidon was so indignant at this, that he devised a revolution, holding out to the people the hope of a division of landed property—a plan which Agis IV. and Cleomenes III. had successively failed to realize. Being joined by about 200 adherents, he surprised the ephors at supper, and murdered them. Lycurgus, however, whose house he next attacked, effected his escape, and Chelidon, having in vain endeavoured to rouse the people in his cause, was compelled to take refuge in Achaea. (Polyb. iv. 25, 01.)

CHELION or CHEILON (Χέλιων, Χέλων). 1. Of Lacænaemon, son of Damagetis, and one of the Seven Sages, flourished towards the commencement of the 6th century b. c. Herodotus (i. 59) speaks of him as contemporary with Hippocrates, the father of Pisistratus, and Diogenes Laërtius tells us, that he was an old man in the 53rd Olympiad (b. c. 579), and held the office of Ephor Eponymus in Ol. 56. (b. c. 556.) In the same author there is a passage which appears to ascribe to Chelidon the institution of the Ephorality, but this contradicts the other well known and more authentic traditions. On the authority also of Aelianus the rhetorician (ap. Arist. Rhet. ii. 22, 401), joined the prince on his
March at Issus in Cilicia. (Diod. xiv. 19, 21; Xen. Anab. i. 4. § 3.) After the battle of Cannae, Clearchus sent him with others to Athens to make an offer, which however was declined, of placing him on the Persian throne [p. 263, b.]. After the arrest of Clearchus and the other generals, through the treachery of Tissaphernes, Clearchus took an active part in encouraging the troops and in otherwise providing for the emergency, and, on the motion of Xenophon, was appointed, as being a Lacedaemonian, to lead the van of the retreating army. In this post he found himself subsequently acting throughout the retreat, and cordially cooperating with Xenophon. In fact it was only once that any difference arose between them, and that was caused by Clearchus having struck, in a fit of angry suspicion, an Armenian who was guiding them, and who left them in consequence of the indignity. (Diod. xiv. 27; Xen. Anab. iii. 2. § 53, &c. § 3, §§ 3, 11, 4. §§ 38—43, 5. §§ 1—6, iv. 1. §§ 6, 15—22, 2. § 25, &c., iii. §§ 3, 25, &c., 1. § 1—5.) When the Greeks had arrived at Trapezus on the Euxine, Clearchus volunteered to go to his friend Ariaeus, the Spartan admiral at Byzantium, to obtain a sufficient number of ships to transport them to Europe; but he was not successful in his object. (Diod. xiv. 30, 31; Xen. Anab. v. 1. § 4, vi. 1. § 16.) On his return to the army, which he found at Sinope, he was chosen commander-in-chief. Xenophon having declined for himself the preferred honor on the express ground of the prior claim of a Lacedaemonian. (Anab. vi. 1. §§ 10—33.) Clearchus, however, was unable to enforce subjection to his authority, or to restrain the Arcadian and Achaean soldiers from their profligate attempt to plunder the hospitable Heracleots; and, on the sixth or seventh day from his election, these troops, who formed more than half the army, separated themselves from the rest, and departed by sea under ten generals whom they had appointed. Xenophon then offered to conduct the march with the remainder of the forces, under the command of Clearchus, but the latter declined the proposal by the advice of Neos, who hoped to find vessels at Calpe furnished by Cleander, the Spartan Harmost at Byzantium, and wished to reserve them exclusively for their own portion of the army. With the small division yet under his command, Clearchus arrived safely at Calpe, where he died from the effects of a medicine which he had taken for a fever. (Xen. Anab. vi. 2. § 4, 9. § 11.) [3. E.]

CHERIISOPHUS (Χερίσσοπος), a statuary in woodwork, probably in stone. A gilded wooden statue of Apollo Aygios made by him, and once at Teges, and near it was a statue in stone of the artist himself, which was most probably also his own work. (Paus. viii. 53. § 3.) Pausanias knew nothing of his age or of his teacher; but from the way in which he mentions him in connexion with the Cretan school of Daidalos, and from his working both in wood and stone, he is probably to be placed with the latest of the Daidalian sculptors, such as Dipnous and Scyllis (about B.C. 566). Böckh considers the erection by the artist of his own statue as an indication of a later date (Corp. Inscript. i. p. 19); but his arguments are satisfactorily answered by Tischler, who also shows that the reply of Hermann to Böckh, that Pausanias does not say that Clearchus made his own statue, is not satisfactory. (Epitchei, pp. 187—189.) Tischler has also observed, that the name of Cherisophus, like many other names of the early artists, is significant of skill in art (αρχομ., χρυσός). Other names of the same kind are, Dacalus (Δακάλος) the son of Euphalus (Ευφαλός), Nucleus (Νύκειος), Cherisiphon (Χερισιφόν), and others. Now, granting that Dacalus is nothing more than a mythological personage, and that his name was merely symbolical, there can be no doubt that others of these artists really existed and bore these names, which were probably given to them in their infancy because they belonged to families in which art was hereditary. Tischler quotes a parallel case in the names taken from navigation among the maritime people of Phaeaciae. (Hom. Od. viii. 112, &c.)

Pausanias mentions also two shrines of Dionysus, an altar of Cinusus, and a temple of Apollo, but the way in which he speaks leaves it doubtful whether Clearchus erected these, as well as the statue of Apollo, or only the statue. [8. P.]

CHEERION (Κέεριος), the wicket and justest of all the centaurs. (Hom. II. xi. 681.) He was the instructor of Achilles, whose father Peleus was a friend and relative of Clearchus, and received at his wedding with Thetis the heavy lance which was subsequently used by Achilles. (II. xvi. 143, xix. 380.) According to Apollodorus (i. 2. § 4), Cheiron was the son of Cronus and Philyra. He lived on mount Pelion, from which he, like the other centaurs, was expelled by the Lapithae; but sacrifices were offered to him there by the Magnesians until a very late period, and the family of the Thessalii in that neighbourhood, who were distinguished for their knowledge of medicine, were regarded as his descendants. (Plut. Sympos. iii. 1; Müller, Orchom. p. 249.) Cheiron himself had been instructed by Apollo and Arctemis, and was renowned for his skill in hunting, medicine, music, gymnastics, and the art of prophecy. (Xen. Cyneget. 1. 11. Philostr. Her. 9. Iacon. ii. 2; Pind. Pyth. ii. 65.) All the most distinguished heroes of Greek story are, like Achilles, described as the pupils of Cheiron in these arts. His friendship with Peleus, who was his grandson, is particularly celebrated. Cheiron saved him from the hands of the other centaurs, who were on the point of killing him, and he also restored to him the sword which Acastus had concealed. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 3, &c.) Cheiron further informed him in what manner he might gain possession of Thetis, who was doomed to marry a mortal. He is also connected with the story of the Argonauts, whom he received kindly when they came to his sanctuary on their voyage for the golden fleece. Some of them were his friends and pupils. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 554; Orph. Argon. 375, &c.) Heracles too was connected with him by friendship; but one of the poisoned arrows of this hero was nevertheless the cause of his death, for during his struggle with the Erymanthian boar, Heracles became involved in a fight with the centaurs, who fled to Cheiron, in the neighbourhood of Maleae. Heracles shot at them, and one of his arrows struck Cheiron, who, although immortal, would not live any longer, and gave him his immortality to Prometheus. According to others, Cheiron, in looking at one of the arrows, dropped it on his foot, and wounded himself. (Ovid. Fast. v. 387; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 38.) Zeus placed Cheiron among the stars. He had been married to Nestis or Chi-rich, and his daughter Endes was the mother of Peleus. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6.) Cheiron is the noblest specimen of a combination of the human and animal forms in the ancient works of art; for while the centaurs generally express the sensual and savage features of a man combined with the strength and swiftness of a horse, Cheiron, who possesses the latter likewise, combines with it a mild wisdom. He was presented on the Amyean throne of Apollo, and on the chest of Cyprus. (Paus. iii. 18. § 7, v. 19. § 2.) Some representations of him are still extant, in which young Achilles or Erotes are riding on his back. (Mus. Pio-Clement. i. 52; Böttiger. Vasen-gemälde. iii. p. 144, &c.)

[LS.]

CHELIDON, the mistress of C. Verres, who is said by Cicero to have given all his decisions during his city praetorship (n. c. 74) in accordance with her wishes. She died two years afterwards, when Verres was praetor in Sicily, leaving him her heir. She is called by the Pseudo-Asenius a plebeian female client of Verres. (Cic. Verri. i. 40, 55; 13, 15, 47, iv. 32; Pseudo-Asen. p. 190; Schol. Varie. p. 376, ed. Orelli.)

CHELI'ONIS (Χελιωνίς), a Spartan woman of great beauty and royal blood, daughter of Leonidae. She married Cleonymus, who was much older than herself, and to whom she proved unfaithful, in consequence of a passion for Acrotatus, son of Ares. It was partly on account of this that Cleonymus, offended also by his exclusion from the throne, invited Pyrrhus to attempt the conquest of Sparta in n. c. 372. Chelidonias, alarmed for the result, was prepared to put an end to her own life rather than fall into her husband's hands; but Pyrrhus was beaten off from the city, chiefly through the valour of Acrotatus. If we may trust the account of Phlstarch, the Spartans generally of both sexes exhibited more sympathy with the lovers than indignation at their guilt,—a proof of the corruption of manners, which Phylarchus (ap. Athen. iv. p. 142, h.) ascribes principally to Acrotatus and his father. (Plut. Pyrrh. 26—28.)

CHELO'NE (Χελόνη), the tortoise. When all the gods, men, and animals were invited by Hermes to attend the wedding of Zeus and Hera, the nymph Chelone alone remained at home, to show her disregard of the solemnity. But Hermes then descended from Olympus, threw Chelone's house, which stood on the bank of a river, together with the nymph, into the water, and changed her into a tortoise, who had hitherto carried her house on her back. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 509.)

[LS.]

CHEOPS (Χεοπ), an early king of Egypt, godless and tyrannical, who, according to Herodotus and Dionyddor, reigned for fifty years, and built the first and largest pyramid by the compulsory labour of his subjects. Diidoros calls him Chennes or Chemmis. His account agrees with that of Herodotus, except that he supposes seven generations to have intervened between Remphus or Rhamphsinitus and Cheops. (Herod. ii. 134—127; Larder, ad loc.; Diod. i. 55.) [GERSHEFEN.] [E. B.]

CHEPHREN (Χεφρεν). [CAHPHEREN.]

CHERA (Χηρά), a woman of Hera, which was believed to have been given her by Temenus, the son of Pelasgus. He had brought her home, and erected to her at Old Stymphalus three sanctuaries under three different names. To Hera, as a maiden previous to her marriage, he dedicated one in which she was called τραία; to her as the wife of Zeus, a second in which she bore the name of τειχαία; and a third in which she was worshipped as the χήρα, the widow, alluding to her separation from Zeus. (Paus. viii. 22. § 2.) [LS.]

CHERSIPHON (Χερσίφων), or, as the name is written in Vitruvius and one passage of Pliny, CHERESIPHON, a temple of Artemis, which was built in conjunction with his son Metagenes, built or commenced building the great temple of Artemis at Ephesus. The worship of Artemis was most probably established at Ephesus before the time of the Ionian colonization [Aristim. p. 376, a.]; and it would seem, that there was already at that distant period some temple to the goddess. (Paus. vii. 2, 54.) We are not told what had become of this temple, when, about the beginning of the 6th century B.C., the Ionian Greeks undertook the erection of a new temple, which was intended for the centre of their national worship, like the temple of Hera at Samos, which was built about the same time by the Dorians in colonies. The foundation of the foundation was commenced about n. c. 600. To guard against earthquakes, a marsh was chosen for the site of the temple, and the ground was made firm by layers of charcoal rammed down, over which were laid fioces of wool. This contrivance was suggested by Theodorus of Samos. [Theodorus.] The work proceeded very slowly. The erection of the columns did not take place till about 40 years later. (n. c. 560.) This date is fixed by the statement of Herodotus (i. 92), that most of the pillars were presented by Croesus. This therefore is the date of Chersaphon, since it is to him and to his son Metagenes that the ancient writers attribute the erection of the pillars and the architrave. Of course the plan could not be extended after the erection of the pillars; and therefore, when Sambu (xiv. p. 640) says, that the temple was enlarged by another architect, he probably refers to the building of the courts round it. It was finally completed by Demetrius and Paeonius of Ephesus, about 220 years after the foundations were laid; but it was shortly afterwards burnt down by Herakamistratos on the same night in which Alexander the Great was born, n. c. 356. It was rebuilt with greater magnificence by the contributions of all the states of Asia Minor. It is said, that Alexander the Great offered to pay the cost of the restoration on the condition that his name should be inscribed on the temple, but that the Ephesians evaded the offer by replying, that it was not right for a god to make offerings to gods. The architect of the new temple was Drosis. The edifice has now entirely disappeared, except some remnants of its foundations. Though Pliny (like others of the ancient writers) has evidently confounded the two buildings, yet his description is valuable, since the restored temple was probably built on the same foundations and after the same general plan as the old one. We have also descriptions of it by Vitruvius, who took his statements from a work on the temple, which was said to have been written by the architects themselves, Chersiphon and Metagenes. (vii. Prof. § 12.) There are five main entrances on the south elevation of the chief portico is represented. The temple was Octastyle, Dipteral, Dianyle, and Hypaethral. It was raised on a basement of 10 steps. Its dimensions were 425 x 220 feet. The columns were 127 in number, 60 feet high, and made of white marble, a quarry of which was discovered, at a distance of only eight miles from the temple, by a shepherd named Ptolemaus. Thirty-six of the columns were sculptured (perhaps Caryatides within the cela), one of them by the great sculptor Scopas. (Plin. xxxvi. 14. a. 21: but many critics think the reading doubtful.) They were of the Ionic order of architecture, which was now first invented. (Pinn. xxxvi. 23. s. 56, and especially Vitruv. iv. §§ 7, 8.) Of the blocks of marble which composed the architrave some were as much as 30 feet long. In order to convey these and the columns to their places, Cherisaphon and Metagenes invented some ingenious mechanical contrivances. (Vitr. x. 6, 7, or x. 2, §§ 11, 12, ed. Schneider; Pinn. xxxvi. 14. s. 21.) The temple was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world, and is celebrated in several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, especially in two by Antipater of Sidon (H. pp. 16, 20; Brackel and Jacobs).

From this account it is manifest that Cherisaphon and Metagenes were among the most distinguished of ancient architects, both as artists and mechanicians. (Plin. H. N. vii. 25. s. 38, xvi. 37. s. 79, xxxvi. 14. a. 21; Vitruv. iii. 2. § 7, v. Paeae. § 16; Strab. xiv. pp. 640, 641; Liv. i. 45; Diog. Laërt. ii. 9; Philo Byzant. de VII Orb. Ephesos, Ephes.; Eschkel, Dict. Num. Vét. ii. 512.)

CHILIO or GILO. [Cilo.]

CHIMAERA (Χιμαιρα), a fire-breathing monster, which, according to the Homeric poems, was of divine origin. She was brought up by Amisodarus, king of Caria, and afterwards made great havoc in all the country around and among men. The fore part of her body was that of a lion, and the hind part that of a dragon, while the middle was that of a goat. (Hom. H. vi. 180, xxi. 326; comp. Or. Met. ix. 646.) According to Hesiod (Theog. 219, &c.), she was a daughter of Typhon and Echidna, and had three heads, one each of the three animals before mentioned, whence she is called τρικέφαλος or τριτριόστος. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 634; Enirip. Iou. 208, &c.; Apollo. i. 9. § 3, ii. 3, § 1.) She was killed by Bellerophon and Virgil (Juv. viii. 283) places her together with other monsters at the entrance of Orcus. The origin of the notion of this fire-breathing monster must probably be sought for in the volcano of the name of Chimaera near Pheneus, in Lycia (Plin. H. N. ii. 106, v. 27; Mela. i. 15), or in the volcanic valley near the Cragus (Strab. xiv. p. 665, &c.), which is described as the scene of the events connected with the Chimaera. In the works of art recently discovered, several representations of the Chimaera in the simple form of a species of lion still occurring in that country. (L. S.)

CHITOMATA (Χιτωμάτα), wife of Ortiogen, king of Galatia, was taken prisoner by the Romans when Ca. Mannius Vulso invaded Galatia, B.C. 189, and was violated by the centurion into whose hands she fell. She agreed, however, to pay him a large sum for her ransom; and when he had delivered her up to a body of her countrymen who met them at an appointed place for the purpose, she caused him to be put to death, and carried back his head to her husband. (Polyb. xxii. 21, and op. Plut. de Mul. Vit. p. 225, ed. Tauch.; Val. Max. vi. 1. Extern. 2, comp. Liv. xxxviii. 12.) Polybius says (L. c.), that he had himself conversed with her at Sardis, and admired her high spirit and good sense.

CHION (Χίον), the son of Matris, a noble citizen of Hemedia, on the Pontus, was a disciple of Plato. With the aid of Leos (or Leonides), Buxenon, and other noble youths, he put to death Clearchus, the tyrant of Hemedia. (s. c. 365.) Most of the conspirators were cut down by the tyrant's body-guards upon the spot, others were afterwards taken and put to death with cruel tortures, and the city fell again beneath the worse tyranny of Satyrus, the brother of Clearchus. (Memnon, op. Plut. Cod. 224, pp. 222, 223, ed. Bekker; Justin. xvi. 5.)

There are extant thirteen letters which are ascribed to Chion, and which are of considerable merit; but they are undoubtedly spurious. Probably they are the composition of one of the later Platonists. They were first printed in Greek in the Aldine collection of Greek Letters, Venet. 1499, 8vo; again, in Greek and Latin, in the reprint of that collection, Aurel. Alleh. 1605. The first edition in a separate form was by J. Caselius, printed by Steph. Myliander, Rostoch. 1583, 4to; there was also a Latin translation published in the same volume with a Latin version of the fourth book of Xenophon's Cyropædia, by the same editor and printer, Rostoch. 1584, 4to. A more complete edition of the Greek text, founded on a new recension of some Medicean MSS., with notes and indices, was published by J. T. Coerbers, Lips. ad. Dred. 1765, 8vo. The best edition, containing all that is valuable in the preceding ones, is that of J. Conr. Orelli, in the same volume with his edition of Memnon. Lips. 1816, 8vo. It contains the Greek text, the Latin version of Coerbers, the Prolegomena of A. G. Hoffmann, the Preface of Coerbers, and the Notes of Coerbers, Hoffmann, and Orelli. There are several selections from the letters of Chion. (A. G. Hoffmann, Prolegomen, ad Chionis Epist. Graec. futuram edita, concipita; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. p. 677.)

CHION, of Corinth, a sculptor, who attained to no distinction, not from the want of industry or skill, but of good fortune. (Vitr. iii. Prax.)

CHIONE (Χιόνη), 1. A daughter of Boreas and Oreithyia, and sister of Cleopatra, Zetes, and Crisus. She became by Poseidon the mother of Eumolpus, and in order to conceal the event, she threw the boy into the sea; but the child was saved by the sea-god. (Apollod. iii. 15. §§ 2, 4; Paus. i. 38. § 3.)

2. A daughter of Daedalion, who was beloved by Apollo and Hermes on account of her beauty. She gave birth to twins, Autolycus and Philimon, the former a son of Hermes and the latter of Apollo. She was killed by Artemis for having found fault with the beauty of that goddess, and her father in his grief threw herself from a rock of Parnassus, but in falling he was changed by Apollo into a hawk. Chione is also called Phallocia. (Ov. Met. xi. 300, &c.; Hymn. Pub. 200; comp. Astr. Cael. vii. 275.) For there is a third mythical personage of this name. (Serr. ed. T. S.)

CHIONIDES (ξιόνιδες and χιονίδες), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, whom Suidas (s. u.) places at the head of the poets of the old comedy (πρῶτοιομένοι τῆς ἀρχαίας κομῳδίας), adding that he exhibited eight years before the Persian war, that is, in B. C. 487. (Clinton, sub ann.) On the other hand, according to a passage in the Poetics of Aristotle (v. 3), Chionides was long after Epicharmus. [Epicharmus.] On the strength of this passage Meineke thinks that Chionides cannot have been much earlier than B. C. 490; and in confirmation of this date he quotes from Athenaeus (xiv. p. 639, a.) a passage from a play of Chironides, the Ερακτός, in which mention is made of Gnesippus, a poet contemporary with Ctesias. But we also learn from Athenaeus (i. c. and iv. p. 137, e.), that some of the ancient critics considered the Ερακτός to be spurious, and with respect to the passage of Aristotle, Ritter has brought forward very strong arguments against its genuineness. (For the discussion of the question see Wolt, Proleg. ad Hom. p. 190; Meineke, Hist. Crit. pp. 27, 28; Gryparius, de Com. Doro. pp. 152, 153; Ritter, Comm. in Aristotel. Poet. 3.) However this may be, the difference of some twenty years in the date of Chionides is of little consequence compared with the fact, attested by Suidas and implied by Aristotle, that Chionides was the most ancient poet of the Athenian old comedy, not absolutely in order of time, for Sophocles was already well known [Strabo], and if the passage of Aristotle be genuine, so were Eukes, Euxenides, and Myllus; but the first who gave the Athenian comedy that form which it retained down to the time of Aristophanes, and of which the old comic lyric songs of Attic and the Megaric buffoonery imported by Susarion were only the rude elements.

We have the following titles of his Comedies:

— Πρωτα (a correction for Πρωτος), Ερακτός (see above), Πέρσαι ή, Αστοράβς. Of the last not a fragment remains; whether its title may be taken as an argument for placing Chironides about the time of the Persian war, is of course a mere matter of conjecture. The Ερακτός is quoted by Athenaeus (i. c. and iii. p. 191, c.), the Πρωτα by Pollux (x. 43), the Αστοράβς (p. 97), and Suidas (s. v. "Αστοράβς"). The poet's name occurs in Vitruvius (vi. Praef.).

CHIONIS (Χιόνης), a Spartan, who obtained the victory at the Olympic games in four successive Olympiads (Ol. 28-31), four times in the stadium and thrice in the diaulos. (Paus. iii. 14, § 3, iv. 23, §§ 2, 5, vi. 13, § 1, viii. 39, § 2: Anchialonis is the same as this Chionis; see Krause, Olympia, pp. 243, 261.)

CHIONIS (Χιόνης), a scion of Corinth, about B. C. 400, executed, in conjunction with Amyclaeans and Dylikes, the group which the Phocians dedicated at Delphi. [Amyclaeus.] Chionis led in the processions of the island of Aetna and Aetrias. (Paus. x. 13, § 4.)

CHIOS (Χίος), the name of two mythical personages, each of whom is said to have given the name to the island of Chios. (Paus. vi. 4, § 6; Steph. Byz. s. v. "Χίος").

CHITONE (Χιτών), a surname of Artemis, who was represented as a huntress with her chiton girt up. Others derived the name from the Attic village of Chitone, or from the circumstance of the cloth in which newly-born children were dressed being sacred to her. (Callim. Hymn. in Dict. 224; Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Jon. 77.) Respecting the festival of the Chitonia celebrated to her at Chitone, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. "Χιτώνα." [L. S.]

CHIUS AUPIDIIUS. [Auridius Chius.]

CHLAEINEAS (Χλαίνεας), an Aetolian, was sent by his countrymen as ambassador to the Lacedaemonians, B. C. 211, to excite them against Philip V. of Macedon. He is reported by Polybius as dwelling very cogently (διασωφρατός) on the oppressive enroachments of all the successor kings of Macedonia from Philip II. downwards, as well as on the sure defeat which awaited Philip from the confederacy then formed against him. Chlaeneas was opposed by the Achaean envoy Lycurgus, but the Lacedaemonians were induced to join the league of the Romans with the Aetolians and Attalus I. (Polyb. ix. 26-39, x. 41; Liv. xxvi. 24.)

[Chloe (Χλοε), the blooming, a surname of Demeter the protectress of the green fields, who had a sanctuary at Athens conjointly with Ge and Curotophos. (Paus. i. 25, § 3; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 772.) This surname is probably alluded to when Sophocles (Oed. Col. 1809) calls her Ἀμφιπειμένας. (Comp. Aristoph. Lysistr. 815.) Respecting the festival Chloëia, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. [L. S.]

CHLORIS (Χλόρις). 1. A daughter of the Theban Amphin and Niobe. According to an Argive tradition, Niobe and her brother Amycles were the only children of Niobe that were not killed by Apollo and Artemis. But the terror of Chloris at the death of her brothers and sisters was so great, that she turned permanently white, and was therefore called Chloris. She and her brother built the temple of Leto at Argos, which contained a statue of Chloris also. (Paus. ii. 21, § 10.) According to an Olympian legend, she once gained the prize in the foot-race during the festival of Hera at Olympia. (Paus. xvi. 18, § 5.) Apollodoros (iii. 5, § 6) and Hyginus (Fab. 10, 69) confound her with Chloris, the wife of Neleus.

2. A daughter of Amphin, the ruler of Orchomenos, by Parthenos, the daughter of Minyas. She was the wife of Neleus, king of Pylos, and became by him the mother of Nestor, Chiron, Periclymenus, and Pilo. (Hom. Od. xi. 231, &c.; Paus. x. 36, § 4, x. 29, § 2; Apollod. i. 9, § 6.)

3. The wife of Zephyrus, and the goddess of flowers, so that she is identical with the Roman Flora. (Ov. Fast. v. 135.) There are two more mythical personages of the name of Chloris. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Aitn. Lib. 9.)

CHLORUS. [Constantius.]

CHNODOMARIUS or CHNODOMARIUS (Gundomar), king of the Alemanni, became co-conqueror in Roman history in A. D. 551. Magnentius having assumed the purple at Augustodunum, now Autun, in Gaul, the emperor Constantius made an alliance with the Alemanni and induced them to invade Gaul. Their king, Chnodomarius, consequently crossed the Rhine, defeated Decentius Caesar, the brother of Magnentius, destroyed many towns, and ravaged the country without opposition. In 556 Chnodomarius was involved in a war with Julian, afterwards emperor, and then Caesar, who succeeded in stopping the progress of the Alamanii in Gaul, and who defeated them completely in the following year, 357, in a battle near Argentoratum, now Strasbourg. Chnodomarius had assembled in his camp the contingents of six chief of the Alamanii, viz., Vestalpus, Urissi, Ursicinian, Suardarius, Hortarius, and Sempio, the son of Chnodomarius' brother Medericus, whose original name was Agennachius; but in spite of their gallant resistance, they were routed, leaving six thousand dead on the field. Obedient to the Rhine in confusion, they lost many thousands more who were drowned in the river. Ammianus Marcellinus says, that the Roman loss was only two hundred and forty-three men, besides four officers of rank, but this account cannot be relied upon. Chnodomarius fell into the hands of the victors, and being presented to Julian, was treated by him with kindness, and afterwards sent to Rome, where he was kept a prisoner in the Castra Perginana on Mount Caesius. There he died a natural death some time afterwards. Ammianus Marcellinus gives a detailed account of the battle of Strasbourg, which had the most beneficial effect upon the tranquillity of Gaul. (Arr. Mar. xvi. 12; Aurel. Vict. Epit. c. 42; Liber. Orig. 10, 12.)

CHOREILUS (Χορηλος or Χορήλος). There were four Greek poets of this name who have been frequently confounded with one another. They are treated of, and properly distinguished, by A. F. Naine, Choreilis Scendi quaes. important, Lips. 1817, 8vo.

1. Choreilus of Athens, a tragic poet, contemporary with Thespis, Phrynichus, Pratinas, Aeschylus, and even with Sophocles, unless, as Welcker supposes, he had a son of the same name, who was also a tragic poet. (Welcker, Die Griech. Trag. p. 892.) His first appearance as a competitor for the tragic prize was in B.C. 532 (Suid. s. v.), in the reign of Hipparchus, when Athens was beginning the centre of Greek poetry by the residence there of Simonides, Anacreon, Sophocles, and others. This was twelve years after the first appearance of Thespis in the tragic contests; and it is therefore not improbable that Choréilus had Thespis for an antagonist. It was also twelve years before the first victory of Phrynichus. (B.C. 511.) After another twelve years, Choreilus came into competition with Aeschylus, when the latter first exhibited (B.C. 499); and, since we know that Aeschylus did not carry off a prize till sixteen years afterwards, the prize of this contest must have been given either to Choreilus or to Pratinas. (Suid. s. v. Αρεχλος, Πραινος.) Choréilus was still held in high estimation in the year 463 B.C., after he had exhibited tragedies for forty years. (Curtz, Julia, p. 158, b.; Euseb. Chron. sub. Ol. 74. 2; Syncell. p. 253, b.)

In the statement in the anonymous Life of Sophocles, that Sophocles contended with Choréilus, there is very probably some mistake, but there is no impossibility; for when Sophocles gained his first victory (B.C. 468), Choréilus would be just 80, if we take 28 as the usual age at which a tragic poet first exhibited. (Compare Welcker, l. c. and Naine, p. 7.)

Of the character of Choréilus we know little more than that, during a long life, he retained a good degree of popular favour. The number of his tragedies was 150, of his victories 12 (Suid. s. v.), being exactly the number of victories assigned to Aeschylus. The great number of his dramas not only establishes the length of his career, but a much more important point, namely, that the exhibition of tetralogies commenced early in the time of Choréilus; for new tragedies were exhibited at Athens only twice a year, and at this early period we never hear of tragedies being written but not exhibited, but rather the other way. In fact, it is the general opinion, that Choréilus was the first who composed written tragedies, and that even of his plays the greater number were not written. Some writers attributed to him the invention or great improvement of masks and theatrical costume (νάρθυρας και σκηνήν πρώτα αναταξένησεν έκ- χειροφανας οι τραγωδία η τριάδας των). These inventions are in fact ascribed to each of the great tragedians of this age; and it is remarkable that the passages on the authority of which they are usually attributed to Aeschylus imply not so much actual invention as the artistic perfection of what previously existed in a rude form. It is evident, moreover, that these great improvements, by whomsoever made, must have been adopted by all the tragedians of the same age. The poetical character and construction of the plays of Choréilus probably differed but little from those of Thespis, until the period when Aeschylus introduced the second actor—a change which Choréilus of course adopted, for otherwise he could not have continued to compete with Aeschylus. The same remark applies to the separation made by Pratinas of the satyrical dram of the regular tragedy. It is generally supposed that Choréilus had some share in effecting this improvement, on the authority of a line from an unknown ancient poet (ap. Plut. de morib. p. 268, ed. Putech.), Υδρα μεν βασιλεύς η Χορηλός η σταφυλ. But it seems more natural to take the words ἦ σταφυλο to mean the tragic Chorus, at the time when the persons composing it retained the costume of satyrs.

The name of Choréilus is mentioned in a very curious fragment of the comic poet Alexis, from his play Licius. (Athens, iv. p. 163, c.; Meineke, Frag. Grœc. Graec. iii. p. 443.) Linus, who is instructing Hercules, puts into his hands some books, that he may choose one of them to read, saying, ὁρόπεδαι ένετοτην, Ἰανόης, τραγανό, Χορηλός, ομοιος, Ἐπίχαρμος, συγγραμμάτα πανουδαται. Here we have a poet for each sort of poetry: Orphœus for the early mystic hymns, Hesiod for the didactic and moral epics, Homer for the epic epos, Epicharmus for comedy; but what are γρα- γάρια, Χορηλος? The usual answer of those critics who abandon from evading the difficulty by an alteration of the text is, Tragedy and the Satyric Drama: but the question is a very difficult one, and cannot be discussed here. (See Naine, p. 5.) Possibly the passage may refer, after all, to the epic poet, Choréilus of Samos, and there may be some hit at his διψαφικα (see below) in the choice of Hercules, who selects a work on διψαφικαί.

Of all the plays of Choréilus we have no remnant except the statement by Pausanias (1. 14. § 2) of a mythological genealogy from his play called Ἀλεστι. The Latin grammarians mention a metre which they call Choreilian. It was in fact, a dactylic hexameter strip of its final catalectic. It must not be supposed that this metre was invented by Chorēllos, for the Greek metrical writers never mention it by that name. Perhaps it got its name from the fact of the above-mentioned line, in praise of Chorēllos, being the most ancient verse extant in this metre. (See Nīkē, pp. 257, 263; Gaisford's edition of Ἱππασεία, notes, pp. 353, 354.)

2. Chorēllos, a slave of the comic poet Εidianis, whom he was said to assist in the composition of his plays. (Hesych. s.v. Εἰδανίδιος is explained by Meineke, Histor. Crit. Conv. Grec. pp. 37, 38; Gaisford, ed. Hept. p. 98.)

3. Chorēllos of Samos, the author of an epic poem on the wars of the Greeks with Xerxes and Dareius. Suidas (s. a.) says that he was a contemporary of Panyasis and a young man (υφυπαπάοι) at the time of the Persian war, in the 75th Olympiad. But this is next to impossible, for Plutarch (Lys. 18) tells us that, when Lysander was at Samos (n. c. 404), Chorēllos was residing there, and was highly honoured by Lysander, who hoped that the poet would celebrate his exploits. This was 75 years later than the 75th Olympiad; and therefore, if this date has anything to do with Chorēllos, it must be the date of his birth (n. c. 479); and this agrees with another statement of Suidas, which implies that Chorēllos was younger than Herodotus (ὅπως ἄνυν καὶ τετέλεσα γέγονεν θεοῦ). We have here perhaps the explanation of the error of Suidas, who, from the connexion of both Panyasis and Chorēllos with Herodotus, and from the fact that both were epic poets, may have confounded them, and have said of Chorēllos that which can very well be true of Panyasis. Perhaps Chorēllos was even younger. Nīkē places his birth about n. c. 470. Suidas also says, that Chorēllos was a slave at Samos, and was distinguished for his beauty; that he ran away and resided with Herodotus, from whom he acquired a taste for literature; and that he turned his attention to poetry: afterwards he went to the court of Archelaius, king of Macedonia, where he died. His death must therefore have been not later than n. c. 421; which is the latest year of the last sestertius of Athenaeus (viii. 345, s. e.), that Chorēllos received from Archelaius four minae a-day, and spent it all upon good living (ἀργυρίων). There are other statements of Suidas, which evidently refer to the later poet, who was contemporary with Alexander. (See below.) There is some doubt whether the accounts which made him a native either of Isos or of Halicarnassus belong to this class. Either of them is perfectly consistent with the statement that he was a slave at Samos. (Compare Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἴδανίδος; Hesych. Miles. p. 40, ed. Meurs.; Phot. Lex. s. v. Σαμακεῖον τρισκέλ.)

His great work was on the Persian wars, but its exact title is not known: it may have been Παρατηρείς. This remarkable sestertius, earliest attempt to celebrate in epic poetry events which were nearly contemporary with the poet's life. Of its character we may form some conjecture from the connexion between the poet and Herodotus. There are also fragments preserved by Aristophanes from the Procession (Ρηθ. iii. 14, and Schol.); by Ephorus from the description of Dareius's bridge of boats, in which the Seytians are mentioned (Strab. vii. p. 303); by Josephus from the catalogue of the nations in the army of Xerxes, among whom were the Jews (c. Apion. i. 22, vol. ii. p. 554, ed. Hierocamp. iii. p. 1183, ed. Oehler); compare Euseb. Praepp. Berk. ex. 9); and other fragments, the place of which is uncertain. (See Nīkē.) The chief action of the poem appears to have been the battle of Salamis. The high estimation in which Chorēllos was held is proved by his reception into the epic canon (Suid. s. a.), from which, however, he was again expelled by the Alexandrian grammarians, and Antimachus was substituted in his place, on account of a statement, which was made on the authority of Herodotides Ponticus, that Plato very much preferred Antimachus to Chorēllos. (Ptolemy, Comm. b. Plut. Tim. p. 28; see also an epigram of Crates in the Greek Anthology, iii. p. 3, ed. Brunck and J.; with Jacob's note, Animad. ii. 1 pp. 7-9.) The great inferiority of Chorēllos to Homer in his similes is noticed by Aristotle. (Tert. vii. 1 § 24.)

4. Chorēllos, probably of Isos, a worthless epic poet in the train of Alexander the Great. (Cur. viii. 5 § 8.) Horace says of him (Ep. ii. 1. 232-234),

"Gratus Alexandro regi Magnus fuit ille Chorēllos, inculsit qui versibus et male natis Rettulit acceptos, regni nomisma, Philosophis;"

and (Art. Poët. 357, 358),

"Sic mihi, qui multum essent, fit Chorēllos ille, Quam bis torquens cum ruscis inserit.

From the former passage it is evident that we must refer to this Chorēllos the statement of Suidas respecting a Chorēllos of Samos, that he received a gold stater for every verse of his poem. However, Alexander may have paid Chorēllos for his flattery, he did not conceal his contempt for his poetry, at least if we may believe Acron, who remarks on the second of the above passages, that Alexander used to tell Chorēllos that "he would rather be the Thesirites of Homer than the Achilles of Chorēllos." The same writer adds, that Chorēllos bargained with Alexander for a piece of gold for every good verse, and a blow for every bad one; and the bad verses were so numerous, that he was beaten to death. This appears to be merely a joke.

Some passages to Chorēllos of Samos a poem entitled Λαγμακείον, and other poems. But in all probability that poem related to the Lamic war, n. c. 323; and, if so, it must have been the composition of this later Chorēllos. To him also Nīkē assigns the epistle on Soudanapalus, which is preserved by Strabo (xiv. p. 672), by Athenaeus (viii. p. 336, a., who says, that it was translated by Chorēllos from the Chaldæa, xii. p. 529, f.; compare Diod. ii. 25; Tzetz. Chalc. iii. 105); and in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Amst. i. p. 105; Jacob, in Animad. vol. i. p. 1. p. 76.)

CHOROBOBOSCUS, GEOLOGRUS (Τέχνες Χορόβοσκους), a Gallic grammarian, who probably lived towards the end of the sixth century of the Christian era. He is the author of various grammatical and rhetorical works, of which only one has been printed, namely "de Figura poetica, oratoriae, et theologicae," (ἱεραι τρισκελεὶς καὶ Θεολογεῖς χρήσεις), published with a Latin translation together with the dissertation of Proclus on divine and poetical instinct, by Morrellus, Paris, 1615, 12mo. His other works, the MSS. of which are scattered in the principal libraries of this country (Bodleian) and the continent, treat on various grammatical matters; his treatise on the Greek accent, the MS. of which is in the Vatican Library, was given particular attention. Several treatises on theological matters, which are extant in MS. are likewise attributed to him. But as Choechoboseus is generally quoted by the earlier writers as Georgius Grammaticus, or Georgius Diaconus—he was a priest—he might sometimes have been confounded with some other grammarian or theologian of that name. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vi. pp. 383—341; Leo Allatius, De Georgios, pp. 318—521.)

CHOMATIA'NUS, DEMETRIUS, a Graeco-Roman jurist and canonist, who probably lived in the early part of the 18th century. He was chariotphlyc and afterwards archbishop of Bulgaria, and wrote Questiones relating to ecclesiastical law, now in manuscript at Munich. (Heimbeck, de Basili. Orig. p. 86.) This work is cited by Cujas. (Observe. v. c. 4.) Freeburns, in the Chronologia in the first volume of the Jus Graecoromanum of Lencelavius, under the year 913, enumerates him among the commentators upon the Basilica, but that he so is denominated by Boecking. (Vindictiolum, i. p. 108, n. 48.) It should be added, that Boecking (l.c.), apparently with good reason, in like manner refuses the character of scholiast on the Basilicæ to Bestes and Ioannes Briennius [Briennius], though they are named as scholiasts in almost every modern work on Graeco-Roman law.

CHONDOMATIUS, or CHONDOMARIUS.

CHOSROES, king of Persia. [Aesopse xxv.]

CHOSROES, king of Pithia. [Aesopse xxv.]

CHRISTODORUS (Χριστοδορος), a Greek poet of Coptus in Egypt, was the son of Paniscus, and flourished in the reign of Anastasius L. A. d. 491—518. He is classed by some particular as an epic poet (Eposoios). 1. There is still extant a poem of 416 hexameter verses, in which he describes the statues in the public gymnasium of Zeuxippus. This gymnasium was built by Septimius Severus at Byzantium, and was burnt down L. A. d. 532. The poem of Christodorus is entitled 'Ephavoris τῶν ἐγκυμίων τοῦ εἰς τὸ δημόσιον γυμνασίον τοῦ Ζεύσειππον. It is printed in the Antiq. Constantinius of Anselmus Banduri, Par. 1711, Venet. 1729, and in the Graeco-Antith. of L. A. d. 567; Jacob, iii. p. 161.) He also wrote—2. 'Istarchos, a poem, in six books, on the taking of Iseria by Anastasius. 3. Three books of Epigrams, of which two epigrams remain. (Anthon. Graec. l. c.) 4. Four books of Letters. 5. Πέρη, epic poems on the history and antiquities of various places, among which were Constantinople, Thessalonica, Nade near Heliopolis, Miletus, Tralles, Aphrodisias, and perhaps others. Suidas and Eudocia mention another person of the same name, a native of Thebes, who wrote 'Rexi'kia ή επαν and Θαυμάτων τῶν ἐγκυμίων άνθρωποί (where Küster proposes to read ματρίσιν) Κοσαί καὶ Ιάσμαι. (Suidas, s. v. Χριστοδορος and Ζεύσειππον; Eudocia, p. 496; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 468; Jacob, Anth. Graec. xiii. p. 871.)

CHRISTOPHORUS the Caesar, son of Constantine V. Copronymus. There is an edict against image-worship issued by him and his brotherNicephorus, L. A. d. 775, in the Imperialis. Decret. de Cult. Imag. of Goldastus, Fran. 1608, 4to., No. 8, p. 75. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xii. p. 740.) For what is known of the life of Christophorus, see NICEPHORUS. [P. S.]

CHRISTOPHORUS, PATRIGYUS, a native of Mytilene, whose time is unknown, wrote in Iambic verse a Menologium, or history of the saints, arranged according to the saints' days in each month. The MS. was formerly in the Palatine Library at Brussels, but is now in the Vatican. Col. 383, No. 7. There are also MSS. of the whole or part of the work at Venice, Moscow, and Paris. It is cited more than once in the Glossarium of Meursius. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Diss. pp. 5, 6; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 594.) [P. S.]

CHROMATIUS, a Latin writer and bishop of Aquila, flourished at the close of the fourth century, and the commencement of the fifth century. His position in the history of the Church is specially remarkable, as he was the first to translate the New Testament into Latin. He was also the author of a number of works, of which the most important is his translation of the New Testament.

CHRYSES.

CHRYSAOR (Χρυσαώρ). 1. A son of Poseidon and Medusa, and consequently a brother of Pegasus. When Perseus cut off the head of Medusa, Chrysaor and Pegasus sprang forth from it. Chrysaor became the father of Calirrhoe, the mother of the three-headed Geryones and Ejidina. (Hesiod, Theog. 280, &c.; Hygin. Fab. Pseud. and 151.)

2. The god with the golden sword or arms. In this sense, it is used as a surname or attribute of several divinities, as Apollo (Hom. Hym. i. 256), Artemis (Herod. viii. 77), and Demeter. (Hom. Hymn. in Cor. 4.) We find Chrysaor as a surname of Zeus with the same meaning, under which he had a temple in Caria, which was a national sanctuary, and the place of meeting for the national assembly of the Cariani. (Strab. xiv. p. 660; comp. Paus. v. 21 § 5; Steph. Byz. s. v. Xyphos.)

CHRYSETES (Χρυσητῆς). [ASTYNOME.] Another mythical personage of this name occurs in Apollodorus (ii. 7 § 8). [L. S.]

CHRYSERMUS (Χρυσερμός). A Corinthian, whom we first mention as the author of the following songs:

1. A history of India, extending to at least 80 books.
3. A history of the Peloponnesus.
4. A treatise on rivers. (Phul. De Flor. i. 13, 20, Pauell. Min. 10; Stob. Floril. xxxix. 31, 11; Phot. Bibl. 167.) The period at which he flourished is not known. [V. E.]

CHRYSERMUS (Χρυσερμός), an ancient physician, who lived probably at the end of the second or the beginning of the first century B.C., as he was one of the tutors of Heracles of Erythrae (Gal. De Epigr. Pala. vi. 10, vol. viii. p. 743), perhaps also of Apollonius Mus, who was a fellow-pupil of Heracles. (Strab. xiv. p. 185, ed. Tzetza.) His definition of the pulse has been preserved by Galen (i. c. p. 741), as also one of his medical formulae (De Comp. Med. vii. sec. i. 2, c. 239), and an anecdote of him is mentioned by Sextus Empiricus (Pseud. Hypotyp. i. 14, § 64), and copied into Cramer's Anec. Graec. vol. iii. p. 412, where for Ευρύπετος we should read Χρυσερμός. He is also mentioned by Pliny. (Hist. N. xxii. 32. [W. A. O.]

CHRYSES (Χρύσης). 1. A son of Ardis and a priest of Apollo at Chryse. He was the father of Astynome (Chryseis), and when he came to the camp of the Greeks, offering a rich ransom for the liberation of his daughter, he was treated by Agamemnon with harsh words. Chryses then prayed to Apollo for vengeance, and the god sent a plague into the camp of the Greeks, which did not cease raging until Calchas explained the cause of it, and Odysseus took Chryses back to her father. (Hom. I. i. 10, &c.)

2. A son of Agamemnon or Apollo by Astynome. When Agamemnon restored Astynome to her father, she was with child, and, on giving birth to a boy, she declared him to be a son of Apollo, and called him Chryses. Subsequently, when Orestes and Iphigeneia fled to Chryses on their escape from Tauris, and the latter recognized in the fugitives his brother and sister, he assisted them in killing King Thoas (Eurip. Iph. 120, &c.).

3. A son of Mines and the nymph Parea. He lived with his three brothers in the island of Paros, and having murdered two of the companions of Heracles, they were all put to death by the latter. (Apollod. ii. 5, § 3, 3; i. 1 § 2.)
4. A son of Posidon and Chrysothea, and father of Minyas. (Paus. ix. 36. § 3.) [L.S.]

CHRYSES (Χρυσῆς), of Alexandria, a skilful mechanic, flourished about the middle of the sixth century after Christ. (Procop. de Aedific.; Just. ii. 3.) [P.S.]

CHRYSSIPPUS (Χρύσσιππος), a son of Pelops by the nymph Artioche or by Damiad (P. Poll. Hist. Gr. et Rom. 32), and accordingly a step-brother of Alcethus, Areus, and Thysteus. While still a boy, he was carried off by king Laius of Thebes, who instructed him in driving a chariot. (Apollod. i. 5. § 5.) According to others, he was carried off by Theseus during the contests celebrated by Pelops (Hygin. Fab. 271); but Pelops recovered him by force of arms. His step-mother Hippodamia hated him, and induced her sons Areus and Thysteus to kill him; whereas, according to another tradition, Chrysippus was killed by his father Pelops himself. (Paus. vi. 20. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 85; Schol. ad Thucyd. l. i. 5.)

CHRYSSIPPUS (Χρύσσιππος). 1. Of Tyane, a learned writer on the art of cookery, or more properly speaking, on the art of making bread or sweetmeats, is called Athenæus σωμός πεματοφόρος, and seems to have been little known before the time of the latter author. One of his works treated specially of the art of bread-making, and was entitled Ἀποτομακραί. (Athen. iii. p. 118, xiv. pp. 647, c. 648, a. c.)

2. The author of a work entitled τραχεία. (Plut. Paral. Min. c. 28.)

CHRYSSIPPUS, a learned freedman of Cicero, who ordered him to attend upon his son in b. c. 52; but as he left young Marcus without the knowledge of his patron, Cicero determined to declare his manumission void. As, however, we find Chrysippus in the confidence of Cicero again in b. c. 48, he probably did not carry his threat into effect. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 4, 5, ad Att. vii. 2, 5, 11.)

CHRYSSIPPUS, VETTIUS, a freedman of the architect Cyrus, and himself also an architect. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 14, ad Att. viii. 29, xiv. 9.)

CHRYSSIPPUS (Χρύσσιππος), a Stoic philosopher, son of Apollonius of Tarus, but born himself at Soli in Cilicia. When young, he lost his paternal property, for some reason unknown to us, and went to Athens, where he became the disciple of Cleantus, who was then at the head of the Stoical school. Some say that he even heard Zeno, a possible but not probable statement, as Zeno died b. c. 264, and Chrysippus was born b. c. 280. He does not appear to have embraced the doctrines of the Stoics without considerable hesitation, as we hear that he studied the Academic philosophy, and for some time openly disented from Cleanthes. Disliking the Academic scepticism, he became one of the most strenuous supporters of the principle, that knowledge is attainable and may be established on certain foundations. Hence, though not the founder of the Stoic school, he was the first person who based his doctrines on an organic system of reasoning, so that it was said, "if Chrysippus had not existed, the Porch could not have been" (Diog. Laert. vii. 183), and among the later Stoics his opinions had more weight than those of either Zeno or Cleanthes, and he was considered an authority from which there was no appeal. He died b. c. 207, aged 73 (Laërt. l. c.), though Valerius Maximus (viii. 7. § 10) says, that he lived till past 80. Various stories are handed down by tradition to account for his death—as that he died from a fit of laughter on seeing a donkey eat figs, or that he fell sick at a sacrificial feast, and died five days after.

With regard to the worth of Chrysippus as a philosopher, it is the opinion of Bitter that, in spite of the common statement that he differed in some points from Zeno and Cleanthes (Cic. Acad. ii. 47), he was not in truth so much the author of any new doctrines as the successful opponent of those who dissented from the existing Stoic system, and the inventor of new arguments in its support. With the reasoning of his predecessors he appears to have been dissatisfied, from the story of his telling Cleanthes that he only wished to learn the principles of his school, and would himself provide arguments to defend them. Besides his struggles against the Academy, he felt very strongly the dangerous influence of the Epicurean system; and in order to counterbalance the seductive influence of their moral theory, he seems to have wished in some degree to popularize the Stoic doctrine, and to give to the study of ethics a more prominent place than was consistent with his statement, that physics (under which he included the whole science of theology, or investigations into the nature of God) was the highest branch of philosophy. This is one of the contradictions for which he is reproached by Plutarch, whose work De Stoicorum Repugnantibus is written chiefly against his inconsistencies, some of which are important, some merely verbal. The third of the ancient divisions of philosophy, logic (or the theory of the sources of human knowledge), was not considered by Chrysippus of the same importance as it had appeared to Plato and Aristotle; and he followed the Epicureans in calling it rather the organum of philosophy than a part of philosophy itself. He was also strongly opposed to another opinion of Aristotle, viz., that a life of contemplative solitude is best suited to the wise man—considering this a mere pretext for selfish enjoyment, and extolling a life of energy and activity. (Plut. de Stoic. Rep. ii.)

Chrysippus is pronounced by Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 10) "homo sine dubio versatvs, et caelifus," and the same character of quickness and sagacity was generally attributed to him by the ancients. His industry was so great, that he is said to have seldom written less than 500 lines a-day, and to have left behind him 705 works. These however seem to have consisted very largely of quotations, and to have been undistinguished for elegance of style. Though none of them are extant, yet his fragments are much more numerous than those of his two predecessors. His erudition was profound, he is called by Cicero (Tusc. i. 45) "in omnis historiae curiosus," and he appears to have overlooked no branch of study except mathematics and natural philosophy, which were neglected by the Stoics till the time of Posidonius. His taste for analysing and refuting fallacies and sophistical subtleties was derived from the Megarians (Plut. Stoic. Rep. v. 2); in the whole of this branch of reasoning he was very successful, and has left numerous treatises on the subject, e.g. περὶ τῶν τυχερῶν, περὶ λεπτῶν, κ. τ. λ. (Diog. Laert. vii. 192, 193.) He was the inventor of the kind of argument called Sorites. (Christi priu. acerens, Pers. Sic. vi. 80.) In person he was so slight, that his statue in the Cerealeus was hidden by a neighbouring figure of a horse; whence Carneades, who, as head of the Academy, bore him no great goodwill, gave him the sobriquet of Κοῖπφες.

(Orrelli, Ossex. Phil. ii. p. 144; Ritter, Gesch. der Phil. xi. 1; Brucker, Hist. Ord. Phil. ii. ii. 8, 2; Baguet, de Chrysippus vita, doct. et religiosi Comment. Lond. 1622; Petronius, Philosophiae Chryssippea Fundamenta, Alton. 1627.)

The general account of the doctrine of the Stoics is given under Zeno.

CHRYSIPPUS (Χρύσιππος), the name of several physicians, who have been frequently confounded together, and whom it is sometimes difficult to distinguish with certainty.

1. Of Cnidus, has sometimes been confounded with the celebrated Stoic philosopher of the same name, who, however, lived about a century later. He was the son of Erhenus (Diog. Laërt. viii. 69), and must have lived in the fourth century B.C., as he was a contemporary of Praxagoras (Cels. De Med. Præf. lib. i. p. 5; Plin. H.N. xxv. 6), a pupil of Dositheus of Erythrae (Diog. Laërt. L. c.), father of Chrysippus the physician to Poltemon Soter (id. vi. 176), and tutor to Erasistratus (id. l. c. Plin. H.N. xxix. 3; Galen, De Ven. Sect. adv. Erasistr. c. 7, vol. xi. p. 171), Aristogenes (id. De Ven. sect. adv. Erasistr. Rom. Deog. c. 2, et De Cur. Rer. per Ven. Sect. c. 2, vol. xi. pp. 197, 252), Medius (id. l.c.), and Mctrodorus. (Sext. Empir. cont. Mathem. i. 12, p. 271, ed. Fabric.) He accompanied his tutor Budoxus into Egypt (Diog. Laërt. vii. 87), but nothing more is known of the events of his life. He wrote several works, which are not now extant, and Galen says (De Ven. Sect. adv. Erasistr. Rom. Deog. c. 5, vol. xi. p. 221), that even in his time they were in danger of being lost. Several of his medical opinions are, however, preserved by Galen, by whom he is frequently quoted and referred to. (De Ven. Sect. adv. Erasistr., &c., vol. xi. pp. 149, &c., 171, &c., 197, 251, &c.)

2. The son of the preceding, was a physician to Poltemon Soter, king of Egypt, b.c. 223-283, and was falsely accused, scourged, and put to death, but on what charge is not mentioned. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 186.)

3. A pupil of Erasistratus (Diog. Laërt. viii. 186), who must have lived therefore in the third century B.C. Some persons think he was the author of the work De Drossa, ‘On the Cabbage,’ mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xx. 38) and Plinius Valerianus (De Med. iv. 29), but this is quite uncertain.

4. A writer on Agriculture, Γεωργικος, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 186), and distinguished by him from the pupil of Erasistratus.

5. A follower of Asclepiades, who must therefore (if Asclepiades of Bithynia be the person meant) have lived in the first century B.C. One of his works is quoted by Caellus Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. iv. 8, p. 537), and a physician of the same name is mentioned by him in several other passages (pp. 89, 107, 225, 576), but whether the same person be meant in each passage is uncertain.

6. A native of Cilicia, who may perhaps have been the tutor of Athenaeus (who was also born in Cilicia), as Galen calls him the great-grandfather of the sect of the Pneumatici. (De Dipp. Pala. ii. 10, vol. vii. p. 631.) He lived probably about the beginning of the Christian era. [W. A. G.]

CHRYSOCEPHALUS (Χρυσωκέφαλος), a native of Cappadocia, was a celebrated ecclesiastical writer, who lived during the middle of the fifth century of the Christian era. Chrysophalus had two brothers, Cosmas and Gabriel, all of whom received a learned education in Syria, and were afterwards interred to the care of the abbot Euthymius at Jerusalem. They Chrysophalus took orders, and became bishops in the “Monasterium Lausae,” prefaect of the church of the Holy Resurrection, and custos of the church of the Holy Cross, an office which he held during ten years. He wrote many works on ecclesiastical matters, and his style is at once elegant and concise; but his productions are lost except a treatise entitled “Homilia de Sancta Deipara,” which is contained with a Latin translation in the second volume of “Auctarius Duceanus,” and some fragments of a small work entitled “Encomium Theodori Martyris,” which are extant in Eugathius Constanopolitanaeus’s “Liber de Statu Vitae Funerariae.” (Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. i. p. 357.)

CHRYSOBERGES, LUCAS (Λουκᾶς Χρυσοβέργης), an important writer on the Canon law and other ecclesiastical and religious subjects, was chosen patriarch of Constantinople in A.D. 1155, preceded at the synod of Constantinople in 1166, and died in 1167. His works are mostly lost, and only some fragments are printed. Thirteen “Decreta Synodalium” are contained in Leunsavius, “Jus Graeco-Romanum.” They treat on important subjects, as, for instance, No. 3. “De Clerici qui ad immiscentia sacriarii Negotii;” No. 4. “De indecoris et securici Ritiis et sanctorum notariorum Festo abrogandis;” No. 13. “De Clerici turpiu, sancto, ad mortem.” &c. A Greek poem in ambose verses, and another poem on fasting, which extend in MS. in the imperial library at Vienna, are attributed to Chrysoberges, and it is believed that he wrote his poem on fasting at the request of a lady, before he was appointed to the patriarchal see of Constantinople.

One Maximus Chrysoberges, who lived about 1400, wrote “Oratio de Processione Spiritus Sancti,” dedicated to the Cretans, and which was printed with a Latin translation in the second vol. of Leo Allatius, “Gracca Orthodoxa.” (Cave, Hist. Liter. ii. p. 390, ad an. 1155; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. pp. 338, 339, ix. 673.)

CHRYSOCEPHALUS, MACATIUS (Μακάτιος Χρυσοκέφαλος), a Greek ecclesiastical writer of great repute. The time at which he lived has been the subject of much investigation: Cave says that it is not correctly known; Oudin thinks that he lived about A.D. 1290; but Fabricius is of opinion that he lived in the fourteenth century, as would appear from the fact, that the condemnation of Barlaam and Gregory Acindynus took place in the synod of Constantinople in 1351, in presence of a great number of prelates, among whom there was Macarius, archbishop of Philadelphia.

The original name of Chrysophalatus was Macarius, and he was also archbishop of Philadelphia; he was called Chrysophalatus because, having made numerous extracts from the works of the fathers, he arranged them under different heads, which he called χρυσοκέφαλος, or “Golden Heads.” Chrysophalatus was a man of extensive learning: his works, which were very numerous, were entirely on religious subjects, and highly esteemed in his day; but only one, of comparatively small importance, the "Oratio in Exaltationem Sanctae Crucis," has been published, with a Latin translation, by Gretserus, in his great work "De Cruce." The most important work of Chrysocophalus is his Commentary on St. Matthew, in three volumes, each of which was divided into twenty books. Only the first volume, containing twenty books, is extant in the Bodleian. (Cod. Baroniensis; it is entitled "Exegesis eis τά κατὰ Ματθαίου άγιων Ευαγγέλια, συνελεγέντα καὶ συντεθείς κεφαλαιωθεῖς παρὰ Μακάριον Μαρτυρολόγιου Φιλαδέλφειας τίτολος Χρυσοκόφαλος, &c.). Fabricius gives the proemium to it, with a Latin translation. The most important among his other works are "Oraciones X.IV. in Psalmos Jesu," "Expositio in Canones Apostolorum et Constitutionem," which he wrote in the island of Chios, "Magnus Alphabetum," a Commentary on Lucas, so called because it is divided into as many chapters as there are letters in the alphabet, viz. twenty-four; it is extant in the Bodleian, and is inscribed "Εὐαγγελικά Ἐκδοσεῖς τοιαύτας Ῥώμαιοι Χρυσοκόφαλος συνθέτων ενθάδε πανεπίστολος Μακάριος Φιλαδέλφειας, ὁ δικτίτς τῆς μακραίας Τραβέδας. Fabricius gives the proemium, "Cosmo- gonia," a Commentary on Genesis, divided into two parts, the first of which is entitled "Cosmogonia," and the second "Patriarchae." The MS. works of Chrysocophalus were nearly all known to Gretserus, and still more so to Leo Allatius, who often refers to them, and gives some fragments or passages of them in his works "De Concilio Florentino, adversus Creightonium," "Diatriba de Script. Symeon," "De Psallic." &c. (Fabric. Bibliogr. viii. pp. 675—683; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. pp. 19, 20.)

CHRYSOCHEUS (Χρυσόχοος), a poor man at Alexandria, who may have lived between the fifth and tenth centuries after Christ, of whom a story is told by Nicolaus Myrepeus. (De Compos. Melit. xxi. 60, 65, pp. 664, 666.) At the age of thirty-two he lost his sight, upon which he went to a chapel of the Blessed Virgin to offer up prayers for his recovery. Here he is said to have been directed to a place where he would find a written paper, which contained a prescription for making an eye-wash; by means of which he was himself restored to sight, and also gained a large income by healing others. At his death he gave the prescription to one of his daughters, and it has been preserved by Nicolaus Myrepeus. (W. A. G.)

CHRYSOCOXCES, GEORGIUS (Γεώργιος ο Χρυσοκοχίς), was a learned Greek physician, who lived in the middle of the fourteenth century of the Christian era, and wrote several valuable works on astronomy and mathematics. It would seem that Georgius Chrysococces is identical with Chuc, who was directed to a place where he would find a written paper, which contained a prescription for making an eye-wash; by means of which he was himself restored to sight, and also gained a large income by healing others. At his death he gave the prescription to one of his daughters, and it has been preserved by Nicolaus Myrepeus. (W. A. G.)

CHRYSOLASAS.

Γεώργιος τοῦ Χρυσοκοχίου τοῦ Ιατροῦ "Αστρονομοῦ. There is another Codex in the same library, entitled "Geωργιανος τοῦ Χρυσοκοχίου περὶ τῆς έκδοσεως τῆς έμφασις τῆς ἀπλώς κυκλωμον ἢλιον καὶ σελήνην, "De inveniendae Syzygiis Lunae solariis per singulas Ann Menses." In the Royal Library at Madrid is a Codex of the same work, entitled "Geωργιανος τοῦ Χρυσοκοχίου περὶ τῆς έκδοσεως τῆς έμφασις τῆς ἀπλώς κυκλωμον ἢλιον καὶ σελήνην." In the copy of this work which was formerly in the Bibli. Palatina at Hildesheim, whence it was sent to Rome by the Spaniards, and kept in the Vatican library till 1815, when it was sent back to Heidelberg with the rest of the Palatine library by order of pope Pius VII. It is doubtful if Georgius Chrysococces is the same Chrysococces who wrote a history of the Byzantine empire, of which a fragment on the murder of Sultan Murad I. in A. D. 1389 is given by Fabricius. The complete astronomical works of Chrysococces, as stated above, have not been published, but several of his Astronomical and Geographical tables have been inserted in various modern works on Astronomy and Geography. (Fabric. Bibli. Græc. xii. pp. 54 57.)

CHRYSOGONUS (Χρυσόγονος). 1. A celebrated player on the flute, who dressed in a sacred robe (τιμία κοσμήσις) played to keep the rivers in time, when Akiobades made his triumphal entry into the Parnassus on his return from banishment in A. D. 407. From a conversation between the father of Chrysogonus and Statonius, reported by Athenaeus, it seems that Chrysogonus had a brother who was a dramatic poet. Chrysogonus himself was the author of a poem or drama entitled Παλατία, which some attributed to Ephialmus. (Athen. xx. p. 252, d. v. p. 300, c. iv. p. 255, d.)

2. Father of the poet Simus, was an intimate friend and devoted servant of Philip V. of Macedon. (Plut. V. c. 219—179.) He was employed by Philip both in war and in peace, and possessed great influence with the king, which he seems to have exercised in an honourable manner, for Polybius says that Philip was most merciful when he followed the advice of Chrysogonus. (Polyb. v. 9, 97, vii. 12, 15.)

CHRYSOGONUS, L. CORNELIUS, a favourite freedman of Sulla, purchased, at Sulla's sale of the goods of the proscribed, the property of M. Crassus. He was born 25 B.C., and was educated with the sons of Virgil, Cicero, and others. He was a scholar of 2000 manuscripts, and afterwards assisted Roscius's son, who was also named S. Roscius Amerinus, of the murder of his father. (Plut. c. 30.) Cicero pronounced his first public oration in defence of Roscius, and in that oration we have a powerful picture of the profligate character of Chrysogonus. It cannot be said with certainty whether in this proceeding Chrysogonus was, as Plutarch affirms, merely the instrument of Sulla. (Plut. Cic. 3; Cic. pro S. Rosc. Amer.; Plin. H. N. xxvi. 18. s. 58.)

pler, astronomer, and statesman. His uncommon talents procured him an introduction to John Cantaeuszus, formerly emperor (John VI.) and from 1355 a monk. Cantaeuszus recommended him to the emperor Manuel II. (1391—1425), by whom he was employed in various important offices. Manuel sent him on several occasions as ambassador to foreign courts. Numerous letters which Chrysoloras wrote to that emperor are extant in MS., in the Bodleian, and in the Royal Library at Paris. Besides these letters, Chrysoloras wrote several treatises on religious subjects, entitled Διάλεγον, such as “Dialogus adversus Demetrium Cydonium, pro Nicolao Cabasila de Procesione Spiritus Sancti,” “Dialogus contra Latinos,” “Encomium in S. Demetrium Martyrem,” “Tractatus ex Libris Nili contra Latinos de Procesione Spiritus Sancti,” “Epistola ad Barthamum de Procesione Spiritus Sancti,” “Extant in a Latin translation, probably made by the same Barham with his own restoration, in the Bibliotheca Patrum Coloniensis.”

CHRYSOLORAS, MANUEL (Μαυρομενος ὁ Χρυσλορας), one of the most learned Greeks of his time, contributed to the revival of Greek literature in western Europe, and the hymn of the fourteenth century the Greek empius was in the greatest danger of being overthrown by sultan Bayazid II., who, however, was checked in his ambitious designs by Timur, and being taken prisoner by him, died in captivity. Before this event, and probably in A. D. 1388, Manuel Chrysoloras was sent by the emperor Manuel Palaeologus to some European kings (among others to the English), at whose courts he remained several years, endeavoring to persuade them to undertake a crusade against the Turks. His efforts, however, were unsuccessful, for the western princes had no confidence in the Greek emperor; nor in his promise to effect the union of the Greek with the Latin church. Having been acquainted with several of the most learned Italians, he accepted their proposition to settle in Italy and to lecture on the Greek language and literature. This he did with great success in Venice, Florence, Milan (1397), Pavia, and Rome: his most distinguished pupils were Leonardo Aretino, Leonardo Bruni, Poggio Bracciolini, Filelfo, Francesco Strozzi, and many more. His renown as a learned priest and eloquent orator were so great, that he was sent to the council of Constance, where he died a short time after his arrival, in the month of April, 1415. It was buried in the church of the Dominicans at Constance. His friend Sylvius wrote his epitaph, which is given in the works cited below.

Manuel Chrysoloras was the author of several treatises on religious subjects, and a considerable number of letters on various topics, which are extant in different libraries in Italy, France, Germany, and Sweden. Only two of his works have been printed, viz., 1. “Epistolae III de Companione Veteris et Novae Romanz,” the Greek text with a Latin version by Petrus Lambechii, appended to “Codex de Antiquitatis Constantinop.” Paris, 1683, fol. These letters are elegantly written. The first is rather prolix, and is addressed to the emperor John Palaeologus; the second to John Chrysoloras; and the third to Demetrius Chrysoloras. This John Chrysoloras, the contemporary of Manuel and Demetrius Chrysoloras, wrote some treatises and letters of little importance, several of which are extant in MS. 2. Ερωτηματικον (Contentiones; that is, “Grammaticales”), printed probably for the first time in 1488, and frequently reprinted at the latter end of that century and the beginning of the next. This is a grammar of the Greek language, and one of the first that circulated in Italy. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 409, &c.) [W. P.] Chrysostoma, a hamadryad who was one day in great danger, as the oak-tree which she inhabited was undermined by a mountain torrent. Arcas, who was hunting in the neighbourhood, discovered her situation, led the torrent in another direction, and secured the tree by a dam. Chrysopelmia became by Arcas the mother of Elatus and Aphoides. (Apollod. iii. 9, § 1; Theod. el Lycurg. 480.) [L. S.]

CHRYSOSTOMUS, JOANNES (Χρυσοστομος, golden-mouthed, so summoned from the power of his eloquence), was born at Antioch, most probably A. D. 347, though the dates 344 and 354 have also been given. His father Secundus was a general in the imperial army, and his mother Anthusa was left a widow soon after his birth. From her he received his first religious impressions, so that she was his name. Monica was to Augustine, Callista to St. Ambrose. Chrysostomus' earliest childhood was continually advancing in seriousness and earnestness of mind, and underwent no violent inward struggle before he embraced Christianity. To this circumstance, Neander (Kirchengesch., iii. p. 1440, &c.) attributes the peculiar form of his doctrine, his strong feeling that the choice of belief or unbelief rests with ourselves, and that God's grace is given in proportion to our own wish to receive it. Libanius taught him eloquence, and said, that he should have desired to see him successor in his school, if the Christians had not stolen him. Before his ordination, he retired first to a monastery near Antioch, and afterwards to a solitary cave, where he committed the whole of the Bible to memory. In this cavern he so injured his health that he was obliged to return to Antioch, where he was ordained deacon by the bishop Meletius, A. D. 381, who had previously baptized him, and afterwards presbyter by Flavianus, successor to Meletius, A. D. 386. At Antioch his success as a preacher was so great, that on the death of Nectarius, archbishop of Constantiopolis, he was chosen to succeed him by Eutropius, minister to the emperor Arcadius, and the selection was readily ratified by the clergy and people of the imperial city, A. D. 397. The minister who appointed him was a eunuch of the palace, and when he died Chrysostom was very soon obliged to extend to him the protection of the church. Tribigild, the Ostrogoth, aided by the treachery of G offices, the imperial general, who hated and despised Eutropius, threatened Constantinople itself by his armies, and demanded as a condition of peace the head of Eutropius, who fled to the sanctuary of the cathedral. While he was grovelling in terror at the altar, Chrysostom ascended the pulpit, and by his eloquence saved his life for the time, though it was afterwards sacrificed to the hatred of his enemies.

The sermons of the archbishop soon gave great offence at Constantinople. The tone of his theology was always rather of a practical than a doctrinal kind, and his strong sense of the power of the human will increased the immorality of the capital. He was undoubtedly rash and violent in his proceedings, and the declamatory character of his preaching was exactly adapted to express the stern morality of his thoughts. He was also disliked for the simplicity of his mode of living, and the manner in which he diverted the revenues of his see from the luxuries in which his predecessors had consumed them, to humane and charitable objects. Many of the worldly-minded monks and clergy, as well as the ministers and ladies of the court, became his enemies, and at their head appeared the empress Eudoxia herself, who held her husband's weak mind in absolute subjection. His unpopularity had spread more widely in consequence of a visitation which he held in Asia Minor, two years after his consecration, in which he accused several bishops of simony and other gross crimes, and deposed thirteen of them. (Comp. Hom. iii. in Act. Apos.) Meanwhile, a contest had arisen in Egypt between Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, and certain monks of Nitria, who followed the opinions of Origen. At their head were four of one family, known as the Tall Brothers (ταλλοί μασαροί), against whom Theophilus seems to have been prejudiced by a strictly private quarrel. (Palladius, op. Chrysost. ed. Montfaucon, vol. xiii.) He excommunicated them, and many flew from the city, which sought the protection of Chrysostom and of the empress. A long dispute followed, in the course of which Theophilus, by artfully working on the simplicity of Epiphanius, bishop of Cyprus, and other prelates hostile to the opinions of Origen, prejudiced them against Chrysostom as implicated in the charge of heresy with which those views had recently been branded by a synod. Eudoxia, who had summoned Theophilus to Constantinople to answer the charge of persecuting the Nitrian monks, became his warm friend when she saw in him her instrument for the destruction of Chrysostom; and he arrived at the capital of the East not as an accursed person, but as the judge of its archbishop. But the same causes which had brought on Chrysostom the hatred of the higher orders had made him the idol of the people; and as it was thought unsafe to hold a synod against him within the city, it was summoned to meet on an estate at Chaledon, called the oak, whence it is known by the name of σύνδος πρὸς τὴν δρέν. The devastations against him were various; his inhospitality was especially put forward (ETY η τινων διδυμησε, μοναστήρι επικοινωνειω, διη μορφὴς διδος, αντιω ζητομένων δρών, Phot. Cod. 50), and the charge of Origenism was used to blind the better part of the East. Before this march of evil Chrysostom steadily refused to appear, until four bishops, notoriously his enemies, were removed from it, who are called by Isidore of Pelusium (i. 152) σύνεργοι δὲ μάλαν συμπάθεταις with Theophilus. He was therefore deposed for contumacy, forty-five bishops subscribing his sentence, to which was added a hint to the emperor, that his sermons against Eudoxia subjected him to the penalties of treason.

At first he refused to desert the flock which God had entrusted to him; but, on hearing that there was a danger of an insurrection in his favour, he retired from Constantinople, to which he was recalled in a few days by a hasty message from the empress, whose superstitious fears were alarmed by an earthquake, which the enraged people considered as an acknowledgment of his punishment. But in two months after his return he was again an exile. The festivities attending the dedication of a silver statue of Eudoxia near the cathedral had disturbed the worshippers, and provoked an angry sermon from the archbishop, who, on hearing that this had excited anew the enmity of the empress, began another sermon with this exordium:—"Herodias again rages, once more she dances, she again requires the head of John." This offence Eudoxia could not forgive. A new synod of Eastern bishops, guided by the advice of Theophilus, condemned Chrysostom for accusing his functions before his previous sentence had been pronounced. He was hastily conveyed to the desolate town of Cucusus, on the borders of Isauria, Cilicia, and Armenia.

Chrysostom's character shone even more brightly in adversity than it had done in power. In spite of the inclement climate to which he was banished, and continual danger from the neighbourhood of Isaurian robbers, he sent letters full of encouragement and Christian faith to his friends at Constantinople, and began to construct a scheme for spreading the gospel among the Persians and Goths. He met with much sympathy from other churches, especially the Roman, whose bishop, Innocent, declared himself his warm friend and supporter. All this time he was working steadily at the summer of A. D. 407 an order came for his removal to Pitius, in Pontus, at the very extremity of the East-Roman empire. But the fatigues of his journey, which was performed on foot under a burning sun, were too much for him, and he died at Comana, in the 60th year of his age. His last words were those of Job, ἀνέλθος τοῦ ἔρχοντα ἐνεργος, and formed a worthy conclusion of a life spent in God's service. His exile nearly caused a schism at Constantinople, where a party, named after him Johannists, separated from the church, and refused to acknowledge his successors. They did not return to the general communion till A. D. 438, when the archbishop Proclus prevailed on the emperor Theodosius II. to bring back the bones of Chrysostom to Constantinople, where they were received with the highest honours, the emperor himself publicly imploring the forgiveness of heaven for the crime of his parents, Arcadius and Eudoxia. Chrysostom, as we learn from his biographers, was short, with a large bald head, high forehead, hollow cheeks, and sunken eyes. The Greek church celebrates his festival Nov. 13, the Latin, Jan. 27.

The works of Chrysostom are most voluminous. They consist of: 1. Homilies on different parts of Scripture and points of doctrine and practice; 2. Apologies and protocols of the ancient authors; 3. Epistles addressed to a great number of different persons. 4. Treatises on various subjects, e. g. the Priesthood (six books), Providence (three books), &c. 5. Liturgies. Of the homilies, those on St. Paul are superior to anything in ancient theology, and Thomas Aquinas said, that he would not accept the whole city of Paris for those on St. Matthew, delivered at Autioch, a. D. 390—397. The letters written in exile have been compared to those of Cicero composed under similar circumstances; but in freedom from vanity and selfishness, and in calmness and resignation, Chrysostom's epistles are infinitely superior to Cicero's. Among the collection of letters is one from the emperor Honorius to his brother Arcadius in defence of Chrysostom, found in the Vatican, and published by Baronius and afterwards by Montfaucon.

The merits of Chrysostom as an expositor of Scripture are very great. Rejecting the allegorical interpretations which his predecessors had put upon it, he investigates the meaning of the text grammatically, and adds an ethical or doctrinal application to a perspicuous explanation of the sense. The first example of grammatical interpretation had indeed been set by Origen, many of whose critical remarks are of great merit; but Chrysostom is free from his mystical fancies, and quite as well acquainted with the language of the New Testament. The Greek expositors who followed him have done little more than copy his explanations. The commentary of Theodoret is a faithful continuation of Chrysostom's homilies, and so also are the works of Theophylact and Oecumenius, so much so that to those who wish to gain a knowledge of the results of his critical labours, the study of the two latter may be recommended as perfectly correct compilers from their more prolix predecessor.

Of Chrysostom's powers as a preacher the best evidence is contained in the history of his life; there is no doubt that his eloquence produced the deepest impression on his hearers, and while we dissent from those who have ranked him with Demosthenes and Cicero, we cannot fail to admire the power of his language in expressing moral indignation, and to sympathise with the ardent love of all that is good and noble, the fervent piety, and absorbing faith in the Christian revelation, which pervaded his writings. His faults are too great diffuseness and a love of metaphor and ornament. He often repelled with indignation the applause with which his sermons were greeted, exclaiming, "The place where you are is no theatre, nor are you now sitting to gape upon actors." (Hom. xvii. Matt. vii.) There are many respects in which he shews the superiority of his understanding to the general feelings of the age. We may cite as one example the fact, that although he had been a monk, he was far from adopting monachism above the active duties of the Christian life. (See Hom. vii. in Heb. iv.; Hom. vii. in Ephes. iv.) "How shall we conquer our enemies," he asks in one place, "if some do not busy themselves about goodness at all, while those who do withdraw from the battle?" (Hom. vi. in 1 Cor. iv.) Again, he was quite free from the view of inspiration which prevailed at Alexandria, and which considered the Bible in such a sense the word of God, as to overlook altogether the human element in its composition, and the difference of mind and character in its authors. Variations in tenses he speaks of as proofs of truth (Hom. i. in Matth.); so that he united the principle of a collation of the principal moral element necessary for an interpreter of the Bible, with the habit of mind with a real depth of Christian feeling. At the same time he was not free from the tendencies of the time, speaking often of miracles wrought by the relics of martyrs, consecrated oil, and the sign of the cross, and of the efficacy of exorcism, nor does he always express himself on some of the points already noticed with the same distinctness as in the examples cited above. His works are historically valuable as illustrating the manners of the 4th and 5th centuries of the Christian era, the social state of the people, and the luxurious licence which disgraced the capital. (See Jortin, Eccles. Hist. iv. p. 169, &c.)

The most elaborate among the ancient authorities for Chrysostom's life are the following:—1. Palladius, bishop of Helenopolis, whose work (a dialogue) was published in a Latin translation at Venice A. D. 1533, and in the original text at Paris in 1680. It is to be found in Montfaucon's edition of Chrysostom's works, vol. xiii. 2. The Ecclesiastical Histories of Socrates (lib. vi.), Sozomenus (lib. viii.), Theodoret (v. 27). 3. The works of Suidas ( Theodore), and Isidore of Pelusium (ii. Epist. 42), besides several others, some published and some in MSS., of which a list will be found in Fabrius (Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. pp. 46-160). Among the more modern writers it will suffice to mention Erasmus (vol. iii. Ep. 1150. p. 1331, &c., ed. Lugd. Bat.), J. Frederic Meyer (Chrysostomus Lutheraus, Jena, 1680), with Hack's reply (S. J. Chrysostomus a Luthersanimo vindicatus, 1683), Cave (Script. Eccl. Hist. Litter, vol. i.), Lardner (Credibility of the Gospel Hist. part ii. vol. x. c. 118), Tilmont (Mémoires Ecclésiastiques, vol. xi. pp. 405, &c.), and Montfaucon, his principal editor. Gibbon's account (Decline and Fall, xxxii.) is compiled from Palladius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Tilmont, Erasmus, and Montfaucon. But the best of all will be found in Neander (Kirchen gesch. ii. 3, p. 1440, &c.), who has also published a separate life of Chrysostom.

Chrysostom's works were first published in Latin at Venice in 1503, Comment. inpsensa et studio Bernardi Stagnoii Tidianensis et Gregorii de Gregorio. Several editions followed at Basle, also in Latin, and in 1523 the Homilies on Genesis were translated there by Oecolampadius (Hauschein). In 1536 his works were published at Paris, but the most famous edition which appeared in that city was cura Porentio Ducezi, 1613, whose translation is much commended by Montfaucon. In Greek were first published at Verona, 1529, the Homilies on St. Paul's Epistles, edited by Gilbert Bishop of Verona, with a preface by Donatus, addressed to Pope Clement VII. In 1610-16, the most complete collection of Chrysostom's works which had yet appeared was published at Eton by Norton, the king's printer, under the superintendence of Henry Savil, in 3 vols.; this edition contained notes by Cusin and others. In 1609, at Paris, F. Morell began to publish the Greek text with the version of Ducaeus, a task which was completed by Charles Morell in 1633. Of this edition the text is compiled from that of Savil, and that of an edition of the Commentaries on the New Testament, published at Heidelberg by Commelin, 1591—1603. In 1718—23 appeared, also at Paris, the edition compiled by Bernard de Fontenelle, the king's friend, who added an appendix to ascertain the date of the different works, has prefixed to most of them a short dissertation on the circumstances under which it was

CHTHONIA, written, with an inquiry into its authenticity, and has added very much hitherto unpublished, together with the principal ancient lives of Chrysostomo. Montfaucon was a Benedictine monk, and was assisted by others of his order. Of separate works of Chrysostom the editions and translations are almost innumerable. Erasmus translated some of the homilies and commentaries; and the edition of two homilies (those on 1 Cor. and 1 Thess. iv.)
"Gr. Lat. interprete Joanne Cheko, Cantabrigiensis, Londoni, ap. Reynier Vuoltinh. 1543" is interesting as the first book printed with Greek types in England. Some of the homilies are translated in the Library of the Fathers now publishing at Oxford, and those on St. Matthew have been recently edited by the Rev. F. Field, Fellow of Trin. Coll. Cambridge. The number of MSS. of Chrysostom is also immense: the principal of these are in the royal library at Paris, the imperial library at Vienna (to which collection two of great value were added by Maria Theresa), and that of St. Mark at Venice. [G. E. L. C.]
CHYRSTOS'TOMUS, DION. [DION.]
CHYRSTOTHMUS (Χρυσόθεμος). There are four mythical females of this name (Hygin. Fab. 170, Post. Atr. ii. 25; Dion. v. 22; Hom. Il. ix.
267), and one male, a son of Caramnor, the priest of Apollo at Tarhira in Crete. He is said to have been a poet, and to have won the first victory in the Pythian games by a hymn on Apollo. (Paus.
z. 7. 2.) [L. S.]
CHYRSTOTHMIS (Χρυσόθεμις) and GUTE-LIDAS (Γυτελίδας), statuaries of Argos, made in honour of the statues of Demeter and his son Thepomus, who were each twice victorious in the Olympic games. The victories of Demeter were in the 65th and 66th Olympiads, and the artists of course lived at the same time (a.c. 520 and wards). Pausanias describes one of the statues, and quotes the inscription, which contained the names of the artists, and which described them as τέχνων εἰδών ὡς καὶ προτέρων, which appears to mean that, like the early artists in general, they each belonged to a family in which art was hereditary. (x. 6. § 2.) [P. S.] CHYRSSUS (Χρύρρος), the fourteenth (or thirteenth) of the family of the Asclepidae, was the youngest son of Neurus, the grandson of Calacos and the grandson of Acrisius, and lived in the six-century b.c. in the island of Cos. During the Crissaean war, while the Amphyceions were besieging the town of Crissa in Phocis, the plague broke out among their army. Having consulted the oracle of Delphi in consequence, they were directed to fetch from Cos "the young of a stag, together with gold," which was interpreted to mean Neurus and Chrysus. They accordingly persuaded them both to join the camp, where Chrysus was the first person to mount the wall at the time of the general assault, but was at the same time mortally wounded, a.c. 591. He was buried in the hippodrom of Delphi, and worship-paid by the inhabitants as a hero (ἐρατὶς). (Thesasal Oratio, in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 836, &c.) [W. A. G.]
CHH'TH'I'NA (Χθονία), may mean the subterranean, or the goddess of the earth, that is, the protection of the fields, whence it is used as a surnane of infernal divinities, such as Hecate (Apollo, Rhod. iv. 149; Orph. Hymn. 35. 9), Nyx (Orph. Hymn. 2. 8), and Melinoë (Orph.
Hymn. 70. 1), but especially of Demeter. (Herod.
ii. 123; Orph. Hymn. 39. 19; Aristid. ii. 35; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 297.) Although the name, in the case of Demeter, scarcely requires explanation, yet mythology relates two stories to account for it.
According to one of them, Clymenus and Chthonia, the children of Phoroneus, founded at Hermione a sanctuary of Demeter, and called her Chthonia from the name of one of the founders. (Paus. ii.
35. § 8.) According to an Argive legend, Demeter on her wanderings came to Argolis, where she was ill-received by Colontas. Chthonia, his daughter, was dissatisfied with her father's conduct; and,
when Colontas and his house were burnt by the goddess, Chthonia was carried off by her to Hemrine, where she built a sanctuary to Demeter Chthonia, and instituted the festival of the Hermes in her honour. (Paus. ii. 35. § 8; Dict. of Ant.
e. v. Xãíνa.) A third mythical personage of this name occurs in Apollodorus (iii. 15. § 1). [L. S.] CHTH'I'NIUS (Χθόνιος) has the same meaning as Chthonia, and is therefore applied to the gods of the lower world, or the shades (Hom. Il. ix. 457; Hesiod. Op. 455; Orph. Hymn. 17. 3, 69. 2, Argon. 973), and to beings that are considered as earth-born. (Apollod. iii. 4. § 1; Apollon. Rhod.
iv. 1398.) It is also used in the sense of "gods of the land," or "native divinities." (Apollon. Rhod.
iv. 1292.) There are also several mythical personages of the name of Chthonia. (Apollod. ii.
1. § 5, iii. 4. §§ 1, 11; Paus. vii. 53; Pind. Py.
5. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 178.) [L. S.]
CHYRRH'NIUS, GTEGRIUS, a native of Caudace or Chandace, in the island of Crete, lived most probably during the later period of the Greek empire. He wrote a history in verse, beginning with the creation of the world and going down to the reign of David and Solomon, kings of Judaea, which is extant in MS. in the imperial library at Vienna, and was formerly in the library of John Suzzo (Susius) at Constantinople. (Fabric. Bibl.
13.) [W. P.]
CHYRRH'NIUS, MICHAEL, a Graeco-Roman jurist and canonist, who was nomophylax, and afterwards metropolitan of Thessalonica. He is said by Pohl (ad Suarez. N. basil. p. 156, n. 5) to have lived in the 8th or 9th century, but the exact time is not known. He wrote an extant work in honor of Niphonos Blemmydes, patriarch of Constantinople, and has been the author of various works. He is cited by Mat. Blastares (Leona. J. G. R. i. pp. 482, 487), and is known by a short treatise on the degrees of relationship (τέτρι των βαθμων [qu. βαθων] πληρυ vevles), inserted in the collection of Leucanlius (p. 519). By Suarez (who erroneously identifies Chthonas and Dominus), Chthusius is mentioned among the scholiasts upon the Basilica (Notit. Basil. § 42), but this seems to be an error.
(Böcking, Institutionen, Bonn, 1845, p. 186, n.
48; Hornbach, de Basil. Orig. p. 97.) [J. T. G.] CHYRRH'NIUS, NICEPHORUS, renowned as a statesman, a philosopher, and a divine, lived in the latter part of the 13th and in the beginning of the 14th century. He was probably a native of Constantinople, and belonged undoubtedly to one of the first families in the Greek empire. Enjoying the confidence and friendship of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus the elder, he was success-ively appointed prefect of the Camiceus, keeper of the imperial seal-ring, and magnus stratope-CHUMNUS.

and a great number of letters on various subjects, several of which seem to be of great interest for history, while others, as well as the works cited above, appear to be of considerable importance for the history of Greek civilization in the middle ages. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 675, 676; Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. ii. p. 494, ad an. 1320; Nicephorus Gregorius, lib. viii. p. 168, ed. Paris; Cantacuzenus, lib. i. p. 45, ed. Paris.) [W. P.]

CICEROIUS, the secretary (scriba) of the elder Scipio Africanus, was a candidate for the praetorship in B.C. 174 along with Scipio's son, but when he saw that he was obtaining more votes than the latter, he resigned in his favour. (Val. Max. iv. 5. § 3, iii. 5. § 2.) Cicereius was, however, elected praetor in the following year (B.C. 173), and he obtained the province of Sardina, but was ordered by the senate to go to Corsica first, in order to conduct the war against the inhabitants of that island. After defeating the Corsicans in battle, he granted them peace on the payment of 200,000 pounds of wax, and then passed over to Sardina. On his return to Rome next year (B.C. 172) he sued for a triumph on account of his victory in Corsica, and when this was refused by the senate, he celebrated on his own authority a triumph on the Alburn mount, a practice which had now become not unfrequent. In the same year he was one of the three ambassadors sent to the Illyrian king, Gentius; and in B.C. 167 he was again despatched on the same mission. In the year before (B.C. 168) he dedicated on the Alburn mount the temple to Juno Moneta, which he had vowed in his battle with the Coriscans five years before. (Liv. xli. 33, xlii. 1, 7, 21, 26 xiv. 17, 15.)

CICERO, the name of a family, little distinguished in history, belonging to the plebeian Claudia gens, the only member of which mentioned is C. Claudius Cicero, tribune of the plebe in B.C. 454. (Liv. iii. 31.) The word seems to be connected with aicor, and may have been originally applied by way of distinction to some individual celebrated for his skill in raising that kind of pulse, by whom the epithet was transmitted to his descendants. Thus the designation will be precisely analogous to Bulbus, Pabius, Lentulus, Piso, Taelero, and the like. [W. R.]

CICERO, the name of a family of the Tullii. The Tullii Cicernones had from time immemorial been settled at Arpinum, which received the full franchise in B.C. 188; but they never aspired to any political distinction until the stock was raised by the great orator from that obscurity into which it quickly relapsed after his death. His genealogy, so far as it can be traced, is represented in the following table.

Married Gratidia.

Married Helvia.

Married Terentia.

Married Pomponia.
1. M. Tullius Cicero, grandfather of the orator, appears to have taken a lead in his own community, and vigorously opposed the projects of his fellow-townsmen and brother-in-law, M. Gratidius, who had raised a great commotion at Arpinum by agitation in favor of a law for voting by ballot. The matter was referred to the consul M. Aemilius Scursus (b.c. 115), who complimented Cicero on his conduct, declaring that he would gladly see a person of such spirit and integrity exerting his powers on the great field of the metropolis, instead of remaining in the seclusion of a country town. The old man was still alive at the birth of his eldest grandson (b.c. 106), whom he little resembled in his tastes, for he was no friend to foreign literature, and was wont to say, that his contemporaries were like Syrian slaves, the more Greek they knew, the greater soundness they were. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 1, iii. 16, de Orat. ii. 66.)

2. M. Tullius Cicero, son of the foregoing, and father of the orator. He was a member of the equestrian order, and lived upon his hereditary estate, in the neighbourhood of Arpinum, near the junction of the Fibrenus with the Liris, devoted to literary pursuits, till far advanced in life, when he removed to Rome for the purpose of educating his two boys, Marcus and Quintus, and became the proprietor of a house in the Cucinae. His reputation as a man of learning procured for him the society and friendship of the most distinguished characters of the day, especially the orators M. Antonius and L. Crassus, and the jurists Q. Scaevola and C. Aculeo. He must have lived for a considerable time after this period, since he was in the habit of giving his nephew many particulars with regard to the pursuits of Antonius. (De Orat. ii. 1.)

3. L. Tullius Cicero, brother of the orator. He accompanied M. Antonius the orator to Cilicia in b.c. 103 as a private friend, and remained with him in the province until his return the following year. He must have lived for a considerable time after this period, since he was in the habit of giving his nephew many particulars with regard to the pursuits of Antonius. (De Orat. ii. 1.)

4. L. Tullius Cicero, son of the foregoing. He was the constant companion and schoolfellow of the orator, travelled with him to Athens in b.c. 79, and subsequently acted as his assistant in collecting evidence against Verres. On this occasion the Syracusans paid him the compliment of voting him a public guest (hospes) of their city, and transmitted to him a copy of the decree to this effect engraved on a tablet of brass. Lucius died in b.c. 68, much regretted by his cousin, who was deeply attached to him. (De Fin. v. i, de Verr. iv. 11, 81, 64, 65, ad Att. i. 5.)

5. M. Tullius Cicero, the orator, eldest son of No. 2. In what follows we do not intend to enter deeply into the complicated political transactions of the em during which this great man flourished, except in so far as he was directly and personally interested and concerned in the events. The complete history of that momentous crisis must be obtained by comparing this article with the biographies of Antonius, Augustus, Brutus, Caesar, Catullus, Cato, Claudius Pulcher, [Claudius], Crassus, Lepidus, Pompeius, and the other great characters of the day.

1. Biography of Cicero.

M. Tullius Cicero was born on the 3rd of January, b.c. 106, according to the Roman calendar, at that epoch nearly three months in advance of the true time, at the family residence in the vicinity of Arpinum. No trustworthy anecdotes have been preserved with regard to his childhood, for little faith can be reposed in the gossiping stories collected by Plutarch of the crowds who were wont to flock to the school where he received the first rudiments of knowledge, for the purpose of seeing and hearing the young prodigy; but we cannot doubt that the aptitude for learning displayed by himself and his brother Quintus induced their father to remove to Rome, where he conducted their elementary education according to the advice of L. Crassus, who pointed out both the subjects to which their attention ought chiefly to be devoted, and also the teachers by whom the information sought might be best imparted. These instructors were, with the exception perhaps of Q. Aelius, the grammarian (Brut. 56), all Greeks, and among the number was the renowned Archias of Antioch, who had been living at Rome under the protection of Lucullus ever since b.c. 102, and seems to have communicated a temporary enthusiasm for his own pursuits to his pupil, most of whose poetical attempts belong to his early youth. In his sixteenth year (b.c. 91) Cicero received the manly gown, and entered the forum, where he listened with the greatest avidity to the speakers at the bar and from the rostra, dedicating however a large portion of his time to reading, writing, and oratorical exercises. At this period he was committed by his father to the care of the venerable Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, whose side he scarcely ever quitted, acquiring from his lips that acquaintance with the constitution of his country and the principles of jurisprudence, and those lessons of practical wisdom which proved of inestimable value in his future career. During b.c. 89, in accordance with the ancient practice not yet entirely obsolete which required every citizen to be a soldier, he served his first and only campaign under Gn. Pompeius Strabo (father of Pompeius Magnus), then engaged in prosecuting with vigour the Social war, and was present at the conference between his commander and P. Vettius Scato, general of the Marsal, by whom the Romans had been signally defeated, a few months before, and the consul P. Rutillius Lupus slain.

For upwards of six years from the date of his brief military career Cicero made no appearance as a public man. During the whole of the fierce struggle between Marius and Sulla he identified himself with neither party, but appears to have carelessly kept aloof from the scenes of strife and bloodshed by which he was surrounded, and to have given himself up with indefatigable perseverance to those studies which were essential to his success as a lawyer and orator, that being the only path open to distinction in the absence of all taste or talent for martial achievements. Accordingly, during the above period he first imbued a love for philosophy from the discourses of Phaedrus the Epicurean, whose lectures, however, he soon deserted for the more congenial doctrines instilled by Philo, the chief of the New Academy, who with several men of learning had fled from Athens when Greece was invaded by the troops of Mithridates. From Dionysius the Stoic, who lived and died in his house, he acquired a scientific knowledge of logic. The principles of rhetoric were deeply imprinted upon his mind by Molo the Rhodian, whose reputation as a forensic speaker was not inferior to his skill as a teacher; while not a day passed in which he did not apply the precepts inculcated by these various masters in declaiming with his friends and companions, sometimes in Latin, sometimes in Greek, but more frequently in the latter language. Nor did he omit to practice composition, for he drew up the treatise commonly entitled De Inventione Rhetoricae, wrote his poem Marinas, and translated Aratus together with the Oceanides of Xenophon.

But when tranquillity was restored by the final discomfiture of the Marian party, and the business of the forum had resumed, in outward appearance at least, its wonted course, the season seemed to have arrived for displaying those abilities which had been cultivated with so much assiduity, and accordingly at the age of twenty-five Cicero came forward as a pleader. The first of his extant speeches, in a civil suit, is that for P. Quinctius (c. 81), in which, however, he refers to some previous efforts; the first delivered upon a criminal trial was that in defense of Sex. Roscius of Ameria, charged with perjury by Chrysogenes, a freedman of Sulla, supported, as it was understood, by the influence of his patron. No one being disposed to brave the wrath of the all-powerful dictator by openly avowing the cause of one to whom he was supposed to be hostile, Cicero moved partly by compunction and partly by perceiving that this was a noble opportunity for commencing his career as a protector of the oppressed (see de Off. ii. 14), and establishing at considerable apparent but little real risk his character as a fearless champion of innocence, boldly came forward, pronounced a most animating and powerful address, in which he did not scruple to animadverted distinctly in the strongest terms upon the cruel and unjust measures of the favourite, and by implication on the tyranny of those by whom he was upheld, and succeeded in procuring the acquittal of his client. Soon after (c. 79) he again came indirectly into collision with Sulla, on the political interests of a woman of Arretinum, a preliminary objection was taken against her title to appear in court, insomuch as she belonged to a town the inhabitants of which in the recent troubles had been deprived of the rights of citizenship. But Cicero denounced the act by which she and her fellow-citizens had been stripped of their privileges as utterly unconstitutional and therefore in itself null and void, and carried his point although opposed by the eloquence and experience of Cotta. It does not appear probable, notwithstanding the assertion of Plutarch to the contrary, that Cicero experienced or dreaded any evil consequences from the displeasure of Sulla, whose power was far too firmly fixed to be shaken by the fiery harangues of a young lawyer, although other circumstances compelled him for a while to abandon the field upon which he had entered so auspiciously. He had now attained the age of twenty-seven, but his constitution was far from being vigorous or his health robust. Thin almost to emaciation, with a long scraggy neck, his general appearance and habit of body were such as to excite serious alarm among his relations, especially since in addition to his close application to business, he was wont to exert his voice, when pleading, to the utmost without remission, and employed in the most tireless and pertinacious exertion. Persuaded in some degree by the earnest representations of friends and physicians, but influenced still more strongly by the conviction that there was great room for improvement in his style of composition and in his mode of delivery, both of which required to be softened and tempered, he determined to quit Italy for a season, and to visit the great fountains of art and eloquence. Accordingly (c. 79) he repaired in the first instance to Athens, where he remained for six months, diligently revising and extending his acquaintance with philosophy by listening to the famous Antiochus of Ascalon, studying rhetoric under the distinguished and experienced Demetrius Syrus, attending occasionally the lectures of Zeno the Epicurean, and enjoying the society of his brother Quintus, of his cousin Lucius, and of Pompeius Atticus, with whom he now cemented that close friendship which proved one of the chief comforts of his life, and which having endured unshaken the fiercest trials, was dissolved only by death. After quitting Athens he made a complete tour of Asia Minor, holding fellowship during the whole of his journey with the most illustrious orators and rhetoricians of the East,—Menippus of Strattonioia, Dionysius of Magnesia, AESCHYLUS of Chiusos, and Xenodes of Arcadytum,—carefully treasuring up the advice which they bestowed and profiting by the examples which they afforded. Not satisfied even with this discipline and these advantages, he passed over to Rhodes (c. 78), where he became acquainted with Posidonius, and once more placed himself under the care of Molo, who took great pains to restrain and confine within proper limits the tendency to diffuse and redundant copiousness which he remarked in his disciple.

At length, after an absence of two years, Cicero returned to Rome (c. 77), not only more deeply skilled in the theory of his art and improved by practice, but almost entirely changed. His general health was now firmly established, his lungs had acquired strength, the habit of stunting his voice to the highest pitch had been commended, his execution and the unvarying reverence in which he was held, the whole form and character of his oratory both in matter and delivery had assumed a steady, sub-

duced, composed, and well-regulated tone. Transcendent natural talents, developed by such elaborate and judicious training under the most celebrated masters, stimulated by burning zeal and sustained by indomitable perseverance, could scarcely fail to command success. His merits were soon discerned and appreciated, the prejudice at first entertained that he was a mere Grecokkling, an indolent man of letters, was quickly dispelled; shyness and reserve were speedily dispelled by the warmth of public applause; he forthwith took his station in the foremost rank of judicial orators, and ere long stood alone in acknowledged pre-emminence; his most formidable rivals, Hortensius, eight years his senior, and C. Aurelius Cotta, now (b. c. 76) canvassing for the consulship, who had long been kings of the bar, having been forced, after a short but sharp contest for supremacy, to yield.

Cicero had now reached the age (of 36) at which the laws permitted him to become candidate for the lowest of the great offices of state, and although comparatively speaking a stranger, and certainly unsupported by any powerful family interest, his reputation and popularity already stood so high, that he was elected (b. c. 76) quaestor by the votes of all the tribes. The lot decided that he should serve in Sicily under Sex. Peduncus, praetor of Lilybaeum. During his tenure of office (b. c. 76) he executed with great skill the difficult and delicate task of procuring large additional supplies of corn for the relief of the metropolis, only suffering from a severe dearth, and at the same time displayed so much liberality towards the farmers of the revenue and such courtesy towards private traders, that he excited no jealousy. He also maintained a strong spirit of integrity, rigid impartiality, and disinterested self-denial, in all branches of his administration, that the delighted provincials, little accustomed to the exhibition of these virtues in the person of a Roman magistrate, devised unheard-of honours to testify their gratitude. Some of the leading weaknesses in the character of Cicero, indolent vanity and a propensity to exaggerate extravagantly the importance of his services, now began to shew themselves, but they had not yet acquired such a mastery over his mind as to prevent him from laughing at the disappointments he encountered. Thus we find him describing with considerable humour one of his speeches (pro Planet. 26) the excitement he had formed at this period of his own extraordinary merits, of the position which he occupied, and of the profound sensation which his proceedings must have caused at Rome. He imagined that the scene of his duties was, as it were, the stage of the world, and that the gaze of all mankind had been watching his performances ready to condemn or to applaud. Full of the consciousness of this celebrity he hunted at Puteoli (b. c. 74), and intense was his mortification when he discovered that even his own acquaintances among the luxurious crowd who thronged that gay coast were absolutely ignorant, not only of his name, but even of his existence. He was, while he imagined where he had been, a leon, he tells us, which though severe was most valuable, since it taught him that, while the eyes of his countrymen were bright and aent their ears were dull, and pointed out the necessity of mingling with the people and keeping constantly in their view, of frequenting assiduously all places of general resort, and of admitting visitors and clients to his presence, under any circumstances, and at all hours, however inconvenient or unreasonable.

For upwards of four years after his return to Rome in the beginning of b. c. 74, the life of Cicero presents an entire blank. That he was actively engaged in the courts of law is certain, for he himself informs us that he was employed in a multitude of causes (Brut. 92), and that his powers had now attained to the full vigour of maturity; but we know not even the name of one of these orations, except perhaps that, "Pro M. Tullio," some important fragments of which have been recently brought to light. Meanwhile, Lucullus had been pressing the war in the East against Mithridates with great energy and the happiest results; the power of Pompey and of Crassus at home had been steadily increasing, although a bad feeling had sprung up between them in consequence of the events connected with the final suppression of the servile war of Spartacus. They, however, discharged harmoniously the duties of their joint consilium (b. c. 70), and seem to have felt that it was necessary for their interests to control the high aristocratical faction, for by their united exertions the plebeian tribunes recovered the vital privileges of which they had been deprived by Sulla, and the equites were once more admitted to serve as judges on criminal trials, sharing this distinction with the senate and the tribuni aevi. In this year Cicero became candidate for the aedilship, and the issue of the contest was if possible more triumphant than when he had formerly solicited the suffrage of the people, for he was chosen not only by a majority of votes, but bartered a greater number of votes than any one of his competitors. A little while before this gratifying demonstration of public approbation, he undertook the management of the most important trial in which he had hitherto been engaged—the impeachment preferred against Verres, for misgovernment and complicated oppression, by the Sicilians, whom he had ruled as praetor of Syracuse for the space of three years. (73—71.) Cicero, who always felt much more inclined to appear in the character of a defender than in the invidious position of an accuser, was prevailed upon to conduct this cause by the earnest entreaties of his provincial friends, who reposed the most perfect confidence in his integrity and good-will, and at the same time were fully alive to the advantage that would be secured to their suit from the local knowledge of their advocate. The most strenuous exertions were now made by Verres, backed by all the interest of the Metellis and other powerful families, to wrest the case out of the hands of Cicero, who, however, defeated the attempt; and, having demanded and been allowed 110 days for the purpose of collecting evidence, instantly set out, accompanied by his cousin Lucius, for Sicily, where he exerted himself so vigorously, that he traversed the whole island in less than two months, and returned attended by only the necessary wits and bailiffs and servants. Another desperate effort was made by Hortensius, now consul-elect, who was counsel for the defendant, to raise up obstacles which might have the effect of delaying the trial until the commencement of the following year, when he counted upon a more favourable judge, a more corrupt jury, and the protection of the chief magistrates; but here again he was defeated by the promptitude and decision of his opponent, who opened the case very briefly upon the fifth of August, proceeded at once to the examination of the witnesses, and the production of the depositions and other papers, which taken together constituted a mass of testimony so decisive, that Verres gave up the contest as hopeless, and retired at once into exile without attempting any defence. The full pleadings, however, which were to have been delivered had the trial been permitted to run its ordinary course were subsequently published by Cicero, and form, perhaps, the proudest monument of his oratorial powers, exhibiting that extraordinary combination of surpassing genius with almost inconceivable industry, of brilliant oratory with minute accuracy of inquiry and detail, which rendered him irresistible in a good cause and often victorious in a bad one.

The most important business of his new office (n. c. 69) were the preparations for the celebration of the Floralia, of the Liberalis, and of the Ludi Romani in honour of the three divinities of the Capitol. It had become a common custom for the secedees to lavish enormous sums on these shows, in the hope of propitiating the favour of the multitude and securing their support. Cicero, whose fortune was very moderate, at once perceiving that, even if he were to ruin himself, it would be impossible for him to vie in splendour with many of those who were likely to be his rivals in his upward course, with very correct judgment resolved, while he did nothing which could give reasonable offence, to found his claims to future distinction solely on those talents which had already won for him his present elevation, and accordingly, although he avoided everything like meanness or parsimony in the games presented under his auspices, was equally careful to shun ostentation and profuse expenditure.

For nearly three years the history of Cicero is again a blank, that is, until the close of n. c. 67, when he was elected first praetor by the suffrages of all the centuries, and this on three several occasions, the comitia having twice broken off in consequence of the disturbances connected with the passing of the Cornelian law. The duties of this magistracy, on which he entered in January, n. c. 66, were two-fold. He was called upon to preside in the highest civil court, and was also required to act as commissioner (quaestor) in trials for extortion, while in addition to his judicial functions he continued to practise at the bar, and carried through single-handed the defence of Cluentius, in the most singular and interesting causa celebré bequeathed to us by antiquity. But the most important event of the year was his first appearance as a political speaker from the rostra, when he delivered his celebrated address to the people in favour of the Manilian law, maintaining the cause of Pompey against the hearty opposition of the senate and the optimates. That his conduct on this occasion was the result of mature deliberation we cannot doubt. Nor will it be difficult to discern his real motives, which were perhaps not quite so pure and patriotic as his panegyrists would have us believe. Hitherto his progress, in so far as any external obstacles were concerned, had been smooth and uninterrupted; the ascent had been neither steep nor rough; the quaestorship, the legatuship, the praetorship, had been gained almost without a struggle: but the great prize of the connection, on which every ambitious hope and desire had long been fixed, was yet to be won, and he had every reason to anticipate the most determined resistance on the part of the nobles (we use the word in the technical Roman sense), who guarded the avenues to this the highest honour of the state with watchful jealousy against the approach of any new man, and were likely to strain every nerve to secure the exclusion of the son of an obscure municipal knight. Well aware that any attempt to remove or soften the inveterate prejudices of these men would be met, if not by open hostility and insult, most surely by secret treachery, he resolved to throw himself into the arms of the popular faction, whose principles he detested in his heart, and to rivet their favour by casting himself in the role of their idol the weight of his own influence with the middle classes, his proper and peculiar party. The popularity of the orator rose higher than ever; the friendship of Pompey, now certainly the most important individual in the commonwealth, was secured, and the success which attended the operations in the East smothered if it did not extinguish the indignation of the senatorial leaders. Perhaps we ought not here to omit adding one more to the almost innumerable examples of the incredible industry of Cicero. It is recorded, that, during his praetorship, notwithstanding his complicated engagements as judge, pleader, and politician, he found time to attend the rhetorical school of Antonius Guipho, which was now rising to great eminence. (Suet. de Iulio. Gramm. 7; Macrob. Sat. iii. 12.)

During the eighteen months which followed (65—64), Cicero having declined to accept a province, kept his eye steadily fixed upon one great object, and employed himself unceasingly in watching every event which could in any way bear upon the consular elections. It appears from his letters, which now begin to open their treasures to us, that he had six competitors, of whom the most formidable were C. Antonius, a nephew of the great orator, who perished during the Marian proscription, and the notorious Catiline. The latter was threatened with a criminal prosecution, and it is amusing to observe the lawyer-like coolness with which Cicero speaks of his guilt being as clear as the noon-day sun, at the same time indicating a wish to defend him, should such a course be for his own interest, and expressing great pleasure at the perjury of the accuser who was ready to betray the cause, and the probable corruption of the judges, a majority of whom it was believed might be bought over. Catiline was, however, acquitted without the aid of his rival, and formed a coalition with Antonius, receiving strenuous assistance from Crassus and Caesar, both of whom now began to regard with an evil eye the partizan of Pompey, whose splendid exploits filled them with increasing jealousy and alarm. That Cicero viewed this union with the most lively apprehensions is evident from the fragments of his address, In Toga candida, in which he appears to have dissected and exposed the vices and crimes of his two opponents with the most merciless severity. But his fears proved groundless. His star was still in the ascendant; he was returned by all the centuries, while his colleague Antonius obtained a small majority only over Catiline. The attention of the new consul immediately after entering upon office (n. c. 63) was occupied with the agrarian law of Rullus, with regard to which we shall speak more fully hereafter; in quelling the tumults excited by the enactment of Otho; in reconciling the descendants of those proscribed by Sulla to the civil disabilities under which they laboured; in defending C. Rabirius, charged with having been concerned in the death of Saturninus; in bringing forward a measure to render the punishment of bribery more stringent; in checking the abuses connected with the nominations to a legatio libera; and in remedying various defects in the administration of justice. But his whole thoughts were soon absorbed by the precautions required to battle the treason of Catiline. The origin and progress of that famous plot, the consummate courage, prudence, caution, and decision manifested throughout by Cicero under circumstances the most delicate and embarrassing, are fully detailed elsewhere. [CATILINA.] For once the nation did not prove thankless to their benefactor. Honours were showered down upon him such as no citizen of Rome had ever enjoyed. Men of all ranks and all parties hailed him as the saviour of his country; Catulus in the senate, and Cato in the forum, addressed him as "pares patres," father of his father-land; thanksgivings in his name were voted to the gods, a distinction heretofore bestowed only on those who had achieved a victory in a field of battle; and all Italy joined in testifying enthusiastic admiration and gratitude. But in addition to the open and instant peril from which the consul had preserved the commonwealth, he had made a grand stroke of policy, which, had it been firmly and honestly followed out by those most deeply interested, might have opened the way for a firm, far-reaching, and final settlement. The equites or mened men had for half a century been rapidly rising in importance as a distinct order, and now held the balance between the optimates or aristocratic faction, the members of which, although exclusive, selfish, and corrupt, were for their own sakes steadfast supporters of the laws and ancient institutions, and felt no inclination for a second Sulla, even had he been one of themselves; and the populares or democratic faction, which had degenerated into a venal rabble, ever ready to follow any revolutionary scheme promoted by those who could stimulate their passions or buy their votes. Although in such a state of affairs the equites were the natural allies of the senate, from being deeply interested in the preservation of order and tranquillity, yet unfortunately the long-protracted struggle for the right of acting as judges in criminal trials had given rise to the most bitter animosity. But when all alike were threatened with immediate destruction this hostility was forgotten; Cicero persuaded the knights, who always placed confidence in him as one of themselves, to act heartily with the senate, and the senate were only too glad to obtain their co-operation in such an emergency. Could this fair fellowship have been maintained, it must have produced the happiest consequences; but the kindly feelings passed away with the crisis which called them forth; a dispute soon after arose with the farmers of the Asiatic revenues, who desired to be relieved from a disadvantageous contract; neither side showed any spirit of fair mutual concession; the whole body of the equites making common cause with their brethren became violent and unreasonable; the senate remained obstinate, the frail bond was rudely snapped asunder, and Caesar, who had viewed this alliance with no small dissatisfaction, contrived to paralyse the hands of the only individual by whom the league could have been renewed.

Meanwhile, Cicero could boast of having accomplished an exploit for which no precedent could be found in the history of Rome. Of ignoble birth, of small fortune, without family or connexions, without military renown, by the force of his intellectual powers alone, he had struggled upwards, had been chosen to fill in succession all the high offices of the state, as soon as the laws permitted him to become a candidate, without once sustaining a repulse; in the garb of peace he had gained a victory of which the greatest among his predecessors would have been proud, and had received tributes of applause of which few triumphant generals could boast. His fortune, after mounting steadily though swiftly, had now reached its culminating point of prosperity and glory; for a brief space it remained stationary, and then rapidly declined and sunk. The honours so lavishy heaped upon him, instead of invigorating and elevating, weakened and debased his mind, and the most splendid achievement of his life contained the germ of his humiliation and downfall. The punishment inflicted by order of the senate upon Lentulus, Cethegus, and their associates, although perhaps morally justified by the emergency, was a palpable violation of the fundamental principles of the Roman constitution, which solemnly declared, that no citizen could be put to death until sentenced by the whole body of the people assembled in their comitia; and for this act Cicero, as the presiding magistrate, was held responsible. Those who had no cause to complain had been armed with dictatorial authority; for, although even a dictator was always liable to be called to account, there was in the present instance no semblance of an exertion of such power, but the senate, formally assuming to themselves judicial functions which they had no right to exercise, formally gave orders for the execution of a sentence which they had no right to pronounce. The argument, pressed again and again by Cicero, that the conspirators by their guilt had forfeited all their privileges, while it is virtually an admission of the principle stated above, is in itself a mere fantastic sophism, since it takes for granted the guilt of the victims—the very fact which no tribunal except the comitia or commissioners nominated by the comitia could decide. Nor were his enemies, and those who secretly favoured the traitors, long in discovering and assailing this vulnerable point. On the last day of the year, when, according to established custom, he ascended the rostra to give an account to the people of the events of his consulship, Metellus Celer, one of the new tribunes, forbade him to speak, exclaiming, that the man who had put Roman citizens to death without granting them a hearing was himself unworthy of being heard. But this attack was premature. The tribunal had already forgotten their commission and their recent escape; so that when Cicero, instead of simply taking the common oath to which he was restricted by the interposition of the tribune, swore with a loud voice that he had saved the republic and the city from ruin, the crowd with one voice responded, that he had sworn truly, and escorted him in a body to his house with every demonstration of respect and affection. Having again refused to accept the government of a province, an employment for which he felt no venation, Cicero returned to the senate as a private individual (n. c. 62), and engaged in several angry contests with the obnoxious tribune. But after the excitement occasioned by these disputes, and by the destruction of Catiline with his army which followed soon after, had subsided, the eyes of men were turned away for a while in another direction, all looking forward eagerly to the arrival of Pompey, who at length reached Rome in the autumn, loaded with the trophies of his Asiatic campaigns.
But, although every one was engrossed with the hero and his conquests, to the exclusion of almost every other object, we must not pass over an event which occurred towards the end of the year; for which, although at first sight of small importance, not only gave rise to the greatest scandal in the city, but was indirectly the source of misfortune and bitter suffered to Cicero. While the wife of Caesar was celebrating in the house of her husband, then praetor and pontifex maximus, the rites of the Bona Dea, from which male creatures were excluded with the most scrupulous superstition, it was discovered that P. Claudius Pulcher, son of Appius (consul n. c. 79), had found his way into the mansion disguised in woman's apparel, and,
having been detected, had made his escape by the help of a female slave. Instantly all Rome was in an uproar. The matter was laid before the senate, and by them referred to the members of the pontiical college, who passed a resolution that seneciolega had been committed. Caesar forthwith divorced his wife. Claudius, although the most powerful interest was exerted by his numerous relations and connections to hush up the affair, and attempts were even made to stop the proceedings by violence, was impeached and brought to trial. In defence he pleaded an alibi, offering to prove that he was at Interamna at the very time when the crime was said to have been committed; but Cicero came forward as a witness, and swore that he had met and spoken to Clodius in Rome on the day in question. In spite of this decisive testimony, and the evident guilt of the accused, the judicious, with that corruption which formed one of the most fatal symptoms of the rottenness of the whole social fabric, pronounced him innocent by a majority of voices. (n. c. 61.) Clodius, whose popular talents and utter recklessness rendered him no insignificant enemy, now vowed deadly vengeance against Cicero, whose destruction from henceforward was the chief aim of his life. To accomplish this purpose more readily, he determined to become a candidate for the tribuneship; but to effect this it was necessary in the first place that he should be adopted into a plebeian family by means of a special law.
This, after protracted opposition, was at length accomplished (n. c. 60), although irregularly, through the interference of Caesar and Pompey, and he was elected tribune in the course of n. c. 59.
While this underplot was working, the path of Cicero had been far more thorny than heretofore.
Intoxicated by his rapid elevation, and dazzled by the brilliant termination of his consulship, his self-concit had become overweening, his vanity uncontrollable and insatiable. He imagined that the authority which he had acquired during the late perilous conjuncture would be permanently maintained after the danger was past, and that he would be invited to grasp the helm and steer single-handed the vessel of the state. But he slowly and painfully discovered that, although addressed with courtesy, and listened to with respect, he was in reality powerless when seeking to resist the encroachments of such men as Pompey, Crassus, and Caesar; and hence he viewed with the utmost alarm the disposition now manifested by these three chiefs to bury their former jealousies, and to make common cause against the aristocratic leaders, who, suspicious of their ulcerous projects, were using every art to baffie and outmanouevre them. Hence Cicero also, at this epoch perceiving how fatal such a coalition must prove to the cause of freedom, carefully laboured to detach Pompey, with whom he kept up a close but somewhat cold intimacy, from the friends of Caesar, and to throw him in with the rest. But his misplaced caution, his indulgence and want of sound principle by which his political life was from this time forward disgraced, began to testify a strong inclination to join the triumvirate, and in a letter to Atticus (i. 5, n. c. 59, actually names the price at which they could purchase his adherence—the seat in the college of augurs just vacant by the death of Metellus Celer.
Finding himself unable to conclude any satisfactory arrangement, like a spoiled child, he expresses his disgust with public life, and longs for an opportunity to retire from the world, and devote himself to study and philosophic contemplation. But while in the letters written during the stormy consulship of Caesar (n. c. 59) he takes a most desponding view of the state of the commonwealth, and seems to consider slavery as inevitable, he does not appear to have foreseen the storm impending over himself individually; and when at length, after the election of Clodius to the tribuneship, he began to entertain serious alarm, he was quieted by positive assurances of friendship and support from Pompey conveyed in the strongest terms. One of the first acts of his enemy, after entering upon office, notwithstanding the solemn pledge he was said to have given to Pompey that he would not use his power to the injury of Cicero, was to propose a bill interdicting from fire and water any one who should be found to have put a Roman citizen to death untrial. Here Cicero committed a fatal mistake. Instead of assuming the front of conscious innocence, he at once took guilt to himselj, and, without awaiting the progress of events, changed his attitude, and assuming the garb of one accused, went round the forum, soliciting the compassion of all whom he met. For a brief period public sympathy was awakened. A large number of the senate and the equites appeared also in mourning, and the better portion of the citizens seemed resolved to espouse his cause. But all demonstrations of such feelings were promptly repressed by the new consuls, Piso and Gabinius, who from the first displayed steady hostility, having been bought by the promises of Clodius, who undertook to procure for them what provinces they pleased. The mob was infuriated by the incasant harangues of their tribune; nothing was to be hoped from Crassus; the good offices of Caesar had been already rejected; and Pompey, the last and only safeguard, contrary to all expectations,
and in violation of the most solemn engagements,
kept aloof, and from real or pretended fear of some outbreak refused to interpose. Upon this, Cicero, giving way to despair, resolved to yield to the storm, and quitting Rome at the beginning of April, (n. c. 50), reached Brundisium about the middle of the month. From hence he crossed over to CICERO.

Greece, and taking up his residence at Thessalonica, where he was hospitably received by Pianecius, quaestor of Macedonia, remained at that place until the end of November, when he removed to Dyrrachium. His correspondence during the whole of this period presents the melancholy picture of a mind crushed and paralyzed by a sudden reverse of fortune. Never did divine philosophy fail more signally in procuring comfort or consolation to her votary. The letters addressed to Terentius, to Attilius, and others, are filled with unmanly wailing, groans, sobs, and tears. He evinces all the distress, but wants the physical courage necessary to become a suicide. Even when brighter prospects begin to dawn, when his friends were straining every nerve in his behalf, we find them receiving no judicious counsel from the object of their solicitude, nought save renewed complaints, capricious and querulous repinings. For a time indeed his prospects were sufficiently gloomy. Clodius felt no compunction for his fallen foe. The instant that the departure of Cicero became known, a law was presented to and accepted by the tribune, formally pronouncing the banishment of the fugitive, forbidding any one to entertain or harbour him, and denouncing as a public enemy whoever should take any steps towards procuring his recall. His magnificent mansion on the Palatine, and his elaborately decorated villas at Tusculum and Formiae were at the same time given over to plunder and destruction. But the extravagant and outrageous violence of these measures tended quickly to produce a strong reaction. As early as the beginning of June, in defiance of the laws of Clodius, a movement was made in the senate for the restoration of the exile; and, although this and other subsequent efforts in the same year were frustrated by the unfriendly tribunes, still the party of the good waxed daily stronger, and the general feeling became more decided. The new consuls (c. c. 57) and the whole of the new college of tribunes, led on by Milo, took up the cause; but great delay was occasioned by formidable riots attended with fearful loss of life, until at length the senate, with the full approbation of Pompey, who, to give greater weight to his words, read a speech which he had prepared and written out for the occasion, determined to invite the voters from the different parts of Italy to repair to Rome and assist in carrying a law for the recall of him who had saved his country from ruin, passing at the same time the strongest resolutions against those who should venture under any pretense to interrupt or embarrass the holding of the assembly. Accordingly, on the 4th of August, the bill was submitted to the comitia centuriata, and carried by an overwhelming vote.

On the same day Cicero quitted Dyrrachium, and crossed over to Brundisium, where he was met by his wife and daughter. Travelling slowly, he received deputations and congratulatory addresses from all the towns on the line of the Appian way, and having arrived at the city on the 4th of September, a vast multitude poured forth to meet and escort him, forming a sort of triumphal procession as he entered the gates, while the crowd collected in groups on the steps of the temples rent the air with acclamations when he passed through the forum and ascended the capitol, there to render homage and thanks to Jupiter Maximus.

Nothing at first sight can appear more strange and inexplicable than the abrupt downfall of Cicero; when suddenly hurled from a commanding eminence he found himself a helpless and almost friendless outcast; and again, on the other hand, the boundless enthusiasm with which he was greeted on his return by the selfsame populace who had exulted so furiously in his disgrace. A little consideration will enable us, however, to fathom the mystery. From the moment that Cicero laid down his consulship he began to lose ground with all parties. The senate were disgusted by the arrogant assumption of superiority in an upstart stranger; the equites were displeased because he would not cordially assent to their most unreasonable and unjust demands; the people, whom he had never attempted to flatter or cajole, were by degrees lashed into fury against one who was unceasingly held up before their eyes as the violator of their most sacred privileges. Moreover, the triumvirs, who were the active though secret movers in the whole affair, considered it essential to their designs that he should be humbled and taught the risk and folly of playing an independent part, of seeking to mediate between the conflicting factions, and thus in his own person regulating and controlling all. They therefore gladly availed themselves of the energetic malady of Clodius, each desiring with their common victim in a manner highly characteristic of the individual. Caesar, who at all times, even under the greatest provocation, entertained a warm regard and even respect for Cicero, with his natural goodness of heart endeavoured to withdraw him from the scene of danger, and at the same time to lay him under personal obligations; with this intent he pressed him to become one of his legates; this being declined, he then urged him to accept the post of commissioner for dividing the public lands in Campania; and it was not until he found all his proposals steadfastly rejected that he consented to leave him to his fate. Crassus gave him up at once, without compunction or regret: they had never been cordial friends, had repeatedly quarrelled openly, and their reconciliations had been utterly hollow. The conduct of Pompey, as might have been expected, was a tissue of selfish, cautious, calculating, cold-blooded dissimulation; in spite of the affection and unwavering confidence ever exhibited towards him by Cicero, in spite of the most unequivocal assurances both in public and private of protection and assistance, he quietly deserted him, without a pang, in the moment of greatest need, because it suited his own plans and his own convenience. But soon after the departure of Cicero matters assumed a very different aspect; his value began once more to be felt and his absence to be deplored. The senate could ill afford to lose the ablest champion of the aristocracy, who possessed the greater weight from not properly belonging to the order; the knights were touched with remorse on account of their ingratitude towards one whom they identified with themselves, who had often served them well, and might again be often useful; the populace, when the first fervour of angry passion had passed away, began to long for that oratory to which they had been wont to listen with such delight, and to remember the debt they owed to him who had saved their temples, dwellings, and property from destruction; while the triumvirs, trusting that the high tone of their adversary would be brought low by this severe lesson, and that he would henceforth be passive, if not a servile tool, were eager to check and overawe Clodius, who was now no longer disposed to be a mere instrument in their hands, but, breaking loose from all restraint, had already given symptoms of open rebellion. Their original purpose was fully accomplished. Although the return of Cicero was glorious, so glorious that he and others may for a moment have dreamed that he was once more all that he had ever been, yet he himself and those around him soon became sensible that his position was entirely changed, that his spirit was broken, and his self-respect destroyed. After a few feeble ineffectual struggles, he was forced quietly to yield to a power which he no longer dared to resist, and was unable to modify or guide. Nor were his masters content with simple acquiescence in their transactions; they demanded positive demonstrations on their behalf. To this degradation he was weak enough to submit, consenting to praise in his writings those proceedings which he had once openly and loudly condemned (ad Att. iv. 5), uttering sentiments in public totally inconsistent with his principles (ad Att. iv. 6), professing friendship for those whom he hated and despised (ad Fam. i. 9), and defending in the senate and at the bar men who had not only distinguished themselves as his bitter foes, but on whom he had previously lavished every term of abuse which an imagination fertile in invective could suggest. (Ad Fam. vii. 1, v. 8.)

Such was the course of his life for five years (b. c. 57-52), a period during the whole of which he kept up warm social intercourse with the members of the triumvirate, especially Pompey, who remained constantly at Rome, and received all outworn compliments and declamations. The duration of his time was occupied by the business of pleasing; but being latterly in a great measure released from all concern or anxiety regarding public affairs, he lived much in the country, and found leisure to compose his two great political works, the De Republica and the De Legibus.

After the death of Crassus (b. c. 55) he was admitted a member of the college of augurs, and towards the end of b. c. 52, at the very moment when his presence might have been of importance in preventing an open rupture between Pompey and Caesar, he was withdrawn altogether from Italy, and a new field opened up for the exercise of his talents, an office having been thrust upon him which he had hitherto earnestly avoided. In order to put a stop in some degree to the bribery, intrigues, and corruption of every description, for which the Roman magistrates had become so notorious in their anxiety to procure some wealthy government, a law was enacted during the third consulship of Pompey (b. c. 52) ordaining, that no consul or praetor should be permitted to hold a province until five years should have elapsed from the expiration of his office, and that in the meantime governors should be selected by lot from those persons of consular and praetorian rank who had never held any foreign command. To this number Cicero was added by lot, to which he returned, and fortune assigned to him Cicilia, to which were annexed Pisidia, Pamphylia, some districts of Cappadocia to the north of mount Taurus, and the island of Cyprus. His feelings and conduct on this occasion present a most striking contrast to those exhibited by his countrymen under like circumstances. Never was an honourable and lucrative appointment bestowed on one less willing to accept it. His appetite for praise seems to have become more craving just in proportion as his real merits had become less and the dignity of his position lowered; but Rome was the only theatre on which he desired to perform a part. From the moment that he quit the metropolis, his letters are filled with expressions of regret over what he had left behind, and of disgust with the occupations in which he was engaged; every friend and acquaintance is solicited and importuned in turn to use every exertion to prevent the period of his absence from being extended beyond the regular and ordinary space of a single year. It must be confessed that, in addition to the vexatious interruption of all his pursuits and pleasures, the condition of the East was by no means encouraging to a man of peace. The Parthians, emboldened by their signal triumph over Crassus, had invaded Syria; their cavalry was scouring the country up to the very walls of Antioch, and it was generally believed that they intended to force the pass of mount Amanus, and to burst into Asia through Cilicia, which was defended by two weak legions only, a force utterly inadequate to meet the emergency. Happily, the apprehensions thus excited were not realized: the Parthians received a check from Cassius which compelled them in the mean time to retire beyond the Euphrates, and Cicero was left at liberty to make the circuit of his province, and to follow out that system of impartiality, moderation, and self-control which he was resolved should regulate not only his own conduct but that of every member of his retinue. And nobly did he redeem the pledge which he had voluntarily given to his friends. At once his head-straightened into practice the precepts which he had so well laid down in former years for the guidance of his brother. Nothing could be more pure and upright than his administration in every department; and his staff, who at first murmured loudly at a style of procedure which most grievously curtailed their emoluments, were at length shamed into silence. The astonished Greeks, finding themselves listened to with kindness, and justice dispensed with an even hand, breathed nothing but love and gratitude, while the confidence thus inspired enabled Cicero to keep the publicans in good-humour by settling to their satisfaction many complicated disputes, and reducing many grievances which had sprung out of the wretched and oppressive arrangements for the collection of the revenue. Not content with the fame thus acquired in cultivating the arts of peace, Cicero began to thirst after military renown, and, turning to account the preparations made against the Parthians, undertook an expedition against the lawless robber tribes who, dwelling among the mountain fastnesses of the Syrian frontier, were wont to descend whenever an opportunity offered and plunder the surrounding districts. The operations, which were carried on chiefly by his brother Quintus, who was an experienced soldier and one of his legates, were attended with considerable success; but when the work of surprise, could neither escape nor offer any effectual resistance; various clans were forced to submit; many villages of the more obstinate were destroyed; Pindemissus, a strong hill fort of the Eleutherocociles, was stormed on the Saturnalia (b. c. 51), after a protracted siege; many prisoners and much plunder were secured; the general was saluted as imperator by his troops; a despatch was transmitted to the senate, in which these achievements were detailed with great pomp; every engine was set to work to procure a flattering decree and supplications in honour of the victory; and Cicero had now the weakness to set his whole heart upon a triumph—a vision which he long cherished with a degree of childish obstinacy which must have exposed him to the mingled pity and derision of all who were spectators of his folly. The following spring (B.c. 50) he again made a progress through the different provinces of his province, and as soon as the year of his command was concluded, having received no orders to the contrary, delegated his authority to his quaestor, C. Caecilius, and quitted Laodicea on the 30th of July (B.c. 50), having arrived in that city on the 31st of the same month in the preceding year. Returning homewards by Ephesus and Athens, he reached Brundisium in the last week of November, and arrived in the neighbourhood of Rome on the 4th of January (B.c. 49), at the very moment when the civil strife, which had been smouldering so long, burst forth into a blaze of war, but did not enter the city because he cherished sanguine hopes of being allowed a triumph.

From the middle of December (B.c. 50) to the end of June (B.c. 49) he wrote almost daily to Atticus. The letters which form this series exhibit a most painful and humiliating spectacle of doubt, vacillation, and timidity, together with the utter absence of all singleness of purpose, and an utter want of firmness, either moral or physical. At first, although from habit, prejudice, and conviction disposed to follow Pompey, he seriously debated whether he would not be unjust in submitting quietly to Caesar, but soon afterwards accepted from the former the post of inspector of the Campanian coast, and the task of preparing for its defence, duties which he soon abandoned in disgrace. Having quitted the vicinity of Rome on the 17th of January, he spent the greater portion of the two following months at Formiae in a state of miserable restlessness and hesitation; murmuring at the inactivity of the consuls; railing at the policy of Pompey, which he pronounced to be a tissue of blunders; oscillating first to one side and then to the other, according to the passing rumours of the hour; and keeping up an active correspondence all the while with the leaders of both parties, to an extent which caused the circulation of reports little favourable to his honour. Nor were the suspicions thus excited altogether without foundation, for it is perfectly evident that he more than once was on the point of becoming a deserter, and in one epistle (ad Att. viii. 1) he explicitly confesses, that he had embarked in the aristocratical cause sorely against his will, and that he would at once join the crowd who were flocking back to Rome, were it not for the incumbrance of his lictors, thus clinging to the last with pitiable tenacity to the faint and fading prospect of a military pageant, which must in his case have been a mockery. His distress was if possible augmented when Pompey, accompanied by a large number of senators, abandoned Italy; for now arose the question fraught with perplexity, whether he could or ought to stay behind, or was bound to join his friends; and this is debated over and over again in a thousand different shapes, his intellect being all the while obscured by irresolution and fear. These tortures were raised to a climax by a personal interview with Caesar, who urged him to return to Rome and act as a mediator, a proposal to which Cicero, who appears, if we can trust his own account, to have comport himself for the moment with considerable boldness and dignity, refused to accede, unless he were permitted to use his own discretion and enjoy full freedom of speech—a stipulation which at once put an end to the conference. At last, after many lingering delays and often renewed procrastination, influenced not so much by any overpowering sense of necessity or consistency as by his sensitiveness to public opinion, to the "sermo hominum" whose censure he dreaded far more than the reproaches of his own conscience, and impressed also with a strong belief that Caesar must be overwhelmed by the enemies who were closing around him, he finally decided to pass over to Greece, and embarked at Brundisium on the 7th of June (B.c. 49). For the space of nearly a year we know little of his movements; one or two notes only have been preserved, which, combined with an anecdote given by Macrobius (Sat. ii. 5), prove that, during his residence in the camp of Pompey he was in bad health, low spirits, embittered by petty difficulties, in the habit of inveighing against everything he heard and saw around him, and of giving way to the deepest despondency. After the battle of Pharsalia (August 9, B.c. 48), at which he was not present, Cato, who had a fleet and a strong body of troops at Dyrrachium, offered them to Cicero as the person best entitled by his rank to assume the command; and upon his refusing to have any further concern with warlike operations, young Pompey and some others of the nobility drew their swords, and, demeaning him as a traitor, were with difficulty restrained from slaying him on the spot. It is impossible to tell whether this narrative, which rests upon the authority of Plutarch, is altogether correct; but it is certain that Cicero regarded the victory of Caesar as absolutely conclusive, and felt persuaded that farther resistance was hopeless. While, therefore, some of his companions in arms retired to Achæia, there to watch the progress of events, and others passed over to Africa and Spain determined to renew the struggle, Cicero chose rather to throw himself at once upon the mercy of the conqueror, and, retracing his steps, landed at Brundisium about the end of November. Here he narrowly escaped being put to death by the legions which arrived from Pharsalia under the orders of M. Antonius, who, although disposed to treat the fugitive with kindness, was with the greatest difficulty prevailed upon to allow him to continue in Italy, having received positive instructions to exclude all the retainers of Pompey except such as had received special permission to return. At Brundisium Cicero remained for ten months until the pleasure of the conqueror could be known, who was busily engaged with the wars which sprung up in Egypt, Pontus, and Africa. During the whole of this time his mind was in a most agitated and unhappy condition. He was constantly tormented with unavailing remorse on account of the folly of his past conduct in having identified himself with the Pompeians when he might have remained unmolested at home; he filled with apprehensions as to the manner in which he might be treated by Caesar, whom he had so often offended and so lately deceived; he moreover was visited by secret shame and compunction for having at once given up his associates upon the first turn of fortune; above all, he was haunted by the forboding that they might after all prove victorious, in which event his fate would have been desperate; and the cup of bitterness was filled by the unnatural treachery of his brother and nephew, who were seeking to recommend themselves to those in power by casting the foulest calumnies and vilest aspersions upon their relative, whom they represented as having seduced them from their duty. This load of misery was, however, lightened by a letter received on the 12th of August (b. c. 47) from Caesar, in which he promised to forget the past, and be the same as he had ever been—a promise which he amply redeemed, for on his arrival in Italy in September, he greeted Cicero with frank cordiality, and treated him ever after with the utmost respect and kindness.

Cicero was now at liberty to follow his own pursuits without interruption, and, accordingly, until the death of Caesar, devoted himself with exclusive assiduity to literary labours, finding consolation in study, but not contentment, for public display and popular applause had long been almost necessary to his existence; and now that the senate, the forum, and the courts of law were silent, or, at all events, no longer presented an arena for free and open discussion, the calm delights of speculative research, for which he was wont to sigh amid the din and hurry of incessant business, seemed monotonous and dull. Posteriorly, however, had good cause to rejoice that he was driven to seek this relief from distasteful recollections; for, during the years b. c. 48, 47, and 44, nearly the whole of his most important works on rhetoric and philosophy, with the exception of the two political treatises named above, were arranged and published. In addition to the pain produced by wounded vanity, mixed with more honourable sorrow arising from the degradation of his country, he was harassed by a succession of domestic annoyances and griefs. Towards the close of b. c. 46, in consequence, it would appear, of some disputes connected with pecuniary transactions, he divorced his wife Terentia, to whom he had been united for upwards of thirty years, and soon after married a young and wealthy maiden, Publilia, his ward; but, as might have been anticipated, found little comfort in this new alliance, which he afterwards dissolved. But his greatest and over-powering affliction was the death of his beloved daughter, Tullia (early in b. c. 45), towards whom he cherished the fondest attachment. Now, as formerly, philosophy afforded no support in the hour of trial; grief for a time seems to have been so violent as almost to affect his intellects, and it was long before he recovered sufficient tranquillity to derive any enjoyment from society or engage with zest in his ordinary occupations. He withdrew to the small wooded island of Asturna, on the coast near Antium, where, hiding himself in the thickest groves, he could give way to melancholy thoughts without restraint; gradually he was far recovered as to be able to resume his Consolation, in imitation of a piece by Crantor on the same topic, and found relief in devising a variety of plans for a monument in honour of the deceased.

The tumults excited by Antony after the murder of Caesar (b. c. 44) having compelled the leading conspirators to disperse in different directions, Cicero, feeling that his own position was not free from danger, set out upon a journey to Greece with the intention of being absent until the new consuls should have entered upon office, from whose vigour and patriotism he anticipated a happy change. While in the neighbourhood of Rhegium (August 2, b. c. 44), whither he had been driven from the Sicilian coast by a contrary wind, he was persuaded to return in consequence of intelligence that matters were likely to be arranged amicably between Antony and the senate. How bitterly this anticipation was disappointed is sufficiently proved by the tone and contents of the first two Philippics; but the jealousy which had sprung up in Antony towards Octavius soon induced the former to quit the city, while the latter, commencing that career of dissimulation which he maintained throughout a long and most prosperous life, affected the warmest attachment to the senate, and especially to the person of their leader, who was completely duped by these professions. From the beginning of the year b. c. 45 until the end of April, Cicero was in the height of his glory; within this space the last twelve Philippics were all delivered and listened to with rapturous applause; his activity was unceasing, at one moment encouraging the senate, at another stimulating the people, he hurried from place to place the admired of all, the very hero of the scene; and when at length he announced the result of the battles under the walls of Mutina, he was escorted by crowds to the Capitol, thence to the Rostra, and thence to his own house, with enthusiasm not less eager than was displayed when he had detected and crushed the associates of Catiline. But when the fatal news arrived of the union of Lepidus with Antony (29th May), quickly followed by the defection of Octavius, and when the latter, marching upon Rome at the head of an armed force, compelled the comitia to elect him consul at the age of 10, it was but too evident that all was lost. The league between the three usurpers was finally concluded on the 27th of November, and the lists of the proscribed finally arranged, among whom Cicero and sixteen others were marked for immediate destruction, and agents forthwith despatched to perpetrate the murders before the victims should take alarm. Although much care had been taken to conceal these proceedings, Cicero was warned of his danger while on his travels. He at once hastened to the coast with the purpose of escaping by sea, and actually embarked at Antium, but was driven by stress of weather to Circei, from whence he coasted along to Formiae, where he landed at his villa, diseased in body and sick at heart, resolving no longer to fly from his fate. The soldiers sent in quest of him were now known to be close at hand, upon which his attendants forced him to enter a litter, and hurried him through the woods towards the shore, distant about a mile from the house. As they were pressing onwards, they were overtaken by their pursuers, and were preparing to defend their master with their lives, but Cicero commanded them to desist, and stretching forward called upon his executioners to strike. They instantly cut off his head and hands, which were conveyed to Rome, and, by the orders of Antony, mailed to the Rostra.

A glance at the various events which form the subject of the above narrative will sufficiently demonstrate, that Cicero was totally destitute of the qualifications which alone could have fitted him to sustain the character of a great independent statesman amidst those scenes of turbulence and revolution.

So long as he was contented in his struggle upwards to play a subordinate part, his progress was marked by extraordinary, well-merited, and most honourable success. But when he attempted to secure the highest place, he was rudely thrust down by bold, more adventurous, and more commanding spirits; when he sought to act as a mediator, he became the tool of each of the rivals in turn; and when, after much and protracted hesitation, he had finally espoused the interests of one, he threw an air of gloom and distrust over the cause by timid despondency and too evident repentance. His want of firmness in the hour of trial amounted to cowardice; his numerous and glaring inconsistencies destroyed all confidence in his discretion and judgment; his irresolution not unfrequently assumed the aspect of awkward duplicity, and his restless craving vanity exposed him constantly to the stains of insidious flattery, while it covered him with ridicule and contempt. Even his boasted patriotism was of a very doubtful, we might say, dishonorable character. He stamp, for his love of construction, so mixed up with petty feelings of personal importance, and his hatred of tyranny so inseparably connected with his mind with his own loss of power and consideration, that we can hardly persuade ourselves that the former was the disinterested impulse of a noble heart so much as the prompting of selfishness and vain glory, or that the latter proceeded from a generous devotion to the rights and liberties of his fellow-citizens so much as from the bitter consciousness of being individually depressed and overshadowed by the superior weight and eminence of another. It is vain to undertake the defense of his conduct by ingenious and elaborate reasonings. The whole case is placed clearly before our eyes, and all the common sources of falacy and unjust judgment in regard to public men are removed. We are not called upon to weigh and scrutinize the evidence of partial or hostile witnesses, whose testimony may be coloured or perverted by the keenness of party spirit. Cicero is his own accuser, and is convicted by his own depositions. The strange confessions contained in his correspondence call for a sentence more severe than we have ventured to pronounce, presenting a most marvellous, memorable, and instructive spectacle of the great intellectual strength linked indissolubly to the greatest moral weakness.

Upon his social and domestic relations we can dwell with unmixed pleasure. In the midst of almost universal probability he remained unremitted; surrounded by corruption, not even malice ever ventured to impeach his integrity. To his dependents he was indulgent and warm-hearted, to his friends affectionate and true, ever ready to assist them in the hour of need with counsel, influence, or purse; somewhat touchy, perhaps, and loud in expressing resentment when offended, but easily appeased, and free from all mcnor. In his intercourse with his contemporaries he rose completely above that paltry jealousy by which literary men are so often disgraced, sally and freely acknowledging the merits of his most formidable rivals, Lucilius and Catullus, for the former of whom he cherished the warmest regard. Towards the members of his own family he uniformly displayed the deepest attachment. Nothing could be more amiable than the readiness with which he extended his forgiveness to his unworthy nephew and to his brother Quintus, after they had been guilty of the basest and most unnatural treachery and ingratitude; his devotion through life to his daughter Tullia, and his despair upon her death, have already called forth some remarks, and when his son, as he advanced in years, did not fulfill the hopes and expectations of his father, he was notwithstanding treated with the utmost forbearance and liberality. One passage only in the private life of Cicero is obscured by a shade of doubt. The simple fact, that when he became embarrassed by pecuniary difficulties he divorced the mother of his children, to whom he had been united for upwards of thirty years, and soon after married a rich heiress, his own ward, appears at first sight suspicious, if not positively discreditable, but it must be remembered that we are altogether ignorant of the circumstances connected with this transaction. From a series of obscure hints contained in letters to Atticus, we infer that Tertullia had been extravagant during the absence of her husband in the province of Pompeii, and that she had made some arrangements with regard to her will which he looked upon as unfair and almost dishonest; in addition to which, we know from other sources that she was a woman of imperious and unyielding temper. On the other hand, the connexion with Publilia could not have been contemplated at the period of the divorce, for we find that his friends were busily employed for some time in looking out for a suitable match, and that, among others, a daughter of Pompey was suggested. Moreover, if the new alliance had been dictated by motives of a purely mercenary nature, more anxiety would have been manifested to retain the advantages which it procured, while on the contrary we find that it was dissolved very quickly in consequence of the bride having innocently testified satisfaction at the death of Tullia, of whose influence she may have been jealous, and that Cicero steadily refused to listen to any overtures, although a reconciliation was earnestly desired on the part of the lady.

Our great authority for the life of Cicero is his own writings, and especially his letters and orations. The most important passages will be found collected in Meierotto, "Ciceronis Vita ex ipsius scriptis excerpta," Berolin. 1783, and in the "Onomasticon Tulli," which forms an appendix to Orelli's Cicero, Zurich, 1826—1830. Much that is curious and valuable may be collected from the biographies of the orator and his contemporaries by Plutarch, whose statements, however, must always be received with caution. Something may be gleaned from Velleius Paterculus also, and from the books of Appian and of Dion Cassius which belong to this period. These and other ancient testimonies have been diligently arranged in chronological order in the "Historia M. Tullii Ciceronis," by F. Fabricius. Of modern works that of Middleton has attained great celebrity, although it must be regarded as a blind and extravagant panegyric; some good strictures on his occasional inacutenesses and constant partiality will be found in Tuntall's "Elogia ad Middletem," Cantab. 1741, and in Collins's "Cludius," London, 1747; but by far the most complete and critical examination of all points relating to Cicero and his times, down to the end of a. c. 56, is contained in the fifth volume of Drummann's "Gesch.
CICERO.

The works of Cicero are so numerous and diversified, that it is necessary for the sake of distinctness to separate them into classes, and accordingly they may be conveniently arranged under five heads:—1. Philosophical works. 2. Speeches. 3. Correspondence. 4. Poems. 5. Historical and Miscellaneous works. The last may appear too vague and comprehensive, but nothing of importance belonging to this section has been preserved.

I. PHILOSOPHICAL WORKS.

Several of the topics handled in this department are so intimately connected and shade into each other by such fine and almost imperceptible gradations, that the boundaries by which they are separated cannot in all cases be sharply defined, and consequently some of the subdivisions may appear arbitrary or inaccurate; for practical purposes, however, the following distribution will be found sufficiently precise:

In the table given below, those works to which an asterisk is prefixed have descended to us in a very imperfect and mutilated condition, enough, however, still remaining to convey a clear conception of the general plan, tone, and spirit; of those to which a double asterisk is prefixed, only a few fragments, or even a few words, survive; those printed in Italics are totally lost; those included within brackets are believed to be spurious:

The Edito Princeps of the collected philosophical works of Cicero was printed at Rome in 1471, by Sweynheym and Pannartz, 2 vols. folio, and is a work of excessive rarity. The first volume contains De Natura Deorum, De Divinatione, De Officiis, Paradoxa, Laelius, Cato Major, Versus duodecim Sapiuntium; the second volume, Questions Tusculanae, De Finibus, De Fato, Q. Cicero de Petitione Consilii, Fragmenta of the Hortensius, Timaeus, Academicae Questions, De Legibus.

We have belonging to the same period, De Officiis, De Amicitia, De Senectute, Semnsm Scipionis, Paradoxa, Tusculanae Questions, in 2 vols. folio, without place or date, but known to have been published at Paris about 1471, by Gering, Crantz, and Friburger.

Also, the De Natura Deorum, De Divinatione, De Fato, De Legibus, Hortensius, (Moderustes), De Disciplina Militari, appeared in 1 vol. 4to, 1471, at Venice, from the press of Vindelini de Spira.

An excellent edition, intended to embrace the whole philosophical works of Cicero, was commenced by J. A. Goerens, and carried to the extent of three volumes, 6vo., which contain the De Legibus, Academicae, De Finibus, Leips. 1803—1813.

Before entering upon an examination of Cicero's philosophic writings in detail, we must consider briefly the inducements which first prompted Cicero to devote his attention to the study of philosophy, the extent to which his original views were subsequently altered and enlarged, the circumstances under which his various treatises were composed, the end which they were intended to accomplish, the degree of importance to be attached to these works, the form in which they are presented to the reader, and the opinions really entertained by the author himself.

Cicero dedicated his attention to philosophy in the first instance not merely as a branch of general education, but as that particular branch which was likely to prove peculiarly serviceable to him in attaining the great object of his youthful aspirations—outstanding public service. He must have discerned, from a very early period that the subtle and astute, though often sophistical, arguments advanced by rival sects in supporting their own tenets and assailing the positions of their adversaries, and the habitual quickness of objection and readiness of reply which distinguished the oral controversies of the more skilful disputants could be turned to admirable account in the wordy combats of the courts; and hence the method pursued by the later Academy of proving the weak points and detecting the fallacies of all systems in succesions, possessed the strongest attractions for one who to insure success must be able to regard each cause submitted to his judgment under many different aspects, and be prepared to anticipate and repel exceptions, of whatever nature, proceeding from whatever quarter. We have already seen, in the biographical portion of this article, that Cicero allowed no opportunity to escape of gaining an intimate acquaintance with the doctrines of the most popular sects, without resigning himself exclusively to one; and he was fully sensible that he owed much of the signal success which attended his efforts, after his return from Greece, to this...

training in philosophy, which he emphatically de-nominates "the fountain-head of all perfect eloquence, the mother of all good deeds and good words." (Brut. 93.) During his residence at Athens and at Rhodes he appears to have imbibed
a deep and earnest attachment for the pursuit which he henceforward viewed as something better and nobler than a mere instrument for acquiring dialectic skill. Accordingly, every moment that could be snatched from his multifarious avocations was employed with exemplary zeal in accumulating stores of philosophic love, which were carefully treasured up in his memory. But the incessant demands of business long prevented him from arranging and displaying the wealth thus acquired;
and had not the disorders of the times compelled him upon two occasions to retire for a brief space from public life, he would probably never have communicated to the world the fruits of his scientific researches. The first of the two periods aluded to above was when after his recall from exile he found himself virtually deprived of all political influence, and consequently, although basely engaged in the service of an odious prince; he found leisure to compose his De Oratione, De Republica, and De Legibus. The second period reached from his return to Italy after the battle of Pharsalia until the autumn after the death of Caesar, during the greater portion of which he lived in retirement and produced the rest of his philosophical works, some of them being published even subsequent to his reappearance on the stage of public affairs.
But, although these were all finished and sent abroad between the end of b. c. 46 and the middle of b. c. 44, it would be absurd to suppose that the varied information required for such a task could have been brought together and distributed into a series of elaborate treatises in the course of sixteen or eighteen months. It seems much more probable, as indicated above, that the materials were gradually collected during a long course of reading and inquiry, and carefully digested by reflection and frequent discussion, so that when a convenient season had arrived, the design already traced out was completed in all its details. Thus we find in the dialogue upon Laws (i. 20) a reference to the debates which had taken place among the wise on the nature of the Supreme Good, the doubts and difficulties with which the question was still encumbered, and the importance of arriving at some correct decision; after which the speaker proceeds briefly to express the same sentiments which nine years afterwards were expanded and formally maintained in the De Finibus. (Comp. Adloc. i. 3.)

In order to understand clearly the nature of these works and the end which they were intended to serve, we must bear in mind the important fact, that they were almost the first specimens of this kind of literature ever presented to the Romans in their own language. With the exception of the poems of I. meretius and some other publications on the doctrines of Epicurus by an Amphilinus and a Phalirius, so obscure that Cicero seems to have thought them not worth the trouble of perusal, there was absolutely nothing. Hence Cicero was left to work out for himself a series of elementary treatises which should furnish his countrymen with an easy introduction to the knowledge of the tenets professed by the leading sects of Greece on the most important branches of politics, morals, metaphysics, and theology. We must, if we desire to form a fair judgment, never forget that the design proposed was to communicate in a correct and precise but familiar and attractive form
the results at which others had arrived, not to expound new conceptions—to present a sharp and striking outline of the majestic structures reared by the labours of successive schools, not to claim distinction as the architect of a new edifice.
The execution of this project demanded extensive research, a skilful selection of the best portions of the best authors, the accurate adjustment and harmonious combination of these loose fragments,
a choice of familiar examples and apt illustrations to shed light on much that would necessarily appear dark and incomprehensible to the inexperienced, and, most difficult of all, the creation of terms and phraseology capable of expressing with clearness and exactitude a class of ideas altogether
new. If then we find upon examination that this difficult undertaking, requiring the union of talents
the most opposite, of unfavouring application, delicate discrimination, refined taste, practical skill in composition, and an ability to command over a substantial knowledge of the whole field of the subject, how much more consummate ability, we have no right to complain that many of the topics are handled somewhat superficially, that there is an absence of all originality of thought, and that no effort is made to enlarge the boundaries of the science. Nor have we any reason to regret the resolution thus formed and consistently carried out. We are put in possession of a prodigious mass of most curious and interesting information bearing upon the history of philosophy, conveyed in the richest and most winning language. Antiquity produced no works which could rival these as manuals of instruction;
as such they were employed until the downfall of the Roman empire; they stood their ground and kept alive a taste for literature during the middle ages; they were still zealously studied for a long period after the revival of learning; they even now command respect from the purity of the moral principles which they inculcate, and serve as models of perfect style and diction. We arrive at the conclusion, that Cicero is fully entitled to the praise of having accomplished with brilliant success all that he engaged to perform. In philosophy he must be regarded as the prince of popular compilers, but nothing more. It is certain that he could not have put forth his powers in a manner better calculated to promote the interests and extend the influence of his favourite pursuit.
The greater number of these essays, in imitation of the writings of many of the Greek philosophers, are thrown into dialogue—a form exremely well suited for the purposes of instruction,
since it affords facility for familiar explanation
and for the introduction of those elucidations and digressions so necessary to communicate clearness and animation to abstract propositions, which, if simply enunciated in a purely scientific shape, must unavoidably appear to the learner dull and spiritless. In a dialogue, also, the teacher is not compelled to disclose his own opinions, but may give full scope to his ingenuity and eloquence in expounding and contrasting the views of others.
The execution is, upon the whole, no less happy than the design. One cannot fail to be impressed with the dexterity exhibited in contriving the machinery of the different conversations, the tact with which the most appropriate personages are selected, the scrupulous accuracy with which their respective characters are distinguished and preserved throughout, and the air of calm dignity which pervades each separate piece. At the same time, we confess, that there is throughout a want of that life and reality which lends such a charm to the dialogues of Plato. We feel that most of the colloquies reported by the Athenian might actually have been held; but there is a stiffness and formality about the actors of Cicero, and a tendency to lecture rather than to converse, which materially injures the dramatic effect, and in fact in some degree neutralizes the benefit to be derived from this method of imparting knowledge. He has also rather abused the opportunities presented for excursions into the attractive regions which lie out of the direct path, and so much space is sometimes occupied by enthusiastic declarations, that the main subject is for a time thrown out of sight and forgotten.

The speculative opinions entertained by Cicero himself are of little importance, except as a mere matter of curiosity, and cannot be ascertained with certainty. In all controversies the chief arguments of the contending parties are drawn out with the strictest impartiality, marshalled in strong relief over against each other, and the decision then left to the reader. The habit of stating and comparing a multitude of conflicting theories, each of which could number a long array of great names among its supporters, would naturally confirm that disposition to deny the certainty of human knowledge which must have been imbued in early life by the pupil of Philo of Larissa; while the multitude of beautiful and profound reflections scattered over the writings of the Greek sages would lead an unbiased mind, honest in its search after truth, to select what was best in each without binding himself exclusively to one.

A. PHILOSOPHY OF TASTE, OR RHETORIC.

The rhetorical works of Cicero may be considered as a sort of triple compound formed by combining the information derived from the lectures and disquisitions of the teachers under whom he studied, and from the writings of the Greeks, especially Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Isocrates, with his own speculative researches into the nature and theory of the art, corrected in his later years by the results of extensive experience. Rhetoric, considered as a science depending upon abstract principles which might be investigated philosophically and developed in formal precepts, had hitherto attracted but little attention in Rome except among the select few who were capable of comprehending the instructions of foreign professors delivered in a foreign tongue; for the Latins and historians were long regarded, and perhaps justly, as ignorant pretenders, who brought such discredit on the study by their presumptuous quackery, that so late as n. c. 92, L. Crassus, who was not likely to be an unjust or illiberal judge in such matters, when censor was desirous of expelling the whole crew from the city. Thus Cicero had the honour of opening up to the masses of his countrymen a new field of inquiry and mental exercise, and of importing for general national use one of the most attractive productions of Athenian genius and industry.

The Edito Prinices of the collected rhetorical works of Cicero was printed at Venice by Alexander and Aemilius, Ed. 1483, containing the De Oratore, the Orator, the Topica, the Partitones Oratoriae, and the De Optimo Genere Oratorum, and was reprinted at Venice in 1486 and 1495, both in fol. The first complete edition, including, in addition to the above, the Brutus, the Rhetorica ad Herennium, and the De Inventione, was published at Venice by Aldus in 1514, 4to., edited in part by Naugerus. Of modern editions the most notable are the following: that by Schütz, which contains the whole, Lips. 1804, 8 vol. 8vo.; the "Opera Rhetorica Minora," by Wettel, Hamb. 1807, containing all with the exceptions of the De Oratore, the Brutus, and the Orator; and the Orator, Brutus, Topica, De Optimo Genere Oratorum, with the notes of Beier and Orelli, Zurich, 1830, 8vo.

1. Rhetoriciarum a. De Inventione Rhetoricae Libri II.

This appears to have been the earliest of the efforts of Cicero in prose composition. It was intended to exhibit in a compendious systematic form all that was most valuable and worthy of note in the works of the Greek rhetoricians. Aristotle had already performed this task in so far as it related to the methods of argumentation; and the works of the Sicilian and his followers, his writings, together with those of his disciples and of the followers of Isocrates, would supply all the necessary materials for selection and combination. According to the original plan, this treatise was to have embraced the whole subject; but there is no reason to fix upon the exact number of four books as the extent contemplated, and it certainly never was completed. The author, after finishing the two which have descended to us, seems to have thrown them aside, and speaks of them at a later period perhaps too slightly (de Orat. 1. 2) as a crass and imperfect performance. After such a preface regarding the origin, rise, progress, use and abuse of eloquence, we find an enumeration and classification of the different branches of the subject. The whole art must be considered under five distinct heads:—1. Its general character and the position which it occupies among the sciences (genus). 2. The duty which it is called upon to perform (affectum). 3. The end which it seeks to attain (finis). 4. The subject matter of a speech (materialia). 5. The constituent elements of which a speech is made up ( partes rhetoricae). After remarking cursorily, with regard to the genus, that the art of rhetoric is a lump of civic knowledge (civile sciendum), that its affectum is to use all the methods most suitable for persuasion by oratory, and its Gius to achieve this persuasion, Cicero confines himself for the present to the materia and partes. Now the materia, subject-matter, or form of a speech, may belong to one of three classes, according to the nature of the audience. (Comp. Partit. Orat. 3.) 1. The genus demonstrativum (άγονον διδασκαλίαν), addressed to mere listeners who study the oratory as an exhibition of art. 2. The genus deliberativum (άγονον συμβουλευτικήν) addressed to those who judge of the future as in legislative and political assemblies. 3. The genus judiciaria (άγονον δικαστικήν), addressed to those who judge of the past as in courts of law. Again, the partes rhetoricae or constituent elements of a speech are five. 1. The invention of arguments (inventio). 2. The arrangement of these arguments (dispositio). 3. The diction in which these arguments are expressed (eloquentia). 4. The clear and distinct perception in the mind of the things and words which compose the arguments and the power of producing them at the fitting season (memoria). 5. The delivery, comprehending the modulation of the voice, the pause, and the expression of the voice. These points being premised, it is proposed to treat of inventio generally and independently, and then to apply the principles established to each of the three classes under which the materia may be ranged, according to the following method:

Every case which gives rise to debate or difference of opinion (controversia) involves a question, and this question is termed the constitution (constitutio) of the case. The constitution may be fourfold. 1. When the question is one of fact (controversia facti), it is a constitutio conjunctiva. 2. When both parties are agreed as to the fact, but differ as to the name by which the fact ought to be distinguished (controversia nominis), it is a constitutio definitiva. 3. When the question relates to the quality of the fact (generis controversiae), it is a constitutio generalis. 4. When the question concerns the fitness or propriety of the fact (gnus aut quam, aut omnem, aut quomodo, aut quid quod, aut quod tempore apore opor tis quater), it is a constitutio translativa. Again, the constitutio generalis admits of being divided into - a. The constitutio jurisdictialis, in which right and wrong, reward and punishment, are viewed in the abstract; and b. The constitutio negotialis, where they are considered in reference to existing laws and usages; and finally, the constitutio jurisdictialis is subdivided into a. The constitutio absoluta, in which the question of right or wrong is viewed with reference to the fact itself; and b. The constitutio assumptiva, in which the question of right and wrong is viewed not with reference to the fact itself, but to the external circumstances under which the fact took place. The constitutio assumptiva is itself fourfold:

(1) conc essio, when the accused confesses the deed with which he is charged, and does not justify it but seeks forgiveness, which may be done in two ways, (a) by pugatio, when the deed is admitted but moral guilt is denied in consequence of its having been done unwittingly (impudicto), or by accident (casu), or unavoidably (necessitate), (b) by deprecation, when the misdeed is admitted to have been done, and to have been done wilfully, but notwithstanding forgiveness is sought—a very rare contingency; (2) revocatio criminis, when the accused defends himself by casting the blame on another; (3) relatio criminis, when the deed is justified by previous provocation; (4) comparatio, when the deed is justified by pleading a praiseworthy motive.

The constitution of the case being determined, we must next examine whether the case be simple (simplices) or compound (conjuncta), that is, whether it involves a single question or several, and whether the reasons do or do not depend upon some written document (in ratione, in scripto acto controversiae). We must then consider the exact point upon which the dispute turns (piausio), the plea in justification (ratio), the debate which will arise from the reply to the plea of justification (judicatio), and the additional arguments by which the defendant seeks to confirm his plea of justification after it had been attacked by his opponent (firmamentum), which will convert the judicatio into a disemplato (comp. Partit. Orat. 58), and so lead more directly to a decision.

These matters being duly weighed, the orator must proceed to arrange the different divisions of his speech (partes orationis), which are six in number:

1. The Esoratio or introduction, which is divided into a. the Prinicipium or opening, and b. the Instmatio, of which the great object is to awaken the attention and secure the goodwill of the audience. 2. The Narratio or statement of the case. 3. The Partitio or explanation of the manner in which the speaker intends to handle the case, indicating at the same time those points on which both parties are agreed, and those on which they differ. 4. The Confirmatio or array of arguments by which the speaker supports his case. 5. The Reprehensio or confession of the arguments employed by the antagonist. 6. The Convictio or peroration, consisting of a. the Esquematia or brief impressive summary of the whole; b. the Indignatio, which seeks to enlist the passions of the audience, and c. the Conquestio or appeal to their sympathies.

Each of these six divisions is discussed separately, and numerous rules and precepts are laid down for the guidance of the orator.

In the second book the fifth and sixth of the above divisions, the Confirmatio and Reprehensio are considered at large with direct reference to cases belonging to the Genus Judicatium, and to each of the four constitutions and their subdivisions after which the two remaining classes, the Genus Deliberativum and the Genus Demonstrativum, are very briefly noticed, and the dissertation upon Rhetorical Invention closes somewhat abruptly.

We have no means of deciding with certainty the exact time at which these books were composed and published. The expressions employed in the De Oratore (1. 2), "quoniam que puere aut adolescentis noxes ex commentariis nostris inepta ac rudiae excluderunt, vix has notata dignum et hoc usur quam ex causa, quae diximus, tot tantum es occupati sumus" (comp. 1. 6), point unquestionably to the early youth of Cicero, but without enabling us to fix upon any particular year. They formed, very probably, a portion of the fruits of that study continued incessantly during the period of tranquillity which prevailed in the city while Sulla was engaged in pros-
The work is repeatedly quoted by Quintilian, sometimes under the title Libri Rhetoricae, sometimes as Libri Artis Rhetoricae, generally as Rhetorica (comp. Serv. ad Virg. Aen. viii. 321, i. 481), and we might infer from a passage in Quintilian (ii. 14. § 5), that De Rhetorica was the appellation selected by the author; at all events, the addition De Inventione Rhetorica rests upon no ancient authority.

An account of the most important editions of the De Inventione is given below, after the remarks upon the Rhetorica ad Herennium.

2. De Partitio Oratoris Dialogus.

This has been correctly described as a catechism of Rhetoric, according to the method of the middle Academy, by way of question and answer, drawn up by Cicero for the instruction of his son Marcus, in which the whole art is comprised under three heads. 1. The Vis Oratoris, in which the subject is treated with reference to the speaker; 2. the Oratio, which treats of the speech; 3. the Quaestio, which treats of the case.

The precepts with regard to the speaker are ranged under five heads. 1. Inventio. 2. Colloquio. 3. Eloquio. 4. Actio. 5. Memoria.

The precepts with regard to the speech are also under five heads. 1. Esordium. 2. Narratio. 3. Confirmatio. 4. Reprehensio. 5. Peroratio.

The case may be a. Infinita, in which neither persons nor times are defined, and then it is called propositum or consultatio, or it may be b. Finita, in which the persons are defined, and then it is called causa; this in reality is included in the former.

The precepts with regard to the quaestio infinita or consultatio are ranged under 1. Cognitio, by which the existence, the nature, and the quality of the case are determined; 2. Actio, which discusses the means and manner in which any object may be obtained.

The precepts with regard to the quaestio finita or causa are ranged under three heads, according as the case belongs to 1. the Genus Demonstrativum; 2. the Genus Deliberativum; 3. the Genus Judicatiae.

The different constitutiones are next passed under review, and the conversation concludes with an exhortation to the study of philosophy.

These partitio, a term which corresponds to the Greek διαπραγμα, may be considered as the most purely scientific of all the rhetorical works of Cicero, and form a useful companion to the treatise De Inventione; but from their strictly technical character the tract appears dry and uninteresting, and from the paucity of illustrations is not frequently somewhat obscure. From the circumstance that Cicero makes no mention of this work in his other writings, some critics have called in question its authenticity, but there seems to be no evidence either internal or external to justify such a suspicion, and it is repeatedly quoted by Quintilian without any expression of doubt. Another debate has arisen as to the period when it was composed. We are told at the commencement that it was drawn up during a period when the author was completely at leisure in consequence of having been at length enabled to quit Rome, and this expression has been generally believed to indicate the close of the year b.c. 46 or the beginning of b.c. 45, shortly before the death of Tullia and the departure of Marcus for Athens, when, as we know from his correspondence, he was devoting himself with the greatest diligence to literary pursuits. (Ad Fam. viii. 28, i. 26.) Hand has, however, endeavoured to prove (Bisch and Grüber's Encyclopädie, art. Cicero), that we may with greater probability fix upon the year b.c. 49, when Cicero after his return from Cliticia suddenly withdrew from Rome about the middle of January (ad Att. vii. 10), and having spent a considerable time at Formiae, and visited various parts of Campania, proceeded to Arpinum at the end of March, invested his son with the manly gown, and afterwards made him the companion of his flight. But this critic seems to have forgotten that Cicero never entered the city from the spring of b.c. 51 until late in the autumn of b.c. 47, and therefore could certainly never have employed the phrase "quoniam aliquando Roma suspenda potestas data est," and still less could he ever have talked of enjoying "summum otium" at an epoch perhaps the most painful and agitating in his whole life.

The earliest edition of the Partitio Oratoris, in a separate form, which bears a date, is that by Gabr. Fontana, printed in 1472, 4to., probably at Venice. There are, however, two others, supposed by bibliographers to be older. Neither of them has place, date, or printer's name, but one is known to be from the press of Moravus at Naples. The commentaries of G. Valla and L. Stradaeus, with the argument of Latomius, are found in the edition of Sib. Gryphius, Leyden, 1641 and 1645, 8vo., often reprinted. We have also the editions of Camerinii, Lips. 1449; of Salmurius, Strasburg 1563; of Minos, Paris, 1802; of Maier and Marcellinus, Venice, 1837; of Hauptmann, Leipzig, 1741. In illustration, the discussion of Erhard Reusch, "De Ciceronis Partitio Oratoris," Helmstädte, 1726, will be found useful.

3. De Oratore ad Quintum Protram Libri III.

Cicero having been urged by his brother Quintus to compose a systematic work on the art of Oratory, the dialogues which bear the above title were drawn up in compliance with this request. They were completed towards the end of n. c. 55 (ad Att. iv. 15), about two years after the return of their author from banishment, and had occupied much of his time during a period in which he had in a great measure withdrawn from public life, and had sought consolation for his political degradation by an earnest devotion to literary enterprise. All his thoughts and exertions were thus directed in one channel, and consequently, as might be expected, the production before us is one of his most brilliant efforts, and will be found to be so accurately finished in its most minute parts, that it may be regarded as a master-piece of skill in all that relates to the graces of style and composition. The object in view, as explained by himself, was to furnish a treatise which should comprehend all that was valuable in the theories of Aristotle, Isocrates, and other ancient rhetoricians, and at the same time present their precepts in an agreeable and attractive form, disencumbered of the formal stiffness and dry technicalities of the schools. (Ad Fam. i. 9, ad Att. iv. 16.)

The conversations, which form the medium through which instruction is conveyed, are supposed to have taken place in n. c. 91, immediately before the breaking out of the Social war, at the moment when the city was violently agitated by the proposal of the tribune M. Livius Drusus, grant to the senators the right of acting in common with the equites as judges on criminal trials. The measure was vehemently opposed by the consul Philipus, who was in consequence regarded as a traitor to his order, and supported by all the influence and talent of L. Licinius Crassus, the most celebrated orator of that epoch, who had decorated the oratory of the Senate with distinction before he came to Rome. This venerable statesman is represented as having retired to his villa at Tusculum during the celebration of the Roman games, in order that he might collect his thoughts and brace up his energies for the grand struggle which was soon to decide the contest. He was accompanied to his retirement by two youths of high promise, C. Amelius Cotta (consul n. c. 75) and P. Sulpicius Rufus, and there joined by his father-in-law and former colleague in the consulship (n. c. 85), Q. Mucius Scaevola, renowned for his profound knowledge of civil law, and by his friend and political ally, M. Antonius (consul n. c. 99), whose fame as a public speaker was little if at all inferior to that of Crassus himself.

The three consular sages having spent the first day in reflections upon politics and the aspect of public affairs, unbend themselves on the second by the introduction of literary topics. The whole party being stretched at ease under the shadow of a spreading plane, the elders, at the earnest solicitation of Cotta and Sulpichus, commence a discourse upon oratory, which is renewed the following morning and brought to a close in the afternoon.

At the end of the first dialogue, Scaevola, in order that strict dramatic propriety may be observed (see ad Att. iv. 16), retires, and his place, in the two remaining colleagues, is supplied by Q. Lutatius Catalus, and his half-brother, C. Julius Caesar Strabo, both distinguished as public speakers, the former celebrated for the extreme purity of his diction, the latter for the pungency of his wit.

An animated debate first arises on the qualifications essential for pre-eminence in oratory. Crassus, who throughout must be regarded as expressing the sentiments of Cicero, after enlarging upon the importance, the dignity, and the universal utility of the art, continues to develop the subject by deep learning, the varied accomplishments, and the theoretical skill which must enter into the combination which shall form a perfect orator, while Antonius, although he allows that universal knowledge, if attainable, would mightily increase the power of those who possessed it, is contented to pitch the standard much lower, and seeks to prove that the orator is more likely to be embarrassed than benefited by aiming at what is beyond his reach, and that, by attempting to master the whole circle of the liberal arts, he will but waste the time that might be more profitably employed, since the natural gifts of quick talents, a good voice, and a pleasing delivery, when improved by practice, self-training, and experience, are in themselves amply sufficient to produce the result sought. This preliminary controversy, in which, however, both parties agree in reality, as to what is desirable, although they differ as to what is practicable, being terminated, Antonius and Crassus enter jointly upon the τεχνολογία (ad Att. iv. 16) of the subject, and expound the principles and rules upon which success in the rhetorical art depends, and the means of acquiring to which they may be achieved. The former discusses at large in the second book, the invention and arrangement of arguments, and winds up with a dissertation on memory, the continuous flow of his discourse being broken and relieved by an essay, placed in the mouth of Caesar, upon the nature and use of humour, a digression, both amusing in itself, and interesting generally, as evincing the miserable bad taste of the Romans in this department. In the third book, Crassus devotes himself to an exposition of the ornaments of rhetoric, contrasting all the graces of diction, to which are added a few remarks upon delivery, that is, upon the voice, pronunciation, and action of the speaker.

The MSS. of the De Oratore known up to the early part of the 15th century, were all imperfect. There were blanks extending in Bk. i. from c. 28, § 128 to c. 34, § 157, and from c. 43, § 193 to Bk. ii. c. 58, § 19, although in the Erft MS. only as far as Bk. ii. c. 3, § 13; in Bk. ii. from c. 12, § 50 to c. 14, § 60; and in Bk. iii. from c. 5, § 17 to c. 28, § 110. These gaps were first supplied by Gasparini of Barsiza, from a MS. found at Lodl, and hence called Codex Laudomius, 1419, which in addition to the Historia ad Herennium, the De Invenzione, the Brutus and the Orator contained the three books De Oratore entire. This MS., which is now lost, was repeatedly copied, and its contents soon became known all over Italy; but it is uncertain whether the whole was transcribed, or merely those passages which were required to fill up existing deficiencies.

The Epitome Prinzipes of the De Oratore was printed at the monastery of Stuβt, by Sweeney and Pannartz, in 4to, between 1465 and 1467. The most useful editions are those by Pierre, Camb. 1716, 1732, and Lond. 1746, 1771, 1755, 18v0; by J. F. Wetzel, Brunwick, 1794, 8v0; by Harle, with the notes of Pearce and others, Leipzig, 1816, 8vo; by O. M. Müller, Leipzig, 1819, 8vo; and by Heinichen, Copenhagen, 1830, 8vo.

4. Brutus s. de Claris Oratoribus.

This work is in the form of a dialogue, the speakers being Cicero himself, Atticus, and M. Brutus; the scene a grass plot, in front of a colonnade, attached to the house of Cicero at Rome, with a statue of Plato close at hand. It contains a complete critical history of Roman eloquence, from the earliest epochs, commencing with L. Junius Brutus, Appius Claudius, M. Curius, and sundry sages of the olden time, whose fame rested upon obscure tradition alone, passing on to those with regard to whose talents more certain information could be obtained, such as Cornelius Cæcugus and Cato, the censor, advancing gradually till it reached such men as Cato, Licinius Crassus, and M. Antonius, whose glory was bright in the recollection of many yet alive, and ending with those Cicero had himself known. It is a youth, and rivalled as a man, the greatest of whom was Hortensius, and with him the list closes, living orators being excluded. Prefixed, are some short, but graphic sketches, of the most renowned Grecian models; the whole discourse being interpersed with clever observations on the speculative principles of the art, and many important historical details connected with the public life and services of the individuals enumerated. Great taste and discrimination are displayed in pointing out the characteristic merits, and exposing the defects, of the various styles of composition reviewed in turn, and the work is most valuable as a contribution to the history of literature. But, from the desire to render it absolutely complete, and, at the same time, to confine it within moderate limits, the author is compelled to hurry from one individual to another, without dwelling upon any for a sufficient period to leave a distinct impression on the mind of the reader; and, while we complain of the space occupied by a mere catalogue of uninteresting names, by which we are wearied, we regret that our curiosity should have been excited, without being gratified, in the sight of many of the shining lights which shed such a lustre over the last century of the commonwealth.

The Brutus was composed next in order, although at a long interval, after the De Republica, at a period when Caesar was already master of the state, it was written before the Cato, the Cato itself coming immediately before the Orator, a combination of circumstances which fixes it down to the year B.C. 46. (Brut. 1, 2, 5, 8, Orat. 7, de Divin. II. 1.)

The Brutus was unknown until the discovery of the Codex Laudensis described above. Hence all the MSS. being confessedly derived from this source do not admit of being divided into families, although the text might probably be improved if the transcripts existing in various European libraries were more carefully examined and compared.

The Edition Princes of the Brutus was that printed at Rome, by Swaynehm and Panmatt, 1469, 4to., in the same volume with the De Orator and the Orator. The best edition is that by Billend, with very copious and useful prolegomena, Königsberg, 1826, 8vo., to which we may add an useful school edition by Billerbeck, Hannover, 1828.

5. Ad M. Brutum Orator.

Cicero having been frequently requested by M. Brutus to explain his views with regard to what constituted a faultless orator, this term being understood to denote a public speaker in the senate or in the forum, but to exclude the eloquence displayed by philosophers in their discourses, and by poets and historians in their writings, endeavours in the present essay to perform the task imposed on him. We must not, therefore, expect to find there a series of precepts, the result of observation and induction, capable of being readily applied in practice, or a description of anything actually existing in nature, but rather a fancy picture, in which the artist represents an object of ideal beauty, such as would spring from the union of all the prominent characteristic excellences of the most gifted individuals, fused together and concentrated into one harmonious whole.

He first points out that perfection must consist in absolute propriety of expression, and that this could be obtained only by occasional judicious transitions from one style to another; by assuming, according to the nature of the subject, at one time a plain, familiar, unperturbing tone; by rising at another into lofty, impassioned, and highly ornamented declamation; and by observing in general a graceful medium between the two extremes; by ascending, as the Greeks expressed it, from the krasis to the apode, and falling back from the apode to the pedos,—instead of adhering steadfastly, after the fashion of most great orators, to one particular form. He next passes on to show that an error very prevalent among his countrymen, who, admitting that Athenian eloquence was the purest model for imitation, imagined that its essence consisted in avoiding with scrupulous care all copious, flowing, decorated periods, and in expressing every idea in highly polished, terse, epigrammatic sentences—a system which, however interesting as an effort of intellect, must necessarily produce results which will fall dull and cold upon the ear of an ordinary listener, and, if carried out to its full extent, degenerate into offensive mannerism. After dwelling upon these dangers and mischiefs attending upon the folly of neglecting the practice of Aeschines and Demosthenes and setting up such a standard as Thucydides, Cicero proceeds to show that the orator must direct his chief attention to three points, which in fact comprehend the soul of the art, the vehemence, the vehemence, and the tone; the matter of his speech, the arrangement of that matter, the expression and enunciation of that matter each of which is in turn examined and discussed. The perfect orator being defined to be one who clearly demonstrates to his hearers the truth of the position he maintains, delights them by the beauty and fitness of his language, and wins them over to his cause ("is, qui in fort, causaque civilibus, sua didic, ut probet, ut delectet, ut flectat"), we are led to consider the means by which these ends are reached. The groundwork and foundation of the whole is true wisdom, but true wisdom can be gained only by the union of all the highest natural endowments with a knowledge of philosophy and all the chief departments of literature and science; and thus Cicero brings us round to the conclusion, which is in fact the prevailing idea of this and the two preceding works, that he who would be a perfect orator must be a perfect man. What follows (from c. 4) to the conclusion is devoted to a dissertation on the harmonious arrangement of words and the importance of rhythmical cadences in prose composition—a curious topic, which attracted much attention in ancient times, as may be seen from the elaborately minute dulness of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, but possesses comparatively little interest for the modern reader.

The Orator was composed about the beginning of B.C. 45, having been undertaken immediately after the completion of the Cato. Cicero declares, that he was willing to stake his reputation for knowledge and taste in his own art upon the merits of this work: "Mihi quidem sic persuadeo, me quidquid habuerim judicium dicendo in illium librum contulisse;" and every one must be charmed by the faultless purity of the diction, the dexterity manifested in the choice of appropriate phraseology, and the sonorous flow with which the periods roll gracefully onwards. There is now and then perhaps a little difficulty in tracing the connexion of the different divisions; and while some of the most weighty themes are touched upon very slightly, disproportionate space is assigned to the remarks upon the music of prose; but this probably arose from the subject having been entirely passed over in the two preceding treatises. For it must be borne in mind that the De Oratore, the Brutus, and the Orator were intended to constitute a connected and continuous series, forming a complete system of the rhetorical art. In the first are expounded the principles and rules of oratory, and the qualifications natural and acquired requisite for success; in the second the importance of these qualifications, and the use and application of the principles and rules are illustrated by a critical examination of the leading merits and defects of the greatest public speakers. In the third it is demonstrated that ideal perfection to which the possession of all the requisite qualifications and a strict adherence to all the principles and rules would lead.

The Epitome Princeps of the Orator is that mentioned above, under the Brutus, printed at Rome in 1469. The best is that by Meyer, Lips., 1827, 8vo.; to which we may add the school edition of Billerbeck, Hannover, 1829, 8vo.

Literature.—P. Ramus, Brutores quaestiones in Oratorum Cis, Paris, 1547, 4to.; 1549, 8vo.; J. Periutiius, Oratorio pro Cis. Oratorum contra P. Ramun, Paris, 1547, 8vo.; A. Malagonii, In Oratorum Cis. Commentariorum, Basil., 1552; M. Junius, In Oratorum Cis. Schol., Argent., 1585, 8vo.; H. A. Burchardus, Animadversiones ad Cis. Oratorum, Berolina, 1815, 8vo.

We have already noticed in the remarks on the Orator the opinions advocated by several of the most distinguished speakers of this epoch, such as Brutus and Calvis, that the essence of the true Attic style consisted in employing the smallest possible number of words, and concentrating the meaning of the speaker into subtle, terse, pointed sentences, which, however, from being totally devoid of all ornament and amplitude of expression, were for the most part stiff, lean, and dry, the very reverse of Cicero's style. In order to refute practically this prevalent delusion, Cicero resolved to render into Latin the two most perfect specimens of Grecian eloquence, the orations of Aschines and Demosthenes in the case of Chrysler. The translation of the latter has perished; but a short preface, in which the origin and object of the undertaking is explained, is still extant, and bears the title given above, De Optimis Genere Oratorum.

The Epitome Princeps of this tract, in an independent form, is that published with the commentary of Achilles Statius, Paris, 1551, 4to., and 1552, 8vo. We have also “De Optimis Genere Oratorum, ad Trebatum Topica, Oratoriae Partitiones, cum Commentario, ed. G. H. Saulfrank, vol. i. Ratisbon, 1823, 8vo.”

7. Topica ad C. Trebatianum.

C. Trebatius, the celebrated jurisconsult, having found himself unable to comprehend the Topics of Aristotle, which treat of the invention of arguments, and having failed in procuring any explanation from a celebrated rhetorician, whose aid he sought, had frequently applied to Cicero for information and assistance. Cicero's incessant occupations prevented him for a long time from attending to these solicitations; but when he was sailing towards Greece, the summer after Caesar's death, he was reminded of Trebatius by the sight of Velia, a city with which the lawyer was closely connected, and accordingly, while on board of the ship, drew up from recollection the work before us, and dispatched it to his friend from Rhegium on the 27th of July, a. c. 44.

We are here presented with an abstract of the original, expressed in plain, familiar terms, illustrated by examples derived chiefly from Roman law instead of from Greek philosophy, accompanied by a promise to expound orally, at a future period, any points which might still appear confused or obscure. We cannot, of course, expect to find in such a book any originality of matter; but when we consider the circumstances under which it was composed, and the nature of the subject itself, we cannot fail to admire the clear head and the wonderful memory which could produce at once a full and accurate representation of a hard, complicated, and technical dissertation on the theory of rhetoric.

The Epitome is without place, date, or printer's name, but is believed to have been published at Venice about 1472. The commentaries upon this work are very numerous. The most celebrated are those by Boethius, G. Valla, Melanchthon, J. Vissoria, Hesiodorhminus, Latomus, Goezianus, Talheus, Curio, Achilles Statius, &c., which are contained in the editions printed at Paris by Tiletans in 1543, 4to., by David in 1550, 4to., by Vasconsus in 1554, 4to., and by Richardus in 1557 and 1561, 4to.

8. Commentes Locis.

All that we know regarding this work is comprised in a single sentence of Quintilian (ii. 1. § 11) : “Commentes loci, sive qui sunt in vita directi, quales legimus a Cicerone composito; sec quibus quaestiones generaliter tractantur, quales sunt editi a Quinto quoque Hortensio.” Orelli supposes, that the Paradoxos are here spoken of; but this opinion is scarcely borne out by the expression in the preface to which he refers.

9. Rhetoriconum ad C. Herennium Libri IV.

A general view of the whole art of Rhetoric, including a number of precepts and rules for the guidance of the student. Passages from this treatise are quoted by St. Jerome (adn. Sf. libr. i. p. 204, ed. Basil.), by Pseudo, by Rufinus (do Comp. ad Mel. Oral. pp. 315, 321 of the Rhetores Antig. ed. Pitt.), and by other ancient grammarians, who speak of it as the work of Cicero, and as such it was generally received by the most distinguished scholars of the fifteenth century, Latamurus, Arretinus, Angelus Politianus, and Laurentius Valla. At a very early period, however, its authenticity was called in question by Raphael Rhegius and Angelus Decembrius, and the controversy has been renewed at intervals down to the present day. Almost all the best editors agree in pronouncing it spurious, but the utmost diversity of opinion has existed with regard to the real author. Regina propounded no less than three hypotheses, assigning it at one time to Q. Corneliuus, who was co-quaestor a. c. 81, and an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship in a. c. 64; at another, to Virginius, a rhetorician contemporary with Nero; and lastly, to Timolaus, son of queen Zenobia, who had an elder brother Herennianus. Paulus and Aldus Marmatius, Sigonius, Muretus, Barthius, and many of less note, all adopted the first supposition of Regina. G. J. Vossius began by deciding in favour of the younger Q. Corneliuus, the colleague of Cicero in the augurate (ad Fam. xii. 17-30), but afterwards changed his mind and fixed upon Tullius Tiro; Julius Caesar Scaliger upon M. Gallo; Numeramus upon Laurens Tullius; while more recently Schütz has advanced the claim of M. Antonius Quipho, and Van Heusde to Adolus Stilo. The arguments which seem to prove that the piece in question is not the production of Cicero are briefly as follows:

1. It could not have been composed before the De Oratore, for Cicero there (i. 2) speaks of his juvenile efforts in this department as rough and never brought to a conclusion,—a description which corresponds perfectly with the two books De Inventione, whereas the Ad Herennium is entire and complete in all its parts; moreover, the author of the Ad Herennium complains at the outset that he was so oppressed with family affairs and business, that he could scarcely find any leisure for his favourite pursuits,—a statement totally inapplicable to the early career of Cicero. 2. It could not have been written after the De Oratore, for not only does Cicero never make any allusion to such a performance among the numerous labours of his later years, but it would have been quite unworthy of his mature age, cultivated taste, and extensive experience: it is in reality in every way inferior to the De Inventione, that hoy'sh essay which he treats so contemptuously. 3. The place of Tullius, as it appears here upon the names of Toretia and young Tullius, which occur in v. i. c. 12, since these words are manifest interpolations. 4. Quintilian repeats wholly from the De Inventione and other acknowledged rhetorical pieces of Cicero, but never notices the Ad Herennium. 5. Marcus Tullius in his commentary on the De Inventione, makes no allusion to the existence of the Ad Herennium; it is still probable that he would have carefully discussed the imperfect manual, and altogether passed over that which was complete. 6. Servius refers three times (ad Verg. Aen. vili. 231, iv. 481, 614) to the "Rhetorica" and Cassiodorus (Rhetor. comp, p. 238) and Porphyrion (in Priscian, s. v. Herennium) to the passages of Cicero; but these citations are all from the De Inventione and not one from the Ad Herennium.

The most embarrassing circumstance connected with these two works is the extraordinary resemblance which exists between them—a resemblance so strong that it is impossible to doubt that there is some bond of union. For although there are numerous and striking discrepancies, not only is the general arrangement the same, but in very many divisions the same precepts are conveyed in nearly if not exactly the same phraseology; and illustrated by the same examples. Any one who will compare Ad Herenn. i. 2, ii. 20, 22, 23, 25, 27, with De Invent. i. 7, 42, 45, 48, 49, 51, will at once be convinced that these coincidences cannot be accidental; but the single instance to be found Ad Herenn. ii. 23, and De Invent. i. 50 would alone be sufficient, for in both we find the same four lines extracted for the same purpose from the Trinummus, and Plautus censured for a fault of which he is not guilty, the force of his expression having been misunderstood by his critics. We cannot suppose that the author of the Ad Herennium copied from the De Inventio, since the former embraces a much wider compass than the latter; still less can we believe that Cicero would be guilty of a shameless plagiarism, which must have been open to such easy detection. Both parties cannot have derived their matter from a common Greek original, for not only is it incredible that two persons translating independently of each other should have rendered so many words in word-for-word identity, but the illustrations from Roman writers common to both at once destroy such an explanation. Only two solutions of the enigma suggest themselves. Either we have in the Ad Herennium and the De Inventione the notes taken down by two pupils from the lectures of the same Latin rhetorician, which were drawn out at full length by the one, and thrown aside in an unfinished state by the other after some alterations and corrections had been introduced; or we have in the Ad Herennium the original lectures, published subsequently by the professor himself. This last idea is certainly at variance with the tone assumed in the preliminary remarks, but may receive some support from the claim put forth (i. 9) to originality in certain divisions of insinuaciones, which are adopted without observation in the De Inventione. Whatever conclusion we may adopt upon this head, it is clear that we possess no evidence to determine the real author. The case made out in favour of Cornificius (we cannot tell which Cornificius) is at first sight plausible. Quintilian (iit. i. § 21, comp. ix. 3, § 89) frequently mentions a certain Cornificius as a writer upon rhetoric, and places especially (iv. c. § 98) enumerates his classification of figures, which corresponds exactly with the Ad Herennium (iv. 15, &c.); and a second point of agreement has been detected in a citation by Julius Rufinus. (De Fig. Sent. p. 29.) But, on the other hand, many things are ascribed to Quintilian to Cornificius which nowhere occur in the Ad Herennium; and, still more fatal, we perceive, upon examining the words referred to above (iv. 3, § 93), that the remarks of Cornificius on figures must have been taken from a separate and distinct tract confined to that subject. We can accord to Schütz the merit of having demonstrated that M. Antonius Quipho cannot be the compiler, and that there is no testimony, external or internal, to render this position untenable; but we cannot go further. There are several historical allusions dispensed up and down reaching from the consuls of L. Cassius Longinus, b. c. 107, to the death of Sulphius in b. c. 89; and if Burmann and others are correct in believing that the second consuls of Sulis is distinctly indicated (iv. 54, 68), the fact will be established, that these books were not published before b. c. 80.

The materials for arriving at a correct judgment with regard to the merits of this controversy, will be found in the preface of the younger Burmann, to his edition of the Rhetorica ad Herennium and De Inventione, printed at Leyden in 1761, 8v0., and republished with additional notes by Lindemann, Leipzig, 1828, 8v0.; in the proemium of Schütz to his edition of the rhetorical works of Cicero, Leipzig, 1804, 3 vols. 8v0., enlarged and corrected in his edition of the whole works of Cicero, Leipzig, 1814; and in the disquisition of J. van Heusde, De Actio Stilone, Utrecht, 1833; to which we may add, as one of the earliest authorities, Utriusque Rhetoricæ ad Herennium Ciceronis juxta inscribatur, appended to the Problematæ in Quintil. Inst. Orat. by Raphael Regius, published at Venice in 1492.

that occasion to have spent some days in recounting the particulars of this memorable conversation, in which he had dealt a part to Mr. young friend who afterwards dedicated the De Republica to the person who was his travelling companion on this occasion. It is hard to discover who this may have been, but historical considerations go far to prove that either Q. Cicero or Atticus was the individual in question. (De Rep. i. 8, Brut. 22; Mni. Praef. § iv.) The precise date at which the De Republica was given to the world is unknown; it could scarcely have been before the end of n. c. 54, for the work was still in an unfinished state at the end of September in that year (ad Att. iv. 16), and during the month of October scarcely a day passed in which the author was not called upon to plead for some client (ad Q. Fr. iii. 3); and on the other hand, it appears from an expression in the correspondence of Cæcius with Cicero, while the latter was in Cicilia (ad Fam. viii. 1), that the "politic libri" were in general circulation in the early part of n. c. 51, while the language used is such as would scarcely have been employed except with reference to a new publication.

The greater number of the above particulars are gleaned from incidental notices dispersed over the writings of Cicero. The dialogues themselves, although written about the middle of the tenth century, and perhaps considerably later, had ever since the revival of literature eluded the most earnest search, and were believed to have been irrecoverably lost with the exception of the episode of the Somnium Scipionis, extracted entire from the sixth book by Macrobius, and sundry fragments quoted by grammarians and ecclesiastics, especially by Lactantius and St. Augustin. But in the year 1822, Angelo Mai detected among the Palimpsests in the Vatican a portion of the long-sought-for treasure, which had been partially obliterated to make way for a commentary of St. Augustin on the Psalms. A full history of this volume, which seems to have been brought from the monastery of Bobio during the pontificate of Paulus V., about the beginning of the 7th century, is contained in the first edition, printed at Rome in 1822, and will be found in most subsequent editions. Although what has been thus unexpectedly restored to light is in itself most valuable, yet, considered as a whole, the work presents a sadly deformed and mutilated aspect. These imperfections arise from various causes. In the first place, the commentary of Augustin reaches from the 119th to the 140th psalm, but the remainder, down to the 150th psalm, written, as may be fairly inferred, over sheets of the same Ms., has disappeared, and gaps occur in what is left to the extent of 64 pages, leaving exactly 362 pages entire in double columns, each consisting of fifteen lines. In the second place, it must be remembered that to prepare an ancient Ms. for the reception of a new writing, it must have been taken to pieces in order to wash or scrape every page separately, and that, no attention being paid to the arrangement of these dissecta membrana, they would, when rebound, be shuffled together in utter disorder, and whole leaves would be frequently rejected altogether, either from being decayed or from some failure in the cleaning process. Accordingly, in the palimpsest in question the different parts of the original were in the utmost confusion, and great care was required not only in deciphering the faint characters, but in re-
In the prologue to the fifth book, of which we know less than of any of the preceding, Cicero indulged in lamentations on the general depravity of morals which were becoming rapidly more corrupt. The main topic in what followed was the administration of laws, including a review of the practice of the Roman courts, beginning with the paternal jurisdiction of the kings, who were the sole judges in the infancy of the city.

We can hardly hazard a conjecture on the contents of the sixth book, with the exception of the well-known Somnium Scipionis, in which Scipio relates that he saw in a dream, when, in early youth, he visited Masinissa, in Africa, the form of the first Africanus, which dimly revealed to him his future destiny, and urged him to press steadily forward in the path of virtue and of true renown, by announcing the reward prepared in a future state for those who have served their country in this life with good faith.

The authorities chiefly consulted by Cicero, in composing the De Republica, are cowiously enumerated in the first chapter of the second book de Divinatone.

"Sexe de Republica libri sexscriptus—Magnus locus philosophique proprius, a Platone, Aristotele, Theophrasto totaque Peripatetico familia tractus uberrimae." To these we must add Polybius, from whom many of the most important opinions are directly derived (e.g. comp. Polyb. vi. 3, 6, 7).

The Edito Principe of the recovered De Republica was printed, as we have seen above, at Rome, in 1622, with copious prolongements and notes by Mai; this was followed by the edition of Crusius and Mozer, Frankf. 1626, 8vo., which is the most complete that has hitherto appeared. The following also contains useful matter, "La République de Cicéron, d'après la texte inédit, recemment découvert et commenté par M. Mai, bibliothécaire de Vatican, avec une traduction française, un discours préliminaire et des dissertations historiques, par M. Villemain, de l'Académie française, il tomes, Paris, Michaud, 1623."

The fragments known before the discovery of Mai are included in all the chief editions of the collected works, and were published with a French translation by Bernardi, ii tomes, Paris, 1807.

2. De Legibus Libri III.

Three dialogues, in a somewhat mutilated condition, on the nature, the origin, and the perfection of laws. These have given rise to a series of controversies respecting the real author of the work, the time at which it was written, its extent when entire, its proper title, the date of publication, the existence of a prologue, or prologue, the source from which the author derived his materials, and the design which he proposed to accomplish. On each of these points it is necessary to say a few words.

1. The opinion that Cicero was not the author, rests solely upon the fact that, contrary to his usual practice in such matters, he nowhere makes mention of these books; no notice of them is taken in the catalogue of his philosophical writings, inserted in the De Divinatone (ii. 1), nor in any part of his correspondence with Atticus, which generally con-contains some account of the literary labours in which he was from time to time engaged, nor in any of those passages where a reference might very naturally have been expected (e.g. Tusc. iv. 1. Brat. v. 19), while the expressions which have been advanced as peculiar to Cicero are, upon examination, as those, have been so unfairly interpreted, that they throw no light whatever on the question. (Cicero.

3. With regard to the number of books at one time in existence, we are certain that there were more than three, for Macrobius (I. c.) quotes the fifth; but how many there may have been is purely a matter of conjecture. Fabricius, Hilleman, and Wagner, decide that there were just five; Goerenz argues very ingeniously that there must have been six; Davis fixes that there were eight.

4. The title De Legibus rests on the authority of nearly all the MSS. One alone exhibits De Jure Civili et Legibus, which doubtless arose from a desire to include the supposed contents of the later books. (See de Leg. ii. 5 fin.; Gell. i. 22.)

5. If we can be certain in our position, that Cicero never finished his work, it follows that it was not published during his life, and, therefore, remained unknown to his contemporaries.

6. As to the existence of a prologue, we should naturally have imagined that this was a question of fact, affording no scope for reasoning. Nevertheless the point also has been keenly debated. Turnebus, in one commentary, considers that the first few chapters constitute a regular introduction, but he afterwards changed his mind, and, startled by the abruptness with which the conversation opens, maintained that the exordium had been lost. Goebrich and Moser, the most judicious editors, adopt the first conclusion of Turnebus.

7. The M. P. C. S. is full of original and elaboration; the statue of Plato is evidently the model, and the imitation throughout is most close and accurate. But the resemblance extends no farther than the surface: the definitions, the propositions, the arguments, and the whole substance, except what is immediately connected with Roman law, can be traced to the labours of the Stoics, especially the polis θεωρεις, the περικ λαος, the περικ δικαιοσυνης, and above all the περικ σωτηριαν of Chrysippus; for the few fragments which have been preserved of these tracts are still sufficient to show that not only did Cicero draw his materials from their stores, but in some instances did little more than translate their words. Even in the passages on magistrates the ideas of Plato, Aristotle, and Theophrastus are presented with the modifications introduced by Dion (Diogenes?) and Panaetius. (De Leg. iii. 6.)

8. The general plan of the work is distinctly traced in one of the opening chapters (i. 8. 17). It was intended to comprehend an exposition of the nature of justice and its connexion with the nature of man, an examination of the laws by which states ought to be governed, and a review of the different causes of revolution which had been adopted by different nations.

Accordingly, in the first book we have an investigation into the sources of justice and virtue. It is laid down (1), That the Gods are the ultimate source of justice; (2) That man, being bound together by a community of faculties, feelings, and desires, are led to cultivate social union—and hence justice, without which social union could not exist.
Thus human nature is a second source of justice.
But since human nature is intimately connected with God by reason and act, it follows that God and the moral nature of man are the joint sources of justice, law being the practical exposition of its principles. Much more stress is, however, laid upon the second of these two sources than upon the first, which is quickly dismissed and kept out of sight.

In the second book the author explains his views of a Model Code, illustrated by constant references to the ancient institutions of Rome. Attention is first called to the laws which relate to religion and sacred observances, which are considered under the different heads of divine worship in general, including the solemnities to be observed in the performance of ordinances, and the classification of the Gods according to the degrees of homage to which they are severally entitled; the celebration of festivals; the duties of the various orders of priests;
the exhibition of public games; the maintenance of ancient rites; the punishment of perjury and impurity; the consecration of holy places and things; and the respect to be paid to the spirits of the departed.

The third book treated of Magistrates, commencing with a short exposition of the nature and importance of their functions as interpreters and enforcers of the laws. This is followed by a dissertation on the expediency of having one magistrate in a state to whom all the rest shall be subordinate, which leads to certain reflections on the authority of the consuls, as controlled by the tribunes. Here, however, there is a great blank, the part which is lost having contained, it would appear, an inquiry into the functions of all the chief officers of the Roman republic. What remains consists of three discussions, one on the power exercised by tribunes of the plebeians, a second on the propriety of supplying the vacancies in the senate from the number of senators who had held certain appointments, and,
thirdly, on the advantages and drawbacks of voting
by ballot.

The scene of these dialogues is laid in the villa of Cicero, in the neighbourhood of his native Arpinum, near the point where the Flaminian joins the Liris. The Edito Princeps forms part of the edition of the philosophical works printed at Rome in 2 vols. fol. by Sweeneyhim and Pamartza, 1471; see above, p. 719, b. The editions of D’avis, Camb.
1727-9, containing the notes of the old commentators, and an improved text, were long held in high estimation, and frequently reprinted, but is now superceded by those of Goeresna, Leip. 1809, 8vo, forming the first volume of the collected philosophical works;
of Moser and Creuzer, Frankf. 1824, 8vo, containing everything that the scholar can desire; and of Bake, Leyden, 1842, 8vo, which is the most recent.

3. De Jure Civili in Artem reddendo.

A. Gellius quotes a sentence from a work of Cicero which he says bore the above title. The subject of civil law was also discussed in one of the last books De Legibus, but the words of Gellius can apply only of certain gifts and virtues. See Orelli’s Cicero
vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 478. (Gell. i. 22; Quintil. xii. 3.
§ 10; Macrob. vi. 4; Cic. de Leg. iii. 20.)

4. Epistola ad Cæsarem de Republica ordinanda.

Cicero, in a letter to Atticus, (xii. 40), written in June, R. C. 45, tells his friend, that he had made several attempts to compose an address to Caesar, in imitation of those of Aristotle and Theopompos to Alexander, but had hitherto failed (Συμβουλὴν πρὸς Cæsar: quæque conser: nūlī réperit).
A few days later, however, it appears to have been finished (ad Att. xiii. 26), and was soon after sent to Atticus (ad Att. xii. 49), but never forwarded to the dictator; for, having been previously submitted to his friends for their approbation, they made so many objections, and suggested so many alterations, that Cicero threw it aside in disgust. (Ad Att. xii. 51, xiii. 1, 27, 28, 51.)

C. PHILOSOPHY OF MORAES.

1. De Officiis Libri III.

A treatise on moral obligations, viewed not so much with reference to a metaphysical investigation of the basis on which they rest, as to the practical business of the world and the intercourse of social and political life. It was composed and published late in the year n. c. 44, certainly after the end of August (III. sub fin.), and is addressed to young Marcus, at that time residing at Athens under the care of Cratippus the Peripatetic. This being a work professingly intended for the purposes of instruction, Cicero does not dwell upon the conflicting doctrines of rival sects, but endeavours rather to inculcate directly those views which he regarded as the most correct; and, rejecting the form of dialogue, enumerates the different procepts with the authority of a teacher addressing his pupil. The discipline of the Stoics is principally followed. In the first two books, the περὶ καθιστάσεως of Panemius served as a guide, and not a little was borrowed from Diogenes of Babylon, Antipater of Tarsus, Hecato, Posidonius, Antipater of Tyre, and others enumerated in the commentary
of Beier and the tract of Lydium on Panemius.
Notwithstanding the express declaration of Cicero of the instruction, we cannot, from the number of manuscripts which have avoided the conclusion, that the Greek authorities have in not a few passages been translated verbatim, and translated not very happily, for the mythology character of the Latin language rendered it impossible to express accurately those nice gradations of thought and delicate distinctions which can be conveyed with so much clearness and precision by the copious vocabulary and graceful flexibility of the sister tongue. (See the essay of Garo named at the end of the article.)

The third book, which is occupied with questions in cosmology, although it lays claim to greater originality than those which precede it, was certainly formed upon the model of the περὶ καθιστάσεως of the Stoic Hecato. But while the skeleton of the whole work is unquestionably of foreign origin, the examples and illustrations are taken almost exclusively from Roman history and Roman literature, and are for the most part selected with great judgment and clothed in the most felicitous diction.

In the first book, after a few preliminary remarks, we find a threefold division of the subject.
When called upon to perform any action we must inquire, 1. Whether it is possible, that is, good in itself, absolutely and explicitly. Whether Whether it is utile, that is, good when considered with reference to external objects; 3. What course we must pursue when the honestum and the uile are at variance. Moreover, the honestum and the uile each admit of degrees which also fall to be examined in order that we may make choice of the highest. The general plan being thus sketched, it is followed out by a discussion of the four constituent elements into which the honestum may be resolved: a. Sapiencia, the power of discerning truth; b. Justitia et Beneficentia, which consists in studying the welfare of those around us, in rendering to every one his own, and in preserving contracts inviolate; c. Fortitudo, greatness and strength of mind; d. Temperantia, the faculty of doing and saying everything in a becoming manner, in the proper place, and to the proper extent. Each of these is explained at length, and the book closes with a debate on the degrees of the honestum, that is, the method of deciding, when each of two lines of conduct is honestum, which is to be preferred as superior (honestus) to the other.

The second book is devoted to the uile, and considers how we may best conciliate the favour of others through a proper medium the honestum will and thus arrive at wealth and public distinction, enlarging peculiarly on the most pure and judicious mode of displaying liberality, whether by pecuniary gifts or by aid of any other description. This is succeeded by a short notice of two uilitates passed over by Panaetius—the care of the health and the care of the purse, after which a few words are added on the comparison of things expedient with each other.

In the third book it is demonstrated that there can never be any real collision between the honestum and the uile, but that when an action is viewed through a proper medium the honestum will invariably be found to be inseparable from the uile and the uile from the honestum, a proposition which had been briefly enunciated at the beginning of book second, but is here fully developed and largely illustrated. A number of difficult cases are then stated, which serve as exercises in the application of the rules laid down, among which a prominent place is assigned to the story of Regularia.

TheEditoPrincipes of the De Officiis is one of the oldest specimens of classical typography in existence, having been printed along with the Parameiros by Pust and Schoffer at Mayence in 1465 and again in 1466, both in small 4to. These are not of excessive rarity, and occur more frequently upon vellum than upon paper. Next comes an edition in 4to, without date or name of place or of printer, but generally recognised as from the press of Ulric Zell, at Cologne, about 1467, which were followed by that of Ulric Henn, fol., Rome, 1468-9, also without name or date, that of Swyneyhem and Pamartz, Rome, fol., 1469, of Vindeminc de Spin, Venice, fol., 1470, and of Egggesteyn, Strasburg, 4to., 1770. Many of these have given rise to lengthened controversies among bibliographers, the substance of which will be found in Dibdin’s “Introduction to the Classics,” Lond. 1827. Among the almost countless editions which have appeared since the end of the 15th century, it is sufficient to specify those of Heusinger, Brunswick, 8vo., 1783, which first presented a really pure text and has repeatedly reprinted; of Gernhard, Leipzig, 8vo., 1811; and of Beier, 2 vols. 8vo., Leipzig, 1829-30, which may be considered as the best.

Literature:—A. Buschel, Ethica Cicorontinae

Libri II., Hamb. 1610; R. G. Reth, Cicero de Officiis in trovi conspectu, Hall. 1803; Thorbecke, Princip. phil. mor. s Ciceroonis Op., Leyden, 1817; and the remarks which accompany the translation of Garve, of which a sixth edition was published at Breslau in 1819.

2. De Virtutibus.

This work, if it ever existed, which is far from being certain, must have been intended as a sort of supplement to the De Officiis, just as Aristotle added a treatise, rei operis, to his Ethica. (Hieron. Zechae. Prophet. Comment. i. 2; Chrysost. ii. p. 186.)

5. Cato Major et De Senectute.

This little tract, drawn up at the end of b. c. 45 or the commencement of b. c. 44, for the purpose of pointing out how the burden of old age may be most easily supported, is addressed to Atticus, who was now in his sixty-eighth year, while Cicero himself was in his sixty-second or sixty-third. It was written from Puteoli on the 11th of May, b. c. 44 (ad Att. xiv. 21, comp. xvii. 11), and is there spoken of as already in the hands of his friend. In the short introductory dialogue, Scipio Aemilius and Lucilius are supposed to have paid a visit during the consulship of T. Quinctius Flamininus and M. Aelius Balbus (b. c. 160; see c. 5 and 10) to Cato the censor, at that time 84 years old. Beholding with admiration the activity of body and cheerfulness of mind which he displayed, they request him to point out by what means the weight of increasing years may be most easily borne. Cato willingly complies, and commences a dissertation in which he seeks to demonstrate how unreasonable are the complaints usually urged regarding the miseries which attend the close of a protracted life. The four principal objections are stated and refuted in regular succession. It is held that old age is wretched, 1. Because it incapacitates men for active business; 2. Because it renders the body feeble; 3. Because it deprives them of the enjoyment of almost all pleasures; 4. Because it heralds the near approach of death. The first three are met by producing examples of many illustrious persons whom old age was not attended by any of these evils, by arguing that such privations are not real but imaginary misfortunes, and that if the reliish for some pleasures is lost, other delights of a more desirable and substantial character are substituted. The fourth objection is encountered still more boldly, by an eloquent declaration that the chief happiness of old age in the eyes of the philosopher arises from the conviction, that it indicates the near approach of death, that is, the near approach of the period when the soul shall be released from its debasing connexion with the body, and enter unfeathered upon the paths of immortality.

This piece has always been deservedly esteemed as one of the most graceful moral essays bequeathed to us by antiquity. The purity of the language, the liveliness of the illustrations, the dignity of the sentiments, and the turn with which the character of the strong-minded but self-satisfied and garrulous old man is maintained, have excited universal applause. But however pleasing the picture here presented to us, every one must perceive that it is a fancy sketch, not the faithful copy of a scene from nature. In fact the whole treatise is a tissue of special pleading on a question which is discussed in the same tone of extravagance on the opposite side by Juvenal in his tenth satire. The logic also is bad, for in several instances general propositions are attacked by a few specious particular cases which are mere exceptions to the rule. No one can doubt the truth of the assertions, that old age does incapacitate us for active business, that it does render the body feeble, and that it does blunt the keenness of our senses; but while it is a perfectly fair style of argument to maintain that these are imaginary and not real ills, it is utterly absurd to deny their existence, because history affords a few instances of favoured individuals who have been exempted from their influence.

Cicero appears to have been indebted for the idea, if not for the plan, of this work to Aristo of Chios, a Stoic philosopher (c. 1); much has been translated almost literally from the Republic of Plato (see cc. 2, 3, 14), and more freely from the Oeconomics and Cyropaedia of Xenophon. The passage with regard to the immortality of the soul is derived from the Timaeus, the Phaedon, the Phaedrus, and the Menon (see Kühner, p. 110), and some editors have traced the observations upon the diseases of young men (c. 19) to Hippocrates. It must be remarked, that although Cato was a rigid follower of the Porch, the doctrines here professed have little of the austerity of that sect, but savour more of the gentle and easy discipline of the Peripatetics. (Kühner, l. c.)

The five earliest editions of the Cato Major were all printed at Cologne, the first three by Ulric Zoll, the fourth by Winter de Hombrich, the fifth by Arnold Thierheomen, not one of which bears a date, but some of them are certainly older than the edition of the collected philosophical works printed at Rome, in 2 vols. fol., by Sweeneyhym and Parmarct, which contains the De Senectute. (See above, p. 719, b.) The best modern editions are those of Gernhard, Leipzig, 1828, and of Otto, Leipzig, 1830.

4. Laelius s. De Amicitia.

This dialogue was written after the preceding, to which it may be considered as forming a companion. Just as the dissertation upon old age was placed in the month of Cato because he had been distinguished for energy of mind and body preserved entire to the very close of a long life, so the steadfast attachment which existed between Scipio and Laelius pointed out the latter as a person peculiarly fitted to enlarge upon the advantages of friendship and the mode in which it might best be cultivated. To no one could Cicero dedicate such a treatise with more propriety than to Atticus, the only individual among his contemporaries to whom he gave his whole heart.

The imaginary conversation is supposed to have taken place between Laelius and his two sons-in-law, C. Fannius and Q. Mucius Scaevola, a few days after the death of Africenus (a. c. 120), and to have been repeated, in after times, by Scaevola to Cicero. Laelius begins by a panegyric on his friend. Then, at the request of the young men, he explains his own sentiments with regard to the origin, nature, limits, and value of friendship; traces its connexion with the higher moral virtues, and lays down the rules which ought to be observed in order to render it permanent and mutually advantageous. The most pleasing feature in this essay is the simple sincerity with which it is impressed. The author casts aside the affectation of learning, and the reader feels convinced throughout that he is speaking from his heart. In giving full expression to the most amiable feelings, his experience, knowledge of human nature, and sound sense, enabled him to avoid all fantastic exaggeration, and, without sacrificing his dignified tone, or pitching his standard too low, he brings down the subject to the level of ordinary comprehension, and sets before us a model which all may imitate. The last chapter is given to the Theneeetus, and in the 8th chapter we detect a correspondence with a passage in the Lysis of Plato; the Ethics of Aristotle, and the Memorabilia of Socrates by Xenophon afforded some suggestions; a strong resemblance can be traced in the fragments of Theophrastus περὶ φιλίας, and some hints are supposed to have been taken from Chrysippus περὶ φιλίας and περὶ τοῦ διάδραµου. (Kühner, p. 118.)

5. De Gloria Libri II.

Cicero completed a work under the above title, in two books dedicated to Atticus, on the 4th of June, b. c. 44. A few words only having been preserved, we have no means of determining the manner or tone in which the subject was handled. Petrarch was in possession of a MS. of the De Gloria, which afterwards passed into the hands of Bernardo Giustiniani, a Venetian, and then disappeared. Paulus Manutius and Jovius circulated a story that it had been destroyed by Petrus Alcoynius, who had stolen numerous passages and inserted them in his own treatise De Eustò; but this calumny has been refuted by Tironboschi in his history of Italian literature. (See Orelli's Cicero, vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 487; Cic. de Off. II. 9, &c. Att. xv. 27, xxv. 2.)

This treatise was written b. c. 43, soon after the death of his beloved daughter, Tullia, when seeking distraction and relief in literary pursuits. We learn from Pliny (praef. H. N.), that the work of Cantor the Academician was closely followed. A few inconsiderable fragments have been preserved chiefly by Lactantium, and will be found in Orelli's Cicero, vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 489. The tract published at Venice in 1583 under the title Consolatio Cicero-rum is a notorious forgery, executed, as is generally believed, by Signorius or Vianus. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 20, 23; Tuscul. iii. 28, 31; Augustin, de Civ. Dei, xix. 4; Hieron. Epist. Napol.)

D. SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY.

1. Academiconorum Libri II.

The history of this work before it finally quitted the hands of its author is exceedingly curious and somewhat obscure, but must be clearly understood before we can explain the relative position of those portions of it which have been transmitted to modern times. By comparing carefully a series of letters written to Atticus in the course of B.C. 45 (ad Att. xiii. 32, 12-14, 16, 18, 19, 21-23, 25, 35, 44), we find that Cicero had drawn up a treatise upon the Academic Philosophy in the form of a dialogue between Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius, and that it was composed in two books, the first bearing the name of Catulus, the second that of Lucullus. A copy was sent to Atticus, and soon after it had reached him, two new introductions were composed, the one in praise of Catulus, the other in praise of Lucullus. Scarcely had this been done, when Cicero, from a conviction that Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius, although men of highly cultivated minds, and well acquainted with general literature, were known to have been little conversant with the subtle arguments of abstruse philosophy, determined to withdraw them altogether, and accordingly substituted Cato and Brutus in their place. (Ad. Att. xiii. 16.) Immediately after this change had been introduced, he received a communication from Atticus representing that the new introductions were not sufficiently clear in the discussion of topics in which he was deeply versed. Thereupon, Cicero, catching eagerly at the idea thus suggested, resolved to recast the whole piece, and, quickly produced, under the old title, a new and highly improved edition, divided into four books instead of two, dedicating the whole to Varro, to whom was assigned the task of defending the tenets of Antiochus of Ascalon, while the author himself undertook to support the views of Philo, Atticus also taking a share in the conversation. But although these alterations were effected with great rapidity, the copy originally sent to Atticus had in the interval been carelessly transcribed; hence both editions passed into circulation, and a part of each has been preserved. One section, containing 12 chapters, is a short fragment of the first book of the second or Varroian edition; the other, containing 49 chapters, is the entire second book of the first edition, to which is prefixed the new introduction noticed above (ad Att. xiii. 32), together with the proper title of Lucullus. Thus it appears that the first book of the first edition has been altogether lost, and the whole of the second edition, with the exception of the fragment of the first book already mentioned and a few verses quoted by Lactantius, Augustin, and the grammarians. Upon examining the dates of the letters referred to, it will be seen that the first edition had been dispatched to Atticus about the middle of June, for the new introductions were written by the 27th (ad Att. xiii. 32); that the second edition, which is spoken of with great complacency— Libri quidem etiam extant (nisi forte manumis quaevis decipit ut in talibus genere apud Graecos quidem similis quidquidam—was fully completed towards the close of July (ad Att. xiii. 15), a few days before the last touches had been given to the De Fideibus (xiii. 19); and that it was actually in the possession of Varro before the ides of August, (xiii. 35, 44.) Goerz has taken great pains to prove that these books were published under the title of Academica, and that the appellation Academica Quaestiones, or Academica Disputationes, by which they are frequently distinguished, are without authority and altogether inappropriate. The object proposed was, to give an accurate narrative of the rise and progress of the Academic Philosophy, to point out the various modifications introduced by successive professors, and to demonstrate the superiority of the principles of the New Academy, as taught by Philo, over those of the Old Academy, as advocated by Antiochus of Ascalon. It is manifestly impossible, under existing circumstances, to determine with certainty the amount of difference between the two editions. That there was a considerable difference is certain, for, although Cicero was in the first instance induced to depart from his plan merely because he considered the topics discussed out of keeping with the character of the individuals who were represented as discussing them, still the division of the two books into four necessarily implies some important change in the arrangement if not in the substance of the subject-matter. We are, moreover, expressly informed, that many things were omitted, and that the four books of the second edition, although more concise than the two of the first, were at the same time better and more brilliant (splendidiora, breviora, meliora). It is probable that the first book of the first edition, after giving a sketch of the leading principles of the different branches of the Academy as they grew out of each other in succession, was occupied with a detailed investigation of the speculations of Carneades, just as those of Philo, which were adopted to a certain extent by Cicero himself, form the leading theme of the second. What remains of the first book of the second edition enables us to discover that it was devoted to the history of Academic opinions from the time of Socrates and Plato, who were regarded as the fathers of the sect, down to Antiochus, from whom Cicero himself had in his youth received instruction while residing at Athens. The second book may have been set apart for an inquiry into the theories of Arestias, who, although the real founder of the New Academy, appears to have been alluded to in the former edition only in an incidental and cursory manner; while the third and fourth books would embrace the full and clear development and illustration of his pregnant though obscure doctrines, as explained in the eloquent disquisitions of Carneades and Philo. Such is the opinion of Goerz, and although it does not admit of strict proof, yet it is highly plausible in itself, and is fully corroborated by the hints and indications which appear in those portions of the dialogue now extant.

The scene of the Catulus was the villa of that statesman at Cumae, while the Lucullus is supposed to have been held at the mansion of Hortensius near Baal. The dialogues of the second edition commence at the Cununum of Varro; but, as we learn from a fragment of the third book quoted by Norius Marcellus, the parties repaired during the course of the conference to the shores of the Lucrine lake.

The Edito Principe is included in the collection of Cicero's philosophical works printed in 2 vols. fol. by Swayneheim and Panmartz, Rome, 1471, see above, p. 719, b. The edition of Davis, Camb. 8vo. 1725, was frequently reprinted, and for a long period remained the standard, but is now superseded by those of Goerz, Leipzig, 8vo. 1816, forming the first volume of his edition of the philosophical works of Cicero; and that of Orelli, Zurich, 8vo. 1827.
2. De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum Libri V.

A series of dialogues dedicated to M. Brutus, in which the opinions of the Grecian schools, especially of the Epicureans, the Stoics, and the Peripatetics, on the Supreme Good, that is, the finis, object, or end, towards which all our thoughts, desires, and actions are or ought to be directed,—the kernel, as it were, of practical wisdom,—are expounded, compared, and discussed. The style is throughout perspicuous and highly polished; the doctrines of the different sects are stated with accurate impartiality according to the representations contained in accredited authorities; but, from the abstruse nature of many of the points investigated, and the subtlety of the arguments by which the different positions are defended, this treatise must be regarded as the most difficult, while it is the most perfect and finished, of all the philosophical performances of Cicero.

These conversations are not supposed to have been all held at the same period, nor in the same place, nor between the same parties. They agree in this, that, after the fashion of Aristotle (ad Att. viii, 19), the author throughout assumes the most prominent place, and that the rest of the actors, at least those to whom important parts are assigned, were dead at the time of publication—a precaution taken to avoid giving unburied to living men by exciting jealousy in reference to the characters which they are respectively represented as supporting (ἀντιδιάοντις, id fore pataverem, ad Att. l.), but the time, the scene, and the performers are twice changed. In the third and fourth books they are different from those in the first and second, and in the fifth from those in any of the preceding.

The first book opens with an apology for the study of philosophy; after which Cicero relates, for the information of Brutus, a debate which took place at his Cummiuni, in the presence of C. Valerius Triarius, between Cicero himself and L. Manlius Torquatus, who is represented as being praetor elect and just about to enter upon his office—a circumstance which fixes this imaginary colloquy to the close of the year B.C. 50, a date agreeing perfectly with the allusion (ii. 18) to the excessive power then wielded by Pompey. Cicero, being challenged by Torquatus to state his objections to the discipline of Epicurus, briefly impugns in general terms his system of physics, his imperfect logic, and, above all, the dogma that the Supreme Good is Pleasure, and the Supreme Evil, Pain. This elicits from Torquatus a lengthened explanation of the sentiments really entertained by Epicurus and the worthiest of his followers respecting ἐνδοξία, sentiments which he contended had been misunderstood and misrepresented, but whose truth he undertakes to demonstrate in a series of propositions; in opposition to which Cicero, in the second book, sets in array the reasons by which the Stoics assailed the whole system. In the third book we find ourselves in the library of young Lucullus in his Tusculan villa, to which Cicero had repaired for the purpose of consulting a work of Aristotle, and there meets Cato, immered in study and surrounded by the books of the Stoics. In this way a controversy arises, in which Cicero maintains, that there was no real discordance between the ethics of the Ptoch and those previously promulgated by the Old Academy and the Peripatetics; that the differences were merely verbal, and that Zeno had no excuse for breaking off from Plato and Aristotle, and establishing a new school, which presented the same truths in a worse form. These assertions are vigorously combated by Cato, who argues, that the principles of his sect were essentially distinct, and descents with great energy on the superior purity and majesty of their ideas concerning the Supreme Good; in reply to which Cicero, in the fourth book, employs the weapons with which the New Academy attacked the Stoics. The second discourse is supposed to have been held in n. c. 53, for we find a reference (iv. 1) to the famous proviso for limiting the length of speeches at the bar contained in a law passed by Pompey against bribery in his second consulship, an enactment here spoken of as having recently come into force. This was the year also in which L. Lucullus the elder died and left his son under the guardianship of Cato.

In the fifth book we are carried back to n. c. 79 and transported from Italy to Athens, where Cicero was then engaged in executing his study (see above, p. 709, b. 1). The dramatic personae are Cicero himself, his brother Quintus, his cousin Lucius, Pompeius Atticus, and M. Pupius Piso. These friends having met in the Academia, the genius of the place calls up the recollection of the mighty spirits who had once trod that holy ground, and Piso, at the request of his companion, enters into a full exposition of the precepts inculcated by Aristotle and his successors on the Sumnum Bonum, the whole being wound up by a statement on the part of Cicero of the objections of the Stoics, and a reply from Piso. The reason which induced Cicero to carry this last dialogue back to the remote days was the difficulty he experienced in finding a fitting advocate for the Peripatetic doctrines, which had made but little progress among his countrymen. M. Brutus and Terentius Varro were both alive, and therefore excluded by his plan; L. Lucullus, although dead, was not of sufficient weight to be introduced with propriety on such an occasion; Piso alone remained, but in consequence of the quarrel between Cicero and himself arising out of his support of Clodius, it was necessary to choose an epoch when their friendship was not yet unshaken. (See Gowen, Intro. xiv.) It will be observed that throughout, the author abstains entirely from pronouncing any judgment of his own. The opinions of the Epicureans are first distinctly explained, then follows the refutation by the Stoics; the opinions of the Stoics are next explained, then follows the refutation by the New Academy; in the third place, the opinions of the Peripatetics are explained, then follows the refutation by the Stoics. In setting forth the opinions of Epicurus, in addition to the writings of that sage enumerated by Diogenes Laërtius, much use seems to have been made of his epistle to Menoeceus and his περὶ καίρων δογμῶν, and not unfrequently the very words of the original Greek have been literally translated; while the lectures of Phaedrus and Zeno [see above, p. 709] would supply accurate information as to the changes and additions introduced by the successive disciples of the Garden after the death of their master. The Stoical refutation of Epicurus, in book second, was probably derived from Chrysipus περὶ τῶν καλῶν καὶ τῆς προσέγγισεν and from the writings and oral communications of Posidonius [see above, p. 708, b.]; the Stoical doctrines in book third were taken from Zeno, from Diogenes, and from Chrysippus ἡ τέκας; the relation of the Stoics in book fourth probably proceeds from Carneades. The Peripatetic doctrines in book fifth are from Aristotle and Theophrastus, as explained and enlarged by Antiochus of Ascalon; while the Stoical objections are in all probability due to Diogenes [see above p. 709, n.1], who, we are told elsewhere, was strongly opposed to Antiochus. (Acad. ii. 36.)

In determining the precise date at which the work before us was completed and published, we cannot agree with Goernz, that the expression "due magnā συντρήσαμα amplissimā" (ad Att. xii. 45, 11th June, B.C. 45) can with certainty be made to comprehend both the De Finibus and the Academica. No distinct notice of the former occurs until the 27th of June, when, in a letter to Atticus, (xiii. 32) we find "Torquentus Romae est. Missi ut tibi dantur," where Torquentus denotes the first book. On the 24th of July (ad Att. xiii. 12), the treatise is spoken of as finished. "Nunc illam τελῶν οὐπόλου, sane mihi probatam, Bruto, ut tibi placiat, desipierimus." Again, on the 30th of the same month, "Ita confeci quodque libros τελῶν, ut Epicurea L. Torquato, Stoica M. Catoni, περισσαμενι M. Fisoni daram. "Vide (ad Att. xii. 21, 13th September) "ut ille decesserit" (ad Att. xiii. 19); and we learn from an epistle, dispatched only two days afterwards (ad Att. xiii. 21, comp. 22), that it had been for some time in the hands of Atticus, through whom Balbus had obtained a copy of the fifth book, while the widow Caerella, in her philosophic zeal, had contrived by some means to get possession of the whole. Cicero complains of this for two reasons; first, because it was but fitting that since the work was dedicated to Brutus it should be presented to him before it became trite and stale, and in the second place, because he had made some changes in the last book; which he was desirous to insert before finally dismissing it from his hands. It is not unlikely that the formal presentation to Brutus took place about the middle of August, when he paid a visit to Cicero at his Tusculumum (ad Att. xiii. 44), and that two editions of the fifth book, differing in some respects from each other, may have gone abroad, which will account for some singular variations and interpolations which have long exercised the ingenuity of editors. (See Goernz, praef. p. xiv.)

The Edito Princeps in 4to. is without date, name of place or printer, but is believed to have appeared at Cologne, from the press of Ulric Zell, about 1467, and was followed by the edition of Joannes ex Colonii, 4to., Venice, 1471. The edition of Davis, 8vo., Cambridge, 1728, was long held in high estimation, and frequently reprinted, but is now superseded by those of Rath, Hal. Sax. 8vo., 1804; of Goernz, Leipz. 1813, 8vo., forming the third volume of the collected philosophical works; of Otto, Leipz. 8vo., 1831; and, last and best of all, of Madvig, Copenhagen, 1839, 8vo.

3. Tusculanum Disputationem Libri V.

This work, addressed to M. Brutus, is a series of discussions on various important points of practical philosophy supposed to have been held in the Tusculumum of Cicero, who, on a certain occasion, soon after the departure of Brutus for the government of Gaul (s. c. 46), requested one of the numerous circles of friends and visitors by whom 1 he was surrounded, to propose some subject for debate; which being accomplished he was to examine as he best walked about. These exercises were continued for five days, a new topic being started and exhausted at each successive conference. There is an utter want of dramatic effect in this collection of dialogues, for the antagonist is throughout anonymous, and is not invested with any life or individuality, but is a sort of a man of straw who brings forward a succession of propositions which are bowled down by Cicero as fast as they are set up. This personage is usually designated in MSS. by the letter λ, and editors have amused themselves by quarrelling about the import of the symbol which they have variously interpreted to mean Antiochus, Auditor, and so forth. There is little room for doubt as to the period when this work was actually composed, since it abounds in allusions to historical events and to former treatises which enable us, when taken in connexion with other circumstances, to determine the question within very narrow limits. Thus, in the eleventh chapter of the fifth book, we have a reference to the De Finibus which was not published until the month of August, B.C. 45, while the dissertations before us were familiarly known before the middle of May in the following year. The conversations on which this work have been given to the world early in B.C. 44, since the task appears to have been undertaken just at the time when the Academica were completed (ad Att. xiii. 32). Schütz (Proleg.) has satisfactorily proved that Tusculana Disputationes is the true title, and not Tusculana Questiones as a few MSS. have it.

The first book treats of the wisdom of desiring death which, it is maintained, cannot be considered as an evil either to the living or to the dead, whether the soul be mortal or immortal. This leads to an investigation of the real nature of death, and a review of the opinions entertained by different philosophers with regard to the soul. The arguments for its immortality are derived chiefly from the writings of the Stoics and of Plato, especially from the Phaedon.

The second book is on the endurance of pain, in which it is demonstrated, after Zeno, Aristo, and Pyrrho, that pain is not an evil, in opposition to Aristippus and Epicurus, who held it to be the greatest evil, to Hieronymus of Rhodes, who placed the chief good in the absence of pain, and to the numerous band of philosophers, belonging to different schools, who agreed that pain was an evil, although not the greatest of evils. Here everything is taken from the Stoics.

In the third book it is proved that a wise man is insensible to sorrow; and the doctrines of the Peripatetics, of Epicurus, of the Cyrenaeics, and of Crantor, being examined in turn, and weighed against: the tenets of Zeno, are found wanting. The authorities chiefly consulted appear to have been Chrysippus, Cleaneuthus, Cleocathamus, Antiochus of Ascalon, Carneades, and Epicurus ἡ τέκας.

The thesis supported in the fourth book, which forms a conclusion to the preceding, is, that the wise man is absolutely free from all mental disquietude (mania perturbationis). We have here a curious classification of perturbations in which the terms sorrow, joy, fear, pity, and a host of others, are carefully analysed and defined according to the discipline of the Porch; and, after a few remarks upon the main proposition, we find a long essay on Six favourite Paradoxes of the Stoics explained in familiar language, defended by popular arguments, and illustrated occasionally by examples, derived from contemporary history, by which means they are made the vehicles for covert attacks upon Crassus, Horticouius, and Lucullus, and for vehement declaration against Clodius. This must not be viewed as a serious work, or one which the author viewed in any other light than that of a mere jeu d’esprit ("Ego vero, ulla ipse, quae vix in gymnaisi et in otho Stoici probant, ludum con- cesso in communis loco, profici"); for the propositions are mere philosophical quibbles, and the arguments by which they are supported are palpably unsatisfactory and illogical, resolving themselves into a juggle with words, or into induction resting upon one or two particular cases. The theorems enunciated for demonstration are, 1. That which is morally fair (τὸ καθόρο) is alone good (δυναιτείω). 2. Virtue alone is requisite to secure happiness. 3. Good and evil deeds admit of no degrees, i. e. all crimes are equally heinous, all virtuous actions equally meritorious. 4. Every fool is a madman. 5. The wise man alone is free, and therefore every man not wise is a slave. 6. The wise man alone is rich.

The Preface, which is addressed to M. Brutus, must have been written early in n. c. 46, for Cato is spoken of in such terms that we cannot doubt that he was still alive, or at all events that intelligence of his fate had not yet reached Italy, and there is also a distinct allusion to the De Claris Oratoribus as already published. But although the offering now presented is called a "parvum opusculum," the result of studies prosecuted during the shorter nights which followed the long watches in which the Brutus had been prepared, it is equally certain that the fourth paradox bears decisive evidence of having been composed before the death of Clodius (n. c. 52), and the sixth before the death of Crassus (n. c. 53). Hence we must conclude that Cicero, soon after his arrival at Rome from Brundusium, amused himself by adding to a series of rhetorical tripies commenced some years before, and then despatched the entire collection to his friends.

The Edito Principes of the Paradox was printed along with the De Officiis, by Fust and Schoffer, at Mayence, 4to, 1465, and reprinted at the same place by Fust and Gernheim, fol., 1466. They were published along with the De Officiis, De Amicitia, and De Senectute, by Swynheym and Pannartz, 4to, Rome, 1469; and the same, with the addition of the Somnium Scipionis, by Vindelin de Spirin, Venice, 4to, 1470; besides which there are a very great number of other editions belonging to the 15th century. The most useful editions are those of Wetzel, 8vo, Lignitz, 1808, and of Gernhard, 8vo, Leipzig, 1819, the former containing also the De Senectute and the De Amicitia, the latter the De Senectute. The Paradoxes were published separately by Borgers, 8vo, Leyden, 1826.

A dialogue in praise of philosophy, drawn up for the purpose of recommending such pursuits to the Romans. Hortensius was represented as deprecating the study and asserting the superior claims of eloquence; his arguments were combated 3 b by Q. Latatius Catulus, L. Licinius Lucullus, Balbus the Stoic, Cicero himself, and perhaps other personages. The work was composed and published B. C. 45, immediately before the Academics, but the imaginary conversation must have been supposed to have been held at some period earlier than B. C. 60, the year in which Catulus died. A considerable number of unimportant fragments have been preserved by St. Augustin, whose ad- ministration is expressed in language profoundly hyperbolical, and by the grammarians. These have been carefully collected and arranged by Nobbe, and are given in Orelli's Cicero, vol. iv. pt. ii. pp. 479—486. (Cic. de Divin. ii. 1, Tusc. ii. 2.)

6. Timaeus s. De Universo.
We possess a fragment of a translation of Plato's Timaeus, executed after the completion of the Academics, as we learn from the proemium. It extends from p. 22, ed. Bekker, with occasional blanks as far as p. 54, and affords a curious spec- men of the careless and inaccurate style in which Cicero was wont to represent the meaning of his Greek originals. It was first printed in the edition of Suetonius and Pannartz, 1471, and with a commentary by G. Vallo, at Venice, in 1485. It is given in Orelli's Cicero, vol. iv. pt. ii. pp. 495 — 513.

7. Protagoras ex Platonis.
A translation of the Protagoras of Plato into Latin. At what period this was executed we cannot determine, but it is generally believed to have been an exercise undertaken in early youth. A few words seem to have been preserved by Priscian on Do- natus, which were found in Orelli's Cicero, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 477. (Comp. Cic. de Off. ii. 24; Quintil. x. 5. § 2.)

E. THEOLOGY.
1. De Natura Deorum Libri III.
Three dialogues dedicated to M. Brutus, in which the speculations of the Epicureans and the Stoics on the existence, attributes, and providence of a Divine Being are fully stated and discussed at length, the debate being illustrated and diversified by frequent references to the opinions entertained upon these topics by the most celebrated philoso- phers. The number of sects and of individuals enumerated is so great, and the field of philosophic research thrown open is so wide, that we can scarcely believe that Cicero could have had recourse to original sources for the whole mass of information which he lavishes so profusely on his subject, but must conclude that he made use of some useful manual or compendium as a worklessic compiled by the preceptors of those days for the use of their pupils, containing a view of the tenets of different schools presented in a condensed form. Be that as it may, in no production do we more admire the vigorous understanding and varied learning of the author, in none does he display a greater command over appropriate language, in none are liveliness and grace more happily blended with head arrangement and brilliant eloquence. Although the materials may have been collected by degrees, they were certainly moulded into shape with extraordinary facility, for we know that this work was published immediately after the Tusculan Disputations, and immediately before the De Divinatione (de Div. ii. 1), and that the whole three appeared in the early part of B. C. 44. The imaginary conversation is supposed to have been held in the presence of Cicero, somewhere about the year B. C. 76, at the house of C. Aurelius Cotta, the pontifex maximus (consul B. C. 75), who well sustains the part of a New Academician, attacking and overthrowing the doctrines of others without advancing any dogma of his own, while the discipline of the Peripatetic, mixed up however with much that belongs rather to Plato and Aristotel, is developed with great earnestness and power by Q. Licinius Balbus, the pupil of Pomatius, and the doctrines of the Garden are playfully supported by Velleius (trib. pleb. B. C. 90), who occupies himself more in ridiculing the speculations of different schools than in any laboured defence of those espoused by himself. Accordingly, in the first book he opens with an attack upon Plato and the Stoics; he then adverts briefly to the theories of no less than 27 of the most famous philosophers, commencing with Thales of Miletus and ending with Diogenes of Babylon, characterising them, in many cases not unjustly, as little superior to the dreams of madmen, the fables of poets, or the superstitions of the vulgar. Passing on from this motley crowd of Epicureans, he pronounces him worthy of all praise, first, because he alone placed the argument for the existence of gods upon its proper and only firm basis,—the belief implanted by nature in the hearts of all mankind; secondly, because he assigned to them their real attributes, happiness, immortality, apathy; representing them as dwelling within themselves, susceptible of neither pleasure nor pain from without, bestowing no benefits and inflicting no evils on men, but fit objects of honour and worship on account of their essential excellence, a series of propositions which are carefully elucidated by an inquiry into the form, the mode of existence, and the mental constitution of divine beings. Cotta now comes forward, takes up each point in succession, and overturns the whole fabric piecemeal. He first proves that the reasons assigned by Epicurus for the existence of gods are utterly inadequate; secondly, that, granting their existence, nothing can be less dignified than the form and attributes ascribed to them; and thirdly, granting these forms and qualities, nothing more absurd than that men should render homage or feel gratitude to those from whom they have not received and do not hope to receive any benefits.

The second book contains an investigation of the question by Balbus, according to the principles of the Stoics, who divided the subject into four heads. 1. The existence of gods. 2. The characteristics of the world. 3. Their watchful care of human affairs (providence), which is in reality included under the third head. The existence of gods is advocated chiefly a. From the universal belief of mankind; b. From the well-authenticated accounts of their appearances upon earth; c. From prophecies, presentiments, omens, and auguries; d. From the evident proofs of de- sign, and of the adaptation of means to a beneficent end, everywhere visible in the arrangements of the material world; e. From the nature of man himself and his mental constitution; f. From certain phys- ical considerations which tend clearly and unequivocally to the establishment of a system of pantheism, the introduction of which is somewhat curious in this place, since, if admitted, it would at once destroy all the preceding arguments; p. From the gradual upward progression in the works of creation, from plants to animals and from the lower animals to man, which leads us to infer that the series ascends from man to beings absolutely perfect. In treating of the nature of the gods, the pantheistic principle is again broadly asserted,—God is the Universe and the Universe is God,—whence is derived the conclusion that the Deity must be spherical in form, because the sphere is the most perfect of figures. But while the Universe is God as a whole, it contains within its parts many gods, among the number of whom are the heavenly bodies. Then follows a curious digression on the origin of the Greek and Roman Pantheon, and on the causes which led men to commit the folly of picturing to themselves gods differing in shape, in age, and in apparel; of assigning to them the relationships of domestic life, and of ascribing to them the desires and passions by which mortals are agitated. Lastly, the government and providence of the gods is deduced from three considerations: (a) From their existence, which being granted, it necessarily follows, that they must rule the world. (b) From the admitted truth that all things are subject to the laws of Nature; but Nature, when properly defined and understood, is another name for God. (c) From the beauty, harmony, wisdom, and benevolence, manifested in the works of creation. This last section is handled with great skill and effect; the absurdity of the doctrine which taught that the world was produced by a fortuitous concourse of atoms is forcibly exposed, while the arguments derived from astronomy, from the structure of plants, of fishes, of terrestrial animals, and of the human frame, form a most interesting essay on natural theology. The whole is wound up by demonstrating that all things survivable to man were made for his use, and that the Deity watches over the safety and welfare, not only of the whole human race collectively, but of every individual member of the family.

In the third book Cotta resumes the discourse for the purpose not of absolutely demolishing what has been advanced by Balbus, but of setting forth, after the fashion of the Sceptics, that the reasonings employed by the last speaker were unsatisfactory and not calculated to produce conviction. In following his course over the different divisions in order, we find two remarkable blanks in the text. By the first we lose the criticism upon the evidence for the visible appearances of the gods on earth; the second leaves us in ignorance of the doubts cast upon the belief of a general resurrection. We have no means of discovering how these deficiencies arose; but it has been conjectured, that the chapters were omitted by some early Christian transcriber, who conceived that they might be quoted for a special purpose by the enemies of revealed religion.

The authorities followed in these books, in so far as they can be ascertained, appear to have been, for the Epicurean doctrines, the numerous works of Epicurus himself, whose very words are sometimes quoted, and the lectures of his distinguished follower Zeno, which Cicero had attended while residing at Athens; in the development of the Stoic principles much was derived from Cleanthes, from Chrysippus, from Antipater of Tarsus, and from Posidonius ὕποθεσα, while in the discussion and subtle logic of Cotta we may unquestionably trace the master-spirit of Carneades as represented in the writings of his disciple Cletius-machus. (Kühner, p. 98.)

The Epitome Principes is included in the collection of the philosophical works of Cicero printed by Svezynheyrn and Pannartz, in 2 vols. fol., Rome, 1471. [See above, p. 719, b.]. The edition of Davis, Camb. 8vo., 1718, long held the first place, and has been often reprinted; but that of Moter and Crenner, 8vo., Leipzig, 1818, must now be regarded as the best. The pretended 4th book published by Sarphatus at Bologna, 8vo., 1811, is an absurd forgery, if indeed the author ever intended or hoped to deceive, which seems doubtful.

2. De Divinatione Libri II.

This is intended as a continuation of the preceding work, out of which the inquiry naturally springs. We are here presented with an exposition of the conflicting opinions of the Porch and the Academy upon the reality of the science of divination, and the degree of confidence which ought to be reposed in its professors. In the first book the doctrines of the Stoics are defended by Q. Cicero, who begins by dividing divination into two branches. 1. The division of Nature. 2. The divination of Art. To the first belong dreams, inward presages, and presentiments, and the ecstatic frenzy, during which the mind inspired by a god discerns the secrets of the future, and pours forth its conceptions in prophetic words; in the second are comprehended the indications yielded by the entrails of the slaughtered victim, by the flight, the cries, and the feeding of birds, by thunder and lightning, by lots, by astrology, and by all those strange sights and sounds which were regarded as the shadows cast before by coming events. A cloud of examples is brought to establish the certainty of each of the various methods, cases of failure being explained away by supposing an error in the interpretation of the divination, while the truth of the general principles is confirmed by an appeal to the concurring belief of philosophers, poets, and mankind at large. Hence Quintus maintains, that we are justified in concluding that the future is revealed to us both from within and from without, and that the information proceeds from the Gods, from Fate, or from Nature; having, however, previously insisted that he was not bound to explain how each circumstance came to pass, it being sufficient for his purpose if he could prove that it actually did come to pass.

In the second book Cicero himself brings forward the arguments of Carneades, who held that divination was altogether a delusion, and that the knowledge which it pretends to convey, if real, would be a curse rather than a blessing to men. He then proceeds to confute each of the propositions emunctated by his antagonist, and winds up by urging the necessity of upholding and extending the influence of true religion, and of waging a vigorous war in every quarter against superstition under every form.

Although many modern writers may be and probably are quite correct in their assertion, that the whole religious system of the Romans was a mere engine of government, that it was a deliberate cheat, in which men of education were the deceivers and the ignorant populace the dupes, yet we have no right in the present instance, and the 3 n 2 same remark extends to all the philosophical writings, to pronounce that the reasonsings employed by Cicero are to be taken as the expression of his own views. Here and elsewhere he always carefully guards himself against such an imputation; his avowed object in every matter of controversy was merely to assist the judgment of the reader by stating fairly the strong points upon both sides of the question, scrupulously leaving the inference to be drawn by each individual, according to the impression produced. In the piece before us whatever may have been the private convictions of the author, it would have been little seemly in a member of that august college whose duty to the state consisted in presiding over and regulating augury to declare openly, that the whole of the discipline which he was required to enforce was a tissue of fraud and imposture; and Cicero above all others was the last man to be guilty of such a breach of public decency.

The scene of the conversation is the Lyceum in the Tusculanum of Cicero. The tract was composed after the death of Cæsar, for that event is spoken of in the course of the debate.

Cicero appears to have consulted Chrysippus, who wrote several works upon this subject, especially a book entitled περὶ χρυσίμων, to have availed himself of the labours of Posidonius and Diogenes of Babylon περὶ μαντικῆς, and to have derived some assistance from Cratippus, Antipater, Plato, and Aristotle. In the second book he avowedly followed Carneades, and there is a reference (ii. 47) to Pannæus also. (See Kühner, p. 100.)

The Edito Principe is included in the collection of Cicero's philosophical works, printed in 2 voll. fol. by Sweeneyhym and Pannartz, Rome, 1471. The edition of Davis, Camb. 8vo, 1721, containing the De Fato also, was for a long period the standard, but has now given way to that of Rath, Hal. 8vo, 1807, and especially to that superintended by Crenzer, Kayser, and Moser, 8vo, Frankf. 1828, which is superior to every other.

A dialogue to complete the series upon speculative theology, of which the De Natura Deorum and the De Divinazione form the first two parts. (De Divin. ii. 1.) It is a confused and mutilated fragment on the subject of all others the most perplexing to unaided reason, the doctrine of predetermination and its compatibility with free-will. The beginning and the end are wanting, and one if not more chaumas break the continuity of what remains. We find it generally stated that the work consisted of two books, and that the whole or the greater part of what is preserved belongs to the second; but there is no evidence whatever to prove in what manner it was originally divided, nor do we know whether it was ever finished, although, judging from the careless style of the composition, we are led to infer that the author left his task incomplete. It would appear to have contained, or to have been intended to contain, a review of the opinions held by the chief philosophic sects upon Fate, or Destiny, the most prominent place being assigned to the Stoics—who maintained that Fate, or Destiny, was the great ruling power of the Universe, the θέρας or anima mundi, in other words, the Divine Essence from which all impulses were derived—and to the Academicians, who conceived that the movements of the mind were voluntary, and independent of, or at least not necessarily subject to, external controul. The scene of conversation is the Puteolanum of Cicero, where he spent the months of April and May after the death of Cæsar, the speakers being Cicero himself, and Hirtius, at that time consul.

The De Fato has generally been published along with the De Divinazione; all the editions of the latter, mentioned above contain it, and the same remark applies.

Chrysias quotes three words from a work of Cicero under the former title, Servius refers apparently to the same under the latter designation. We know nothing more upon the subject. (Chrysias, i. p. 98, comp. p. 112; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. v. 737.)

2. Speeches.

In oratory Cicero held a position very different from that which he occupied in relation to philosophy, whether we consider the amount of exertion and toil bestowed on each pursuit respectively, or the obstacles external and internal which impeded his advancement. Philosophy was originally viewed by him merely as an instrument which might prove useful in fabricating weapons for the strife of the bar, and in bestowing a more graceful form on his compositions. Even after he had learned to prize more fully the study of mental science, it was regarded simply as an intellectual pastime. But the cultivation of eloquence constituted the main business of his whole life. It was by the aid of eloquence alone that he could hope to emerge from obscurity, and to rise to wealth and honour. Upon eloquence, therefore, all his energies were concentrated, and eloquence must be held as the most perfect fruit of his talents.

Cicero was peculiarly fortunate in flourishing during the only epoch in the history of his country which could have witnessed the full development of his intellectual strength; had he lived fifty years earlier public taste would not have been sufficiently refined to appreciate his accomplishments, fifty years later the motive for exertion would have ceased to exist. In estimating the degree of excellence to which Cicero attained, we must by no means confine ourselves, as in the case of the philosophical works, to a critical examination of the speeches in reference to the matter which they contain, and the style in which they are expressed, for in an art so eminently practical the result gained is the most important element in the perfection. Even had the orations which have come down to us appeared poor and spiritless, we should nevertheless have been justified in concluding, that the man who unquestionably obtained a mastery over the minds of his hearers, and who worked his way to the first offices of state by the aid of eloquence alone, must have been a great orator; while, on the other hand, we could not have pronounced such an opinion with confidence from a mere perusal of his orations, however perfect they may appear as writings, unless we possessed the assurance, that they were always suited to the ears of those who listened to them, and generally produced the effect desired. This being premised, we may very briefly glance at the merits of these works as literary compo-
CICERO.

...tions, and then consider their characteristics with reference to the class to which they severally belong, and the audiences to whom they were addressed; as deliberative or judicial; delivered in the senate, from the rostra, or before the tribunal of a judge.

Every one must at once be struck by the absolute command which Cicero had over the resources of his native tongue. His words seem to gush forth without an effort in an ample stream; and the sustained dignity of his phraseology is preserved from pompous stiffness by the lively saliety of a ready wit and a vivid imagination, while the happy variety which he communicated to his themes is in no way diminished but it would appear that Cicero was remarkably fortunate in procuring the acquittal of those whose cause he supported, and, except in the instance of Verres, he scarcely ever appeared as an accuser. The courts of justice were the scene of all his earliest triumphs; his devotion to his clients alone won for him that popularity to which he owed his elevation; he never was seen upon the rostra until he had attained the rank of praetor, and there is no record of any humbug in the senate until two years later. We have some difficulty in deciding the precise amount of praise to be awarded to him in this branch of his profession, but it would appear that Cicero was generally on both sides of the case. We know not how much is a masterly elucidation, how much a clever perversion of the truth. The evidence is not before us; we see points which were placed in prominent relief, but we are unable to discover the facts which were quietly kept out of view, and which may have been all-important. What we chiefly admire in these pleadings is the well-concealed art with which he tells his story. There is a sort of graceful simplicity which hails suspicion to sleep; the circumstances appear so plain, and so natural, that we are induced to follow with confidence the guidance of the orator, who is probably all the while leading us aside from the truth.

Although the criterion of success must be applied with caution to the two classes of oratory we have just reviewed, it may be employed without hesitation to all dealings with popular assemblies. We must admit that that man must be one of the greatest of orators who will boldly oppose the prejudices and passions of the vulgar, and, by the force of his eloquence, will induce them to abandon their most cherished projects. This Cicero frequently did. We pass over his oration for the Manilian law, for here he had the people completely on his side; but when, two years afterwards, he came forward to oppose the Agrarian law of the tribune Rullus, he had to struggle with the prejudices, interests, and passions of the people. The two speeches delivered on this occasion have come down to us, and are triumphs of art. Nothing can be more dexterous than the feat with which he identifies himself with his hearers, reminds them that he was the creature of their bounty, then hails all suspicion to sleep by a warm eulogy on the Gracchi, declares that he was far from being opposed to the principle of such measures, although strongly opposed to the present enactment, which was in fact a disguised plot against their liberties, and then cunningly taking advantage of some inadver- tence in the wording of the law, contrives to kindle their indignation by representing it as a studied insult to their favourite Pompey, and through him to them.
selves. Not less remarkable is the ingenuity with which, in the second address, he turns the tables upon his adversary, who had sought to excite the multitude by accusing Cicero of being a supporter of Sulla, and demonstrates that Rullus was the real partisan of the late dictator, since certain clauses in the new resolution would have the effect of ratifying some of his most obnoxious acts. The defenders of the scheme were forced to abandon their design, and left the consular master of the field, who boasted not unreasonably, that no one had ever carried a popular assembly more completely with him when arguing in favour of an Agrarian law, than he had done while denouncing against it. His last exhibition was, if possible, still more marvellous. The love of public amusements which has always formed a strong feature in the Italian character, had gradually become an engrossing passion with the Romans. At first the spectators in the theatres occupied the seats without distinction of rank or fortune. The elder Scipio, however, introduced an ordinance by which the front benches in the orchestras were reserved for the senate; but, notwithstanding the immense influence of Africamus, the innovation gave a heavy blow to his popularity. Accordingly, when Roscius Otho carried a law by which places immediately behind the senators were set apart for the equestrian order, the populace were rendered furious; and when Otho, not long after the new regulation was put in force, entered the theatre, he was greeted with a perfect storm of disapprobation. The knights on the other hand, showed every inclination to support their benefactor, both parties grew more violent, and a riot seemed inevitable, when Cicero entered, called upon the spectators to follow him to the area of a neighbouring temple, and there so wrought upon their feelings that they returned and joined heartily in doing honour to Otho. Such a victory needs no comment. The address is unhappily lost.

In order to avoid repetition, an account of each oration is given separately with the biography of the individual principally concerned. The following tables present a view of all the speeches whose titles have been preserved. As before, those which have totally perished are printed in italics; those to which two asterisks are prefixed survive only in a few mutilated fragments; those with one asterisk are imperfect, but enough is left to convey a clear idea of the work.

Oratio de Pace.]

The Edito Principes of the Orations is probably that printed in 1471 at Rome by Sweynheim and Pannartz, fol, under the inspection of Andrew, bishop of Aloria. Another edition was printed in the same year at Venice, by Valdarer; and a third at Venice, in 1473, by Amberta, both in folio; besides which there is a fourth, in very ancient characters, without date, name of place or printer, which many bibliographers believe to be the earliest of all. The most useful editions are those of Jo. Reigay, fol, Paris, 1586, containing a complete collection of all the commentaries which had appeared up to that date; of Graevius, 3 vols. in 6 parts, Amsterdam, 1695—1699, forming part of the series of Variorum Classics in Svo., and comprising among other addenda the notes of Mammarius and Lumbinius 1111; to which we may add that of Klotz, Leipzig, 1835, 3 vols. Svo., with excellent introductions and annotations in the German language. The best edition of each speech will be noticed when discussing the speech itself.

3. CORRESPONDENCE.

Cicero during the most important period of his life maintained a close correspondence with Atticus, and with a wide circle of literary and political friends and connexions. Copies of these letters do not seem to have been systematically preserved, and so late as b. c. 44 no regular collection had been formed, although Tiro was at that time in possession of about seventy, which he is supposed to have published with large additions after the death of his patron. (Ad Att. xvi. 5, comp. ad Fam. xvii. 17.) We now have in all upwards of eight hundred undoubtedly genuine, extending over a space of 26 years, and commonly arranged in the following manner:

1. "Epistolarum ad Familiares s. Epistolarum ad Diversas Libri XVI." titles which have been permitted to keep their ground, although the former conveys an inaccurate idea of the contents, and the latter is bad Latin. The volume contains a series of 426 epistles, commencing with a formal congratulation to Pompey on his success in the Mithridatic war, written in the course of b. c. 62, and terminating with a note to Cassius, detached about the beginning of July, b. c. 45, announcing that Lepidus had been declared a public enemy by the senate, in consequence of having gone over to Antony. They are not placed in chronological order, but those addressed to the same individuals, with their replies, where these exist, are grouped together without reference to the date of the rest. Thus the whole of those in the third book are addressed to Appius Pulcher, his predecessor in the government of Cilicia; those of the fourteenth to Terentius; those of the fifteenth to Tiro; those of the fourth to Sulpicius, Marcellus, and Figulus, with replies from the two former; while the whole of those in the eighth are from M. Caecilius Rufus, most of them transmitted to Cicero while in his province, containing full particulars of all the political and social gossip of the metropolis.

2. "Epistolarum ad T. Pomponium Atticon Libri XVI." A series of 396 epistles addressed to Atticus, of which eleven were written in the years b. c. 69, 67, 63, 62, the remainder after the end of b. c. 62, and the last in Nov. b. c. 44. (Ad Att. xvi. 15.) They are for the most part in chronological order, although discussions occur here and there. Occasionally, copies of letters received from or sent to others—from Caesar, Antony, Balbus, Hirtius, Oppius, to Dolabella, Plancus, &c., are included; and to the 16th of the last book no less than six are subjoined, to Plancus, Capito, and Cupienius.

3. "Epistolarum ad Q. Fratrem Libri III." A series of 29 epistles addressed to his brother, the first written in b. c. 59, while Quintus was still proprietor of Asia, containing an admirable summary of the duties and obligations of a provincial governor; the last towards the end of b. c. 54.

We find in most editions "Epistolarum ad Brutum Liber," a series of eighteen epistles all written after the death of Caesar, eleven from Cicero to Brutus, six from Brutus to Cicero, and one from Brutus to Atticus. To these are added eight more, first published by Cratander, five from Cicero to Brutus, three from Brutus to Cicero. The genuineness of these two books has proved a fruitful source of controversy, and the question cannot be said to be even now fully decided, although the majority of scholars incline to believe them spurious. [Brutus, No. 21.]

5. In addition to the above, collections of letters by Cicero are quoted by various authors and grammarians, but little has been preserved except the names. Thus we can trace that there must have once existed two books to Cornelius Nepos, three books to Caesar, three books to Pansa, nine books to Hirtius, eight books to M. Brutus, two books to young M. Cicero, more than one book to Calvus, more than one book to Q. Aulus, single letters to M. Titinius, to Cato, to Cæcullia, and, under the title of "Epistola ad Pompeium," a lengthened narrative of the events of his consularship. (Ascon. ad Orat. in Epist. c. 24, pro Sull. c. 24.)
CICERO.

Notwithstanding the manifold attractions offered by the other works of Cicero, we believe that the man of taste, the historian, the antiquary, and the student of human nature, would willingly resign them all rather than be deprived of the Epistles. Greece can furnish us with more profound philosophy, and with superior oratory; but the ancient world has left us nothing that could supply the place of these letters. Whether we regard them as mere specimens of style, at one time reflecting the conversational tone of familiar every-day life in its most graceful form, at another sparkling with wit, at another claiming applause as works of art belonging to the highest class, at another couched in all the stilt courtesy of diplomatic reserve, or whether we consider the ample materials, derived from the purest and most inaccessible sources, which they supply for a history of the Roman constitution during its last struggles, affording a deep insight into the personal dispositions and motives of the chief leaders,—or, finally, seek and find in them a complete key to the character of Cicero himself, unlocking as they do the most hidden secrets of his thoughts, revealing the whole man in all his greatness and all his meannesses,—their value is altogether inestimable. To attempt to give any idea of their contents would be to analyze each individually.

The Edito Princeps of the Epistolas ad Familias was printed in 1647, 4to., being the first work which issued from the press of Sweynheym and Pannartz at Rome. A second edition of it was published by these typographers in 1649, fol., under the inspection of Andrew of Acria, and two others were printed in the same year at Venice by Jo. de Spina.

Editions of the Epistolas ad Atticam, ad M. Brutum, ad Q. Fratrem, were printed in 1740 at Rome by Sweynheym and Pannartz, and at Venice by Nicol. Jenson, both in folio; they are taken from different MSS., and bibliographers cannot decide to which precedence is due. The first which exhibited a tolerable text was that of P. Victorinus, Florence, 1571, which follows the MS. copy made by Petrarca. The commentaries of P. Manutius attached to the Aldine of 1549, and frequently reprinted, are very valuable.

The most useful edition is that of Schultze, 6 vols. 8vo., Hal. 1809—12, containing the whole of the Epistles, except those to Brutus, arranged in chronological order and illustrated with explanatory notes. The student may add to these the translation into French of the letters to Atticus by Mongault, Paris, 1738, and into German of all the letters by Wieland, Zurich, 1808—1821, 7 vols. 8vo., and the work of Abeken, Cicero in seinen Briefen, Hanover, 1835.

4. POETICAL WORKS.

Cicero appears to have acquired a taste for poetical composition while prosecuting his studies under Archias. Most of his essays in this department of later years they must be regarded as exercises undertaken for improvement or amusement, and they certainly in no way increased his reputation.

1. Versus Homericus. Translations from Homer. (See de Fin. v. 18.) The lines which are found de Divin. ii. 30, Tacit. ann. 26, 8, de Fin. v. 18; Augustin, de Civ. Del. v. 8, amounting in all to 44, and especially the last fifteen, may be held as specimens.

2. Arati Phaenomena.

3. Arati Prognostica.

About two-thirds of the former, amounting to upwards of fifty hundred hexameter lines, of which 470 are nearly continuous, have been preserved, while twenty-seven only of the latter remain. The translation is for the most part very close—the dull copy of a dull original. Both pieces were juvenile efforts, although subsequently corrected and embellished. (De Nat. Deor. ii. 41, comp. de Att. ii. 1.) [Aratus, Athenius, Germanus.]

4. Aionomene. Capitolinus (Gordan. 3) mentions a poem under this name ascribed to Cicero, of which nearly two lines are quoted by Nonius. (s. v. Prooemius.)

7. Limon. Four hexameter lines in praise of Terence from this poem, the general subject of which is unknown, are quoted by Sanctorius. (Vit. Terent. 5.)

8. Marius. Written before the year b. c. 82. (De Leg. i. 1; Vell. Pat. ii. 26.) A spirited fragment of thirteen hexameter lines, describing a prodigy witnessed by Marius and interpreted by him as an omen of success, is quoted in de Divinationes (i. 47), a single line in the de Legibus (i, 1), and another by Isidorus. (Orig. xix. 1.)

9. De Febus in Consulatu gestis. Cicero wrote a history of his own consulship, first in Greek prose, which he finished before the month of June, b. c. 60 (ad Att. ii. 1), and soon afterwards a Latin poem on the same subject, divided, it would seem, into three parts. A fragment consisting of seventy-eight hexameters, is quoted from the second book in the de Divinationes (i. 11—13), three lines from the third in a letter to Atticus (ii. 5), and one verse by Nonius. (s. v. Eventus.)

10. De meis Temporibus. We are informed by Cicero in a letter belonging to b. c. 54 (ad Pam. i. 9), that he had written three books in verse upon his own times, including, as we gather from his words, an account of his exile, his sufferings, and his recall—the whole being probably a continuation of the piece last mentioned. Four disjointed lines only remain (Quintil. xi. 1 § 34, ix. 4 § 41), one of which is, "Cedam arma toga concedat laura lingua," and the other, the unlucky jingle so well known to us from Juvenal (x. 122), "O fortunatum natam me consule Romam."

11. Tumuloacis. An elegy upon some unknown theme. One line and a word are found in the commentary of Servins on Virgil. (Ecl. i. 53.)

12. Ellabitas Jocuaria. Our acquaintance with this is derived solely from Quintilian (viii. 6. § 78), who quotes a punning couplet as the words of Cicero "in quodam jocuari libello."

13. Pontius Gabrielius. Plutarch tells us that Cicero, while yet a boy, wrote a little poem in tetrameters with the above title. The subject is unknown. (Plut. Cæs. 2.)

14. Epigramma in Tiromen. Mentioned by Pliny. (Ep. vii. 4.)

The poetical and other fragments of Cicero are given in their most accurate form, with useful in-

5. HISTORICAL AND MISCELLANEOUS WORKS.

1. De meis Consilvis s. Moerun Consiliariurn Expositio. We find from Asconius and St. Augustin that Cicero published a work under such some title, in justification of his own policy, at the period when he feared that he might lose his election for the consulship, in consequence of the opposition and intrigues of Crassus and Caesar. A few sentences only remain. (Ascon. ad Orat. in Toq. Cons.; Augustin. c. Julian. Polyz. v. 5; Pronto, Eev. Elc.etc.)

2. De Consulatu (spel τῆς διεξάγεσεις). The only purely historical work of Cicero was a commentary on his own consulship, written in Greek and finished before the month of June, b.c. 60, not one word of which has been saved. (Ad Att. ii. 1; Plut. Cais. 8; Dion Cass. xlvii. 21; comp. ad Fam. v. 12.)

3. De Laude Caesaris. It is clear from the commencement of a letter to Atticus (iv. 5; 10th April, b.c. 56), that Cicero had written a book or pamphlet in praise of Caesar. He does not give the title, and was evidently not a little ashamed of his performance.

4.  M. Cato s. Laus M. Catonis. A panegyric upon Cato, composed after his death at Utica in b.c. 46, to which Caesar replied in a work entitled Anticata. [Caesar, p. 553, a.] A few words only remain. (Ad Att. xiii. 40; Gall. xii. 19; Macrob. vi. 2; Pistor. x. 3, p. 48, ed. Krehl.)

5. Laus Poreici. A panegyric on Porsici, the sister of M. Cato and wife of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, written in b.c. 45, soon after her death. (Ad Att. xiii. 37, 48.)

6.  Oeconomicæ et Xenophontis. Probably not so much a close translation as an adaptation of the treatise of Xenophon to the wants and habits of the Romans. It was composed in the year b.c. 80, or in 79, and was divided into three books, the arguments of which have been preserved by Servius. The first detailed the duties of the mistress of a household at home, the second the duties of the master of a household out of doors, the third was upon agriculture. The most important fragments are contained in the eleventh and twelfth books of Columella, which together with those derived from other sources have been carefully collected by Nobbe (Cicerois Opera, Leipzig, 1837), and will be found in Orelli's Cicero, vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 472. (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 43; Cic. de Off. ii. 24.)

7. Chorographia. Priscian, according to the text usually received (xvi.16), mentions "Chorographiam Cicerinam," but the most recent editor, Krehl, supposes " orthographiam" to be the true reading, while others substitute " chronographiam." If " chorographia" be correct, it may refer to the geographical work in which Cicero was engaged b.c. 59, as we read in letters to Atticus. (ii. 4, 6, 7.)

It is doubtful whether works under the following titles were ever written by Cicero:—

1. De Oratographia. 2. De Re Militari. 3. Symmogna. 4. De Numeris Oratibus ad Tironem. 5. Orphæus s. de Adolescenti Studio. 6. De Memoriarum. Any tracts which have been published from time to time under the above titles as works of Cicero, such as the De Re Militari attached to many of the older editions, are unquestionably spurious. (See Angelo Mai, Catalog. Cod. Ambros. cl.; Bandini, Catalog. Bibli. Laurent. iii. p. 455, and Suppl. ii. p. 391; Fabric. Bibl. Lat. i. p. 211; Orelli, Cicerois Opera, vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 584.)

The Edito Princeps of the collected works of Cicero was printed at Milan by Alexander Minutianus, 4 vols. fol., 1498, and reprinted with a few changes due to Badaeus by Badius Ascensius, Paris, 4 vols. fol., 1511. Aldus Manutius and Naugertius published a complete edition in 9 vols. fol., Venet., 1512—1532, which served as the model for the second of Ascensius, Paris, 1522, 2 or 4 vols. None of the above were derived from MIS, authorities, but were merely copies of various earlier impressions. A gradual progress towards a pure text is exhibited in those which follow:—Cratander, Basile. 1529, 2 vols. fol., corrected by Bentinus after certain Heidelberg MSS.; Horvagices, Basile. 1534, 4 vols. fol.; Junius, Ven. 1534—1537, 4 vols. fol., an entirely new recension by Petrus Victorius, who devoted his attention especially to the correction of the Epistles from the Medicean MSS.; Car. Stephanus, Paris, 1555, 4 vols. fol., containing many new readings from MSS. in France; Diniogius Labianus, Lutet. op. Bernardum Turriani, 1566, 4 vols. fol., with an ample commentary,—in every respect more worthy of praise than any of the foregoing, and of the greatest importance to the critic; Gratrer, Hamburg, Proben. 1618, 4 vols. fol., including the collations of sundry German, Belgian, and French MSS., followed in a great measure by Jae. Cronogius, Lug. Bat. 1691, 4 vols. 4to., and by Verbüraynus, Amst. Wetstein. 1724, 2 vols. fol., or 4 vols. 4to., or 12 vols. 8vo., which comprehends also a large collection of notes by earlier scholars; Oliver, Genue. 1743—1749, 9 vols. 4to., with a commentary "in usum Delphini," very frequently reprinted; Ernertii, Hal. Sax. 1774—1777, 5 vols. 8vo., in 7 parts, immeasurably superior, with all its defects, to any of its predecessors, and still held by some as the standard; Sahlins, Lepis. 1814—1823, 20 vols., small 8vo., in 28 parts, with useful pegoeogenuma and summaries prefixed to the various works. The small editions printed by Elzevir, Amst. 1684—1699, 11 vols. 12mo., by Poullis, Glang. 1749, 20 vols. 16mo., and by Barlow, Paris, 1783, 14 vols. 12mo., are much esteemed on account of their neatness and accuracy.

All others must now, however, give place to that of Orelli, Turic. 1826—1837, 9 vols. 8vo., in 13 parts. The text has been revised with great industry and judgment, and is as pure as our present resources can render it, while the valuable and well-arranged selection of readings placed at the bottom of each page enable the scholar to form an opinion for himself. There is unfortunately no apparatus criticus, but this work is in some degree supplied by an admirable "Onomasticon Tullianum," drawn up by Orelli and Baiter jointly, which forms the three concluding volumes.

The seventh volume contains the Scholiasts upon Cicero, C. Marius Victorinus, Rufinus, C. Julius
CICERO.

VICTOR, BOETHIUS, FAVONIUS EULOGIA, ASSENIUS PEDIANUS, SCHOLIA BOBONISI, SCHOLASTA GRONOVIA-

MUS.

Q. TULLIUS CICERO, son of NO. 2, was born in B.C. 102, and was educated along with his older brother, the orator, whom he accompanied to Athens in B.C. 79. (De Div. v. 1.) In B.C. 67 he was elected aedile, and held the office of praetor in B.C. 62. After his period of service in the city had expired, he succeeded L. Flaccus as governor of Asia, where he remained for upwards of three years, and during his administration gave great offence to many, both of the Greeks and of his own countrymen, by his violent temper, unguarded language, and the corruption of his favourite freedman, Statius. The murmurs arising from these excesses called forth from Marcus that celebrated letter (ad Q. Fr. i. 2), in which, after warning him of his faults and of the unfavourable impression which they had produced, he proceeds to detail the qualifications, duties, and conduct of a perfect provincial ruler. Quintus returned home in B.C. 58, soon after his brother had gone into exile, and on his approach to Rome was met by a large body of the citizens (pro Sext. 31), who had flocke together to do him honour. He exerted himself strenuously in promoting all the schemes devised for procuring the recall of the exile, in consequence of which he was threatened with a criminal prosecution by App. Claudius, son of C. Claudius (ad Att. iii. 17), and on one occasion nearly fell a victim to the violence of one of the mercenary mobs led on by the demagogues. (Pro Sext. 35.) In B.C. 55 he was appointed legatus to Caesar, whom he at tended on the expedition to Britain, and on their return was despatched with a legion to winter among the Nervii. (n. c. 54.) Here, immediately after the disasters of Titurius Sabinus and Arunculeius Cotta, his camp was suddenly attacked by a vast multitude of the Eburones and other tribes which had been roused to insurrection by Ambiorix. The assault was closely pressed for several days in succession, but so energetic were the mea sures adopted by Cicero, although at that very time suffering from great bodily weakness, and so bravely was he supported by his soldiers, that they were enabled to hold out until relieved by Caesar, who was slow in his commendations of the troops and their commander. (Cas. B. G. v. 24, &c.)

Quintus was one of the legal counsellors of the senator in Cilicia, B.C. 51, took the chief command of the military operations against the mountain-dwellers of the Syrian frontier, and upon the breaking out of the civil war, insisted upon sharing his fortunes and .following him to the camp of Pompey. (Ad Att. ix. 1, 6.) Up to this time the most perfect confi dence and the warmest affection subsisted between the brothers; but after the battle of Pharsalia (n. c. 48) the younger, giving way to the bitter ness of a hasty temper exasperated by disappointment, and stimulated by the representations of his son, indulged in the most violent language towards M. Cicero, wrote letters to the most distinguished persons in Italy leading him with abuse, and, pro ceeding to Alexandria, made his peace with Caesar. (n. c. 47.) (Ad Att. xi. 5, 9, 13, 14—16, 20.) A reconciliation took place after his return to Italy; but we hear little more of him until the year B.C. 43, when he fell a victim to the proscription of the triumvirs.

Quintus, in addition to his military reputation, was an aspirant to literary fame also, and in poetry Cicero considered him superior to himself. (Ad Q. Fr. iii. 4.) The fact of his having composed four tragedies in sixteen days, even though they may have been mere travesties, does not impair us with a high idea of the probable quality of his productions (ad Q. Fr. iii. 5); but we possess no spe cimens of his powers in this department, with the exception of twenty-four hexameters on the twelve signs, and an epigram on four lines on the love of women, not very complimentary to the sex. (An tholog. Lat. v. 41, iii. 88.) In prose we have an address to his brother, entitled De Pettione Cons ulesate, in which he gives him very sound advice as to the best method of attaining his object.

Quintus was married to Pompeonia, sister of Atticus; but, from incompatibility of temper, their union was singularly unhappy. As an example of their matrimonial squabbles, the reader may refer to a letter addressed to Atticus (v. 1), which con	ains a most graphic and amusing description of a scene which took place in the presence of the lady's brother-in-law. (Appian, B. C. iv. 20; Dion Cass. xi. 7, xlvii. 10.)

7. M. TULLIUS CICERO, only son of the orator and his wife Terentia, was born in the year B.C. 65, on the very day, apparently (ad Att. i. 2), on which L. Julius Caesar and C. Marius Figulus were elected consuls. He is frequently spoken of, while a boy, in terms of the warmest affection, in the letters of his father, who watched over his education with the most earnest care, and made him the companion of his journey to Cilicia. (B.C. 51.) The autumn after their arrival he was sent along with his school-fellow and cousin, Quintus, to pay a visit to king Deiotarus (ad Att. v. 17), while the proconsul and his legates were prosecuting the war against the highlanders of Ammochostos. He returned to Italy at the end of B.C. 50, was in tested with the manly gait at Arpinum in the course of March, B.C. 49 (ad Att. ix. 6, 19), being then in his sixteenth year, passed over to Greece and joined the army of Pompey, where he received the command of a squadron of cavalry, gaining great applause from his general and from the whole army by the skill which he displayed in military exercises, and by the steadiness with which he endured the toils of a soldier's life. (De Off. ii. 13.) After the flight of Pharsalia he was sent to Brundisium to await the arrival of Caesar from the East (ad Fam. xiv. 11, Ad Att. xii. 18), was chosen soon afterwards (n. c. 46), along with young Quintus and a certain M. Caesarius, to fill the office of aedile at Arpinum (ad Fam. xiv. 11), and the following spring (n. c. 45) expressed a strong wish to proceed to Spain and take part in the war against his former friends. He was, however, persuaded by his father to abandon this ill-judged project (ad Att. xii. 7), and it was determined that he should proceed to Athens and there prose cute his studies, along with several persons of his own age belonging to the most distinguished families of Rome. Here, although provided with an allowance from the most liberal scale (ad Att. xii. 27, 92), he fell into irregular and extravagant habits, led astray, it is said, by a rhetorician named Gorgias. The young man seems to have been touched by the remonstrances of Cicero and Atticus, and in a letter addressed to Tiro (ad Fam. xvi. 21), expresses great shame and sorrow for his past misconduct, giving an account at the same time of his reformed mode of life, and diligent application to philosophy under Cratippus of Mytilene—representations confirmed by the testimony of various individuals who assisted him at that period. (Ad Att. xiv. 16, iv. 4, 6, 17, 20, xvi. 1, ad Fam. xii. 16.) After the death of Caesar he was raised to the rank of military tribune by Brutus, gained over the legion commanded by L. Piso, the lieutenant of Antonius, defeated and took prisoner C. Antonius, and did much good service in the course of the Macedonian campaign. When the republican army was broken up by the rout at Philippi, he joined Sext. Pompeius in Sicily, and taking advantage of the amnesty in favour of exiles, which formed one of the terms of the convention between that chief and the triumvirs when they concluded a short-lived peace (n. c. 39), returned to the metropolis. Here he lived in retirement and obscurity, until Octavianus, touched perhaps with remorse on account of his former treachery to the family, caused him to be admitted into the college of augurs, and after his final rupture with Antonius, assumed him as his colleague in the consulship. (n. c. 30, from 13th Sept.) By a singular coincidence, the despatch announcing the capture of the fleet of Antony, which was immediately followed by his death, was addressed to the new consul in his official capacity, and thus, says Plutarch, "the divine justice reserved the completion of Antony's punishment for the house of Cicero," for the arrival of the intelligence was immediately followed by a decree that all statues and monuments of Antony should be destroyed, and that no individual of that family should in time coming bear the name of Marcus. Middleton has fallen into the mistake of supposing that the victory thus announced was the battle of Actium, but this was fought about eleven months before the event in question. Soon after the termination of his office, Cicero was nominated governor of Asia, or, according to others, of Syria, and we hear no more of him.

Young Cicero was one of those characters whose name would never have appeared on the page of history had it not been for the fame of his father; and that fame proved to a certain extent a misfortune, since it attracted the eyes of the world to various follies and vices which might have escaped unnoticed in one enjoying a less illustrious parentage. Although naturally indolent (ad Att. vi. 1), the advantages of education were by no means lost upon him, as we may infer from the style and tone of those two epistles which have been preserved (ad Fam. xvi. 21, 25), which prove that the praise bestowed upon his compositions by his father did not proceed from mere blind partiality (ad Att. xiv. 7. xv. 17), while his merits as a soldier seem unquestionable. Even the stories of his dissipation scarcely justify the bitterness of Seneca and Pliny, the latter of whom records, upon the authority of Tergilla, that he was able to swallow two cups of wine at a draught, and that on one occasion, when intoxicated, he threw a cup at M. Agrippa, an anecdote which Middleton, who is determined to see no fault in any one bearing the name of Cicero, oddly enough quotes as an example of courage and high spirit. (Plin. H. N. xxii. 3, &c. xiv. 28; Senec. Serm. 6, de Benefice; iv. 50; Plut. Cic. and Brut.; Appian, B. C. iv. 19, 20, 2; Dion Cass. xiv. 15, xiv. 3, 18, 41, 19.)

CICERO.

8. Q. Tullius Cicero, son of No. 6, and of Pompeia, sister of Atticus, must have been born about 55 B.C., or possibly before; for that it was intended to invest him with the manly gown in the year B.C. 51 (ad Att. v. 20). He passed a considerable portion of his boyhood with his cousin Marcus, under the eye of his uncle, whom he accompanied to Cilicia, and who at an early period remarked his restless vehemence and self-confidence, observing that he required the curb, while his own son stood in need of the spur (ad Att. i. 3, 7), although he at the same time had formed a favourable opinion of his disposition from the propriety with which he conducted himself amidst the wrangling of his parents (ad Att. i. c.). Before leaving Cilicia, however, he appears to have begun to entertain some doubts of his nephew's uprightness, and these suspicions were fully verified by a letter which the youth, tempted it would seem by the prospect of a great reward, despatched to Caesar soon after the outbreak of the civil war, betraying the design which his father and his uncle had formed of quitting Italy. (Ad Att. x. 4, 7.) His unamiable temper broke forth with savage violence after the battle of Pharsalia, when he loaded his uncle with the most virulent vituperation in hopes that he might thus more easily propitiate the conqueror. Having obtained pardon from Caesar he accompanied him to Spain, ever seeking to gain favour by railing against his own nearest relations, and after the death of the dictator was for a while the right-hand man of Antony (ad Att. xiv. 20), but, having taken some offence, with characteristic fickleness he went over to Brutus and Cassius, by whom he was kindly received, was in consequence included in the proscription of the triumvirs, and was put to death at Rome in n. c. 43. He is said on this occasion to have in some degree made amends for his former errors by the steadfastness with which he refused to divulge the place where his father was concealed, even when pressed by torture. (Dion Cass. xvi. 10.)

[CICERINUS, the name of a patrician family of the Veturius gens. Varro says (L. L. vii. 91, ed. Müller), that the Veturii obtained the surname of Ciceri from their quiet and domesticated (cicer) disposition. Cicerius seems to have been the name of two distinct families of the Veturii gens, which are traced back to the Etruscan Cusci and Gemini Cicerini; the members of each are given below in chronological order.

1. P. VETURIUS GEMINUS CICERINUS, consul n. c. 499 with T. Aebutius Eila. In this year siege was laid to Fidenae, Crustumeria was taken, and Paenestiae revolted from the Latins to the Romans. In Livy (ii. 19) his praenomen is Caius, but Dionysius (v. 56) has Publius; and the latter name is preferable, as it seems likely enough that the P. Veturius, who was one of the first two questors, was the same as the consul. (Plut. Popul. 12.)

2. T. VETURIUS GEMINUS CICERINUS, consul n. c. 494 with A. Virginius Tricostumianus, in which year the plebs seceded to the sacred mound to resist the tribune who was about to hold elections. Cicerinus was sent against the Aqueli, who invaded the Latin territory this year; but they retired at his approach, and took refuge in the mountains. (Liv. ii. 23-30; Dionys. vii. 34; Ascon, in Corn. p. 76, ed. Orelli.)

3. T. VETURIUS GEMINUS CICERINUS, consul n. c. 463, with L. Lucretius Tricipitius, defeated
the Volsci, and on this account entered the city with the honour of an ovation. (Liv. iii. 8, 10; Dionys. iv. 69; Diod. xi. 81.)

4. C. VETURIUS P. F. GERMINUS CICURINUS, consul b. c. 455 with T. Rumilius Roccus Vatianus, marched with his colleague against the Aequi. They defeated the enemy, and gained immense booty, which however they did not distribute among the soldiers, but sold on account of the poverty of the treasury. They were in consequence both brought to trial in the next year: Veturius was accused by L. Albusius, the plebeian aedile, and sentenced to pay a fine of 10,000 asses. As some compensation for his ill-treatment by the plebeians he was elected augur in 453. (Liv. iii. 31, 32; Dionys. x. 33; Diod. xii. 5.)

5. Sp. VETURIUS SP. F. P. N. CASSUS CRASSINUS, one of the first decuriones, b. c. 457 (Fast. Capitol.). called L. Veturius by Livy (iii. 33) and T. Veturius by Dionysius (x. 59).

6. Sp. VETURIUS CRASSUS CICURINUS, consul tribune in b. c. 417. Livy (iii. 47) calls him Sp. Rutulus Crassus; but this no doubt is a false reading, for Diodorus (xiii. 7) has Sp. Veturius, and the Rutulian gens was moreover plebeian, and had not the cognomen of Crassus.

7. M. VETURIUS L. F. P. N. CASSUS CRASSINUS, consul tribune in b. c. 339,—the only patrician elected this year; his five colleagues were all plebeians. (Liv. v. 13; Diod. xiv. 54.)

8. C. VETURIUS CRASSUS CICURINUS, consul tribune b. c. 377, and a second time in 369 during the agitation of the Licinian laws. (Liv. vi. 32, 36; Diod. xvi. 61, 77.)

9. L. VETURIUS L. F. P. N. CASSUS CRASSINUS, consul tribune two years successively, b. c. 368, 367, in the latter of which years the Licinian laws were carried. (Liv. vi. 38, 42.)

CITA RIA (Kittapds), a surname of the Eueli- nian Demeter at Pheneus, in Arcadia, derived either from an Arcadian dance called tides, or from a royal head-dress of the same name. (Paus. viii. 15, 5.) [L. S.]

CILIUS (KittS), a son of Agenor and Telephassa. He and his brothers Cadmus and Phoenix were sent out by their father in search of Europa, who had been carried off by Zeus. Cilius settled in the country which derived from him the name of Cilia. He is called the father of Thamus and Thebe. (Herod. vii. 91; Apollod. iii. 1. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 178; Diod. vi. 49.) [L. S.]

CILLAS (KUaSoS), a daughter of Laomedon and Placia or Leneippe, and a sister of Priam. At the time when Hecabe was pregnant with Paris, the seer Aesæus declared that mother and child must be put to death in order to avert a great calamity; but Priam, who referred this prophetic declaration to Cilla and her son Menippos by Thymoæus, made them suffer instead of Hecabe and Paris. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 3; Tacta ad Lyobol. 224.) [L. S.]

CILLUS or CILLUS (KUaSoS or KUaSoS), the charioteer of Pelops, whose real name, according to a Troezenian tradition, was Sphaericus. His tomb was shown near the town of Cilla in the neighbourhhood of the temple of Apollo. (Paus. v. 10. § 2; Strab. xiii. p. 613.) [L. S.]

CILNII, a powerful family in the Etruscan Arretium, who seem to have been usually firm supporters of the Roman interests. They were driven out of their native town in b. c. 301, by the party opposed to them, but were restored by the Romans. The Cillii were nobles or Lucumi- mones in their state, and some of them in ancient times may have held even the kingly dignity. (Comp. Hor. Carm. i. 1. 1, iii. 29. 1, Serm. i. 6. 3.) Till the fall of the republic no separate individual of this family is mentioned, for the "Cil- nus" of Silius Italicus (vii. 29) is a poetical creation, and the name has been rendered chiefly memorable by C. Cillius Macenas, the intimate friend of Augustus. [Marcianus.] It appears from sepulchral inscriptions that the Etruscan form of the name was Cifena or Cifenea, which was changed by the Romans into Cilinæus, much in the same way as the Etruscan Lene was altered into Lucinæus. (Muller, Etrusker, i. p. 414.)

Cilo or Chilo, a Roman surname, seems to have been written in either way, as we find both forms on coins of the Flaminia gens. (Eckhel, v. p. 212.) The Latin grammarians, however, state that Cilo was applied to a person with a long and narrow head, and Chilo to one with large or thick lips. (Velius Long. p. 2234, Flav. Capes, p. 2242, Charis, p. 78, ed. Putschius; Festus, a. ed. Chidio.)

CILIO, a Roman senator, called by Appian Klaos, proscribed in b. c. 49 (App. B. C. iv. 27), may perhaps be the same as the Cilo, the friend of Toranius and Cicero, whom the latter mentions in b. c. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 20.)

Cilo, or Chilo, L. FLAMINIUS, occurs only on coins, of which a specimen is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Venus, and the reverse Victory driving a biga. The interpretation of the inscription on the obverse, III. VICT. PR. FL., is not certain. We know that Julius Caesar increased the number of the superintendents of the mint from three to four, and it has therefore been supposed that this Flaminius Chilo was one of the first four superintendents appointed by Caesar, and that the above letters refer to this, being equivalent to IIIIVIR primus flamen monnem. (Eckhel, v. pp. 212, 213.)

CILIO, JUNIUS, procurator of Pontus in the reign of Claudius, brought the Bosporan Mithridates to Rome in a. d. 50, and received afterwards the consular insignia. (Tac. Ann. xii. 21.) Dion Cassius speaks (ix. 39) of him as governor of Bithynia, and relates an amusing incident respecting him. The Bithynians came before Claudius to complain of Cilo having taken bribes, but as the emperor could not hear them on account of the noise, he asked those standing by his side what they said. Narcissus therupon told him that they were returning thanks to Cilo, upon which Claudius appointed him to the government of the province for two years longer.

Cilo, or Chilo, P. MAGIUS, murdered at Peiraeeus, in b. c. 45. M. Claudius Marcellus, who had been consul in 51, and killed himself immediately afterwards. Cilo was a friend and client of Marcellus and a rumour was circulated at the time by Caesar's enemies, that the dictator had instigated him to commit the murder. Brutus wrote to Cicero to defend Caesar from this charge. The real motive for the crime seems to have been, that Marcellus refused to advance Cilo a sum of money to relieve him from his embarrassments. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 10, ad Fam. iv. 12.) Valerius Maximus (ix. 11. § 4) says, that Cilo had served under Pompey, and that he was ignominious at Marcellus preferring another friend to him. Livy (Epit. 115) calls him Chen Magnus.

CILÔ SEPTIMIANUS, L. FABIUS, to whom an inscription quoted by Tillemont after Onuphrius Pauvinius gives the names Catinius Acelianus Lepidus Pulginiuianus, was consul in a. d. 193 and 204, and was the chosen friend of Septimius Severus, by whom he was appointed prefect of the city and tutor to his two sons. Having endeavoured to mediate between the brothers, he incurred the hatred of the elder, who after the murder of Geta gave orders that the man who had ever acted towards him the part of a father, and whom he had often addressed by that title, should be included in the massacre which followed. The soldiers hastened to the mansion of Cilo, and after plundering it of all the costly furniture and other precious effects, dragged him from the bath, compelled him to walk through the streets in his wooden slippers and a single scanty garment, buffeting him as they hurried along with the intention of putting him to death when they should have reached the palace. This gratuitous cruelty proved his salvation. For the populace, beholding one of whom they had been wont to honour treated with such indignity, began to murmur, and were joined by the city-guards. A tumult was imminent when Caracalla came forth to meet the mob, and partly through fear, partly perhaps touched for a moment with compunction, threw his own cloak over the shoulders of his former preceptor, once more addressed him as father and master, gave orders that the tribune and his attendants who had been sent to perpetrate the crime should themselves be put to death, not, says Dion, because they had wished to slay their victim, but because they had failed to do so, and continued to treat him with the outward semblance at least of respect. The only other anecdote preserved with regard to Cilo is, that he saved the life of Macrius at the time when the latter was upon the point of sharing the fate of Philius (Plautianus), whose agent he was, and thus the destruction of Caracalla was indirectly hastened by the friend and benefactor whom he had sought to destroy. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 7, lxxviii. 11; Spalatian. Caracella; 4; Amel. Vict. Epit. 30.) [W. R.]

CIMBER, C. A'NNIUS, the son of Lysidicus, had obtained the praetorship from Caesar, and was one of Antony's supporters in the. 43, on which account he is vehemently attacked by Cicero. He was charged with having killed his brother, whence Cicero calls him ironically Philippus, and perpetrates the pun Nisi forte fere Germanam Ciceros occidit, that is, "unless perchance he has a right to kill his own countryman," as Cicero is the name of a German people, and Germanicus signifies in Latin only Caesar a boister. (Cic. Phil. xii. 12, xi. 6; Quintili. viii. 3, § 27; comp. Cic. ad Att. xv. 13; Suet. Aug. 86.) Cimer was an orator, a poet, and an historian, but his merits were of an orator, and he is ridiculed by Virgil in an epigram preserved by Quintilian (l.c.). (Huschke, De C. A. Unioi Cimbro, Rostoch. 1824.)

CIMON.

CIMBER, P. GABITIUS, one of the Catilinaris conspirators. (Cic. in Cat. iii. 5, 6, iv. 6.)

CIMBER, L. TULLIUS (not Tullius), one of the murderers of Caesar, r. 44. When Caesar first became supreme, Cimer was one of his warmest supporters (Cic. Philipp. ii. 11; Sene. de Fra. iii. 30); and we find Cicero making use of his influence with the Dictator in behalf of a friend (Ad Fam. vi. 12). He was rewarded with the province of Bithynia. But for some reason (Seneca says from disappointed hopes) he joined the conspirators. On the fatal day, Cimer was foremost in the ranks, under pretence of presenting a petition to Caesar praying for his brother's recall from exile. Caesar motioned him away; and Cimer then, seizing the Dictator's gown with both hands drew it over his neck, so as to pull him forward. After the assassination, Cimer went to his province and raised a fleet, with which (if we may believe the author of the Paeo-Brutus Epistles to Cicero, i. 6) he defeated Dolabella. When Cassius and Brutus marched into Macedonia, Cimer co-operated with the fleet, and appears to have done good service. (Appian, B. C. iv. 102, 105.) He was a bold active man, but addicted to wine and riotous living, so that he asked jokingly, Ego quemquam fuerim, qui vinum iure non possidet? (Sene. Epist. 83. 11.) [H. G. L.]

| 2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of the great Miltiades, is mentioned in Herodotus as paying his father's fine and capturing Eion. (vi. 136, vii. 107.) This latter event, the battle of Eurytemon, the expedition in aid of Sparta, and his death in Cyprus, are the only occasions in which he is expressly named by his relation, Thucydides; whose summary, moreover, of the history of this period leaves us by its brevity necessarily dependent for much on the additional authorities, which form the somewhat heterogeneous basis of Plutarch's biography. We find here the valuable contemporary recollections of Ion of Chios (cc. 5, 9), and the almost worthless contemporary gossip and scandal of the Thasian Stainibus: some little also from the poets of the time, Cratinus, Melan- thius, and Archedes. He seems to have followed Thucydides, though not very strictly, as a guide in general, while he filled up the details from the later history which the historian had omitted, and more than from Ephorus, whose account, as followed probably by Diodorus (xi. 60), differs materially. He appears to have also used Callisthenes, Cratinus, Plaainodorus, Diodorus Perigetes, Gorgias, and Nausicaetes; Aristotle, Eupolis, Aristophanes, and Critias.

On the death of Miltiades, probably in b. c. 489, Cimon, we are told by Diodorus (Excortps, p. 255), in order to obtain the corpse for burial, took his father's place in prison till his fine of 50 talents should be paid. [Miltiades.] It appears, however, certain (see Dem. c. Antipat. p. 603) that the diptus, if not the imprisonment, of the public debtor was legally inherited by the son, and Cornelius Nepos, whose life comes in many parts from Theopompus, states the confinement to have been compulsory. The fine was eventually paid by Callias on his marriage with Elpinice, Cimon's sister. [Callias, No. 2, p. 567, b.] A more difficult point is the previous connexion and even marriage of Cimon with this sister or half-sister, which was recorded by numerous writers, but after all was very probably the scandal of Sceabinbrotus and the comedians. (Eupol. ap. Plut. Cim. 15, comp. 4; Nepos, Cim. 1; Athen. xii. p. 588.) Nor, again, can we very much rely on the statement which Plutarch introduces at this time, that he and Themistocles vied with each other at the Olympic games in the splendour of their equipments and banquets. (Plut. Cim. 5.) It is more credible that his first occasion of attracting notice and admiration was the forwardness with which, when the city in b. c. 489 was to be deserted, he led up to the citadel a company of young men to offer to the goddess their now unserviceable bridles. (Plut. Cim. 5.) After the battle of Platea, Aristides brought him forward. They were placed together in 477 at the head of the Athenian contingent to the Greco-Persian war, under the supreme command of Pausanias. Cimon shared the glory of transferring that supremacy to Athens, and in the first employment of it reduced the Persian garrison at Eion, and opened the important district in the neighbourhood of Athens for colonization. (Plut. Cim. 6; Herod. vii. 197; Thuc. i. 59; Nepos, Cim. 2; Strab. i. 1, 2, 4, 8; Aesch. de Pals. Lyc. p. 755, LXX. ed. Reiske; Clinton, F. H. ii. App. ix.)

In honour of this conquest he received from his countrymen the distinction, at that time unprecedented, of having three busts of Hermes erected, inscribed with triumphal verses, but without mention of the names of the generals. (Plut. Cim. 6; Aesch. c. Celeph. p. 673, ed. Reiske.) In 476, apparently under his conduct, the piratical Doplolians were expelled from Screos, and a colony planted in their room; and the remains of Theseus discovered there, were thence transported, probably after some years' interval (b. c. 468) with great pomp to Athens. (Plut. Cim. 6; Paus. i. 17, § 6, iii. 3, § 6.) The reduction of Scyrus and Naxos was most likely effected under his command (Thuc. i. 58); and at this period he was doubtless in war and politics his country's chief citizen. His coadjutor at home would be Aristides; how far he contributed to the banishment of Themistocles may be doubtful. (Comp. Plut. Arist. 25, Them. 24.) The year b. c. 460 (according to Clinton; Kruger and others persist in placing it earlier) saw the completion of his glory. In the conflict of the allied forces on the Asiatic coast he met a Persian fleet of 350 ships, attacked them, captured 200, and following the fugitives to the shore, by the river Euyymedon, in a second and obstinate engagement on the same day, routed the land armament; indeed, according to Plutarch, he crowned his victory before night by the defeat of a reinforcement of 30 Phoenician ships. (Plut. Cim. 12; Thuc. i. 100; Diod. xi. 60, with Wesseling's note.) His next achievement was the expulsion of the Persians from the Chersonese, and the subjection of the territory to Athens, accompanied perhaps with the recovery of his own patrimony. The effect of these victories was doubtless very great; they crushed perhaps a last aggressive movement, and fixed Persian finally in a defensive position. In later times it was believed, though on evidence, as was shown by Callisthenes, quite insufficient, that they had been succeeded by a treaty (the famous peace of Cimon) negotiated through Callias, and containing in its alleged conditions the most humiliating concessions. They placed Cimon at the height of his power and glory, the chief of that empire which his character had gained for Athens, and which his policy towards the allies was rendering daily firmer and more solid. Themistocles, a banished man, may perhaps have witnessed his Asiatic triumphs in sorrow; the death of Aristides had left him sole possessor of the influence they had hitherto jointly exercised; nor had time yet matured the opposition of Pericles. (Plut. Cim. 16, 17, 19, 20; Strab. i. 1, 2, 4, 8.) People defended and the rapidity increasing influence of the new opponent rendered his position precarious.

The chronology of the events that follow is henceforth in most points disputed; according to Clinton's view, which cannot hastily be desisted, the revolt of Thasos took place in 465; in 463 Cimon reduced it; in the year intervening occurred the earthquake and insurrection at Sparta, and in consequence, upon Cimon's urgent appeal, one if not two (Plut. Cim. 16; comp. Aristoph. Lysikr. 1137) expeditions were sent from Athens, under his command, to assist the Spartans. In these occurrences were found the means for his humiliation. During the siege of Thasos, the Athenian colonists on the Strymon were cut off by the Thracians, and Cimon seems to have been expected, after his victory there, to retrieve this disaster; and, neglecting to do so, he was on his return brought to trial; but the accusation of having taken bribes from Alexander of Macedon, was, by Pericles at any rate, not strongly urged, and the result was an acquittal. The termination of his Laecadaemonian policy in the jealous and insolent dissatisfaction of their Athenian auxiliaries by the Spartans, and the consequent rupture between the two states was a more serious blow to his popularity. And the victory of his opponents was decided when Ephialtes and Pericles, after a severe struggle, carried their measure for reducing the authority of the aristocratic Areopagis. Upon this it would seem his ostracism ensued. Soon after its commencement (b. c. 457) a Laecadaemonian army, probably to meet the views of a violent section of the defeated party in Athens, posted itself at Tanagra. The Athenians advanced to meet it: Cimon requested permission to fight in his place; the generals in suspicion refused: he departed, begging his own friends to vindicate his character: they, in number a hundred, placed in the ensuing battle his panoply among them, and fell around it to the last man. Before five years of his exile were fully out, b. c. 453 or 454, he was recalled on the motion of Pericles himself; late reverses having inclined the people to tranquillity in Greece, and the democratic leaders perhaps being ready, in fear of more unscrupulous opponents, to make concessions to those of them who were patriotic and temperate. He was probably employed in effecting the five years’ truce with Sparta which commenced in 450. In the next year he sailed out with 200 ships to Cyprus, with the view of retrieving the late mishaps in Egypt. Here, while besieging Citium, illness or the effects of a wound carried him off. His forces, while sailing away with his remains, as if animated by his spirit, fell in with and defeated a fleet of Phoenician and Cilician galleys, and added to their naval victory a second over forces on shore. (Plut. Cim. 14—19; Thuc. i. 112; Diod. xi. 61, 65, xii. 3, 4; Theopomp. ap. Euphor. fragm. ed. Max. 228.)

CINADON’s character (see Plut. Cim. 4, 5, 8, 10, 16, Peri. 5) is marked by his policy. Exerting himself to aggrandize Athens, and to centralize in her the power of the naval confederacy, he still looked mainly to the humiliation of the common enemy, Persia, and had no jealous feeling towards his country’s rivals at home. He was always an admiral of Sparta: his words to the people when urging the success in the revolt of the Helots were, as recorded by Ion (Plut. Cim. 16) “not to suffer Greece to be laden, and Athens to lose its yoke-fellow.” He is described himself to have had something of the Spartan character, being deficient in the Athenian points of readiness and quick discretion. He was of a cheerful, vivacious temper, free and indulgent perhaps rather than excessively in his pleasures, as has been said (Polyb. i. 19, 5; Enopis, ap. Plut. Cim. 15), delighting in achievement for its own sake rather than from ambition. His frankness, affability, and mildness, won over the allies from Pausanias; and at home, when the recovery of his patrimony or his share of spoils had made him rich, his liberality and munificence were unbounded. His orchards and gardens were thrown open; his fellow demeans (Aristot. ap. Plut. Cim. 10; comp. Cic. de Off. ii. 18 and Theopomp. ap. Athen. xii. 533) were free daily to his table, and his public bounty vogue on ostentation. With the treasure he brought from Asia the southern wall of the citadel was built, and at his own private charge the foundations of his palace to the Petreus, and, after the marshy soil made difficult and expensive, were laid down in the most costly and efficient style. According to the report of Ion, the tragic poet, who as a boy supplied in his company (Plut. Cim. 5, 9), he was in person tall and good-looking, and his hair, which he wore long, thick and curly. He left three sons, Lacedaemonius, Elenus, and Thesealus, and was, according to one account, married to Isodice, a daughter of Euryptolemus, the cousin of Pericles, as also to an Archaean wife. (Diodorus Periegetes, ap. Plut. Cim. 15.) Another record gives him three more sons, Miltiades, Cimon, and Peliasman. (Schoel. ad Arist. iii. p. 513, Dindorf.)

edited in a useful form by Arnold Bicker, Utrect, 1843, in which references will be found to other illustrative works.)

CIMON. 1. Of Cleone, a painter of great renown, praised by Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 34) and Aelian. (V. H. viii. 5.) It is difficult to ascertain, from Pliny’s obscure words, wherein the peculiar merit of Cimon consisted: it is certain, however, that he was not satisfied with drawing simply the outlines of his figures, such as we see in the oldest painted vases, but that he also represented limbs, veins, and the folds of garments. He invented the Catalogra, that is, the profile, according to the common interpretation (Caylus, Mem. de l’Acad. vol. xxv. p. 265), but the various positions of figures, as they appear when looking upwards, downwards, and sideways; and he must therefore be considered as the first painter of perspective. It would appear from an epitaph of Simonides (Anthol. Palat. i. 758), that he was a contemporary of Diorynus, and belonged therefore to the 80th Olympiad; but as he was certain more ancient, Klaudiosw should in that passage be changed into Klaudios. (Bittinger, Archidion. d. Malerei. p. 294, &c.; Müller, Heliod. § 99.)

2. An artist who made ornamental cups. (Athen. xi. p. 781, &c.)

CINADON (Кинадон), the chief of a conspiracy against the Spartan peers (Δείοι) in the first year of Aegaeans II. (b. c. 386—387.) This plot appears to have arisen out of the increased power of the ephors, and the more oligarchical character which the Spartan constitution had by this time assumed. (Thucydides’ Greece, iv. pp. 373—378; Manso’s Sparta, iii. 1, p. 219, &c.; Wychsmuth, Helenen. Alter. i. 2, pp. 214, 215, 260, 286.) Cindon was a young man of personal accomplishment and courage, but not one of the peers. The design of his conspiracy was to assassinate all the peers, in order, as he himself said, “that he might have no superior in Lacedaemon.” The first hint of the existence of the plot was given by a soothsayer, who was assisting Aegaeans at a sacrifice. Five days afterwards, a person came to the ephors, and told them the following story: He had been taken, he said, into the agora by Cindon, who asked him to count the Spartans there. He did so, and found that, including one of the kings, the ephors, the senators, and others, there were less than forty. “These,” said Cindon, “account your enemies, but the others in the agora, who are more than four thousand, your confederates.” He then referred to the like disparity which might be seen in the streets and in the country. The leaders of the conspiracy, too, had few, but trustworthy; but their associates were in fact all the Helots, and Neodamodes, and Hypo- neiones, who, if the Spartans were mentioned in their presence, were unable to conceal their ferocious hatred towards them. For arms, he added, there were at hand the knives, swords, spits, hatchets, and so forth, in the iron market; the rustics would use bludgeons and stones, and the artificers had each his own tools. Cindon finally warned him, he said, to keep at home, for the time of action was at hand.

Upon hearing this account, the ephors called no assembly, but consulted with the senators as they happened to meet them. Cindon, who had been at other times employed by the ephors on important commissions, was sent to Aulis in Messenias, with orders to take certain persons prisoners; but secret instructions were given to some young men who were sent with him, and the choice of whom was so managed as not to excite his suspicions. This step was taken because the epithalamia were important in the matter of the hostages. Accordingly, Cinnaeus was seized and tortured; letters were sent to Spera mentioning the persons whom he had denounced as his confederates; and it is a remarkable proof of the formidable character of the conspiracy that among them was Tismenus, the soothsayer, a descendant of Tismenus the Eleian, who had been admitted to the full franchise. (He- red. ix. 33.) Cinnaeus was then brought to Sparta, and he and the other conspirators were led in irons through the streets, and scourged as they went, and so they were put to death. (Xen. Hell. iii. 3, §§ 4—11; Aristot. Politi. v. 6, § 2.) [P. S.]

CINAEATHON (Κιναιάθων), of Locacentum, one of the most fertile of the Cyclic poets, is placed by Eusebius (Chron. Ol. 3. 4) in B.C. 755. He was the author of: "Teogonia (Τεογονία)," which gave the history of Odysseus from the point where the Odyssey breaks off to his death. (Euseb. l. c.) 2. "Genalogies," which are frequently referred to by Pausanias (iii. 3, § 7, 13, § 5, iv. 2, § 1, viii. 53, § 2; comp. Schol. ad Hom. II. iii. 175), and which must consequently have been extant in A.D. 175. 3. "Heracles (Ἡρακλῆς)," containing an account of the adventures of Hercules. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. l. 1357.) 4. "Odipolos (Οδιπόλος)," the adventures of Oedipus, is ascribed to Cinaethon in an ancient inscription (Heeren, in Böll. d. alter. Litar. und Kunst, vol. iv. p. 57), but other authorities speak of the author as uncertain. (Paus. ix. 5, § 5; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1706.) 5. The "Little Pied ("Ouix Μυρμήξ"); this was also attributed by some to Cinaethon. (Schol. Vnt. ad Eur. Troil. 822; comp. Weikert, Episc. Cypriotes, p. 243.)

CINAEATHUS or CYNAESIEUS (Κινάεατος or Κύναιεατος), of Chios, a rhapsoed, who was generally supposed by the ancients to have been the author of the Homeric hymn to Apollo. He is said to have lived about the 69th Olympiad (b.c. 504), and to have been the first rhapsoed of the Homeric poems at Syracuse. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ii. 1.) This date, however, is much too low, as the Sielians were acquainted with the Homeric poems long before. Weikert (Episc. Cypriotes, p. 243) therefore proposes to read κατά τὴν ἔρασθι ἢ τὴν ἕρασθιν 'Ολ. instead of κατά τὴν ἑρασθεὶσ τὸν 'Ολ. and places him about B.C. 750. Cynaiethus is charged by Eusebius (ad II. l. p. 16, ed. Politi.) with having interpolated the Homeric poems. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. 508.)

CYNICA GENS, plebeian, of small importance. None of its members ever obtained the consulship: the first Cicaeus who gained any of the higher offices of the state was L. Cincius Alimentus, pretor in B.C. 209. The only cognomen of this gens is ALIMENTUS; those who occur without a surname are given under CINCIUS.

4. Q. Quinctius L. F. L. N. Cincinnatus, consular tribune in B.C. 415, and again in 405. (Liv. iv. 49, 61; Dio. xiii. 34, xiv. 17.)

5. T. Quinctius Cincinnatus Capitolinus, consular tribune in B.C. 338, and again in 334. In 330, in the war with the Punicves, he was appointed dictator, gained a decisive victory over them on the banks of the Alia, and in nine days captured nine towns. (Liv. vi. 4, 18, 26, 29; Dio. xiv. 23, 36; Eutrop. ii. 2; Festus, s. v. Triues.)

6. L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, consular tribune in B.C. 356, again in 355, and a third time in 377, when, with his colleague Ser. Sulpiicius, he raised the siege of Tusculum, of which the Latins had nearly made themselves masters. (Liv. vi. 32, 53; Dio. xiv. 25, 26, 61.)

7. C. Quinctius Cincinnatus, consular tribune in B.C. 377. (Liv. vii. 32.)

8. Q. Quinctius Cincinnatus, consular tribune in B.C. 356. (Liv. vi. 36.)

9. Quinctius Cincinnatus Capitolinus, consular tribune in B.C. 338, and in the following year master of the horse to the dictator M. Furius Camillus, when the Lucanians were carried, Livy calls him T. Quinctius Pennus, and as we have the surnames Cincinnatus Capitolinus in the Capitoline Fasti, his full name may have been T. Quinctius Pennus Cincinnatus Capitolinus. (Liv. vi. 38, 42; Dio. xiv. 78.) [C. P. M.]

CINCIUS. 1. M. Cincius, prefect of Pisa in B.C. 194, wrote to the senate to inform them of an insurrection of the Ligures. (Liv. xxxiv. 56.) He is probably the same as the M. Cincius Alemontus, tribune of the plebs in 204 [p. 132, a].

2. L. Cincius, the procurator or bailiff of Attica, is frequently mentioned in Cicero's letters. (Ad Att. i. 1, 7, 8, 16, 20, iv. 4, a.; vi. 2; ad Q. Fr. ii. 2, iii. 1. § 2.)

3. Cincius, who was entrusted with the government of Syria in A.D. 62, during the expedition of Corbulon. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 25.)

CINNEAS (Kóvz), a Thessalian, is mentioned by Demosthenes, in a well-known passage (de Cor. p. 324), as one of those who, for the sake of private gain, became the instruments of Philip of Macedon in sapping the independence of their country. Polybius (xxvi. 14) censures Demosthenes for bringing so sweeping a charge against a number of distinguished men; but he does not enter specially into the question with respect to Cinesas and the Thessalians. (Comp. Dem. de Cor. p. 243, de Chers. p. 105; Dio. xiv. 36, 69.) [E. E.]

CINNEAS (Kóvz), a Thessalian, the friend and minister of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. He was the most eloquent man of his day, and remonstrated his hearers (in some degree) of Demosthenes, whom he heard speak in his youth. Pyrrhus prized his persuasive powers so highly, that "the words of Cinesas (he was wont to say) had won him more cities than his own arms." He was also famous for his conversational powers, and some instances of his repartees are still preserved. (Plin. H. N. xiv. 12.) That he was versed in the philosophy of Epicurus is plain from the anecdote related by Cicero (Cat. Maj. 13) and Plutarch. (Pyrh. 20.) But this is no ground for assuming that he professed this philosophy. At all events he did not practise it; for, instead of whiling away life in useless ease, he served Pyrrhus long and actively; and he took so much interest in the art of war, as to epitomise the Tactica of Aeneas (Aelian, Tact. 1); and this, no doubt, is the work to which Cicero refers when he speaks of Cinesas' books de re militaris (ad Fam. iv. 25). Dr. Arnold says Plutarch mentions his Commentaries, but it does not appear to what he refers. The historian, writer referred to by Strabo (vii. fin. p. 329) may be the same person.

The most famous passage in his life is his embassy to Rome, with proposals for peace from Pyrrhus, after the battle of Hemeda (B.C. 320). Cinesas spared no arts to gain favour. Thanks to his wonderful memory, on the day after his arrival he was able (we are told) to address all the senators and knights by name (Plin. H. N. vii. 24); and in after times stories were current that he sought to gain them over by offering presents to them and their wives, which, however, were disdainfully rejected. (Plut. Pyrh. 18; Dio. Exe. Vite. xxii. 1; Liv. xxxiv. 4.) The terms he had to offer were bad, viz. that all the Greeks in Italy should be left free, and that the Romans should give them open admittance. Downwards should receive back all they had forfeited to Rome. (Appian, Sann. Frugm. x.) Yet such was the need, and such the persuasiveness of Cinesas, that the senate would probably have yielded, if the scale had not been turned by the dying eloquence of old Appius Caecus. [Clausius, No. 10.] The ambassador returned and told the king (say the Romans), that there was no people like that people,—their city was a temple, their senate an assembly of kings. Two years after (B.C. 273), when Pyrrhus was about to cross over into Sicily, Cinesas was again sent to negotiate peace, but on easier terms; and though the senate refused to conclude a treaty while the king was in Italy, his minister's negotiations were in effect successful. (Appian, Sann. Frugm. xi.) Cinesas was then sent over to Sicily, according to his master's usual policy, to win all he could by persuasion, before he tried the sword. (Plut. Pyrh. 22.) And this is the last we hear of him. He probably died before Pyrrhus returned to Italy in B.C. 276, and with him the star of his master's fortune set. He was (as Niebuhr says) the king's good genius, and his place was filled by unworthy favourites.

CINESSIAS (Kínnfsh), a dithyrambic poet of Athens. The Scholast on Aristophanes (Rus. 153) calls him a Theban, but this account seems to be virtually contradicted by Plutarch (de Gorg. Ath. 5), and may perhaps have arisen, as Fabricius suggests (Bid. Græc. h. p. 117), from confounding him with another person of the same name. (Comp. Aristot. op. Schol. ed Aristoph. Ath. 1279.) Fabricius himself mentions Evagoras as his father, on the authority of Eupolemos, to whom also we are indebted for Plato, the comic poet, which is quoted by Galen. (See Duselchamp, ad Athen. xii. 551.) In the "Gorgias" of Plato (p. 501, c,) he is expressly called the son of Meles. His talents are said to have been of a very inferior order. Plutarch (t.c.) calls him a poet of no high repute or creative genius. The comic writer, Pherecyttes (ep. Plat. de Mus. 30), accuses him of having introduced and corrupted music into poetry: and to this Aristophanes perhaps alludes in the word διαμαγώματας. (Nub. 332.) In the Birds (1572—1409), he is introduced as wishing to fly up to Olympus to bring down from the clouds, their proper region, a fresh supply of "mingling odes, air-trost and snow-

beaten" (ἀποστολὰς καὶ νιφόδεον ἀναλάθα, comp. Aristot. Rhet. iii. 9 § 1). But he presented many salient points, besides the character of his poems, to the attacks of comedy. Athenaeus tells us (xiv. p. 551), that he was so tall and thin as to be obliged to wear, for the support of his body, a species of stays made of the wood of the linden tree. Hence Aristophanes (Av. 1676) calls him φυλάρχος: hence, too (Rom. 1433), he makes Eu- ripides propose to fit Cinesias, by way of wings, to a fellow-rogue, Cecropus; and in a fragment of the Πυθαγοραῖοι (ap. Athen. l. c.) he speaks of him as a fit ambassador from the Dithyrambic poets to their shadowy brethren of the craft in Hades. (Comp. Strattis, ap. Athen. l. c.; Daldychamp, ad loc.; and the authors there referred to.) A more legitimate ground of satire was furnished by his impiety, which was open and excessive, and his very profligate life; and we learn from Lysia, the orator (ap. Athen. l. c.), who himself attacked him in two orations,—now lost with the exception of the fragment here referred to,—that not a year passed in which he was not assailed on this score by the comic poets. He had his revenge however; for he succeeded in procuring (probably about b.c. 380) the abolition of the Choragia, as far as regarded comedy, which had indeed been declining ever since the Archbishopship of Callias in b.c. 406. In consequence of this Strattis attacked him in his play called "Cinesias." (Schol. ad Arist. Ran. 404; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 497; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, bii. ch. 22; Clinton, sub anmns 406, 388, 337.) From Lysias also (ap. Athen. l. c.), we learn, that Cinesias abandoned prudently the practice of his art, and betook himself to the trade of an informer, which he found a very profitable one. (Comp. Perizon. ad Ael. V. H. iii. 8, x. 6; Schol. ad Aristoph. II. c.; Plut. de Superst. 10; Harpocration and Suid. s. v. Κυνισίας.) [E. E.]

CINGETORIX, a Gaul, one of the first men in the city of the Treviri (Trèves, Trier). He attached himself to the Romans, though son-in-law to Indutiusmenus, the head of the independent party. When this leader had been put to death by order of Caesar, he was promoted to be chief of his native city. (Caes. B. G. v. 29—50, vi. 12.) Caesar (B. G. v. 29) mentions another Cingetorix, a chief of the Kentish Britons. [H. G. L.]

CINGO'NIUS VARRO. [VARRO.]

CINNA, an early Roman jurist, mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2, s. 2, § 44), among the disciples of Servius Sulpicius. [T. CARSIUS.] He is cited by Ulpian (Dig. 23. tit. 2, s. 6), and by Javolenus. (Dig. 35, tit. 1. s. 40. § 40.) There are no data to identify him with any of the various historical Cinnas of his age. He was later than the celebrated L. Cornelius Cinna, who was consul in b.c. 87-84; but may have been his son. [CINNA, No. 3.] The grandson, Cn. Cornelius CINNA MAGNUS, consul in A.D. 5, is of milder too late a date, and, moreover, is termed by Sueton. (de Clem. L. 9), a stupid man, "quod nostro iuro contemptum minus convenit," says Maiusius, who seems disposed to identify the jurist with the poet C. Helvius CINNA, the author of Smyrna. (Maiusius, ad XXX. J'Clou. ii. p. 143.) [J. T. G.]

CINNA, CAUTULUS, a Stoic philosopher, a teacher of M. Aurelius. (Capitol. Anton. Phil. 3; Antonin. i. 13.)

CINNA, CORNELIUS. Cinna was the name of a patrician family of the Cornelis gens.

1. L. CORNELIUS L. F. P. CINNA, consul in b.c. 127. (Fast. Sic.)

2. L. CORNELIUS L. F. L. N. CINNA, son of No. 1, the famous leader of the popular party, during the absence of Sulla in the East. (a. c. 87—84.) He was praetorius legatus in the Maris war. (Cic. pro Font. 15.) In b. c. 87, when Sulla was about to take the command against Mithridates, he allowed Cinna to be elected consul with Cn. Octavius, on condition of his taking an oath not to alter the constitution as then existing. (Sall. Bell. Jug. Dion Cass. Probr. 117.) Yet Cinna's first act as consul was to impeach Sulla (Cic. in Cat. iii. 10, Brut. 47, Tusc. Disp. v. 10); and as soon as the general had left Italy, he began his endeavour to over-power the senate, by forming a strong popular party out of the new citizens, chiefly of the Italian states, who had lately been enrolled in the 35 old tribes, whereas they had before voted separately as eight tribes (Appian, B. C. i. 55, 56; Cic. Philipp. viii. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 29); and by their aid it was proposed to recall Marius and his party. The other consul, Octavius, was ill fitted to oppose the energy of the popular leaders (Plut. Mar. 41, 42, Sertor. 4); yet Sulla had left the party of the senate so strong, that on the day of voting, Octa- vius was unable to defeat Sulla; and Cinna flew the city. He was soon joined by Sertorius and others, who assisted in raising the Italians against the party now in power at Rome; for which the senate, by unconstitutionally deposing him from the consulate, had given him a very specious pretext. Cinna and his friends then marched upon Rome and invested it from the land, while Marius, having landed from Africa, blockaded it on the sea-side; and to his life more properly belong the siege and capture of the city, with the massacre of Sulla's friends. (MARIUS.)

Next year (b. c. 86) Cinna and Marius made themselves consuls; but Marius dying in January, was succeeded by L. Valerius Flaccus. Him Cinna got rid of by appointing him to the command against Mithridates, hoping thereby also to provide Sulla with a new ally. But Flaccus was killed by his legatus C. Flavius Fimbria. (Vell. Pat. ii. 23; Appian, B. C. i. 75.) In b. c. 85, Cinna entered on his third consulate with Cn. Papirius Carbo, an able man, who had already been of great use to the party. Sulla now threatened to return and take vengeance on his enemies; and the next year (b. c. 84), Cinna and Carbo being again consuls, he fulfilled his threat. Cinna had assembled an army at Brundisium, and sent part of it across to Liburnia, intending to meet Sulla before he set foot in Italy; but when he ordered the rest to follow, a mutiny arose, and in the effort to quell it he was slain. (For the sequel see SULLA.)

Cinna was a bold and active man, but his boldness was akin to rashness, and his activity little directed by judgment. Single-handed he could do nothing; he leaned for support first on Sertorius, then on Marius, then on Carbo; and fell at last from wanting the first quality of a general, ability to command the confidence of his troops. Veilleus's character of him is more anti-ethical than true. (ii. 24.)

3. L. CORNELIUS L. F. L. N. CINNA, son of No. 2. When very young he joined M. Lepidus in overthrowing the constitution of Sulla (b. c. 78); and on the defeat and death of Lepidus in Sardinia, he went with M. Perperna to join Sertorius in Spain. (Suet. Cass. 5; Plut. Sert. 15.) Caesar, his brother-in-law, wishing to make use of him against the party of the senate, procured his recall from exile. But his father had been prescribed by Sulla, and young Cinna was by the laws of procession unable to hold office, till Caesar, when dictator, had them repealed. He was not elected praetor till b. c. 44. By that time he had become discontented with Caesar’s government; and though he would not join the conspirators, he approved of their act. And so great was the rage of the mob against him, that notwithstanding he was praetor, they nearly murdered him; nay, they did murder Helvius Cinna, tribune of the plebs, whom they mistook for the praetor, though he was at the time walking in Caesar’s funeral procession. (Plut. Brut. 18, Caes. 68; Suet. Caes. 52, 85, &c.; Val. Max. ix. 9; § 1.) Cicero praises him for not taking any provocation (Philipp. iii. 10); but it may be doubted whether the conspirators gave him the choice, for the praetor does not seem to have been a very important person. He married a daughter of Pompeius Magnus.

4. CINNA, probably brother of the last, served as quaeator under Dolabella against Brutus. (Plut. Brut. 25; Cic. Philipp. x. 6.)

5. CN. CORNELIUS CINNA MAGNUS, son of No. 3, and therefore grandson of Pompey, whence he received the surname of Magnus. Though he sided with Antony against Octavius, he was preferred to a priesthood by the conqueror, and became consul in A. D. 5. (Suet. de Cæs. i. 9; Dion Cass. iv. 14. 22.)

The name of Cinna occurs, in the form of Cina, on asses, semisses, and trientes. A specimen of one is given below: the obverse represents the head of Janus, the reverse the prow of a ship.

CINNA, C. HELVIIUS, a poet of considerable renown, was the contemporary, companion, and friend of Catullus. (Catull. x., xxv., xxvii.) The year of his birth is totally unknown, but the day of his death is generally supposed to be a matter of common notoriety; for Suetonius (Caes. 85) informs us, that immediately after the funeral of Julius Caesar the rabble rushed with fire-brands to the houses of Brutus and Cassius, but having been with difficulty driven back, chanced to encounter Helvius Cinna, and mistaking him, from the resemblance of name, for Cornelius Cinna, who but the day before had delivered a violent harangue against the late dictator, they killed him on the spot, and bore about his head stuck on a spear. The same story is repeated almost in the same words by Valerius Maximus (ix. 9, § 1), by Appian (B. C. ii. 147), and by Dion Cassius (xiv. 50), with this addition, that they all three call Helvius Cinna a tribune of the plebeians, and Suetonius himself in a previous chapter (50) had spoken of Helvius Cinna as a tribune, who was to have brought forward a law authorizing Caesar to marry whom he pleased and as many as he pleased, in order to make sure of an heir. Plutarch likewise (Caes. 68) tells us that Cinna, a friend of Caesar’s, was torn to pieces under the supposition that he was Cinna, one of the conspirators. None of the above authorities take any notice of Cinna being a poet; but Plutarch, as if to supply the omission, when relating the circumstances over again in the life of Brutus (c. 20), expressly describes the victim of this unhappy blunder as ποιητὴς ἄρη (ἐν δὲ τὸς Κίππας, ποιητής ἄρη — the reading ποιητὴς ἄρη being a conjectural emendation of Xylander). The chain of evidence thus appearing complete, scholars have, with few exceptions, concluded that Helvius Cinna, the tribune, who persisted thus, was the same with Helvius Cinna the poet; and the story of his dream, as narrated by Plutarch (Caes. l. c.) has been embodied by Shakespeare in his Julius Caesar.

Weichert, however, following in the track of Reiske and J. H. Voss, refuses to admit the identity of these personages. He finds that chronological difficulties render the position untenable. He builds almost entirely upon two lines in Virgil’s ninth eclogue, which is commonly assigned to b. c. 40 or 41.

Nam neque admic Vario videor, nee dicere Cinna Digna, sed argus inter streper anser aures, arguing that, since Vario was alive at this epoch, Cinna must have been alive also; that the Cinna here celebrated can be no other than Helvius Cinna; and that inasmuch as Helvius Cinna was alive in b. c. 40, he could not have been murdered in b. c. 44. But, although the conclusion is undeniable if we admit the premises, it will be at once seen that these form a chain, each separate link of which is a pure hypothesis. Allowing that the date of the pastoral has been correctly fixed, although this cannot be proved, we must bear in mind——1. That Vario and that Vario is the rendering in every MS.——2. That even if Vario be adopted, the expression in the above verses might have been used with perfect propriety in reference to any hard who had been a contemporary of Virgil, although recently dead. 3. That we have no right to assert dogmatically that the Cinna of Virgil must be C. Helvius Cinna, the friend of Catullus. Hence, although we may grant that it is not absolutely certain that Helvius Cinna the tribune and Helvius Cinna the poet were one and the same, at all events this opinion rests upon much stronger evidence than the other.

The great work of C. Helvius Cinna was his Smyrna; but neither Catullus, by whom it is highly extolled (xv.), nor any other ancient writer gives us a hint with regard to the subject, and hence the various speculations in which critics have indulged, rest upon no basis whatsoever. Some believe that it contained a history of the adventures of Smyrna the Amazon, to whom the famous city of Ionia ascribed its origin; others that it was connected with the myth of Adonis and with the legend of Myrrha, otherwise named Smyrna, the incestuous daughter of Cinyras; at all events, it certainly was not a drama, as a commentator upon Quintilian has dreamed; for the fragments, short and unsatisfactory as they are, suffice to demonstrate that it belonged to the epic style. These consist of two disjointed hexameters 3 c 2. preserved by Priscian (vi. 16. § 84, ed. Kroehl) and the Scholastici on Juvenal (vi. 153), and two consecutive lines without Servius (ad Verg. Georg. i. 289), which are not given merit so far as making verseification is concerned.

Te matutinus flentem conspexit Roux Et flentem Paulo vidit post Hesperus idem.

The circumstance that nine years were spent in the elaboration of this piece has been frequently dwelt upon, may have suggested the well-known precept of Horace, and unquestionably secured the suffrage of the grammarians. (Catull. xv.; Quint. x. 4. § 4; Serv. and Philargyr, ad Verg. Ec. ix. 35; Hor. A. P. 387, and the comments of Aero, Porphyr. and the Schol. Cracq.; Martial, Epigr. x. 11; Oell. xix. 9, 13; Sueton. de Iulio. Gramm. 16.)

Besides the Smyrna, he was the author of a work entitled Propositiones Politian, which Voss imagines to have been dedicated to Attius Pollio when setting forth in n. c. 40 on an expedition against the Parni of Dalmatia, from which he returned in triumph the following year, and founded the first public library ever opened at Rome from the profits of the spoils. This rests of course upon the assumption that Cicero was not killed in n. c. 44, and until that fact is decided, it is vain to reason upon the subject, for the fragments, which extend to six hexameter lines, of which four are consecutive, throw no light on the question. (Charis, Inst. Gramm. p. 93, ed. Putsch; Isidor. Orig. xii. 2, 4.)

Lastly, in Isidorus (vi. 12) we find four elegiac verses, while one hexameter in Suetonius (de Ilustr. Gramm. 11), one hexameter and two hendecasyllabics in Callius (ix. 12, xii. 13), and two stanzas in Nonius Marcellus (s. v. Clupiaet, cannis), are quoted from the "Poezama" and "Epigrammata" of Cicero. The elocution to which some of these fugitive essays belonged may be inferred from the words of Ovid in his apology for the Ars Amatoria. (Trist. ii. 435.) (Weichert, Poetar. Latin. Rerum.)

CINNAMUS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης Κίναμος), also called CINNAMUS (Κίναμος), and SIINNAMUS (Σίνναμος), one of the most distinguished Byzantine historians, and the best European historian of his time, lived in the twelfth century of the Christian era. He was one of the "Grammatel" or "Notariz" of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, who reigned from A. D. 1143 till 1180. The functions of the imperial notaries, the first of whom was the proto-notarius, were nearly those of private secretaries appointed for both, private and state affairs, and they had a considerable influence upon the administration of the empire. Cinnamus was attached to the person of Manuel at a youthful age, and probably as early as the year of his accession, and he accompanied that great emperor in his numerous wars in Asia as well as in Europe. Favoured by such circumstances, he undertook to write the history of the reign of Manuel, and that of his predecessor and father, the emperor Calo-Joannes; and so well did he accomplish his task, that there is no history written at that period which can be compared with his work. The full title of this work is Εποτε να ταν καταρρηπατών της μακαριστής βασιλείας και ποσφρογυνήτη κυρίας Ἡσιάνη τῆς Κυπριαί, καὶ ἀρχέων τῶν παρεχθέντων τῆς αὐτοῦ τῆς βασιλείας και ποσφρογυνήτη κυρίας Μανουήλ ὁ Κυπριανος περιφύστῳ ἣγανος βασιλεῖας γραμματικὸς Κωνέιος. It is divided into six books; or more correctly into seven, the seventh, however, being not finished: it is not known if the author wrote more than seven books; but as to the seventh, which in the Paris edition forms the end of the sixth and last book, it is evidently mutilated, as it ends abruptly in the account of the siege of Feanum by the emperor Manuel in 1176. As Cinnamus was still alive when Manuel died (1180), it is almost certain that he finished the history of his whole reign; and the loss of the latter part of his work is the more to be regretted, as it would undoubtedly have thrown light on many circumstances connected with the conduct of the Greek aristocracy, and especially of Andronicus Comnenus, afterwards emperor, during the short reign of the infant son and successor of Manuel, Alexis II. In the first book Cinnamus gives a short and concise account of the reign of Calo-Joannes, and in the following he relates the reign of Manuel.

Possessed of great historical knowledge, Cinnamus records the events of his time as a man accustomed to form an opinion of his own upon important affairs; and, being himself a statesman who took part in the administration of the empire, and enjoyed the confidence of the emperor Manuel, he is always master of his subject, and never sacrifices leading circumstances to amusing trifles. His knowledge was not confined to the political state of the Greek empire; he was equally well acquainted with the state of Italy, Germany, Hungary, and the adjoining barbarous kingdoms, the Latin principalities in the East, and the empires of the Persians and Turks. His view of the origin of the power of the popes, in the fifth book, is a fine instance of historical criticism, sound and true without being tedious and dry investigation, and producing the effect of a powerful speech. He is, however, often violent in his attacks on the papal power, and is justly reproached with being prejudiced against the Latin princes, although he deserves that reproach much less than Nicetas and Anna Comnena. His praise of the emperor Manuel is exaggerated, but he is very far from making a romantic hero of him, as Anna Comnena did of the emperor Alexis. Cinnamus is partial and jealous of his enemies, rivals, or such as are above him; he is impartial and just where he deals with his equals, or those below him, or such persons and events as are indifferent to him personally. In short, Cinnamus shows that he was a Byzantine Greek. His style is concise and clear, except in some instances, where he embalms his thoughts in rhetorical figures or poetical ornaments of more show than beauty. This defect also is common to his countrymen; and if somebody would undertake to trace the origin of the deviation of the writers, poets, and artists among the later Greeks from the classical models left them by their forefathers, he would find it in the supernatural tendency of minds imbued with Christianism being in perpetual contact with the sensuality of the Mohammedan faith and the showy materialism of Eastern imagination. Xenophon, Thucydides, and Procopius were the models of Cinnamus; and though he cannot be compared with the two former, still he may be ranked with Procopius, and he was not unworthy to be the disciple of such masters. His work will ever be of interest to the scholar and the historian.
Leo Allatius made Cinnamus an object of deep study, and intended to publish his work; so did Petrus Possius also; but, for some reasons unknown, they renounced their design. The first edition is that of Cornelius Tullius, with a Latin translation and some notes of no great consequence, Utrecht, 1652, 4to. Tullius dedicated this edition, which he divided into four books, to the states of Utrecht, and in his preface gives a brilliant description of the literary merits of Cinnamus. The second edition is that in the Paris collection of the Byzantines by Du Cange, published at Paris, 1670, fol, together with the description of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, by Paulus Silentiarius, and the editor's notes to Nicephorus Bryennius and Anna Comnena. It is divided into six books. Du Cange corrected the text, added a new Latin translation, such of the notes of Tullius as were of some importance, and an excellent philological-historical commentary of his own; he dedicated his edition to the minister Colbert, one of the principal protectors of the French editors of the Byzantines. This edition has been reprinted in the Venice collection, 1729, fol. Cinnamus has lately been published at Bonn, 1836, 8vo., together with Nicephorus Bryennius, by Augustus Meineke; the work is divided into seven books. The editor gives the Latin translation of Du Cange revised in several instances, and the prefaces, dedications, and commentaries of Tullius and Du Cange. (Hannius, De Script. Byzant. Graec. p. 516, &c.; Fabric, Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 733, &c.; the Prefaces and Dedications of Tullius and Du Cange; Leo Allatius, De Poet. p. 24, &c.) [W. P.]

CYNYRAS (Κύνυρα), a famous Cyprician hero. According to the common tradition, he was a son of Apollo by Paphos, king of Cyprus, and priest of the Paphian Aphrodite, which latter office remained hereditary in his family, the Cynyrades. (Pind. Pyth. ii. 26, &c.; Tac. Hist. ii. 3; Schol. ad Theocr. i. 109.) Tacitus describes him as having come to Cyprus from Cilicia, from whence he introduced the worship of Aphrodite; and Apollo-dorus (ii. 14. § 3) too calls him a son of Sandaces, who had emigrated from Syria to Cilicia. Cinyras, after his arrival in Cyprus, founded the town of Paphos. He was married to Methane, the daughter of the Cyprian king, Pygmalion, by whom he had several children. One of them was Adonis, whom, according to some traditions, he begot unwittingly in an incestuous intercourse with his own daughter, Smyrna. He afterwards killed himself on discovering this crime, into which he had been led by the anger of Aphrodite. (Hygin. Fab. 58; Apul. Met. xvi. 34; Plut. Mor. x. 310, &c.) According to other traditions, he had promised to assist Agamemnon and the Greeks in their war against Troy; but, as he did not keep his word, he was cursed by Agamemnon, and Apollo took vengeance upon him by entering into a contest with him, in which he was defeated and slain. (Hom. I. xi. 20, with the note of Bustath.) His daughters, fifty in number, leaped into the sea, and were metamorphosed into alleyes. He is also described as the founder of the town of Cinyreia in Cyprus. (Plin. H. N. v. 31; Nonn. Dionys. xiii. 451.) [L. S.]

CIOS (Κιος), a son of Olympus, from whom Cios (Πρώτα) on the Propontis derived its name, as he was believed to have led thither a band of colonists from Miletus. (Schol. ad Theocrit. xiii. 30; ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1177.) Strabo (vii. p. 564) calls him a companion of Hercules who founded Cios on his return from Colchis. [L. S.]

CIPITUS, a person who gave rise to the proverb "non omnium dormio". He was called Pera- nunchos (περανούνχος), because he pretended to be asleep, in order to give facility to his wife's adultery. (Festus, s. v. Non omnium dormio; Cic. ad Fam. vii. 24.) There are two coins extant: with the name M. CIP. M. F. upon them, but it is not impossible that they may belong to the Cipia gens, as the omission of a letter in a name is by no means of uncommon occurrence on Roman coins.

CIPUS or CIPPUS, GENUICUS, a Roman praetor, to whom an extraordinary prodigy is said to have happened. For, as he was going out of the gates of the city, clad in the publamentum, horns suddenly grew out of his head, and it was said by the haruspices that if he returned to the city, he would be king: but lest this should happen, he imposed voluntary exile upon himself. (Val. Max. v. 6. § 3; Ov. Met. xvi. 563, &c.; Plin. H. N. xii. 37, s. 45.)

CIRCE (Κηρές), a mythical sorceress, whom Homer calls a fair-looking goddess, a daughter of Heles by the oceanid Perse, and a sister of Aëtes. (Od. x. 185.) She lived in the island of Aeae; and when Odysseus on his wanderings came to her island, Circe, after having changed several of his companions into pigs, became so much attached to the unfortunate hero, that he was induced to remain a whole year with her. At length, when he wished to leave her, she prevailed upon him to descend into the lower world to consult the seer Teiresias. After his return from thence, she explained to him the dangers which he would yet have to encounter, and then dismissed him. (Od. lib. x.—xii.; comp. Hygin. Fab. 135.) Her descent is differently described by the poets, for some call her a daughter of Hyperion and Aërope (Arg. Arg. 1215), and others a daughter of Aëtes and Hecate. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 200.) According to Hesiod (Theog. 1011) she became by Odysseus the mother of Agrius. The Latin poets too make great use of the story of Circe, the sorceress, who metamorphosed Scylla and Perses, king of the Aonians. (Ov. Met. xiv. 9, &c.) [L. S.]

CIRRA (Κηρή), a nymph from whom the town of Cirra in Phocis is believed to have derived its name. (Paus. v. 37. § 4.) [L. S.]

CISPIA GENS, plebeian, which came originally from Angania, a town of the Hernici. An ancient tradition related that Cispia Laevus, of Angania, came to Rome to protect the city, while Tullus Hostilius was engaged in the siege of Veii, and that he occupied with his forces one of the two hills of the Esquiline, which was called after him the Cispian mount, in the same way as Oppius of Tusculum did the other, which was likewise called after him the Oppian mount. (Festus, s. v. Septimatio, Cispianus montis; Var. L. L. v. 50, ed.
Müller, where the name is also written Cæsusus and Cipius.)

No persons of this name, however, occur till the very end of the republic. The only cognomen of the gens is Lævus; for those whose surname is not mentioned, see Cipius.

CISPIUS. 1. M. CIPSIUS, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 57, the year in which Ciceró was recalled from banishment, took an active part in Ciceró's favor. The father and brother of Cipius also exerted themselves to obtain Ciceró's recall, although he had had in former times a law-suit with the family. On one occasion the life of Cipius was in danger through his support of Ciceró; he was attacked by the mob of Clodius, and driven out of the forum. In return for these services Ciceró defended Cipius when he was accused of bribery (ambitus), but was unable to obtain a verdict in his favour. (Cic. pro. Pison. 31, post red. in Sen. 8, pro Sest. 33.)

2. CIRCUS, a member of Caesar's officers in the African war, commanded part of the fleet. (Hirt. B. A.fr. 62, 67.) He is perhaps the same as the Cipius Lævus, whom Plancus mentions in a letter to Ciceró in B. C. 43. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 21.)

3. CIPSIUS, a debtor of Ciceró's. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 24, xiii. 33.) Whether he is the same as either of the preceding, is uncertain.

CISSEUS (Kaurwet), a king in Thrace, and father of Thecabar, according to others, of Hecabe. (Hom. ii. vi. 295, xi. 223; Eurip. Hec. 3; Hygin. Fab. 91; Virg. Aen. vii. 720; Serv. ad Aen. v. 535.) There are two other mythical beings of the name of Cisæus. (Apollod. ii. l. § 5; Virg. Aen. x. 317.)

CYSSIDAS (Koσερίας), a Syracusan, commanded the body of auxiliaries which Dionysius I. sent, for the second time, to the aid of Sparta. (B. C. 367.) He assisted Archidamus in his successful attack on Cyrus, and in his expedition against Arcadia in the same year. But during the campaign in Arcadia he left him, as the period fixed for his stay by Dionysius had now expired. On his march towards Laconia he was intercepted by a body of Messenians, and was obliged to send to Archidamus for assistance. The prince having joined him with his forces, they changed their route, but were again intercepted by the combined troops of the Arcadians and Argives. The result was, the defeat of the latter in that battle which has been called the "Terrorous Battle." (Xen. Hell. vii. l. §§ 30-32; see p. 267, b.)

CITERIUS SINDONIUS, the author of an epitaph on three shepherds, which has no poetical merit, and is not remarkable for its quaintness. It is printed in Wiardorf's Phileus Latini Antiquor (vol. ii. p. 215), and in the Anthologia Latina (ii. Ep. 257, ed. Burmann, Ep. 253, ed. Meyer). Its author appears to be the same as the Citerius, one of the professors at Bourdeaux, and the friend of Ausonius, commemorated in a poem of the latter. (Prof. Burdig. xiii.) We learn from Ausonius that Citerius was born at Syracusa, in Sicily, and was a grammarian and a poet. In his hyperbolical panegyric, Ausonius compares him to Aristocrates and Zenodorus, and says that his poems, written at an early age, were superior to those of Simonides. Citerius afterwards settled at Bourdeaux, married a rich and noble wife, but died without leaving any children.

CITHÆRON (Kitaūs), a mythical king in Boeotia, from whom mount Cithæron was believed to have derived its name. Once when Heracles was angry with Zeus, Cithæron advised the latter to take into his chariot a wooden statue and dress it up so as to make it resemble Plataea, the daughter of Asopus. Zeus followed his counsel, and as he was riding along with his pretended bride, Heracles overcame her jealousy, ran up to him, tore the covering from the suspected bride, and on discovering that it was a statue, became reconciled to Zeus. (Paus. ix. l. § 2, 3, § 1.) Respecting the festival of the Dædalus, celebrated to commemorate this event, see Dict. of Aut. s. v. [L. S.]

CIVICA CEREALES. [CEREALES.]

CIVILIS, CLAUDIUS, was the leader of the Batavi in their revolt from Rome, A. D. 69-70. The Batavi were a people of Germanic origin, who had left the nation of the Catti, of which they were a part, and had settled in and about the island which is formed by the mouths of the Rhine and the Meuse (Mosa). The important position which they occupied led the Romans to cultivate their friendship, and they rendered good service to Rome in the wars in Germany and Britain, under the early emperors. When Rome gave up the idea of subduing Germany, the nations west of the Rhine, especially those of Germanic origin, began to feel a hope of setting themselves free. The civil wars afforded an opportunity for the attempt, and the oppressions of the imperial legates furnished the provocation. It was out of such an act of oppression that the rebellion of Civilis sprung.
Julius Paulus and Claudius Civilis were brothers of the Batavian royal race, and exceled all their nation in personal accomplishments. On a false charge of treason, Nero's legate, Fonteius Capito, put Julius Paulus to death, A. D. 67 or 68, and sent Civilis in chains to Nero at Rome, where he was heard and acquitted by Galba. He was afterwards prefect of a cohort, but under Vitellius he became an object of suspicion to the army, who demanded his punishment. (Compare Tac. Hist. l. 59.) He escaped the danger, but he did not forget the affront. He thought of Hannibal and Sertorius, like whom he had lost an eye; and, being endowed, says Tacitus, with greater mental power than is common among barbarians, he began the execution of his schemes of enmity to Rome under the pretense of supporting the cause of Vespasian. In order to understand the events which occurred at this period in the Germanies and Gaul, it must be remembered that the legions of Germany were Vitellius's own troops, who had called him to the purple, and who remained steadfast to his cause to the very last. The legates, on the other hand, early chose the side of Vespasian, and it was not without reason that they were accused by their soldiers of treasonable

* In the following narrative it is necessary to bear in mind the distinction between Germany, properly so called, and the two Gallic provinces on the left bank of the Rhine, which, from their population being chiefly of Germanic origin, were called the Germanies (Germania Inferior, and Germania Superior). The scene of the war with Civilis was on the left bank of the Rhine, and chiefly in Germania Inferior.

† Tacitus (Hist. i. 59) also calls Civilis Julius, and so do other writers. (Plut. Eth. 25, p. 770; where, however, Julius Tutor is possibly meant; Frontin. Strat. iv. 3, § 14.)

rominance at the progress of the insurrection on the Rhine. (See especially Tacit. Hist. iv. 27.) Thus Civilis was urged by a letter from Antoninus Primus, and by a personal request from Hordeonius Flaccus, to prevent the German legions from marching into Italy to the support of Vitellius, by the appearance of a Germanic insurrection; an appearance which Civilis himself resolved to convert into a reality. His designs were aided by an edict of Vitellius, calling for a levy of the Batavians, and still more by the harshness with which the command was executed; for feeble old men were compelled to pay for exemption from service, and beautiful boys were seized for the vilest purposes. Irritated by these cruelties, and urged by Civilis and his confederates, the Batavians refused the levy; and Civilis having, according to the ancient German custom, called a solemn meeting at night in a sacred grove, easily bound the chiefs of the Batavians by an oath to revolt. Messengers were sent to secure the assistance of the Cuninefates, another Germanic tribe, living on the same island, and others to try the fidelity of the Batavian cohorts, which had formerly served in Britain, and were now stationed at Magoniacum, as a part of the Roman army on the Rhine. The first of these missions was completely successful. The Cuninefates chose Eunicus for their chief; and he, having joined to himself the Frisii, a nation beyond the Rhine, attacked the furthest winter quarters of the Romans, and compelled them to retire from their forts. Upon this, Civilis, still dissembling, accused the prefects, because they had deserted the camp, and declared that with his single cohort he would reprove the revolt of the Cuninefates; whereupon the prefects retired and encamped themselves quietly to their winter quarters. His treachery was, however, seen through, and he found himself compelled openly to join the insurgents. At the head of the Cuninefates, Frisii, and Batavi, he engaged the Romans on the bank of the Rhine. In the midst of the battle, a cohort of the Tungri deserted to Civilis, and decided the battle on the land; while the Roman fleet, which had been collected on the river to co-operate with the legions, was carried over to the German bank by the rowers, many of whom were Batavians, who overpowered the pilots and centurions. Civilis followed up his victory by sending messengers through the two Germanies and the provinces of Gaul, urging the people to rebellion; and aimed at the kingdom of the Germanies and Gauls. Hordeonius Flaccus, the governor of the Germanies, who had secretly encouraged the first efforts of Civilis, now ordered his legate, Mummium Luperces, to march against the enemy. Civilis gave him battle; and Luperces was immediately deserted by an aide of Batavians; the rest of the auxiliaries fled; and the legionary soldiers were obliged to retreat into Vetara Castra, the great station which Augustus had formed on the left bank of the Rhine, as the head quarters for operations against Germany. About the same time some veteran cohorts of Batavians and Cunicifates, who were on their march into Italy by the order of Vitellius, were induced by the emissaries of Civilis to mutiny and to march back into Lower Germany, in order to join Civilis, which they were enabled to effect by the indecision of Hordeonius Flaccus, who, meeting them on their way, was persuaded by the Flaccus Gallus, who was stationed at Born, and who was forced by his soldiers to resist their march. Civilis was now at the head of a complete army; but, being still unwilling to commit himself to an open contest with the Roman power, he caused his followers to take the oath to Vespasian, and sent envoys to the two legions which, as above related, had taken refuge in Vetara Castra, to induce them to take the same oath. Enraged at their refusal, he called to arms the whole nation of the Batavi, who were joined by the Bructeri and Tecterii, while emissaries were sent into Germany to rouse the people. The Roman legates, Mummium Luperces and Nummus Rufus, strengthened the fortifications of Vetara Castra. Civilis marched down both banks of the Rhine, having ships also on the river, and blockaded the camp, after a fruitless attempt to storm it. The operations of Hordeonius Flaccus were retarded by his weakness, his anxiety to save Vespasian, and the mistrust of his soldiers, to whom this inclination was no secret; and he was at last compelled to give up the command to Dillius Vocula. The dissensions at this period in the Roman camp are described elsewhere. [HORDEONIUS FLACCU; HERMINNUS GALLUS; DIllIUS VOCUSLA.] Civilis, in the meantime, having been joined by large forces from all Germany, proceeded to harass the tribes of Gaul west of the Mosse, even as far as the Menapi and Morini, on the sea shore, in order to shake their fidelity to the Romans. His efforts were more especially directed against the Treveri and the Ubii. The Ubii were firm in their faith, and suffered severely in consequence. He then pressed on the siege of Vetara Castra, and, yielding to the ardour of his new allies beyond the Rhine, tried again to storm it. The effort failed, and he had recourse again to attempt to tamper with the besieged soldiers.

These events occurred towards the end of A. D. 69, before the battle of Cremnum, which decided the victory of Vespasian over Vitellius. [VESPAELIANUS.] When the news of that battle reached the Roman army on the Rhine, Alpinus Montanus was sent to Civilis to summon him to lay down his arms, since his professed object was now accomplished. The only result of this mission was, that Civilis sowed the seeds of dissatisfaction in the envoy's mind. Civilis now sent against Vocula his veteran cohorts and the bravest of the Germans, under the command of Julius Maximus, and Claudius Victor, his sister's son, who, having taken on their march the winter quarters of an auxiliary tribe at Ascburgium, fell suddenly upon the camp of Vocula, which was only saved by the arrival of unexpected aid. Civilis and Vocula are both blamed by Tacitus, the former for not sending a sufficient force, the latter for neglecting to follow up his victory. Civilis now attempted to gain over the legions who were besieged in Vetara Castra, by pretending that he had conquered Vocula, but one of the captives whom he paraded before the walls for this purpose, shouted out and revealed the truth, his credit, as Tacitus observes, being the more established by the fact, that he was stabbed to death by the Germans on the spot. Shortly afterwards, Vocula marched up to the relief of Vetara Castra, and defeated Civilis, but again neglected to follow up his victory, most probably from design. [VOCUSLA.] Civilis soon again reduced the Romans to great want of provisions, and forced them to retire to Gelubna, and to place their trust in the station of Ostericum; to which place Civilis, with some officers, went to take Gelubna. The Romans, paralyzed by new dissensions [HORDEONIUS FLACCU; VOCULA;], suffered another defeat from Civilis; but some of them, rallying under Voeula, re-took Magnoniaem.

At the beginning of the new year (A.D. 70), the war assumed a fresh and more formidable character. The news of the death of Vitellius exasperated the Roman soldiers, encouraged the insurgents, and shook the fidelity of the Gaules; while a rumor was moreover circulated that the winter quarters of the Moesian and Pannonian legions were besieged by the Dacians and Sarmatians; and above all the burning of the Capitol was esteemed an omen of the approaching end of the Roman empire. Civillis, whose last remnant of dissimulation was necessarily torn away by the death of Vitellius, gave his undivided energies to the war, and was joined by Classicus and Julius Tutor, who at length gained over the army of Voeula. [Classicus; Tutor; Sarinus.] The besieged legions at Vettera Castra could now hold out no longer; they capitulated to Civillis, and took the oath to the empire of the Gaules (in vertba Galliarum), but as they marched away, they were all put to death by the Germans, probably not without the connivance of Civillis. That chiefman, having at length performed his vow of enmity to the Romans, now cut off his hair which, according to the custom of the Germans, he had suffered to grow since the beginning of his enterprise. (Tac. Germ. 31.) Neither Civillis nor any others of the Batavians took the oath in vertba Galliarum, which was the watchword of Classicus and Tutor; for they trusted that, after having disposed of the Romans, they should be able to overpower their Gallic allies. Civillis and Classicus now destroyed all the Roman winter camps, except those at Magontiacum and Vindonnissa. The Germans demanded the destruction of Colonia Agrippinensis, but it was at length spared, chiefly through the gratitude of Civillis, whose son had been kept in safety there since the beginning of the war. Civillis now gained over several neighbouring states. He was opposed by his old enemy Claudius Labec, at the head of an irregular force of Betasi, Tungri, and Nervii; and, by a daring act of courage, he not only decided the victory, but gained the alliance of the Tungri and the other tribes. The attempt, however, to unite all Gaul in the revolt completely failed, the Treviri and the Lingones being the only people who joined the insurgents. [Sarimus.]

The reports of these events which were carried to Rome had at length roused Macarius, who now sent an immense army to the Rhine, under Petellus Cerealis and Aemius Gallus. [Cerealis; Gallus.]

The insurgents were divided among themselves, Civillis was busy among the Belgae, trying to crush Claudius Labec; Classicus was quietly enjoying his new empire; while Tutor neglected the important duty, which had been assigned to him, of guarding the Upper Rhine and the passes of the Alps. Cerealis had therefore little difficulty in overcoming the Treviri and regaining their capital. [Tutor; Valentinus.] While he was stationed there he received a letter from Civillis and Classicus, informing him that Vespasian was dead, and offering him the empire of the Gauls. Civillis now wished to wait for success from beyond the Rhine, but the opinion of Tutor and Classicus prevailed, and a battle was fought on the Mosella in which the Romans, though at first almost beaten, gained a complete victory, and destroyed the enemy's camp. Colonia Agrippinensis now came over to the Romans; but Civillis and Classicus still made a brave stand. The Canninecates destroyed the greater part of a Roman fleet, and defeated a body of the Nervii, who, after submitting to Fabius Priscus, the Roman legate, had of their own accord attacked their former allies. Having renewed his army from Germany, Civillis encamped at Vettera Castra, whither Cerealis also marched with increased forces, both leaders being eager for a decisive battle. It was soon fought, and Cerealis gained the victory by the treachery of a Batavian; but, as the Romans had no fleet, the Germans escaped across the Rhine. Here Civillis was joined by reinforcements from the Chauci; and, after making, with Verax, Classicus, and Tutor, one unsuccessful effort to hold his ground in the island of the Batavi, he was again defeated by Cerealis, and driven back across the Rhine. Emissaries were sent by Cerealis to make private offers of peace to the Batavians, and of pardon to Civillis, who found that he had no alternative but to surrender. He obtained an interview with Cerealis on a bridge of the river Vahalis. The History of Tacitus breaks off suddenly just after the commencement of his speech. (Tac. Hist. iv. 12-37, 54-79; v. 14-26. Joseph. Bell. Jud. vii. 4. § 2; Dion Cass. Ixv. 3.)

CLANIS, the name of two mythical beings. (Ov. Met. x. 140, xxi. 379.)

CLARA, DAEI, daughter of the emperor Didius Julium and his wife Manlia Scantilla. She was married to Cornelius Repentinus, who was appointed praefectus urbi in the room of Flavius Sulpicius; she received the title of Augusta upon her father's accession, and was deprived of it at his death. Her effigy appears upon coins, but these are of great rarity. (Spartan. Iulian. 3; 8; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 151.)

[CL]ARIIUS (Κάσσως), a surname of Apollo, derived from his celebrated temple at Claros in Asia Minus, which had been founded by Manto, the daughter of Teiresias, who, after the conquest of her native city of Thebes, was made over to the Delphic god, and was then sent into the country, where subsequently Colophon was built by the Ionians. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1; ix. 33. § 1; Tzetze, Anth. 54; Strab. xiv. p. 642; Virg. Aen. iii. 360; comp. Müller, Dor. ii. 2. § 7.) Clarus also occurs as a surname of Zeus, describing him as the god who distributes things by lot (κασσως or κασσως, Aeschyl. Sept. 360). A hill near Tegon was sacred to Zeus under this name. (Paus. viii. 53. § 4.)

CLAUSUS, a cognomen of a noble Roman family in the second century of the Christian era.

I. C. SEPTIMIUS CLARUS, a brother of No. 2, and an uncle of No. 3, was an intimate friend of the younger Pliny, who dedicated to him his Epistles, and speaks of him as one "quo nihil verius, nihil simplicius, nihil candidius, nihil fade- ris laviss." (Ep. vii. 3.) All the epistles addressed to him (i. 1, 15, vii. 28, viii.) were addressed to him. Clarus was appointed Praefectus Praetorio by Hadrian, but removed from this office soon afterwards, having, like most of Hadrian's other friends, incurred his suspicion. (Spartian. Hadr. 9, 11, 15.)

2. M. ERICIUS CLARUS, brother of the preceding, is spoken of by Pliny (Ep. ii. 9), as a man of honour, integrity, and learning, and well skilled in pleading causes. He is probably the same as the Ercius Clarus who took and burnt Seleuceia, in conjunction with Julius Alexander, in A.D. 115 (Dion Cass. lxviii. 30), and also the same as the M. Ercius Clarus, who was consul sufficient with Ti. Julius Alexander, in A.D. 117, the year of Trajan's death.

3. SEX. ERICIUS CLARUS, son of No. 2, was also a friend of Pliny, who obtained for him from Trajan the latores clarus, which admitted him to the senate, subsequently secured the quasestorship for him, and writes a letter to his friend Apollinaris, requesting his assistance in canvassing for Ercius who was then aspiring to the tribunate. (Plin. Ep. ii. 9.) A. Gellius speaks of him as a contemporary, and says that he was most devoted to the study of ancient literature; we also learn from the same author that he was the father of the historian, Lucius Ercius." (Gell. vi. 6, xiii. 17.)

The date of his consulship is not known, but we learn from Spartianus (Seser. 1), and an ancient inscription, that he was consul a second time in A.D. 146, with Ch. Claudius Severus. One of Pliny's Epitaphs (i. 15) is addressed to him.

4. C. Ercius Clarus, consul in A.D. 170, with M. Cornelius Cethegus (Pass.), was probably the son of No. 3, and the same as the Præfectus Vigilum mentioned in the Digest. (1. tit. 15. s. 3. § 2.)

5. C. (Julius) Ercius Clarus, probably the son of No. 4, was consul in A.D. 193, with Q. Sosius Falco. The Emperor Commodus had determined to murder both consuls, as they entered upon their office on the 1st of January, but he was himself assassinated on the preceding day. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 22; Capitol. Perit. 15.) After the death of Ager, who had been one of the claimants to the vacant throne, Severus wished Clarus to turn informer, and accuse persons falsely of having assisted Ager, partly with the view of destroying the character of Clarus, and partly that the well-known integrity of Clarus might give an appearance of justice to the unjust judgments that might be pronounced. But as Clarus refused to discharge this disgraceful office, he was put to death by Severus. (Dion Cass. lxviii. 9; Spartan. Seser. 13.)

CLASSICUS, JULIUS, a Trevir, was prefect of an ala of the Treviri in the Roman army on the Rhine, under Vitellius, A.D. 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 14), and afterwards joined Civilis at the head of some of the Treviri in the Rhine army. During the first part of the war with Civilis, the Treviri, like the rest of Gaul, remained firm to the Romans. They even fortified their borders, and opposed the Germans in great battles. (Tac. Hist. iv. 37.) But when the news of Vitellius's death reached Gaul (A.D. 70), there arose a rumour that the chiefs of Gaul had secretly taken an oath to avail themselves of the civil discord of Rome for the recovery of their independence. There was, however, no open sign of rebellion till after the death of Hordanielius Flaccus, when messengers began to pass between Civilis and Classicus, who was still commanding an ala of Trevirians in the army of Vercellus. He was desi-mented from a family of royal blood and of renown both in peace and war, and through his ancestors he accounted himself rather an enemy than an ally of the Roman people. His conspiracy was shared by Julius Tector, a Trevirian, and Julius Secunnus, a Lignon. They met, with some Trevirians and a few Ubii and Turgri, in a house at Colonia Agrippinensia; and, having resolved to occupy the passes of the Alps, to seduce the Roman legions, and to kill the legates, they sent emissaries to rouse the Gauls. Vercellus was warned of the plot, but did not feel strong enough to crush it. He even suffered himself to be enticed by the conspirators to leave his camp at Colonia and to march against Civilis, who was besieging Veternus Castra. The army was not far from this place, when Classicus and Tector, having communicated privately with the Germans, drew off their forces and formed a separate camp. Vercellus, after attempting in vain to gain them back, retired to Novesium. They followed at a little distance, and at length persuaded the disaffected soldiers of Vercellus to desert the emperor and join the insurgents. A small body of the Guttulians and Tectorians, under the leadership of a certain Trebius, went over to the insurgents, and on the following day they seized Tector and Classicus, and sent them to their companions in Veternus Castra. Tector was shot, and Classicus was sent to the place of execution, where he was beheaded. He was succeeded in command by a certain Trebius, who was named Arisopus, a Lignon from the tribe of the Assutaviri.

6. CLAUDIA. 1. Five of this name were daughters of App. Claudius Caecus, censor b. c. 312. [CLAUDIUS, Stemma, No. 10.] It is related of one of them, that, being thronged by the people as she was returning home from the games, she expressed a wish that her brother Publius had been alive, that he might again lose a fleet, and lessen the number of the populace. For this she was fined by the plebeian aediles, b. c. 246. (Liv. xiv.; Valer. Max. viii. 1; 4; Sueton. Tib. 2; Gell. x. 6.)

2. CLAUDIA QUINTA [CLAUDIUS, Stemma, No. 19], probably the sister of App. Claudius Pulcher [CLAUDIUS, No. 17], and grand-daughter of App. Claudius Caesar. Her fame is connected with the story of the transportation of the image of Cybele from Pessinus to Rome. The vessel conveying the image had stuck fast in a shallow at the mouth of the river Tiber, and the sailors announced that only a chaste woman could move it. Claudia, who had been accused of indecency, stepped forward from among the matrons who had accompanied Secpil to Ostia to receive the image, and after calling upon the goddess to vindicate her innocence, took hold of the rope, and the vessel forthwith followed her. A statue was erected to her in the vestibule of the temple of the goddess. (Liv. xxix. 14; Ost. Fasti. iv. 305, &c.; Cic. de Hort. Resp. 13; Val. Max. i. 8. § 11; Plin. H. N. vii. 35.)

3. CLAUDIA [CLAUDIUS, Stemma, No. 19], daughter of Appius Claudius Pulcher [No. 17]. She was married to Pacuvius Calavius of Capua. (Liv. xxiii. 2.)
CLAUDIA.

4. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 30], daughter of App. Claudius Pulcher [No. 29], was one of the vestal virgins. (Cic. pro Caelio, 14; Val. Max. v. 4. § 6.)

5. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 31], sister of No. 4, was married to Tib. Gracchus. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 4.)

6. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 37], daughter of C. Claudius Pulcher [No. 29], married Q. Marcius Philippus. (Cic. pro Dom. 32.)

7. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 41], eldest sister of P. Claudius Pulcher, the enemy of Cicero (Cic. ad Fam. i. 9), married Q. Marcius Rex. (Plut. Cic. 29; Dion Cass. xxxv. 17.) She is said to have been debauched by her brother Publius. (Plut. Cic. 29; Cic. ad Fam. i. 9.) For a discussion respecting the number of sisters Claudias, see Drumm, vol. ii. p. 374, &c.

8. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 42], the second of the three sisters of P. Claudius, and older than her brother. (Cic. pro Caelio, 15.) She was married to Q. Metellus Celer, but became infamous for her debaucheries (Cic. l. a. 14), which so destroyed all domestic peace, that, as Cicero says (ad Att. ii. 1), she was at open war with her husband, and, on his sudden death, was suspected of having poisoned him. During her husband's lifetime she had wished to form a connexion with Cicero, and, being slighted by him, revenged herself by excising her brother Publius against him, and during his exile annoyed his family. (Pro Caelio, 20, ad Att. ii. 12; Plut. Cic. 29.) Among her paramours was M. Caesar, who after a time left her. To revenge herself, she instigated Atinatus to charge him with having borrowed money of her to hire assassins to murder Dio, the head of the embassy sent by Ptolemaus Aniotes, and with having attempted to poison Cicilia herself. Caesar and Cicero spoke in defence of Caesar, who was acquitted. Cicero in his speech represents Clodia as a woman of most abandoned character, and charges her with having carried on an incestuous intrigue with her brother Publius. (Pro Caelio, 14—20, 32.) The nickname Quadratavia was often applied to her. (Pro Caelio, 26; Quintil. viii. 6. § 53.) Cicero in his letters frequently calls herBoëria. (Ad Att. ii. 9, 12, 14.) Either this Clodia, or her youngest sister, was alive in B. C. 41. (Ad Att. xiv. 8.)

9. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 43], the youngest sister of P. Claudius, was married to L. Licinius Lucullus, before his election to the consulship in B. C. 74. (Plut. Lucull. 21, 34, 38; Var. R. R. iii. 16. § 1.) After his return from the Mithridatic war, Lucullus separated from her, on account of her immorality, and in B. C. 61 brought her to trial for an incestuous amour with her brother P. Clodius. (Plut. Lucull. 34, 38; Cic. pro Mil. 27, ad Fam. i. 9.)

10. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 44], daughter of App. Claudius Pulcher [No. 39], was married to Cn. Pompeius, the eldest son of the trimvirs. (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 13, iii. 4, 11; Dion Cass. xxxix. 60.)

11. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 45], sister of the preceding, was married to M. Brutus, who separated from her in B. C. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 4, ad Att. xiii. 9, 10, Brut. 77, 94.)

12. CLAUDIA [Stemma, No. 49], daughter of P. Clodius, was betrothed in B. C. 43 to Ovidius Augustus, who, however, never regarded her as his wife, and at the outbreak of the Perusinian war sent her back to her mother Fulvia. (Suet. Aug. 62; Dion Cass. clxviii. 5.)

CLAUDIUS, lived in the reign of Tiberius. In A. D. 26, to prepare the way for the assassination of Agrippina, she was brought to trial by Domitius Apel, and convicted of adultery, poisoning, and conspiracy against the emperor. (Tac. Ann. iv. 52; Dion Cass. lix. 19.) She is the last member of this family whose name occurs in history.

13. CLAUDIA PULCHRA, lived in the reign of Tiberius. In A. D. 26, to prepare the way for the assassination of Agrippina, she was brought to trial by Domitius Apel, and convicted of adultery, poisoning, and conspiracy against the emperor. (Tac. Ann. iv. 52; Dion Cass. lix. 19.) She is the last member of this family whose name occurs in history.

14. CLAUDIA, called by Suetonius (Calig. 12) JUNIA CLAUDIDIA, was the daughter of M. Junius Silanus, and was married to Caligula, according to Dion Cassius (viii. 25) in A. D. 35. (Tac. Ann. vi. 20, 45.)

15. CLAUDIA, daughter of the emperor Claudius I. by his wife Plautia Urgulanilla. (Suet. Claud. 27.)

16. CLAUDIA, an illegitimate daughter of Plautia Urgulanilla, the wife of the emperor Claudius I. and his freedman Boter (Suet. Claud. 27), was raised by the command of Claudius.

17. CLAUDIA AUGUSTA, daughter of the emperor Nero by his wife Poppea Sabina. She died young. (Suet. Ner. 35.)

[O. P. M.]

CLAUDIA, daughter of Crispus the brother of Claudius Gothicus, wife of Eutropius, mother of Constantius and grandmother of Constantine the Great. (Tirabell. Poll. Claud. 13.) [W. R.]

CLAUDIA, GENS, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Claudii were of Sabine origin, and came to Rome in B. C. 504, when they were received among the patricians. (Claudius, No. 1.) The patrician Claudii bear various surnames, as Coecus, Cænicius, Caelio, Crassius, Pulcher, Tribilina, and Subius, the two latter of which, though applicable to all the gens, were seldom used, when there was also a more definite cognomen. But as these surnames did not mark distinct families, an account of all the patrician Claudii is given under CLAUDIUS, with the exception of those with the cognomen Nero, since they are better known under the latter name.

The surnames of the plebeian Claudii are Asselii, Canina, Centevulus, Cicero, Flamin, and Marelus, of which the last is by far the most celebrated.

The patrician Claudii were noted for their pride and arrogance, and intense hatred of the commonalty. "The house during the course of centuries produced several very eminent, few great men; hardly a single noble-minded one. In all ages it distinguished itself alike by a spirit of haughty defiance, by disdain for the laws, and iron hardness of heart." (Niebuhr, vol. i. p. 599.) The phrenomen Lucius was avoided after two of that name had dishonoured it, the one by robbery, the other by murder. (Sueton. Tib. 1.) The honours and public offices borne by members of this gens are enumerated by Suetonius. (L. c.) During the republic no patrician Claudius adopted one of another gens; the emperor Claudius was the first who broke through this custom by adopting I. Domitius Ahenobarbus, afterwards the emperor Nero. (Suet. Claud. 39; Tac. Ann. xii. 25.)

[O. P. M.]

CLAUDIUS, the last of the Latin classic poets, flourished under Theodosius and his sons Arcadius and Honorius. Our knowledge of his personal history is very limited. That he was a native of Alexandria seems to be satisfactorily established from the direct testimony of Suidas, corroborated by an allusion in Sidonius CLAUDIANUS.

Apollinaris (Epist. ix. 13), and certain expressions in his own works (e.g. Epist. vi. 3, i. 39, 50). It has been maintained by some that he was a Gaul, and by others that he was a Spaniard; but neither of these positions is supported by even a shadow of evidence, while the opinion advanced by Petarach and Politian, that he was of Florentine extraction, arose from their confounding the Florentines addressed in the introduction to the second book of the Raptus Proserpinae, and who was praefectus uabi in s. d. 396, with the name of their native city. We are entirely ignorant of the parentage, education, and early career of Claudian, and of the circumstances under which he quitted his country. We find him at Rome in 395, when he composed his panegyric on the consulate of Probinus and Olybrius. He appears to have cultivated poetry previously, but this was his first essay in Latin verse, and the success by which it was attended induced him to abandon the Gallican for the Roman muse. (Epist. iv. 13.) During the five years which immediately followed the death of Theodosius, he was absent from Rome, attached, it would appear, to the retinue of Stilicho (de Coni. Stilich. prael. 23), under whose special protection he seems to have received almost immediately after the publication of the poem notice above. We say after, because he makes no mention of the name of the all-powerful Vandal in that composition, where it might have been most naturally and appropriately introduced in conjunction with the exploits of Theodosius, while on all subsequent occasions he eagerly avails himself of every pretext for sounding the praises of his patron, and expressing his own fervent devotion. Nor was he less indebted to the good offices of Serena than to the influence of her husband. He owed, it is true, his court favour and preferment to the latter, but by the interposition of the former he gained his African bride, whose parents, although they might have turned a deaf ear to the suit of a poor poet, were unable to resist the solicitations of the niece of Theodosius, the wife of the general who ruled the ruler of the empire. The following inscription, discovered at Rome in the fifteenth century, informs us that a statue of Claudian was erected in the Forum of Trajan by Arcadius and Honorius at the request of the senate, and that he enjoyed the titles of Notarius and Tribunus, but the nature of the office, whether civil or military, denoted by the latter appellation we are unable to determine. —

The close of Claudian's career is enveloped in the same obscurity as its commencement. The last historical allusion in his writings is to the 6th consulate of Honorius, which belongs to the year 494. That he may have been involved in the misfortunes of Stilicho, who was put to death in 498, and may have retired to end his days in his native country, is a probable conjecture, but nothing more. The idea that he at this time became exposed to the enmity of the powerful and vindictive Hadrian, whom he had provoked by the insolence of wit, and who with cruel vigilance had watched and seized the opportunity of revenge, has been adopted by Gibbon with less than his usual caution. It rests upon two assumptions alike incapable of proof—first, that by Pharios, whose indefatigable charity is contrasted in an epigram (xxx.) with the lethargic indolence of Mallius, the poet meant to indicate the præatorian prefect, who was a native of Egypt; and secondly, that the detail which forms the subject of one of his epistles refers to that effusion, and is addressed to the same person.

The religion of Claudian, as well as that of Appuleius, Ausonius, and many of the later Latin writers, has been a theme of frequent controversy. There is, however, little cause for doubt. It is impossible to resist the explicit testimony of St. Augustin (de Civ. Dei, v. 28), who declares that he was "a Christi nomine alienus," and of Orosius, who designates him as "Praeque videm eximium sed paganus pervicacioussum." The argument for his Christianity derived from an ambiguous expression, interpreted as an admission of the unity of God (decolor. Honor. 96.), is manifestly frivolous, and the Greek and Latin hymns appended to most editions of his works are confessedly spurious. That his conscience may have had all the pliancy of indifference on religious topics is probable enough, but we have certainly nothing to adduce against the positive assertions of his Christian contemporaries.

The works of Claudian now extant are the following: 1. Three panegyrics on the third, fourth, and sixth consulships of Honorius. 2. A Doxe in the nuptials of Honorius and Maria. 3. Four short Pascennie lays on the same subject. 4. A panegyric on the consulship of Probinus and Olybrius, with which is interwoven a description of the exploits of the emperor Theodosius. 5. The praises of Stilicho, in two books, and a panegyric on his consulship, in one book. 6. The praises of Serena, the wife of Stilicho; this piece is mutilated or was left unfinished. 7. A panegyric on the consulship of Flavius Mælius Theodosius. 8. The Epithalamium of Palladius and Celerina. 9. An invective against Rufinus, in two books. 10. An invective against Eutropius, in two books. 11. De Bello Gildonico, the first book of an historical poem on the war in Africa against Gildo. 12. De Bello Getico, an historical poem on the successful campaign of Stilicho against Alaric and the Goths, concluding with the battle of Pollentia. 13. Raptus Proserpinae, three books of an unfinished epic on the rape of Proserpine. 14. Gigantomachia, a fragment extending to a hundred and twenty-eight lines only. 15. Ten lines of a Greek poem on the same subject, perhaps a translation by some other hand from the former. 16. Five short epistles; the first of these is a sort of prayer, imploring forgiveness for some petulant attack. It is usually inscribed "Deprecatio ad Hadriannum Praetextum Praetorium," but from the variations in the manuscripts this title appears to be merely the guess of some transcriber. The remaining four, which are very brief, are addressed—to Serena, to Olybrius, to Probinus, to Gennadius. 17. Eidyllea, a collection of seven poems chiefly on subjects connected with natural history, as may be seen by their titles: Phoebus, Hygienia, Tor谴o, Nitis, Magnus, Apollo, De Pitu Fructibus. 18. A collection of short occa-nomic pieces, in Greek as well as Latin, comprehended under the general title of Epigrams. The Christian hymns to be found among these in most editions are, as we have observed above, certainly spurious. 19. Lastly, we have a hundred and thirty-seven lines entitled "Laudes Hercules;" but with the exception of some slight resemblance in style, we have no ground for attributing them to Claudian.

The measure employed in the greater number of these compositions is the heroic hexameter. The short prologues prefixed to many of the longer poems are in elegies, and so also are the last four epistles, the last two idylls, and most of the epigrams. The first of the Pescennienses is a system of Alcaic hendecasyllables; the second is in a stanza of five lines, of which the first three are limeric dimeters catalectic, the fourth is a pure choriambic dimeter, and the fifth a trochee dimeter bimacroselectic; the third is a system of anapæstic dimeters metatelic; and the fourth is a system of choriambic trimeters catalectic.

It will be at once perceived that the first thirteen articles in the above catalogue, constituting a very large proportion of the whole works of Claudian, although some of them differ from the rest and from each other in form, belong essentially to one class of poems, being such as would be expected from a laureate as the price of the patronage he enjoyed. The object in view is the same in all—all breathe the same spirit, all are declamations in verse devoted either personally or virtually to the glorification of the emperor, his connections and favourites, and to the degradation of their foes. We must also bear in mind, while we discuss the merits and defects of our author, and compare him with those who went before, that although Virgil and Horace were flatterers as well as he, yet their strains were addressed to very different ears. When they, after entering upon some theme apparently far removed from any courtly train of thought, by some seemingly natural although unexpected transition seemed as it were compelled to trace a resemblance between their royal benefactor and the gods and heroes of the olden time, they well knew that their skill would be appreciated by their cultivated hearers, and that the value of the compliment would be enhanced by the dexterous delicacy with which it was administered. But such refinements were by no means suited to the "purple-born" despots of the fifth century and their half-barbarous retainers. Their appetite for praise was craving and coarse. If the adulation was presented in sufficient quantity, they cared little for the manner in which it was seasoned, or the form under which it was served up. Hence there is no attempt at concealment; no veil is thought requisite to shroud the real nature and object of these panegyrics. All is broad, direct, and palpable. The subject is in each case boldly and fully proposed at the commencement, and followed out steadily to the end. The determination to praise everything and the fear lest something should be left unpraised, naturally lead to a systematic and formal division of the subject; and hence the career of each individual is commonly traced upwards from the cradle, and in the case of Sidilico separate sections are allotted to his warfare, his peaceful, and his magisterial virtues,—the poet warning his readers of the transition from one subdivision to another with the same care as when an accurate lecturer discriminates the several heads of his discourse. It can scarcely he argued, however, that the absence of all reserve rendered the task more easy. The ingenuity of the author is severely taxed by other considerations, with this disadvantage, that just in proportion as we might feel disposed to admire his skill in hiding the ugliness of his idol within the folds of the rich garment with which it is invested, so are we constrained to loathe his servile hypocrisy and laugh at his unblushing falsehood. It was indeed hard to be called upon to vaunt the glories of an empire which was crumbling away day by day from the grasp of its feeble rulers; it was harder still to be forced to prove a child of nine years old, at which age Honorius received the title of Augustus, to be a model of wisdom and kingly virtue, and to blazon the military exploits of a boy of twelve who had never seen an enemy except in chains; and hardest of all to be constrained to condone with a halo of divine perfections a squalid Vandal like Stilicho. To talk of the historical value of such works as the Bellum Cildoniacum and the Bellum Geticam is sheer folly. Wherever we have access to other sources of information, we discover at once that many facts have been altogether suppressed, and many others distorted and falsely coloured; and hence it is impossible to feel any confidence in the fidelity of the narrator in regard to those incidents not elsewhere recorded.

The simple fact that pieces composed under such circumstances, to serve such temporary and unworthy purposes, have been read, studied, admired, and even held up as models, ever since the revival of letters, is in itself no mean tribute to the powers of their author. Nor can we hesitate to pronounce him a highly-gifted man. Deeply versed in all the learning of the Egyptian schools, possessing a most extensive knowledge of the history of man and of the physical world, of the legends of mythology, and of the moral and theological speculations of the different philosophical sects, he had the power to light up this mass of learning by the fire of a brilliant imagination, and to concentrate it upon the objects of his adulation as it streamed forth in a flashing flood of rhetoric. The whole host of heaven and every nation and region of the earth are called upon to aid in extolling his patron, the prince, and their satellites; on the other hand, an infernal Pandemonium of demons and fiends with all the horrors of Styx and Tartarus, are evoked as the allies and tormentors of a Raimus, and all nature is transmuted for foul and loathsome images to body forth the natural and emperor defacement of the unholy consul. His diction is highly brilliant, although sometimes shining with the glitter of tinsel ornaments; his similes and illustrations are elaborated with great skill, but the marks of toil are frequently too visible. His versification is highly sonorous, but is deficient in variety; the constant recurrence of the same cadences, although in themselves melodious, pulls upon the ear. His command of the language is perfect; and although the minute critic may fancy that he detects some traces of the foreign extraction of the bard, yet in point of style neither Lucret nor Statius need be ashamed to own him as their equal. His powers appear to greatest advantage in description. His pictures often approach perfection, combining the softness and rich glow of the Italian with the force and reality of the Dutch school.
CLAUDIUS.

We have as yet said nothing of the Rape of Proserpine, from which we might expect to form the most favourable estimate of his genius, for here at least it had fair and free scope, untrammeled by the fetters which cramped its energies in panegyric. But, although these causes of embarrassment are removed, we do not find the result anticipated. If we become familiar with his other works in the first instance, we rise with a feeling of disappointment from the perusal of this. We find, it is true, the same animated descriptions and harmonious numbers; but there is a want of taste in the arrangement of the details, of sustained interest in the action, and of combination in the different members, which gives a fragmentary character to the whole, and causes it to be read with much greater pleasure in extracts than continuously. The subject, although grand in itself, is injudiciously handled; for, all the characters being gods, it is impossible to invest their proceedings with the interest which attaches to struggling and suffering humanity. The impression produced by the commencement is singularly unfortunate. The rage of the King of Shades that he alone of gods is a stranger to matrimonial bliss, his determination to war against heaven that he may avenge his wrongs, the musing and marvelling of the Titans and all the monsters of the abyss for battle against Jupiter, are figured forth with great dignity and pomp; but when we find this terrific tempest at once quelled by the very simple and sensible suggestion of old Laocoon, that he might probably obtain a wife, if he chose to ask for one, the whole scene is converted into a burlesque, and the absurdity is if possible heightened by the blustering harangue of Pluto to the herald, Mercury. Throughout this poem, as well as in all the other works of Claudian, we lament the absence not only of true sublimity but of simple nature and of real feeling: our imagination is often excited, our intellect is often gratified; but our noblest energies are never awakened; no cord of tenderness is struck, no kindly sympathy is enlisted; our hearts are never softened.

Of the Idyls we need hardly say anything; little could be expected from the subjects: they may be regarded as clever essays in versification, and nothing more. The best is that in which the hot springs of Apomus are described. The Ecesenie verses display considerable lightness and grace; the epigrams, with the exception of a very few which are neatly and pointedly expressed, are not worth reading.

The Editio Princeps of Claudian was printed at Vienna by Jacobus Dusenius, fol., 1482, under the editorial inspection of Barnabas Celsius, and appears to be a faithful representation of the MS. from which it was taken. Several of the smaller poems are wanting. The second edition was printed at Parma by Angelus Ugoleus, 4to., 1493, superintended by Thadnaeus, who made use of several MSS. for emending the text, especially one obtained from Holland. Here first we find the epigrams, the Ephthalumion of Palladius and Sera-rena, the epistles to Serena and to Hadrian, the Aponus, and the Gigantomacha. The edition printed at Vienna by Hieronymus Victor and Joannes Singerienius, 4to., 1510, with a text newly revised by Joannes Camara, is the first which contains the Laudes Heraclei, In Sirenas, Laus Christi, and Minucia Christi. The first truly critical edition was that of Theod. Pulmannus, printed at Antwerp by Plantinus, 16mo., 1571, including the notes of Delrio. The second edition of Caspar Barthius, Franc. and Hamburg, 1650 and 1654, 4to., boasts of being completed with the aid of seventeen MSS., and is accompanied by a voluminous commentary; but the notes are heavy, and the typography very incorrect. The edition of Gesner, Lips. 1759, is a useful one; but by far the best which has yet appeared is that of the younger Burmann, Amst. 1760, forming one of the series of the Dutch Variorum Classics, in 4to. An edition was commenced by G. L. König, and one volume published in 1806 (Götting), but the work did not proceed further.

The "Rapillus Proserpinae" was published separately, under the title "Claudian de Rupibus Proserpine Tragediae denuo," at Utrecht, by Keizler and Locuput, apparently several years before the Editio Princeps of the collected works noticed above, and three other editions of the same poem belong to the same early period, although neither the names of the printers nor the precise dates can be ascertained.

We have a complete metrical translation of the whole works of Claudian by A. Hawkins, 2 vols. 8vo., Lond. 1817; and there are also several English translations of many of the separate pieces, few of which are of any merit. [W. R.]

CLAUDIANIUS (Κλαυδιανός), the author of five epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Brannk, Anal. ii. p. 447; Jacobs, iii. p. 153), is commonly identified with the celebrated Latin poet of the same name; but this seems to be disproved by the titles and contents of two additional epigrams, ascribed to him in the Vatican MS., which are addressed "to the Saviour," and which show that their author was a Christian. (Jacobs, Paralip. ap. Anth. Graec. xiii. pp. 615—617.) He is probably the poet whom Evagrius (Hist. Eccel. i. 19) mentions as flourishing under Theodosius II., who reigned A. d. 408—450. The Gigantomachia, of which a fragment still exists (Iriarte, Catal. MSS. Matr. p. 215), and which has been ascribed to the Roman poet, seems rather to belong to this one. He wrote also, according to the Scholia on the Vatican MS., poems on the history of certain cities of Asia Minor and Syria, τάταρα Ταρσοῦ, Ἀράχδηος, Βυσρούη, Ναξανέα, whence it has been inferred that he was a native of that part of Asia. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. xiii. p. 672.)

CLAUDIUS, patrician. [CLAUDIA GENN.] 1. APP. CLAUDIUS SABINUS RREGELINUS, a Sabine of the town of Regillum or Regilli, who in his own country bore the name of Attus Claudio (or, according to some, Attia Claudius; Dionysius calls him Τίνος Κλαυδίου), being the advocate of peace with the Romans, when hostilities broke out between the two nations shortly after the beginning of the commonwealth, and being vehemently opposed by most of his countrymen, withdrew with a large train of followers to Rome. (z. c. 504.) He was forthwith received into the ranks of the patricians, and lands beyond the Anio were assigned to his followers, who were formed into a new tribe, called the Claudian. (Liv. ii. 16, iv. 5, x. 8; Dionys. v. 40, xi. 15; Seston. Th. 1; Tac. Ann. xi. 24, xii. 25; Niebuhr, i. p. 560.) He exhibited the characteristics which marked his descendants, and, in his consulship (B.C. 498), showed great severity towards the plebeian debtors. (Livy ii. 21, 23, 24, 27; Dionys. vi. 23, 24, 27, 30.) Next year, on the refusal of the commons to enlist, we find him proposing the appointment of a dictator. (Livy ii. 29.) We find him manifesting the same bitter hatred of the plebs at the time of the succession to the Mons Sacer, in B.C. 494 (Dionys. vi. 50, &c.), of the famine in 493 (Dionys. vii. 15), and of the impeachment of Coriolanus. (Dionys. vii, 47, &c.) He is made by Dionysius (vii. 83, &c.) to take a prominent part in opposing the agrarian law of Sp. Cassius. According to Pliny (H. N. xiv. 3) he was the first who set up images of his ancestors in a public temple (that of Bellona).

2. APP. CLAUDIUS APP. F. M. N. SABINUS REGILLIENSIS, son of the preceding, was a candidate for the consulship in B.C. 482, but, through the opposition of the tribunes, did not succeed. (Dionys. viii. 90.) In 471 he was made consul by the patricians to oppose the Pubilian rogations. He was baffled in his violent attempt to defeat and strike himself on the plebeians by his severity when commanding against the Aquinians and Volscians. The soldiers became discontented and disobedient, and, when the enemy attacked them, threw away their arms and fled. For this he punished them with extreme severity. The next year he violently opposed the execution of the agrarian law of Sp. Cassius, and was brought to trial by two of the tribunes. According to the common story, he killed himself before the trial. (Livy ii. 56–61; Dionys. ix. 43–45, 48–54; Niebuhr, vol. ii. pp. 106, 219–228.)

3. C. CLAUDIUS APP. F. M. N. SABINUS REGILLIENSIS, brother of the preceding (Dionys. x. 50; Liv. iii. 53), was consul in B.C. 480, when Appius Herdonius seized the Capitol. After it had been recovered, we find him hindering the execution of the promise made by Valerius respecting the Teventina law. (Livy iii. 13–21; Dionys. x. 9, 12–17.) Subsequently, he opposed the proposition to increase the number of the plebeian tribunes and the law de Aventino publico. (Dionys. x. 30, 32.) He was an unsuccessful candidate for the dictatorship. (Livy iii. 35.) Though a staunch supporter of the aristocracy, he warned his brother against an immoderate use of his power. (Livy iii. 40; Dionys. xi. 7–11.) His remonstrances being of no avail, he withdrew to Regillium, but returned to defend the decemvir Appius, when impeached. (Livy iii. 58.) Incensed at his death, he strived to revive himself on the consuls Horatius and Valerius by opposing their application for leave to triumph. (Dionys. xi. 49.) In 445 we find him strenuously opposing the law of Camillus, and proposing to arm the consuls against the tribunes. (Livy iv. 6.) According to Dionysius, however (xi. 55, 56), he himself proposed the election of military tribunes with consular power from both plebeians and patricians.

4. APP. CLAUDIUS CRASSUS (or CRASSINUS) REGILLIENSIS SABINUS, the decemvir, is commonly considered to have been the son of No. 2 (as by Livy, iii. 55); but, from the Capitoline Fasti, where the record of his consulship appears in the following form: App. Claudius Ap. f. M. N. Crassus, Regill. Sabinus II., he would appear to have been the same person. (See Niebuhr, vol. ii. note 754.) He was elected consul in B.C. 451, and on the appointment of the decemvirs in that year, he became one of them. His influence in the college became paramount, and he so far won the confidence of the people, that he was reappointed the following year. Now, however, his real character betrayed itself in the most violent and tyrannous conduct towards the plebeians, till his attempt against Virginia led to the overthrow of the decemvirs. Appius was impeached by Virginius, but did not live to abate his trial. According to Livy, he killed himself. Dionysius (xi. 46) says, it was the general opinion that he was put to death in prison by order of the tribunes. (Livy iii. 33, 35–58; Dionys. x. 54–xi. 46.) For an account of the decemviral legislation, see Dict. de Anti. s. v. Twelve Tables.

5. APP. CLAUDIUS AP. F. AP. N. CRASSUS (or CRASSINUS), the elder son of the decemvir, was consular tribune in B.C. 434. All that we are told of him is, that he was married by a genuine Claudian hatred of the tribunes and plebeians. (Livy iv. 35, 36.)

6. CLAUDIUS CRASSUS (or CRASSINUS), a younger son of the decemvir. (Livy vi. 40.)

7. APP. CLAUDIUS APP. F. AP. N. CRASSUS (or CRASSINUS), son of No. 5, was consular tribune in B.C. 403. It was this Appius who was the author of the important measure, that the proceedings of the tribunes might be stopped by the veto of one of the college. (Niebuhr, vol. ii. p. 459, note 965.) Livy (v. 3–5) puts into his mouth a speech in reply to the complaints of the tribunes, when, at the siege of Veii, the troops were kept in the field during the winter. He afterwards proposed to appropriate the spoil of Veii for the pay of the soldiers. (Livy v. 1–6. 20.)

8. APP. CLAUDIUS P. F. AP. N. CRASSUS (or CRASSINUS), a son of No. 6, distinguished himself by his opposition to the Lexian rogations, particularly as regarded the appointment of plebeian consuls. In 392, on the death of the consul Cnemonius, he was appointed dictator to conduct the war against the Hornicians, when a victory was gained over them under his auspices. In 349 he was made consul, but died at the commencement of his year of office. (Livy vi. 40–42, vii. 6, &c., 24, 55.)

9. C. CLAUDIUS APP. F. AP. N. CRASSUS (or CRASSINUS), son of No. 7, was named dictator in B.C. 337, but immediately resigned his office, the augurs having pronounced his appointment invalid. Who the C. Claudius Hortator, whom he made Master of the Horse, was, is not known. (Livy viii. 15.)

10. APP. CLAUDIUS C. P. AP. N. CAESAR, son of No. 9. It was generally believed among the ancients that his blindness was real, and there can be no doubt that such was the fact, though it is pretty certain that he did not become blind before his old age. The tradition of the occasion of his blindness is given by Livy, ix. 29. (See also Cic. de Senect. 6, Tusc. Disc. v. 38; Plut. Pyrrh. 18, 19; Diodorus, xx. 36; Appian, Sen. 10.) He was twice curule aedile (Frontin. de Aequa, v. 72), and in B.C. 312 was elected censor with C. Plautius, without having been consul previously. (Livy ix. 29.) With the design of forming in the senate and people a party which should be subservient to him in his ambitious designs, he filled up the vacancies in the senate with the names of a large number of the low popular party, including even the sons of freedmen. His list, however, was set aside the following year, upon which C. Plea-tius resigned, and Appius continued in office as sole censor. He then proceeded to draw up the lists of the tribes, and enrolled in them all the libertini, whom he distributed among all the tribes, that his influence might predominate in all. (Liv. ix. 29, 30, 33, 34; 46; Cic. De Civ. 24.) According to Pliny (H. N. xxxii. 6.) it was at this instigation that his secretary, Ca. Flavius, published his calendar and account of the legis actions. But the durable monuments of his censorship (for his political innovations were in good part set aside by Q. Fabius Maximus) were the Appian road to Capua, which was commenced by him, and the Appian aqueduct, which he completed. (Liv.
ix. 29; Frontin. de Aquaed. 5; Niebuhr, vol. iii.
pp. 303—309.) Niebuhr conjectures, with some probability, that in order to raise money he must have sold large portions of the public land. He retained his censorship four years. (Niebuhr, vol.
iii. pp. 294—313.) In 307 he was elected consul after resigning his censorship, which he had indefatigably endeavoured to retain, and renewed in Rome the practice of strengthening his interest. (Liv. ix. 42.) In the following year we find him a strenuous opponent of the Ogulnian law for opening the offices of pontif and augur to the plebeians. (x. 7, 8.) In 298 he was appointed interrex (an office which he filled three times; see inscription in Pigliu, ad ann. 561), and at first refused to receive votes for the plebeian candidate. (Liv. x. 11; Cic. Brut. 14.) In 296 he was chosen consul a second time, and commanded at first in Samnium with some success. (Liv.
x. 17; Orelli, Insr. No. 539.) From Samnium he led his forces into Etruria, and having been de-ivered from a perilous position by his colleague Volumnius, the combined armies gained a decisive victory over the Etruscans and Samnites. (Liv.
x. 13, 19.) In this battle he vowed a temple to Bellona, which he afterwards dedicated. Next year he was continued in command, as praetor,
but was sent back to Rome by the consul Fabius.
(x. 22, 25.) Afterwards, in conjunction with Volumnius, he gained a victory over the Sun-nites. (x. 31.) He was once dictator, but in what year is not known. (Insc. in Orelli, L. c.)
In his old age, when Cincius was sent by Pyrrhus to propose peace, Appius, now quite blind, appeared in the senate, and by his speech prevailed on them to resist the proffered terms. This speech was extant in Cicero's time. (Liv. xiii.; Cic.
Brut. 14, 16; De Senect. 6.) His eloquence is toiled by Livy. (x. 13.)
Appius Claudius the Blind was the earliest Roman writer in prose and verse whose name has come down to us. He was the author of a poem known to Cicero through the Greek (Cic. Tusc.
Disp. iv. 2), of which some minute fragments have come down to us. (Praecian. viii. p. 792, ed.
Putsch; Festus, s. v. Stephum.) Its contents were of a Pythagorean cast. He also wrote a legal treatise, De Usurpationibus, and according to some was the author of the Aetiones which Flavius published. [FLAVIUS.] (Pomponius, Dig. 1. 2.
§ 36.) He left four sons and five daughters.
(Cic. De Senect. 11.)

11. APP. CLAUDIUS C. F. APP. N. CADEX, also son of No. 9. He derived his surname from his attention to naval affairs. (Senec. de Div. Plur.
13.) He was elected consul b. c. 264, and commanded the forces sent to the assistance of the Mamertini. He effected a landing on the coast of Sicily by night, defeated Hiero and the Carthagians, and raised the siege of Messana. After a repose from Egesta, and some other unsuccessful operations, he left a garrison in Messana and returned home. (Polyl. ii. 11, 12, 16; Suet. Tib. 2.)

12. APP. CLAUDIUS APP. F. C. N. CRASSUS (or CRASSINUS) RUPER, the eldest son of No. 10, and apparently the last of the gens who bore the surname Crassus. He was consul b. c. 268. (Fast.
Sic.; Vell. Pat. i. 14.)

13. P. CLAUDIUS APP. F. C. N. PULCHER, the first of this gens who bore that surname, was the second son of No. 10. He possessed in a more than ordinary degree most of the worst characteristics of this family. He was elected consul in b. c.
249, and commanded the fleet sent to reinforce the troops at Lilybaea. In defiance of the injuries he attacked the Carthaginian fleet lying in the harbour of Drepana, but was entirely defeated, with the loss of almost all his forces. (Polyb. i. 25.
2; Cic. De Domo i. 16; Liv. iv. 33; Schol. Bob. in C.
Ch. p. 337, ed. Orell.; Liv. xix.; Suet. Tib. 2.) Claudius was recalled and commanded to appoint a dictator. He named M. Claudius Glicia or Glicia, the son of a freedman, but the nomination was immediately superseded. (Suet. Tib. 2; Fasti Capit.) P. Claudius was accused of high treason, and, according to Polybius (i. 52) and Cicero (de Nat. Doct. ii. 8), was severely punished. According to other accounts (Schol. Bob. l. c.; Val. Max.
viii. i. § 4), a thunder-storm which happened stopped the proceedings; but he was impeached a second time and fined. He did not long survive his disgrace. He was dead before b. c. 246.
[CLAUDIA, No. 1.] The probability is that he killed himself. (Val. Max. i. 4. § 3.)

14. C. CLAUDIUS APP. F. C. N. CANTIO or CENTO, another son of No. 10, was consul in b. c.
240, interrex in 247, and dictator in 213. (Fasti 34, xxv. 2.)

15. TR. CLAUDIUS NERO, fourth son of No.
10. Nothing further is known respecting him.
(Suet. Tib. 3; Gell. xiii. 22.) An account of his descendants is given under NERO.

16. CLAUDIUS QUIQUER. [CLAUDIA, No. 1.]

17. APP. CLAUDIUS P. F. APP. N. PULCHER, son of No. 12, was aedile in b. c. 217. (Liv. xxii.
33.) In the following year he was military tribunate, and fought at Cannae. Together with P.
Scipio he was raised to the supreme command by the troops who had fled to Canusium. In 215 he was created praetor, and conducted the relics of the defeated army into Sicily, where his efforts to detach Hieronymus, the grandson of Hiero, from his connexion with the Carthaginians, were unsuccessful. (Liv. xxii. 24, 30, 31, liv. 6, 7.)
He remained in Sicily the following year also, as praetor and legatus to M. Marcellus. (xxiv. 10, 21, 27, 29, 30, 33, 38; Polyb. viii. 3, 5, 9), having charge of the fleet and the camp at Leontini.
(Liv. xxiv. 39.) In 212 he was elected consul, and in conjunction with his colleague Q. Fulvius Flaccus laid siege to Capua. At the close of his year of office, in pursuance of a decree of the senate, he went to Rome and created two new consuls. His own command was prolonged another year. In the battle with Hannibal before Capua CLAUDIUS.

he received a wound, from the effects of which he died shortly after the surrender of the city. He ineffectually opposed the infliction of the sanguinary vengeance which Fulvia took on the Capuans. (Liv. xxv. 3, 22, 41, xxvi. 1, 5, 6, 8, 15, 16; Polyb. ix. 3.)

18. Claudia Quinta. [Claudia, No. 2.]

19. Claudia. [Claudia, No. 3.]

20. App. Claudius App. F. P. N. Pulcher, son of No. 17. In b. c. 197 and the three following years, he served as military tribune under T. Quintius Flaminius in Greece in the war with Philip. (Liv. xxxii. 35, 36, xxxiii. 29, xxxiv. 50.) We find him again in Greece in 191, serving first under M. Bacchus in the war against Antiochus (xxvii. 19), and afterwards under the consul M. Acilius Glabrio against the Austolians. (xxxii. 22, 30.) In 187 he was made praetor, and Tarentum fell to him by lot as his province. (xviiil. 42.) In 185 he was elected consul, and gained some advantages over the Ingaman Ligurians, and, by his violent interference at the comitia, procured the election of his brother Publius to the consulship. (xxxix. 23, 32.) In 184, when Philip was preparing for a new war with the Romans, Appius was sent to the head of an embassy into Macedonia and Greece, to observe his movements and wrast from his grasp the cities of which he had made himself master. (xxxvii. 7.) In 176 he was one of an embassy sent to the Austolians, to bring about a cessation of their internal hostilities and oppose the machinations of Perseus. (xli. 25, 27.)

21. P. Claudius App. F. P. N. Pulcher, son of No. 17. In b. c. 189 he was curule aedile, and in 188 praetor. (Liv. xxxvii. 35.) In 184 he was made consul [see No. 20] (xxxix. 32), and in 181 one of the three commissioners appointed for planting a colony at Gravisca. (cx. 29.)

22. C. Claudius App. F. P. N. Pulcher, another son of No. 17 (Vasti Cap.; Liv. xxxix. 44), was made augur in b. c. 195, praetor in 180 (xl. 37, 42), and consul in 177. The province of Istria fell to his lot. Fearing lest the successes of the consuls of the preceding year might render his presence unnecessary, he set out without performing the regular insulatory ceremonies of the consulship, but soon found himself compelled to return. Having again proceeded to his province with a fresh army, he captured three towns, and reduced the Istars to submission. He next marched against the Ligurians, whom he defeated, and celebrated a double triumph at Rome. Having held the comitia, he returned to Liguria and recovered the town of Mutina. (xlii. 10—18; Polyb. xxxv. 7.) In 171 he served as military tribune under P. Licinius against Perseus. (Liv. xxxii. 49.) In 169 he was censor with T. Sempronius Gracchus. Their severity drew down upon them an imprisonment from one of the tribunes, but the popularity of Gracchus secured an acquittal. Claudius opposed his colleagues, who wished to exclude the freedmen from all the tribes, and at last it was agreed that they should be enrolled in one tribe—the Esquilina. (xliii. 14—16, xlv. 16, xlv. 15; Valer. Max. vii. 5, § 3.) In 167 Claudius was one of an embassy of ten sent into Macedonia. He died in this year. (xlv. 16, 44; Polyb. xxx. 10.)

23. C. Claudius Cento, probably the grandson of No. 14, served under the consul P. Sulpicius in b. c. 200, in the war with Philip. Being sent to the relief of Athens, which was besieged by a Macedonian army, he raised the siege. He next made himself master of Chalcois in Euboea, and gained several advantages over Philip, who marched in person upon Athens. (Liv. xxxi. 14, 22, &c.; Zonar. ix. 15.)

24. App. Claudius Cento, brother of No. 23, was aedile in b. c. 173. (Liv. xl. 59.) In 175 he was made praetor, and received Hispania Citerior as his province. Here he gained a victory over the revolted Celtiberi, for which he was honoured with an ovation. (xii. 22, 31, 33.) In 173 he was sent into Thessaly, and quieted the disturbances which prevailed there. (xviii. 5.) In 172 he was one of an embassy sent into Macedonia to communicate to Perseus the demands and threats of the Romans. (xiii. 25.) In 170 he was legatus under the consul A. Hostilius. Having been sent with 4000 men into Illyricum, he sustained a defeat near the town of Uscaena. (xiii. 11, 12.)

25. App. Claudius App. F. App. N. Pulcher, son of No. 20. He was consul in b. c. 143, and, to obtain a pretext for a triumph, attacked the Salassi, an Alpine tribe. He was at first defeated, but afterwards, following the directions of the Sibyl, attacked the Arpicians, gained a victory, and was declared dictator. (Dion Cass. lxxiv. 1xxx.; Orat. v. 4.) On his return a triumph was refused him; but he triumphed at his own expense, and when one of the tribunes attempted to drag him from his car, his daughter Claudia, one of the Vestal virgins, walked by his side up to the capital. (Cic. pro Cael. 14; Sust. Tib. 2.) Next year he was an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship, though he afterwards held that office with Q. Fulvius Nobilius, probably in 136. (Dion Cass. lxxiv.; Plut. Tib. Grach. 4.) He gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tib. Gracchus, and in b. c. 133 with Tib. and C. Gracchus was appointed commissioner for the division of the lands. (Livy. 55; Orelli, fasc. No. 570; Vell. Pat. ii. 2.) Appius lived at eminence with P. Scipio Aemilianus. (Plut. Aemil. 38; Cic. de Rep. i. 18.) He died shortly after Tib. Gracchus. (Appian. B. C. 18.) He was one of the Sabines, an augur, and princeps senatus. (Macrob. Sat. ii. 10; Plut. Tib. Grach. 4.) Cicero (Brot. 28) says, that his style of speaking was fluent and vehement. He married Antistia. (Antistia, No. 1.)

26. C. Claudius Pulcher, son of No. 22, was consul in b. c. 139, and laid information before the senate of the disturbances excited by C. Papirius Carbo. (Cic. de Legg. iii. 19.)

27. App. Claudius Pulcher, known only as the son of No. 26 and father of No. 32.

28. C. Claudius Pulcher, also son of No. 26 and father of No. 34. (Cic. pro Planc. 21.)

29. App. Claudius Pulcher, son of No. 25. He inherited his father's estate to P. Scipio Aemilianus. (Cic. pro Scaur. ii. 32.) In b. c. 107 he took part in the discussions respecting the agrarian law of Sp. Thaurius. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 70.) He appears to have been of a facetious disposition. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 60.)

30. Claudia. [Claudia, No. 4.]

31. Claudia. [Claudia, No. 5.]

32. C. Claudius App. F. C. N. Pulcher, son of No. 27 (Cic. de Off. ii. 16, Ferr. ii. 49; Fasti Capitolii), appears in b. c. 100 as one of those who took up arms against Saturninus. (Cic. pro Rosc. 7.) In 99 he was curule aedile, and in the games celebrated by him elephants were for the first time exhibited in the circus, and painting employed in the scenic decorations. (Plin. H. N. viii. 7, xxxv. 7; Val. Max. ii. 4. § 6.) In 85 he was praetor in Sicily, and, by direction of the senate, gave laws to the Halicarnassians respecting the appointment of their senators. (Cic. Ferr. ii. 49.) The Mamertini made him their patronus. (Ferr. iv. 3.) He was consul in 92. (Fasti Cap.) Cicero (Brut. 48) speaks of him as a man possessed of great power and some ability as an orator.

35. APP. CLAUDIUS FULCHER, the brother, possibly of No. 32, was military tribune in b.c. 87. He was appointed to guard the Janiculum when the city was threatened by Marius and Cinna, but opened a gate to Marcius, to whom he was under obligations. (Appian, B. C. i. 68.) It appears, however, that he managed to keep his credit with his own party; for it is probably this Claudius who was interrex in 77, and with Q. Latinius Catulus had to defend Rome against M. Aemilius Lepidus. (Sall. Frugium. lib. 1.)

34. APP. CLAUDIUS FULCHER, son of No. 29, was made consul in b.c. 73, though he had been an unsuccessful candidate for the curule aedileship. (Cic. pro Planc. ii. 21; Appian, B. C. i. 103.) He was afterwards governor of Macedonia, and engaged in contests with the neighbouring barbarians. He died in his province, before 76, when he was succeeded by C. Scribonius Curio. (Liv. Epit. 91; Flor. iii. 4; Oroz. v. 23.)

35. APP. CLAUDIUS FULCHER, apparently the son of No. 29. (Orelli, Inscription. No. 578.) When curule aedile he celebrated the Megalesian games. (Cic. de Harusp. Resp. 12.) In b.c. 89 he was made praetor (Cic. pro Arch. 5), and afterwards filled the office of praefect. In b.c. 87 Cinna gained a victory over his army. (Liv. Epit. 79.) Claudius was impeached by one of the tribunes, and, not appearing, was deposed from his command and banished. Next year, L. Marcus Philippus, his nephew, who was censor, omitted his name in the new consular list. (Dion. Cass. 31, 32.) He appears in 82 to have marched with Sulla against Rome, and met his death near the city. (Plut. Sulla. 29.) He married Cassilia, and left three sons and three daughters, but no property. (Varro, R. R. iii. 16.)

36. C. CLAUDIUS FULCHER, son of No. 29, when curule aedile excluded slaves from the Megalesian games which he celebrated. (Cic. de Har. Resp. 12.) In b.c. 73 he was praetor (Plut. Crass. 9), and commanded an army against Spartacus, by whom he was defeated at Mount Vesuvius. (Liv. Epit. 95; Oroz. v. 24.)

37. CLAUDIUS. [Claudius, No. 6.]

38. APP. CLAUDIUS FULCHER, eldest son of No. 35 (Varro, R. R. iii. 16), appears in b.c. 75 as the prosecutor of Tertius Varro. (Ascon. ad C. Dic. in Cass. p. 109, Orelli.) In 70 he served in Asia under his brother-in-law, Lucullus, and was sent to Tigranes to demand the surrender of Mithridates. (Plut. Lucull. 19, 21.) In 61 he was in Greece, collecting statues and paintings to adorn the games which he contemplated giving as aedile. (Cic. pro Dom. 45; Schol. Bob. in orat. in Cid. et C. C. p. 338, Orelli.) Through the favour and influence of the consuls L. Piso, however, he was made praetor without first filling the office of aedile. (Cic. l.c.) As praetor (b.c. 57) he presided in trials for extortion, and Cicero expresses anxiety on behalf of his brother Quintus, who had been praetor in Asia. (Ad Att. iii. 17.) Though Appius did not openly and in person oppose Cicero's recall (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 10. § 8; comp. pro Dom. 23), he tacitly sanctioned and abetted the proceedings of his brother Publius. He placed at his disposal the gladiators whom he had hired, and alone of the praetors did nothing on behalf of Cicero; and, after the return of the latter, showed more decidedly which side he took. (Cic. pro Sca. 36, 39, 41; in Plin. iv. 15, pro Mil. 18, post. Red. 7, in Or. Somn. 1. 14, pro Mil. 18, pro Mil. 19, 307, Orelli; Dion. Cass. xxxix. 6, 7.) Next year he was praetor in Sardinia, and in April paid a visit to Caesar at Luca. (Plut. Cass. ii. 21; Cic. ad Q. F. ii. 6, 15.) In b.c. 54 he was chosen consul with L. Domitius Ahenobarbus. (Caes. B. G. v. 1; Dion Cass. xxxix. 60, xl. 1.) Through the intervention of Pompey, a reconciliation was brought about between him and Cicero, though his attentions to the latter appear, in part at least, to have been prompted by avarice. (Cic. ad Q. F. ii. 12, ad Fam. i. 9, iii. 10.) When Gabinius returned from his province, Appius appeared as his successor, in hopes that his silence might be bought, though previously he had said he would do all that lay in his power to prevent the threatened prosecution. (Cic. ad Q. F. ii. 12, 13, iii. 2; Dion Cass. xxxix. 60.) Similar motives appear to have induced him to support C. Pompilius in his claim for a triumph. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16, ad Q. F. iii. 4.) A still more glaring instance of his dishonesty and venality was the compact which he and his colleague entered into with Cn. Domitius Calvinius and C. Memmius, two of the candidates for the consulship, by which the two latter bound themselves in the sum of 4,000,000 sesterces a-piece, in case they should be appointed consuls, to bring forward false witnesses to prove that laws had been passed assigning to Appius and his colleague the command of an army, and settling in other respects the administration of the provinces to which the two latter were to go as proconsuls. The whole affair, however, was exposed, and the comitia were not held in that year. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16, 15, 16, ad Q. F. iii. 1. cap. 5.) Appius, however, asserted his right to command an army, even without a lex curiata. (Ad Fam. i. 9. § 25, ad Att. iv. 16. § 12.) He reached his province in July, b.c. 53, and governed it for two years. His rules appear to have been most tyrannous and rapacious. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 1, 2, § 8, ad Fam. xv. 4, comp. iii. 8. § 5-8.) He made war upon the mountaineers of Amanus, and some successes over them gave him a pretext for claiming a triumph. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 1, 2; Eckel, iv. p. 969.) Cicero wrote to him, while in his province, in terms of the greatest cordiality (ad Fam. iii. 1); but when he was appointed his successor in 51, Appius did not conceal his displeasure. He avoided meeting him, and showed him other marks of disrespect. His displeasure was increased by Cicero's countermanding some of his directions and regulations. (Ad Fam. iii. 2—6, 7, 8.) Appius on his return demanded a triumph, but was compelled to withdraw his claim by an impeachment instituted against him by Della Bella. (Ad Fam. iii. 9, viii. 6, iii. 11.) As witnesses were required from his old province, he found himself again obliged to pay court to Cicero. (Ad Fam., Lucullus, in Asia. Displeased at not being treated by Lucullus with the distinction he had expected, he encouraged the soldiers to mutiny. He then left Lucullus, and betook himself to his other brother-in-law, Q. Marius Rex, at that time proconsul in Cilicia, and was entrusted by him with the command of the fleet. He fell into the hands of the pirates, who however dismissed him without ransom, through fear of Pompey. He next went to Antiochaeus, and joined the Syrians in making war on the Egyptians. Here again he excited some of the soldiers to mutiny, and nearly lost his life. He now returned to Rome, and made his first appearance in civil affairs in n. c. 65 by impeaching Catiline for extortion in his government of Cilicia. Catiline bribed his accuser and judge, and escaped.

In n. c. 64, Clodius accompanied the propraetor L. Murena to Gallia Transalpina, where he resorted to the most nefarious methods of procuring money. His avarice, or the want to which his dissipation had reduced him, led him to have recourse to similar proceedings on his return to Rome. Asconius (in Mem. p. 50, Orrell) says, that Cicero often charged him with having taken part in the conspiracy of Catiline. But, with the exception of some probably exaggerated rhetorical aspersions (de Horum. Resp. 5, pro Mem. 14), his participation in the kind appears in Cicero; and Plutarch (Cic. 29) says, that on that occasion he took the side of the consul, and was still on good terms with him.

Towards the close of 62, Clodius was guilty of an act of sacrilege, which is especially memorable, as it gave rise to that deadly enmity between himself and Cicero which produced such important consequences to both and to Rome. The mysteries of the Bona Dea were this year celebrated in the house of Caesar. Clodius, who had an intrigue with Pompeia, Caesar's wife, with the assistance of one of the attendants entered the house disguised as a female musician. But while his guide was gone to apprise her mistress, Clodius was detected by his voice. The alarm was immediately given, but he made his escape by the aid of the dame who had introduced him. He was already a candidate for the quaestorship, and was elected; but in the beginning of 61, before he set out for his province, he was impeached for this offence. The senate referred the matter to the pontiffs, who declared it an act of impunity. Under the direction of the senate a rotation was proposed to the people, to the effect that Clodius should be tried by judges selected by the praetor who was to preside. The assembly, however, was broken up without coming to a decision. The senate was at first disposed to persist in its original plan; but afterwards, on the recommendation of Hortensius, the proposition of the tribune Publius Calenus was adopted, in accordance with which the judges were to be selected from the three classes. Cicero, who had hitherto strenuously supported the senate, now relaxed in his exertions. Clodius attempted to prove an alibi, but Cicero's evidence showed that he was with him in Rome only three hours before he pretended to have been at Interamna. Bribery and intimidation, however, secured him an acquittal by a majority of 31 to 25. Cicero however, who had been irritated by some sarcastic allusions made by Clodius to his consulsip, and by a verdict given in contradiction to his testimony, attacked Clodius and his partisans in the senate with great vehemence.
Soon after his acquittal Claudius went to his province, Sicily, and intensified his design of becoming a candidate for the censorship. On his return, however, he disclosed a different purpose. Eager to revenge himself on Cicero, that he might be armed with more formidable power he purposed becoming a tribune of the plebs. For this it was necessary that he should be adopted into a plebeian family; and as he was not in the power of his parent, the adoption had to take place by a vote of the people in the comitia curiata. (This ceremony was called Adrogatio; see Dict. of Aut. s. v. Adrogatio.) Repeated attempts were made by the tribune C. Horrennius to get this brought about. Cicero, who placed reliance on the friendship and support of Pompey, did not spare Claudius, though he at times showed that he had misgivings as to the result. The tribunals had not yet taken Claudius' side, and when he impeached L. Calpurnius Piso for extortion, their influence procured the acquittal of the accused. But in defending C. Antonius, Cicero provoked the tribunals, and especially Caesar, and within three hours after the delivery of his speech Claudius became the adopted son of P. Fonteius (at the end of the year 80). The lex curiata for his adoption was proposed by Caesar, and Pompey presided in the assembly. The whole proceeding was irregular, as the sanction of the pontifices had not been obtained; Fonteius was not twenty years old, and consequently much younger than Claudius, and was married, nor was there the smallest reason to suppose that his marriage would remain childless, and, indeed, he was afterwards the father of several children; the rogation was not made public three mundines before the comitia; and it was passed although Bibulus sent notice to Pompey that he was taking the auspices. A report soon after got abroad that Claudius was to be sent on an embassy to Tigranes, and that by his refusal to go he had provoked the hostility of the tribunals. Neither turned out to be the case. Claudius was now ready to endeavor to secure his election to the tribunalship. Cicero was for a time amused with a report that his only design was to rescind the laws of Caesar. With the assistance of the latter, Claudius succeeded in his object, and entered upon his office in December, B.c. 59.

Claudius did not immediately assail his enemies. On the last day of the year, indeed, he prevented Bibulus, on laying down his office, from addressing the people; but his first measures were a series of laws, calculated to lay senate, knights, and people under obligations to him. The first was a law for the gratuitous distribution of corn once a month to the poorer citizens. The next enacted that the magistrates should observe the heavens on comitial days, and that no veto should be allowed to hinder the passing of a law. This enactment was designed specially to aid him in the attack with which he had threatened Cicero. The third was a law for the restoration of the old guilds which had been abolished, and the creation of new ones, by which means he secured the support of a large number of organized bodies. A fourth law was intended to gratify those of the higher class, and provided that the cursors should not expel from the senate, or inflict any mark of disgrace upon any one who had not first been openly accused before them, and convicted of some crime by their joint sentence. The consuls of the year he gained over to his interests by undertaking to secure to them the provinces which they wished. Having thus prepared the way, he opened his attack upon Cicero by proposing a law to the effect, that whoever had taken the life of a citizen uncondemned and without a trial, should be interdicted from earth and water. For an account of the proceedings which ensued, and which ended in Cicero's withdrawing into exile, see Cicero, p. 718.

On the same day on which Cicero left the city Claudius procured the enactment of two laws, one to interdict Cicero from earth and water, because he had illegally put citizens to death, and forged a decree of the senate; the other forbidding any one, on pain of the like penalty, to receive him. The interdict was, however, limited to the distance of 400 miles from Rome. Claudius added the clause, that no proposition should ever be made for reversing the decree till those whom Cicero had put to death should come to life again. The law was confirmed in the comitia tributa, and engraved on brass. On the same day, the consuls Gabinius and Piso had the provinces of Syria and Macedonia assigned to them, with extraordinary powers. Claudius next visited himself to M. Cato, who, by a decree passed on his motion, was sent with the powers of praetor to take possession of the island of Cyprus, with the treasures of its king, Ptolemy, and to restore some Byzantine exiles. [Cato, p. 648, b.]

In the former nefarious proceeding, Claudius seems to have taken as a pretext the will of Ptolemy Alexander I., the uncle of the Cyprian king, who, as the Romans pretended, had made over to them his kingdom.

Immediately after the banishment of Cicero, Claudius set fire to his house on the Palatine, and destroyed his villa at Tusculum and Formiae. The greater part of the property carried off from them was divided between the two consuls. The ground on which the Palatine house stood, with such of the property as still remained, was put up to auction. Claudius wished to become the purchaser of it, and, not liking to bid himself, got a needy fellow named Scato to bid for him. He wished to erect on the Palatine a palace of surpassing size and magnificence. A short time before he had purchased the house of Q. Seius Postumus, after poisoning the owner, who had refused to sell it. This it was his intention to unite with another house which he already had there. He pulled down the portico of Catulus, which adjoined Cicero's grounds, and erected another in its place, with his own name inscribed on it. To alienate Cicero's property irretrievably, he dedicated it to Jupiter, and a small portion of the site of the dwelling, with part of the ground on which the portico of Catulus had stood, was occupied by a chapel to the goddess. For the image of the goddess he made use of the statue of a Tanagraean hetear, which his brother Appius had brought from Greece. To maintain the armed bands whom he employed, Claudius required large sums of money; but this he did not find much difficulty in procuring: for with the populace he was all-powerful, and his influence made his favour worth purchasing. (For an account of the way in which, through his influence, Bogruatus of Gaetula was made priest of Cybele at Fessanis, and Menalda of Anagnia screened from punishment, with other arbitrary and irregular proceedings of Claudius, see Cio. pro Dom. 59, 50, de Har. Hosp. 18, pro Sest.)
The matter was referred to the college of pontifices, but was not decided till the end of September, when Cicerone defended his right before them. The pontifices returned an answer sufficient to satisfy all religious scruples, though Claudius chose to take it as favourable to himself, and the senate decreed the restoration of the site, and the payment of a sum of money to Cicerone for rebuilding his house. When the workmen began their operations in November, Claudius attacked and drove them off, pulled down the portico of Catulus, which had been nearly rebuilt, and set fire to the house of Q. Cicerone. She afterwards forwards he assaulted Cicerone himself in the street, and compelled him to take refuge in a neighbouring house. Next day he attacked the house of Milo, situated on the eminence called Germanus, but was driven off by Q. Flaccus. When Marcellinus proposed in the senate that Claudius should be brought to justice, the friends of the latter protested the discussion, so that no decision was come to.

Claudius was at this time a candidate for the aedilship, that, if successful, he might be screened from a prosecution; and threatened the city with fire and sword if an assembly were not held for the election. Marcellinus proposed that the senate should decree that no election should take place till Claudius had been brought to trial; Milo declared that he would prevent the consuls Metellus from holding the comitia. Accordingly, whenever Metellus attempted to hold an assembly, he posted himself with a strong body of armed men on the place of meeting, and stopped the proceedings, by giving notice that he was observing the auspices. In the beginning of the following year, however (B.C. 56), when Milo was no longer in office, Cicerone was elected without opposition; for, notwithstanding his outrageous violence, as it was evident that his chief object was not power but revenge, he was supported and censured at by several who found his proceedings calculated to further their views. The optimates rejoiced to see him insult and humble the triumvir, Pompey, and the latter to find that he was sufficiently powerful to make the senate afraid of him. Cicerone had many foes and rivals, who openly or secretly encouraged so active an enemy of the object of their envy and dislike; while the disturbances which his proceedings occasioned in the city were exactly adapted to further Caesar's designs. Claudius almost immediately after his election returned Milo for public violence. Milo appeared on the second of February to answer the accusation, and the day passed without disturbance. The next hearing was fixed for the ninth, and when Pompey stood up to defend him, Cicerone's party attempted to put him down by raising a tumult. Milo's party acted in a similar manner when Cicerone spoke. A fray ensued, and the judicial proceedings were stopped for that day. The matter was put off by several adjournments to the beginning of May, from which time we hear nothing more of it.

In April, Claudius celebrated the Megalesian games, and admitted such a number of slaves, that the free citizens were unable to find room. Shortly after this, the senate consulted the haruspices on some prodigies which had happened near Rome. They replied, that, among other things, which had provoked the anger of the gods, was the desecration of sacred places. Claudius interpreted this as referring to the restoration of Cicero's house, and made it a handle for a fresh attack upon him. Cicero replied in the speech De Horatiium Responsa. By this time Pompey and Clodius had found it convenient to make common cause with each other. A fresh attack which Clodius soon afterwards made on Cicero's house was repulsed by Milo. With the assistance of the latter also, Cicero, after being once foiled in his attempts by Clodius and his brother, succeeded in charging Clodius in carrying off from the Capitol the tablets on which the laws of the latter were engraved.

Clodius actively supported Pompey and Cassius when they became candidates for the consulship, to which they were elected in the beginning of B. C. 55, and nearly lost his life in doing so. He appears to have been in a great measure led by the hope of being appointed on an embassy to Asia, which would give him the opportunity of recruiting his almost exhausted pecuniary resources, and getting from Borgia and some others whom he had assisted, the rewards they had promised him for his services. It appears, however, that he remained in Rome. We hear nothing more of him this year. In B. C. 54 we find him prosecuting the ex-tribune Proculus, who, among other acts of violence, was charged with murder; and soon after we find Clodius and Cicero, with four others, appearing to defend M. Aemilius Scaurus. Yet it appears that Cicero still regarded him with the greatest apprehension. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, ad Q. Fr. ii. 16, b., iii. 1. 4.)

In B. C. 53 Clodius was a candidate for the praetorship, and Milo for the consulship. Each strove to hinder the election of the other. They collected armed bands of slaves and gladiators, and the streets of Rome became the scene of fresh tumults and fracas, in one of which Cicero himself was endangered. When the consuls endeavored to hold the comitia, Clodius fell upon them with his band, and one of them, Cn. Domitius, was wounded. The senate met to deliberate. Clodius spoke, and attacked Cicero and Milo, touching, among other things, upon the amount of debt with which the latter was burdened. Cicero replied in the speech De Aere alicio Milonis. The contest, however, was soon after brought to a sudden and violent end. On the 20th of January, B. C. 52, Milo set out on a journey to Lanuvium. Near Bovillae he met Clodius, who was returning to Rome after visiting some of his property. Both were accompanied by armed followers, but Milo's party was the stronger. The two antagonists had passed each other without disturbance; but two of the guards of Milo, who were on Clodius' troop picked a quarrel with some of the followers of Clodius, who immediately turned round, and rode up to the scene of dispute, when he was wounded in the shoulder by one of the gladiators. The fray now became general. The party of Clodius were put to flight, and betook themselves with their leader to a house near Bovillae. Milo ordered his men to attack the house. Several of Clodius' men were slain, and Clodius himself dragged out and despatched. The body was left lying on the road, till a senator named Sex. Tadius found it, and conveyed it to Rome. Here it was exposed to the view of the populace, who crowded to see it. Next day it was carried naked to the forum, and again exposed to view before the rostra. The mob, enraged by the spectacle, and by the infamatory speeches of the tribunes Munatius Plancus and Q. Pompeius Rufus, headed by Sex. Clodius carried the corpse into the Curia Hostilia, made a funeral pile of the benches, tables, and writings, and burnt the body on the spot. Not only the senate-house, but the Porcian basilica, erected by Cato the Censor, and other adjoining buildings, were reduced to ashes. (For an account of the process which followed, see No. 50.)

Clodius was twice married, first to Pinaria, and afterwards to Fulvia. He left a son, Publius, and a daughter. Cicero charges him with having held an incestuous intercourse with his three sisters. [Claud., No. 7—9.] Clodius inherited no property from his father. [See No. 53.] Besides what he obtained by less honest means, he received some money by legacies and by letting one of his houses on the Palatine. He also received a considerable dowry with his wife Fulvia. He was the owner of two houses on the Palatine hill, an estate at Alba, and considerable possessions in Etruria, near lake Fregillus. His personal appearance was effeminate, and his manner of life was considered extravagant. That he was a man of great energy and ability there can be little question; still less that his character was of the most profligate kind. Cicero himself admits that he possessed considerable eloquence.

The chief ancient sources for the life of Clodius are the speeches of Cicero, pro Caio, pro Sexio, pro Milone, pro Domna sua, de Horatiium Responsa, in Pisoneum, and in Clodium et Carioneum, and his letters to Atticus and his brother Quintus; Plutarch's lives of Lucullus, Pompey, Cicero, and Caesar; and Dion Cassius. Of modern writers, Middleton, in his Life of Cicero, has touched upon the leading points of Clodius's history; but the best and fullest account has been given by Dru- man, Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 150—570.

46. APP. CLAUDIUS OF CLODIUS PULCHER, the elder of the two sons of C. Claudius. [No. 39.] Both he and his younger brother bore the praenomen Appius (Ascon. Arg. in Milon. p. 35, Orell.), from which it was conjectured by Manutius (in Cic. ad Fam. lii. 13, § 2, and viii. 8, § 2), that the former had been adopted by his uncle Appius [No. 39], a conjecture which is confirmed by a coin, on which he is designated C. C. Cl. C. [Valliant, Claud. No. 14.] Cicero, in letters written to Atticus during his exile (iii. 17, § 1, iii. 2, 9, § 3) expresses a fear lest his brother Quintus should be brought to trial by this Appius before his uncle on a charge of extortion. On the death of P. Clodius he and his brother appeared as accusers of Milo. (Ascon. in Milon. pp. 35, 39, 40, 42, ed. Orell.) In B. C. 50 he led back from Gallia the two legions which had been sent to Caesar by Pompey. (Plut. Pomp. 57.) Whether it was this Appius or his brother who was consul in B. C. 38 (Dion. Cass. xvi. 43) cannot be determined.

47. APP. CLAUDIUS OF CLODIUS PULCHER, brother of No. 46, joined his brother in prosecuting Milo. (ib. c. 52.) Next year he exposed the intrigue through which his father had escaped [see No. 59], in hopes of getting back the bribe that had been paid to Servilius. But he managed the matter so clumsily, that Servilius escaped, and Appius, having abandoned a prosecution with which he had threatened Servilius, was himself not long after impeached for extortion by the Ser-CLAUDIUS. The following were plebeians, or freedmen of the patrician Claudius gens.

1. Q. CLAUDIUS, a plebeian, was tribune of the plebs in B. c. 218, when he brought forward a law that no senator, or son of a person of senatorial rank, should possess a ship of the burden of more than 300 amphorae. (Liv. xvi. 53.) The Q. Claudius Flamen, who was praetor in B. c. 208, and had Tarentum assigned to him as his province, is probably the same person. (Liv. xxvii. 21, 22, 43, xxviii. 10.)

2. L. CLAUDIUS, praefectus fabrum to App. Claudius Pulcher, consul in B. c. 54. (CLAUDIUS, No. 38.) (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 4—6, 8.) He was tribune of the plebs, B. c. 43. (Pseudo-Cic. ad Brut. i. 1; comp. Cic. ad Att. xvi. 13.)

3. APP. CLAUDIUS, C. f., mentioned by Cicero in a letter to Brutus. (Ad Fam. xi. 22.) Who he was cannot be determined. He attacked himself to the party of Antony, who had restored his father. Whether this Appius was the same with or distinct from the last mentioned is uncertain. (Appian (B. C. iv. 44, 51) as among those proscribed by the triumvirs, is uncertain.

4. SEX. CLAUDIUS, probably a descendant of a freedman of the Claudian house, was a man of low condition, whom P. Claudius took under his patronage. (Cic. pro Cael. 32, pro Dom. 10.)

5. M. AUSILIUS, and condemned. (Ascon. in Milon. p. 55.) He remained in exile for eight years, but was restored in 44 by M. Antonius. (Cic. ad Att. xiv. 13, A. and B.) Cicero (pro Dom. 10, 31, pro Cael. 32) charges him with having carried on a criminal correspondence with Clodius (Quadrantaria).

6. SEX. CLAUDIUS, a Sicilian rhetorician, under whom M. Antonius studied oratory, and whom he rewarded with a present of a large estate in the Leontine territory. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, Phil. ii. 4, 17, iii. 9; Dion Cass. xiv. 39, xlvii. 8; Suet. de Caesar. 53.)

7. P. CLAUDIUS, M. F., appears on several coins which bear the image of Caesar and Antonius. (Eckhel, v. p. 172; Vaillant, Anton. Nos. 14, 15, Claud. 43—46.) He is probably the same with the Clodius whom Caesar in B. c. 43 sent into Macedonia to Metellus Scipio (Cass. B. C. iii. 57), and with the Clodius Bithynicus mentioned by Appian (B. C. v. 49), who fought on the side of Antonius in the Perusian war, and was taken prisoner and put to death in B. c. 40 by the command of Octavius.

8. C. CLAUDIUS, probably the descendant of a freedman of the Claudian house, was one of the suite of P. Claudius on his last journey to Aricia. (Cic. pro Mil. 17; Ascon. in Milon. p. 53, Orell.)

9. CLAUDIUS, a follower of M. Brutus, who by the direction of the latter put C. Antonius to death. [Antonius, No. 13, p. 216.] (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24; Plut. Anton. 22, Brut. 26.) He was afterwards sent by Brutus in command of a squadron to Rhodes, and on the death of his patron joined Cassius in Syria. (Appian, B. C. v. 2.) [C. P. M.]

CLAUDIUS L. or, with his full name, TR. CLAUDIUS DRUSUS NERO GERMANICUS was the fourth in the series of Roman emperors, and reigned from A. D. 41 to 54. He was the grandson of Tib. Claudius Nero and Livia, who afterwards married Augustus, and the son of Drusus and Antonia. He was born on the first of August, B. c. 10, at Lyons in Gaul, and lost his father in his infancy. During his early life he was of a sickly constitution, which, though it improved in later years, was in all probability the cause of the weakness of his intellect, for, throughout his life, he shewed an extraordinary deficiency in judgment, tact, and presence of mind. It was owing to these circumstances that from his childhood he was neglected, despised, and intimidated by his nearest relations; he was left to the care of his preceptors, who often treated him with improper harshness. His own mother is reported to have called him a portentum hominis, and to have said, that there was something wanting in his nature to make him a man in the proper sense of the word. This judgment, harsh as it may appear in the mouth of his mother, is not exaggerated, for in everything he did, and however good his intentions were, he failed from the want of judgment and a proper tact, and made himself ridiculous in the eyes of others. Notwithstanding this intellectual deficiency, however, he was a man of great industry and perseverance. He was excluded from the society of his family, and confined to slaves and women, whom he was led to make his friends and confidants by his natural desire of unfolding his heart. During the long period previous to his accession, as well as afterwards, he devoted the greater part of his time to literary pursuits, Augustus and his uncle Tiberius always treated him with contempt; Caligula, his nephew, raised him to the consulship indeed, but did not allow him to take any part in public affairs, and behaved towards him in the same way as his predecessors had done. In this manner the ill-fated man had reached the age of fifty, when after the murder of Caligula he was suddenly and unexpectedly raised to the imperial throne. When he received the news of Caligula's murder, he was alarmed about his own safety, and concealed himself in a corner of the palace; but he was discovered by a common soldier, and when Claudius fell prostrate before him, the soldier saluted him emperor. Other soldiers soon assembled, and Claudius in a state of agony, as if he were led to execution, was carried in a litter into the praetorian camp. There the soldiers proclaimed him emperor, and took their oath of allegiance to him, on condition of his giving each soldier, or at least each of the praetorian guards, a donative of fifteen sesterces—the first instance of a Roman emperor being obliged to make such a promise on his accession. It is not quite certain what may have induced the soldiers to proclaim a man who had till then lived in obscurity, and had taken no part in the administration of the empire. It is said that they chose him merely on account of his connexion with the imperial family, but it is highly probable that there were also other causes at work.

During the first two days after the murder of Caligula, the senators and the city councillors, which formed a kind of guard to the praetorian guards, indulged in the vain hope of restoring the republic, but being unable to make head against the praetorians, and not being well agreed among themselves, the senators were at last obliged to give way, and on the third day they recognized Claudius as emperor. The first act of his government was to proclaim an amnesty respecting the attempt to restore the republic, and a few only of the murderers of Caligula were put to death, partly for the purpose of establishing an example, and partly because it was known that some of the conspirators had intended to murder Claudius likewise. The acts which followed showed the same kind and aim. He flung out large sums to the public for the purpose of winning the sympathy of the people; that, if he had been left alone, or had been assisted by a sincere friend and adviser, his government would have afforded little or no ground for complaint. Had he been allowed to remain in a private station, he would certainly have been a kind, good, and honest man. But he was throughout his life placed in the most unfortunate circumstances. The perpetual fear in which he had passed his earlier days, was now increased and abused by those by whom he was surrounded after his accession. And this fear now became the cause of a series of cruel actions and of bloodshed, for which he is stamped in history with the name of a tyrant, which he does not deserve.

The first wife of Claudius was Plautia Urgulania, by whom he had a son, Drusus, and a daughter, Claudia. But as he had reason for believing that his own life was threatened by her, he divorced her, and married Aelia Petina, whom he likewise divorced on account of some misunderstanding. At the time of his accession he was married to his third wife, the notorious Vaiaria Messalina, who, together with the freedmen Natus, Pallus, and others, led him into a number of cruel acts. After the fall of Messalina by her own conduct and the intrigues of Narcissus, Claudius was, if possible, still more unfortunate in choosing for his wife his niece Agrippina. A.D. 49. She prevailed upon him to set aside his own son, Britannicus, and to adopt her son, Nero, in order that the succession might be secured to the latter. Claudius soon after regretted this step, and the consequence was, that he was poisoned by Agrippina in A.D. 54.

The conduct of Claudius during his government, in so far as it was not under the influence of his wives and freedmen, was mild and popular, and he made several useful and beneficial legislative enactments. He was particularly fond of building, and several architectural plans which had been formed, but thought impracticable by his predecessors, were carried out by him. He built, for example, the famous Claudian aqueduct (Aqua Claudia), the port of Ostia, and the emmary by which the water of lake Fusimus was carried into the river Liris. During his reign several wars were carried on in Britain, Germany, Syria, and Mauretania; but they were conducted by his generals. The southern part of Britain was constituted a Roman province in the reign of Claudius, who himself went to Britain in A.D. 48, to take part in the war; but not being of a warlike disposition, he quitted the island after a stay of a few days, and returned to Rome, where he celebrated a splendid triumph. Mauretania was made a Roman province in A.D. 42 by the legate Cn. Husius.

As an author Claudius occupied himself chiefly with history, and was encouraged in this pursuit by Livy, the historian. With the assistance of Sulpicius Flavins, he began at an early age to write a history from the death of the dictator Caesar; but being too straightforward and honest in his accounts, he was severely censured by his mother and grandmother. He accordingly gave up his plan, and began his history with the restoration of peace after the battle of Actium. Of the earlier period, he had written only four, but of the latter forty-one books. A third work were memoirs of his own life, in eight books, which Suetonius describes as 'characteristic and very interesting.' A fourth was a learned defence of Cicero against the attacks of Asinius Pollio. He seems to have been as well skilled in the use of the Greek as of the Latin language, for he wrote two historical works in Greek, the one a history of Carthage, in eight books, and the other a history of Etruria, in twenty books. However small the literary merit of these productions may have been, still the loss of the history of Etruria in particular is greatly to be lamented, as we know that he made use of the genuine sources of the Etruscans themselves. In A.D. 48, the Aedil petitioned that their senators should obtain the jus potestatem solemnum at Rome. Claudius supported their petition in a speech which he delivered in the senate. The grateful inhabitants of Lyons had this speech of the emperor engraved on bronze tables, and exhibited them in public. Two of these tables were discovered at Lyons in 1529, and are still preserved there. The inscriptions are printed in Gruter's Corp. Inscrip. p. 486. (Sueton. Claudius; Dion Cassius, lib. IX.; Tact. had sailed along the southern shores of the Euxine. Proceeding onwards, they passed through the narrow seas, and, steering for mount Athos, landed in Macedonia and invested Thessalonica. But having heard that Claudius was advancing at the head of a great army, they broke up the siege and hastened to encounter him. A terrible battle was fought near Naissus in Dardania (A.D. 269); upwards of fifty thousand of the barbarians were slain; a still greater number sank beneath the ravages of famine, cold, and pestilence; and the remainder, hotly pursued, threw themselves into the defiles of Haemus. Most of these were surrounded and cut off from all escape; such as resisted were slaughtered; the most vigorous of those who surrendered were admitted to recruit the ranks of their conquerors, while those unfit for military service were compelled to labour as agricultural slaves. But soon after these glorious achievements, which gained for the emperor the title of Gothicus, by which he is usually designated, he was attacked by an epidemic which seems to have spread from the vanquished to the victors, and died at Sirmium in the course of A.D. 270, after a reign of about two years, recommending with his last breath his general Aurelian as the individual most worthy of the purple.

Claudius was tall in stature, with a bright flashing eye, a broad full countenance, and possessed extraordinary muscular strength of arm. He was dignified in his manners, temperate in his mode of life, and historians have been loud in extolling his justice, moderation, and moral worth, placing him in the foremost rank of good emperors, equal to Trajan in valour, to Antoninus in piety, to Augustus in self-control—commendations which must be received with a certain degree of caution, from the fact, that the object of them was considered as one of the ancestors of Constantine, his niece Claudia being the wife of Eutropius and the mother of Constantius Chiron. The biography of Trebellius Pollio is a mere declamation, bearing all the marks of fulsome panegyric; but the testimony of Zosimus, who, although no admirer of Constantine, echoes these praises, is more to be trusted. It is certain also that he was greatly beloved by the senate, who heaped honours on his memory: a golden shield bearing his effigy was hung up in the curia Romana, a colossal statue of gold was erected in the Capitol in front of the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, a column was raised in the forum beside the rostra, and a greater number of coins bearing the epithet dieus, indicating that they were struck after death, are extant of this emperor than of any of his predecessors. (Trebell. Pollio, Claud.; Aurel. Vict. Epit. 54, de Caes. 34; Eutrop. ix. 11; Zosim. i. 40-43; Zonar. xii. 35, 26. Trebellius Pollio and Vopiscus give Claudius the additional appellation of Flavius, and the former that of Valerius also, names which were borne afterwards by Constantians.) [W.R.]

CLAUDIUS JULLUS OR JOLLAUS, a Greek writer of unknown date, and probably a freedman of some Roman, was the author of a work on Phoenixia (Φωινόχοιρς) in three books at least.
(Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀρχική, Ἰουλλίας, Διολλίας; Elym.

spoke in one of his works of the city Lemno in

CLAUDIUS, C. QUINCTIUS, patrician, consul with L. Genucius Cleopina in b.c. 271. (Fasti.)

CLAUDIUS, a Sabine leader, who is said to have assisted Aeneas, and who was regarded as the an-ccestor of the Claudia gens. (Virg. Aen. vii. 706, &c.) App. Claudius, before he migrated to Rome, was called in his own country Attus, or Attu
Claudius. (Claudius, No. 1.)

CLEANETUS (Klaionetos). I. Father of Cleon, the Athenian demagogue. (Thuc. iii. 36, iv. 21.) It is doubtful whether he is the same person as the Cleanetus who is mentioned by Aristophanes (Eg. 572), and of whom the Scholast on the passage speaks as the author of a decree for withholding the κριτικα ᾤποράσεως from the generals of the state.

2. A tragic poet, of whom we find nothing recorded except the interesting fact of his being so fond of lupines, that he would eat them, husks and all. (Comm. carp. Athen. ii. p. 59, c.; comp. Casaub.
ad loc.)

CLEANDER (Klaiondros). I. Tyrant of Gela, which had been previously subject to an oligarchy.
He reigned for seven years, and was murdered b.c. 498, by a man of Gela named Sybulus. He was succeeded by his brother Hippocrates, one of whom alone was also called Cleander. The latter, together with his brother Eudeleides, was deposed by Olen when he seized the government for himself in b.c. 491. (Herod. vii. 154, 155; Aristot.
Polit. v. 12, ed. Bekk.; Paus. vi. 5.)

2. An Aeginitan, son of Telescrus, whose victory in the pan克拉第 at the Isthmian games is celebrated by Pindar. (Isthm. viii.) The ode must have been composed very soon after the end of the Peloponnesian war (b.c. 479), and from it we learn that Cleander had also been victorious at the 'Athens at Megara and the 'Athens at Epida-
rou. (See Diet. of Ant. on the words.)

3. A Lacedaemonian, was most harmost at Byzantium in b.c. 400, and proposed Chreimathoj to meet the Cyrenian Greeks at Calpe with ships to convey them to Europe. On their reaching that place, however, they found that Cleander had neither come nor sent; and when he at length arrived, he brought only two triremes, and no transports.
Soon after his arrival, a tumult occurred, in which the traitor Dexcippus was rather roughly handled, and Cleander, instigated by him, threatened to sail away, to denounce the army as enemies, and to issue orders that no Greek city should receive them. (Dexcippus.) They succeeded, however, in persuading him by extreme submission, and he entered into a connexion of hospitality with Xenop-phon, and accepted the offer of leading the army home. But he wished probably to avoid the possibility of any hostile collision with Pharnabazus, and, the sacrifices being declared to be unavourful for the projected march, he sailed back to Byzantium, promising to give the Cyrenians the best reception in his power on their arrival there. This promise he seems to have kept as effectually as the opposition of the admiral Anaxibius would permit.
He was succeeded in his government by Aristarchus. (Xen. Anab. vi. 2 § 13, 4 §§ 12, 10, vi. 6 §§ 5—38, vii. i. §§ 8, 30, 5, 7, § 5, &c.)

4. One of Alexander's officers, son of Polemocrates. Towards the winter of b.c. 334, Alexander, being then in Caria, sent him to the Pelopon-nesus to collect mercenaries, and with these he returned and joined the king while he was engaged in the siege of Tyre, b.c. 331. (Arr. Anab.
iv. 24, iv. 20; Curt. iii. i. § 1, iv. 3, § 11.) In b.c. 330 he was employed by Polydamas, Alexander's emissary, to kill Parmenion, under whom he had been left as second in command at Ecbat-
a. (Arr. Anab. iii. 26; Curt. vii. 2 §§ 19, 27—32; Plut. Alex. 49; Diod. xvii. 80; Just. xii. s.)
On Alexander's arrival in Carmania, b.c. 325, Cleander joined him there, together with some other generals from Media and their forces.
But he was accused with the rest of extreme profligacy and oppression, not unmixed with sorcery.
His command, and was put to death by order of Alexander. (Arr. Anab. vi. 27; Diod. xvii. 106; Plut.
Alex. 68; Curt. x. 1 §§ 1—8; Just. xii. 10.)

5. A collector of proverbs, is quoted by the Scholast on Theocritus. (Idyll. v. 21, ἐπὶ μὲν οὖν ἄριστον.)

CLEANDER, a Phrygian slave, brought to Rome as a porter. He chanced to attract the attention and gain the favour of Commodus, who elevated him to the rank of chamberlain, and made him his chief minister after the death of Perennis.
(Paracelsus.) Being now all-powerful, he openly offered for sale all offices, civil and military, and the regular number of magistrates was multiplied to answer the demand, so that on one occasion he was nominated in a single year (it is believed to have been A.D. 165, or, according to Tillemont, 189), one of whom was Septimus Severus, afterwards emperor. The vast sums thus accumulated were however freely spent, partly in supplying the demands of the emperor, CLEANTHES.
partly in his own private gratifications, partly in receiving the wants of friends, and partly in works of public magnificence and utility. But fortune, which had raised him so rapidly, as suddenly hurled him down. A scarcity of corn having arisen, the blame was artfully cast upon the faction of Dionysius, the prefect of the province. A tumult burst forth in the circus, a mob hurried to the suburban villa of Commodus, clamouring for vengeance, and the emperor giving way to the dictates of his natural cowardice, yielded up Cleander, who was torn to pieces, and his whole family and nearest friends destroyed. (Dion Cass. Ixxii. 12, 13; Herodian. i. 12, 10; Lastram. Commod. 6, 7, 11.) [W. R.]

CLEANDER, an architect, who constructed some baths at Rome for the emperor Commodus. (Lastram. Comm. c. 17; Osann, Konsultblatt, 1830, N. 38.) [L. U.]

CLEAN'DRIDAS (Xlaanstrapaz), a Spartan, father of Glyppus, who, having been appointed by the ephors as commissioner to visit Attica in the invasion of Attica, b.c. 445, was said to have been bribed by Pericles to withdraw his army. He was condemned to death, but fled to Thurii, and was there received into citizenship. (Plut. Peric. 22, No. 28; Thuc. vi. 104, 93, viii. 2; Diod. xiiii. 106, who calls him Clearchus.) He afterwards commanded the Thurians in their war against the Tarentines. (Stat. vi. p. 264, who calls him Cleandrias.) [A. H. C.]

CLEAN'NOR (Klaanawapor), an Arcadian of Orchomenus, entered into the service of Cyrus the Younger, and is introduced by Xenophon as refusing, in the name of the Greeks, after the battle of Cunaxa, b.c. 401, to surrender their arms at the requisition of Artaxerxes. (Xen. Ancab. ii. 1, § 10.) After the treacherous apprehension of Clearchus and the other generals by Tissaphernes, Cleanner was one of those who were appointed to fill their places, and seems to have acted throughout the retreat with bravery and vigour. (Xen. Ancab. iii. § 46, 2, §§ 4—6, iv. 6, § 9.) When the Greeks found themselves deceived by the adventurer Coerastades, under whom they had marched out of Byzantium, Cleanner was among those who advised that they should enter the service of Seuthes, the Thracian prince, who had conciliated him by the present of a horse. We find him afterwards co-operating with Xenophon, of whom he seems to have had a high opinion, in his endeavour to obtain from Seuthes the promised pay. (Xen. Ancab. vii. 2, § 2, § 10.) [E. U.]

CLEANTHES (Klaanawphas), a Stoic, born at Assos in Troad about b.c. 300, though the exact date is unknown. He was the son of Phanias, and entered life as a boxer, but had only four drachmae of his own when he felt himself impelled to the study of philosophy. He first placed himself under Crates, and then under Zeno, whose faithful disciple he continued for nineteen years. In order to support himself and pay Zeno the necessary fee for his instructions, he worked all night at drawing water from gardens, and in consequence received the nickname of Phedrionas. As he spent the whole day in philosophical pursuits, he had no visible means of support, and was therefore summoned before the Areiopagus to account for his way of living. The judges were so delighted by the evidence of industry which he produced, that they voted him ten minas, though Zeno would not permit him to accept them. By his fellow-disciples he was considered slow and stupid, and received from them the title of the Aes, in which appellation he said that he rejoiced, as it implied that his back was strong enough to bear whatever Zeno put upon it. Several other anecdotes preserved of him show that he was one of those enthusiastic votaries of philosophy who naturally appeared from time to time in an age when there was no deep and earnest religion to satisfy the thinking part of mankind. We are not therefore surprised to hear of his declaring that for the sake of philosophy he would dig and undergo all possible labour, of his taking notes from Zeno's lectures on bones and pieces of earth-ware when he was too poor to buy paper, and of the quaint principle with which he reviled himself for his small progress in philosophy, by calling himself a slow and stupid disciple of a slow and stupid teacher, but not of a mind. For this vigour and zeal in the pursuit, he was styled a second Hercules; and when Zeno died, b.c. 263, Cleanthes succeeded him in his school. This event was fortunate for the preservation of the Stoic doctrines, for though Cleantches was not endowed with the sagacity necessary to rectify and develop his master's system, yet his stern morality and his devotion to Zeno induced him to keep it free from all foreign corruptions. His poverty was relieved by a present of 3000 minas from Antigonus, and he died at the age of eighty. The story of his death is characteristic. His physician recommended to him a two days' abstinence from food to cure an ulcer in his mouth, and at the end of the second day he said that, as he had now advanced so far on the road to death, it would be a pity to have the trouble over again, and he therefore still refused all nourishment, and died of starvation.

The names of the numerous treatises of Cleanthes preserved by Laertius (vii. 175) present the usual catalogue of moral and philosophical subjects: ἄρετος, ἄρετος, ἄρετος, ἄρετος, ἄρετος, &c. A hymn of his to Zeus is still extant, and contains some striking sentiments. It was published in Greek and German by H. H. Claudiuss, Göttingen, 1786; also by Sturz, 1785, re-edited by Merzdorf, Lips. 1835, and by others. His doctrines were almost exactly those of Zeno. There was a slight variation between his opinion and the more usual Stoicl view respecting the immortality of the soul. Cleantches taught that all souls are immortal, but that the intensity of existence after death would vary according to the strength or weakness of the particular soul, thereby leaving to the wicket some apprehension of future punishment; whereas Chrysippus considered that only the souls of the wise and good were to survive death. (Plut. Plac. Phil. iv. 7.) Again, with regard to the ethical principle of the Stoics, to "live in unison with nature," it is said that Zeno only emulated the vague direction, διαλογογονία, which Cleantches explained by the addition of τῆς ὁλοκλήρου, (Stob. Ed. ii. p. 152.) By this he meant the universal nature of things, whereas Chrysippus understood by the nature which governs this or that man, as well as universal nature. (Diog. Laer. vii. 89.) This opinion of Cleantches was of a Cynical character [Antisthenes], and held up as a model

"Hence the correction of patetum for patetum has been proposed in Juv. ii. 7: "Et juliet archetypa patetum servare Cleanthes."
of an animal state of existence, unimproved by the progress of civilization. Accordingly we hear that his moral theory was even stricter than that of ordinary Stoicism, denying that pleasure was agreeable to nature, or in any way good. The direction to follow universal nature also led to fatalistic conclusions, of which we find traces in the later schools. For example, Sócrates and Sócrates, kí káthv, sócratión, lógoj givó ékòlía ñaìstronovés, n. t. l. (Mohrike, Kleinthes der Stukler, fragm. i.; see also Diog. Laërt. Lc.; Cit. Acad. iv. 25, Dic. i. 3, Flin. ii. 31, iv. 3; Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, xi. 5. 1; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philosop. p. ii. lib. ii. c. 9.) [G. E. L. C.]

CLEANTHES (Κλεάνθης), the name of a freedman of Cat's Younger, who was also his physician, and attended him at the time of his death, s. c. 46. (Plut. Cat. ad fin.) [W. A. G.]

CLEANTHES, an ancient painter of Corinth, mentioned among the inventors of that art by Pliny (H. N. xxv. 3) and Athenagoras. (Leg. pro Christ. c. 17.) A picture by him representing the birth of Minerva, which was one of the treasures of Dionysus at Alpens. (Strab. viii. p. 348, b.; Athen. viii. p. 348, c.) This work was not, as Gerhard (Ameres. Vassthuli, i. p. 12) says, confounding our artist with Cleistocles (Plin. xxxv. 40), in a ludicrous style, but rather in the severe style of ancient art. [L. U.]

CLEARCHUS (Κλεάρχος), a Spartan, son of Rauphas. In the congress which the Spartans held at Corinth, in b. c. 412, it was determined to employ him as commander in the Hellespont after Chios and Lesbos should be gained from the Athenians; and in the same year the eleven commissioners, who were sent out from Sparta to take cognizance of the conduct of Astyochus, were entrusted with the discretionary power of despatching a force to the Hellespont under Clearchus. (Thuc. viii. 8, 39.) In b. c. 410, he was present at the battle of Cynusus under Mindarus, who appointed him to lead that part of the force which was specially opposed to Thrasybulus. (Diod. xiii. 51; Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 16, &c.; Plut. Ala. 26.) In the same year, on the proposal of Agis, he was sent to Chalcodon and Byzantium, with the latter of which states he had a connexion of hospitality, to endeavour to cut off the Athenian supplies of corn in that quarter, and he accordingly fixed his residence at Byzantium as hostages. When the town was besieged by the Athenians, b. c. 408, Clearchus reserved all the provisions, when they became scarce, for the Lacedaemonian soldiers; and the consequent sufferings of the inhabitants, as well as the general tyranny of his rule, led some parties within the place to surrender it to the enemy, and served afterwards to justify them even in the eyes of Spartan judges when they were brought to trial for the alleged treachery. At the time of the surrender, Clearchus had crossed over to Asia to obtain money from Pharnabazus and to collect a force sufficient to raise the siege. He was afterwards tried for the loss of the town, and fined. (Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 35, 3. § 18, &c.; Diod. xiii. 67; Plut. Ala. 31; Polycaen. i. 47, ii. 2.) In b. c. 406 he was present at the battle of Arginusae, and was named by Calliocrates as the man most fit to act as commander, should he himself be slain. (Diod. xiii. 50.) On the conclusion of the Peloponnesian war, Clearchus, to whom peace was ever irksome, persuaded the Spartans to send him as general to Thrace, to protect the Greeks in that quarter against the Thracians. But by the time he had reached the isthmus, the ephors repented their selection of him, and sent an order for his recall. He proceeded however to the Hellespont in spite of it, and was consequently condemned to death by the authorities at home. At Byzantium, where he took up his residence, he beheld with great confidence a large arm of money with which many of the chief citizens and seized their property, he raised a body of mercenary guards and men, and himself mustered the place. The Spartans, according to Diodorus, having remonstrated with him to no purpose, sent a force against him under Panthoides; and Clearchus, thinking it no longer safe to remain in Byzantium, withdrew to Selymbria. Here he was defeated and besieged, but effects his escape by night, and passing over to Asia, proceeded to the court of Cyrus. The prince, whose object was to collect, without exciting suspicion, as many troops as possible for his intended expedition against his brother, supplied Clearchus with a large sum of money, with which he levied mercenaries and employed them till Cyrus need their services, in protecting the Greeks of the Thracian Chersoneseus against the neighbouring barbarians. Plutarch says,—a statement not very easy to reconcile with the sentence of death which had been passed against him,—that he received also an order from Sparta to promote in all points the objects of Cyrus. When the prince had set out on his expedition, Clearchus joined him at Celaenae in Phrygia with a body of 2000 men in all, being, according to Xenophon (Anab. iii. 1. § 10), the only Greek who was aware of the prince's real object. When the actual intention of Cyrus began to be suspected, the Greeks refused to march further, and Clearchus, attempting to force his own troops to proceed, narrowly escaped stoning at their hands. Professing then to come into their wishes, and keeping up a show of variety between himself and Cyrus, he gradually led, not his own forces only, but the rest of his countrymen as well, to perceive the difficulties of their position should they desert the service of the prince, and thus ultimately induced them to advance. When Orontes was brought to trial for his treason, Clearchus was the only Greek admitted into the number of judges, and he was the first to advise sentence of death against the accused. At the battle of Cumana, b. c. 401, he commanded the right wing of the Greeks, which rested on the Euphrates; from this position he thought it unsafe to withdraw, as such a step would have exposed him to the risk of being surrounded; and he therefore neglected the directions of Cyrus, who had desired him to charge with all his force the enemy's centre. Plutarch blames him exceedingly for such an excess of caution, and attributes to it the loss of the battle. When the Greeks began their retreat, Clearchus was tacitly recognized as their commander-in-chief, and in this capacity he exhibited his usual qualities of prudence and energy, as well as great strictness in the preservation of discipline. At length, however, being desirous of coming to a better understanding with his Thermopylites, and allaying the suspicions which existed between him and the Greeks in spite of their solemn truce, Clearchus sought an interview with the government, the result of which was an agreement to punish the parties on both sides who had laboured to excite their mutual jealousy; and Thermopylites promised that, if Clearchus would bring his chief officers to him, he would point out those who had instilled suspicion into him against their countrymen. Clearchus fell into the snare, was indeed found of the generals and twenty of the lachesi to accompany him to the interview. The generals were admitted and arrested, while the other officers, who had remained without, were massacred. Clearchus and his colleagues were sent to the court of Artaxerxes, and, notwithstanding the efforts of the queen-mother, Parysatis, in their favour, were all beheaded, with the exception of Memon, who perished by a more lingering death. In this account Xenophon and Ctesias are in the main agree; but from the latter Plutarch reports besides several apocryphal stories. One of these is, that, while the bodies of the other generals were torn by dogs and birds, a violent wind raised over that of Clearchus a tomb of sand, which, in a miraculous way, shortly stopped the time of an overshadowing grove of palm trees arose; so that the king repented much when he knew that he had slain a favourite of the gods. (Xen. Ancub. l. i. § 9, 2, § 9, 3, §§ 1—21, 5, §§ 11—17, 6, §§ 1—11, 8, §§ 4—13, ii. 1—6, § 15; Diod. xiv. 12, 22—26; Plut. Ar- tax. 8, 18.)

CLEARCHUS (Κλαρχησ), a citizen of Hermelgia on the Kauke, was recalled from exile by the nobles to aid them in quelling the seditions temper and demands of the people. According to Justin, he made an agreement with Mithridates I. of Pontus to betray the city to him on condition of holding it under him as governor. But, perceiving apparently that he might make himself master of it without the aid of Mithridates, he not only broke his agreement with the latter, but seized his person, and compelled him to pay a large sum for his release. Having deserted the oligarchical side, he came forward as the man of the people, obtained from them the command of a body of mercenaries, and, having got rid of the nobles by murder and banishment, raised himself to the tyranny. He used his power as badly, and with as much cruelty as he had gained it, while, with the very frenzy of arrogance, he assumed publicly the attributes of Zeus, and gave the name of Kepaurus to one of his sons. He lived in constant fear of assassination, against which he guarded in the strictest way. But, in spite of his precautions, he was murdered by Chion and Leon in B.C. 333, after a reign of twelve years. He is said to have been a pupil both of Plato and of Isocrates, the latter of whom asserts that, while he was with him, he was one of the greatest and most benevolent of men. CLEARCHUS (Κλαρχησ), of Soli, one of Aristotle's pupils, was the author of a number of works, none of which are extant, on a very great variety of subjects. He seems to have been the same person whom Athenaeus (i. p. 4, a.) calls τρεξβενηφ, or the diner out. A list of his principal writings has not been preserved, all the remains of which are fragmentary. (In Hist. Graec. pp. 83, 94, ed. Westermann) being omitted for the sake of brevity.—1. Bioi, a biographical work, extending, at least, eight books. (See Athen. xii. p. 545, d.)

2. A commentary on Plato's "Timæus." (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. iii. p. 95.) 3. Πλάτωνος ευγνώμον. (Diog. Laert. iii. 2.) 4. Περί των ἐν τῇ Πλάτωνος Πολεμίους μνημεία διερήσεις. 5. Μενούραν τον τιμητήραν, a treatise on flattery, so called, according to Athenaeus (vi. p. 258), from Gorgythus, one of Alexander's courtiers. 6. Περί φάλαιν. (Diog. Laert. i. 9; Athen. xxv. p. 697, e.) 7. Περί φιλοσ. 8. Παρομοία. 9. Περί γραφής, on riddles. 10. Ἐνακριβοτεκά, probably historical, a collection of love-stories, not unmixed with the discussion of some very odd questions on the subject (e. g. Athen. xii. p. 553, f.). 11. Περί γραφής, on paintings. (Athen. xiv. p. 648, f.) 12. Περί πολιτείας. The reading in Athenaeus (vii. ad init.) is doubtful; see D'Achamps and Casaubon, ad loc. 13. Περί ψυχής, on the Torpedo. 14. Περί τῶν ἀνθρώπων, on water-animals. 15. Περί νησίων, on sand-wastes. 16. Περί τῶν ἀνθρώπων, an anatomical work. (Casaubon ad Athen. xiv. p. 390.) 17. Περί νησίων, the genuineness of which, however, has been called in question. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. iii. p. 481.) This is the work to which Clement of Alexandria refers (Strom. i. 15) for the account of the philosophical Jew, with whom Aristotle was said to have held much communication, and wherein, by his own confession, he has gained more than he imparted. It has been doubted also whether the work on military tactics referred to by Adianus Tacticus (ch. 1) should be ascribed to the present Clearchus or to the tyrant of Hermelgia. (See Voss. l.c.; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. iii. p. 481.)

[Ε. Ε.]

CLEARCHUS (Κλαρχησ), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, whose time is unknown. Fragments are preserved from his Kepaurusiai (Athen. xiv. p. 626, e.; Kepaurusia (xiv. p. 613, h.), Περικερνου (xiv. p. 642, b.), and from a play, the title of which is unknown, i. p. 28, e.; Eustath. ad Odys. 1. 1693, 47; Meine c., Com. Graec. i. p. 490, iv. pp. 562, 649.) [P. S.]

CLEARCHUS, a sculptor in bronze at Rhegium, is important as the teacher of the celebrated Pythagoras, who flourished at the time of Myron and Polydorus. Clearchus was the pupil of the Corinthian Eucheir, and belongs probably to the 72nd and following Olympiads. The whole pedigree of the school to which he is to be ascribed is given by Pausanias. (vi. § 4. Comp. Heyne, Opusc. Acad. v. p. 371.) [L. U.]

CLEARIDAS (Κλαρίδας), a friend of Brasidas, and apparently one of those young men whose appointment to foreign governments Thucydides considered to have been inconsistent with Spartan principles (iv. 129). He was made governor of Amphipolis by Brasidas; and in the battle there, in which Brasidas and Cleon were killed, he commanded the main body of the forces, i. c. 422. Clearidas afterwards distinguished himself in the quarrals which arose after the peace of Nicias, by giving up Amphipolis, not (as the terms required) to the Athenians, but to the Amphipolitans himself. (Thuc. v. 10, 21, 34.) [Α. H. C.]

CLEDONIUS, the author of an essay upon Latin grammar, published by Putschius from a single corrupt and imperfect MS., inscribed Ars Cledonii Romano-Senatoria, Consuetudinem et usum Graecorum. It is more of a treatise on the celebrated treatise of Donatus, and to suit the arrangement of that work is divided into two parts, the former, or ars prima, containing illustrations of the Eddito Prima; the latter, or ars CLEINIAS. [Donatus.] Of Cledionius personally we know nothing; but it is not improbable that he may have been attached to the Auditorium or University established in the epiphilium of Constantinople, an institution to which we find an allusion in p. 1865. (Comp. Godfr. ad Cod. Theod. 14. tit. 9 vol. v. p. 203, &c.) The only edition that is contained in the "Grammaticae Latinae Antiquae Antiqui" of Putesch, ivto. Hanov. 1693, pp. 1859—1859. (Ossia, Beiträge zur Griech. und Röm. Literaturgesch. vol. ii. p. 514, &c.) [W. R.]

CLEM/MOPORUS or CLEA/MPORUS, a physician, who may have lived in the sixth or fifth century B.C., as Pliny says that it was a botanical work, which was commonly attributed to Pythagoras, was by some persons supposed to have been written by him. (H. N. xiv. 101.) [W. A. G.]

CLEIDE/MUS (Kleidymos), an ancient Athenian author. Meursius is inclined to believe (Plexistr. c. 2), that the name, where it occurs in Plutarch, Athenaeus, and others, has been substituted, by an error of the copystas, for Cleidemus, who is mentioned by Pausanias (z. 15) as the most ancient writer of Athenian history. We find in Athenaeus the following works ascribed to Cleidemus:—I. 'Egygprados.' (Athen. ix. p. 412, a.) This is probably the same work which is referred to by Suidas (s. v. Τόπος). Casaubon (ad Athen. l. c.) and Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 418, ed. Westermann) think that it was a sort of lexicton; but it seems rather to have been an antiquarian treatise, in verse, on religious rites and ceremonies. (Comp. Ruhnken, ad Tim. s. v. 'Εγγυγοις.) 2. 'Αρδός (Athen. vi. p. 283, a.), the subject of which seems to have been the history and antiquities of Attica. It is probably the work quoted by Plutarch (Tues. 19, 27), who mentions profusily as the special characteristic of the author. 3. Παραγονονια, also apparently an antiquarian work. (Athen. xiv. p. 650, a.) 4. Νομιας, a passage from the eighth book of which is referred to by Athenaeus (Xiv. p. 603, a.), relating to the first restoration of Pausanias of Athens (of Hemi. Hell. v. 2. § 11, &c.; Diod. xxv. 19, &c.; comp. p. 155, a.)

2. A man who is violently attacked by Aristophanes in a very obscure passage (Rut. 705—716), where he is spoken of as a bathian, purry in person, dishonest, drunken, and quarrelsome. The Scholiast says (ad Arist. l. c.), that he was a rich man, but of foreign extraction. He seems to have been a meddler in politics, and a mischievous churlatin of the day. [E. E.]

CLEI/NIAS (Kleiniás.). 1. Son of Alebiadus, who traced his origin from Euryasces, the son of the Telenomian Ajax. This Alebiadus was the contemporary of Cleisthenes [CLEISTHENES, No 2], whom he assisted in expelling the Peisistratidae from Athens, and along with whom he was subsequently banished. Cleinas married Deinomachus, the daughter of Megacles, and became by her the father of the famous Aleibiades. He greatly distinguished himself in the third naval engagement at Artemision, b. c. 480, having provided a ship and manned it with 200 men at his own expense. He was slain in b. c. 447, at the battle of Coroneia, in which the Athenians were defeated by the Boeotians and Euboecans. (Herod. viii. 17; Plut. Alex. 1; Plat. Ale. Prim. p. 112.) Thus I. 113.)

2. A younger brother of the famous Aleibiades. Pericles, the guardian of the youths, fearing lest Aleibiades might corrupt him, sent him away from his own house and placed him for education with his brother Arifron; but the latter sent him back at the end of six months, finding it impossible to make anything of him. (Plut. Protag. p. 320.) In another dialogue (Ale. Prim. p. 118, ad fin.; comp. Schol. ad loc.) he is spoken of as quite a madman.

3. Son of Achiucus, and the same who is introduced as a very young man by Plato in the "Euthydemus," was first cousin to No 3 and to Aleibiades.

4. The father of Aratus of Sicyon. The Sicyonians committed to him the supreme power in their state on the deposition, according to Pausanias, of the tyrants Euthydemus and Timoleonidas, the latter of whom, according to Plutarch, was joined with Cleinas as his colleague. Soon after this Abantias murdered Cleinas and seized the tyranny, b. c. 264. (Paus. ii. 8; Plut. Arat. 2.) [ABANTIDAS.]

CLEINIAS (Kleiniás), a Pythagorean philosopher, of Tarentum, was a contemporary and friend of Plato's, as appears from the story (perhaps otherwise worthless) which Diogenes Laëritus (ix. 40) gives on the authority of Aristocles, to the effect that Plato wished to burn all the writings of Democritus which he could collect, but was prevented by Amyclias and Cleinas. In his practice, Cleinas was a follower of Diogenes Laëritus. Thus we hear that he used to assure his anger by playing on his harp; and, when Proclus of Cyrene had lost all his fortune through a political revolution (comp. Thirige, Res Cyrenienses, § 48), Cleinas, who knew nothing of him except that he was a Pythagorean, took on himself the risk of a voyage to Cyrene, and supplied him with money to the full extent of his loss. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 27, 31, 53; Ael. V. H. xiv. 23; Perizem. ad loc.; Chamael. Pont. Op. Athen. xiv. p. 623, &c.; Diod. Perigam. lib. x.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. pp. 840, 886.) [E. E.]

CLEINIS (Kleinis), the husband of Harpe and father of Lycius, Ortygus, Harpasus, and Arte- michas. He lived in Mesopotamia, near Babylon, and was beloved by Apollo and Artemis. Having heard that the Hyperboreans sacrificed seven to Apollo, he wished to introduce the same custom at Babylon; but Apollo threatened him, and commanded that only sheep, goats, and heifers should be sacrificed. Lycius and Harpasus, the sons of Cleinis, however, insisted in sacrificing asses, whereupon Apollo infuriated the animals so as to attack the family of Cleinis. Other divinities, however, took pity upon the family, and changed all its members into different birds. (Anton Lib. 20.)

CLEINO/MACHUS (Kleinomachus), a Megarian
CLEISTHENES. philosopher of Thurium, is said by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 112) to have been the first who composed treatises on the fundamental principles of dialectics (περὶ εξειδήμων καὶ καταγραφήμασι). We learn from Suidas (s. v. Πύθων), that Pythion, who flourished about 330 B.C., attended the instructions of Bryso, and that the latter was a disciple of Cleinomachus. We may therefore set the date of Cleinomachus towards the commencement of the same century. [E. E.]

CLEID. [MUS.] 1. CLEISTHENES (Κλεισθένης). 1. Son of Aristocles, and tyrant of Sicyon. He was descended from Orthagoras, who founded the dynasty about 100 years before his time, and succeeded his grandfather Myron in the tyranny, though probably not without some opposition. (Herod. vi. 126; Aristot. Politi. v. 12, ed Bekk.; Paus. ii. 8; Müller, Dor., i. 8, § 2.) In B.C. 595, he aided the Amphictyons in the sacred war against Corinna, which ended, after ten years, in the destruction of the guilty city, and in which Solon too is said to have assisted with his counsel the avengers of the god. (Paus. x. 87; Aesch. c. Cle. § 107, &c.; Clinton, F. H. sub anno, 595.) We find Cleisthenes also engaged in war with Argos, his enmity to which is said by Herodotus to have been so great, that he prohibited the recitation at Sicyon of Homer's poems, because Argos was celebrated in them, and restored to the worship of Dionysus what the historian calls, by a prolepsis, the tragic choruses in which Adnatus, the Argive hero, was commemorated. (Herod. v. 67; see Nitschke, Mel. tom. i. p. 153, &c.) Müller (l. c.) connects this hostility of Cleisthenes towards Argos, the chief Dorian city of the district, with his systematic endeavours to depress and dishonour the Dorian tribes at Sicyon. The old names of these he altered, calling them by new ones derived from the sown, the ass, and the pig ('Τάρα, 'Οιναί, Χοιράται), while to his own tribe he gave the title of 'Αρέανα (lords of the people). The explanation of his motives is given by Müller, and Pythagoras mentions a colonnade (στὸν Κλεισθένησος) which he built with the spoils taken in the sacred war. (Paus. ii. 9.) We have no means of ascertaining the exact date of the death of Cleisthenes, or the conclusion of his tyranny, but we know that it cannot be placed earlier than B.C. 582, in which year he won the victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games. (See Clinton and Müller on the year.) His daughter Agarista, whom so many suitors sought, was given in marriage to Megacles the Alcmeonid. [AGARISTA.]

2. An Athenian, son of Megacles and Agarista, and grandson of the tyrant of Sicyon, appears as the head of the Alcmeonid clan on the banishment of the Peisistratidae, and was indeed suspected of having tampered with the Delphic oracles, and urged it to require from Sparta the expulsion of Hippia. Finding, however, that he could not cope with his political rival Isagoras except through the aid of the commons, he set himself to increase the power of the latter, and to remove most of the safeguards against democracy which Solon had established or preserved. There is therefore less truth than rhetorics in the assertion of Isocrates (Apologet. p. 145, a), that Cleisthenes merely restored the constitution of Solon. The principal change which he undertakes was the abolition of most of his other alterations grew, was the abolition of the four ancient tribes, and the establishment of ten new ones in their stead. These last were purely local, and the object as well as the effect of the arrangement was, to give permanence to democratic ascendency by the destruction of the old aristocratic associations of clanship. (Comp. Arist. Politi. vi. 4, ed Bekk.; Thirglo, Res Cyren. § 48.) The increase in the number of the θυγήθηκαν was a consequence of the above measure. The θυγήθηκα were indeed allowed to remain as before, but, as they were no longer connected with the tribes (the θυγήθηκα constituting the new subdivision), they ceased to be of any political importance. According to Adrian (V. H. xiii. 24) Cleisthenes was also the first who instituted ostracism, by which he is said, on the same authority, to have been the first sufferer; and this is partly borne out by Diodorus (xi. 55), who says, that ostracism was introduced after the banishment of the Peisistratidae (but see Plut. Nic. 11; Harpocrt. s. v. Ιππαρχαί). We learn, moreover, from Aristotle (Politi. ii. 2, ed Bekk.) that he admitted into the tribes a number of persons who were not of Athenian blood; but this appears to have been only intended to serve his purposes at the time, not to be a precedent for the future. By some again he is supposed to have remodelled the Epihetae, adding a fifth court to the four old ones, and altering the names of the towns, by taking them from the Dorian tribes and the names of places from each tribe and a president. (Wachsmuth, vol. i. p. 360, Eng. transl.; but see Müller, Enum. mel. § 64, &c.) The changes of Cleisthenes had the intended effect of gaining political superiority for himself and his party, and Isagoras was reduced to apply for the aid of the Spartans under Cleomenes I. Hemida accordingly were sent from Lacedaemon to Athens, who demanded and obtained the banishment of Cleisthenes and the rest of the Alcmeonidae, as the accursed family (κακογενή), on whom rested the pollution of Gylon's murder. [CION.:] Cleisthenes having withdrawn, Cleomenes proceeded to expel 700 families pointed out by Isagoras, and endeavored to abolish the Council of 500, and to place the government in the hands of 300 oligarchs. But the Council resisted the attempt, and the people supported them, and besieged Cleomenes and Isagoras in the Acropolis, of which they had taken possession. On the third day the besieged capitulated, and the Lacedaemonians and Isagoras were allowed to depart from Attica. The rest were put to death, and Cleisthenes and the 700 banished families were recalled. (Herod. v. 63, 66, 69—73, vi. 131; comp. Dict. of Ant. pp. 155, 238, 823, &c., 633, 755, 890—933.)

3. An Athenian, whose folly and effeminate profligacy brought him more than once under the lack of Aristophanes. Thus the Clouds are said to take the form of women, when they see him (v. 351, &c.) and in the Nicomachean (574, &c.) he brings information to the women, as being a particular friend of theirs, that Euripides has smuggled in Mnesilochus among them as a spy. In spite of his character he appears to have been appointed on one occasion to the sacred office of Ἀθηνόπος. (Vesp. 1187.) The Scholiast on Ach. 118 and Ep. 1371 says, that, in order to preserve the appearance of youth, he wore no beard, removing the hair by an application of pitch. (Comp. Eimsl. ad Ach. 118.)

CLEITAGORAE (Κλειταγόρα), a lyric poetess, mentioned by Aristophanes in his Wasps (v. 1245), and in his lost play, the Damaith. She is variously represented as a Lacedaemonian, a Thessalian, and a Lesbian. (Schol. in Aristoph. Vesp. 1220, 1245, Laisistr. 1237; Suid. Hesych. s. v.) [PS.]

CLEITARCHUS (Κλειταρχος), tyrant of Eretria in Euboea. After Phirtarchus had been expelled from the tyranny of Eretria by Phocion, b. c. 350, popular government was at first established; but strong party struggles ensued, in which the adherents of Athens were at length overpowered by those of Macedonia, and Philip then sent Hippocrates, one of his generals, to destroy the walls of Porthous, the harbour of Eretria, and to set up Hipparchus, Automedon, and Cleitar- chus as tyrants. (Plut. Pheoc. 13; Dem. de Cor. §§ 86, Philipp. iii. §§ 86, 68.) This was subsequent to the peace between Athens and Philip in b. c. 346, since Demosthenes adduces it as one of the proofs of a breach of the peace on the part of Macedon. (Philipp. iii. § 28.) The tyrants, however, were not sued to retain their power quietly, for Demosthenes (Philipp. iii. § 69) mentions two armaments sent by Philip for their support, at different times, under Eurylochus and Parmenion respectively. Soon after, we find Cleitarchus in sole possession of the government; but he does not seem to have been at open hostility with Athens, though he held Eretria for Philip, for we hear of the Athenians sending ambassadors to request his consent to the arrangement for uniting Euboea under one federative government, having its congress at Chalkis, to which Athens was also to transfer the annual contributions from Oreus and Eretria. Aeschines says, that a talent from Cleitarchus was part of the bribe which he alleges that Demosthenes received for procuring the decree in question. Cleitarchus appears therefore to have come into the above project of Demosthenes and Callias, to whom he would naturally be opposed; but he thought it perhaps a point gained if he could get rid of the remnant of Athenian influence in Eretria. For the possible motives of Demosthenes, see p. 568, a. The plan, however, seems to have fallen to the ground, and Demosthenes in b. c. 341 carried a decree for an expedition to Euboea with the view of putting down the Macedonian interest in the island. On this, Cleitarchus and Philistides, the tyrant of Oreus, sent ambassadors to Athens to prevent, if possible, the threatened invasion; and Aeschines, at whose house the envoys were entertained, appears to have supported their cause in the assembly. But the decree was carried into effect, and the command of the armament was given to Phocion, by whom Cleitarchus and Philistides were expelled from their respective cities. (Aesch. c. Cles. §§ 85—103; Dem. de Cor. p. 252, &c.; Dion. xvi. 74; Phil. Dem. 17.)

CLEITARCHUS (Κλειταρχος), son of the historian Deinon (Plin. H. N. x. 49), accompanied Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition, and wrote a history of it. This work has been erroneously supposed by some to have formed the basis of that of Curtius, who is thought to have closely followed, even if he did not translate it. We find Curtius, however, in one passage (ix. 5, § 21) differing from Cleitarchus, and even ensuring him for his inaccuracy. Cicero also (de Leg. i. 2) speaks very significantly of the production in question (τα ἔργα Ἀλέξανδρος), and mentions him again ( Brut. 11) as one who, in his account of the death of Themistocles, sketched out history with a little dash of romance. Quintilian says (Inst. Or. x. 1), that his ability was greater than his veracity; and Longinus (de Sublim. § 3; comp. Toup. ad loc.) condemns his style as frivolous and inflated, applying to it the expression of Sophocles, συμπήγμενοι μὲν ἀληθικοίς, φθειρᾶς δὲ έγίγνοντο. He is quoted also by Putharch (Them. 27, Alex. 46), and several times by Pliny, Athenaeus, and Strabo. The Cleitarchus, whose treatise on foreign words (γλωσσολογία) is frequently referred to by Athenaeus, was a different person from the historian. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iii. p. 83; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 90, ed. Westermann.)

CLEITE (Κλείτη), a daughter of king Merops, and wife of Cyzicus. After the murder of her husband by the Argonauts she hung herself, and the tears of the nymphs, who lamented her death, were changed into drops which bore the name of Cleite. (Apoll. Rh. i. 967, 1063, &c.) He continued to reign at Athens till as late as b. c. 111, at all events, as Crassus heard him in that year. (Cic. de Orat. i. 11.)

Of his works, which amounted to 400 books (Βιβλία, Diog. Laërt. i. c.), only a few titles are preserved. His main object in writing them was to make known the philosophy of his master Carneades, from whose views he never dissented. Cleitomachus continued to reside at Athens till the end of his life; but he continued to cherish a strong affection for his native country, and when Carthage was taken in b. c. 146, he wrote a work to console his unfortunate countrymen. This work, which Cicero says he had read, was taken from a discourse of Carneades, and was intended to exhibit the consolation which philosophy supplies even under the greatest calamities. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 22.) Cicero seems indeed to have paid a good deal of attention to the works of Cleitomachus, and speaks in high terms of his industry, penetration, and philosophical talent. (Acad. ii. 6; 31.) He sometimes translates from the works of Cleitomachus, as for instance from the "De sustentandis Offensionibus," which was in four books. (Acad. ii. 31.)
CLEITUS.

Cleitomachus appears to have been well known to his contemporaries at Rome, for two of his works were dedicated to illustrious Romans; one to the poet C. Ludius, and the other to L. Censorinus, consul in B.C. 149. (Cic. Acad. ii. 32.)

Cleitomachus probably treated of the history of philosophy in his work on the philosophical sects (τεῖτρα διάφορα). (Diog. Laert. ii. 92.)

CLEITOMACHUS (Κλείτωμαχος), a Thracian athlete, whose exploits are recorded by Pausanias (v. 15; comp. Suid. s.v. Κλείτωμαχος). He won the prize at Olympia in the panathlon in Ol. 141. (n. c. 216.)

Aelian mentions (V. H. iii. 30) his great temperance, and the care he took to keep himself in good condition. [E. E.]

CLEITONYMUS (Κλείτονυμος), an historian of uncertain date. A work of his on Italy and another on Sybaris are quoted by Plutarch. (Parallel. Min. 10, 21.) His Tragedies, also quoted by Plutarch (de Pace. 3), Vossius supposes to have been a collection of the legends which formed the ordinary subject of ancient tragedy; but it has been proposed to substitute Θεοδωραγωγας for τραγωδεις in the passage in question. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 416, ed. Westermann.) [E. E.]

CLEITOPHON (Κλείτοφων), a Rhodian author of uncertain date, to whom we find the following works ascribed: 1. Γελατονυμα, a history of the Gauls, from which Plutarch (Parallel. Min. 15) gives a story, parallel to that of Tarpeia in Livy, of a woman of Ephesus, who betrayed the town to Brennus. 2. Ἰερασίδαι, from the tenth book of which Plutarch (de Lus. 25. § 3) quotes a medical recipe for the jaundice. 3. Τραγωδουλης. 4. Κρισιας, a work on the origin of different cities (Plut. de Pace. 6. § 4), from which we obtain one theory on the etymology of Lagusium. (See Voss. de Hist. Graec. pp. 416, 419.) [E. E.]

CLEITUS (Κλείτος). 1. A son of Amytippus, married Cleito, (Apollod. i. § 6.)

2. A son of Mantius, carried off by Essex on account of his extraordinary beauty. (Hom. Od. xv. 250; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1780.)

3. A son of Peisencor of Troy, slain by Teucerus. (Hom. I. xxv. 445, &c.)

4. The beloved friend of Pallene, who fought with his rival Dryas for the possession of Pallene, and conquered him by the assistance of the maidens. Sithon, the father of Pallene, wanted to punish his daughter, but she was rescued from his hands by Aphrodite, and after Sithon's death she married Cleitus, and the country of Pallene derived its name from her. (Conon, Narrat. 10; Parthen. Erot. 6.)

5. King of the Sithones in Thrace, who gave his daughter Glytis to Tereon in marriage to Protes, who had come to Thrace from Egypt. (Conon, Narrat. 39.) [L. S.]

CLEITUS (Κλείτος or Κλείτος). 1. Son of Bardylis, king of Illyria. [See p. 463.] In B.C. 335, having received promise of aid from Glauicus, king of the Taulantians, he revolted from Alexander the Great. The latter accordingly invaded his country, and after a campaign, in which the advantage of the Illyrians and their allies lay entirely in the strong positions they were enabled to take up among their hills, compelled him to flee from his dominions and take refuge in those of Glauicus. Arrian mentions a dreadful sacrifice of three boys, three girls, and three black rams, offered by the Illyrians before their first battle with Alexander's troops. (Arr. Anab. i. 5, 6; Plut. Alex. 11; Diod. xivii. 8.)

2. A Macedonian, surnamed Megas, son of Dripodes, and brother to Laclea or Hellanice, nurse of Alexander the Great. He saved Alexander's life at the battle of Granicus, c. 334, cutting off with a blow of his sword the arm of Spithridates which was raised to slay the king. When he was wounded, in B.C. 331, he commanded in the right wing, the body of cavalry called Ἀγγέλοι (see Polyb. v. 65, xxi. 5); and when, in B.C. 320, the guards (στρατιωται) were separated into two divisions, it was considered expedient not to entrust the sole command to any one man, Hephhestion and Cleitus were appointed to lead respectively the two bodies. In B.C. 328, Artabazus resigned his satrapy of Bactria, and the king gave it to Cleitus. On the eve of the day on which he was to set out to take possession of his government, Alexander, then at Marussado in Sogdiana, celebrated a festival in honour of the Dioscuri, though the day was in fact sacred to Dionysus—a circumstance which afterwards supplied his friends with a topic of consolation to him in his remorse for the murder of Cleitus, the soothsayers declaring, that his frenzy had been caused by the god's wrath at the neglect of his festival. At the banquet an angry dispute arose, the particulars of which are variously reported by different authors. They agree, however, in stating, that Cleitus became exasperated at a comparison which was instituted between Alexander and Philip, much to the disapprobation of the latter, and also at supposing that his own services and those of his contemporaries were depreciated as compared with the exploits of younger men. Being heated with wine, he launched forth into language highly insolent to the king, quoting a passage from Euripides (Androm. 663, &c.) to the effect, that the soldiers win by their toil the victories of which the generous reaps the glory. Alexander at length, stung to an outburst of rage, rushed toward him, but was held back by his friends, while Cleitus also was forced from the room. Alexander, being then released, seized a spear, and sprung to the door; and Cleitus, who was returning in equal fury to brave his anger, met him, and fell dead beneath his weapon. (Diod. xiiii. 21, 57; Wess. ad loc.; Plut. Alex. 16, 50-52; Arr. Anab. i. 15, iii. 11, 27, iv. 8, 9; Curt. iv. 13. § 26, viii. 1; Just. xii. 6.)

3. Another of Alexander's officers, surnamed Aenod to distinguish him from the above. He is noted by Athenaeus and Aelian for his pomp and luxury, and is probably the same who is mentioned by Justin among the veterans sent home to Macedonia under Cretavius in B.C. 324. (Athen. xivii. p. 539 c.; Ael. V. H. ix. 3; Just. xii. 12; Arr. Anab. viii. 12.)

4. An officer who commanded the Macedonian fleet for Antipater in the Lamian war, B.C. 322, and defended the Athenian admiral, Eustion, in two battles off the Echinades. In the distribution of provinces at Tripuradiseus, B.C. 321, he obtained from Antipater the satrapy of Tydias; and when Antigonus was advancing to dispossess... him of it. In n. c. 319, after Antipater's death, he garrisoned the principal cities, and sailed away to Macedonia to report the state of affairs to Poly sperchon. In B. c. 319, after Polysperchon had been bullied at Megalopolis, he sent Cleitus with a fleet to the coast of Thrace to prevent any forces of Antigonus from passing into Europe, and also to effect a junction with Arrhiades, who had shut himself up in the town of Cius. [See p. 350, a.] Nicaraor being sent against him by Cassander, a battle ensued near Byzantium, in which Cleitus gained a decisive victory. But his success ren dered him over-confident, and, having allowed his troops to disembark and encamp on land, he was surprised by Antigonus and Nicaraor, and lost all his ships except the one in which he sailed him self. Having reached the shore in safety, he pro ceded towards Macedonia, but was slain by some soldiers of Lysimachus, with whom he fell in on the way. (Died. xviii. 15, 39, 52, 72.) [E. E.]

CLEMENS (Ky/ημειος), a Greek historian, probably of Constantinople, who wrote, according to Suidas (s. v.), respecting the kings and emperors of the Romans, a work to Hieronymus on the figures of Isocrates (πηρκ των Ἱερονυμου σχημάτων), and other treatises. Rubenkon (Proof. ad Tim. Lect. p. x.) supposes that Suidas has confounded two different persons, the historian and grammarian, but one possibility is that the latter is the same as the other. The grammatical works of Clemens are referred to in the Byzantinicum Magnum (s. v. Ἰφυς) and Suidas (s. v. Ἰφυς, πανωπράσιος), and the historical ones very frequently in the Byzantine writers. (Vossius, de Histor. Graec. p. 416, ed. Westermann.)

CLEMENS (Κλήμεντ), a slave of Agrippa Postu mus, whose person very much resembled his master's, and who availed himself of this resemblance, after the murder of the latter on the accession of Tiberius in A. D. 14, to personate the character of Agrippa. Great numbers joined him in Italy; he was gene rally believed at Rome to be the grandson of Ti berius; and a formidable insurrection would pro bably have broken out, had not Tiberius contrived to have him apprehended secretly. The emperor did not venture upon a public execution, but com manded him to be slain in a private part of the palace. This was in A. D. 16. (Tac. Ann. ii. 39, 40; Dion Cass. liv. 16; comp. Suet. Tib. 25.)

CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, whose name was T. Flavius Clemens, usually surmamed Alexandri nus, is supposed to have been born at Athens, though he spent the greater part of his life at Alexandria. In this way the two statements in which he is called an Athenian and an Alexandrian (Epiph. Haror. xxvii. 6) have been reconciled by Cave. In early life he was ardently devoted to the study of philosophy, and his thirst for knowl edge led him to visit various countries,—Greece, southern Italy, Coelo-Syria, Palestine, and Egypt. It appears, from his own account, that he had various Christian preceptors, of whom he speaks in terms of great respect. One of them was a Jew by birth, and several were from the East. At length, coming to Egypt, he sought out Pantenus, master of the Christian school at Alexandria, to whose instructions he listened with much satisfac tion, and whom he prized far more highly than all his former teachers. It is not certainly known whether he had embraced Christianity before hear ing Pantenus, or whether his mind had only been

Clemens was favourably inclined towards it in consequence of previous inquiries. Probably he first became a Christian under the influence of the precepts of Pantaenus, though Neander thinks otherwise. After he had joined the Alexandrian church, he became a presbyter, and about A. D. 190 he was chosen to be assistant to his beloved preceptor. In this latter capacity he continued until the year 292, when both principal and assistant were obliged to flee to Palestine in consequence of the persecution under Severus. In the beginning of Caracalla's reign he was at Jerusalem, to which city many Christians were then accustomed to re pair in consequence of its hallowed spots. Alex ander, bishop of Jerusalem, who was at that time a prisoner for the gospel, recommended him in a letter to the church at Antioch, representing him as a godly minister, a man both virtuous and well known, whom they had already seen, and who had confirmed and promoted the church of Christ. It is conjectured that Pantaenus and Clemens re turned, after an absence of three years, in 206, though of this there is no certain evidence. He must have returned before 211, because at that time he succeeded Pantaenus as master of the school. Among his pupils was the celebrated Origen. Guericke thinks, that he died in 213; but it is better to assume with Cave and Schrèck, that his death did not take place till 220. Hence he flourished under the reigns of Severus and Ca mellus, 193—217.

It cannot safely be questioned, that Clement held the fundamental truths of Christianity and exhibited genuine piety. But in his mental char acter the philosopher predominated. His learn ing was great, his imagination lively, his power of perception not defective; but he was unduly prone to speculation. An eclectic in philosophy, he eagerly sought for knowledge wherever it could be obtained, examining every topic by the light of his own mind, and selecting out of all systems such truths as commended themselves to his judg ment. "I espoused," says he, "not this or that philosophy, not the Stoic, nor the Platoic, nor the Epicurean, nor that of Aristotle; but whatever any of these sects had said that was fit and just, that taught righteousness with a divine and religious knowledge, all that being selected, I call philos ophy." He is supposed to have leaned more to the Stoics than to any other sect. He seems, indeed, to have been more attached to philosophy than any of the fathers with the exception of Origen.

In comprehensiveness of mind Clement was cer tainly deficient. He never develops great principles, but runs chiefly into minute details, which often be come trifling and insipid. In the interpretation of the Scriptures he was guided by fancy rather than fixed rules deduced from common sense. He pun ishes no definite principles of exposition, neither does he penetrate into the essential nature of Christianity. His attainments in purely religious knowledge could never have been extensive, as no one doctrine is well stated. From his works no system of theology can be gathered. It were pre posterous to recur to them for sound exegesis, or even a successful development of the duties of a Christian, much less for an enlightened estimate of the obligations under which men are laid to their Creator and to each other. It may be questioned, whether he had the ability to compose a connected system of theology, or a code of Christian morality.
Doublets great allowance should be made for the education and circumstances of the writer, the character of the age in which he lived, the persons for whom chiefly he wrote, the modes of thought then current, the entire circle of influences by which he was surrounded, the principal object he had in view; but after all deductions, much theological knowledge will not be attributed to him. The speculative philosopher is still more prominent than the theologian—the allegoriser rather than the exounder of the Bible appears—the metaphysician eclipses the Christian.

The works of Clement which have reached us are his Ἀρχιτεκτονικὴ τῆς Ἐλαθμῶν, or Horatiorum Ad Tychaeum; Ἀφάνεια, or Theocratus; and Ἀποκρισιμένας, or Miscellaneous works and Τίς τι Βιβλίου Πλάσσεις; Quis Deos salvetur? In addition to these, he wrote Ἰστορίαι in eight books; περὶ τῶν Πάχας, i.e. de Paschate; περὶ Νεκραίας, i.e. de Jojunio; περὶ Καταλαλίας, i.e. de Observations; Ἰστορίαι; εἰς Τομονικον, i.e. de Operationibus; Ἐκκλησιι; καὶ Ἐκκλησιαστικον, i.e. de Consecrationes, or de Consecratio Ecclesiasticæ; εἰς τὰν Προφῆτα Ἄμως, On the Prophet Amos; περὶ Ποιονικαῖς, or Ὀρας Ἐσφαλεῖον. If the Ἰστορίαι be the same as the Ἀβάναμια, translated by Cassiodorus, as is probable, various fragments of them are preserved and may be seen in these collections. The first book of his Ἀρχιτεκτονική is πρὸς τοὺς Προφῆτας, which are also given by Potter, were originally a part of the Ἰστορίαι. Among the fragments printed in the same edition are also εἰς τῶν Εὐαγγελίων καὶ τῶν Ἀποκάλυψεων καθα ρα Πολεύτερον εὐαγγελίων ἐπιστολα, i.e. extracts from the writings of Theodotus and the doctrine called oriental, relating to the times of Valentinus. Whether these excerpts were really made by Clement admits of doubt, though Sylburg remarks that the style and phraseology resemble those of the Alexandrine father. The fragments of his lost works have been industriously collected by Potter, in the second volume of his edition of Clement's works; but Fabricius, at the end of his second volume of the works of Hippolytus, published some of the fragments more fully, along with several not found in Potter's edition. There are also fragments in the Biblioth. Patr. of Galland. In various parts of his writings Clement speaks of other works which he had written or intended to write. (See Potter, vol. ii. p. 1045.)

His three principal works constitute parts of a whole. In the Horatiorum Address his design was to convince the Heathens and to convert them to Christianity. It exposes the impurities of polytheism as contrasted with the spirituality of Christianity, and demonstrates the superiority of the gospel to the philosophy of the Gentile world by showing, that it effectually purifies the motives and elevates the character. The Pandogras takes up the new convert at the point to which he is supposed to have been brought by the horatiorum address, and furnishes him with rules for the regulation of his conduct. In the first chapter he explains what he means by the term Pandogas,—one who instructs children, leading them up to manhood through the paths of truth. This preceptor is none other than Jesus Christ, and the children whom he trains up are simple, sincere believers. The author goes into minute and trifling details, instead of dwelling upon great precepts applicable to human life in all circumstances. The Stromata are in eight books, but probably the last book did not proceed from Clement himself. The treatise is rambling and discursive, without system, order, or method, but contains much valuable information on many points of antiquity, particularly the history of philosophy. The principal information respecting Egyptian hieroglyphics is contained in the fifth book of this work of Clement. His object was to delineate in it the perfect Christian or Gnostic, after he had been instructed by the Teacher and thus prepared for sublime speculations in philosophy and theology. The eighth book is a treatise on logic, so that the original seems to have been lost, and this one substituted in its place. Domin Cajus, however, inclines to the opinion, that it is a genuine production of Clement. The treatise entitled τίς τι σώσεισι is practical, shewing to what temptations the rich are particularly exposed. It has the appearance of a homily. His Hypostardos in eight books (Ἰστορίαι, translated adulationes by Cassiodorus) contained, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 14), a summary exposition of the books of Scripture. Phoebus gives a most unfavourable account of it, affirming that it contained many fabulous and impious notions similar to those of the Gnostic heretics. But at the same time he suggests, that these are inserted by some one after the death of Clement, or possibly征集ed from Clement, as there is nothing similar to them in his acknowledged works. Most probably they were interpolated. The following are the chief editions of Clement's works:—Victori, Florentiae, 1550, fol., Graece. This is the editio princeps. Frid. Sylburgius, Heidelb. 1592, fol. Gr. et Lat. Herverti, "Proterpius et Paedagogos," et Strozziæ libri viii. "Stromatum," Florence, 1561, fol. Lat. Herverti, "Proterpius, Paedagogos, et Stromata." Besl, 1566, fol. and 1666, fol., Paris, 1572 and 1590, fol. in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. iii. 1677, fol. Lugd. Sylburgius et Heinaci, Lugd. Bat. 1616, fol. Gr. et Lat.; this edition was reprinted with the additional notes of Ducaeus at Paris, 1629, fol., Paris, 1641, fol. and Col. 1668, fol., Parisiis, Oron. 1715, fol. 9 vols. Gr. et Lat.; this edition is incomparably the best. Oebertber, Wirneb. 1780—89, 8vo. 3 vols. Gr. et Lat.; Klotz, Lips. 1830—34, 34, 8vo. 4 vols. Gr. et Lat. A. B. Cailleau, in the "Collectio selecta SS. Ecumenici Patrum," Paris, 1827 &c., vol. 4 vols. Lat. The treatise "Quis Deos salvatur?" was published in Greek and Latin, with a commentary by Segner, Truj. 1816, 8vo.; and in Latin by Dr. H. Olshausen, Regiom. 1831, 12mo. The Hymn to Christ the Saviour at the end of the Greek work, was published in Greek and Latin by Piper, Goetting, 1835, 8vo.

ClemensArretinus, a man of Senatorial rank, connected by marriage with the family of Vespasian, and an intimate friend of Domitian, was appointed by Mucianus prefect of the praetorian guards in A.D. 70, a dignity which his father had formerly held under Caligula. (Tac. Ann. iv. 68.) Clemens probably did not hold this command long, and the appointment of Mucianus may have been regarded as altogether void, as Suetonius says (Tit. 6), that Titus was the first senator who was prefect of the praetorians, the office being up to that time filled by a knight. Notwithstanding, however, the friendship of Domitian with Clemens, he was one of the victims of the cruelty of this emperor when he ascended the throne. (Suet. Dom. 11.)

Clemens, Atrius, a friend of the younger Pliny, who has addressed two of his letters to him. (Ep. i. 10, iv. 9.)

Clemens, Caussia, was brought to trial about A.D. 135, for having espoused the side of Niger; but defended himself with such dignity and freedom, that Severus, in admiration not only granted him his life, but allowed him to retain half of his property. (Dion Cass. lxxiv. 9.)

Clemens, T. Flavius, was cousin to the emperor Domitian, and his colleague in the consulship, A.D. 95, and married Domitia, also a relation of Domitian. His father was Flavius Sabinus, the elder brother of the emperor Vespasian, and his brother Flavius Sabinus, who was put to death by Domitian. (Suet. Domit. 10.) Domitian had destined the sons of Clemens to succeed him in the empire, and, changing their original names, had called one Vespasian and the other Domitian; but he subsequently put Clemens to death during the consulship of the latter. (Suet. Domit. 15.) Dion Cassius says (Lyc. 14), that Clemens was put to death on a charge of atheism, for which, he adds, many others who went over to the Jewish opinions were executed. This must imply that he had become a Christian; and for the same reason his wife was banished to Pandataria by Domitian. (Comp. Philostr. Apoll. viii. 15; Euseb. H. E. iii. 14; Hieronym. Ep. 27.) To this Clemens in all probability is dedicated the church of St. Clement at Rome, on the Caelian hill, which is believed to have been built originally in the fifth century, although its site is now occupied by a more recent, though very ancient, structure. In the year 1725 Cardinal Aniball Albani found under this church an inscription in honour of Flavius Clemens, martyr, which is now worked up into a fresco Clementis, Viri Consularis et Martyris Tamnus illustratus, Urbino, 1727. Some connect him with the author of the Epistle to the Corinthians.

[Clemens Romanus.]

[G. E. L. C.]

Clemens, Paectuemeus, a Roman jurist, who probably died in the lifetime of Pomponius, for Pomponius mentions him as if he were no longer living, and cites, on his authority, a consti-tuation of the emperor Antoninus: "Paectuemeus Clemens aiebat imperatorem Antoniunum constituisse." (Dig. 40. tit. 7. s. 21. § 1.) The name Antoninus is exceedingly ambiguous, as it belongs to Pius, Marcus, L. Verus, Commodus, Caracalla, Geta, Didinius, and Elagabalus; but in the compilations of Justinian, the name Antoninus, without addition, refers either to Caracalla, M. Aurelius, or Pius—usually to the first; to the second, if used by a jurist who lived earlier than Caracalla, and not earlier than Marcus; to the third, if used by a jurist who was living under Pius. (Zimmerm. R. R. G. l. p. 184, n. 8.) Here it probably denotes Pius, of whom Paectuemeus Clemens may be supposed to have been a contemporary. [J. T. G.]

Clemens Romanus, was at Rome at the end of the first century. He is probably the same as the Clemens whom St. Paul mentions (Phil. iv. 3) as one of "his fellow workers, whose names are in the Book of Life." To Clement are ascribed two epistles addressed to the Corinthian Church, and both probably genuine, the first certainly so. From the style of the second, Neander (Kirchengesch. iii. p. 1100) considers it as a fragment of a sermon rather than an epistle. The first was occasioned by the divisions which distracted the Church of Corinth, where certain presbyters had been unjustly deprived. The exhortations to unity are enforced by examples from Scripture, and in addition to these are mentioned the martyrdoms of St. Peter and St. Paul. Of the latter it is said, that he went τελ ἐκ τοῦ χριστοῦ a passage which has been considered to favour the supposition that the apostle executed the intention of visiting Spain, which he mentions, Rom. xv. 24.

The epistle seems to contain an important interpolation (§ 40, &c.). In these chapters is suddenly introduced, in the midst of practical exhortations, a laboured comparison between the Jewish priesthood and Christian ministry, and the theory of the former is transferred to the latter. This style of speaking savours in itself of a later age, and is opposed to the rest of the epistle, which uniformly speaks of the church and its offices in their simplest form and relations. The whole tone of both epistles is mock, pious, and Christian, and it is this contrast that forms the strong tendency to find types in greater number than the practice of Scripture warrants, which the latter fathers carried to so extravagant a length. Thus, when Rahab is quoted as an example of faith and hospitality, the fact of her hanging a scarlet thread from her window is made to typify our redemption through Christ's blood. In the midst of much that is wise and good we are surprised to find the fable of the phoenix adduced in support of the resurrection of the body.

As one of the very earliest apostolical fathers, the authority of Clement is valuable in proving the authenticity of certain books of the New Testament. The parts of it to which he refers are the epistles of Sts. Matthew and St. Luke, the epistle of St. James, the first of St. Peter, and several of St. Paul, while from the epistle to the Hebrews he quotes so often, that by some its authorship has been attributed to him. Two passages are quoted (i. § 46, and ii. § 4) with the formula γέγραπται, which do not occur in Scripture; we are also to deference to the apocryphal books of Wisdom and Judith; a traditional conversation is related between our Lord and St. Peter; and a story is given from the spurious gospel to the Egyptians. (Ep. ii. § 12; comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. p. 465.) The genuineness of the Homily or 2nd Epistle is denied by Jerome (Catal. c. 15) and Photius (Bibl. Cod. 113), and it is not quoted by any author earlier than Eusebius. Besides these works two other letters were preserved as Clement's in the Syrian church, and published by Wetstein in the appendix to his edition of the New Testament. They are chiefly occupied by the praises of celibacy, and it is therefore seems a fair ground of suspicion against them that they are not quoted before the fourth century, though, from the ascetic disposition prevalent in the North African and other Western churches, it seems unlikely that no one should ever have appealed to such an authority. Other writings are also falsely attributed to Clement. Such are the Recognitio (a name given to the work from the Latin translation of Rufinus), which purport to contain a history of Clement himself, who is represented as a convert of St. Peter, and in the course of it recognizes his father, whom he had lost. Of this there is a convenient edition by Gersdorf in his Bibliotheca Patrum Ecclesiae Graecae, CCCIV. 82, 1837.) The collection of Apostolical Constitutions is also attributed to Clement, though certainly without foundation, as they are plainly a collection of the ecclesiastical rules of various times and places. (See Knabe, Uber den Ursprung und Inhalt der Apostol. Constitutions, 1839.) Lastly, we may just mention the Clemensiots,—homilies of a Judaizing tendency, and supposed by Neander (Genetische Entwicklung, &c. p. 387) to be written by a member of the Ebionitic sect.

The true particulars of Clement's life are quite unknown. Tillemont (Mémoires, ii. p. 147) supposes that he was a Jew; but the second epistle is plainly written by a Gentile. Hence some connect him with Flavius Clemens who was martyred under Domitian. It is supposed, that Trajan burned Clement to the Claremonte, where he suffered martyrdom. Various dates are given for the first Epistle. Grabe (Spic. Patr. i. p. 254) has fixed on A.D. 68, immediately after the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul; while others prefer A.D. 95, during Domitian's persecution.

The Epistles were first published at Oxford by Patric Young, the king's librarian, from the Codex Alexandrinus, to the end of which they are appended (the second only as a fragment), and which had been sent by Cyrilus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I. They were republished by F. Ross, provost of Eton, in 1650; by Fell, bishop of Oxford, in 1659; Cotelerius, at Paris, in 1672; Grotius, at Leipsig, 1699; Wetton, at Cambridge, 1710; Galland, at Venice, 1765; Jacobson, at Oxford, in 1826; and by Hefele, at Tubingen, 1839. Most of the above editions contain the works of other fathers also. Of the various texts, Hefele's is the best, and has been republished in England (1843) in a convenient form, with an introduction, by Mr. Grenfell, one of the masters of Rugby. The best English translation is that of Chevalier (Cambridge, 1833), founded on a previous translation made by Archbishop Wake, 1693. [G. E. L. C.]

CLEMENS, TERTIANTUS, a Roman jurist, contemporary with Julianus, whom he once cites by the expression Julianus m'aster. (Dig. 28. tit. 6. s. 6.) From this we infer, not that he was a pupil of Julianus, but that he belonged to the same legal school. (Compare Dig. 7. tit. 7. s. 5.) He probably therefore flourished in the time of Hadrian. It has been suggested from the agreement of date, that he was the same person as Pascutelius Clemens, and that his name in full was Ter. Pascutelius Clemens, but this is not likely. No jurist is mentioned in the Digest by the name Clemens, but, as if expressly for the sake of distinction, we have in the name, either Terentius Clemens or Pascutelius Clemens. Terentius is nowhere cited in any extant fragment of any other jurist. He wrote a treatise on the famous lex Julia et Papia Poppaea, with the title "Ad Lexem Libri xx," and of this work 35 fragments (belonging, according to Blume's hypothesis, to the alias Hadrianae), are preserved in the Digest. They are explained by Heineccius in his excellent commentary on the lex Julia et Papia Poppaea. [Comp. CLEMENS PASCUTELIUS.] [J. T. G.]

CLEMENTINIA, a personification of Clemency, was worshipped as a divinity at Rome, especially in the time of the emperors. She had then temples and altars, and was still seen on coins, holding in her right, and a luce in her left hand. (Cic. Lael. Stil. ii. 6, &c.; Stat. Theb. xii. 481, &c.; comp. Hirt, Mythol. Bilderbuch, ii. p. 113.) [L. S.]

CLEOBIS. [BITON.]

CLEOBUL'INE (Κλεόβουλινη), called also CLEOBULINE and CLEOBULE (Κλεόβουλη, Κλεόβουλανη), was daughter to Cleobulus of Lindus, and is said by Plutarch to have been a Corinthian by birth. From the same author we learn that her father called her Eumetis, while others gave her the name which marks her relation to Cleobulus. She is spoken of as highly distinguished for her moral as well as her intellectual qualities. Her skill in riddles, of which she composed a number in hexameter verse, is particularly recorded, and we find attributed to her a work on the subject of the year [CLEOBULUS], as well as that on the cupping-glass, which is quoted with praise by Aristote. A play of Cratinus, called Κλεόβουλως, and apparently having reference to her, is mentioned by Athenaeus. (Plut. de Pyth. Orac. 14, Comp. vii. Sep. 3; Diog. Laert. i. 39; Menag. ad loc.; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 19; Suid. s. v. Κλεόβουλη; Arist. Rhet. iii. 2. § 12; Athen. iv. 171, b., x. p. 448, c.; Cusab. ad loc.; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. ii. pp. 117, 121, 654; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 277.) Cleobulina was also the name of the mother of Thales. (Diog. Laert. i. 22.) [E. E.]

CLEOBULUS (Κλεόβουλος), one of the Seven Sages, was son of Euphractus and a citizen of Lindus in Rhodes, for Düris seems to stand alone in stating that he was a Carian. (Diog. Laert. i. 39; Strab. xiv. p. 635.) He was a contemporary of Solon's, and must have lived at least as late as B.C. 500 (the date of the usurpation of Peisistratus), if the letter preserved in Diogenes Laërti is genuine, which purports to have been written by Cleobulus to Solon, inviting him to Lindus, as a place of refuge from the tyrant. In the same letter Lindus is mentioned as being under democratic government; but Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 19) calls Cleobulus King of the Lindians, and Plutarch (de die ap. Delph. 3) speaks of him as a tyrant. These statements may, however, be reconciled, by supposing him to have held, as αυτοκράτορ, an authority delegated by the people through election. (Aríst. Polit. iii. 14, 15, ad fin. iv. 10, ed. Bekk.) Much of the philosophy of Cebesus is said to have been derived from Epictetus. He wrote also lyric poems, as well as riddles (ρ' φωνοι) in verse. Diogenes Laërtius also ascribes to him the inscription on the tomb of Midas, of which Homer was considered by others to have been the author (comp. Plut. Philet. p. 264, d.) and the riddle on the year (τε μ' ἐκ τοῦ, μαζής δὲ ἔδρας, κ. τ. l.), generally attributed to his daughter Cleobulina. He is said to have lived to the age of sixty, and to have been greatly distinguished for strength and beauty of person. Many of his sayings are on record, and one of them at least, δεν σωσθείναι τῆς ἡγεμονίας, [κρίνουσα μὲν τὴν δικαιο, τῇ δὲ φρονίμῃ γυναικὶ,—shows him to have had worthier views of female education than were generally prevalent; while that he added on them is clear from the character of his daughter. (Diog. Laërt. i. 89—93; Suid. s. v. Κλεάθυροσ; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 14; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. ii. pp. 117, 121, 654; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Κλεαθύρος.)

CLOEOCHARIS (Κλεοχαρής), a Greek orator of Myrina in Bithynia, contemporary with the orator Demochares and the philosopher Arcesilaus, towards the close of the third century B.C. The chief passage relating to him is in Rutillus Lupus, de Figur. Sentent. p. 1, 8, where a list of his orations is given. He also wrote on rhetoric: a work in which he compared the styles of Isocrates and Demochares, and said, that the former resembled an athlete, the latter a soldier, is quoted by Photius. (Cod. 176, p. 121, b. 9, ed. Bekker.) The remark there quoted is, however, ascribed to Philip of Macedon by Photius himself (Cod. 265, p. 493, b. 20, ed. Bekker), and by the Psuedo-Plutarch (de Vit. X Or. viii. 25, p. 845, c.). The obvious explanation is, that Cleochares inserted the observation in his work as having been made by Philip. None of his orations are extant. (Strab. xii. p. 566; Diog. Laërt. iv. 41; Runkeln, ad Rutil. Lep. i. p. 5, &c., and Hist. Crit. Or. Gr. 63, pp. 185, 186; Wiesemann, Gesch. der Dorotathenkl. in Griechenland, § 76.)

CLEOCRITUS (Κλεοκρίτος), an Athenian, herald of the Mysteries, was one of the exiles who returned to Athens with Thrasylus. After the battle of Munychia, p. c. 404, being remarkable for a very powerful voice, he addressed his countrymen who had fought on the side of the Thirty, calling on them to abandon the cause of the tyrants and put an end to the horrors of civil war. ( Xen. Hell. ii. 4. §§ 20—22.) His person was as burly as his voice was loud, as we may gather from the joke of Aristophanes (Rum. 1433), who makes Euripides propose to fit on the slender Ginesus by way of wings to Cleocritus, and send them up into the air together to squirt vinegar into the eyes of the Spartans. The other passage also in which Aristophanes mentions him (Av. 876), may perhaps be best explained as an allusion to his stature. (See Schol. ad loc.)

[Σ. H.]

CLOEDEAEUS (Κλεοδαίος), a son of the Heraclean Hyllus, who was as unsuccessful as his father in his attempt to conquer Peloponnesus. In after times he had a heroum at Sparta. (Apollod. ii. 3. § 2; Paus. iii. 15. § 7.)

CLEODEMUS MALCHUS (Κλεοδημός Μάλχος), an historian of uncertain date. He wrote a history of the skin, to which we find reference made by Alexander Polyhistor in a passage quoted from the latter by Josephus. (Ant. i. 15.) The name of Malchus is said to be of the same meaning in Syria as that of Cleodemus in Greek.

CLEODEMUS (Κλεοδήμος), the name of a physician introduced by Plutarch in his Septem Sulpicientum Convivium (c. 10. ed. Taurch.,) and said to have used cupping more frequently than any other physician of his age, and to have brought that remedy into great repute by his example, in the first century after Christ. (W. Α. Τ.]

CLEOPATAS (Κλεοπάτας), a sculptor and architect, celebrated for the skins, to which he dedicated the Ægeus or starting place in the stadium at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 20. § 7.) He was the author of a bronze statue of a warrior which existed at the aeropoli of Athens at the time of Pausanias. (i. 24. § 3.) As he was the son and father of an Aristocles (Visconti, Oeuvres diverses, vol. iii. p. 372), Thiersch (Eposc. d. Bild. Kunst. p. 281, &c.), and Silius (Catil. p. 153) reckon him as one of the Scythian artists, among whom Aristocles, the brother of Canachus, is a conspicuous name, and assign him therefore to Ol. 61. But this is a manifest error, as may be seen by comparing two passages of Pausanias (vi. 3. § 4, vi. 9. § 1); and it is highly probable that Cleopaet was an Athenian. His name occurs (Ol. 68) in an inscription, from which we learn, that he was one of Phthisa's assistants, that he accompanied his master to Olympia, and that thus he came to construct the Ægeus. (Muller, de Phthis. i. 13; Büchel, Corp. Inscrip. Graec. i. pp. 39, 237, 884; Schultz, in Jahn's Jahrbiicher für Philologie, 1829, p. 73; Brunn, Artif. liberae Graeciae temporis, p. 23.)

CLEOMACHUS (Κλεομάχος). 1. It is supposed that there was a tragic poet by this name, contemporary with Cratinus; but there can be little doubt that the passages of Cratinus on which this notion is founded (ap. Athen. xiv. p. 639, &c.) refer to the lyric poet Gnesippus, the son of Cleomachus, and that for τε Κλεομάχος δ Κλεοίμαχος we ought to read τις Κλεομάχος and δ Κλεοίμαχος. (Bergk, Rapp. Con. Att. p. 39, &c.; Meineke, Prag. Gym. Graec. ii. pp. 27—29; Gnesippus.) Of Cleomachus, the father of Gnesippus, nothing is known, unless he be the same as the lyric poet mentioned below.

2. Of Magnesia, a lyric poet, was at first a boxer, but having fallen violently in love, he devoted himself to the composition of poems of a very licentious character. (Strab. xiv. p. 648; Triclin. de Metris, p. 34.) From the resemblance in character between his poetry and that of Gnesippus, it might be inferred that he is the same person as the father of Gnesippus; but Strabo mentions him among the celebrated men of Magnesia in such a way that, if he adheres in this case to his usual practice of giving the names in chronological order, this Cleomachus would fall much later than the time of Gnesios. His name was given to a variety of the Ionica a Majorre metre. (Hephaestion, xi. p. 62, ed. Gaisford.)

[CLEOMOBUTUS (Κλεόμβοτος), son of Axaunandros, king of Sparta, brother of the late Alcemedes, and half-brother of Cleomenes. (Herod. v. 41.) He became regent after the battle of Thermopylae, n.c. 480, for Pleistarchus, infant son of Leonidas, and in this capacity was at the head of the Peloponnesian troops who at the time of the battle of Salamis were engaged in fortifying the isthmus. (Herod. viii. 71.) The work was removed in the following spring, till deserted for the commencement of the campaign of Plataea. Whether Cleomobutus was this second time engaged in it cannot be gathered with certainty from the expression of Herodotus (ix. 10), “that he died shortly after leading home his forces from the Isthmus in consequence of an eclipse of the sun.” Yet it seems very probable that eclipse, Oct. 10, 482, proved to fix his death to the end of n. c. 480 (thus Müller, Prolegom. p. 409), nor is the language of Herodotus very favourable to Thirlwall’s hypothesis, according to which, with Clinton (P. H. ii. p. 209), he places it early in 479. (Hist. of Greece, ii. p. 328.) He left two sons,—the noted Pausanias, who succeeded him as regent, and Nicomedes. (Thuc. i. 107.)

CLEOMOBUTUS I. (Κλεόμβοτος), the 23rd king of Sparta, of the Agid line, was the son of Pausanias. He succeeded his brother Agesipolis I. in the year 386 B. C., and reigned nine years. After the deliverance of Thebes from the domination of Sparta [Pelopidas], Cleomobutus was sent into Boeotia, at the head of a Lacedaemonian army, in the spring of n. c. 378, but he only spent sixteen days in the Theban territory without doing any injury, and then returned home, leaving Sparta as harshest at Thebais. On his march home his army suffered severely from a storm. His conduct excited much disapprobation at Sparta, and the next two expeditions against Thebes were entrusted to the other king, Agesipolis II. In the year 376, on account of the illness of Agesilus, the command was restored to Cleomobutus, who again effected nothing, but returned to Sparta in consequence of a slight repulse in the passes of Chimaeron. This created still stronger dissatisfaction: a congress of the allies was held at Sparta, and it was resolved to prosecute the war by sea. [Charaxias; Pausan.] In the spring of 374, Cleomobutus was sent across the Corinthian gulf into Phocis, which had been invaded by the Thebans, who, however, retreated into Boeotia upon his approach. He remained in Phocis till the year 371, when, in accordance with the policy by which Thebes was excluded from the peace between Athens and Sparta, he was ordered to march into Boeotia. Having avoided Epanomidas, who was guarding the pass of Coroneia, he marched down upon Crecis, which he took, with twelve Theban triremes which were in the harbour; and he then advanced to the plains of Leuctra, where he met the Theban army. He seems to have been desirous of avoiding a battle, though he was superior to the enemy in numbers, but his friends reminded him of the punishment he had before incurred by his former stubbornness to the Thebans, and warned him of the danger of repeating such conduct in the present crisis. In accusing Cleomobutus of rashness in fighting, Cicero (Off. i. 24) seems to have judged by the result. There was certainly as much hesitation on the other side. In the battle which ensued [Ispanomidas; Pelopidas] he fought most bravely, and fell mortally wounded, and died after he had carried the battle from the field. According to Diodorus, his fall decided the victory of the Thebans. He was succeeded by his son Agesipolis II. (Xen. Hell. v. 4, §§ 14-18, 59, vi. 1, § 1, c. 4, § 15; Plut. Pelop. 18, 20-23, Ages. 28; Diod. xv. 51-55; Paus. i. 13, § 2, iii. 6, § 1, ix. 13, §§ 2-4; Manso, Sparta, iii. 1, pp. 124, 133, 138, 156.)

CLEOMOBUTUS II., the 30th king of Sparta of the Agid line, was of the royal race, though not in the direct male line. He was also the son-in-law of Leonidas II., in whose place he was made king by the party of Agis IV. about 243 B. C. On the return of Leonidas, Cleomobutus was deposed and banished to Tegea, about 240 B. C. [Aegus I.] He died in exile by his own hand in 231 B. C. Leonidas, through whose intercession with her father his life had been spared, and who is mentioned as a conspicuous example of conjugal affection. He left two sons, Agesipolis and Cleomenes, of whom the former became the father and the latter the guardian of Agesipolis III. (Plut. Agis, 11, 16-18; Paus. iii. 6; Polyb. iv. 35; Manso, Sparta, iii. 1, pp. 294, 298.)

CLEOMOBUTUS (Κλεόμβοτος), an Academic philosopher of Amphipolis, who is said to have thrown himself down from a high wall, after reading the Phaedon of Plato; not that he had any sufferings to escape from, but that he might exchange this life for a better. (Callimach. Epigr. 60, ap. Brunck, Anal. i. p. 474, Jacobs, i. p. 296; Agath. Schol. Ep. 60, v. 17, ap. Brumcy, Anal. iii. p. 59, Jacobs, iv. p. 29; Lucian. Philop. 1; Cle. pro Scasr. ii. 4, Tes. i. 84; Augustin. de Civ. Dei, i. 22; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 168.)

The disciples of Socrates, whom Plato mentions as being in Aegina when Socrates died, may possibly be the same person. (Phaedon, 2, p. 59, c.)

CLEOMedes (Κλεόμδης), an Athenian, son of Lyconedes, was one of the commanders of the expedition against Melos in B. C. 416. He is mentioned also by Xenophon as one of the 30 tyrants appointed in B. C. 404. (Thuc. v. 84, &c. &c. Xen. Hell. ii. 3, § 2.) Schneider’s conjecture with respect to him (ad Xen. loc. cit.) is inadmissible. [F. E. J.]

CLEOMEDes (Κλεόμδης), of the island Astypalaia, and athlete, of whom Pausanias (vi. 9) and Plutarch (Rom. 23) record the following legend:—In OL. 72 (B. C. 492) he killed Icetus, his opponent, in a boxing-match, at the Olympic games, and the judges ("E'κασαροικαθα") decided that he had been guilty of unfair play, and punished him with the loss of the prize. Stung to madness by the disgrace, he returned to Astypalaia, and there in his frenzy he shook down the pillar which supported the roof of a boy’s school, crushing all who were in it beneath the ruins. The Astypalians preparing to stone him, he fled for refuge to the temple of Athena, and got into a chest, which his pursuers, having vainly attempted to open it, at length broke to pieces; but no Cleomedes was there. They sent accordingly to consult the Delphic oracle, and received the following answer:—
CLEOMENES.

CLEOMENES (Κλεομήνης), author of a Greek treatise in two books on the Circular Theory of the Heavenly Bodies (Κατὰ Άνθρωπον Μερικάνα Βιβλία δύο). It is rather an exposition of the system of the universe than of the geometrical principles of astronomy. Indeed, Cleomenes betrays considerable ignorance of geometry (see his account, p. 28, of the position of the ecliptic), and seems not to pretend to accuracy in numerical details. The first book treats of the universe in general, of the zones, of the motions of the stars and planets, of day and night, and of the magnitudes and figure of the earth. Under the last head, Cleomenes maintains the spherical shape of the earth against the Epicureans, and gives the only detailed account extant of the methods by which Eudoxus and Posidonius attempted to measure an arc of the meridian. The second book contains a dissertation on the magnitudes of the sun and moon, in which the absurd opinions of the Epicureans are again ridiculed; and on the illumination of the moon, its phases and eclipses. The most interesting points are, the opinion, that the moon's revolution about its axis is performed in the same time as its sapphical revolution about the earth; an allusion to something like almanacs, in which predicted eclipses were registered; and the suggestion of atmospheric refraction as a possible explanation of the fact (which Cleomenes however professes not to believe), that the sun and moon are sometimes seen above the horizon at once during a lunar eclipse. (He illustrates this by the experiment in which a ring, just out of sight at the bottom of an empty vessel, is made visible by peering in water.)

Of the history of Cleomenes nothing is known, and the date of his work is uncertain. He professes (ad fin.), that it is compiled from various sources, ancient and modern, but particularly from Posidonius (who was contemporary with Cicero); and, as he mentions no author later than Posidonius, it is inferred, that he must have lived before, or at least not much after Ptolemy, of whose works he could hardly have been ignorant if they had been long extant. It seems, also, from the eagerness with which he defends the Stoical doctrines against the Epicureans, that the controversy between these two sects was not obsolete when he wrote. On the other hand, Delambre has shown that he had nothing more than a second-hand knowledge of the works of Hipparchus, which seems to lessen the improbability of his being ignorant of Ptolemy. And Letronne (Journal des Savants, 1821, p. 712) argues, that it is unlikely that Cleomenes should have known anything of refraction before Ptolemy, who says nothing of it in the Almagest (in which it must have appeared if he had been acquainted with it), but introduces the subject for the first time in his Optics. The same writer also endeavours to show, from the longitude assigned by Cleomenes (p. 59) to the star Abdalcan, that he could not have written earlier than A.D. 166. Riccioli (Almagest. Nov. vol. i. pp. xxxii. and 307) supposes, that the Cleomenes who wrote the Circular Theory lived a little after Posidonius, and is of opinion, that another Cleomenes lived about A.D. 390.

A treatise on Astronomic and another on the Spicere, attributed to a Cleomenes are said to exist in MS. Vossius (de Nat. Art. p. 180, b.), conjectures that Cleomenes wrote the work on Harmonics attributed to Cleonides or Eulcid. [Εὐκλείδης.]

CLEOMENES I. (Κλεομήνης), 16th king of Sparta in the Agid line, was born to Anaxandrides by his second wife, previous to the birth by his first of Dareios, Leonidas, and Cleombrotus. [Anaxandrides.] He accordingly, on his father's death, succeeded, not later it would seem than 519 B.C., and reigned for a period of 29 years. (Clinton, F. H. ii. p. 203.)

In B.C. 519 we are told it was to Cleomenes that the Plataeans applied when Sparta, declining to assist them, recommended alliance with Athens. (Herod. vi. 108.) And not much later, the visit of Macedon occurred, who had been left in possession of Samos by the death of Polyocrates, but had afterwards been driven out by the Persians with Sylosus. Macedonius twice or thrice in conversation with Cleomenes led the way to his house, where he took care to have displayed certain splendid goblets, and, on Cleomenes expressing his admiration, begged he would accept them. Cleomenes refused, and left Macedonius in search of his own or his citizens' weakness, went to the ephors and got an order for the stranger's departure. (Herod. iii. 148.)

In 510 Cleomenes commanded the forces by whose assistance Hippias was driven from Athens, and not long after he took part in the struggle between Cleisthenes and the aristocratical party of Isagoras by sending a herald with orders, pointed against Cleisthenes, for the expulsion of all who were stained with the pollution of Cylon. He followed this step by coming and driving out, in person, 700 households, substituting also for the new Council of 500 a body of 300 partisans of Isagoras. But his force was small, and having occupied the acropolis with his friends, he was here besieged, and at last forced to engage on terms, leaving his allies to their fate. In shame and anger he hurried to collect Spartan and allied forces, and set forth for his revenge. At Eleusis, however, when the Athenians were in sight, the Corinthians refused to proceed; their example was followed by his brother-king Demaratus; and on this the other allies also, and with them Cleomenes withdrew. When in the acropolis at Athens, he is related to have attempted, as an Achaeus, to enter the temple, from which Dorians were excluded, and to have hence brought back with him to Sparta a variety of oracles predictive of his country's future relations with Athens; and their contents, says Herodotus, induced the abortive attempt which Ptolemy refers to as Cleomenes' conqueror, or a prince of the country of Hippias. (Herod. v. 64, 65, 69, 76, 93-91.)

appear to have had considerable effect on Cleomenes. He demanded three days to consider; then quitted Sparta for Aegina, where the Argives forgot his diplomacy and said, "three months' journey." His Spartan listener was thoroughly alarmed, and ordered him to depart before sunset. Aristogoras however in suppliant's attitude hurried to meet him at home, and made him offers, beginning with ten, and mounting at least to fifty talents. It chanced that Cleomenes had his daughter Gorgo, a child eight or nine years old, standing by; and at this point she broke in, and said "Father, go away, or he will do you harm." And Cleomenes on this recovered his resolution, and left the room. (Herod. vi. 49—51.) This daughter Gorgo, his only child, was afterwards the wife of his half-brother Leonidas; and she, it is said, first found the key to the message which, by scraping the wax from a wooden writing-tablet, glorying the wood, and then covering it with wax again, Demaratus conveyed to Sparta from the Persian court in announcement of the intended invasion. (Herod. vii. 228.)

In 491 the heralds of Dareius came demanding earth and water from the Greeks; and Athens denounced to Sparta the submission of the Aegip- tians. Cleomenes went off in consequence to Aegina, and tried to seize certain parties as hostages. Meantime Demaratus, with whom he had probably been on bad terms ever since the retreat from Eleusis, sent private encouragements to the Aegiptians to resist him, and took further advantage of his absence to intrigue against him at home. Cleomenes returned unsuccessful, and now leagued himself with Leotychides, and effected his colleague's deposition. [DEMARATUS.] (Herod. vi. 49—66.) He then took Leotychides with him back to Aegina, seized his hostages, and placed them in the hands of the Athenians. But on his return to Sparta, he found it detected that he had tampered with the priestess at Delphi to obtain the oracle which deposed Demaratus, and, in apprehension of the consequences, he went out of the way into Thessaly. Shortly after, however, he ventured into Arcadia, and his machinations there to excite the Arcadians against his country were sufficient to frighten the Spartans into offering him leave to return with impunity. He did not however long survive his return. He was seized by the Heraclids, and dashed his staff in every one's face whom he met; and at last when confined as a maniac in a sort of stocks, he prevailed on the Helot who watched him to give him a knife, and died by slashing (καρπωκλίδον) his whole body over with it. (Herod. vi. 73—75.)

His madness and death, says Herodotus, were ascribed by the Spartans to the habit he acquired from some Skythian visitors at Sparta of excessive drinking. Others found a reason in his acts of sacrilege at Delphi or Eleusis, where he laid waste a piece of sacred land (the ὄργος), or again at Argos, the case of which was as follows. Cleomenes invaded Argos, compelling his forces by sea to the neighbourhood of Taygetus, defeated them in a simple stratagem the whole Argive forces, and pursued a large number of fugitives into the wood of the hero Argus. Some of them he drew from their refuge on false pretences, the rest he burnt among the sacred trees. He however made no attempt on the city, but after sacrificing to the Argive Juno, and whipping her priestess for oppressing his will, returned home and excused himself, and indeed was acquitted after investigation, on the ground that the oracle propitiating that he should capture Argos had been fulfilled by the destruction of the grove of Argus. Such is the strange account given by Herodotus (vi. 76—84) of the great battle of the Seventh (ἐπὶ τῷ Ἐθέλη), the greatest exploit of Cleomenes, which deprived Argos of 6000 citizens (Herod. vii. 148), and left her in a state of dolebility from which, notwithstanding the enlargement of her franchise, she did not recover till the middle of the Peloponnesian war. To this however we may add in explanation the story given by later writers of the defence of Argos by its women, headed by the poet-heroine Telesilla. (Paus. ii. 20, § 7; Plut. Mor. p. 242; Polyb. vii. 32; Suidas, a. e. Tελεσίαια.)[Tελεσίαια.]

Herodotus appears ignorant of it, though he gives an oracle seeming to refer to it. It is perfectly probable that Cleomenes thus received some check, and we must remember the Spartan incapacity for sieges. The date again is doubtful. Pausanias, (iii. 4. §§ 1—5), who follows Herodotus in his account of Cleomenes, says, it was at the beginning of his reign; Clinton, however, whom Thirlwall follows, fixes it, on the ground of Herod. vii. 148—9, towards the end of his reign, about 510 n. c.

The life of Cleomenes, as graphically given by Herodotus is very curious; we may perhaps, without much imputation on the father of history, suspect that his love for personal story here has a little coloured his narrative. Possibly he may have somewhat mistaken his character; certainly the freedom of action allowed to a king whom the Spartans were at first half inclined to put aside for the younger brother Dorius, and who was always accounted half-mad (ὑμνομαχομένος), seems at variance with the received views of their kingly office. Yet it is possible that a wild character of this kind might find favour in Spartan eyes. (Comp. Müller, Dor. i. 8. § 6; Clinton, n. c. 510, and p. 423, note x.)

The occupation of the acropolis of Athens is mentioned by Aristophanes. (Lysistr. 272.) [A. H. C.]

CLEOMENES II. the 25th king of Sparta of the Agid line, was the son of Cleombrotus I. and the brother of Agesipolis II., whom he succeeded in n. c. 570. He died in n. c. 500, after a reign of sixty years and ten months. During this long period we have no information about him of any importance. He had two sons, Acrotatus and Cleonymus. Acrotatus died during the life of Cleomenes, upon whose death Areus, the son of Acrotatus, succeeded to the throne. [AREUS I.; CLEONYMUS.] (Diod. xx. 29; Plut. Agis, 3; Paus. i. 13. § 3, iii. 6. § 1; Manio, Sparta, ii. 1, p. 164, 2. pp. 247, 248: Diod. xv. 60, contradicts himself about the time that Cleomenes reigns, and is evidently wrong; see Clinton, Fast. ii. pp. 213, 214.)

P. S.]

CLEOMENES III., the 31st king of Sparta of the Agid line, was the son of Leonidas I. After the death of Agis IV., in n. c. 240, Leonidas married his widow Agisida to Cleomenes, who was understood to have brought his family the inheritance of the Prochidas. Agisida, though at first violently opposed to the match, conceived a great affection for her husband, and she used to explain to him the principles and designs of Agis, about which he was eager for information. Cleomenes was endowed, according to Plutarch, with a noble spirit; in moderation and simplicity of life he was not inferior to Agis, but superior to him in energy, and less scrupulous about the means by which his good designs might be accomplished. His mind was further stirred up to manliness and ambition by the instructions of the Stoic philosopher Sphaerus of Borysthenes, who visited Sparta. To this was added the influence of his mother Cratesideia. It was not long, therefore, before Cleomenes had formed the design of restoring the ancient Spartan discipline, and the death of his father, whom he succeeded (B.C. 230), put him in a position to attempt his projected reform; but he saw that careful preparations must first be made, and that Sparta was not to be restored by the means which Agis had employed. From Cleomenes, but the counsels of Aratus, who was blinded to this danger, prevailed; and the proposal of Lydiadas, to make the first attack on Sparta, was rejected.

The first movement of Cleomenes was to seize suddenly and by treachery the Arcadian cities, Tegea, Mantinea, and Orechomenus, which had recently united themselves with the Aetolians, who, instead of relenting the injury, confirmed Cleomenes in the possession of them. The reason of this, that the Aetolians had already conceived the project of forming an alliance with Macedonia and Sparta against the Achaean league. It is probable that they even connived at the seizure of these towns by Cleomenes, who thus secured an excellent position for his operations against the league before commencing war with it. Aratus, who was now strategus, at last perceived the danger of the threatened loss of Sparta, and, with the other chiefs of the Achaean league, he resolved not to attack the Lacedaemonians, but to resist any aggression they might make. About the beginning of the year 227 B.C. Cleomenes, by the order of the Ephors, seized the little town of Belluna, and fortified the temple of Athena near it. This place commanded the mountain pass on the high road between Sparta and Megalopolis, and was at that period claimed by both cities, though anciently it had belonged to Sparta. Aratus made no complaint at its seizure, but attempted to get possession of Tegea and Orechomenus by treachery. But, when he marched out in the night to take possession of them, the conspirators, who were to deliver up the towns, lost courage. The attempt was made known to Cleomenes, who wrote in ironical terms of friendship to ask Aratus whether he had led his army in the night? "To prevent your fortifying Belluna," was the reply. "Pray then, if you have no objection," retorted Cleomenes, "tell us why you took with you lights and scaling ladders." By this correspondence Aratus found out with whom he had to do. The Spartans, on the other hand, were satisfied with the important advantage which they had gained in the fortification of Belluna; and Cleomenes, who was in Arcadia with only three hundred foot and a few horse, was recalled by the Ephors. His back was no sooner turned than Aratus seized Caphyae, near Orechomenus. The Ephors immediately sent back Cleomenes, who took Methydron, and made an incursion into the territories of Argos. About this time Aristocles succeeded Aratus as strategus of the Achaean league (in May, 227, B.C.), and to this period perhaps should be referred the declaration of war against Cleomenes by the council of the Acheans, which is mentioned by Polybius. Aratus, with an army of 20,000 foot and 1000 horse, with which he met Cleomenes near Palantium; and, though the latter had only 5000 men, they were so eager and brave that Aratus persuaded Aristocles to decline battle. The fact is, that the Acheans were never a warlike people, and Aratus was very probably right in thinking that 20,000 Acheans were no match for 5000 Spartans. But the moral effect of this affair was worth more than a victory to Cleomenes. In May, 226, Aratus again became strategus, and led the Achaean forces against Elis. The Eleans applied to Sparta for aid, and Cleomenes met Aratus on his return, at the foot of Mount Lycaon, in the territory of Megalopolis, and defeated him with great slaughter. It was at first reported that Aratus was killed; but he had only fled; and, having rallied part of his army, he took Mantinea by a sudden assault, and revolutionized its constitution by making the metoeci citizens. The effect of this change was the formation of an Achaean party in the town. Cleomenes had not yet taken any open step against the Ephors, though he could not but be an object of suspicion to them; they were however in a difficult position. The spirit of Agis still lived in the Spartan youth; and Cleomenes, at the head of his victorious army, was too strong to be crushed like Agis. Secret assassination might have been employed—and when was a Spartan ephor heard of who would have scrupled to use it?—but then they would have lost the only man capable of carrying on the war, and Sparta must have fallen into the position of a subordinate member of the Achaean league. They appear, however, to have taken advantage of the loss of Mantinea to make a truce with the Achaeans. (Paus. viii. 27. 10.) Cleomenes now took measures to strengthen himself against them. These measures are differently represented by Phylarchus, the panegyrist of Cleomenes, whom Plutarch seems on the whole to have followed, and by Polybius and Pausanias, who followed Aratus and other Achaean writers. At the death of Agis, his infant son, Evrydamidas, was left in the hands of his mother, Agis; and Archidamus, the brother of Agis, fled into Messenia, according to the statement of Plutarch, which, from the nature of the case, is far more probable than the account of Polybius (v. 37. § 2, viii. 1. § 3), that Archidamus fled at a later period, through fear of Cleomenes. Evrydamidas was now dead, poisoned, it was said, by the Ephors, and that too, according to Pausanias (ii. 9. § 1), at the instigation of Cleomenes. The falsity of this last statement is proved by the silence of Polybius, who never speaks Cleomenes, but it may serve to shew how recklessly he was abused by some of the Acheans.
party. Archidamus had thus become the rightful heir to the throne of the Proclides, and he was invited by Cleomenes to return; but no sooner had he set foot in Sparta than he was assassinated. This crime also is charged upon Cleomenes by the Achaean party, and among them by Polyclitus. The truth cannot now be ascertained, but every circumstance of the case seems to fix the guilt upon the Ephors. Cleomenes had everything to hope, and the Ephors everything to fear, from the association of Archidamus in his councils. Cleomenes, it is true, did nothing to avenge the crime; but the reason of this was, that the time for his attack upon the Ephors was not yet come; and thus, instead of an evidence of his guilt, it is a striking proof of his patient resolution, that he submitted to incur such a suspicion rather than to peril the object of his life by a premature movement. On the contrary, he did everything to appease the party of the Ephors. He bribed them largely, by the help of his mother Cratesiclesia, who even went so far as to marry one of the chief men of the oligarchical party. Through the influence thus gained, Cleomenes was permitted to continue the war; he took Locatra, and gained a decisive victory over Aratus beneath its walls, owing to the impetuosity of Lydiadus, who was killed in the battle. The conduct of Aratus, in leaving Lydiadus unsupported, though perhaps it saved his army, disgraced and dispirited the Achaeans to such a degree, that they made no further efforts during this campaign, and Cleomenes was left at leisure to effect his long-cherished revolution during the winter which now came on. (v. c. 226—225.)

Having secured the aid of his father-in-law, Magistomenus, and of two or three other persons, he first weakened the oligarchical party by drafting many of its chief supporters into his army, with which he then again took the field, seized the Achaean cities of Hermae and Acna, threw supplies into Orchomenus, beleaguered Mantinaea, and so wearied out his soldiers, that they were glad to be left in Arcadia, while Cleomenes himself marched back to Sparta at the head of a force of mercenaries, surprised the Ephors at table, and slew all of them, except Agesilaus, who took sanctuary in the temple of Fear, and had his life granted afterwards by Cleomenes. Having struck this decisive blow, and being supported not only by his mercenaries, but also by the remains of the party of Agis, Cleomenes met with no further resistance. He now propounded his new constitution, which is too closely connected with the whole subject of the Spartan polity to be explained within the limits of this article. All that can be said here is, that he extended the power of the kings, abolished the Ephorate, restored the community of goods, made a new division of the lands, and recruited the body of the citizens, by bringing back the exiles and by raising to the full franchise the most deserving of those who had not before possessed it. He also restored, to a great extent, the ancient Spartan system of social and military discipline. In the completion of this reform he was aided by the philosopher Spheron. The line of the Proclides being extinct, he took his brother Eucleidas for his colophon in the kingdom. In his own conduct he set the fine example of the simple virtue of an old Spartan.

From this period must be dated the contest between the Achaeans and Cleomenes for the supremacy of Greece, which Polybius calls the Cleomenic war, and which lasted three years, from B. c. 225 to the battle of Sellasia in the spring of B. c. 222. For its details, of which a slight sketch is given under Aratus, the reader is referred to the historians. Amidst a career of brilliant success, Cleomenes committed some errors, but, even if he had avoided them, he could not but have been overpowered by the united force of Macedonia and the Achaean league. The moral character of the war is condensed by Niebuhr into one just and forcible sentence:—"Old Aratus sacrificed the freedom of his country by an act of high treason, and gave up Corinth rather than establish the freedom of Greece by a union among the Peloponnesians, which would have secured to Cleomenes the influence and power he desired." (History of Rome, iv. P. 292.)

From the defeat of Sellasia, Cleomenes returned to Sparta, and having advised the citizens to submit to Antigonus, he fled to his ally, Ptolemy Euergetes, at Alexandria, where his mother and children were already residing as hostages. Any hope he might have had of recovering his kingdom by the help of Ptolemy Euergetes was defeated by the death of that king, whose successor, Ptolemy Philopator, treated Cleomenes with the greatest neglect, and his minister, Sosibius, imprisoned him on a charge of conspiracy against the king's life. Cleomenes, with his attendants, escaped from prison, and attempted to raise an insurrection against Ptolemy, but finding no one join him, he put himself to death. (v. c. 221—220.) His reign lasted 16 years. He is rightly condemned by Pausanias (ii. 6, § 5) as the last of the Agiadæ, for his nominal successor, Agesipolis III., was a mere puppet. He was the last truly great man of Sparta, and, excepting perhaps Philopoemen, of all Greece.

CLEOMENES (ΚΛΟΕΜΗΝΟΣ), Spartans of the royal family of the Agidae, but not kings. 1. Son of the general Pausanias, brother of king Pleistoonax, and uncle of king Pausanias, led the Peloponnesian army in their fourth invasion of Attica, in the fifth year of the Peloponnesian war. (v. c. 437.) Cleomenes acted in place of his nephew, Pausanias, who was a minor. (Thucyd. iii. 26, and Selcol.)

2. Son of Cleombrotus II., and uncle and guardian of Agesipolis III., B. c. 219. (Polyb. iv. 35. § 12; Agesipolis III., Cleom. II.) [P. S.]

CLEOMENES, a Greek of Naucratia in Egypt, was appointed by Alexander the Great as monarch of the Arabian district (εὐκρατος) of Egypt and receiver of the tributes from all the districts of Egypt and the neighbouring part of Africa. (v. c. 331.) Some of the ancient writers say that Alexander made him satrap of Egypt; but this is incorrect, for Arrian expressly states, that the other monarchs were independent of him, except that they had to pay to him the tributes of their districts. It would, however, appear that he had no difficulty in extending his depredations over all Egypt, and it is not unlikely that he would assume the title of satrap. His capacity knew no bounds; he exercised his office solely for his own advantage. On the occurrence of a scarcity of corn, which was less severe in Egypt than in the neighbouring countries, he at first forbade its exportation from Egypt; but, when the monarchs represented to him that this measure prevented them from raising the proper amount of tribute, he permitted the exportation of the corn, but laid on it a heavy export duty. On another occasion, when the price of corn was ten drachmas, Cleomenes bought it up and sold it at 32 drachmas; and in other ways he interfered with the markets for his own gain. At another time he contrived to cheat his soldiers of a month’s pay in the year. Alexander had entrusted to him the building of Alexandria. He gave notice to the people of Canopus, then the chief emporium of Egypt, that he must remove them to the new city. To avert such an evil they gave him a large sum of money; but, as the building of Alexandria advanced, he again demanded of the people of Canopus a large sum of money, which they could not pay, and thus he got an excuse for removing them. He also made money out of the superstitions of the people. One of his boys having been killed by a crocodile, he ordered the crocodiles to be destroyed; but, in consideration of all the money which the priests could get together for the sake of saving their sacred animals, he revoked his order. On another occasion he sent for the priests, and informed them that the religious establishment was too expensive, and must be reduced; they handed over to him the treasures of the temples; and he then left them undisturbed. Alexander was informed of these proceedings, but found it convenient to take no notice of them; but after his return to Babylon (b.c. 323) he wrote to Cleomenes, commanding him to erect at Alexandria a splendid monument to Iphicaste, and promised that, if this work was zealously performed, he would overlook his misconduct.

In the distribution of Alexander’s empire, after his death, Cleomenes was left in Egypt as his viceroy. Cleomenes, however, was not content with his possession of Egypt, but he took the opportunity to demand possession of the treasures of Cleomenes, which amounted to 8000 talents. CLEOMENES, literary. 1. A Rhodian, who recited the skolopaei of Bampodicles at the Olympic games. ( Athen. xiv. p. 620, d.)

2. Of Rhegium, a dithyrambic poet, cenured by Timocrates (Athen. xiv. p. 636, e), and by Aristarchus (Athen. 332, 333). He seems to have been an erotic writer, since Epicius mentions him in connexion with Sappho, Melato, and Laonius. ( Athen. xiv. p. 602, e.) The allusions of other comedians to him fix his date in the latter part of the fifth century B.C. One of his poems was entitled Medeum. ( Athen. ix. p. 403, a.)

3. A cynic philosopher, the disciple of Metrodorus, who wrote a work on education (Papadopoulous), which is quoted by Diogenes Laertius (vi. 82, 95).

4. A commentator on Homer, and Hesiod. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 129.) Perhaps he was the same as the philosopher. (P. S.)

CLEOMENES (Κλεομένης), the name of a physician introduced by Ptolemy in his Symposium (vi. 8, § 5, ed. Tauchn.) as giving his opinion on the nature and cause of the disease called balatimis, in the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

CLEOMENES, a sculptor mentioned only by Pliny (xxxvi. 4, § 10) as the author of a group of the Theopetides, or Muses, which was placed by Asinius Pollio in his building at Rome, perhaps the library on the Palatine hill. This artist, who does not appear to have enjoyed great celebrity with the ancients, is particularly interesting to us, because one of the most exquisite statues, the Venus de Medici, bears his name in the following inscription on the pedestal:

ΚΛΕΟΜΕΝΗΣ ΑΠΟΛΛΩΝΙΩΤΟΣ ΑΘΗΝΑΙΟΣ ΕΠΙΧΕΝ.

This inscription, which has been undeservedly considered as a modern imposition, especially by Florentine critics, who would fain have claimed a greater master for their admired statue, indicates both the father and the native town of Cleomenes; and the letter Ω gives likewise an external proof of what we should have guessed from the character of the work itself, that he was subsequent to b.c. 403. But we may arrive still nearer at his age. Mummius bought the above-mentioned group of the Muses from Theopetis to Rome; and Cleomenes must therefore have lived previously to b.c. 146, the date of the destruction of Corinth. The beautiful statue of Venus is evidently an imitation of the Cidian statue of Praxiteles; and Müller’s opinion is very probable, that Cleomenes tried to revive at Athens the style of this great artist. Our artist would, according to this supposition, have lived between b.c. 363 (the age of Praxiteles) and b.c. 146.

Now, there is another Cleomenes, the author of a much admired but rather lifeless statue in the Louvre, which commonly bears the name of Germanicus, though without the slightest foundation. It represents a Roman orator, with the right hand lifted, and, as the attribute of a turtile at the foot shews, in the habit of Mercury. There the artist calls himself

ΚΛΕΟΜΕΝΗΣ ΚΛΕΟΜΕΝΟΣ ΑΘΗΝΑΙΟΣ ΠΟΙΗΣΕΝ.

He was therefore distinct from the son of Apollo- dorus, but probably his son; for the name of Cleomenes is so very rare at Athens, that we can hardly suppose another Cleomenes to have been his father; and nothing was more common with ancient artists than that the son followed the father’s profession. But it is quite improbable that an Athenian sculptor should have made the statue of a Roman, in the form of a god before the wars against Macedonia had brought the Roman armies into Greece. The younger Cleomenes must therefore have exercised his art subsequently to b.c. 220, probably subsequently to the battle of Cynoscephalae. We may therefore place the father about b.c. 220.

Another work is also inscribed with the name of Cleomenes, namely, a base-relief at Florence, of very good workmanship, with the story of Alexee, bearing the inscription κλεομενης ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. But we are not able to decide whether it is to be referred to the father, or to the son, or to a third and more recent artist, whose name is published by Rastel-Rochette. (Monumenta iecult
The following winter unmasked his boldest enemy. At the city Dionysus, n. c. 426, in the presence of the numerous visitors from the subject states, Aristophanes represented his "Babylonians." It attacked the plan of election by lot, and contained no doubt the first sketch of his subsequent portrait of the Athenian democracy. Clean, it would appear, if not actually named, at any rate felt himself referred to and rejected by a legal suit against the author or his representative. The Sophists speak of it as directed against his title to the franchise (ἐνία τεγμα), but it certainly also assailed him for insulting the government in the presence of his citizen, Aristocles in 377, 503.) About the same time, however, before the next winter's Lenaea, Clean himself, by means of a combination among the nobler and wealthier (the ἀρχαῖοι), was brought to trial and condemned to disgorge five talents, which he had extracted on false pretences from some of the islanders. (Aristoph. Acharn. 6, comp. Schol., who refers to Theopompus.) Thirlwall, surely by an oversight, places this trial after the representation of the Knights. (Hist. of Greece, iii. p. 500.) In 425 Clean reappears in general history, still as before the potent favourite. The occasion is the embassy sent by Sparta with proposals for peace after the commencement of the blockade of her citizens in the island of Sphacteria. There was considerable elevation at their success prevalent among the Athenians; yet numbers were truly anxious for peace. Clean, however, well aware that peace would greatly curtail, if not annihilate, his power and his emoluments, contrived to work on his countrymen's presumption, and insisted to the ambassadors on the surrender, first of all, of the blockaded party with their arms, and then the restoration in exchange for them of the losses of n. c. 445, Nisaes, Pegae, Troezen, and Achaea. Such concessions it was beyond Sparta's power to make good; it was even dangerous for her to be known to have so much as admitted a thought of them; and when the ambassadors begged in any case to have commissioners appointed them for private discussions (καλος ἀνθρωπος or with Break off the negotiation by loud outcries against what he professed to regard as evidence of double-dealing and oligarchical caballing. (Thuc. iv. 21, 22.)

A short time however showed the unoundsness of his policy. Winter was approaching, the blockade daily growing more difficult, and escapes daily easier; and there seemed no prospect of securing the prize. Popular feeling now began to run strongly against him, who had induced the rejection of those safe offers. Clean, with the true demagogue's tact of catching the feeling of the people, talked of the false reports with which a democracy let people deceive it, and when appointed himself to a board of commissioners for inquiry on the spot, shifted his ground and began to urge the expediency rather of sending a force to decide it at once, adding, that if he had been general, he would have done it before. Nicias, at whom the scoff was directed, took advantage of a rising feeling in that direction among the people, and replied by begging him to be under no restraint, but to take any forces he pleased and make the attempt. What follows is highly characteristic. Clean, not having a thought that the timid Nicias was really venturing so unprecedented a step, professed his aequesience, but on finding the matter treated as serious, began to be discounted and back out. But it was intolerable to spoil the joke by letting him off, and the people insisted that he should abide by his word. And he at last recovered his self-possession and coolly replied, that if they wished it then, he would go, and would take merely the Lemnians and Imbrrians then in the city, and bring them back the Spartans dead or alive within twenty days. And indeed, says Thucydidcs, wild as the proceeding appeared, soberer minds were ready to pay the price of a considerable failure abroad for the ruin of the demagogue at home.

Fortune, however, brought Cleon to Pylos at the moment when he could appropriate for his needs the merit of an enterprise already devised, and no doubt entirely executed, by Demosthenes. [DEMOSTHENES.] He appears, however, not to have been without shrewdness either in the selection of his troops or his exculptor, and it is at least some small credit that he did not mar his good luck. In any case he brought back his prisoners within his time, among them 120 Spartans of the highest blood. (Thuc. iv. 27—39.) At this, the crowning point of his fortunes, Aristophanes dealt him his severest blow. In the next winter's Lenea, n. c. 422, appeared "The Knight," in which Cleon figures as an actual dramatic person, and, in default of an artificer bold enough to make the mask, was represented by the poet himself with his face smeared with wine-lees. The play is simply one satire on his vanity, impudence, ignorance, violence, and cowardice; and was as successful as far as to receive the first prize. It treats of him, however, chiefly as the leader in the Ecclesia; the Wasps, in n. c. 422, similarly displays him as the grand patron of the abuses of the courts of justice. He is said to have originated the increase of the decian's stipend from one to three obols (S. Bœckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, bk. ii. 15), and in general he professed to be the unheralded advocate of the poor, and their protector and enfranchiser by his judicial attacks on the rich.

The same year (422) saw, however, the close of his career. Late in the summer, he went out, after the expiration of the year's truce, to act against Brasidas in Chalcidice. He seems to have persuaded both himself and the people of his consummate ability as a general, and he took with him a magnificent army of the best troops. His effect with ease the capture of Torone, and then moved towards Amphipolis, which Brasidas also hastened to protect. Utterly ignorant of the art of war, he advanced with no fixed purpose, but rather to look about him, up to the walls of the city; and on finding the enemy preparing to sally, directed so unskillfully a precipitate retreat that the soldiers of one wing presented their unprotected right side to the attack. The issue of the combat is related under BRANIGI. Cleon himself fell, in an early flight, by the hand of a Myrchnian taenarch. (Thuc. v. 2, 5, 6—10.) Cleon at the present is representative of the worst faults of the Athenian democracy, as it came from the hands of Pericles. While Pericles lived, his intellectual and moral power was a sufficient check; nor had the assembly as yet become conscious of its own sovereignty. In later times the evil found itself certain alleviations; the coarse and illiterate demagogues were succeeded by the line of orators, and the throne of Pericles was at last worthy filled by Demosthenes. How far we must call Cleon the creature and how far the cause of the vice and evil of his time of course is hard to say; no doubt he was partly both. He is said (Plut. Nicoles, 8) to have first broken through the gravity and seriousness of the Athenian assembly by a loud and violent tone and coarse gesticulation, tearing open his dress, slapping his thigh, and running about while speaking. It is to this probably, and not to any want of pure Athenian blood, that the title Paphlogonion (Παφλογονίῳ, from Παρθένου), given him in the Knights, refers. His power and familiarity with the assembly are shown in a story (Plut. Nicoles, 7), that on one occasion the people waited for him, perhaps to propose some motion, for a long time, and that he at last appeared with a garland on, and begged that they would put off the meeting till the morrow, "for," said he, "to day I have no time: I am entertaining some guests, and have just sacrificed,"—a request which the assembly took as a good joke, and were goodhumoured enough to accede to.

A MAGNENUS, appears to have been a philo- sophers, from the quotation which Pausanias makes from him. (x. 4. § 4.) 4. A SICILIAN, one of the literary Greeks in the train of Alexander the Great, who, according to Curtius, corrupted the profession of good arts by their evil manners. At the banquet, at which the proposal was made to adore Alexander (n. c. 337), Cleon introduced the subject. (Curt. viii. 8. § 8.) Neither Arrian nor Plutarch mentions him; and Arrian (iv. 10) puts into the mouth of Anaxarchus the same proposal and a similar speech to that which Curtius ascribes to Cleon.

He excelled in portrait-statues (Πιθοσφης, Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 19, is to be taken as a general term), of which several athletic ones are mentioned by Pausanias. (vi. 3. § 4, 8, § 3, 9. § 1, 10, fn.)

μαθητής of the Achaenians, he was not said for a slave with the other prisoners, and was ultimately released without ransom. (Polyb. v. 93.) In the same year, and before his release, Philip V. being anxious for peace with the Aetolians, employed him as his agent in sounding them on the subject.
(v. 102.) He was perhaps the same person who is prevailed on the prince to intercede with Agesilus on his behalf. The king, to gratify his son, used all his influence to save the accused, who was ac-gratifying, and assured Archidamus that he would do

3. The younger son of Cleomenes II., king of Sparta, and uncle of Agesilaus, was excluded from the throne on his father's death, b. c. 309, in consequence of the general dislike inspired by his violent and tyrannical temper. In b. c. 303, the Tarentines, being at war with the Romans and Lucanians, asked aid of Sparta, and requested that the command of the required succours might be given to Cleonymus. The request was granted, and Cleonymus crossed over to Italy with a considerable force, the mere display of which is said to have frightened the Lucanians into peace. Dio-dorus, who mentions this, says nothing of the effect of the Spartan expedition on the Romans, though it is pretty certain that they also concluded a treaty at this time with the Tarentines. (See Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 315.) According to some of the Roman annalists, Cleonymus was defeated and driven back to his ships by the consul, M.

Aemilius; while others of them related that, Junius Bibulcus the dictator being sent against him, he withdrew from Italy to avoid a conflict. Af-

After this, abandoning a notion he had formed of freeing the Sicilians from the tyranny of Agathocles, he sailed up the Adriatic and made a piratical descent on the coast of the Veneti; but he was defeated by the Patavians and obliged to sail away. He then seized and garrisoned Corecyra, from which he seems to have been soon expelled by Demetrius Poliorettes. While, however, he still held it, he was recalled to Italy by intelligence of the revolt of the Tarentines and others whom he had reduced :
but he was beaten off from the coast, and returned to Corecyra. Henceforth we hear no more of him until b. c. 272, when he invited Pyrrhus to attempt the conquest of Epirus, [Pyrrhus, [Cleonymus.]

CLEOPATRA (Κλεοπάτρα). 1. A daughter of Idas and Marpessa, and wife of Meleagrus (Hom.

her husband's death, or to have died of grief.
Her real name was Alyfena. (Apollod. i. 8. § 3; Hygin. Poët. 174.)

2. A Damaid, who was betrothed to Eteoes or Agenor.
( Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Hygin. Poët. 170.)

There are two other mythical personages of this name in Apollodorus. (Ili. 12. § 2, 15. § 2.) [L. S.]

CLEOPATRA (CAE.), in Aeneid vi. 327, Niece of Atalus, one of the generals of Philip of Macedonia.
Philip married her when he divorced Olympias in b. c. 337; and, after his murder, in the next year she was put to death by Olympias, being either compelled to hang herself (Justin. ix. 7) or bored to death in a brazen cauldron. (Paus. vii. 7. § 5.)
Her infant son or daughter, according to Justin, perished with her, being apparently looked upon as a rival to Alexander. (Just. L. a., and ix. 5; Diod. xvi. 93, xvii. 2; Plut. Alex. 10.)

2. A daughter of Philip and Olympias, and sister of Alexander the Great, married Alexander, king of Epeirus, her uncle by the mother's side,
b. c. 335. It was at the celebration of her nuptials, 334, that Philip took place on a magnificent seat at Aegae in Macedonia, that Philip as a murder.

and after the death of her brother, she was sought in marriage by several of his generals, who thought to strengthen their influence with the Macedonians
by a connexio with the sister of Alexander.
Leonatus is first mentioned as putting forward a suit to her hand, and he represented to Eunomus that he received a promise of marriage from her.
(Plut. Eum. 3.) Perdiccas next attempted to gain her in marriage, and after his death in b. c. 321,
his hand was sought by Cassander, Lysanichus, and Antigonus. She refused, however, all these offers;
and, anxious to escape from Sardica, where her father had been kept for years in a sort of uncertain captivity, she readily acceded to proposals from Ptolemy; but, before she could accomplish her design, she was assassinated by order of Antigonus.
(Diod. xviii. 23, xx. 37; Justin. ix. 6, xili. 6, xiv. 1;

3. A daughter of Antiochus Ill. the Great, who married Ptolemy V. Epiaphes (n. c. 193), Cilicia-Syria being given her as her dowry (Appian, Syr.
c. 5; Liv. xxvii. 3), though Antiochus afterwards repudiated any such arrangement. (Polyb.
xviii. 17.)

4. A daughter of the preceding and of Ptolemy V.
Epiaphes, married her brother Ptolemy VI. Philo-metor. She had a son by him, whom on his death, to choose the elder, Ptolemy VIII. Lathybus, but she soon prevailed on him to expel him, and made room for her younger son Alexander, her favourite (Paus. viii. 7), and even sent an army against Lathybus to Cyprus, whither he had fled, and put to death the general who commanded it for allowing him to escape alive. Terrified at her cruelty, Alexander also retired, but was recalled by his mother, who attempted to assassinate him, but was herself put to death by him ere she could effect her object, n. c. 39. (Justin. xxxix. 4.)

7. A daughter of Ptolemy Physcon and Cleopatra [No. 6], married first her brother Ptolemy VIII. Lathybus, but was divorced from him by his mother, and fled into Syria, where she married Antiochus IX. Cyzicenus, who was then in arms against his brother Grypus, about n. c. 117, and successfully tempered with the latter's army. A battle took place, in which Cyzicenus was defeated; and she then fled to Antioch, which was besieged and taken by Grypus, and Cleopatra was surrendered by him to the vengeance of his wife Tryphone, her own sister, who had murdered her in a temple in which she had taken refuge. (Justin. xxxix. 3.)

8. Another daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, married her brother Lathybus (on her sister [No. 7] being divorced), and on his exile remained in Egypt, and then married Antiochus XI. Epiphanes, and on his death Antiochus X. Eusebes. She was besieged by Tigranes in Syria or Mesopotamia, and killed by him (Strab. xvi. p. 749), or according to Josephus (Ant. xiii. 16. § 4), relieved by Lucullus' invasion of Armenia. She was the mother of Antiochus XIII. Asiasicus. She is more generally called Selene.

9. Daughter of Ptolemy IX. Lathybus, usually called Berenice. [Berenice, No. 4.]

10. Third and eldest surviving daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, was born towards the end of n. c. 69, and was consequently seventeen at the death of her father, who in his will appointed her heir of his kingdom in conjunction with her younger brother, Ptolemy, whom she was to marry. The personal charms, for which she was so famed, shewed themselves in early youth, as we are told by Appian (B. C. v. 8), that she made an impression on the heart of Antony in his fifteenth year, when he was at Alexandria with Gabinius. Her beauty and reign did not last long, as Ptolemy, or rather Pothinus and Achillas, his chief advisers, expelled her from the throne, about n. c. 49. She retreated into Syria, and there collected an army with which she designed to force her brother to reinstate her. But an easier way soon presented itself; for in the following year Caesar arrived in Egypt in pursuit of Pompey, and took upon himself to arrange matters between Cleopatra and her brother. (Caes. B. C. iii. 103, 107.) Being informed of Caesar's amatory disposition, she resolved to avail herself of it, and, either at his request, according to Plutarch, or of her own accord, clandestinely effected an entrance into the palace where he was residing, and by the charms of her person and voice and the fascination of her manner, obtained such an ascendency over him, that, in the words of Dion Cassius (xlii. 35), from being the judge between her and her brother, he became her advocate. According to Plutarch, she made her entry into Caesar's apartment in a kala of cloth, which was brought by Apollodorus, her attendant, as a present to Caesar. However this may be, her plan fully succeeded, and we find her replaced on the throne, much to the indignation of her brother and the Egyptians, who involved Caesar in a war in which he ran great personal risk, but which ended in her favour. In the course of it, young Ptolemy was killed, probably drowned in the Nile (Liv. B. a. 112; Hist. B. A. e. 31; Dion Cass. xiii. 43), and Cleopatra obtained the undivided rule. She was however associated by Caesar with another brother of the same name, and still quite a child, with a view to conciliate the Egyptians, with whom she appears to have been very unpopular (Dion Cass. xiii. 34), and she was also nominally married to him.

While Caesar was in Egypt, Cleopatra lived in undisguised connexion with him, and would have detained him there longer, or have accompanied him at once to Rome, but for the war with Pharnaces, which tore him from her arms. She however joined him in Rome, in company with her nominal husband, and there continued the same open intercourse with him, living in apartments in his house such as no other woman of his rank enjoyed (Doubts have been thrown on her visit to Rome, but the evidence of Cicero (ad Att. xiv. 5), of Dion Cassius (xiii. 27), and Suetonius (Caes. 35), seems to be conclusive). She was loaded with honours and presents by Caesar, and seems to have stayed at Rome till his death, B. C. 44. She had a son by him, named Caesarion, who was afterwards put to death by Augustus. Caesar at least owned him as his son, though the paternity was questioned by some contemporaries [Cassarion]; and the character of Cleopatra perhaps favours the doubt. After the death of Caesar, she fled to Egypt, and in the troubles which ensued she took the side of the triumvirate, and assisted Dolabella both by sea and land, resisting the threats of Cassius, who was preparing to attack her when he was called away by the enticements of Brutus. She also sailed in person with a considerable fleet to assist Antony after the defeat of Dolabella, but was prevented from joining him by a storm and the bad state of her health. She had however done sufficient to prove her attachment to Caesar's memory (which seems to have been sincere), and also to furnish her with arguments to use to Antony, who in the end of the year 41 came into Asia Minor, and there summoned Cleopatra to attend, on the charge of having failed to co-operate with the triumvirate against Caesar's murderers. She was now in her twenty-eighth year, and in the perfection of matured beauty, which in conjunction with her talents and eloquence, and perhaps the early impression which we have mentioned, completely won the heart of Antony, who henceforth appears as her devoted lover and slave. We read in Plutarch elaborate descriptions of her well-known voyage up the Cydnus in Cilicia to meet Antony, and the magnificent entertainments which she gave, which were remarkable not less for good taste and variety than splendour and profuse expense. One of these is also celebrated in Athenaeus (iv. 29). The first use Cleopatra made of her influence was to procure the death of her younger sister, Arizem, who had once set up a claim to the kingdom. (Apian, B. C. v. 8, 9; Dion Cass. xlvii. 24.) Her brother, Ptolemy, she seems to have murdered with such promptitude as to make her name a byword of terror and poison. She also avenged herself on one of her generals, Serapion, who had assisted Cassius contrary to her orders, and got into her hands a person whom the people of Arados had set up to counterfeit the elder of her two brothers, who perished in Egypt. All these were torn from the sanctuaries of temples; but Antony, we learn from both Dion and Appian, was so entirely enslaved by Cleopatra's charms, that he set at nought all ties of religion and humanity. (Appian, B. C. v. 9; Dion Cass. xlviii. 24.)

Cleopatra now returned to Egypt, where Antony spent some time in her company; and we read of the luxury of their mode of living, and the unbounded empire which she possessed over him. The ambition of her character, however, peeps out even in these scenes, particularly in the fishing anecdote recorded by Plutarch. (Ant. 29.) Her connexion with Antony was interrupted for a short time by his marriage with Octavia, but was renewed on his return from Italy, and again on his return from his Parthian expedition, when she went to meet him in Syria with money and provisions for his army. He then returned to Egypt, and gratified her ambition by assigning to her children, and she dallied with the kings of Macedon.
made her way to Alexandria, the harbour of which she entered with her prows crowned and music sounding, as if victorious, fearing an outbreak in the city. With the same view of retaining the Alexandrians in their allegiance, she and Antony (who soon joined her) proclaimed their children, Antyllus and Cleopatra, of age. She then prepared to defend herself in Alexandria, and also sent embassies to the neighbouring tribes for aid. (Dion Cass. li. 6.) She had also a plan of retiring to Spain, or to the Persian gulf; and either was building ships in the Red Sea, as Dion asserts, or, according to Plutarch, intended to draw her ships across the isthmus of Suez. Which ever was the case, the ships were burnt by the Arabs of Petra, and this hope failed. She scurried not to behead Artavasdes, and send his head as a bribe for aid to the king of Media, who was his enemy. Finding, however, no aid nigh, she prepared to negotiate with Augustus, and sent him on his approach her sceptre and throne (unknown to Antony), as thereby resigning her kingdom. His public answer required her to resign and submit, but he provided only the peace and liberty, and away with Antony, and promised that she should retain her kingdom. On a subsequent occasion, Thaurus, Caesar's freedman, brought similar terms, and represented Augustus as captivated by her, which she seems to have believed, and, seeing Antony's fortunes desperate, betrayed Ptolemaus to Augustus, prevented the Alexandrians from going out against him, and frustrated Antony's plan of escaping to Rome by persuading the fleet to desert him. She then fled to a mausoleum she had built, where she had collected her most valuable treasures, and proclaimed her intention of putting an end to her life, with a view to entice Antony thither, and thus ensure his capture. (This is the account of Dion Cassius, li. 6, 8—11: the same facts for the most part are recorded by Plutarch, who however represents Cleopatra's perfidy as less glaring.) She then had Antony informed of her death, as though to persuade him to die with her; and this stratagem, if indeed she had this object, fully succeeded, and he was drawn up into the unfinished mausoleum, and died in her arms. She did not however venture to meet Augustus, though his rival was dead, but remained in the mausoleum, ready if need was to put herself to death, for which purpose she had asps and other venomous animals in readiness. Augustus contrived to apprehend her, and had all instruments of death removed, and then requested an interview (for an account of which see Dion Cass. li. 12, 13, and Plut. Ant. 85). The charms of Cleopatra, however, failed in softening the heart of Augustus. He could only "judge her be of good cheer, and fear no violence." Seeing that her case was desperate, and determined at all events not to be carried captive to Rome, she resolved on death; but in order to compass this, it was necessary to disarm the vigilance of her guards, and she did this by feigning a readiness to go to Rome, and preparing presents for Livia, the wife of Augustus. This artifice succeeded, and she was thereby enabled to put an end to her life, either by the poison of an asp, or by a poisoned comb (Dion Cass. li. 14; Plut. Ant. 85, 86), the former supposition being adopted by most writers. (Suet. Aug. 17; Galen. Theriac. ad Plat. p. 480, ed. Basili; Vell. Pat. ii. 67.)

Cleopatra died in n. c. 30, in the thirty-ninth year of her age, and with her ended the dynasty of the Ptolemies in Egypt. She had three children by Antony: Alexander and Cleopatra, who were twins, and Ptolemy surnamed Philadæus. The leading points of her character were, ambition and voluptuosity. History presents to us the former as the prevailing motive, the latter being frequently employed only as the means of gratifying it. In all the stories of her luxury and lavish expense, there is a splendour and a grandeur that somewhat refines them. (See Plin. H. N. ix. 58.) In the days of her prosperity, her arrogance was unbounded, and she loved to swear by the Capitol, in which she hoped to reign with Antony. She was avaricious, to supply her extravagance, and cruel, or at least had no regard for human life when her own objects were concerned,—a Caeser with a woman's caprice. Her talents were great and varied; her knowledge of languages was peculiarly remarkable (Plut. Ant. 27), of which she had seven at command, and was the more remarkable from the fact, that her predecessors had not been able to master even the Egyptian, and some had forgotten their native Macedonian; and in the midst of the most luxurious scenes we see traces of a love of literature and critical research. She added the library of Pergamus, presented to her by Antony, to that of Alexandria. Her ready and versatile wit, her knowledge of human nature and power of using it, her attractive manners, and her exquisitely musical and flexible voice, compared by Plutarch (Ant. 27) to a many-stringed instrument, are also the subjects of well-attested praise. The higher points in her character are admirably touched by Rome in the ode (i. 37) on her defeat.

The following coin represents the head of Antony on the obverse, and Cleopatra's on the reverse.

11. Daughter of Antony, the triumvir, and Cleopatra, was born with her twin brother Alexander in n. c. 40. Her early history till the time she was carried to Rome is given under Alexander, p. 112, a. She continued to reside at Rome till her marriage with Juba, king of Numidia, who was brought to Rome in n. c. 46, when quite a boy, along with his father, after the defeat of the latter by Caesar. (Dion Cass. li. 15; Plut. Ant. 57.) By Juba, Cleopatra had two children, Ptolemy, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and Drusilla, who married Antonius Felix, the governor of Judæa. The following coin contains the head of Juba on the obverse, and Cleopatra's on the reverse.

12. A daughter of Mithridates, who married Tiranes, king of Armenia. She seems to have been a woman of great courage and spirit. (Plut. Loc. 22; Appian, Mith. 108; Justin, xxxviii. 3.) 13. A courteous of the emperor Claudius. (Tac. Ann. xi. 30.)
14. A wife of the poet Martial, who has written an epigram relating to her. (Epigr. iv. 21.) [J. E. B.]
CLEOPATRA (Κλεοπάτρα), the authoress of a work on Cosmetics (Κοσμημάτων, or Κοσμώνητικον), who must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ, as her work was abridged by Crion. (Galen, De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. i. 3. vol. xii. p. 446.) The work is several times quoted by Galen (Iat. i. 1. 6, 5. pp. 408, 322, 495, De Pomp. ad Meas. c. 10. vol. xix. p. 767, etc.) (Lib. Med. ii. 2. 56. p. 278, and Pliny, Hist. Natur. iv. 1. 2. p. 413.) Though at first sight one might suspect that Cleopatra was a fictitious name attached to a treatise on such a subject, it does not really appear to have been so, as, wherever the work is mentioned, the authoress is spoken of as if she were a real person, though no particulars of her personal history are preserved. A work on the Diseases of Women is attributed either to this Cleopatra, or to the Egyptian queen; an epitome of which is to be found in Caspar Wolff's Tabulae Gymnæotypicae, &c. Basili, 1665, 1666, 1797, etc. (W. A. C.)
CLEOPHANTUS (Κλεόφαντος) 1. A Greek physician, who lived probably about the beginning of the third century B.C., as he was the tutor of Antigonus (Cael. Aurol. De Morb. Aut. ii. 10. p. 96) and Mennaemon. (Gal. Comment. in Hippocr. "Epist. III." ii. 4. iii. 71. vol. xvii. pt. i. pp. 603, 731.) He seems to have been known among the ancients for his use of wine, and is several times quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 15, xxiv. 92, xxvi. 8), Celsius (De Medico. iii. 14. p. 51), Galen (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. ii. 6. vol. xii. p. 310; De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. vii. 7. vol. xiii. p. 985; De Autid. ii. 1. vol. xiv. p. 108), and Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Aut. ii. 39. p. 176).
2. Another physician of the same name, who attended A. Claudius Avitus in the first century B.C. He also is called by Cicero "medicus ignobilis, sed spectatus homo" (pro Cunct. 16), must not be confounded with the preceding. [W. A. G.]
CLEFTOPHANTUS, one of the mythic inventors of painting at Corinth, who is said to have followed Damaras in his flight from Corinth to Etruria. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 5.) [L. U.]
CLEOPHON (Κλεόφων). 1. An Athenian demagogue, of obscure and, according to Aristophanes (Rim. 677), of Thracian origin. The meanness of his birth is mentioned also by Aelian (V. H. xii. 45), and is said to have been one of the grounds on which he was attacked by Plato, the comic poet, in his play called "Cleopphon." (Schol. ad Aristoph. "Cleopon." 1.) He appears throughout his career in vehement opposition to the oligarchical party, of which his political contest with Critias, as referred to by Aristotle (Rhet. i. 15. § 13), is an instance; and we find him on three several occasions exercising his influence successfully for the prevention of peace with Sparta. The first of these was in B.C. 410, after the battle of Cyzicus, when so favourable terms were offered to the Athenians (Diod. xiii. 52, 53; West. ad loc.; Clinton, F. H. sub anno 410); and it has been thought that a passage in the "Crestes" of Euripides, which was represented in B.C. 406, was pointed against Cleopphon and his evil counsel. (See I. 592, 593, 594.) CLEOSTRATUS (Κλεόστρατος), an aeronaut of Tenedos. Censorinus (de Dia Nat. c. 18) considers him to have been the real inventor of the Octothérès, or cycle of eighty years, which was used before the Melonioc cycle of nineteen years, and which was popularly attributed to Budeus. Theophratus (de Signa. Plan. p. 239, ed. Basil. 1641) mentions him as a meteorological observer along the course of Polybius (xx. 8).
CLOSTRODIUS (Κλόστρόδιος), an astronomer of Tenedos. Censorinus (de Dia Nat. c. 18) considers him to have been the real inventor of the Octothérès, or cycle of eighty years, which was used before the Melonioc cycle of nineteen years, and which was popularly attributed to Budeus. Theophratus (de Signa. Plan. p. 239, ed. Basil. 1641) mentions him as a meteorological observer along the course of Polybius (xx. 8).
CLOACINA.

The life of Cliquina, written by a Greek monk of the name of Daniel, is contained in "Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima," in the "Acta Sanctorum," ad 30 dicembris, in the editions of the works of Cliquina, and in "Johnnis Cliquina, Johannis Damasenii, et Johannis Eleemosynarii Vitae," &c., ed. Johannes Victurius, Jesueta, Tournai, 1664, 4to. Two works of Cliquina, who was a fertile writer on religious subjects, have been printed, viz.: — 1. "Scala Paradisi" (Kαίμην), addressed to John, abbot of the monastery of Rathun, which is divided into thirty chapters, and treats on the means of attaining the highest possible degree of religious perfection. A Latin translation of this work by Ambrosius, a Camaldulensian monk, was published at Venice, 1531, ibid. 1569, Cologne, 1583, ibid. 1593, with an exposition of Dionysius, a Carthusian friar; ibid. 1601, 8vo. The Greek text, with a Latin translation and the Scholia of Elias, archbishop of Crete, was published together with the work of Cliquina cited below, by Matthæus Raderus, Paris, 1633, fol. It is also contained, together with the previously mentioned Scholia of Elias, in the different Bibliotheca Patrum. In some MSS., this work has the title Dádes Péninúlae in Spiritual Tables. 2. "tablet ad Pastorem," of which a Latin translation was published by the Ambrosius mentioned above, and was reprinted several times; the Greek text with a Latin version was published, together with the "Scala Paradisi" and the Scholia of the archbishop Elias, by Raderus mentioned above, Paris, 1633, fol. Both these works of Cliquina were translated into modern Greek and published by Maximus Marganis, bishop of Cerigo, Venice, 1590. (Fabric. Bibl. Græca. i. p. 529, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 421, ad annum 584; Hamberger, Zweytägiges Niederbruch von geahnten Maimern, vol. iii. p. 407.)

CLOACINA or CLOACICA, a surname of Venus, under which she is mentioned, and very rarely (Liv. iii. 48). The explanation given by Lactantius (de Fals. Relig. i. 20), that the name was derived from the great sewer (Cloaca maxima), where the image of the goddess was said to have been found in the time of king Tatius, is merely one of the unfortunate etymological speculations which we frequently meet with in the ancients. There is no doubt that Pliny (H. N. xvi. 36) is right in saying that the name is derived from the ancient verb clarea or clarea, to wash, clean, or purify. This meaning is also alluded to in the tradition about the origin and worship of Venus Cloacina, for it is said that, when Tatius and Romulus were arrayed against each other on account of the rape of the Sabine women, and when the women prevented the two belligerents from bloodshed, both armies purified themselves with sacred myrtle-branches on the spot which was afterwards occupied by the temple of Venus Cloacina. The supposition of some modern writers, that Cloacina has reference to the purity of love, is nothing but an attempt to intrude a modern notion upon the ancients, to which it was quite foreign. (Hartung, Die Relig. d. Röm. ii. p. 249.)

With Mātricius of Mitylene and Phænius of Athens, and says that Meton was taught by Phænius. If, therefore, Celestius was contemporaneous with the latter, which however is not clear, he must have lived before Ol. 87. Pliny (H. N. i. 8) says, that Anaximander discovered the obliquity of the ecliptic in Ol. 58, and that Celestius afterwards introduced the division of the Zodiac into signs, beginning with Aries and Sagittarius. It seems, therefore, that he lived some time between b. c. 548 and 432. Hyginus (Poliot. Astr. ii. 13) says, that Celestius first pointed out the two stars in Auriga called Mocia. (Verg. Aen. iv. 668.) On the Octaeteris, see Geminus, Elem. Astr. c. 6. (Ptolem. Eranus. p. 37.)

CLEO'XENOS (Kλεόξενος), was joint-author with one Democritus of a somewhat cumbrous system of telegraphing, which Polibius explains (x. 45-47) with the remark, that it had been considerably improved by himself. See Suidas, s. v. Κλεόξενος καλ. Δημώκλεαν γράμματα πέρι περαγόνων, where περαγόνων was the erroneous reading of the old editions. [E. E.]

CLEPSINA, the name of a patrician family of the Genicia gens.

1. C. Genicu's CLEPSINA, consul in b. c. 276 with Q. Fabius Maximus Gurreg, in which year Rome was visited by a grievous pestilence (Oros. iv. 2), and a second time in 270 with Cr. Cornelius Eladio. (Fasti.)

2. L. Genicu's CLEPSINA, probably brother of the preceding, was consul in b. c. 271 with C. Quinctius Claudius. He was sent to subdue the Campanian legion, which under Decius Jubellius had revolted from the Romans and made itself master of Rhegium. After a long siege, Clepsina took the town; he straightway set out death all the loose vagabonds and robbers whom he found among the soldiers, but sent the remains of the legion (probably a few above 800, though the numbers vary in the different authorities) to Rome for trial, where they were scourged and beheaded. (Oros. iv. 3; Dionys. xx. 7 in Mal's Excerpta; Appian, Soc. 5; Polyb. i. 7. 10; Suidas; Epit. 151; Zonar. viii. 6; Valer. Max. vii. § 15; Pausan. vii. 1 § 38.) Oresius and Dionysius are the only writers who mention the name of the consul, with the exception of Appian, who calls him by mistake Fabricius; and even the two former do not entirely agree. Oresius calls the consul Geminus simply, and places the capture of Rhegium in the year after that of Tarentum, by which L. Genticus would seem to be intended; while Dionysius, on the other hand, names him C. Genicus, and would thus apparently attribute the capture of the city to the consul of the following year (s. c. 270). [No. 1.]

CLETA. [Eleusis.

CLIMACUS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης ὁ Ἰαμακις), surnamed the Learned (ὁ Ἐκλεμψτηρ), a Greek writer who lived in the sixth century of the Christian era, whose original name was Joannes, and who was called Cliquus on account of a work written by him, which was entitled Κλαίμακας. He took orders, and although the learned education which he had received seemed to have destined him for a life among scholars, he lived during forty years with monks of the most rude and illiberal description, till he was chosen abbot of the convent on Mount Sinai, where he died at the age of one hundred, or thereabouts, on the 30th of March. The year of his death is uncertain, but it was probably in the beginning of the seventh century. [A. d. 606?]

The life of Cliquus, written by a Greek monk of the name of Daniel, is contained in "Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima," in the "Acta Sanctorum," ad 30 dicembris, in the editions of the works of Cliquus, and in "Johnnis Cliquina, Johannis Damasenii, et Johannis Eleemosynarii Vitae," &c., ed. Johannes Victurius, Jesueta, Tournai, 1664, 4to. Two works of Cliquus, who was a fertile writer on religious subjects, have been printed, viz.: — 1. "Scala Paradisi" (Καλαμίς), addressed to John, abbot of the monastery of Raithun, which is divided into thirty chapters, and treats on the means of attaining the highest possible degree of religious perfection. A Latin translation of this work by Ambrosius, a Camaldulensian monk, was published at Venice, 1531, ibid. 1569, Cologne, 1583, ibid. 1593, with an exposition of Dionysius, a Carthusian friar; ibid. 1601, 8vo. The Greek text, with a Latin translation and the Scholia of Elias, archbishop of Crete, was published together with the work of Cliquus cited below, by Matthæus Raderus, Paris, 1633, fol. It is also contained, together with the previously mentioned Scholia of Elias, in the different Bibliotheca Patrum. In some MSS., this work has the title Dádes Péninúlae in Spiritual Tables. 2. CLOELIA.

CLODIANUS, mentioned by Cicero (ad Att. i. 19), is the same as Ca. Cornelius Lentulus Ciodianus, consul B.C. 72. [LENTULUS.]

CLODIUS, another form of the name Claudius, just as we find both cardus and cedus, clausemum and cedrum, caudae and cudae. In the latter times of the republic several of the Claudia gens, adopted exclusively the form Codium, others were called differently, sometimes Claudius and sometimes Codius: their lives are given under CLAUDIUS.

CLODIUS. 1. A physicius, who must have lived in the first century B.C., as he was a pupil of Asclepiades of Bithynia. One of his works is quoted by Caesius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. iv. 9, p. 345; De Mort. Auct. iii. 8, p. 217) with reference to ascetics.

2. L. Claudius, a native of Ancona, who was employed by Oppianicus to poison Deme in the first century B.C., and who is called by Cicero (pro Cuen. c. 14) "pharmacopoea circumfranens," may perhaps be the same person as the preceding, though it is scarcely probable. [W. A. G.]

CLODIUS ALBINUS. [ALBINUS.]

CLODIUS BITHYNICUS. [BITHYNICUS, and CLAUDIUS No. 6, p. 775, b.]

CLODIUS LICINIUS. [LICINIUS.]

CLODIUS QUIRINALIS/LIS. [QUIRINALIS.]

CLODIUS SABINUS. [SABINUS.]

CLODIUS TURPINUS. [TURPINUS.]

CLOELIA, a Roman virgin, who was one of the hostages given to Persena with other maidens and boys, is said to have escaped from the Etruscan camp, and to have swum across the Tiber to Rome. She was sent back by the Romans to Persena, who was so struck with her gallant deed, that he not only set her at liberty, but allowed her to take with her a part of the hostages: she chose those who were under age, as they were most exposed to ill-treatment. Persena also rewarded her with a horse adorned with splendid trappings, and the Roman people with the statue of a female on horseback, which was erected in the Sacred Way. Another tradition, of far less celebrity, related, that all the hostages were massacred by Tarquinius with the exception of Valeria, who swam over the Tiber and escaped to Rome, and that the equestrian statue was erected to her, and not to Cloelia. (Liv. ii. 13; Dionys. v. 33; Plut. Popic. 19; Ilustr. Fem. s. v. Valeria et Cloelia; Flor. i. 10; Val. Max. iii. 2 § 2; Aurel. Vict. de Inv. iii. 13; Dion Cass. in Bekker's Anecd. i. p. 133. 8; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. a. 13; Virg. Aen. viii. 631; Juv. viii. 265.)

CLOELIA or CLUILLIA GENIS, patrician, of Alban origin, was one of the gentle minors, and was said to have derived its name from Cloelius, a companion of Aeneas. (Festus, s. v. Cloelius.) The name of the last king of Alban is said to have been Cuilnius or Cilnius. He led an army against Rome in the time of Tullus Hostilius, pitched his camp five miles from the city, and surrounded his encampment with a ditch, which continued to be called after him, in subsequent ages, POSSE CILNII, POSSE CILNIAE, or POSSA CILNII. While here, he died, and the Albanians chose Mettus Fufetius as dictator, in consequence of whose treachery the Romans destroyed Alban. Niebuhr, however, remarks, that though the Possa Cilnus was undoubtedly the work of an Alban prince called Cilnus, yet that the story of the Alban army encamping there was probably invented for the sake of accounting for this name. (Liv. i. 22, 23; Dionys. iii. 2-4; Festus, s. v. Cloelius Fossae; comp. Liv. ii. 39; Dionys. viii. 22; Niebuhr, vol. i. pp. 204, 348, n. 870.)

Upon the destruction of Alba, the Cloelii were one of the noble Alban houses enrolled in the Roman senate. (Liv. i. 30; Dionys. iii. 29.) They bore the surname SICULUS, probably because the Albanians were regarded as a mixture of Sicilians with Priscans. Tullus was perhaps another cognomen of this gens. See CLOELIUS TULLUS.

The following coin of this gens contains the obverse the name of Cloelia, and on the reverse Victory on a biga, with the inscription T. CLOELIUS, Cloelia being an ancient form of the name.

CLOELIUS, an Aeuvian, the commander of a Volscian force, came to besiege Ardea, B.c. 443, invited by the plebs of that town, who had been driven out of it by the optimates. While he was before the place, the Romans, under the consul M. Geganius, came to the assistance of the optimates, drew lines around the Volscians, and did not allow them to march out till they had surrendered their general, Cloelius, who adored the triumph of the cons at Rome. (Liv. iv. 9. 10.) Comp. COELIUS GRACCHUS.

CLOELIUS GRACCHUS, the leader of the Aeuvians in B.c. 458, surrounded the consul L. Minucius Augurinus, who had through fear shut himself up in his camp on Mount Algida; but Cloelius was in his turn surrounded by the dictator L. Quinctius Capitolinus, who had come to relieve Minucius, and was delivered up by his own troops to the dictator. (Liv. iii. 25—28; Dionys. x. 22—24.) The legendary nature of this story as told by Livy has been pointed out by Niebuhr (vol. ii. p. 268), who remarks, that the Aeuvian general, Cloelius, is again surrounded and taken prisoner twenty years after at Ardea—a circumstance quite impossible, as no one who had been led in triumph in those days ever escaped execution.

CLOELIUS TULLUS, a Roman ambassador, who was killed with his three colleagues by the Fidenates, in B.C. 488, upon the instigation of Lar Tolumnius, king of the Velantes. Statues of all four were placed on the Rostra. Cicero calls him Tullus Clunia. (Liv. iv. 17; Cic. Pleb. ix. 2; Plin. H. N. xxiv. 6. a. 11.)

CLONAS (Klovos), a poet, and one of the earliest musicians of Greece, was claimed by the Arcadians as a native of Tegea, but by the Boeotians as a native of Thebes. His age is not quite certain; but he probably lived a little later than Terpander, or he was his younger contemporary (about 620 B.C.). He excelled in the music of the flute, which he is thought by some to have introduced into Greece from Asia. As might be expected from the connexion between elegiac poetry and the flute music, he is reckoned among the elegiac poets. Among the pieces of music which he composed was one called Elygos. To him are ascribed the invention of the Apollotics and Schoenium, and of Proopeptia. Mention is made of a choral song in which he used all the three ancient modes of music, so that the first strophe was Dorian, the second Phrygian, and the third Lydian. (Plut. de Mus. 3. p. 1132, c. 5. p. 1133, a. 8. p. 1134, a. b. 17. p. 1136, f.; Herod. Pont. p. 140; Paus. x. 7. § 8.) [P. S.]

CLO'NIUS (Kal'nevus). 1. The leader of the Boeotians in the war against Troy, was slain by Agenor. (Hom. II. ii. 495, xv. 340; Dod. iv. 67; Hygin. Fab. 97.)

2. Two companions of Aeneas, one of whom was slain by Turnus, and the other by Messeapus. (Virg. Aen. ix. 574, x. 749.) There is a fourth imaginary personage of this name. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) [L. S.]

CLOTHO. [Moirai.]

CLU'ENTIUS. 1. Sister of the elder A. Cluentius Habitus. She was one of the numerous wives of Statius Albinus Oppianicus, and, according to the representation of Cicero, was poisoned by her husband (pro Cluent. 10). This Cluentius, in Orelli’s Onomasticon Tullianum, seems to be confounded with her niece. [No. 2.]

2. Daughter of the elder A. Cluentius Habitus. Soon after her father’s death she married her first cousin A. Aurinius Melinus, from whom she was soon divorced in order to make way for her own mother, Sasia, who had conceived a passion for the husband of her daughter. (Pro Cluent. 5.) [W. L.]

L. CLU'ENTIUS, called A. Cluentius by Eupropias (v. 8), was one of the generals of the Itali ans in the Social War. He gained a victory over Sulla in the neighbourhood of Pompeii, but was soon after defeated with great loss by Sulla, n. c. 89. Thirty thousand of his men are said to have fallen in their flight towards Nola, and twenty thousand, among whom was Cluentius himself, before the walls of that town, as the inhabitants would admit them by one only gate, for fear lest Sulla’s troops should rush in with them. (Appian, B. C. i. 50; Eutrop. l. c.; comp. Cic. de Div. i. 53; Val. Max. i. 6. § 4; Plin. H. N. xxii. 6.)

A. CLU'ENTIUS HA'BITUS. 1. A native of Latinum, highly respected and esteemed not only in his own country but in the whole surrounding country, on account of his ancient descent, unblemished reputation, and great moral worth. He married Sasia, and died in n. c. 68, leaving one son and one daughter. (Pro Cluent. 5.)

In modern editions of Cicero the cognomen Acitus uniformly appears instead of Habitus, having been first introduced, in opposition to all the best MSS. both of Cicero and Quintilian, by Lambins at the suggestion of Cuajacius, who maintained, that Habitus must in every case be considered as a corruption of the transcribers, and appealed for the confirmation of his opinion to the Florentine MS. of the Digest (48, tit. 19. § 39), whereas, however, upon examination the reading is found to be Acitus. Accordingly, Orelli, following Niebuhr and Classen, has restored the ancient form in his Onomasticon, although not in the text of the edition. (Rivuesisches Museum for 1827, p. 223.)

2. Son of the foregoing and his wife Sasia, was also a native of Latinum, born about n. c. 103. (Pro Cluent. 5.) In n. c. 74, being at Rome, he accused his own step-father, Statius Albinus Oppianicus, of having attempted to procure his death by poison. The cause was heard before a certain C.

Junius during a period when a strong feeling prevailed with regard to the veracity of the criminals, who were at that epoch selected from the senate exclusively. Shortly before the trial, a report was spread abroad, and gained general credit, that bribery had been extensively practised by those interested in the result. Accordingly, when a verdict of guilty was pronounced by a very small majority, including several individuals of notoriously bad character, when it became known that one of the consuls had been irrationally introduced, and had voted against the defendant without hearing the evidence, and when, above all, it was ascertained beyond a doubt that one of the most infamous of the judges who had condemned Oppianicus had actually received a large sum of money for distribution among his fellow-countrymen, relief became universal that Cicero had by the foulest practices obtained the conviction of an innocent man. Indignation being thus strongly excited, it was exhibited most unequivocally. No opportunity was allowed to pass of inflicting condign punishment on the obnoxious judges. Junius, the judge questionis, a man rising rapidly to eminence, was forced by the popular clamour to retire from public life; Cluentius and many others of those concerned were disgraced by the censors, and the Judicium Janumani or Albinianum Judicium became a by-word for a corrupt and unrighteous judge. In the advantage of the outtry than Cicero himself, when insisting, at the trial of Verres, on the necessity of obliterating the foul stain which had thus sullied the reputation of the Roman courts. (Jo Verr. act. i. 10, 15—61, pro Coccio. 10; Pseudo-Aecon. in Verr. act. i. p. 141; Schol. Gronov. p. 395, ed. Orelli.)

Eight years after these events, in n. c. 66, Cluentius was himself accused by young Oppianicus, son of Statius Albinus who had died in the interval, of three distinct acts of poisoning, two of which, it was alleged, had proved successful. The attack was conducted by T. Accius Pisaerensis; the defence was undertaken by Cicero, at that time praetor. It is perfectly clear, from the whole tenor of the remarkable speech delivered upon this occasion, from the small space devoted to the refutation of the above charges, and from the meagre and defective evidence by which they were supported, that comparatively little importance was attached to them by the prosecutor, that they were merely employed as a plausible pretext for bringing Cluentius before a Roman court, and that his enemies grounded their hopes of success almost entirely upon the prejudices which was known to exist in men’s minds on account of the Judicium Janumani,—a prejudice which had already proved the ruin of many others when arraigned of various offences. Hence it would appear that the chief object kept in view by Accius in his opening address was to refresh the memories of his hearers, to recall to their recollections all the circumstances connected with the previous trial, and the punishments which had been inflicted on the guilty judges. Consequently, the greater portion of the reply is devoted to the same topics; the principal aim of Cicero was to undeceive his audience with regard to the real state of the facts, to draw a vivid picture of the life and crimes of the elder Oppianicus and Sasia, proving them to be monsters of guilt, and thus to remove the dubiety invidia" which had taken such deep root against his client. Following the example of his antagonist, he divides the subject into two heads: 1. The treason or prejudice which prevailed. 2. The crimes or specific offences libelled; but while five-sixths of the pleading are devoted to removing the former, the latter is dismissed shortly and contemptuously as almost unworthy of notice. A critical analysis of the whole will be found in the well-known lectures of Blair upon rhetoric and belles-lettres, who has selected the oration as an excellent example of managing at the bar a complex and intricate cause with order, elegance, and force. And certainly nothing can be more admirable than the distinct and clear exposition by which we are made acquainted with all the details of a most involved and perplexing story, the steady precision with which we are guided through a frightful and entangled labyrinth of domestic crime, and the apparently plain straightforward simplicity with which every circumstance is brought to bear upon the exculpation of the impeached. We are told (Quintil. ii. 17. § 21), that Cicero having procured an acquittal by his eloquence, boasted that he had spread a mist before the judges; but so artfully are all the parts connected and combined, that it is very difficult, in the absence of the evidence, to discover the suspicious and weak points of the narrative. In one place only do we detect a sophism in the reasoning, which may involve important consequences. It is freely confessed that bribery had been extensively employed at the trial of Oppianicus; it is admitted with ostentatious candour that this bribery must have been the work either of Claudius or of Oppianicus; it is fully proved that the latter had tampered with Stanius, who had undertaken to suborn a majority of those associated with him; and then the conclusion is triumphantly drawn, that since Oppianicus was guilty, Claudius must have been innocent. But another contingency is carefully kept out of view, namely, that both may have been guilty of the attempt, although one only was successful; and that this was really the truth appears not only probable in itself, but had been broadly asserted by Cicero himself a few years before. (In Ver. Act. i. 13). Indeed, one great misfortune which befell the case itself, had arisen from the sentiments which he had formerly expressed with so little reserve; and Accius did not fail to twit him with this inconsistency, while great ingenuity is displayed in his struggles to escape from the dilemma. Taken as a whole, the speech for Claudius must be considered as one of Cicero's highest efforts. (Comp. Quintil. xi. 1. § 61). [W. R.]

CLUVIIUS. [CLOELIA GENUS ET CLOELIUS.

CLUVIA, FAUCULA [CLUVIR], a Capuan courtezan, who lived in the time of the second Punic war. She earned the good-will of the Romans by secretly supplying the Roman prisoners with food. When Capua was taken, c. 210, her property and liberty were restored to her by a special decree of the senate. (Liv. xxvi. 33, 34.)

CLUVIUS, the name of a family of Campanian origin, of whom we find the following mentioned:—

1. C. CLUVIUS SAXULA, praetor in b. c. 175, and again in b. c. 173 praetor peregrinus. (Liv. xlii. 22, 33, xlii. 1.)

2. S. CLUVIUS, praetor in b. c. 172, had Saridina as his province. (Liv. xlii. 9, 10.)

3. C. CLUVIUS, legate in b. c. 168 to the consul L. Aemilius Paullus in Macedonia. (Liv. xlv. 10.)

4. C. CLUVIUS, a Roman knight, a contemporary of Cicero, was judge in a suit between C. Fannius Caecere and Q. Flavius, about b. c. 76. (Cic. pro Rosc. Com. xiv. 14—16.)

5. M. CLUVIUS, a wealthy banker of Patrae, with whom Cicero was on intimate terms. In b. c. 51, Cicero gave him a letter of introduction to Themus, who was proprietor in Asia, whither Cluvius was going to collect some debts due to him from various cities and individuals. In his will he bequeathed part of his property to Cicero. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 2, ad Fam. xii. 56, ad Att. xiii. 46, xiv. 8.)

6. C. CLUVIUS, made consul suffectus in b. c. 29 by Augustus. (Dion Cass. Hi. 42.) It was probably this Cluvius who in b. c. 45 was appointed by Caesar to superintend the assignment of lands in Gallia Cisalpinia, when Cicero wrote to him on behalf of the town of Atella. (Ad Fam. xiii. 7.) This same Cluvius also is probably referred to in a funeral oration of the age of Augustus. (Orelli, Inv. No. 4859.)

The annexed coin, struck in the third dictatorship of Caesar, seems to belong to this Cluvius. Its obverse represents the head of Victory, with CAESAR DIC. TIB.; its reverse Pallas, with C. CLOVI PRAEF.

7. M. CLUVIUS RUFUS, consul suffectus in A. D. 45. (Joseph. Antiq. H. 1; Suet. Ner. 21; Dion Cass. Ixliii. 14.) He was governor of Hispania in the time of Galba, b. c. 69. (Tac. Hist. I. 8.) On the death of Galba he first swore allegiance to Otho, but soon afterwards he appears as a partisan of Vitellius. Hilarius, a freedman of Vitellius, having accused him of aspiring to the independent government of Spain, Cluvius went to Vitellius, who was then in Gallia, and succeeded in clearing himself. He remained in the suite of the emperor, though he still retained the government of his province. (Tac. Hist. ii. 53.) Tacitus speaks of him (Hist. iv. 43) as distinguished alike for his wealth and for his eloquence, and says, that no one in the time of Nero had been endangered by him. In the games in which Nero made his appearance, Cluvius acted as herald. (Suet. Ner. 21; Dion Cass. Ixii. 14.) It is probably this same Cluvius whom we find mentioned as an historian. He wrote an account of the times of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. (Tac. Ann. xlii. 20, xiv. 2; Plin. Ep. ix. 19. § 5.)

2. A daughter of Iphius or Minyas, and the wife of Phylemus or Cephalus, by whom she became the mother of Iphicles and Alcimedea. (Paus. x. 29. § 2; Hom. Od. vi. 323; Schol. ad Apollod. Rhod. i. 48. 230.) According to Hesiod (стат. to Hom. p. 1889; comp. Ov. Met. i. 758, iv. 294), she was the mother of Phaëthon by Helios, and according to Apollodorus (iii. 9. § 2), also of Atlante by Jana.

3. A relative of Menelaus and a companion of Helen, together with whom she was carried off by Paris. (Hom. ΕΙ. iii. 114; Dictys Cret. i. 3, v. 13.) After the taking of Troy, when the booty was distributed, Clymena was given to Acamas. She was represented as a captive by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi. (Paus. x. 26. § 1; comp. Ov. Her. xviii. 267.) There are several other mythical personages of this name. (Hom. ΕΙ. ii. 47; Hygin. Fab. 71; Apollod. iii. 2. § 1, &c.; Paus. x. 24. § 8.)

[LS.]

CLYMENUS (Κλυμένος). 1. A son of Cardis in Crete, who is said to have come to Ellis in the fiftieth year after the flood of Deucalion, to have restored the Olympic games, and to have erected altars to Heracles, from whom he was descended. (Paus. v. 8. § 1, 14. § 6, vil. 21. § 5.)

2. A son of Caenus or Schoenus, king of Arcadia or of Argos, was married to Epicaste, by whom he had among other children a daughter Harpalycle. He entertained an unnatural love for his daughter, and after having committed incest with her, he gave her in marriage to Alastor, but afterwards took her away from him, and again lived with her. Harpalycle, in order to avenge her father’s crime, slew her younger brother, or, according to others, her own son, and placed his flesh prepared in a dish before her father. She herself was thereupon changed into a bird, and Clymenus hung himself. (Hygin. Fab. 242, 246, 255; Parn. Erod. 13.)

3. A son of Preseus and king of Orchomenos, who was married to Minya. (Paus. ix. 37. § 1, &c.; Apollod. ii. 4. § 11; Hygin. Fab. 14.) There are several other mythical personages of this name. (Hygin. Fab. 154; Paus. ili. 35. § 8; Ov. Met. v. 98; comp. Aethra.)

CLYTAEMLRESTSA (Κλυταιμήστερα), a daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, and sister of Castor, Timandra, and Philonoe, and half-sister of Polydeuces and Helen. She was married to Agamemnon. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 6, &c.) For the particulars of the stories about her see Agamemnon, AEGENSTUS, ORKYES. [LS.]

CLYTIE (Κλυτία), the name of three mythical personages. (Hes. Theog. 352; Ov. Met. iv. 305; Paus. x. 30. § 1; Tzetz. ad Lyco. 421.) [LS.]

CLYTUS (Κλύτος). 1. A son of Lacedemon and father of Caloer and Procles, was one of the Trojan elders. (Hom. ΕΙ. iii. 147, xv. 419; Paus. x. 14. § 2.)

2. A son of the Ochelian king Eurytus, who was one of the Argonauts, and was killed during the expedition by Herakles, or according to others by Acetes. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 86; Schol. ad Soph. Trach. 385; Hygin. Fab. 14.) There are several other mythical personages of this name. (Paus. vi. 17. § 4; Ov. Met. i. 140; Apollod. i. 6. § 2; Vit. Jovv. iv. 294, x. 129, 226; xvi. 606.) [LS.]

CLYTUS (Κλύτος), the name of three mythical personages. (Hygin. Fab. 124, 170; Ov. Met. v. 87.) [LS.]

CLYTUS (Κλύτος), a Milesian and a disciple of Aristotle, was the author of a work on the history of his native city. The two passages of Athenaeus (xii. p. 540, d., xiv. p. 655, b.), in which this work is quoted, must be assimilated to one another either by reading Κλύτος in the first or Κλυτος in the second, for it is clear that references are made in both to the same author and the same treatise. In the passage of Diogenes Laertius (i. 25), καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Κλύτος, οὗτος ἡ πρώτη Κλυτος is mentioned by name. With much show of probability, the substitution of Κλυτος for αὐτός, as a notice of Thules would naturally find a place in an account of Miletus. It does not appear what ground there is for the assertion of Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 91, ed. Westermann), that Clytus accompanied Alexander on his expedition. The passage in Valerius Maximus to which he refers (ix. 3, externum, § 1), speaks only of the Cleitus who was murdered by the king.

CNAQIA (Κναχιά), a surname of Artemis, derived from Cnaeus, a Laconian, who accompanied the Dioscuri in their war against Achaea, and was made prisoner. He was sold as a slave, and carried to Crete, where he served in the temple of Artemis; but he escaped from thence with a priestess of the goddess, who carried her statue to Sparta. (Paus. iii. 18. § 3.)

[LS.]

CNEUMUS (Κνεύμος), the Spartan high admiral (αυταγγελος) in the second year of the Peloponnesian war, b. c. 430, made a descent upon Zacynthus with 1000 Lacedaemonian hoplites; but, after ravaging the island, was obliged to retire without reducing it to submission. Cneus was continued in his office of admiral next year; though the regular term, at least a few years subsequently, was only one year. In the second year of his command (b. c. 429), he was sent with 1000 hoplites again to co-operate with the Ambracians, who wished to subdue Acarnania and to revolt from Athens. He put himself at the head of the Ambracians and their barbarian allies, invaded Acarnania, and penetrated to Stratton, the chief town of the country. But here his barbarian allies were defeated by the Ambracians, and he was obliged to abandon the expedition altogether. Meanwhile the Peloponnesian fleet, which was intended to co-operate with the land forces, had been defeated by Phormio with a far smaller number of ships. Enraged at this disaster, and suspecting the incompetency of the commanders, the Lacedaemonians sent out Timocrates, Brasidas, and Lycophon to assist Cneus as a council, and with instructions to prepare for fighting a second battle. After refitting their disabled vessels and obtaining reinforcements from their allies, by which their number was increased to seventy-five, while Phormio had only twenty, the Lacedaemonian commanders attacked the Athenians off Naupactus, and though the latter at first lost several ships, and were nearly defeated, they eventually gained the day, and recovered, with one exception, all the ships which had been previously captured by the enemy. After this, Cneus, Brasidas, and the other Peloponnesian commanders formed the design of surprising Phocaea, and would probably have succeeded in their attempt, only their courage failed them at the time of execution, and they sailed to Solium instead, thereby giving the Athenians notice of their intention. (Thuc. ii. 66, 80—93; Dod. xii. 47. &c.)

[LS.]

CNEPH. [Cnephis]
CNUPHIS.

CNIÜDIA (Knosfa), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from the town of Knidos in Caria, for which Pythia declared to be the celebrated statue of the goddess. The statue of Aphrodite known by the name of the Medecum Venus, is considered by many critics to be a copy of the Cnidian Aphrodite. (Paus. i. 1 § 3; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5; Lucian, Amor. 13; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 57.) [L. S.]

CNO‘HIAS (Knoras), of Alorus, an officer who, having seen some active service under Demetrius II. and Antigonus Doson, was one of those employed by Agathocles and Sosos, ministers of Ptolemy IV. (Philopator) to superintend the provision of arms and the choice and training of the troops when Egypt was threatened with war by Antiochus the Great in B.C. 219. Cnophias is said to have been elected to the priesthood of Artemis at Ephesus (v. 68-65.) [E. E.]

CNOSSUS (Knosos), the author of a work on the geography of Asia (γεωγραφία τῆς Ασίας) quoted by the Scholast in Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 262); his name is probably corrupted. (Voss. Histor. Graec. p. 420, ed. Westerman.) [P. S.]

CNUPHIS (Knoupis), an Egyptian divinity, so called by Strabo (xvii. p. 582), while other writers, such as Plutarch, probably more in conformity with the genuine Egyptian name, call him Cneoph (Knōph). Plutarch (de Is. et Os. 21) states that all the Egyptians contributed to maintain the worship of the sacred animals, with the exception of the inhabitants of Thebaïs, who were not allowed to worship any mortal divinity, but an unborn and an immortal one, whom they called Cneoph. This statement would lead us to the belief, that the inhabitants of Thebaïs worshipped some spiritual divinity to the exclusion of all others, and that consequently their religion was of a purer and more refined nature than that of the other Egyptians; but we know from other sources, that in Thebaïs, as well as in other places, animals were worshipped, such as the crocodile (Herod. ii. 69), the eagle (Diod. i. 87; Strab. xvii. p. 559), the ram (Amon) of a kind of harmless snake. (Herod. ii. 74.) The god Cneoph himself was worshipped in the form of a serpent, as we learn from Strabo and Basællus (Praep. Ec. i. 10), the latter of whom states, that Cneoph was also called by the Ptolemaic Egyptians Θεός φάνος, which word thus appears also in coins and inscriptions of the time of the Roman empire, in which the god himself is represented in the form of a serpent. It was probably the idea of which the serpent is the symbol, that gave rise to the opinion of Plutarch and others, that Cneoph was a spiritual divinity; and when this notion had once become established, the symbol of the god became a matter of less importance, and was changed. Thus Basællus (Praep. Ec. iii. 11) informs us, that the Egyptians called the creator and ruler of the world (ηγομνόντας) Cneoph, and that he was represented in the form of a man, with dark complexion, a girdle, and a sceptre in his hand. Cneoph produced an egg, that is, the world, from his month, and out of it arose the god Pthna, whom the Greeks called Hephasteus. Most modern writers entertain about Cneoph the same or nearly the same views as were propounded by the Greek philosophers, and accordingly regard him as the eternal spirit, and as the author of all that is in the world. Cneoph is said to signify in the Coptic language the good spirit, like Agathodaemon. (Jablonsky, Panth. Aegypt. i. 4.) [L. S.]

COBIDAS, JOANNES, a Greek-Roman jurist, who seems to have lived shortly after the time of Justinian. His name is spelt in various ways, as Cobidas, Codibius, &c. He is one of the Greek jurists whose commentaries on the titles "de Procuratoribus et Defensisis" in the Digest and the Code (which titles, translated into Greek and arranged, constitute the eighth book of the Basilica) were edited by D. Ruhnenkienius and first published in the third and fifth volumes of Meermann's Theaurus. Extracts from the commentaries of Cobidius on the Digest are sometimes appended as notes to the Basilica, and sometimes the Scholiasts on the Basilica cite Cobidius. (Basil. ed. Heinbach, i. pp. 359, 784, ii. p. 10.) In Basil. (ed. Fabrot.) iii. p. 182, Codibius is found citing Cyrilius and Stephanus, contemporaries of Justinian, and in an extant passage does he refer to the Novellae of Leo; though Nic. Commennis (Pravol. Mystag. p. 379) mentions a Codibius, logotheta genici, who wrote scholia on the Novellae of Leo. Cobidius is cited by Balsamo. (Ad Nonnian. Plut. in Just. et Voel. Bild. Jur. Canon. p. 1118.)

Cobidus, the commentator on the Digest, is usually identified and may perhaps be the same with the Joannes Cubiudius (Codibius, Convidius, &c.) who wrote a Πολεμιστήρ, or treatise on punishments. Of this jurist and professor (antecessor) Suæres (Notit. Basil. § 27) says, that Ant. Augustinus possessed some works or portions of works in manuscript in the possession of the Novallar, which are preserved in the appendix to the Elogia of Leo and Constantinus. This appendix consists of legal writings, chiefly of the eighth and ninth centuries, and was published from a Parisian manuscript by C. E. Zachariae in his work entitled Anecdota. (Lips. 1843, p. 191.) (Zachariae, Hist. Jur. Graeco-Rom. p. 30; Heinbach, Anecdota, i. p. 186.) Pohl, ad Suæres. Notit. Basil. p. 137, n. (a); Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xii. p. 563.) [J. T. G.]

COCALUS (Κωσαλος), a mythical king of Sicily, who kindly received Daedalus on his flight from Crete, and afterwards killed Minos, who came with an army in pursuit of him. According to others, Minos was killed by the daughters of Cocalus. (Diod. iv. 78, 80; Hygin. Fab. 44; Paul. Aegypt. i.)

COCCEIA'NUS, SALVIUS, the son of the brother of the emperor Otho, was quite a youth at his uncle's death in A.D. 69. He was afterwards put to death by Domitian for celebrating his uncle's birthday. Plutarch calls him Cocceianus, but Cocceianus seems the correct form. (Tac. Hist. ii. 43; Plut. Oth. 16; Suet. Oth. 10, Domit. 10.)

COCECIUS, the name of a family which is first mentioned towards the latter end of the republic, and to which the emperor Nerô belonged. All the members of this family bore the cognomen Nerô.

COCCUS (Κόκκος), an Athenian orator or rhetorician, was, according to Suidas (s. n.), a disciple of Isocrates, and wrote rhetorical discourses (λόγος πράγματος). A passage of Quintilian (xii. 10) has been thought to imply that Coccus lived at an earlier period than Isocrates and even Lysias; but it seems that Quintilian is speaking of the comparative distinction of the orators he mentions, rather than of their time. [P. S.]

COCLEES, HORAT'IVIUS, that is, Horatius the "one-eyed," a hero of the old Roman lays, is said to have defended the Subiachian bridge along with
Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius against the whole Etruscan army under Porsena, while the Romans broke down the bridge behind them. When the work was nearly finished, Hostinius sent back his two companions, and withdrew alone the attacks of the foe, till the crash of the falling timbers and the shouts of the Romans announced that the bridge was destroyed. Then he prayed to father Tiberinus to take him and his arms in charge, and forthwith plunged into the stream and swam across to the city in safety amid the arrows of the enemy. The state raised a statue to his honour, which was placed in the comitium, and allowed him as much land as he could plough round in one day. The citizens, too, when the famine was raging, deprived themselves of food to support him. This statue was afterwards struck by lightning, and the Etruscan haruspices, who had been consulted respecting the prodigy, with voices of the glory of Rome, caused it to be placed on a lower spot, where the sun never shone upon it. But their treachery was discovered; they were put to death, and the statue was placed in a higher spot on the Vulcarnae above the Comitium, which brought great fortune to the state. This story is related by A. Gallus (iv. 5), and explains the fact why some writers speak of the statue being in the Comitium, and others in the Vulcarnae. The statue still existed in the time of Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 5. s. 11) —an irrefragable proof of the truth of the story! Few legends in Roman story were more celebrated than this gallant deed of Hostinius, and almost all Roman writers tell us,

"How well Hostinius kept the bridge"

In the brave days of old."

(Liv. ii. 10; Dionys. v. 24, 25; Val. Max. iii. 2, § 1; Flor. i. 10; Aurel. Vict. de Ver. Ill. 11; Plut. Popul. 16; Seneck. Ep. 120, &c.)

Polybius relates (vi. 55) the legend differently. According to his description, Hostinius defended the bridge alone, and perished in the river. Mr. Macaulay observes (Lays of Ancient Rome, p. 43), with much probability, that it is likely that there were two old Roman lays about the defence of the bridge; and that, while the story which Livy has transmitted to us was preferred by the multitude, the other, which ascribed the whole glory to Hostinius alone, may have been the favourite of the Horatian house (Compare Niebuhr, i. p. 542.)

The annexed coin, which bears on it the name of Cucusus, was doubtless struck by some member of the Horatian house, but at what time is uncertain. The obverse represents the head of Pallus, the reverse the Dioscuri. A facsimile of this coin, with the addition of the legend IMP. CARS. TRAJAN. AVG. GR. DAC. P. P. REST., that is, Imperator Caesar Trajanus Augustus Germanicus Dacicus Pater Patriae restitutus, was struck in the time of Trajan.
Cardinal Francesco Barbetini. This work begins with an account of the origin of Constantinople (Byzantium); after this the author treats in different chapters on the size and situation of that city; on the province of Adiabene (!); on the statues, public buildings of Constantinople, and the like subjects, in an extensive chapter; on the church of St. Sophie; and the work finishes with a short chronicle from the beginning of the world down to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks. If Codinus wrote this latter fact himself, he died of course after 1453; but the singular digression respecting the province of Adiabene is of itself a sufficient proof that an unknown hand has made some additions to it. This work of Codinus is likewise of great interest. The student, however, who should wish to make himself acquainted with that interesting subject, the antiquities of Constantinople, should begin with Petrus Gyllius, "Antiquitates Constantinopolitanae," of which a very good English translation was published by John Ball, London, 1729, 8vo., to which is added a "Description of the City of Constantinople as it stood in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius" (translated from "Notitiae Urbinas Imperialis"), with the notes of Panofila. After this the student will peruse with profit Du Pange's celebrated work, "Constantinopolis Christiana," where he will find numerous observations referring to Codinus.

CODONUS. [DARMS I.]

CODON. Suarez (Notit. Basil. § 27) states, that portions of the Paratitla of Codon, copied from a Cretan manuscript, were in the library of Ant. Augustinus. Paratitla are additions made by commentators, explaining difficulties and filling up deficiencies in one title (Epistola) from explaining what (ο) the law is, and where it is to be found (τό ηδί το); though Heimach (Anecdota, i. p. 220) refers the name to the book, not the author. Under Baphius we have mentioned a similar conjecture of Suarez; but Heimach (l. c.) thinks, that Baphius is a mere fabrication of Nin. Commensus Papadopoli, which he was induced to hazard under cover of the false reading Baphov for Φωσίου in a passage of the Basilica referring to the lex Fabia. (Basil. vii. p. 187.) [J. T. G.]

CODRATUS (Κύρσταρος), an ancient physician, saint, and martyr, who was born at Corinth in the third century after Christ. His parents, who were Christians and persons of rank and wealth, died while he was quite young. When he was grown up, he applied himself to the study and practice of medicine, and also took every opportunity of endeavouring to convert his fellow-citizens to Christianity. He was put to death, together with several other Christians, about the year 258, at the command of Jason, the governor of Greece at that time; and there is an interesting account of his martyrdom in the Acta Sanctorum, Mart. vol. ii. p. 5. His memory is observed on the 10th of March both by the Roman and Greek Churches. (Acta Sanct. l. c.; Mon. Greg. Graec. vol. iii. p. 11; Brevins, Nomenclator Sanctorum Professions Medicorum; v. S. Planudeus, De Medecis ad Medicinam Sanctitatis. [W. A. G.]

CODRUS (Κόρσταρος), the son of Melanthus, and king of Athens, where he reigned, according to tradition, some time after the conquest of the Peloponnese by the Dorians, about B.C. 1068. Once when the Dorians invaded Attica from Peloponnese, they were told by an oracle, that they should be victorious if the life of the Attic king was spared. The Dorians accordingly took the greatest precautions not to kill the king. But when Codrus was informed of the oracle, he resolved to sacrifice himself, and thus to deliver his country. In the disguise of a common man, he entered the camp of the enemy. There he began quarrelling with the soldiers, and was slain in the struggle. When the Dorians discovered the death of the Attic king, they abstained from further hostilities, and returned home. Tradition adds, that as no one was thought worthy to succeed such a high-minded and patriotic king, the kingly dignity was abolished, and a responsible archon for life was appointed instead. In our accounts of this transaction there are points which justify the belief, that when, after the death of Codrus, quarrels arose among his sons about the succession, the ephors availed themselves of the opportunity for stripping the chief magistrate of as much of his power as they could, and that they succeeded in instituting in the place of the kingly dignity, that of a responsible archon which was instituted. Mean accordingly succeeded his father as archon, and his brothers emigrated to Asia Minor, where they founded several of the Ionian colonies. (Herod. v. 76; Lycurg. c. Leotr. 20; Vell. Pat. i. 2; Justin, i. 6, &c.; Paus. iv. § 4, vii. 2; Strab. xiv. p. 633, &c.) [L. S.]

CODRUS, a Roman poet, a contemporary of Virgil, who ridicules him for his vanity. (Elog. vii. 22, x. 10.) According to Servius, Codrus had been mentioned also by Valgus in his elegies. Weichert (Poét. Lat. Rép. p. 497) conjectures, that this Codrus is the same as the Archias, the imitator of Timonides, who is ridiculed by Horace (Epist. i. 19. 15); whereas Bergk believes, that Codrus in Virgil and Valgus is a fictitious name, and is meant for the poet Cornicius. (Classical Museum, vol. i. p. 278.) Juvenal (1. i.) also speaks of a wretched poet of the name of Codrus (the Scholiast calls him Cordus), who wrote a tragedy "Thesorea." But it is generally believed, that in all the above cases Codrus is altogether a fictitious name, and that it is applied by the Roman poets to those poetasters who annoyed other people by reading their productions to them. [L. S.]

COELESTIUS, a Campanian by birth, the successor of Pope Boniface I., was ordained bishop of Rome on the 10th of September, A. D.
428, and retained this dignity until his death, in the month of July, 432. He was distinguished by the activity which he displayed in seconding the exertions of Cyril for procuring the deposition of Nestorius and the condemnation of his doctrines at the council of Ephesus in 431, and by the earnestness with which he strove to root out the Semi-pelagianism of Cassianus [CASSIANUS] from Gaul, Italy, and Britain. We must not omit to observe, that during this pontificate the jurisdiction of the Roman see was formally disowned by the clergy of Africa, who refused to admit the right of any transmarine ecclesiastical to interfere with the proceedings or alter the decrees of their synods. According to Prosper, Palladius, the first bishop of Scotland, which probably means Ireland, was consecrated by Caelestius.

Sixteen Epistles of Caelestius are extant, and being chiefly of an official character, are considered of importance by the students of church history. The whole series is given in the "Epistolae Pontificum Romanorum," published by Constant, Paris, fol. 1721 (vol. l. p. 267), in the great work of his predecessors, and in the ix. p. 287, and in all the large collections of councils. [W. R.]

COELESTIUS, the friend, associate, and partisain of Pelagius, whose followers were hence termed indifferently Pelagian or Caelestianus, is believed from an expression used by Prosper to have been born in Campania, although others maintain that he was a native of Ireland or of Scotland. He commenced his career as an advocate (auctoritas scholastica), but in early life, in consequence perhaps of bodily deformity, became a monk, and in a.d. 409 accompanied Pelagius to Carthage. Here he soon excised the suspicions of the restless ecclesiastics of that province, and was impeached of heresy before the council held in 412. Having been found guilty and excommunicated, he prepared to appeal to Pope Innocent against the sentence; but, feeling probably that success was hopeless before such a judge, refrained from prosecuting the matter further for the time being, and retired to Ephesus, where he was raised to the rank of presbyter, and passed five years in tranquillity. From thence, about the year 417, he passed over to Constantinople, but being speedily driven out of that city by Atticus, the enemy and supplanter of Chrysostom, he betook himself to Rome, and laying his whole case before Zosimus, the successor of Innocent, demanded that the allegations of his enemies should be fairly examined, and at the same time presented in writing a statement of the articles of his faith. After a full and formal hearing before all the bishops and clergy then present in Rome, the council of Carthage was rebuked for precipitation and want of charity, their decree was reversed, and Caelestius was reinstated in all his privileges, to the great indignation of the African prelates, who passed a solemn resolution adhering to their first judgment; and fearing that these proceedings would tend to promote the extension of Pelagian doctrines, applied for relief to the imperial court. Accordingly St. Augustin obtained from Honorius an edict, published on the 30th of April, 418, banishing Caelestius, Pelagius, and their followers, from Rome, and from the whole of the Roman dominions. Notwithstanding these strong measures, it would appear that Caelestius contrived to keep his ground, for similar denunciations were issued by Constantius (421) and Pope Caelestinius, and about 429 we find him expelled from Constantinople by a proclamation of Theodosius, granted in compliance with the solicitations of Marius Mercator. [MERCATOR.]

Caelestius is mentioned in the Acts of the Council of Rome held in 420, but from that time his name disappears from ecclesiastical history, and the close of his life is unknown. Caelestius was younger than Pelagius, and appears to have possessed a more bold, enthusiastic, and enterprising temperment than his master, and to have displayed more zeal and energy in the propagation and defence of their peculiar tenets, while he at the same time, with great acuteness, verbal subtlety, and dialectic skill, sought to establish these principles by metaphysical and a priori reasoning, rather than by induction from the observed habits of mankind. [AUGUSTINUS; PELAGIUS; ZOSIMUS.]

While still a young man, before he had embraced the views of Pelagius, Caelestius composed in his monastery three Epistolae on moral subjects, addressed to his parents. These were followed by his De Controversiis, De Oratione, and De Sacramentis, completed in the early part of his life, the last is remarkable for its ingenuity, and the transmission of sin, published, apparently, before the commentary of Pelagius on the Romans. Augustin, in his De Perfectione Justitiae, replies to a work which he believes to have proceeded from Caelestius, entitled, it would seem, Definitiones, or perhaps Rationationes, containing sixteen propositions to prove that man may be without sin. The Libellus Fidei, or Confession of Faith, presented to Zosimus, is known to us from the treatise of Augustin, De Peccato Originali, out of which Garnier has essayed to extract the original document in its perfect form. Finally, Augustin, De gestis Paulli et Paulinae (13. 14), quotes from several chapters of a piece by Caelestius, without, however, giving it a name. After his banishment from Rome, he addressed Epistles to his adherents; and, in like manner, when driven from Constantinople, he wrote to Zosimus, whose reply is still extant.

Of the above compositions none exist in an entire shape; but, a considerable portion, if not the whole, of the Rationationes and the Libellus Fidei, as noticed above, may be extracted from the replies of Augustin.

For the best account of the life and the most complete collection of the fragments of Caelestius, we are indebted to the Jesuit Garnier, in the dissertations prefixed to his edition of the works of Marius Mercator. Paris, fol. 1673. [W. R.]

COELIOMONTANUS. [CAELIOMONTANUS]

COELIUS. [CARLIUS.]

COENUS (Κώνως), a son of Polemocrates and son-in-law of Parmenion, was one of the ablest and most faithful generals of Alexander the Great in his eastern expedition. In the autumn of b.c. 334, when Alexander was in Caria, and sent those of his soldiers who had been recently married, to Macedonia, to spend the ensuing winter with their wives there, Coenus was one of the commanders who led them back to Europe. In the spring of the year following, Coeus returned with the Macedonians, and joined Alexander at Gordium. He commanded a portion of Alexander's army, and distinguished himself on various occasions. When Alexander had arrived at the river Hyphasis, and was anxious to push his conquests still further, Coenus was the first who had the boldness strongly to urge the necessity of returning, and the king was obliged to follow his advice. But a short time afterwards, when the Macedonian army had actually commenced its return, Coenus died of an illness, and was honoured by the king with a splendid burial. Alexander lamented his death, but is reported to have said, that Coenus had urged the necessity of returning so strongly, as if he alone had been destined to see his native country again. (Arr. Anab. i. 6, 14, 24, 25, iv. 16-18, 27, v. 16, 17, 21, 27, vi. 2-4; Cart. i. 10, iii. 9, iv. 15, 16, v. 4, vi. 3, 9, viii. 1, 10, 114, ix. 3; Diod. xiv. 37, 61.)

COERBERTADAS (Κοιντάρας), a Thessalian, commanded some Bœotian forces under Clearchus, the Spartan harmaet at Byzantium, when that place was besieged by the Athenians in B.C. 408. When Clearchus crossed over to Asia to obtain money from Thracian, and to collect forces, he left the command of the garrison to Helius, a Megarian, and Coerbertadas, who were soon after compelled to surrender themselves as prisoners when certain parties within the town had opened the gates to Alcibiades. (Clearch. ii. 12.) They were sent to Athens, but during the disembarkation at the Peiraeus, Coerbertadas contrived to escape in the crowd, and made his way in safety to Decelea. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. §§ 15-22; Diod. xiii. 67; Plut. Mor. 31.) In B.C. 400, when the Cynegic Greeks had arrived at Byzantium, Coerbertadas, who was going about in search of employment as a general, prevailed on them to choose him as their commander, promising to lead them into Thrace on an expedition of much profit, and to supply them plentifully with provisions. It was however almost immediately discovered that he had no means of supporting them for even a single day, and he was obliged accordingly to relinquish his command. (Xen. Anab. vii. 1. §§ 35-41.)

COES (Κόης), of Mytilene, attended Dareius Hystaspes in his Scythian expedition (see Clionto, E. H. ii. p. 313) as commander of the Mytilenean horse, and rode with his bridge of boats over the Danube, and so escaping of his own retreat. For this good counsel he was rewarded by Dareius on his return with the tyranny of Mytilene. In B.C. 501, when the Ionians had been instigated to revolt by Artaxerxes, Coes, with several of the other tyrants, was seized by Iatragorans at Myus, where the Persian fleet that had been engaged at Naxos was lying. They were delivered up to the people of their several cities, and most of them were allowed to go uninjured into exile; but Coes, on the contrary, was stoned to death by the Mytileneans. (Herod. iv. 92, 93, and 94; Dareius Hystaspes, p. 2.)

COLAEUS (Κολάεος), a surname of Amphipolis in the Attic demes of Myrrhinus, was derived from a mythical king, Colaeus, who was believed to have reigned even before the time of Cercops. (Paus. i. 31. § 3.)

COLAXI or COLAXES (Κόλαξις, Κόλαξ), an ancient king of the Scythis, a son of Targitos, who, according to the Scythian tradition, reigned about 1000 years previous to the expedition of Dareius into Scythia. (Herod. iv. 5, &c.; Val. Placc. vi. 48.)

COLCHAS or COLICHAS (Κόλχας, Κόλχας), a petty prince of Spain, who ruled over twenty-eight cities, and furnished supplies of troops to Scipio against Mago and Hasdrubal in B.C. 206. (Pol. xi. 20; Liv. xxxviii. 16.) In reward for his services, the Romans increased his dominions (Pol. xxii. 9); but in B.C. 197 he revolted, and drew away seventeen towns from their allegiance to Rome. The rebellion spread widely through Spain, but was eventually suppressed by M. Porcius Cato, Q. Minucius Thermus, and various other commanders, in B.C. 195. (Liv. xxxvi. 21, 26, 44, xxxviii. 3-5.)

COIΛIΑS (Κοιλάς), a surname of Aphroditos, who had a statue on the Attic promontory of Collas. (Paus. i. 1. § 4; comp. Herod. viii. 90; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 56.) Strabo (ix. p. 398) places a sanctuary of Aphroditos Collas in the neighbourhood of Anaphylustus.

[5. S.]

COIΛΛHYNUS, L. TARQUINIVS, the son of Egerius, who was the son of Aruns, the brother of Tarquinius Priscus. When the town of Collatia was taken by Tarquinius Priscus, Egerius was left in command of the place (Liv. i. 83), and there his son also resided, whence he received the surname of Collatins. He was married to Lucretia, and it was the rape of the latter by his cousin, Sex. Tarquinius, that led to the destruction of Tarquinius Superbus, and the establishment of the republic, B.C. 509. Collatins and L. Junius Brutus were the first consuls; but as the people could not endure the rule of any of the hated race of the Tarquins, Collatins was persuaded by his colleague and the other nobles to resign his office and retire from Rome. He withdrew with all his property to Lavinium, and P. Valerius Poplicola was elected in his place. (Liv. i. 57-60, ii. 2; Dionys. iv. 64, &c.; Dion Cass. Frag. 24, ed. Reimar; Cie. de Rep. ii. 25, de Off. iii. 10.)

COLLEGIA, POMPEIUS, consul with Cornelius Priscus, a. d. 93, the year in which Agricola died. (Tact. Agr. 44.)

COLLIUS (Κόλλωος). 1. A heretic, who seems nearly to have agreed in his opinions with the Manicheans. He was a presbyter of Alexandria. He was deposited by the council of Alexandria in A.D. 324, and died before A.D. 349. His act lasted no long time.

2. A heretic of the Macropistic sect, who lived at a later time. Some fragments of his writings are preserved in the acts of the great Lattorn council, a. d. 649. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. ix. 245, ed. Harlec.)

COLOTES (Κολότης), of Lampsacus, a hearer of Epicurus, and one of the most famous of his disciples, wrote a work to prove, "That it was impossible even to live according to the doctrines of the other philosophers" (Δια τυγ κατά των ἀληθῶν φιλόσοφων θυμάμαν ὑπὸ τοῦ κτήτου). It was dedicated to king Polemy, probably Philopator. In reference to this work, Athen. xii. 528, and of Lampsacus, an epilogue, to prove, "That it is impossible even to live pleasantly according to Epicurus," and a work entitled "Against Colotes." (Plut. Oper. pp. 1096 -1127.) The two works stand in the editions in this order, which should be reversed. It may be collected from Phtarch, that Colotes was clever, but vain, dogmatical, and intolerant. He made violent attacks upon Socrates, and other great philosophers. He was a great favourite with Epicurus, who used, by way of endearment, to call him Κολοτήρας and Κολοτράτης. It is also related by Phtarch, that Colotes, after hearing Epicurus discourse on the nature of things, fell on his knees before him, and besought him to give him instruction. He held, that it is unworthy of the truthfulness of a philosopher to use fables in his teaching, in which Cicero opposed. (De Repub. vii. 7, ed. Orelli, ap. Manzini, Sanea. Sop. 1. 2.) Some fragments of another work of Colotes, against the Lysis of Plato, have been recently discovered at Heracleaenum. [P. S.]

COLOTES (Κολότης). 1. A sculptor from the island of Paros, who assisted Phidias in executing the colossal of Zeus at Olympia, and left several beautiful works, principally in gold and ivory, in Elis, where he seems to have lived in banishment. He appears to belong to Ol. 84, &c. (v. c. 444), and is praised for his statues of philosophers. (Strab. vili. p. 897; Plin. H. N. xcv. 19, xxxv. 34; Paus. v. 20 § 1; Eustath. ad H. III. 683; Du Ck, Corp. Inscr. n. 24; 2. A painter, a contemporary of Timanthes, n. c. 396, mentioned by Quinilius (ii. 13). (L. u.)

COLUMELLA, L. JUNIUS MODERATUS, is known to us as the most voluminous and important of all the Roman writers upon rural affairs. The only particulars which can be ascertained with regard to his personal history are derived exclusively from incidental notices scattered up and down in his writings. We thus learn, that he was a native of Cadiz (x. 185); and since he frequently quotes Virgil, names Cornelius Celcus (1. § 14, iii. 17. § 4, &c.), and Seneca (iii. 3. § 5), as his contemporaries, and is himself repeatedly referred to by the elder Pliny, it is certain that he must have flourished during the early part of the first century of the Christian era. At some period of his life, he visited Syria and Africa (ib. 10. § 18); Rome appears to have been his ordinary residence (Praef. 29); he possessed a property which he calls Ceretium (iii. 3. § 3, comp. iii. 9. § 6), but whether situated in Etruria, in Spain, or in Sardinia, we cannot tell; and from an inscription found at Tarentum it has been conjectured that he died and was buried in that city. His great work is a systematic treatise upon agriculture in the most extended acceptance of the term, dedicated to an unknown Silvius, and divided into twelve books. The first contains general instructions for the choice of a farm, the position of the buildings, the distribution of the various duties among the master and his labourers, and the general arrangement of a rural establishment. The second is devoted to agriculture proper, the breaking up and preparation of the ground, and an account of the different kinds of grain, pulse, and artificial grasses, with the tillage appropriate for each; the third, fourth, and fifth are occupied with the cultivation of fruit trees, especially the vine and the olive; the sixth contains directions for choosing, breeding, and rearing oxen, horses, and mules, together with an essay on the veterinary art; the seventh discusses the same topics with reference to asses, sheep, goats, swine, and dogs; the eighth embraces precepts for the management of poultry and fishponds; the ninth is on bees; the tenth, composed in dactylic hexameters, treats of gardening, forming a sort of supplement to the Georgics (comp. Virg. Geor. iv.); in the eleventh are detailed the duties of a villicus, followed by a Calendarium Rusticum, in which the times and seasons for the different kinds of work are marked down in connection with the risings and settings of the stars, and various astronomical and atmospheric phaenomena; and the twelfth winds up the whole with a series of receipts for manufacturing different kinds of wine, and for pickling and preserving vegetables and fruits.

In addition to the above, we have one book "De Arboribus," which is of considerable value, since it contains extracts from ancient authorities now lost, and throws much light on the fifth book of the larger work, which appears under a very corrupt form in many of the MSS. Cassiodorus (Divin. Lect. 28) mentions sixteen books of Columella, from which some critics have imagined, that the tract "De Arboribus" was one of four written at an early period, presenting the outline or first sketch of the complete production. The MSS. from which Columella was first printed inserted the "De Arboribus" as the third book of the whole work, and hence in the older editions which is now the third book is marked as the fourth, and so on for all the rest in succession.

The Latinity of Columella is in no way inferior to that of his contemporaries, and belongs to the best period of the Silver Age. His style is easy and copious to exuberance, while the fondness which he displays for multiplying and varying his mode of expression is out of taste when we consider the nature of his theme, and not compatible with the close precision which we have a right to expect in a work professedly didactic. Although we miss the rare quaintness of Cato and the varied knowledge and highly cultivated mind of Varro, we find here a far greater amount of information than they convey, and we could persuade ourselves that the whole was derived from personal observation and experience, we might feel satisfied that our knowledge of the rural economy of that epoch was tolerably complete. But the extreme carelessness with which the Calendar has been compiled from foreign sources may induce the suspicion, that other matters also may have been taken upon trust; for no man that had actually studied the appearance of the heavens with the eye of a practical farmer could ever have set down in an almanac intended for the use of Italian husbandmen observations copied from paraphrases calculated for the latitudes of Athens and Alexandria.

With the exception of Cassiodorus, Servius, and Isidorus, scarcely any of the ancient grammarians mention Columella, whose works are mentioned and were unknown in the tenth century. The Edito Princeps was printed at Venice by Nie. Jansen, 1472, fol., in a collection of "Rei Rusticen Scripctorum" containing Cato, Terentius Varro, Columella, and Palladius Rutilius. The first edition in which the "Liberr de Arboribus" was separated from the rest was that supervisioned by Jucundus of Verona and published by Aldus, Venice, 1514, 4to. The most valuable editions are those contained in the "Scripctorum Rei Rustici veteres Latini," edited by Geem, 3 vols. 4to. Lipp. 1735, reprinted, with the addition of an important Paris MS., by Ernesti, Lipp. 1773; and the "Scripctores Rei Rustici" of J. C. Schneider, 4 vols. Bvo. Lipp. 1794. This last must be considered in every respect the most complete, and in the preface will be found a very full account of the different MSS. and of the gradual progress and improvement of the text.

The tenth book, under the title "J. Moderati Columellae Hortulii Commentarium," appeared in a separate form at Rome, about 1472, from the press of Adam Rot, and was frequently reprinted in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.
COMAZON.

Translations exist in English, Lond. 4to. 1745; in French by Cottereau, Paris, 4to. 1551; in Italian, by P. Lauro, Venice, 4to. 1564, and 1569, by Burchiello, 2 tom. 4to. Verona, 1808; and in German, among many others, by M. C. Curtius, 8vo., Hamburg, 1769. [W. R.]

COLUTHUS (Κόλυθος), one of the late Greek epic poets, was a native of Lycopolis in Upper Egypt, and flourished under the emperor Anastasius, at the beginning of the sixth century of our era. He wrote laudatory poems (Ἁγγείωμα ἢ ἑόρω), an heroic poem, in six books, entitled Καλλισμον, and another entitled Περίθεα. These are all lost, but his poem on "The Rape of Helen" (Ἐπεμναφος) was discovered, with Quintus Smyrnium, by the Cardinal Bessarion, in Calabria. It was first printed by Aldus, 8vo. (no date); more accurately, with ingenious conjectural emendations, by H. Stephens in his Poetae Graeci Primi Principis, Par. 1566, fol. Several Latin versions and reprints of the text appeared in the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, the most important of which is the edition of Io. Dan. Lornep, Leuward. 1747, 8vo. The latest and best editions are those of Bekker, Berl. 1816, 8vo., and Schaefer, Lips. 1825, 8vo. The poem, as it now stands, consists of 392 hexameter lines, and is an unmeaningful imitation of Homer. [P. S.]

COMANUS (Κομανος), one of the ministers of Ptolemy Physeon (who had been placed on the throne of Egypt in the room of his exiled brother, Philopator) for whom he was endeavoured by embassy and negotiation to obtain peace from Antiochus Epiphanes, b.c. 168, when the latter had gained possession of Egypt. (Pol. xxviii. 16; comp. Liv. Epit. 46; Val. Max. v. 1. § 1.) We hear of Comanus again in b. c. 162 as ambassador from Physcon to the Romans, to complain that Philometer refused to act up to their decree, by which Cyrus had been assigned to Physcon in the partition of the kingdom. (Pol. xxxi. 27, xxxii. 1; Diosd. xxxi. Exc. de Legat. 23, p. 626.)

COMAZON, one of the first commission of nine appointed by Theodosius and Valentinian, A. d. 429, to compile the Theodosian Code—a work which was carried into effect by a second commission of sixteen, consisting for the most part of new members, appointed A. d. 453. He was an ex [COMAZON, P. VALEBRIUS EUTYCHIANUS. Eutychianus, surnamed Comazon from his dissipation and buffoonery (τοῦτο γὰρ τὸνομά ἐκ μικαν νοον τῆσειτε τοὺς ένοφεια) was originally an actor and dancer at Rome. While serving in Thrace, he was degraded in consequence of misconduct, to the rank of a fower in the fleet, by Claudius Attalus, governor of the province, and having subsequently taken an active part in the conspiracy against Macrianus, he became the confidential adviser and right-hand man of Elagabalus, who was chosen prefect of the praetorium, raised to the rank of consul A. d. 229, twice nominated prefect of the city, and permitted to go out of the city to execute his revenge by uncovering the death of the officer by whom he had been disgraced. Comazon not only escaped the massacre which followed the death of his patron (A. d. 222), but was immediately after appointed prefect of the city for the third time—an honour never before enjoyed by any individual. COMMODIANUS.

Spoleto. He died shortly before Cicero composed his "Brutus," namely B.C. 45, in which he calls Cominius his friend, and praises his well-arranged, lively, and clear style of speaking.

(Asson. in CorNEL.; Cic. Brut. 78.)

7. Q. COMINIUS, one of Caesar's officers, was taken prisoner with L. Titius by Virgilius, a Pompeian commander, near Thapsus, in crossing over to Africa, B.C. 47. (Hist. B. Afr. 44, 46.)

8. L. COMINIUS PEDARIUS, appointed by Augustus to assist Messalla Corvinus in his superintendence over the aqueducts. (Frontin. de Aquaeduct. 99.)

9. C. COMINIUS, a Roman knight, was the author of a libellous poem against Tiberius, but was pardoned by the emperor on the entreaty of his brother, who was a senator, A.D. 24. (Tac. Ann. iv. 61.)

COMNIIUS, PONTIUS, a youth of great bravery and activity, who offered to go to the senate, when besieged in the Capitol by the Gauls, to convey the wish of the Roman army to Veli, that Camillus should be appointed dictator. He arrived at the Capitol in safety by floating down the Tiber in a tree. (Liv. v. 49; Plut. Cam. vii. 52.)

COMMUNIA/NUS, a Latin grammarian, who was intermediate between Donatus, whom he quotes, and Servius, by whom he is quoted (Virg. A. A. iii. 21, Georg. i. 215), and therefore belongs to the latter part of the fourth century. Large extracts from his work are to be found in Chari- sius, and a few fragments in Lindemann, Grammat. Inedit. Lat. i. Zitau, 1822, and in Mai, ClassiciAnt. ex CodicibusVolcanis, vol. v. p. 150. [W. R.]

COMNIUS, king of the Atrebates, was advanced to that dignity by Caesar. When Caesar's projected invasion of Britain became known to the inhabitants, ambassadors from various states came to him. Commius, whose fidelity Caesar had great confidence, and whose influence in Britain was great, was sent back with them, accompanied by a small body of cavalry. He was seized and cast into chains by the Britons, but was released when, after a defeat, they found it expedient to sue for peace. (Caes. B. G. iv. 21, 27, 83.) In A.D. 53, we find him serving under Caesar against the Menapii (vi. 6); but towards the close of 52, when an extensive league was formed by the Gauls for the purpose of relieving Alesia, his patriotism proved stronger than his gratitude. He joined the confederates, and was one of those to whom the chief command was assigned. (vii. 78, 79, &c.) In the course of the ensuing winter, an insurrectional attempt was made by T. Labianus to assassinate him. (viii. 23.) We find him again in 51 one of the two leaders of the confederacy formed by the Belgae and the neighbouring tribes. (For an account of the operations which ensued, see B. G. viii. 7-28.) When the Atrebates were reduced to subjection, Commius continued to carry on a predatory warfare against the Romans, but, having lost a great part of his men in an engagement, he made his submission to Antonius. (vii. 47, 48.) [C. P. M.]

COMMÓN/NA/DUS, the Christian composer of a prosaic poem against the Pagan divinities, divided into eighty sections, and entitled Instruenciones exterioris Conditum Deos pro Christiana Disciplina. Of these the first thirty-six are addressed to the Gentiles with the object of gaining them over to the true faith; in the nine which follow an attempt is made to bring home conviction to the obstinate ignorance of the Jews; the remainder are devoted to the instruction of catechumens and penitents. Whatever knowledge we possess with regard to this author is derived exclusively from his work. The general style and the peculiar words occasionally employed lead us to infer that he was of African extraction. It is expressly and repeatedly declared, that for a long period he was heathen, but was converted by perusing the Scriptures (e. g. Praef. 5, Instruc. xxvi. 24, lat. 1); while the epistle Gaetanum, which he applies to himself, may either indicate that he was connected with the city of Gaza in Palestine, or, more probably, that he was indebted for support to the treasury of the church. Doubts have been entertained with regard to the period when he flourished. Rigaltius concluded, from a conjectural emendation of his own upon the text of an obscure passage (Instruc. xxxvi. 5), that it contained an allusion to pope Sylvester (A.D. 314-335), the contemporary of Constantine the Great; but the careful and accurate researches of Cave and Dodwell have clearly proved that Commodianus belongs to the third century (comp. Instruc. vi. 6); and may with tolerable certainty be placed about A.D. 270.

The Instruenciones display much devotion and a fervent zeal for the propagation of the Gospel, but from their harshness, dryness, and total want of all poetical fire, they present few attractions as literary productions. The versification is curious, since it exhibits an early specimen of the Versus Politici, in which, while an attempt is made to imitate the general rhythm of some ancient measure, the rules of quantity are to a great extent neglected. Thus the following lines from the Praefatio are intended for didactic hexameters:

Praefatio nostra viam erundì demonstrat,
Respectaque bonum, cum vernit saeculi meta,
Asternum fieri: quod discurrent inasica corda.

The taste for acrostics also is largely developed: the initials of the twenty-six concluding verses, when read backwards, form the words Commodianus Mencianus Cornulus, and in like manner the general subject and contents of each chapter are expressed by the first letters of the opening lines.

The Instructions of Commodianus were first published by Rigaltius at Toul (Tullum Lucorum), 4to.1650. They were subsequently printed at the end of the edition of Cyprian by Priorius, Paris, 1669, fol.; in the Bibliotheca Patrum Lugdun. vol. xxviii.; in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. iii, p. 621; and in an independent form, by Schurzfeiisch, Vitenburg, Saxox. 4to.1704. [W.R.]

COMMODUS, the name of a family of the Ceveni under the emperors.

1. L. CRONIUS COMMODUS, appears in the Pasti as consul under Vespasian, A.D. 78.

2. CRONIUS COMMODUS, who according to some was named also Verus, according to others L. Aurelius, according to many Annius, descended from a noble family of Etruria or Faenia (Spartian. Adr. Ver. 2), was the father of

3. L. CRONIUS COMMODUS, otherwise called L. Aurelius Verus, who was adopted by Hadrian when that emperor, feeling that his health was sinking under the attacks of prostrated disease, deemed it expedient to select an assistant and successor. The new prince from that time forward, as we infer from inscriptions and Fasti, laid aside his former appellations, and, passing into the gens Aelia, was styled L. AELIUS VERUS CAESAR, being the first individual on whom the title of Caesar was bestowed to indicate the next heir to the imperial throne. Of the early life of Aelius Caesar we know nothing except that he attracted the attention and gained the favour of Hadrian by his personal beauty and literary accomplishments, although the son-in-law of Nigrinus, who was put to death as a traitor. The precise date of his adoption is a disputed point among chroniclers (see Tillemont and Eckhel), some, on the authority of Spartianus, declaring for A.D. 135; while others with greater probability concludes, from inscriptions and coins, that it took place the year following. He is set down in the Fasti as consul for A.D. 136, under the name of Colonius Commodus, which seems to prove that the ceremonies of adoption had not at all events been completed at the commencement of that year; while on the coins of his second consulate, which belong to A.D. 137, we find him designated as L. AELIUS CAESAR, and invested with the tribunicia potestas. Soon after his elevation, he was nominated governor of Pannonia, returned from his province in the course of 137, died suddenly on the 1st of January, 138, and was interred in the mausoleum of Hadrian.

Aelius Caesar, according to the testimony of his biographer, Spartianus, was a man of comely features, graceful bearing, and noble aspect, but in all other respects deeply stamped with the impress of mediocrity. He displayed moderate abilities as a statesman, governed his province respectably, was considered a tolerably good general, and although somewhat addicted to the pleasures of the table and other luxurious indulgences, maintained a decent character in his private life and social relations. His health was so wretched, that Hadrian is said to have speedily repented of the choice he had made, declaring that he had leaned for support upon a falling wall, and had thrown away the large sums lavished on the soldiers and people in largesse and shows in honour of the adoption. Aelius Caesar left behind him one daughter, Fabia, and one son, namely

4. L. CHONICUS COMMODUS, who was born at Rome on the 15th of December, A.D. 130. Upon the adoption of his father by Hadrian, he passed into the gens Aelia, and was entitled L. CECIUS AELIUS AURELIUS COMMODUS. Again, after the death of his father, he was, in pursuance of the command of Hadrian, adopted, along with M. Aurelius, by Antoninus Pius on the 25th of February, A.D. 138, and thus became L.CHONICUS AELIUS AURELIUS COMMODUS ANTONINUS. During the lifetime of Pius he enjoyed no peculiar distinction except the appellation RITUS AUGUSTUS in 160 he was quaeator, and in the year following consul, an honour which he enjoyed for a second time, along with his brother by adoption, in 161. After the death of Antoninus Pius, which took place in March, 161, he was invested with the titles of CAESAR and AUGUSTUS, and by the favour of the new sovereign admitted to a full participation in all the imperial dignities. At the same time, M. Aurelius transferred to him the name of VERUS and so Hadrian (ap. Vopisc. Saturn. c. 8); but Cardinal Noris rejects Verus, because it does not appear in inscriptions and Fasti.

COMMODUS, L. AURELIUS, son of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina (see genealogical table prefixed to Antoninus Pius), was born at Lamia on the last day of August, A.D. 161, a few months after the death of Antoninus Pius, and this was the first of the Roman emperors to whom the title of PYPHAGROGEIES could be correctly applied. Faustina at the same time gave birth to a twin son, known as Antoninus Geminus, who died when four years old. The nurture and education of Commodus were watched and superintended from infancy with anxions care; and from a very early age he was surrounded with the most distinguished preceptors in the various departments of general literature, science, and philosophy. The honours heaped upon the royal youth as he advanced towards manhood have been accurately chronicled by his biographers. He received the appellation of CAESAR along with his younger brother Annius Verus on the 12th of October, A.D. 170. On the 5th of December, 172, Commodus and I Verus celebrated their triumph over the Parthians; he was styled GERMANIACUS on the 15th of October, 172; in 175, on the 20th of January, he was admitted a member of all the sacerdotal colleges; on the 19th of May he left the city, having been summoned in all haste to Germany in consequence of the news which had arrived from Syria of the rebellion of Avidius Cassius; on the 7th of July he was invested with the manly gown, Princeps JUVENILIS, and nominated consular-elect; he then accompanied his father to the East, and, during his absence from Rome, Sarmatians was added to his other titles; on the 27th of November, 176, he was saluted Imperator; on the 25th of December, he shared in the triumph celebrated over the Germans, and was assumed as colleague in the tribunian power; on the 1st of January, 177, he entered on his first consulsiphip; in the same year he married Bruttia Crispina, daughter of Bruttius Praesus, was hailed as Augustus and Pater Patriae, and thus at the age of 16 was admitted to a full participation in all the imperial dignities except the chief pontificate, which, according to the principle maintained inviolate until the reign of Balbinus and Pupienus [BALBINUS], could be held by one individual only. On the 5th of August he set forth to take part in the war then raging on the Upper Danube, which, as is mentioned elsewhere [M. Aurelius], was prosecuted withsignal success until the death of M. Aurelius, on the 17th of March, 180.

Impatient of hardship and eager to indulge without restraint in the pleasures of the capital, Commodus, disregarding alike the last injunctions of his size and the earnest advice of the trusty counsellors to whose care he had been consigned, concluded a hasty and therefore uncertain peace with the barbarians, who in their depressed and enfeebled condition might by a vigorous effort have been crushed for ever. In autumn he reached Rome, where his authority was as fully and freely acknowledged by the senate, the provincials, and the people, as it had been by the legions which he commanded in person and the armies of the distant provinces. No prince ever commenced a career of power under fairer auspices. The love and veneration entertained by men of every condition for the father had descended like an inheritance on the son, and although some who knew him well and had marked his boyhood might whisper distrust and fear, such murmurs were drowned by the general acclamations which greeted his first appearance as emperor. Nor were the hopes of men for a while disappointed. Grave and calculating statesmen might feel displeasure and alarm at the reckless profusion which characterized the very commencement of the new reign; but since a large portion of the army had been lavished upon the soldiers and the people, the lower orders at least of the community were enthusiastic in their attachment to the new ruler. This state of things did not endure long. A formidable plot against his life was organized (A. D. 183) by his sister Lucilla, jealous, it was believed, of the superior influence and position of Crispina; but the scheme failed in consequence of the awkwardness of the assassin, who, instead of dealing the fatal blow at the proper moment, put the prince upon his guard by exclaiming as he rushed forward, “The senate sends thee this.” The event seems to have awakened the slumbering ferocity of a temper which was accustomed to butcher forthwith frightful vengeances, and raging from that time forward without control, especially against the members of that body in which the conspiracy was said to have originated, rendered the remainder of his life an unbroken tissue of sanguinary excesses. Every pretext was seized for the exhibition of the most savage cruelty; false accusations, vague suspicions, great wealth, high birth, distinguished learning, or any conspicuous virtue, were sufficient to point out and doom his victims, long lists of whom have been preserved by Lampadius, including nearly all who had risen to fame and fortune under M. Aurelius, with the exception of Pertinax, Pompeianus, and Victorinus. [PERTINAX; POMPEIANUS; VICTORINUS.] All other passions were indulged with the same freedom as the thirst for blood. Resigning the reins of government into the hands of the various favourites who followed each other in rapid succession [see PAPINUS; CLEANDER; LARTUS; ECLEPTUS], he abandoned himself without interruption to the most shameless and beastly debauchery. But while devouring in glutony the resources of the empire and wallowing in every description of sensual filth, he was at the same time the slave of the most childish vanity, and sought for popular applause with indefatigable activity. He disdained not to dance, to sing, to play the charioteer and the buffoon, to disguise himself as a pedlar or a horse-dealer, and to essay his skill in the practical pursuits of the humble artisan. Frequently he would appear and officiate as a sacrificing priest, and eagerly assisted in all the orgies of foreign superstition, celebrating the rites of Iuis, of Anubis, of Serapis, or of Mithra, in all their folly and all their horror. His pride and boast, however, was his skill in the use of martial weapons. This he sought not to display against the enemies of his country in the field, but he fought as a gladiator upwards of seven hundred times, and slew as many thousands of wild beasts in the amphitheatre with bow and spear. Other emperors had sought or accepted the compliment of having one month named after themselves, but Commodus decreed that the whole twelve should be designated by the epithets and titles which he had at different periods assumed, and that they should be arranged and emblazoned in the following order:—Amazons, Inexstis, Felix, Plus, Lucius, Aelius, Aurelius, Commodus, Augustus, Hercules, Romanus, Exsuperatorius, ordaining also that the happy epoch during which he had sojourned on earth should be distinguished as Seculum aureum Commodiannum, the nation as Commodiana, the senate as Commodorum, the armies as Commodiani, and the eternal city itself as Colonia Commodiana. At length the miserable craving could be no longer appeased by the homage and flatteries which a mere mortal might claim. Long ere this, indeed, the Greeks had been wont to compare their rulers, both domestic and foreign, to deities, and the Romans had sometimes deliberately hinted at some such resemblance by the devices stamped on the reverse of the coins of their Augusti. But as yet no inscription had appeared openly ascribing divine attributes to living princes, nor had any symbol appeared on their medals which could openly and directly convey such impious meaning. It was left for Commodus to break through these decent restrictions; his exploits in the slaughter of wild beasts gave him the name of the Thyrtopian hero; he demanded that he should be worshipped as Hercules, and hence from the year 191 we find a multitude of coins on which he is represented in the attire of the immortal son of Alcmene, with the epigraph of Hercules Commodiannus or Hercules Romanus. His statues also, we are told by the historians of the day, were clad in the appropriate robes; sacrifices were publicly offered as to a present God; when he went abroad the lion’s hide and other insignia were borne before him; and, to crown the whole, a number of unhappy wretches were incensed in cases terminating in serpent-tails, and these he slaughtered with his club, as if they had been the giants warring against heaven. After having escaped many plots provoked by noxious tyranny, he at length came to a sitting end. He had a mistress named Marcia, to whom he was deeply attached, and whom he especially loved on being banished to the island of Amasea. Hence the epithet "Amaseus" was frequently assumed by himself: the name Amaseus, as we have already seen, was attached to the first month, and he displayed his own person in the amphitheatre arrayed in the Amasean garb. The first of January, 193, was to have been signalized by a spectacle which would have thrown into the shade the insults previously heaped upon the senate and the people, for Commodus had determined to put to death the two consuls-elect, Q. Sothis Falco and C. Julius Ercutius Claurus, and to come forth himself as consul at the opening of the year, not marching in robes of state from the palace to the capitol at the head of the senate, but in the uniform of a secutor, followed by a band of gladiators issuing from their training-school. This project he communicated to Marcia, who earnestly implored him to abandon a design so fraught with disgrace and danger, and her remonstrances were warmly seconded by Laetus and Eclcectus, the one proconsul of the praetorians, the other imperial chamberlain. These counsellors were dismissed with wrath from the presence of the prince, who retired to indulge in his wonted sates, having previously inscribed on his tablets a long catalogue of persons who were to be put to death that night, the names of Marcia, Laetus, and Eclcectus appearing at the head of the list. This document was found by a favourite child, who entered the apartment while Commodus was asleep, and was carried by him in sport to Marcia, who at once perceived its import. She immediately communicated the discovery to Laetus and Eclcectus. The danger was imminent, and, unless promptly met, inevitable. Their plans were quickly matured and quickly executed. That evening poison was administered, and its operation proving so slow as to excite apprehensions of its efficiency, Narcissus, a celebrated athlete, was introduced, and by him Commodus was strangled on the night of December the 31st, A. D. 192, in the thirty-second year of his age and the thirteenth of his reign. When the news of his death, at first cautiously attributed to apoplexy, was spread abroad, the intelligence diffused universal joy among all ranks except the guards, who had been permitted to revel in indulgence and luxury and could scarcely expect again to find a master so indulgent and liberal. When his successor, Pertinax [Pertinax], repaired next morning before daylight to the senate, that venerable body, while greeting their new sovereign, poured forth a string of curses upon the dead tyrant in a sort of strange chant, the words of which have been preserved by Lampridius, declared him a public enemy, and, being unable to vent their rage upon the living man, begged that his body might be dragged, like that of a criminal, through the streets with a hook, and cast into the Tiber,—a request with which Pertinax, to his credit, refused to comply, and the corpse was decently interred in the mausoleum of Hadrian.

We seldom meet in history with a character which inspires such pure and unmixed detestation as that of Commodus. While his vices and crimes were incredible, revolting, they were rendered if possible more loathsome by his contemptible meanness and weakness. The most grinding oppression was combined with the most childish vanity, the most savage cruelty with the most distasteful cowardice. He hated, persecuted, and massacred the senate and the nobles, and at the same time eagerly drank in their most disgusting flatteries. He slew thousands and tens of thousands of wild beasts, but his arrows were shot and his darts were hurled from behind a screen of network which protected his person from the possibility of risk. He butchered hundreds of his fellow-men in gladiatorial combats; while he was clad in the impenetrable armour and wielded the heavy blade of a secutor, his antagonists had no defences except weapons of lead or tin; and when as, Hercules, he crushed with his club the unhappy creatures dressed up to resemble the monstrous progeny of Earth, the rocks which they hurled at their assailant were formed of sponge. After examining the ample records preserved of his career, we shall be unable to find a trace of one generous action or one kindly feeling, to discern a single ray of human sympathy to relieve the perturbing blackness of his guilt. Dion, indeed, represents him as naturally of a weak and extremely simple temper; as one who easily received impressions, and whose crimes were to be attributed rather to the artful advice of evil counsellors acting upon a timid and yielding disposition, than to any inherent depravity; and assures that he erred at first from ignorance of what was right, and gliding by degrees into a habit of doing evil, became gradually familiar with deeds of shame and wickedness. But had this been the case, the lessons so carefully inculcated in early life would never have been so rapidly and for ever obliterated. We feel more inclined to give credit to the assertion of Lampridius, who declares that from his earliest boyhood he displayed evident proofs of dark passions and a corrupt heart, a propensity to indulge freely in every low and dissolute pleasure, and utter indifference to human suffering and life.

It is almost needless to remark, that Commodus paid no attention to foreign policy nor to the government and regulation of the provinces, except in so far as they might be made to minister to his profusion and profligacy. The integrity of the empire was however maintained, and the barbarians repulsed from the Dacian frontier by the skill and valour of Claudius Albinus and Pescennius Niger, the same who after the death of Pertinax contested the throne with Septimius Severus. A still more serious disturbance arose in Britain; for the northern tribes having forced a passage across the wall of Antonine, defeated the Roman troops who opposed their progress, slew their leader, and laid waste the more peaceable districts far and wide. But Ulpian Marcellus having assumed the chief command, the Caledonians were speedily driven back, the war was successfully terminated about A. D. 194, Commodus was saluted Imperator for the seventh time, and added Britannicus to his other titles.

7. Theodora, married Constantine Angeli.

A daughter, married Alexis Protostratos, son of Joannes Artoch, or Axuchus, the excellent Turkish minister of the emperors Calo-Joannes and Manuel.

1. Alexis, titular Emperor, born in 1106, in Macedonia; died before his father, probably in 1142, at Attalina, the capital of Pamphylia; his wife, whose name is unknown, survived him.
2. Andronicus, Sebastocrator; died shortly after his brother Alexis, and likewise before his father; his wife was Irene, at whose persuasion Constantine Manassos wrote his poetical Annals.
3. Maria, married (Calusina), the haughty concubine of the emperor Andronicus Comnenus, from whom she had no children.
4. Theodora; married Constantine Angeli, the founder of the family of Angeli.
5. Euodxia; first husband unknown; after his death concubine of Andronicus Comnenus, afterwards emperor; married Mich. Gabra, about 1178.

Further issue, see below III.

A daughter, married Alexis Protostrator, son of Protesciarius, Protosebastus; governed the empire for the minor, Alexis II.; his arrogance insupportable to many of the Greek nobles, who declared for Andronicus Comnenus; blinded and castastred by Andronicus; died in prison in 1183.

From above. IV. Further Issue of the Emperor Calo-Imoans. Manuel, Emperor [Manuel]; born about 1120, began to reign 1143, died 1180; married

1. Bertha (in 1143), afterwards called Irene, daughter of Berengar, Count of Sulzbach, and niece of Conrad III., Emperor of Germany, who died about 1158; 2. Maria, afterwards called Xene, daughter of Raymond, prince of Antioch; put to death by Andronicus I. in 1183; 3. Conombine, Theodora Comnena (Caldina). |

| 4. Alexis, illegitimate, Sebasteorator; married Irene, natural daughter of Andronicus I. Comnena and Theodora Comnena; destined to succeed Andronicus I., by whom he was afterwards blinded for conspiracy; though blind, created Caesar by Isaac II. for some time a monk; a learned and highly gifted man, of whom no issue is known. |

From above. V. Issue of Isaac Sebasteorator, founder of the Imperial branch of the Comneni of Trebizond.

The history of the Emperors of Trebizond was almost entirely unknown till the publication of Professor Fallmerayer's Geschichte des Kaiserthums von Trebizond, one of the most important historical productions of our days. The accounts which Du Cange and Gibbon give of these emperors is in many respects quite erroneous; but these writers are to be excused, since they could not avail themselves of several Oriental works perused by Fallmerayer, and especially of two Greek MSS. which the German professor discovered at Venice, viz., A Chronicle of the imperial palace at Trebizond, by Panaretus, and a work on Trebizond by the celebrated Cardinal Bassaris. It would not be compatible with the plan of the present work to give the lives of the Emperors of Trebizond, but it has been thought advisable to give at least their genealogy, and thus to assist those who should wish to investigate the history and tragical fall (in 1462) of the last independent remnant of Greek and Roman power. As there are no genealogical tables in Fallmerayer's work, the writer has brought together all his separate statements respecting the genealogy of the family, and the following genealogical table of the Comneni of Trebizond is thus the first that has yet been printed.

V. Isaac Sebasteorator, Caesar, third son of Alexis I., and third brother and favourite of the Emperor Calo-Imoans. In consequence of some slanders against his character, he fled to the Sultan of Iconium, with his son Joannes, returned, enjoyed again the confidence of Calo-Imoans, lost it once more, was imprisoned, but released by the emperor Manuel, and died in possession of the highest civil and military honours, leaving behind him the reputation of having been one of the most virtuous and able men of his time. Died after 1143.

4. Thamar.

5. Alexis, and 6. Irene; both illegitimate. Irene married Alexis, the illegitimate son of the emperor Manuel.

1. Alexius I., first Emperor of Trebizond; born 1182; carried with his younger brother, by their aunt Thamar, to Trebizond, thence to the Caucausus; conquered Trebizond and a great part of Asia Minor in 1204; emperor in the same year; died in 1222; married Theodore.

2. David, a great general; his brother's chief support; died without issue, probably in 1215.

1. A daughter; married Andronicus I. Cidon Comnenus (II.),* Emperor, of unknown parentage, who succeeded Alexius I., and reigned 13 years; died probably in 1235.

2. (III.) Ioannes I. Aruchus, Emperor; succeeded Andronicus I. probably in 1235; reigned 3 years; died probably in 1238.

3. (IV.) Ioanoussis; Emp. succ. his father probably in 1238; confined in a convent shortly afterwards by his uncle Manuel.

3. (V.) Manuel I., Emperor; succ. his nephew Joannicus, probably in 1238; formed an alliance with the Mongols; reigned 25 years; died March, 1263; marri. I. Anna Xylogale; 2. Irene; 3. Princess of Iberia.

1. (VI.) Andronicus II. Emperor, succeeded his father Manuel in 1263; reigned three years; died probably in 1266.

2. (VII.) George, Emperor, succeeded his brother Andronicus II. probably in 1266; reigned 14 years; died probably in 1280.

3. (VIII.) Ioannes II., Emperor, succeeded his brother George, probably in 1280; reigned 18 years; died in 1297 or 1298; married, in 1292, Eudokia, daughter of Michael Palaeologus, emperor of Constantinople.

4. (IX.) Alexis II., Emp.; born in 1283; succ. his father Ioannes II. in 1297 or 1298; died in 1330; married a princess of Iberia.

5. (X.) Andronicus III., Emp.; succ. his father Alexis II. in 1330; reigned 20 months.

6. (XI.) Manuel II., Emp., eight years old; succ. his father Andronicus III.; deposed in 1333 by his uncle Basil.

2. (XII.) Basil I. Emp.; sent to Constantinople; returned; deposed his nephew Manuel II. in 1338; died in 1340; married, I. Irene (XII.); natural daughter of Andronicus II., emperor of Constantinople; repudiated soon afterwards; seized the crown in 1340; reigned 15 months; deposed and sent to Constantinople by Anna (XIV.); 2. Irene, a lady of Trebizond, by whom he had issue.

3. (XIII.) Anna; first a man, then queen of Imerina; wrested the crown from Irene in 1341; stripped by Ioannes III. (XV.);

6. (XIV.) Anna; sent to Constantinople; first a man, then queen of Imerina; wrested the crown from Irene in 1341; stripped by Ioannes III. (XV.);

7. (XV.) Ioannes III., Emp.; born about 1322; wrested the crown from the empress Anna in September, 1342; confined in a convent in March 1344 by the nobles who put his father Michael on the throne.

1. (XVII.) Alexis III. Ioannes, Emp.; born 1338; succeeded Michael in 1349; died 1350 (?); married Theodora Cantacuzena; humbled by the Genoese; under him lived Panaretus, mentioned above.

2. Calo.-

3. Maria, married in 1351 Kutha Bey, chief of the White Horde.

4. Theodora, married in 1357 Hajj Emir, chief of Chalybians.

* The Roman numerals indicate the order in which the members of the family succeeded to the crown.
I. (XVIII.) Manuel, Emperor, born 1364, Caesar 1376; succeeded his father 1390 (?); submitted to Timur; died 1412; married Eudoxia, daughter of David, king of Georgia.

2. Eudoxia, married James or Zetines, a Turkish emir, and after his death John V. Palaeologus, Emperor of Constantinople.

3. Anna, married Bagrat VI., king of Georgia.

4. A daughter, married Taharan or Zahrani, emir of Arisinga.

(XIX.) Alexis IV., Emperor; succeeded his father in 1412; murdered between 1445 and 1449; married a Cantacuzænian princess.

(XX.) 1. Joannes IV. (Calo-Joannes), Emp.; deposed and killed his father between 1445 and 1449; paid tribute to the Turks; died 1458; married a daughter of Alexander, king of Iberia.

2. Alexander, married a daughter of Gutteluzi, prince of Lesbos.

3. (XXII.) David, the last Emperor of Trebizond; seized the crown from his nephew Alexis V., in 1458; married: 1. Maria Theodora, of the house of the Theodori, princes of Gothia in the Crimea; 2. Helena (Irene), daughter of Mattheus, and granddaughter of John VI. Cantacuzenus, emperor of Constantinople; deposed by Sultan Mohammed II. in 1482; exiled with his family to Serres, near Adrianople; put to death with nearly all his children by order of the Sultan, probably in 1486.

(XXI.) 1. Alexis V., born 1454; succeeded his father 1458; deposed in the same year by his uncle David; put to death by Sultan Mohammed II. after 1462.

— George, the youngest; said to have adopted the Mohammedan religion; his life was spared; he married a Turkish chief.

A branch of the Commenian family became extinct at Rome in 1551; another branch flourished in Savoy, and became extinct in 1784. Demetrius Commenus, a captain in the French army, whose descendants are still alive, pretended to be descended from Niphonius, one of the sons of the last emperor of Trebizond, David, whose life, according to him, was spared by Mohammed, and his parentage and name were recognized by letters-patent of Louis XVI., king of France. But his claims will hardly stand a critical examination, notwithstanding many so-called authentic documents which he published in a rather curious work, "Précis historique de la Maison Impériale des Comméniens, avec Filiation directe et reconnue par Lettres-Patentes du Roi du mois d'Avril, 1782, depuis David, dernier emperëur de Trebizond, jusqu'à Damiostri Comméné," Amsterdam, 1784, 8vo. (Fallmerayer, Geschichte des Kaiserhauses von Trepezont.) [W. P.]

COMUS (Κομος), occurs in the later times of antiquity as the god of festive mirth and joy. He was represented as a winged youth, and Philostratus (Tom. ii. 2) describes him as he appeared in a painting, drunk and lauging after a repast, his head sunk on his breast; he was slumbering in a standing attitude, and his legs were crossed. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. ii. p. 224.) [L. S.]

CONCOLERUS (Κονκόλερος), the Greek name of Scandinapus. (Polyb. Frug. ix.) Other forms of the name are Κονκόλερος (see Suid. s. v.) and Θωνκόταλενος. [E. R.]

CONCOLITANUS (Κονκόλτανος), a king of the Gallic people called Gaesati, and colleague of Anoricus, together with whom he made war against the Romans, b. c. 235. [ANORICUS.] In the battle in which they were defeated, Concilitanus was taken prisoner. (Polyb. ii. 31.) [E. E.]

CONCORDIA, a Roman divinity, the personification of concord. She had several temples at Rome, and one was built as early as the time of Furius Camillus, who vowed and built it in commemoration of the reconciliation between the patricians and plebeians. (Plut. Cam. 42; Or. Fest. i. 659.) This temple, in which frequent meetings of the senate were held, but which appears to have fallen into decay, was restored by Livia, the wife of Augustus, and was consecrated by her son, Tiberius, a. d. 9, after his victory over the Pannonians. (Suet. Tib. 20; Dion Cass. iv. 17.) In the reign of Constantine and Maxentius, the temple was burnt down, but was again restored. A second temple of Concordia was built by Cn. Flavins on the area of the temple of Vesta (Liv. ix. 46, xl. 19; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 6), and a third was vowed by L. Manlius during a sedition commotion among his troops in Gaul, and was afterwards erected on the Capitoline hill. (Liv. xxii. 33.) Concordia is represented on several coins as a matron, sometimes standing and sometimes sitting, and holding in her left hand a cornucopia, and in her right either an olive branch or a patera. (Comp. Ov. Pаст. vi. 91; Varr. L. L. v. 73, ed. Müller; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 23; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. ii. p. 160.) [L. S.] CONIANUS, sex. QUINTILIUS, and sex. QUINTILIUS MAXIMUS, two brothers remarkable for their mutual affection, high character, learning, and military skill, and wealth, who flourished under the Antonines. They were consuls together in A.D. 151; were subsequently joint governors, first of Achaea, and afterwards of Pannonia; they addressed a joint epistle to M. Aurelius, to which he gave a rescript (Dig. 38. tit. 2. s. 16. § 4); they wrote jointly a work upon agriculture frequently quoted in the Geoponica; and, having been inseparable in life, were not divided in death, for they both fell victims at the same time to the cruelty of Commodus, guiltless of any crime, but open to the suspicion that, from their high fame and probity, they must have felt disgusted with the existing state of affairs and eager for a change.

Sex. CONDIANUS, son of Maximus, is said to have been in Syria at the period of his father's death, and, in anticipation of his own speedy destruction, to have devised an ingenious trick for escape. The story, as told by Dion Cassius, is amusing and romantic, but bears the aspect of a fable. (Lamprid. Comm. 4. and Caesarianus's note; Dion Cass. X. ii. 5, and Reimarus's note; Philost. Vit. Sophist. ii. 1. § 11; Needham, Proleg. ad Geoponica. Cantab. 1704. [W. R.]

CONISALUS (Κωνισάλος), a demon, who together with Ortheus and Typhon appeared in the train of Priapus. (Aristoph. Lys. 293; Athen. x. p. 441; Strab. xiii. p. 568; Hesych. s. v. [L. S.]

CONIUS (Κόνιος), the god who excites or makes dust, a surname of Zeus, who had an uncovered temple under this name in the camp of Megara. (Paus. i. 40. § 5. [L. S.]

CONNUS (Κόννος), the son of Metrobus, a player in the cithara, who taught Socrates music. (Plut. Euthyd. pp. 372, e. 295, d; Mem. p. 235, e; Cic. ad Fam. iv. 22. [L. S.]

CONNUS (Κόννος), a distinguished Athenian who lived in the latter part of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth century B.C. In 413, he was stationed in command of a fleet off Naupactus, to prevent the Corinthians from sending succours to the Syracusans. In an engagement which ensued neither side gained a decisive victory. (Thuc. vii. 31. In 410, according to Diodorus (xiii. 48), he was strategos, and was sent to Corecyra to protect the Athenians in that quarter, when Corecyra became the scene of another massacre. In 409, he was elected strategos with Aeliiabdes and Thrasybulus (Xen. Hell. i. 4. § 10), and again in 406 was made the first of the ten generals chosen to supersede Aeliiabdes. (Xen. Hell. i. 5. § 18; Diod. xiii. 74.) For an account of his character, which is proverbial to take revenge in Mytilene, of his blockade of Callipolis, and the victory of the Athenians at Arginusae by which he was delivered, see Xen. Hell. i. 6; Diod. xiii. 77-79, 37, &c. When all his colleagues were deposed, Conon retained his command. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1.)

When the Athenian fleet was surprised by Ly-and temples, and the remainder to his son Timo-theus. (Lyra de Arist. Bon. p. 638, ed. Riedesl.; Corn.-Nep. 4. a.) His tomb and that of his son, in the Cemmecus, were to be seen in the time of Pausanias. (i. 29. § 15.)
Son of Timotheus and grandson of the preceding. On the death of Timotheus nine-tenths of the fines which had been imposed on him were remit, and Conon was allowed to discharge the remainder in the form of a donation for the repair of the long walls. (Corn. Nep. Tim. 4.) He was sent by the Athenians, together with Phocion and Clearsias, to remonstrate with Nicanor on his seizure of Pereaics, n. c. 318. (Diod. xviii.
64.)

[ C. P. M. ]

CONON, literary. 1. A grammarian of the age of Augustus, the author of a work entitled Amygyrikes, addressed to Archelaus Philopator, king of Cappadocia. It was a collection of fifty narratives relating to the mythical and heroic period, and especially the foundation of colonies. A epigraph of the work has been preserved in the Bibliotheca of Photius (Cod. 186), who speaks in terms of commendation of his Attic style, and remarks (Cod. 189), that Nicolaus Damascenus bor-much more from him. There are separate editions 241, &c., Paris, 1675; by Teucher, Lips. 1794 and 1802; and Gumm. Gotting. 1796.

Dion Chrysostom (Or. xviii. tom. i. p. 480) mentions a rhetorician of this name, who may possibly be identical with the last.

2. A Conon is mentioned by the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (l. 1193), who quotes a passage, ἐν ἔνδομι Ἰππαλείγ, and mentions a treatise 20) also speaks of a writer of this name.

3. Another Conon, whether identical with any of those above-mentioned or not is uncertain, is mentioned by Servius (ad Virg. Aen. vii. 738)
as having written a work on Italy. (Fabric. Bibl.
Græc. iv. p. 25; Voss. de Hist. Gr. pp. 206, 429;
ed. Westermann.)

4. There was a Christian writer of this name, who wrote on the resurrection against Johannes Philoponus. (Phot. Cod. 23, 24.)

CONON (Kówros), of Samos, a mathematician and astronomer, lived in the time of the Polemies Philadelphiaus and Euenetes (n. c. 263—292), and was the friend and probably the teacher of Archimedes, who survived him. None of his works are preserved. His observations are referred to by Ptolemy in his Quick: δράκων, and in the histori-ical notice appended to that work they are said to have been made in Italy (Petrav. Utracolog. p.
93), in which country he seems to have been celbrated. (See Virgil's mention of him, Eccl. iii. 40.)
According to Seneca (Nat. Quaest. vii. 3), he made a collection of the observations of solar eclipses preserved by the Egyptians. Apollonius Pergaeus (Common. lib. iv. praef.) mentions his attempts to demonstrate some propositions concerning the number of points in which two conic sections can cut one another. Conon was the inventor of the curve called the spiral of Archimedes [ARCHIMEDES]:
but he seems to have contented himself with proposing the investigation of its properties as a problem to other geometers. (Pappus, Math. Collect.
Prop. 18.) He is said to have given the name
Cona Deronico to the constellation so called [Bernice, 3], on the authority of an od of Callimachus translated by Catullus (Irv. de Coma Boreides); a fragment of the original is preserved by Theon in his Scholia on Aratus. (Phainon. 146; Hyginus, Poet. Astron. i. 24.) But it is doubful whether the consolation name was really adopted by the Alexandrian astronomers.

The strongest evidence which remains to us of Conon's mathematical genius consists in the admiration with which he is mentioned by Archimedes. See his preface to the treatises on the Quadripartite of the Parabolae and on Spirida.

CONISTAULUS BISTES. [BISTES.]

CONONEUS (Korwvros), a Tarentine, is mentioned by Appian (Anab. 82) as the person who betrayed Tarentum to the Romans in n. c. 213.
(Comp. Frontini. Strateg. iii. 3, § 6, where Ouden-dorp has restored this name from Appian.) Polybius (viii. 19, &c.) and Livy (xxv. 8, &c.) say, that Philomenus and Nicon were the leaders of the conspiracy; but Schweigertes remarks (ad App.
4, &c.), that as Person was the cognomen of Nicon (see Liv. xxvi. 39), so there is no reason why we should not infer that Cononeus was the cognomen of Philomenus. [PHILOMENUS.]

P. CONSA. A Roman jurist of this name is mentioned by legal biographers and by writers who have made lists of jurispruders, as Val. Porsternus, Rutilius, Guili. Gratius, and Fabricius, but they give no authority for their statement. The only authority that we can find for this name is an anecdoti in Plutarch's life of Cicero (e. 26), repeated in his Apophthegmata. When P. Conas, an ignorant and empty min, who held himself forth as a jurist, was summoned as a witness in a case, and declared that he knew nothing whatever about the matter that he was examined upon, Cicero said to him, drily, "Perhaps you think that the question relates to law."

The reading of the name in Plutarch is exceedingly doubtful,—Publius may be Popilises, and Consa may be Caius, Cassius, or Cotta. [J. T. G.]

CONSENTIES DII, the twelve Etruscan gods, who formed the council of Jupiter. Their name is probably derived from the ancient verb conso,$ that is, console. According to Seneca (Quaest. Nat.
ii. 41), there was above the Consentes and Jupiter a yet higher council, consisting of mysterious and nameless divinities, whom Jupiter consulted when he intended to announce to mankind great calamities or changes by his lightnings. The Consentes Dii consisted of six male and six female divinities, but we do not know the names of all of them; it is however certain that Juno, Minerva, Summanas, Vulcan, Saturn, and Mars were among them.
According to the Etruscan theology, they ruled over the world and time; they had come into existence at the beginning of a certain period of the world, at the end of which they were to cease to exist. They were also called by the name of Complexes, and were probably a set of divinities distinct from the twelve great gods of the Greeks and Romans.
(Varro, R. R. i. 1, op. Arnob. advl. Gent. iii. 40; Hartung, Die Rodig. d. Röm. ii. p. 5.)

L. S.

P. CONSENTIUS, the author of a grammatical treatise "Ars P. Consentii V. C. de duabus partibus Orationis, Nomine et Verbo," published originally by J. Richard at Basle, in 1556, and subsetively, but as a separate edition of the same, in the collection of Putzsch (Grammatica Latina. Anteores Antiqu. 4to. Hannover, 1605), who had access to MSS. which enabled him to supply numerous and large deficiencies. Another work by the same writer, entitled "Aux de Barbarismis of Metaphalmasis," was recently discovered by Cramer in a Regensburg MS. now at Munich, and was published at Berlin, in 1817, by Buttmann. It is of considerable value on account of the fragments quoted from lost productions, and of the view which it affords of the state of the language and of grammatical studies at the period when it was composed. In the "de Barbarismis" we find a reference to a third essay on the structure of periods, "de Structurarum Ratione," which, if ever published, is no longer extant.

Consentius is commonly believed to have flourished at Constantinople in the middle of the fifth century, on the supposition that he was one or other of the following individuals.

1. Consentius, a poet violently brayed by Sidonius Apollinaris. (Carmin. xxiv., Epist. viii. 4.) He married a daughter of the consul Jovianus, by whom he had a son, namely

2. Consentius, who rose to high honour under Valentine III., by whom he was named Comes Palatii and despatched upon an important mission to Theodosius. He also had a son, namely

3. Consentius, who devoted himself to literary leisure and the enjoyments of a rural life, and is celebrated as well as his grandfather by Sidonius.

Fabricius (Bibl. Lat. vol. iii. p. 743) tells us, that in some MSS. the grammarian is styled not only viae clarissimus, the ordinary appellation of learned men at that period, but also qui deius consi turque civitatem, which might perhaps lead us to identify him with the second of the above personages.

[WR.]

Consivyus or Consivius, the propagator, occurs as the surname of Justin and Opa. (Macrob. Sat. i. 9, iii. 9; Fest. s. v. Opiuma.) [LS.]

Considia gens, plebeian. None of its members ever obtained any higher office in the state than the praetorship, and are, with one exception, mentioned only in the last century of the republic. The cognomina of these gens are Gallus, Longus, Novianus, and Pactus, the last two of which also occur on coins; but as there is some confusion between some of the members of the gens, an account of all of them is given under Considius, and not under the cognomina. [CONSIDIUS]

1. Considius, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 476, united with his colleague T. Genius in bringing forward the agrarian law again, and also in accusing T. Menenius Lanatus, the consul of the preceding year, because it was supposed that the Fubii had perished at Cremera through his neglect. (Liv. ii. 52; Dionys. i. 27.)

2. Considius, a farmer of the public taxes (publicianus), brought an action against L. Sergius Orata, who was praetor in b.c. 98, on account of his illegal appropriation of the waters of the Lucrine sea. Orata was defended by L. Crassus, who was a friend of Considius. (Val. Max. i. 1. § 1.)

3. L. Considius, conducted, in conjunction with Sex. Sallustius, a colony to Capua, which was formed by M. Brutus, the father of the so-called tyrants in his tribunate, b.c. 33. (Barrus, No. 20.) Considius and Sallustius are ridiculed by Cicero for the arrogance which they displayed, and for calling themselves praetors instead of duumvirs. (Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 34.)

4. Q. Considius, a senator and one of the judges, is praised by Cicero for his integrity and uprightness as a judge both in b.c. 70 (in Terr. i. 7) and in b.c. 66. (Pro Cluent. 38.) Considius is spoken of as quite an old man in Caesar's consulship, b.c. 59, and it is related of him, that when very few senators came to the house, on one occasion, he told Caesar, that the reason of their absence was their fear of his arms and soldiers; and that when Caesar thereupon asked him why he also did not stop at home, he replied, that old age had deprived him of all fear. (Plut. Cest. 14; Cic. ad Att. ii. 24.)

5. Q. Considius Gallus, the usurer, may perhaps be the same as the preceding, especially as the anec dote related of him is in accordance with the character which Cicero gives of the senator. It is related of this Considius, thus, when in the Catilian conspiracy, b.c. 63, the value of all property had been so much depreciated that it was impossible even for the wealthy to pay their creditors, he did not call in the principal or interest of any of the sums due to him, although he had 15 millions of sesterces out at interest, endeavouring by this indulgence to mitigate, as far as he could, the general alarm. (Val. Max. iv. 8 § 3; comp. Cic. ad Att. i. 12.)

6. Q. Considius Gallus, one of the heirs of Q. Turius in b.c. 49, was perhaps a son of No. 4. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 26.)

7. P. Considius, served under Caesar in his first campaign in Gaul, b.c. 58, and is spoken of as an experienced soldier, who had served under L. Sulla and afterwards under M. Cæsars. (Cæs. B. G. i. 21.)

8. M. Considius Nonianus, praetor in b.c. 59. He is spoken of in 49 as the intended successor of Caesar in the province of Nearer Gaul, and he assisted Pompey in the same year in conducting his preparations at Capua. (Ascon. in Cic. Mil. 55, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 12; ad Att. viii. 11.) The name of C. Considius Nonianus occurs on coins. (Eckehl, v. p. 177.)

9. C. Considius Longus, propraetor in Africa, left his province shortly before the breaking out of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, in order to go to Rome to become a candidate for the consulship, entrusting the government to Q. Ligarius. (Cic. pro Lig. 1; Suet. Clem. in Life p. 41, ed. Orelli.) When the civil war broke out in b.c. 49, Considius espoused Pompey's party, and returned to Africa, where he held Aduarametum with one legion. (Cæs. B. C. ii. 23.) He still had possession of Aduarametum two years afterwards, b.c. 47, when Caesar came into Africa; and when a letter was sent him by the hands of a captive, Considius caused the unfortunate bearer to be put to death, because he said he had brought it from the imperator Caesar, declaring at the same time himself, that Scipio was the only imperator of the Roman people at that time. Shortly afterwards Considius made an unsuccessful attempt upon Achilla, a free town in Caesar's interest, and was obliged to retire to Aduarametum. We next hear of Considius in possession of the strongly-fortified town of Tisdrad; but after the defeat of Scipio at Thapsus, and when he heard that Cn. Domitius Calvinus was advancing against the town, he secretly withdrew from it, accompanied by a few Galatians and laden with money, intending to fly into Mauretania. But he was murdered on the journey by the Galatians, who coveted his treasures. (Hirt. B. Afr. 3, 4, 53, 45, 76, 86, 93.)
CONSTANS.

10. C. Considius, son of No. 9, fell into Caesar's power, when he obtained possession of Aedumatum after the battle of Thapsos, B. c. 47, and was pardoned by Caesar. (Hist. B. Afr. 89.) It is supposed that he may be the same as the C. Considius Paetus, whose name occurs on coins; but this is mere conjecture. (Eckhel, v. p. 177.)

CONSTANS I., FIAV'VIUS JULIUS, the youngest of the three sons of Constantine the Great and Fausta, was at an early age appointed by his father governor of Western Illyricum, Italy, and Africa, countries which he subsequently received as his portion upon the division of the empire in A.D. 337. After having successfully resisted the treachery and violence of his brother Constantine, who was slain in invading his territory, A.D. 340, Constans became master of the whole West, and being naturally indolent, weak, and profligate, abandoned himself for some years without restraint to the indulgence of the most degraded pleasures. While hunting in Gaul, he suddenly received intelligence that Magnentius [MAGNENTIUS] had rebelled, that the soldiers had mutinied, and that emissaries had been dispatched to put him to death. Flying with all speed, he succeeded in reaching the Pyrenees, but was overtaken near the town of Helena (formerly Iliberis) by the cavalry of the usurper, and was slain, A.D. 350, in the thirtieth year of his age and the thirteenth of his reign. (Aurel. Vict. de Caesar. xlii, Epit. xlii; Euryp. x. 8; Zosimus, ii. 42; Zonaras, xiii. 6.) [W. R.]

CONSTANS II., FIAW VIUS HERA/CLIIUS, emperor of the East, A.D. 641-668, the elder son of the emperor Constantine III. and the empress Gregoria, was born on the 7th of November, A.D. 630, and his original name was Heraclius. After the death of his father, who reigned but a few months, in A.D. 641, the throne was seized by Heraclonas, the younger brother of Constantine III.; but as Heraclonas was a tool in the hands of his ambitious mother, Martina, he incurred the hatred of the people, and a rebellion broke out, which was headed by Valentine Caesar. Valentine at first compelled Heraclonas to admit his nephew Heraclius as co-regent, and on this occasion Heraclius adopted the name of Constans, which he afterwards changed into that of Constans. Not satisfied with this result, Valentine proclaimed Constans sole emperor: Heraclonas and Martina were made prisoners, and, after being mutilated, were sent into exile. Thus Constans II. succeeded in the month of August, A.D. 641, and on account of his youth was obliged to be satisfied with only the name of emperor, and to abandon his authority to Valentine, who is probably identical with one Valentine, who rebelled in A.D. 644, but was killed in a skirmish in the streets of Constantinople.

The reign of Constans II. is remarkable for the great losses which the empire sustained by the attacks of the Arabs and Longobards or Lombards.

COIN OF CONSTANS I.

EGYPT, and at last its capital, Alexandria, had been conquered by 'Amru, the general of the khalif 'Omar, towards the close of the reign of the emperor Heraclius, the grandfather of Constans. (A. d. 610—641.) Anxious to regain possession of Alexandria, Constans fitted out an expedition against Egypt, and we are informed by the Chinese annalists, that he sent ambassadors to the emperor of China, Tathun, to excite him to a war against the Arabs, by whom the Chinese possessions in Turkistan were then infested. (Comp. De Guignes, Histoire générale des Huans, l. pp. 55, 56.) This emperor reigned from A. d. 627 till 650, and as the Christian religion was preached in China during his reign by Assyrian monks, from which we may conclude that an intercourse existed between China and the Greek empire, the fact related by the Chinese annalists seems worthy of belief, especially as the danger from the Arabs was common to both the empires. When Manuel, the commander of the imperial forces, appeared with a powerful fleet off Alexandria, the inhabitants took up arms against the Arab governor 'Oliman, and with their assistance Manuel succeeded in taking the town. (A. d. 646.) But he maintained himself there only a short time. 'Amru approached with a strong army; he took the town by assault, and Manuel fled to Constantinople with the remnants of his forces. A considerable portion of Alexandria was destroyed, and the Greeks never got possession of it again. Encouraged by this success, the khalif 'Omar ordered his lieutenant 'Abdul-lah to invade the Greek possessions in northern Africa. 'Abdul-lah met with great success; he conquered and killed in battle Geregrus, the imperial governor of Africa, and the Greeks ceded to him Tripoli and promised to pay an annual tribute for the remaining part of the imperial dominions in Africa. This treaty was concluded without the consent of Constans, and although it was dictated by necessity, the emperor blamed and punished his officers severely, and dreaded so much resentment against his subjects in Africa, that he took revenge upon them seventeen years afterwards, as is mentioned below.

While 'Abdul-lah was gaining these advantages in Africa, Mawiyah, who subsequently became khalif, drove the Greeks out of Syria, and, after conquering that country, sailed with a fleet of 1700 small craft to Cyprus, conquered the whole island, and imposed upon the inhabitants an annual tribute of 7200 pieces of gold. The island, however, was taken from the Arabs two years after the conquest, by the imperial general Cosonius. The Arabs made a considerable progress in Cilicia and Isauria, which were more or less subject to Byzantium, and they kept their position in those provinces. While the finest provinces of the East thus became a prey to the khalifs, the emperor was giving all his attention towards the protection of monothelism, to which sect he was addicted, and the persecution of the orthodox Catholic faith. Unable to finish the religious contest by reasonable means, Constans issued an edict by which he prohibited all discussions on religious subjects, hoping thus to establish monothelism by oppressive measures. This edict, which is known by the name of "Typos," created as much discontent as that of the pope and generally by all the churches in Italy, and contributed much to ruin the emperor in public opinion. His subjects manifested publicly their contempt for his character, and the governors of distant provinces paid so little respect to his authority, that they seemed to be independent princes. A revolt broke out in Armenia under Paragamnus, who made himself completely independent; but he afterwards returned to obedience.

As early as 648, a truce for two years had been concluded between the Arabs and Constans. 'Abdul-lah availed himself of that truce to invade and conquer Nubia and Abyssinia; but he returned in 651, renewed hostilities, and sent an expedition against Sicily, where the Arabs took several places, and maintained themselves there. In the same year Mâawyiyah spread terror through both the East and the West by the conquest of Rhodes, and it was on this occasion that the famous colossus was sold to a Jew of Edessa.

The fall of Rhodes failed to rouse Constans from his carelessness. He still endeavoured to compel obedience to his "Typos" in Italy, although it had been condemned by pope Martin I. Theodorus Callippos, the imperial exarch in Italy, arrested Martin in his own palace in 653, and sent him from thence to Messana, afterwards to the island of Naxos, and at last, in 654, to Constantiople. Here, after a mock trial, he was condemned of holding treasonous correspondence with the infidels, and was mutilated and banished to Cherson, in the Chersonesian Tauric, where he died in September, n. d. 655. Many other bishops of the orthodox faith were likewise persecuted, among whom was St. Maximus, who died in exile in the Caucasus, in 662.

In 655, the war with the Arabs became alarmingly serious. Mâawyiyah, then governor of Syria, fitted out a fleet, which he entrusted to the command of Abu-l-Abâr, while he himself with the land forces marched against Caesarea, whence he intended to proceed to the Bosporos. In this imminent danger Constans gave the command of Constantiople to his eldest son, Constantine, and sailed himself with his own ships against the hostile fleet. The two fleets met off the coast of Lycia, and an obstinate battle ensued, in which the Greeks were at last completely defeated. Constantiople seemed to be lost. But that if 'Abdul-lah was assassinated in 655, and Mâawyiyah, who was chosen in his stead, was obliged to reconcile the conquest of Constantiople, and to defend his own empire against the attempts of 'Ali, and afterwards of his son Hasân, who assumed the title of Khalif, and maintained themselves at Kufa till 668. Delivered from the Arabs, Constans made war upon the Slavonian nations south and north of the Danube with great success.

In 661, Constans put his brother Theodosius to death. The reasons for this crime are not well known; for, as Theodosius had taken orders, and was consequently unfit for reigning, political jealousy could not be the cause; perhaps there was some religious difference between the two brothers. The murder of his brother pressed heavily upon him; he constantly dreamt about him, and often awoke, crying out that Theodosius was standing at his bedside, holding a cup of blood, and saying, "Drink, brother, drink!" His palace at Constantiople was insupportable to him, and he at last resolved to quit the East and to fix his residence in Italy. The political state of this country, however, was as strong a reason for the emperor's presence there as the visions of a murderer.

As early as A. D. 641, Rotharia, king of the Longobards, attacked the imperial dominions in northern Italy, and conquered the greater part of them. One of his successors, Grimoald, had formed designs against the Greek possessions in southern Italy, where the emperor was still master of the duchies of Rome and Naples, with both the Calabrias. Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica belonged likewise to the Greek empire. The emperor's authority in Italy was much shaken by the religious and civil troubles which he had caused there by his absurd edict, the "Typos;" but, on the other hand, the dissensions among the dukes and other great chiefs of the Longobards seemed to afford a favourable chance for the re-establishment of the Roman empire of Italy by the Greeks, an enterprise which one hundred years before the emperor Justinian had so gloriously achieved by his general Narses. Under these circumstances, Constans resolved not only to imitate the example of Justinian, but to make Rome once more the centre of the Roman empire. His resolution caused the greatest surprise, for since the downfall of the Western empire no emperor had resided, nor even made a momentary stay, in Italy. "But," said Constans, "the mother (Rome) is worthier of my care than the daughter (Constantiople);" and, having fitted out a fleet, he fixed the day of his departure, and ordered the empress and his three sons to embark and sail with him. The women and board of his galley, but no sooner had they left the imperial palace, than the people of Constantiople rose in revolt and prevented them by force from joining the emperor. Being informed of this, Constans spilt against the city, cursed its inhabitants, and ordered the sailors to weigh anchor. This took place towards the end of 662. Constans stayed the winter at Athens, having previously appointed his eldest son, Constantine, governor of Constantiople. Our space prevents us from giving an account of his campaign in Italy; it is sufficient to state, that though he met at first with some success, his troops were afterwards defeated by the Longobards, and he was obliged to relinquish his design of subduing them. After plundering the cypress and olive plantations of Rome and some of their finest ornaments and treasures, he took up his residence at Syracuse for a time. In this city also he gratified his love of avarice and cruelty to such an extent, that many thousands fled from the island and settled in different parts of Syria, especially at Damascus, where they adopted the religion of Mohamed. The emperor's absence from the seat of government excited Mâowyiyah to make fresh inroads into the Greek provinces.

It has been already related that Constans was deeply offended on account of the treaty having been concluded without his consent between his officers in Africa, and the Arabian general 'Abdul-lah. In 665, Mâowyiyah being then chiefly occupied in the eastern part of the Khaifinate, Constans resolved to revenge himself upon his subjects in Africa, and accordingly imposed a tribute upon them which was more than double what they had engaged to pay to the Arabs. This avaricious and imprudent measure caused a revolt. They invited the Arabs to take possession of their country, promising to make no resistance. Upon this Mâowyiyah entered Africa, defeated the few troops who were faithful to Constans, and extended his conquests as far as the frontiers of Mauretania. During the same time the Longobards extended their conquests in Italy. Despised and hated by all his subjects, Constans lost his life by the hand of an assassin, at least in a most mysterious manner, perhaps by the intrigues of orthodox priests. On the 15th of July, 608, he was found drowned in his bath at Syracuse. He left three sons: Constantinus, Valentinus, and Constans. The name of his wife is not known. (Theophanes, p. 275, &c., ed. CONSTANTIA. 1. FLAVIA VALERIA CON-stantia, also called Constantina, the daughter of Constantius Chlorus Caesar and his second wife, Theodora, was born after A.D. 292 and before A.D. 306, either in Gaul or Britain. She was a half-sister of Constantine the Great, who gave her in marriage in 313 to C. Valerius Licinius Licinius Augustus, master of the East. In the civil war which broke out between Constantine and Licinius in 323, the latter was entirely defeated at Chrysopolis, now Setuari opposite Constantinople, and fled to Nicomedia, where he was besieged by the victor. In order to save the life of her husband, who was able neither to defend the town nor to escape, Constantia went into the camp of her brother, and by her earnest entreaties obtained pardon for Licinius. Afraid, however, of new troubles, Constantia afterwards gave orders to put him to death; but this severity did not alter his friendship for his sister, whom he always treated with kindness and respect. Constantia was first an orthodox Christian, having been baptized by pope Sylvester at Rome; but she afterwards adopted the Arian creed. It appears that she was governed by an Arian priest, whose name is unknown, but who was certainly a man of great influence, for it was through him that she obtained the pardon of Arians, who had been sent into exile in 325, after his opinion had been condemned by the council at Nicaea. During the negotiations concerning the recall of Arians, Constantia fell ill, and, being visited by her brother Constantine, besought him on her death-bed to restore Arians to liberty. She died some time afterwards, between 328 and 330. She had a son by Licinius, whose name was Flavius Licinius Licinius Caesar. (Philostorg. i. 9; Theophan. pp. 9, 37, ed. Paris; Euseb. H. E. x. 9; Sozom. i. 2; Zosim. ii. pp. 17, 28.)

2. FLAVIA MAXIMA CONSTANTIA, the daughter of the emperor Constantius II. and his third wife, Faustina, was born shortly after the death of her father in A.D. 361. In 375 she was destined to marry the young emperor Gratian, but, on her way to the emperor, was surprised in Ilyria by the Quadi, who had invaded the country, and would have been carried away into captivity but for the timely succour of Mammalia, the governor of Ilyria, who brought her safely to Sirmium. When a child of four years, she had the misfortune to be seized with her mother by Procopius, a cousin of the emperor Julian, who had raised a rebellion in 365, and who carried his captives with him in all his expeditions, in order to excite his troops by their presence. Constantia died before her husband Gratian, that is, before 303, leaving no issue. (Ann. Marc. xvi. 13, xxv. 7, 9, xxix. 6.) [W. P.]

CONSTANTIA, FLAVIA JULIA, by some authors named CONSTANTIA, daughter of Constantine the Great, and afterwards married to Constans and received from her father the title of Augusta. Disappointed in her ambitious hopes by the death of her husband, she encouraged the revolt of Vetranio [VETRANIO], and is said to have placed the diadom on his brows with her own hand. She subsequently became the wife of Gallus Caesar (A.D. 351), and three years afterwards (A.D. 354) died of a fever in Bithynia. This princess, if we can trust the highly-coloured picture drawn by Ammianus Marcellinus, must have been a perfect demon in the human form, a female fury ever thirsting for blood, and stimulating to deeds of violence and savage atrocity the cruel temper of Gallus, who after her death ascribed many of his former excesses to her evil propensities. (Amm. Marc. xvi. 1, 2; Ansel. Vict. 41, 42; Julian, Epist. ad Atlen. p. 301, ed. 1630; Philos. Hist. Ecol. iii. 22, iv. 1; Theophan. Chronos. p. 37, ed. 1655.)

CONSTANTINUS, the second son of Constantius Chlorus, and the first whom he had by his second wife, Theodora, was probably murdered by his nephew, the emperor Constantius. He is mentioned only by Zonaras (vol. i. p. 246, ed. Paris). There is much doubt respecting him, although it appears from Julianus (Epist. ad Pop. Aten. p. 497, ed. Paris), that Constantius put two uncles to death; so that we are forced to admit three brothers of Constantine the Great, one of whom, Hannibal,us, died before him, while his brothers Constantius and Constantine survived him. The passage in Philostorgius (ii. 4) "Meg oυ τουιν χριθνιν (after the empress Fausta was suffocated in a bath) υν δευτερων φαρμακιν κατα την Nυμφωβατα διαψευδα διακρατησα" says clearly, that at the death of Constantine the Great there was more than one brother of him alive. [CONSTANTINUS II.]

CONSTANTINUS, the tyrant, emperor in Britain, Gaul, and Spain, was a common soldier in the Roman army stationed in Britain in the beginning of the fifth century of our era, during the reign of the emperor Honorius. In A.D. 407 these troops rebelled, and chose one Marcus emperor, whom they murdered soon afterwards. They then swore obedience to one Gratianus, and having got tired of him, they killed him likewise, and chose one of their comrades, Constantine, in his stead. They had no other motive for selecting him but the fact that he bore the venerable and royal name of Constantine. Although little fitted for the duties of his exalted rank, Constantine considered that he should soon share the fate of his predecessors, if he did not employ his army in some serious business. He consequently carried his troops immediately over to Gaul, and landed at Boulogne. This country was so badly defended, that Constantine was recognized in nearly every province before the year had elapsed in which he was invested with the purple. (A.D. 407.) Stilicho, who was commissioned by the emperor Honorius, sent his Lieutenant Sarus, a Goth, into Gaul, who defeated and killed Justinian, and assassinated Nervigundus, the two best generals of the usurper. Constantine was besieged by Sarrus in Vienna, now Vienna in Dauphiné; but, assisted by the skill of Bidobinus and especially Gerontius, the successors of Justinius and Nervigastes in the command of the army, he defeated the besiegers, and drove them back beyond the Alps. Upon this, he took up his residence at Arctatium, now Arles, and sent his son Constans, whom he created Caesar, into Spain. At the head of the Honoriani, a band of mercenary barbarians, Constans soon established the authority of his father in Spain (A.D. 408), and was rewarded with the dignity of Augustus.

In the following year Honorius judged it prudent to acknowledge Constantine as emperor, in order that he might obtain his assistance against the Goths. Constantine did not hesitate to arm for the defence of Honorius, having previously obtained his pardon for the assassination of Diodynus (Diydymi) and Verinianus (Verenianus), two kinmen of Honorius, who had been killed by order of Constantine for having defended Spain against his own Constans; and he entered Italy at the head of a strong army, his secret intention being to depose Honorius and to make himself master of the whole Western empire. He had halted under the walls of Verona, when he was suddenly recalled to Gaul by the rebellion of his general, Gerontius, who, having the command of the army in Spain, persuaded the troops to support his revolt. In a short time, Gerontius was master of Spain; but, instead of assuming the purple, he had his friend Maximus proclaimed emperor, and hastened into Gaul, where Constantine had just arrived from Italy. Constans, the son of Constantine, was taken prisoner at Vienna, and put to death, and his father shut himself up in Arles, where he was besieged by Gerontius. This state of things was suddenly changed by the arrival of Constantius, the general of Honorius, with an army strong enough to compel Gerontius to raise the siege and to fly to the Pyrenees, where he perished with his wife. Constantius commanded part of his troops to pursue him; with the other part he continued the siege, as is related under Constantius, and afterwards compelled Constantine to surrender on condition of having his life preserved. Constantine and his second son Julian were sent to Italy; but Honorius did not keep the promise made by his general, and both the captives were put to death. The revolt of Constantine is of great importance in the history of Britain, since in consequence of it and the rebellion of the inhabitants against the officers of Constantine, the emperor Honorius gave up all hopes of restoring his authority over that country, and recognized its independence of Rome,—a circumstance that led to the conquest of Britain by the Saxons. Further issue of Constantius Chlorus by Theodora, see below.

Flavia Maxima Constantia, married the emperor Gratianus.
From above. Further issue of Constantius Chlorus by his second wife, Theodora.

1. Constantius, murdered by the emperor Constantius II; no issue known.

2. Dalmatius Flavius Hannibalianus; time of death unknown.

3. Constantius, Consul, 335; murdered by the emperor Constantius; married,

1. Dalmatius, Flavius Julius, Consul in A.D. 335. Put to death by the emperor Constantine the Younger in 339 or 340; no issue known.

2. Hannibalianus, Flavius Claudius, king of Pontus; married Constantina, eldest daughter of Constantine the Great; perished in the wholesale murder of his kinsmen.

3. A, married after his death, probably, Lucius Rufinus Acutus Optatus, consul.

4. Constantia or Constantina (Constantia) Flavia Valeria, married in 313 Valeria Licinia Licina, Augustus; died between 326 and 330.

5. Annastea, married Bassianus Caesar; married Popilius Nepotianus, consul.

Flavius Licinius Licinius, put to death by Constantine the Great.

Flavius Popilius Nepotianus; assumed the purple in Gaul in 350; killed at Rome in the same year.

Constantine was born in the month of February, A.D. 272. There are many different opinions respecting his birth-place; but it is most probable, and it is now generally believed, that he was born at Naissus, now Nisza, a well-known town in Dardania or the upper and southern part of Moesia Superior.

Constantine was distinguished by the choicest gifts of nature, but his education was chiefly military. When his father obtained the supreme command in Gaul, Britain, and Spain, he did not accompany him, but remained with the emperor Diocletian as a kind of hostage for the fidelity of his parent, and he attended that emperor on his celebrated expedition in Egypt. After the capture of Alexandria and the pacification of that country in A.D. 296, Constantine served under Galerius in the Persian war, which resulted in the conquest and final cession to the Romans of Iberia, Armenia, Mesopotamia, and the adjoining countries, for which Diocletian and Maximian celebrated a triumph in Rome in 303. In these wars Constantine distinguished himself so much by personal courage as well as by higher military talents, that he became the favorite of the army, and was as a reward appointed tribunus militum of the first class. But he was not allowed to enjoy quietly the honours which he so justly deserved. In his position as a kind of hostage he was exposed to the machinations of the ambitious, the jealous, and the designing; and the dangers by which he was surrounded increased after the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian and the accession of his father and Galerius as emperors (A.D. 305). He continued to live in the East under the eyes of Galerius, whose jealousy of the superior qualities of Constantine was so great, that he meditated his ruin by exposing him to personal dangers, from which Constantine, however, escaped unhurt. In such circumstances he was compelled to cultivate and improve his natural prudence and sagacity, and to accustom himself to that reserve and discretion to which he afterwards owed a considerable part of his greatness, and which was the more remarkable in him as he was naturally of a most lively disposition. The jealousy of Galerius became conspicuous when he conferred the dignity of Caesar upon his sons, Severus and Maximin, a dignity to which Constantine seemed to be entitled by his birth and merits, but which was withheld from him by Galerius and not conferred upon him by his father. In this, however, Constantine Chlorus acted wisely, for as his son was still in the hands of Galerius, he would have caused his immediate ruin had he proclaimed him Caesar; so that if Constantine spoke of disappointment he could only feel disappointed at not being in the camp of his father. To bring him thither became now the great object of the policy of both father and son. Negotiations were carried on for that purpose with Galerius, who, aware of the consequences of the departure of Constantine, delayed his consent by every means in his power, till at last his pretenses were exhausted, and he was obliged to allow him to join his father. Justly afraid of being detained once more, or of being cut...

off by treachery on his journey, Constantine had no sooner obtained the permission of Galerius than he departed from Nicomedia, where they both resided, without taking leave of the emperor, and travelled through Thrace, Illyricum, Pannonia, and Gaul, with all possible speed, till he reached his father at Boulogne just in time to accompany him to Britain on his expedition against the Picts, and to be present at his death at York (25th of July, 306). Before dying, Constantine declared his son as his successor.

The moment for seizing the supreme power, or for shrinking back into death or obscurity, had now come for Constantine. He was renowned for his victories in the East, admired by the legions, and beloved by the subjects, both heathen and Christian, of Constantine, who did not hesitate to believe that the son would follow the example of justice, toleration, and energy set by the father. The legions proclaimed him emperor; the barbarian auxiliaries, headed by Croesus, king of the Alamanni, acknowledged him; yet he hesitated to place the fatal diadem on his head. But his hesitation was mere pretence; he was well prepared for the event; and in the quick energy with which he acted, he gave a sample of that marvellous combination of boldness, cunning, and wisdom in which but a few great men have surpassed him. In a conciliatory letter to Galerius, he protested that he had not taken the purple on his own account, but that he had been pressed by the troops to do so, and he solicited to be acknowledged as Augustus. At the same time he made preparations to take the field with all his father's forces, if Galerius should refuse to grant him his regal title. But Galerius dreaded a struggle with the brave legions of the West, headed by a man like Constantine. He disguised his resentment, and acknowledged Constantine as master of the countries beyond the Alps, but with the title of Caesar only: he conferred the dignity of Augustus upon his own son Severus.

The peace in the empire was of short duration. The rapacity of Galerius, his absence from the capital of the empire, and probably also the example of Constantine, caused a rebellion in Rome, which resulted in Maxentius, the son of Maximian, seizing the purple; and when Maximian was informed of it, he left his retirement and resumed the diadem, which he had formerly renounced with his colleague Diocletian. The consequence of their rebellion was a war with Galerius, whose son, Severus Augustus, entered Italy with a powerful force; but he was shut up in Ravenna, and, unable to defend the town or to escape, he surrendered himself up to the besiegers, and was treacherously put to death by order of Maxentius. (A.D. 307.) Galerius chose C. Valerius Licinius Licinius as Augustus instead of Severus, and he was forced to acknowledge the claims of Maximian likewise, who had been proclaimed Augustus by the legions under his command, which were stationed in Syria and Egypt. The Roman empire was divided into six masters: Galerius, Licinius, and Maximin in the East; and Maxentius, Maximian, Constantine in the West (308). The union between the masters of the West was cemented by the marriage of Constantine, whose first wife Minervina was dead, with Fausta, the daughter of Maximian, which took place as early as 306; and at the same time Constantine was acknowledged as Augustus by Maximian and Maxentius. But before long serious quarrels broke out between Maxentius and Maximian; the latter was forced by his son to fly from Rome, and finally took refuge with Constantine, by whom he was well received. Maximian once more abdicated the throne; but during the absence of Constantine, who was then on the Rhine, he reassumed the purple, and entered into secret negotiations with his son Maxentius for the purpose of ruining Constantine. He was surprised in his plot; by Constantine, who, on the news of his rebellion had left the Rhine, and embarking his troops in boats, descended the Saône and Rhône, appeared under the walls of Arles, where Maximian then resided, and forced him to take refuge in Marseilles. That town was immediately besieged; the inhabitants gave up Maxentius, and Constantine quelled the rebellion by one of those acts of bloody energy which the world hesitates to call murder, since the kings of the world cannot maintain themselves on their thrones without blood. Maximian was put to death (A.D. 309); he had deserved punishment, yet he was the father of Constantine's wife. [MAXIMIANUS.]

The authority of Constantine was now unrestrained in his dominions. He generally resided at Trier (Trèves), and was greatly beloved by his subjects on account of his excellent administration. The inroads of the barbarians were punished by him with great severity: the captive chiefs of the Franks were devoured by wild beasts in the circus of Trier, and many robbers or rebels suffered the same barbarous punishment. These occasional cruelties did not prejudice him in the eyes of the people, and among the emperors who then ruled the world Constantine was undoubtedly the most beloved, a circumstance which was of great advantage to him when he began his struggle with his rivals. This struggle commenced with Maxentius, who pretended to feel resentment for the death of his father, insulted Constantine, and from insults proceeded to hostile demonstrations. With a large force assembled in Italy he intended to invade Gaul, but so great was the aversion of his subjects to his cruel and rapacious character, that Roman deputies appeared before Constantine imploring him to deliver them from a tyrant. Constantine was well aware of the danger to which he exposed himself by attacking Maxentius, who was obeyed by a numerous army, chiefly composed of veterans, who had fought under Diocletian and Maximian. At the same time, the army of Constantine was well disciplined and accustomed to fight with the brave barbarians of Germany, and while his rival was only obeyed by soldiers he met with obedience among both his troops and his subjects. To win the affections of the people he protected the Christians in his own dominions, and he persuaded Galerius and Maximin to put a stop to the persecutions to which they were exposed in the East. This was a measure of prudence, as the Christians were, in that joy, which was increased in proportion as Constantine showed them still more proofs of his conviction, that Christianity had become a moral element in the nations which would give power to him who understood how to wield it. He attributed the politic conduct of their master to divine inspiration, and thus the fault became believed, that on his march to Italy, either at Avinum in Frisia, or at Verona, or near Ander-march on the Rhine in Germany as some pretend. Constantine had a vision, seeing in his sleep a cross with the inscription "Constantine, peace." Thus, it is said, he adopted the cross, and in that sign was victorious.\(^*\)

Constantine crossed the Cottian Alps (Mount Cenis), defeated the vanguard of Maxentius at Turin, entered Milan, and laid siege to Verona, under the walls of which Maxentius suffered a severe defeat. Another battle fought near Rome on the 26th of October, 312, decided the fate of Maxentius: his army was completely routed, and while he tried to escape over the Tiber bridge, he was driven by the throng of the fugitives into the Tiber and perished in the river. [MAXENTIUS.]

Constantine entered Rome, and displayed great activity in restoring peace to that city, and in removing the causes of the frequent disturbances by which Rome had been shaken during the reign of Maxentius; he disbanded the body of the Praetorians, and in order that the empire might derive some advantage from the existence of the senators, he subjected them and their families to a heavy poll-tax. He also accepted the title of Pontifex Maximus, which shews that at that time he had not the slightest intention of elevating Christianity at the expense of Paganism.

The fruit of Constantine's victories was the undisputed mastership of the whole western part of the empire, with its ancient capital, Rome, which, however, had then ceased to be the ordinary residence of the emperors. At the same time, important events took place in the East. The emperor Galerius died in A.D. 311, and Licinius, having united his dominions with his own, was involved in a war with Maximin, who, after having taken Byzantium by surprise, was defeated in several battles, and died, on his flight to Egypt, at Tarsus in Cilicia, in 313. [MAXIMINUS.] Thus Licinius became sole master of the whole East, and the empire had now only two heads. In the following year, 314, a war broke out between Licinius and Constantine. At Cibalus, a town on the junction of the Saur with the Danube, in the southernmost part of Pannonia, Constantine defeated his rival with an inferior force; a second battle, at Marcella in Thessaly, was indecisive, but the loss which Licinius sustained was immense, and he sought for peace. This was readily granted by him to Constantine, who perhaps felt himself not strong enough to drive his rival to extremities; but, satisfied with the acquisition of Illyricum, Pannonia, and Greece, which Licinius ceded to him, he established a kind of mock friendship between them by giving to Licinius the hand of his sister Constantia. During nine years the peace remained undisturbed, a time which Constantine employed in reforming the administration of the empire by those laws of which we shall speak below, and in defending the northern frontiers against the incursions of the barbarians. Illyricum and Pannonia were the principal theatres of these devastations, and among the various barbarians that dwelt north of the Danube and the Black Sea, the Goths, who had occupied Dacia, were the most dangerous. Constantine chastised them several times in Illyricum, and finally crossed the Danube, entered Dacia, and compelled them to respect the dignity of the Roman empire. His fame as a great monarch, distinguished both by civil and military abilities, increased every year, and the consciousness of his talents and power induced him to make a final struggle for the undisputed government of the empire. In 323, he declared war against Licinius, who was then advanced in years and was detested for his cruelties, but whose land forces were equal to those of Constantine, while his navy was more numerous and manned with more experienced sailors. The first battle took place near Adrianople on the 3rd of July, 323. Each of the emperors had above a hundred thousand men under his command; but, after a hard struggle, in which Constantine gave fresh proofs of his skill and personal courage, Licinius was routed with great slaughter, his fortified camp was stormed, and he fled to Byzantium. Constantine followed him thither, and while he laid siege to the town, his eldest son Crispus forced the entrance of the Hellespont, and in a three days' battle defeated Amandus, the admiral of Licinius, who lost one-third of his fleet. Unable to defend Byzantium with success, Licinius went to Bithynia, assembled his troops, and offered a second battle, which was fought at Chrysopolis, now Skutari, opposite Byzantium. Constantine obtained a complete victory, and Licinius fled to Nicomedia. He surrendered himself on condition of having his life spared, a promise which Constantine made on the intercession of his sister Constantina, the wife of Licinius; but, after spending a short time in false security at Thessalonica, the place of his exile, he was put to death by order of his fortunate rival. We cannot believe that he was killed for forming a conspiracy; the cause of his death was undoubtedly the dangerous importance of his person. [LICIUS; CONSTANTINA.]

Constantine acted towards his memory as, during the restoration in France, the memory of Napoleon was treated by the Bourbons: his reign was considered as an usurpation, his laws were declared void, and infancy was cast upon his name. Constantine was now sole master of the empire, and the measures which he adopted to maintain himself in his lofty station were as vigorous, though less bloody, as those by which he succeeded in obtaining those who were capable of ruling the empire. The barbarians had been expelled from the West and the East of the empire had gradually become more distinct from each other, and as each of those great divisions had already been governed during a considerable period by different rulers, that distinction became dangerous for the integrity of the whole, in proportion as the people were accustomed to look upon each other as belonging to either of those divisions, rather than to the whole empire. Rome was only a nominal capital, and Italy, corrupted by luxury and vices, had ceased to be the source of Roman grandeur. Constantine felt the necessity of creating a new centre of the empire, and, after some hesitation, chose that city which now to the present day is a gate both to the East and the West. He made Byzantium the capital of the empire and the residence of the emperors, and called it after his own name, Constantinople, or the city of Constantine. The solemn inauguration of Constantinople took place in A.D. 330, according to Tatius, and the Chronicon Alexandrinum. The possibility of Rome ceasing to be the capital of the Roman empire, had been already observed by Tacitus, who says (Hist. 1. 4), "Evulgati imperii arcano, posse principem alibi quam Romae fieri." Constantiniople was enlarged and embellished by Constantine and his successors; but when it is said that it equalled Rome in splendour, the cause must partly be attributed to the fact, that the beauty of Constantiniople was ever increasing, while that of Rome was constantly decreasing under the rough hands of her barbarian conquerors. (Comp. Cinquini, De Sanctis Mediolani a Constantino Magno constructis.) By making Constantiniople the residence of the emperors, the centre of the empire was removed from the Latin world to the Greek; and although Latin continued to be the official language for several centuries, the influence of Greek civilization soon obtained such an ascendency over the Latin, that while the Roman empire perished by the barbarians in the West, it was changed into a Greek empire by the Greeks in the East. There was, however, such a prestige of grandeur connected with Rome, that down to the capture of Constantiniople by the Turks, in 1453, the rulers of the Eastern empire retained the name of Roman emperors as a title by which they thought that they inherited the government of the world. The same title and the same pretension were assumed by the kings of the German barbarians, seated on the ruins of Rome, and they were the pride of their successors till the downfall of the Holy Roman empire in Germany in 1806.

The year 324 was signalized by an event which caused the greatest consternation in the empire, and which in the opinion of many writers has thrown indelible disgrace upon Constantine. His accomplished son, Crispus, whose virtues and glory would perhaps have been the joy of a father, but for their rendering him popular with the nation, and producing ambition in the mind of Crispus himself, was accused of high treason, and, during the celebration at Rome of the twenty-seventh anniversary of Constantine's victory over Maxentius, was arrested and sent to Pola in Istria. There he was put to death. Licinius Caesar, the son of the emperor Licinius and Constantina, the sister of Constantine, was accused of the same crime, and suffered the same fate. Many other persons accused of being connected with the conspiracy were likewise punished with death. It is said, that Crispus had been calumniated by his step-mother, Fausta, and that Constantine, repenting the innocent death of his son, and discovering that Fausta lived in criminal intercourse with a slave, commanded her to be suffocated in a warm bath. As our space does not allow us to present more than a short sketch of these complicated events, some additions to which are given in the lives of Passus and Fausta, we refer the reader to the opinion of Niebuhr, who remarks (History of Rome, ed. by Dr. L. Schmitz, vol. v. p. 360), "Every one knows the miserable death of Constantine's son, Crispus, who was sent into exile to Pola, and then put to death. If however people will make a tragedy of this event, I must confess that I do not see how it can be proved that Crispus was innocent. When I read of so many insurrections of sons against their fathers, I do not see why Crispus, who was Caesar, and demanded the title of Augustus, which his father refused him, should not have thought,—'Well, if I do not get my father's crown, my father will not, for he will certainly prefer the sons of Fausta to me, the son of a repudiated woman.' Such a thought, if it did occur to Crispus, must have stung him to the quick. That a father should order his own son to be put to death is certainly repulsive to our feelings, but it is rash and insconsiderate to assert that Crispus was innocent. It is to me highly probable that Constantine himself was quite convinced of his son's guilt: I infer this from his conduct towards the three step-brothers of Crispus, whom he always treated with the highest respect, and his unity and harmony with his sons is truly exemplary. It is related that Fausta was suffocated by Constantine's command, by the steam of a bath, but Gibbon has founded some weighty doubts about this incredible and accountable act, and I cannot therefore attach any importance to the story."

During the latter part of his reign, Constantine enjoyed his power in peace. As early as 315, Arius denied at Alexandria the divinity of Christ. His doctrine, which afterwards gave rise to so many troubles and wars, was condemned by the general council assembled at Nicaea in 325, one of the most important events in ecclesiastical history. Constantine protected the orthodox fathers, though he must be looked upon as still a Pagan, but he did not persecute the Arians; and the foundations of a church to which he did not belong, did not occupy much of his attention, since the domestic peace of the empire was not yet in danger from them. Notwithstanding the tranquility of the empire, the evident result of a man of his genius being the sole ruler, Constantine felt that none of his sons was his equal; and by dividing his empire among them, he hoped to remove the causes of troubles like those to which he owed his own accession. He therefore assigned to Constantine, the eldest, the administration of Gaul, Britain, Spain, and Tingitania; to Constantius, the second, Egypt and the Asiatic provinces, except the countries given to Hannibalians; to Constans, the youngest, Italy, Western Illyricum, and the rest of Africa; they all received the title of Augustus. He conferred the title of Caesar upon his nephew Dalmatius, who obtained the administration of Eastern Illyricum, Macedonia, Thrace, and Greece; and his nephew Hannibalians, who received the new title of Nobilissimus, was placed over Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia Minor, with Caesarea as capital. They were to govern the empire, after his death, as a joint property. Among the three Augusti, Constantine, the eldest, was to be the first in rank, but they were to be equal in authority: the Caesar and the Nobilissimus, though sovereign in their dominions, were inferior in rank, and, with regard to the administration of the whole empire, in authority also to the Augusti. The failure of this plan of Constantine's is related in the lives of his sons.

In 337, Constantine was going to take the field against Sapor II., king of Persia, who claimed the provinces taken from him by Galerius and Maximian. But his health was bad; and having retired to Nicomedia for the sake of the air and the waters, he died there, after a short illness, on the 22nd of May, 337. Shortly before his death, he declared his intention of becoming a Christian, and was accordingly baptized. His death was the signal for the massacre of nearly all his kinmen, which was conceived by his own sons, and subsequently, to the violent death of two of his sons, while the second, Constantius, succeeded in becoming sole emperor.
The following were the most important of the laws and regulations of Constantin. He developed and brought to perfection the hierarchial system of state dignities established by Diocletian on the model of the Eastern courts, and of which the details are contained in the Notitiae Dignitatum. The principal officers were divided into three classes: the Illustres, the Spectabiles, and the Clarissimi; for officers of a lower rank other titles were invented, the pompous sounds of which contrasted strangely with the pettiness of the functions of the bearers. The consulship was a mere title, and so was the dignity of patricius; both of these titles were in later years often conferred upon backbitors. The number of public officers was immense, and they all derived their authority from the supreme chief of the empire, who could thus depend upon a host of men raised by their education above the lower classes, and who, having generally nothing but their appointments, were obliged to do all in their power to prevent revolutions, by which they would have been deprived of their livelihood. A similar artificial system, strengthening the government, is established, in our days, in Prussia, Austria, France, and most of the states of Europe. The dignity and dangerous military power of the praetext praetorio were abolished. Under Diocletian and Maximian there were four praefecti, but they were only lieutenants of the two Augusti and their two Caesars. Constantine continued the number, and limited their power by making them civil officers: under him there was the Prefectus Oriente over the Asiatic provinces and Thrace; the Prefectus Italiae, over Italy, Raetia, Noricum, and Africa between Egypt and Tintagia; the Prefectus Illyricum, who had Illyricum, Pannonia, Macedonia, and Greece; and the Prefectus Galliae, over Gaul, Britain, Spain, and Tintagia or the westernmost part of Africa. Rome and Constantinople had each their separate prefect. Under the prefector there were thirteen high functionaries, who were civil governors of the thirteen dioceses into which the empire was divided, and who had either the title of comes or count, or of vicarius or vice-prae- fect. Between these officers and the praefecti there were three proconsuls, of Asia, Achaea, and Africa, who however were but governors of provinces, the whole number of which was one hundred and sixteen, and which were governed, besides the proconsuls, by thirty-seven consulars, five correctores, and seventy-one presidents.

The military administration was entirely separated from the civil, and as the Prefect Praetorius were changed into civil officials, as has been mentioned above, the supreme military command was continued, but divided, in two a four, and finally eight Magistri Militum, under whom were the military Comites and Duces. The number of legions was diminished, but the army was nevertheless much increased, especially by barbarian auxiliaries, a dangerous practice, which hastened the overthrow of the Western and shook the Eastern empire to its foundations. The increase of the army rendered various oppressive taxes necessary, which were unequally assessed, and caused many revolts. There were seven high functionaries, who may be compared with some of the great officers of state in our country, viz. the Praepositus Sacri Cubiculi, or Lord Chamberlain; the Magister Officiorum, who acted in many con-musicans as a secretary for home affairs; the Questor, or Lord Chancellor and Seal-Keeper; the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, or Chancellor of the Exchequer for the public revenue; the Comes Rerum Privatarum Diviniae Dominus for the private property of the emperor; and, finally, two Comites Domestici, or simply Domestici, the commanders of the imperial life-guard. For further details we refer to the authorities enumerated at the end of this article, and to Guterius, "De Officls Domin Augusiae."

Constantine deserves the name of Great: he rose to the highest pinnacle of power, and owed his fortune to nobody but himself. His birth was a source of danger to him; his exalted qualities caused jealousy among his enemies, and during the greater part of his reign his life was one continued struggle. He overcame all obstacles through his own exertions; his skill vanquished his enemies; his energy kept the hydra of anarchy headless; his prudence conducted him in safety through conspiracies, rebellions, battles, and murder, to the throne of Rome; his wisdom created a new organization for an empire, which consisted of huge fragments, and which no human hand seemed powerful enough to raise to a solid edifice. Christianity was made by him the religion of the state, but Paganism was not persecuted though discouraged. The Christianity of the emperor himself has been a subject of warm controversy both in ancient and modern times, but the graphic account which Niebuhr gives of Constantine's belief seems to be perfectly just. Speaking of the murder of Licinius and his own son Crispus, Niebuhr remarks (Hist. of Rome, vol. v. p. 359), "Many judge of him by too severe a standard, because they look upon him as a Christian; but I cannot regard him in that light. The religion which he had in his head must have been a strange compound indeed. The man who had on his coins the inscription Sol invictus, who worshipped pagan divinities, consulted the haruspices, indulged in a number of pagan superstitions, and, on the other hand, built churches, shut up pagan temples, and interfered with the council of Nicaea, must have been a repulsive phenomenon, and was certainly not a Christian. He did not allow himself to be baptized till the last moments of his life, and those who praise him for this do not know what they are doing. He was a superstitious man, and mixed up his Christian religion with all kinds of absurd superstitions and opinions. When, therefore, certain Oriental writers call him ὁ ἀναφερόντας they do not know what they are saying, and to speak of him as a saint is a profanation of the word."

The blame which falls upon Constantine for the death of Maximian, Licinius, and Crispus, will fall upon many kings, and we have only fabulous accounts of the mental sufferings which his bloody deeds might have caused him. Constantine was not so great during the latter part of his reign. In proportion as he advanced in years he lost that serene generosity which had distinguished him while he was younger; his temper grew morbid, and he gave way to passionate bursts of resentment which he would have suppressed while he was in the bloom of manhood. He felt that the grandeur of Rome could be maintained only in the East, and he founded Constantinople; but the spirit of the East overwhelmed him, and he sacrificed the heroic majesty of a Roman emperor to
As Constantine the Great was a successful political reformer, and the protector of a new religion, he has received as much undeserved reproaches as praisé; the Christian writers generally defined him, and the Pagan historians have cast fastiety on his memory. To judge him fairly was reserved for the historians of later times.

The accounts of, and the opinions on, Constantine given by Eumenius, Nazarius, &c., in the Panegyrics (especially vi.—xi.), and by the emperor Julian, in his Caesares as well as in his Orations, are of great importance, but full of partiality: Julian treats Constantine very badly, and the Panegyrics are what their name indicates. Among the ecclesiastical writers, Ensebiius, Lactantius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theophanes, &c., are the principal; but it has already been observed that their statements must be perused with great precaution. The Life of Constantine by Panormia, which was known to the Byzantines, is lost. Besides these sources, there is scarcely a writer of the time of Constantine and the following centuries, who does not give some account of Constantine; and even in the works of the later Byzantines, such as Constantine Porphyrogentius and Cedricus, we find valuable additions to the history of that great emperor. The most complete list of sources, with critical observations, is contained in Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs. See also Manso, Lecon Constantin des Graces.) [W.P.]

Constantine, he received some exterior marks of respect from the other emperors, but he had no authority over them. Dissatisfied with his share of the spoil, he exacted from his younger brother Constans the rest of Africa, and the co-administration of Italy. Constans refused to give up these provinces. Constantine declared war against him, and invaded Italy by sea and by land, and at Aquilina met with the army of Constans, who approached from Dacia. Having rashly pursued the enemy when they gave way in a mock flight, Constantine was suddenly surrounded by them and fell under their swords. (A.D. 340.) His body was thrown into the river Alsa, but was afterwards found and buried with royal honours. He was twice married, but the names of his wives are not known; they probably both died before him, and he left no issue. An unknown author pronounced a monody on his death, which is contained in Heraceps's edition of Eutropius. (Zosim. Lib. ii.; Zonar. Lib. xiii.; Enseb. Vita Constant. iv. 40—49; Prosper. Chron. Acyendin et Procule Cos.; move authorities are given in the lives of his brothers, Constans and Constans.) [W.P.] was he gone, than an Arabic fleet, perhaps invited thither by the rebels, appeared off Syracuse. The place was taken by surprise and partly destroyed, and the riches and statues, the plunder of Rome, collected there by Constans, were carried by the Arabs to Alexandria. The Greek troops in Asia revolted soon after the return of the emperor. They would be governed by a "Triumvir," and not by a sole sovereign, and demanded that Constantine should divide his authority with his two brothers, Heraclius and Tiberius, who had the title but not the power of Augustus. This rebellion was likewise soon quelled, and Constantine pardoned both his brothers. At the same time, an Arabic army commanded by Utbah and Dinár invaded the remaining part of the Greek dominions in Africa (Mauretania), penetrated as far as the shores of the Atlantic, and ravaged the country so fearfully, that both the Greek and Berber inhabitants rose in despair, and, under the command of a native chief named Kussilah, surprised the Moslems, and killed nearly all of them. This however was no advantage to the emperor, since Kussilah succeeded in seizing the supreme power in that country.

In 671 the Arabs equipped a powerful fleet with the intention of laying siege to Constantinople. They conquered Smyrna and nearly all the islands of the Grecian archipelago, and began the blockade of Constantinople in the spring of 672; but, after a protracted siege of five months, were compelled to sail back, after sustaining immense losses from the Greek fire, which had just been invented by Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Syria, and was first employed in that siege. Yazid, the son of the khalif Mâ'âwiya, who commanded the Arabian forces, returned in the following spring, and, during a period of seven years, regularly appeared before Constantinople in the spring, and sailed to his winter-quarters in the autumn, but was not able to take the city. During the last siege, in 679, the Arabian fleet lost so many ships by the Greek fire, that Yazid was compelled to make a hasty retreat, and not having a sufficient number of ships for his numerous forces, despatched a body of 30,000 men by land for Syria, while he embarked the rest on board his fleet. But his fleet was destroyed by a storm, and the land army was overtaken and cut to pieces by a Greek army commanded by Florus, Peloron, and Cyprianus. This unfortunate campaign, and the war at the same time with the Moammites or Druses of Mount Lebanon, pressed so heavily upon the khalif Mâ'âwiya, that, wishing for peace, he signed the conditions offered him by Constantine, and he thus became liable, for the period of thirty years, to an annual tribute of 3000 pounds of gold accompanied by rich presents of slaves and horses. By this glorious peace the authority of the Greek emperor rose to such a height, that all the minor powers of Asia sought his protection. But his name was less dreaded in Europe, for he was compelled by the Bulgarians to cede to them that country south of the Danube which is still called Bulgaria.

In 680 Constantine assembled the sixth general council at Constantinople, by which the Monothelists were condemned and peace was restored to the church. In 681 the emperor's brothers, Heraclius and Tiberius, were both deprived of their dignity of Augustus, which title Constantine conferred upon his son Justinian. We know almost nothing of the last five years of the reign of Constantine; he died in the month of September, 685, and was succeeded by his son, Justinian II.

Besides the wars which signalized the reign of Constantine IV., there is an event not less remarkable, which most probably took place during the reign of this emperor. We allude to the new division of the empire which had been administered according to the ancient system. In fact, for instance, all the Asiatic dominions were ruled by a civil governor or proconsul; and the whole army stationed in that part of the empire had likewise but one chief commander, the prefect of Asia. The constant invasions of the Arabs required the presence of different moveable corps stationed in the frontier provinces, the commanders of which were independent of one another: these bodies were called themata (έθματα), from thema (έθμα), a position. This name was afterwards given to the districts in which such corps were stationed, and its use became so general, that at last the whole empire was divided into twenty-nine themata, seventeen of which were in the eastern and southern or Asiatic part of the empire, and twelve in the northern and western parts, from the Cimmerian Bosporus to Sicily. This important change in the administration of the empire took place in the latter years of the reign of Heraclius, or in the reign of Constantine IV., that is, from about 635 to 685. But although we do not precisely know the year, there are many reasons for believing that Constantine IV. was the originator of that plan. [CONSTANTINUS VII.] (Cedren. p. 426, &c., ed. Paris; Zonmor. vol. ii. p. 89, &c., ed. Paris; Glycas, p. 278, &c., ed. Paris; Theophan. p. 269, &c., ed. Paris; Paulus Damasc. De Gesta Longobard. v. 30.)

CONSTANTINUS V. (C. W. P.)

CONSTANTINUS V., surnamed COPRO NYMUS (6 Kôpôrónykos), because he polluted the baptismal font at the time of his baptism, emperor of the East, a. d. 741—775, was the only son of the emperor Leo III. Iannu. He was born in 719, and succeeded his father in 741. The unfortunate commencement of his reign is related in the life of the emperor ARTAVASEDES, p. 376, b. The downfall of this usurper in 743 and the complete success of Constantine caused much grief to pope Zacharias, who had recognized Artavasdes because he protected the worship of images, while Constantine was an iconoclast, at whose instigation a council held at Constantinople in 754 condemned the worship of images throughout the whole Eastern empire. Constantine was most cruel in his proceedings against the orthodox: he anathematized Joannes Damascenus and put to death Constantine, the patriarch of Constantinople, St. Stephana, and many other fathers who had declared for the images. In 751 Butychius, exarch of Ravenna, was driven out by Astolf (Astanphus), king of the Longobards, who united that province with his dominions after the dignity of exarch had been in existence during a period of 185 years. A war having broken out between Astolf and Pipin the Short, king of the Franks, the latter conquered the exarchate and gave it to pope Stephen (755), the first pope who ever had temporal dominions, the duchy of Rome being still a dependency of the Eastern empire. Constantine sent ambassadors to Pipin, Astolf, and the pope, to claim the restitution of the exarchate; but the negotiations proved abortive, since the emperor could not give them suffi-suffered a severe defeat from the eunuch Joannes in Armenia, evacuated that country, and fled in confusion to Syria. In the following year, a powerful Arabian army, divided into three strong bodies, and commanded by Harun-ar-Rashid, the son of the khalif Mahāfī, penetrated as far as the Bospors, and compelled Irene to pay an annual tribute of 60,000 pieces of gold. The peace, however, was broken some years afterwards, and the new war lasted till the end of the reign of Constantine, who in 790 lost half of his fleet in the gulf of Atilia, but obtained several victories over the Arabs by land. He was likewise victorious in a war with the Slavonians, who had conquered all Greece, but were driven back by Stauracius in 784.

At an early age, Constantine was betrothed to Rotrudis, daughter of Charlemagne; but quarrels having broken out with that emperor on the subject of the Greek dominions in Italy, the match was broken off, and Constantine married Maria, an Armenian lady, whom he repudiated three years afterwards, and married one Theodota. In 797, the sect of the Iconoclasts was condemned in the seventh general council held at Nicaea, and the worship of images was restored throughout the empire. When Constantine came of age, he was of course intrusted with the administration of the empire; but Irene's influence was so great, that she remained the real sovereign. Tired of his vassalage, Constantine intrigued against her, and had already resolved to arrest her, when the plot was discovered; his parians were severely punished, and he himself received the chastisement of a boy from the hands of his mother. Inflamed by this outrage, the young emperor requested the assistance of his Armenian life-guard, and, having found them all devoted to him, seized upon his mother, and confined her in one of her palaces, where she was kindly treated, but was allowed to have no other company but that of her attendants. A reconciliation took place some time afterwards, but Irene finally contrived the ruin of her son.

After succeeding in being recognized as the lawful master of the empire, Constantine put himself at the head of his army, and set out to meet the Bulgarians, who were plundering all Thrace. He obtained some advantages over them, but lost a pitched battle, saw his army cut to pieces, and with difficulty escaped to Constantinople. There he received intelligence that a conspiracy against his life, formed by his four uncles and supported by the Armenian guard, was on the eve of breaking out. His measures were at once quick and energetic: he seized the conspirators, disarmed the Armenians, whose commander, Alexis, had his eyes put out, and punished his uncles with equal severity: one of them was blinded, and the three others had their tongues cut off, and they were all forced to become eunuchs, in order to incapacitate them for reigning. They were afterwards banished, and died in obscurity.

The reconciliation which had taken place between Constantine and his mother was a hollow one; Irene could not forget that she had once ruled, and during an expedition of her son against the Arabs she formed another conspiracy. On Constantine's return in 797, he was suddenly assailed by assassins while he was sitting in the Hippodrome to look at the races. He escaped unharmed, fled from the city, and directed his course to Phyrgia.
CONSTANTINUS.

Before arriving there, he was joined by the empress and a host of partisans. Relying on the promises of Irene, he returned to Constantinople, but was surprised in his palace by a band of assassins hired by Irene and her favourite, the general Staunaeus. His eyes were put out by their order with so much violence that he died on the same day. By a singular coincidence of circumstances, he was murdered in the "Corpyra," the name of the apartment where the empresses were accustomed to be confined, and where he was born. His only son, Leo, having died in his lifetime, he was succeeded by his mother Irene. Constantinople VI. was the last of the Iaurian dynasty. Zonaras and Cedrenus say, that he survived his execution for a considerable time; but their opinion seems to be untenable, although Le Beau believes it to be correct. (Theopan. p. 582, &c., ed. Paris; Cedren. p. 469, &c., ed. Paris; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 93, &c., ed. Paris; Joel, p. 178, ed. Paris; Glynias, p. 235, ed. Paris.)

CONSTANTINUS VII. FLAVIUS PORPHYRG Pumpetus (δ Πορφύριγγενης), emperor of the East, A.D. 911-959, the only son of the emperor Leo VI. Philosophus, of the Macedonian dynasty, and his fourth wife, Zoe, was born in A.D. 905; the name Πορφύριγγενης, that is, "born in the purple," was given to him because he was born in an apartment of the imperial palace called πορφύρων, in which the empresses awaited their confinement. The name Porphyrgenitus is also given to Constantinople VI., but it is generally employed to distinguish the subject of this article. Constantine succeeded his father in 911, and reigned under the guardianship of his paternal uncle, Alexander, who was already Augustus, governed the empire as an absolute monarch, and died in the following year, 912. After his death the government was usurped by Romanus Lecapenus, who excluded Constantine from the administration, leaving him nothing but an honorary retreat in the imperial palace, and who ruled as emperor till 944, when he was deposed and exiled by his sons Stephanus and Constantine, both Augusti, and who expected to be recognised as emperors. (Romanus Lecapenus.) They were deceived; the people declared for the son of Leo; Constantine left his solitude, and, supported by an enthusiastic population, seized upon the usurpers, banished them, and ascended the throne. In the long period of his retirement Constantine had become a model of learning and theoretical wisdom; but the energy of his character was suppressed; instead of men he knew books, and when he took the reins of government into his hands, he held them without strength, prudence, and resolution. He was a good student and a learned professor, but was an incompetent emperor. Yet the good qualities of his heart, his humanity, his love of justice, his sense of order, his passion for the fine arts and literature, won him the affections of his subjects. His good nature often caused him to trust without discernment, and to confer the high offices of the state upon fools or rogues; but he was not always deceived in his choices, and many of his ministers and generals were able men, and equally devoted to their business and their master. The empire was thus governed much better than could have been expected. In a long and bloody war against the Arabs in Syria, the Greek arms were victorious under Leo and Nicephorus, the sons of Bardas Phocas; the Christian princes of Iberia recognised the supremacy of the emperor; alliances of the Greeks with the Pechenegues or Patzinacæ in southern Russia checked both the Russians and the Bulgarians in their hostile designs against the empire; and Constantine had the satisfaction of receiving in his palace ambassadors of the khâls of Bagdad and Africa, and of the Roman emperors. Chios and Lusignan, the emperor's ambassador, has left us a most interesting account of his mission to Constantinople. (Annales Lusigniani.) One of the most praiseworthy acts of Constantine was the restoration to their lawful proprietors of estates confiscated during rebellions, and held by robbers and swindlers without any titles, or under fraudulent ones. Constantine's end was hastened by poison, administered to him by an ungrateful son, Romanus (his successor), in consequence of which he died on the 15th of November, A.D. 959. His wife was Helen, by whom he had the above-mentioned son Romanus, a daughter Theodora, married to Joannes Zinicus, and other children.

Constantine Porphyrogenitus holds a high rank in literature. His productions are not masterworks in point of style and thought, but they treat of important and interesting subjects, and without him our knowledge of his time would be reduced to a few vague notions; for he not only composed works himself, but caused others to be composed or compiled by the most able men among his subjects. His own works are—

I. Ἱστορία βιγανή τού βίου καὶ πράξεων τοῦ Βασιλείου τοῦ αὐτοκράτορος Βασιλίου (Vita Basilii), the life of Basilius I. Macedo, the grandfather of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, a work of great importance for the reign and character of that great emperor, although it contains many things which cannot be relied upon, as Constantine was rather credulous, and embellished the truth from motives of filial piety or vanity.

Editions: 1. By Leo Allatius in his Συμμετοχή, with a Latin translation, Cologne, 1653, 8vo.; the text divided into 70 sections or chapters. 2. By Comenius, in his "Scriptores post Theopanem," Paris, 1605, fol.; divided into 101 sections or chapters; with a new translation and notes of the editor.

II. Πειρατης τοῦ Σεμιταρίου, "De Themistibus." (The origin and signification of the name Σεμιταρίου as a new name for "province," is given in the life of Constantinus IV.) This work is divided into two books; the first treats on the Eastern (Eastern and Southern) or Asiatic themes, and the second on the Western (Western and Northern) or European themes. Editions: 1. The first book, with a Latin translation and notes, by B. Valentinus, Leiden, 1617, 8vo. 2. The second book, with a Latin translation and notes by T. Morello, Paris, 1609, 8vo. Both these editions, and consequently the complete work, were reprinted and edited with some other works of Constantine, by Meursius, Leiden, 1617, 8vo. 3. The same in the sixth volume of "J. Meursii Opera," edited by Lami. 4. The complete work, by Bandurius, in the first volume of his "Imperium Orientale," with notes and a corrected version by the editor. 5. The same in the third volume of the Bonn edition or the works of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, a revised reprint of the edition of Bandurius, but without the map of De Nile, edited by Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1840.
III. "De Administrando Imperio," without a corresponding Greek title. This celebrated work was written by the imperial author for the special purpose of informing his son Romanus of the political state of the empire, its various resources, and the political principles which ought to be followed in its administration, as well as in its relations to foreign nations. It contains abundance of historical, geographical, ethnographical, and political facts of great importance, and without it our knowledge of the times of the author and the nations which were either his subjects or his neighbours would be little more than vague conjectures, erroneous. The chapters are divided into 53 chapters, preceded by a dedication to prince Romanus. In the first 13 chapters the author gives an account of the state of several nations which lived towards the north of the Danube, such as the Petchenegues or Patzinacites, the Chazars, the Bulgarians, the Turks (by which he means the Majars or present Hungarians), and especially the Russians, who were then the most dangerous enemies of Constantinople. In the 14th and following chapters he speaks of Mohammed, and gives a view of the rising power of the Arabs, which leads him to Spain and the conquest of the West Gothic kingdom by the Arabs. (cc. 23 and 24.). The migrations of the Goths to Italy and to the Frankish kingdoms are related in cc. 25 to 26. In the eight following chapters (29 to 36), which are all very long, he dwells on the history and geography of those parts of the empire which a few centuries before his time were, and are still, occupied by Slavonian nations, viz. Dalmatia, Servia, Croati, &c. In c. 37 and following he returns to the Patzinacites, Chazars, and other nations in ancient Syria—a most valuable and interesting section, on which Beyr wrote the best commentary which we have on the work: it refers likewise to the corresponding part of the Themata and is contained in the fifth volume of the "Commentarii Academiae Petropolitanae." After illustrating that subject, Constantinople preceded by Armenia, and some of the adjacent countries in Asia. Chapter 53 contains some remarks on the theme of the Peloponnese, a country of which the author speaks also occasionally in other chapters; and in the 53rd and last chapter, which is of considerable length, he gives interesting information respecting the city of Cherson, the Chersonitae, and other adjacent nations. The style of the work is generally clear and simple, but the logical order of the subjects is in some instances broken. Editions: 1 and 2. By Meursius, 1610, 8vo. and 1617, 8vo., in his "Opera Const. Perp." with a Latin translation. 3. By the same, in the sixth volume of "Meursius Opera," edited by Lami, in which, however, only the translation of Meursius is contained, the editor having likewise given the more perfect text and translation of Bandurius. 4. By Bandurius, in his "Imperium Orientale," the best edition, partly on account of a map of the Eastern empire by Guillaume de l'Ile, which belongs both to this work and to that on the Thomas. Bandurius added a new translation and an extensive commentary. Having perused better MSS. than Meursius, Bandurius was enabled to add the text with a translation of the 23rd and 24th chapters ("De Iberia" and "De Ispmnia"), of which Meursius had only fragments, so that he could not translate them. 5. By Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1840, in the Bonn collection of the Byzantines, a revised reprint of the edition of Bandurius without the map of Guillaume de l'Ile. The commentary of Bayer cited above belongs likewise to this work.

IV. Βελείον Τακτικήν, τάμον περίεχον τάς κατά Σαλαςταν καὶ τῆν μαχανείαν, commonly called "Tactica," an essay on the art of warfare by sea and by land, a very interesting treatise. Editions: 1 and 2. By Meursius, in "Constantini Opera," and in the sixth volume of "Meursii Opera," edited by Lami, both cited above. No. 1 gives only the text, but No. 2 has also a Latin translation. The work was translated into Latin by Cod. Verdunensis of this work, attributes it to Constantine, the son of the emperor Romanus. Leconomos. 3. By Meursius, in the sixth volume of his works edited by Lami, with a Latin translation of the editor. 5. "Εκθέσεις τῆς Βασιλείας Τεθείων, "De Censoribus Aulicis Byzantiniæ." This work is divided into three sections, viz., the first book, an appendix to the first book, and the second book. It gives a detailed account of the ceremonies observed at the imperial court of Constantinople. The appendix to the first book treats of the ceremonies observed in the imperial camp, and when the emperor sets out from his palace for the purpose of leading his army into the field, or returns from it to his capital: it is dedicated to Romanus, the son of Constantine. The first book is divided into 94 chapters, the appendix into 16 sections, or heads, which are not numbered, and the second book into 56 chapters, the last chapter incomplete; and it seems that there were originally some chapters more, which have not been discovered yet. The work is on the whole tedious and wearisome, as we may presume from the nature of the subject and the character of the emperor, who dwells with delight on trifling forms and usages which scarcely anybody but a master of ceremonies would find it worth while to write upon. The style, however, is pure and elegant for the time; but the work abounds with Arabic and other terms strange to the Greek language, which are, however, explained by the commentators. It is impossible to read it through; but it used as a book of reference it answers well, and it contains, besides, a number of important facts, and little stories or anecdotes referring to the life of former emperors. Editions: 1. By Leich and Reiske, the first volume containing the first book and the appendix, Leipzig, 1751, vol.: the second volume containing the second book, ibid. 1754, fol., with a Latin translation, an excellent Commentary to the first book by Reiske, and Notes and a "Commentatio de Vita et Rebus Gestis Constantinii" by Leich. 2. By Niebuhr, vol. i., Bonn, 1829, 8vo.; vol. ii., ibid. 1830. This is a carefully revised reprint of the edito princeps; it contains the remaining part of Reiske's commentary (to the appendix and the second book), first edited by Niebuhr. The principal laws issued by Constantine (Novellae Constitutiones) have been published by Lomovavia, in his "Jos Grueco-Romanum," and by Labbe, Paris, 1686, 8vo. Constantine wrote besides several smaller treatises on religious and other matters.
CONSTANTINUS.

Besides his own writings, we owe to Constantine's love of literature the preservation of some works from destruction or oblivion, and the compilation of others at his order. Such are: I. "Collectanea et Excerpta Historico-Poetica et Moralia," an extensive compilation, of which but the 27th book, Περὶ Προσευξίων, "De Legationibus," and the 50th, Περὶ Ἀρετῆς καὶ Κακίας, "De Virtute et Vitio," have been preserved. A further account of this work is given in the life of PRINCIPI. II. "Ρωματικά," "De Medicina Veterinaria," compiled from the works of a number of writers, a list of whom is given by Fabricius; it is divided into two books. Edited by Constantine in a Latin translation by J.
Ruelli, Paris, 1530, fol. 2. The Greek text, by Simon Grynaeus, Basel, 1537, 4to. 3. By Valentinus, together with the "Collectanea," &c., Paris, 1634, 4to. An Italian translation of it was published at Venice, 1543, 8vo., and a French one at Paris, 1563, 4to. III. "Ρωματικά," "De Re Rustica," which is generally attributed to Bassus Cassianus.
[BASSUS CASSIANUS.] Both the Hippocrates and the Geoponika were held in high esteem in the middle ages as well as in after times, and they were both used for practical purposes, as we may see from the numerous editions and translations, especially of the Geoponika. The first eight books of this work, which treat on the cure of beasts, and form a kind of domestic veterinary handbook, were separately published in a Latin translation by Andreas a Laenua, Cologne, 1543, 8vo.
An Italian translation of the complete work ap-ppeared at Venice, 1542; French ones at Poitiers, 1545, Lyon, 1557; and a German, by Michael Herr, in 1551, 3rd edition, edited by Ludvig
Rabus, Strassburg, 1666, 8vo.
The Annals of Theophanes were continued by Constantine's order [THEOPHANES], and he also induced Josephus Genius to write his Annals, which contain the period from Leo Armenus to Basilius Macedo. [GENEOUS.] An account of Constantine's laws is given in the life of the emperor ΛΕΩ ΦΙΛΟΠΟΙΟΣ. (Cedren, pp. 607, &c., 631, &c., ed. Paris; Leo Diaconus, pp. 497, &c., 507,
ed. Paris; Joel, pp. 180, 181, ed. Paris; Glynus, Byzant, pp. 461—475; Humberger, Zeuterlässige Gracc, vol. viii. p. 1, &c.; Leich, Commentatio de Vita et Rebus Gestis Const. Porphyry., Leipzig, 1746, 4to., and also in his and Reiske's edition of Constantine's works, as well as in the Bonn edition of
"De Cerem. Aulae Byzant."
[W. P.]

CONSTANTINUS VIII., emperor of the East,
A.D. 976—1028, the son of the emperor Romanus
II., was born in A.D. 961, and began to reign, together with his elder brother, Basil II., in 976;
but, addicted to idleness and luxury, he took no part in the administration of the empire. After the death of Basil in 1025, he became sole emperor; but, fortunately for his subjects, who suffered much from the Arabs during his miserable administration, he died three years afterwards, in 1028. Constantine IX. was the last of the Macedonian dynasty. His successor was Romanus Argyros, the husband of his daughter Zoe, whom he had by his wife Helena Augusta. [BASILII II.]

CONSTANTINUS X. MONOMACHUS
(Μονομάχος), emperor of the East, A.D. 1042—1054. His surname was given him on account of his personal courage in war. In 1042 the go-government of the empire was in the hands of two imperial sisters, Zoe, the widow of the emperor Romanus Argyros, and afterwards of Michael IV.

the Paphlogiomenos, and Theodora, a spinster, who were placed on the throne by the inhabitants of Constantinople, after they had deposed the emperor Michael V. Calaphates, the son of John Zemis of Zoe. The two sisters being afraid of their position, Zoe proposed to Constantine Monomachus that he should marry her; and as she was rather advanced in age, being then upwards of sixty, she allowed the gallant warrior to bring his beautiful mistress, Sclerena, with him to the imperial palace, where the two ladies lived together on the best terms.
Constantine was saluted as emperor, and conferred the dignity of Augusta upon Sclerena. Soon after the accession of Constantine, Georgius Maniates, a brother of Sclerena, who was renowned for his victories over the Arabs, and who then held the command in Italy, raised a rebellion. At the head of a chosen body of troops he crossed the Adriatic and landed in Epirus, joined an auxiliary army of Bulgarians, and marched upon Constantinople. An assassin delivered the emperor from his fears:
Maniates was murdered by an unknown hand in the midst of his camp.

A still greater danger arose in 1043 from an invasion of the Russians, who appeared with a powerful fleet in the Bosporus, while a land force penetrated as far as Varia: but the fleet was dispersed or taken in a bloody engagement, and the Russian army was routed by Catakalo.

In 1047, while absent on an expedition against the Arabs, Constantine received news of another rebellion having broken out, headed by Tornicius, a relative of the emperor, who assumed the imperial title, and laid siege to Constantinople. The emperor hastened to the defence of his capital, broke the forces of the rebel in a decisive battle, and Tornicius, having fallen into the hands of his pursuers, was blinded and confined to a monastery.
Constantine was not less fortunate in a war with Cicones, the vassal king of Armenia and Iberia, who tried to make himself independent; but, unable to take the field against the imperial armies, he was at last compelled to throw himself at the feet of the emperor and implore his clemency. His crown was taken from him, but he was allowed to enjoy both life and liberty, and spent the rest of his days in Cappadocia, where his generous victor had given him extensive estates. Iberia and Armenia were reunited under the immediate authority of the Greeks.

While the frontiers of the empire were thus extended in the East, Thraecia and Macedonia suffered dreadfully from an invasion of the Petchenegues, who were so superior to the Greeks in martial qualities, that they would have conquered all those provinces which they had hitherto only plundered, but for the timely interference of the emperor's body-guards, composed of Waragians or Normans, who drove the enemy back beyond the Danube,
and compelled them to beg for peace. (A.D. 1053.)
At the same time the Normans made great progress
CONSTANTINUS.

in Italy, where they finally succeeded in conquering all the dominions of the Greek emperors. In the following year, 1064, the great schism began, which resulted in the complete separation of the Greek and Roman churches, and put an end to the authority of the popes in the East. Constantine did not live to see the completion of the schism, for he died in the course of the same year, 1064. Constantine was a man of generous character, who, when emperor, would not revenge many insults he had received while he was but an officer in the army. He managed, however, the financial department in an unprincipled manner, spending large sums upon the embellishment of Constantinople and other luxuries, and shewing himself a miser whom he ought to have spared no money. Thus, for economy's sake, he paid off his Iberian troops, 50,000 in number, who were the bulwark of Greece, and who were no sooner dishonoured than the frontier provinces of the empire were inundated by Arabs and Petchenegues, so that, although he augmented the extent of his dominions by the addition of Iberia and Armenia, he contributed much to the rapid decline of Greek power under his successor. The successor of Constantine X. was the empress Theodora mentioned above. (Cedren. p. 754, &c., ed. Paris; Paellus in Zonar. vol. ii. p. 247, &c., ed. Paris; Glynus, p. 319, &c., ed. Paris; Joel, p. 183, &c., ed. Paris.) [W. P.]

CONSTANTYNIUS XI. DUCAS (Δόκας), emperor of the East, A. D. 1059—1067, was chosen by the emperor Isaac I. Comnenus, who abdicated in 1059, as his successor, in preference to his own children, because he thought him to be the most worthy of his subjects. It proved, however, that, although Constantine was undoubtedly one of the best subjects of Isaac, he still was not fit to rule in those troublous times. Previously to his election, Constantine had been very active in putting Michael VI. Stratelates on the throne (A. D. 1056), but he deserted him in the following year and espoused the party of Isaac Comnenus, who succeeded in seizing the government. Thence their friendship arose. When he ascended the throne, the people expected that he would take vigorous measures against those swarms of barbarians who were attacking the empire from all sides, and they were the more justifiable, as Constanti- nianus Comnenus was a noble general. But he loved talking quite as much as action, and instead of preparing for war, he addressed the people in a long elaborate speech on the duties of an emperor under the circumstances of the times. So fond was he of speeches, that he said he preferred the crown of eloquence to the crown of Rome, nor can we feel sure whether he really meant so or not, for both those crowns were rather dusty then. Having reduced his army from motives of economy, he saw his empire suddenly invaded (in 1064) by a host, or probably the whole nation, of the Uzes, for they are said to have been 600,000 men strong. While they ravaged Thrace and Macedonia, the Hungarians and Hungarians again advanced upon the key of the empire. Fortunately for the Greeks, the plague broke out in the camps of those barbarians, and so much diminished their numbers that they hastened back to their steppes beyond the Danube. During the same time the Turks-Saljiks made similar attacks upon the Greek dominions in Asia, and the Normans obtained possession of the rest of the emperor's dominions in Italy. Bari, the capital of them, was taken shortly before the death of the emperor, which happened in A. D. 1067. Constantine had many good qualities, though they were overshadowed by petty and strange passions. Love of justice induced him to recall immediately on his accession all those who were exiled for political crimes, and to undertake a great number of lawsuits, which, accustomed as he was to follow his sophistical genius, he believed to be just, while they proved to be mere chicaneries. When it became known that his love of war had turned into love of legal intrigues, many officers of his army abandoned the profession of arms, and became advocates for the purpose of rising to honours and making their fortunes. Constantine conferred the title of Augustus upon his three sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine, who were all under age, and whom he destined to succeed him and to reign conjointly under the regency of his widow Eudoxia. But she was unable to keep the throne alone, and married Romanus Diogenes for the sake of protection and support, and this distinguished general, who was created emperor, must be considered as the real successor of Const- antine XI. (Sclitzes, p. 813, &c., ed. Paris; Paellus in Zonar. vol. ii. p. 272, &c., ed. Paris; Glynus, p. 824, &c., ed. Paris; Nicephorus Bryenn. p. 19, &c., ed. Paris.) [W. P.]

CONSTANTYNIUS XII. DUCAS, emperor of the East, the youngest son of the preceding, succeeded his father Constantine XI. in 1067, together with his brothers Michael and Andronicus, under the regency of their mother Eudoxia, who married Romanus III. Diogenes and made him emperor. After the capture of Romanus by the Turks in 1071, Constantine and his brothers were proclaimed emperors, but Michael, the eldest, was the real ruler. Constantine was confined in a monastery by the emperor Nicephorus III. Botaniates about 1078. His final fate is not well known. He died either in the same year in consequence of cruel tortures to which he had been exposed, or as late as 1082, in a battle between the emperor Alexis I. and Robert Guiscard. Anna Comnena calls him Constantius (p. 117, ed. Paris). [MICHAEL VII.; ROMANUS III.]

CONSTANTYNIUS XII. PALAEOLOGUS, son of ANDRONICUS PALAEOLOGUS (Δορυφορος Αλεξάνδρου Δορυ- φορου), the last emperor of the East, A. D. 1440—1453, was the fourth son of the emperor Manuel II. Palaeologus. He was born in A. D. 1394, and obtained the throne after the death of his elder brother, the emperor John VII., in 1448. He first married Theodora, daughter of Leonardo, count of Toeco, a lord in the Peloponnese, and, after her death, Catharina, daughter of Notaras Palaeologus Cate- lusius, prince of Leslie, by neither of whom he left issue.

Previously to his accession, Constantine was despot or lord of a small remnant of the Byzantine empire in the Chersonesian Taurian, and during the reign of his brother John he was invested with the principality of, or more correctly a principality in, the Peloponnese, which he bravely defended against the Turks. After the death of John, the throne was claimed by his surviving brothers, Demetrius, the eldest, Constantine, and Thomas. A strong party having declared for Constantine, this prince, who was still in the Peloponnese, accepted the crown after long hesitation, as he saw that he had but few chances of defending it against the overwhelming power of the Turks, who had gradually reduced the Byzantine empire to the city of Constantinople and a few maritime places and islands in Greece. In his embarrassment he sent Phranza, the historian, to the court of sultan Murad II., declaring that he would not exer- cise that power which the Greeks had conferred upon him, unless the sultan would give him his permission. Murad having received the ambassador favourably, and given his consent, Constantine embarked on board a squadron, and soon afterwards arrived at Constantinople. He made peace with his brothers by giving them his former domain in the Peloponnesus. The beginning of his reign was quiet; but sultan Murad died in 1450, and his son and successor, the ambitious and lofty Mohammed, was far from shewing the same sentiments towards Constantine as his father. Mohammed was then engaged in a war against the Turkish emir of Caramania, who made such a desperate resistance, that the councillors of Constantine thought this to be a favourable opportunity for making their master somewhat more independent of the sultan. They threatened to assist prince Urkhan (the eldest brother of Mohammed?), who lived at Constantinople and claimed the Turkish throne, to raise an army and to enter into a contest with Mohammed. Ambassadors having been sent to the sultan to inform him of the dispositions of the Greek court, the vizir Khalit reproached them with their imprudent and presumptuous conduct in very severe terms, and concluded with the words, If you will proclaim Urkhan as sultan, you may do so; you may call the Hungarians for assistance, you may try to reconquer all those countries which we have taken from you; but know ye that you will succeed in nothing, and that instead of winning an inch of ground, you will lose the petty remains of your empire which we have left you. My master shall be informed of the subject of your message, and his will shall be done. (Ducas, p. 132.) Soon afterwards, Mohammed made preparations for a siege of Constantinople, having declared that he would not make peace till he could reside in the capital of the Greek empire.

Constantinople was blockaded by land and by sea till the sultan's artillery was ready, which was cost at Adrianople by Urban, a Dacian, or Hungarian founder, and was of greater dimensions than had ever been made before. While it was existing Mohammed took Mesembria, Anchialos, Byzon, and other towns which still belonged to the empire. On the 6th of April, 1453, Mohammed appeared under the walls of Constantinople at the head of an army of 258,000 men, carrying with him, among other pieces of large size, a gun which threw a stone ball of 1200 pounds. The city was defended by the Greeks and numerous Venetian, Genoese, and other Frankish auxiliaries or volunteers; and the Christian navy was superior to the Turkish, not in number, but in the construction of the ships and the skill of the Frankish marines.

Our limits do not allow us to give a history of this siege. Among the numerous works, in which the account is given with more or less truth or beauty, we refer to Gibbon, Le Beau, "Histoire du Bas Empire," continued by Amelilhon, and Hamme, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches."

The contest lasted from the 6th of April till the 29th of May, 1453: prophecies had foretold its issue. On that day the last emperor of the East fell on the wall of his trembling capital; Θαλάθαι ελληναί, he cried out in despair when the Turks stormed the wall and he was foreseen by his guards. Surrounded by a crowd of Janissaries, and foreseeing his fate, he cried out again, "Is there no Christian who will cut off my head?" He had scarcely uttered these words when he was struck by two Turks at once, and expired unknown to them on a heap of slain. His body was afterwards discovered, and when Mohammed was in undisputed possession of the city, he ordered his head to be cut off, and had it mailed on the porphyry column on the place called Augusteum. It was afterwards sent as a trophy to the principal towns in Turkish Asia. One of the first acts of the victor was the consecration of the church of St. Sophia as a mosque, and Mohammed was the first Moslem who prayed there standing on the altar. It is said that he entered that church on horseback, but this is an idle story invented by monks. He alighted from his horse at the principal gate, entered the church with visible respect and admiration, and was so far from committing any profana- tion, that he killed with his own hand a Turk whom he discovered breaking up the beautiful mosaics of the pavement.

The conquest of Constantinople was an event of the greatest importance to the Sultans. During upwards of one thousand years that city had been looked upon by the nations of the East as the sacred seat of both the supreme temporal and spiritual power, and being masters of Constanti- nople, the Sultans at once were considered as the heirs of the Roman emperors. Until then the obedience paid to them was but submission to the sword of a conqueror: it was now both fear and habit, and the transient impression of victory acquired the strength of hereditary duty. With the fall of Constantinople, darkness spread over the East; but the Muses flying from the Bosphorus found a more genial home on the banks of the Arno and the Tiber. Almost four centuries have elapsed since the first Mohammedan prayer was offered in St. Sophia; yet all the power and glory of the Sultans have been unable to root out of the minds of the Greeks the remembrance of their past gran- deur, and at the present moment the duration of the Turkish power in Constantinople is less probable than the revival of a new Greek empire. CONSTANTINUS ACROPOLITÆ. [Acro- polita, Georgiæ.]

CONSTANTINUS, of Antioch, also called Constantius, was a presbyter at the Monastic church of Antioch, lived about A. D. 400, and was destined to succeed bishop Flavianus. Porphyrius, however, who wished to obtain that see, intrigued at the court of Constantinople, and succeeded in obtaining an order from the emperor Arcadius for the banishment of Con- stantine. contemporary of Justinian, as an English lawyer might call Cokos his master. Reisz, however (ad referred to an Antoninus Stephanus, judge and mag-

CONSTANTINUS RHODIUS (Κωνστα-

was written, as appears from internal evidence, during the joint reign of the emperors Leo and Alexander, that is, between A.D. 906 and 911.
Reiske supposed him to be the same person as Constantian Cephalas, who compiled the Palatine Anthology. [CONSTANTINUS CEPHALAS.] The poetry of Constantine himself is barbarous in the first, and somewhat better in the last epigram (xiii. p. 739; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 613, ad

CONSTANTINUS SANASUS. [Ma-

CONSTANTIUS.

CONSTANTIUS I. FLAVIUS VALERIUS

Rius, surnamed CHLORUS (ΣΧΛΟΡΟ), “the Pale,” Roman emperor, A. D. 303-306, the father of Constantine the Great, was the son of one Eutropius, of a noble Dardanian family, and Claudia, the daughter of Crispus, who was the (younger?) brother of the emperors Claudius II and Quintilius. He was probably born in 250. Distinguished by ability, valour, and virtue, Constantius became governor of Dalmatia, and the successor of the emperor Carus, who, disgusted with the extravagant conduct of his son Carinus, intended to adopt and appoint as his successor the more worthy Constantius. Death prevented Carus from carrying that plan into execution, and the reward of Constantius was left to the emperors DIOCLETIAN AND MAXIMIAN, who had experienced that the government of the immense Roman empire, in its perpetual and hostile contact with so many barbarians, was a burden too heavy not only for one, but even for two emperors, however distinguished they were. They consequently resolved that each should appoint a co-regent Caesar, and their choice fell upon Constantius, who was adopted by Maximian, and GALERIUS, who was adopted by DIOCLETIAN. Both the Caesars were obliged to repudiate their wives, and Galerius was married to Valeria, the daughter of DIOCELIAN, while Constantius received the hand of Theodora, the daughter of the wife of Maximian. Their appointment as Caesars took place at Nicomedia on the 1st of March, 292. The government of the empire was distributed among the four princes in the following manner: Constantius was set over the provinces beyond the Alps, that is, Gaul, Britain, and Spain (?); Galerius received both the Illyrian and Moesia, an extensive tract comprising all the countries from the Inn in Germany to Mount Athos and the shores of the Archipelago, and from the Adriatic Sea to the mouth of the Danube; Maximian governed Italy and Africa; and THRACE, Egypt, and all the Asiatic provinces were reserved for the authority of DIOCLETIAN. The first and most important business of Constantius was the reunion of Britain with the empire, as Carausius had succeeded in making himself independent of the authority of DIOCLETIAN AND MAXIMIAN. [CARAUSIUS.] After the murder of Carausius by Allectus in 293, this officer seized the government; but Britain was taken from him after a struggle of three years [ALLECTUS], and Constantius established his authority there. Some time afterwards, the Alamanni invaded Gaul, and pitched battle took place. In 298, between them and Constantius at LINGONES, in LUGDUNENAE PRIMA, now Langres; the Romans were nearly routed, when Constantius restored the battle, defeated the enemy, and killed either 60,000 or 6000 barbarians. They suffered another defeat at Vindonissa, now WINDISH, in Switzerland: there are doubts with regard to this battle. After the abdication of DIOCLETIAN AND MAXIMIN, in 305, Constantius and Galerius assumed the title and dignity of Augusti, and ruled as co-emperors. Constantius died fifteen months afterwards (25th of July, 306) at Eboracum, now YORK, on an expedition against the Picts, in which he was accompanied by his son Constantine, whom he had by his first wife, Helena, whom he had repudiated. The same Constantine, afterwards the Great, succeeded him in his share of the government. Constantius was one of the most excellent characters among the later Romans, and it is to be regretted that we know so little about him. His administration of his provinces procured him great honour, for he took the most lively interest in the welfare of the people, and was so far from imitating the rapacity of other governors, that he was not even provided with such things as are necessary to men of his rank, though a vulgar appellation calls them luxury. In his private life he seems, however, to have shown some asceticism. The Pagans praised him for his humanity, and the Christians for his impartiality and toleration. Theophanes calls him Χριστιανόφιλος, or a man of Christian principles. His conduct during the persecution of the Christians by DIOCLETIAN was very humane. It is not known whence he received the surname of Chlorus, or the Pale, which is given to him only by later Byzantine writers. Gibbon (vol. ii. p. 118, note I. ed. 1815) observes, that any remarkable degree of piety seems inconsistent with the rubor mentioned in the Punicares (v. 18). Besides his son and successor, Constantine, Constantius had by his second wife, Theodora, three sons and three daughters, who are mentioned in the genealogical table prefixed to the life of CONSTANTIUS I. (Eutrop. ix. 14-23; Aurel. Vic. Cosm. 39, &c.; Epit. 39; Zosimus. iii. 7, &c.; Theop. pp. 4-9, ed. Paris; Paneg. Victor. iv. 3, vi. 4, 6; Euseb. Vit. Const. i. 13-21; Treb. Pol. Claudius, 3. 13; Ael. COIN OF CONSTANTIUS I.

CONSTANTIUS II, FLAVIUS JULIUS, Roman emperor, A. D. 337-361, whose name is sometimes written Flavius Claudius Constantius, Flavius Valerius Constantius, and Constantius Constantius. He was the third son of Constantine the Great, and the second whom he had by his second wife, Fausta; he was born at Sirmium in Pannonia on the 4th of August, A. D. 317, in the consulate of Ovidius Gallicanus and Septimius Bassus. He was educated with and received the same careful education as his brothers, Constantine and Constans, was less proficient in learned pursuits and fine arts, but surpassed them in gymnastic and military exercises. He was created consul in 326, or perhaps as early as 324, and was employed by his father in the administration of the eastern provinces. At the death of his father in 337, Constantius was in Asia, and immediately hastened to Constantinople, where the garrison had already declared that none should reign but the sons of Constantine, excluding thus the nephews of the late emperor, Dalmatius and Hannibalibasius, from the government of those provinces which had been assigned to them by Constantine, who had placed Dalmatius over Greece, Macedonia, Thrace, and part of Illyricum, and Hannibalians over Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia Minor, with Caesarea as the capital. The declaration of the army, whether preconcerted between them and the sons of Constantine or not, was agreeable to Constantius, who was apparently resolved to act in accordance with the same views. In a wholesale murder, where the troops were the executioners, the male descendants of Constantius Chlorus by his second wife perished through the cruel perfidy of Constantius, who spared the lives of only two princes, Flavius Julius Gallus and Flavius Claudius Julianus, the sons of Flavius Julianus Constantius, youngest son of Constantius Chlorus, who himself became a victim of his nephew's ambition. Besides those princes, the patrician Optatus and the praefectus praetorio Abbavius were likewise massacred. It would be difficult to explicate Constantius from the part which he took in this bloody affair, even if it were true that his crime was not so much that of a murderer as that of a cool spectator of a massacre which he could have prevented.

After this the three sons of Constantine the Great had an interview at Sirmium in Pannonia, and made a new division of the empire (September, 337), in which Constantine, the eldest, received Gaul, Spain, Britain, and part of Africa; Constantius, the second and the subject of this article, Thrace, Macedonia, Greece, the Asiatic provinces, and Egypt; and Constans, the youngest, Italy, Illyricum, and the rest of Africa. The ancient world was thus governed by three youths of twenty-one, twenty, and seventeen years of age. Immediately after the death of Constantine the Great a war broke out with the Persian king, Sapor II., which was chiefly carried on in Mesopotamia and on the frontiers of Syria, and, with short interruptions, lasted during the whole reign of Constantius. This war was to the disadvantage of the Romans (Greeks), who were vanquished in many battles, especially at Singara, in 344, where Constantius commanded in person, and after having carried the day, was routed with great slaughter of his troops in the succeeding night. On the other hand, the Persians sustained great losses in their fruitless attempts to take the strong fortress of Nisibis, the key of Mesopotamia; and as other fortified places in that country as well as in the mountains of Armenia were equally well defended, Sapor gained victories without making any acquisitions.

Being thus engaged in the east, Constantius was prevented from paying due attention to the west, and in the meantime the Roman suffering, civil war between his brothers, in which Constantius was slain at Aquileia, and Constans got possession of the whole share of Constantine in the division of the empire (A. D. 340). In 350, Constans was murdered by the troops of Magnentius, who assumed the purple and was obeyed as emperor in Britain, Gaul, and Spain; at the same time Vetranio, commander of the legions in the extensive province of Illyricum, was forced by his troops to imitate the example of Magnentius, and he likewise assumed the purple. It was now time for Constantius to prove with his sword that none but a son of the great Constantine should rule over Rome. At the head of his army he marched from the Persian frontier to the West. At Hornelia in Thrace ambassadors of Magnentius waited upon him, proposing that he should acknowledge their master as emperor, and cement their alliance by a marriage of Constantius with the daughter of Magnentius, and of Magnentius with Constantina, eldest sister of Constantius; they threatened him with the consequences of a war should he decline those propositions. Constantius dismissed the ambassadors with a haughty refusal, and, sending one of them back to Magnentius, ordered the others to be put in prison as the agents of a rebel. His conduct towards Vetranio tended to a reconciliation; but while he promised to acknowledge him as co-emperor if he would join him against Magnentius, he secretly planned treachery. Having bribed or persuaded the principal officers of Vetranio to forsake their master if it should suit his plans, he advanced towards Sardica, now Sophia, where he met with Vetranio, both of them being at the head of an army, that of Vetranio, however, being by far the stronger. Had Vetranio, a straightforward veteran, who could disobey but was not made for more refined perjury, now acted in the spirit of Constantius, he could have seized his rival in the midst of his camp; but the result was very different. On a plain near Sardica a battle was fought, where the soldiers showed themselves to their troops, who filled the plain apparently for the purpose of being witnesses of a ceremony by which the empire was to have two lawful heads. Constantius first addressed the armed crowd, and artfully turning upon his "legitimate" opinion, that a son of the great Constantine was alone worthy to reign, suddenly met with a thunder of applause from his own troops as well as those of Vetranio, who, either spontaneously or in accordance with the instructions of his officers, declared that they would obey no emperor but Constantius. Vetranio at once perceived his situation; he took off his diadem, knelt down before Constantius, and acknowledged him as his master, himself as his guilty subject. Constantius evinced equal wisdom; he raised Vetranio from the ground, embraced him, and, as he despaired a throne, assigned him a pension, and allowed him to spend the rest of his days at Prusa. (A. D. 351.)

Constantius now turned his arms against Magnentius, after having appointed his cousin Gallus as Caesar and commander-in-chief of the army against the Persians. At Murse, now Esack, a town on the river Drave in Hungary, Magnentius was routed (28th of September, A. D. 351) in a bloody battle, in which Constantius evinced more piety than courage, but where the flower of both armies perished. The two parts of Illyricum and Italy fell into the hands of that victory, and Magnentius fled into Gaul. There he was attacked in the east by the army under Constantius, and in the west by another army, which, after having conquered Africa and Spain, crossed the Pyrenees and penetrated into Gaul. After another complete defeat at mount Selenucus in the Cossian Alps, and the rebellion of the principal cities in Gaul, Magnentius, reduced to extremity, put an end to his life, and his brother Decentius followed his example. (A. D. 353.) [MAGNENTIUS.] Constantius became thus master of the whole West. He avenged the murder of his brother Constans, and established his authority by cruel measures, and neither the guilty nor the innocent were exempt from his resentment.

Once more the immense extent of the Roman empire was ruled by one man. The administration of the government and the public and private life of Constantius approached more and more those of an Asiatic monarch: emperors reigned at the court, and secret murders, dictated by jealousy or suspicion, were committed by order of the emperor, whenever justice disdained or was too weak to assist him in his plans. One of the victims of his malice was his cousin, Gallus Caesar. Guilty of negligence, disobedience, and cruelty in his administration of the East, he deserved punishment; and his guilt became still greater when he put to death the imperial commissioners, Domitian, praefectus praetorio Oriens, and Moncius, questor palatii, who were sent to his residence, Antioch, to inquire into his conduct, but conducted themselves with the most imprudent haughtiness, threatening and defying Gallus, when they ought to have unmasked him with gentle persuasions and intrigues, according to their instructions. They were torn to pieces by the mob excited by Gallus, who, after such an atrocious act seemed to have had but one means of saving himself from the emperor's resentment—rebellion. But deceived by new promises from the artful Constantius, he went to meet him at Milan. At Petovio in Pannonia he was arrested, and sent to Pula in Istria, where he was beheaded in a prison. (a. d. 354.) Julian, the brother of Gallus was likewise arrested; but, after having spent about a year in prison and exile, was pardoned at the intervention of his protectors, the empress Eusebia, and in November, 355, was created Caesar and appointed to the command-in-chief in Gaul, which was suffering from the consequences of the rebellion of Sylvanus, who had assumed the purple, but was ensnared by Ursicinus, whom he was murdered in the church of St. Severin at Cologne in September, 355.

In 357, Constantius visited Rome, where he celebrated an undeserved triumph. Imitating the example of Augustus, he ordered the great obelisk which stood before the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis to be carried to Rome, where it was erected in the Circeum Maximus. (Having been thrown down, it was placed by order of pope Sixtus V. before the portal of the church of St. John Lateran, and is known as the Lateran obelisk.) From Rome Constantius went to Lyons, where his generals made a successful campaign against the Quadi and Samatians, and thence returned in 359 to Asia to meet the armies of Sapor, who had once more invaded Mesopotamia, and taken Amidia, now Diyarbekir, and the minor fortresses of Singara and Busable. Before Sapor appeared in the field, Gaul was invaded by the Alemani and the Franks, but their power was broken in a three years' campaign by Julian, who made Chnodomarius, the king of the Alemani prisoner [CHNOOMARIUS]; and not only by his martial deeds, but also by his excellent administration, which won him the hearts of the inhabitants, he excelled the jealousy of Constantius. Accordingly, Julian was ordered in Gaul that the legions opposed there should march to the defence of the题材. The pretext for this command was, that Gaul being tranquil, no great army was required there, but the real motive was the fear that Julian might abuse his popularity, and assume the purple. Instead of preventing that event, the impudent order caused it. The troops refused to march; and Julian having nevertheless brought them into motion, they suddeny proclaimed him emperor. (a. d. 360.) It is related in the life of Julian how he acted under these circumstances; his protestations of innocence were misconstrued; his ambassadors, who met with Constantius at Caesarea, were dismissed with anger, and war was declared. Constantius, with the greater part of his army, marched to the West, and the empire was on the eve of being shaken by a dreadful civil war, when the sudden death of Constantius at Mopsocrene, near Tarsus in Cilicia [3rd of November, a. d. 361], prevented that calamity, and made Julian the sole master of the empire. [JULIANUS.] By his third wife, Maximia Faustina, Constantius left one daughter, who was afterwards married to the emperor Gratian. (Amn. Mare. lib. iv.—xxi.; Zosimus, lib. ii. COIN OF CONSTANTIUS II.

CONSTANTIUS III., emperor of the West, A. D. 421, was born in Illyria in the latter part of the 4th century of our era. He became early known by his military deeds, and was beloved at the court of the emperor Honorius, as well as among the people and the soldiers, for his talents and amiable yet energetic character, which were enhanced by extraordinary manly beauty. When the tyrant Constantine, after his return from Italy, was besieged in Arles by his rebellions and successful general, Gerontius, Constantius was dispatched by Honorius to reduce Gaul and Spain to obedience; but the emperor refrained from sending troops over to Britain, since this country was then in a hopeless state of revolt against everything Roman. It is related under Constantine the tyrant [p. 361] how Constantius, whose first lieutenant was Ulphilas, a Goth, compelled Gerontius to raise the siege and fly to the Pyrenees, where he perished. Constantius then continued the siege; but, although closely confined, his adversary found means to send one Eudobius or Eudovicius into Germany, for the purpose of calling the nations beyond the Rhine to his assistance. Eudobius soon returned at the head of a body of Frankish and Alamannic auxiliaries; but, instead of surprising Constantius, the latter surprised him, having suddenly left his camp, and marched to attack the barbarians, whom he and Ulphilas met with beyond the Rhône and defeated entirely. Eudobius was murdered by a friend in whose house he had taken refuge, and the murderer presented the head of Eudobius to the victor, expecting a recompense. With the virtue of an ancient Roman, Constantius refused to accept the hideous present, and ordered the murderer to be turned out of his camp straightway. Constantius hastened back to Arles, resumed the interrupted siege, and forced Constantine to surrender, whose fate is related in his life. Constantius was rewarded for his victory by belonging to his church to Constantius, requesting that he would keep them as his ransom in case the town should be taken and he fall into the hands of the victors. But Constantius kept those vessels for himself, and pledged them to a banker of the name of Sylvanus. When after the capture of Sirmium and the captivity of the bishop, Attilia was informed of the robbery, he requested Theodosius to give up Sylvanus and his property, and Theodosius having refused to comply with the demand, Attilia prolonged the war on that ground. Constantius was afterwards charged with high treason, and crucified by order of his master. [Priscus, in Excerpt. de Legat. pp. 54, 57, 69, ed. Paris.] [W. P.]

CONSTANTIUS, a presbyter of Lyons, who flourished towards the close of the fifth century, has been characterized by a French writer as at once the Maccenas and the Aristarchus of the literary men of that period, fostering them by his munificence and training them to excellence by his counsel. We find four letters addressed to him by his friend Sidonius Apollinaris, from the first of which we learn, that this collection of epistles was made at his suggestion and submitted to his criticism and correction.

Constantius, at the request of Patiens, bishop of Lyons, drew up a biography of Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, who died in A.D. 448. This work, entitled Vita S. Germani Episcopi Auxericensis, appears from the second dedication to have been completed about A.D. 488, and is contained in the compilations of Surianus and of the Hollandists under the Saints of July. It was rendered into verse by Ericus, a Benedictine monk of Auxerre, who lived about A.D. 989, and translated into French by Arnauld d’Andilly.

Some persons have ascribed to Constantius the "Vita S. Justi Lugdunensis Episcopi," who died in A.D. 390, but there is no evidence that he was the author. This performance also will be found in Surianus under September 2nd, and has been translated into French by Le Maître de Sacy in his "Vies des Pères du Désert." [W. R.]

CONSUUS, an ancient Roman divinity, whose name is derived by some from Consus, i. e. Consul (Plutarch, i. 51. Tacitus, de Spir. 5), while others regard it as a contraction of conditus. (Pseudo-Ascon. in Civ. Verr. ii. 10.) All we know about the nature of this divinity is limited to what may be inferred from the etymology of the name, and from the rites and ceremonies which were observed at his festival, the Consualia. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) With regard to the former, some call him the god of secret deliberations, and others the hidden or mysterious god, that is, a god of the lower regions. The story about the introduction of his worship throws no light upon the question, since both explanations are equally in accordance with it. When after the building of Rome the Romans had no women, it is said, and when their suit to obtain them from the neighboring tribes was rejected, Romulus spread a report, that he had found the altar of an unknown god buried under the earth. The god was called Consus, and Romulus vowed sacrifices and a festival to him, if he succeeded in the plan he devised to obtain wives for his Romans. (Plut. i. 14; Dionys. ii. 30, &c.) Livy (i. 9) calls the god Neptunus Equestris. Hartung (Die Religion, d. Rom. ii. p. 87) has pointed out reasons sufficient to show, that Consus must be regarded as an infernal divinity; this notion is implied in the tradition of his altar being found under the earth, and also in the fact that nules and horses, which were under the especial protection of the infernal divinities, were used in the races at the Consualia, and were treated with especial care and solemnity on that occasion. [L. S.]

COON (Kepas), a son of Antenor and brother of Iphidamas, who wounded Agamemnon, but was afterwards slain by him. He was represented on the chest of Cypselus. (Hom. II. xi. 248, 36., xii. 53; Paus. v. 19, 5.)

COPHEN or COPHER (Kephes, Kephés), son of the satrap Arabazus (No. 4 p. 368 b.), was appointed to convey Damascus the treasures of Dareius, when the latter marched from Babylon to meet Alexander, B. C. 333. (Arr. Anat. ii. 15; comp. Curt. iii. 10.) The favour with which Alexander regarded Arabazus was extended also to Cophen, whom we find mentioned among the young Asiatic nobles that were enrolled in the body of cavalry called Aygma, in the reorganization of the army in B. C. 124. (Arr. Anat. vii. 6; comp. Polyb. v. 23, 63, xxxi. 5.) [E. E.]

COPONIUS, the name of a Roman family, which originally came from Tiber. The name occurs in an inscription found at Tiber. 1. T. COPONIUS, of Tiber, a man of distinguished merit and rank, was made a Roman citizen upon the condemnation of C. Massa, whom he accused. (Cic. pro Balb. 23.)

2. M. COPONIUS, had a celebrated lawsuit respecting an inheritance with M. Curius, B. C. 93. The cause of Coponius was pleaded by Q. Scaevola, and that of Curius by L. Crassus, in the court of the centumviri. (Cic. de Oroat. i. 39, ii. 52, Brut. 52.) [Curius.]

3. 4. T. and C. COPONIUS, two grandsons of No. 1, are spoken of by Cicero in B. C. 56 as two young men of great acquirements. (Cic. pro Balb. 23, pro Caed. 10.) C. Coponius is probably the same as No. 6.

5. COPONIUS, was left in command of Casarae in the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians, B. C. 53. (Plut. Crass. 27.) He may also have been the same as No. 6.

6. C. COPONIUS, one of the praetors on the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49. He espoused the side of Pompey, followed him into Greece, and had the command of the Rhodian ships jointly with C. Marcellus. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 12, 2; Caesar B. C. iii. 5, 26; Cic. de Div. i. 32, ii. 55.) Coponius was procured by the treachery in B. C. 43, but his wife obtained his pardon from Antony by the sacrifice of her honour. (Appian, B. C. iii. 40.) He is afterwards mentioned shortly before the battle of Actium as the father-in-law of Silus, and as a greatly respected member of the senate. (Vell. Pat. ii. 83.)

The following coin was probably struck by order of this Coponius. It contains on the obverse the head of Apollo, with the inscription Q. Coponius III Vir (that is, of the mint), and on the reverse a club with the skin of a lion upon it, and the inscription C. COPONIUS PR. S. C. The reverse no doubt has reference to Hercules, whose worship prevailed at Tiber.

COPO'NIUS, a Roman sculptor, author of the fourteen statues of nations conquered by Pompey, which were placed at the entrance of the porticoes belonging to the theatre of Pompey at Rome, which gave to this entrance the name of Porticus ad Nationes. This was built by Pompey himself, and afterwards restored by Augustus. (Pline. H. N. xxxiv. 4, §§ 12, 13; Suet. Claud. 17; Serv. Virg. Aen. viii. 720; Thiersch, Epocch. p. 596; Uph. Beschr. der Stadt Rom, iii. 3, p. 69.) [L. U.]

COPRIGUS (Kopos), a son of Pelops and father of Periobetes. After having murdered Iphitus, he fled from Elia to Mycenea, where he was purified by Eurythynes, who employed him to inform Hercules of the labours he had to perform. (Hom. II. xxv. 639; Apollod. iii. 5.) Euripides in his "Herculeides" makes him the herald of Eurythynes. [L. S.]

CORAX (Koax), a Sicilian, who, after the expulsion of Thrasebulus from Syracuse (c. 407), by his oratorical powers acquired so much influence over the citizens, that for a considerable time he was the leading man in the commonwealth. The great increase of litigation consequent on the confusion produced by the expulsion of the tyrants and the claims of those whom they had deprived of their property, gave a new impulse to the practice of forensic eloquence. Corax applied himself to the study of its principles, opened a school of rhetoric, and wrote a treatise (entitled Tēkho) embodying such rules of the art as he had discovered. He is commonly mentioned, with his pupil Thras, as the founder of the art of rhetoric; he was at any rate the earliest writer on the subject. His work has entirely perished. It has been conjectured (by Garnier, Mon. de l'Institut de France, Classe d'Histoire, vol. ii. p. 44, &c., and others), though upon very slight and insufficienf grounds, that the treatise entitled Rhetorica ad Alexander, found amongst the works of Aristotle, is the supposed lost work of Corax. (Cic. Brut. 12, de Oroat. i. 20, iii. 21; Aristrot. Rhet. ii. 24; Quintil. iii. 1; Mongiot, Bibl. Sicil. i. p. 146, &c., ii. p. 297, &c.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit, i. § 27, note 5, &c., § 68, notes 8, 27.) [C.P.M.]

CORIBIS and ORSUA, two Spanish chiefs, and cousins-German, fought in the presence of Sulpio at New Carthage in Spain, B. C. 206, for the sovereignty of the town of Ibis. (Liv. xxviii. 21; Val. Max. xii. 6, extern. 1.)

CORBULO, CN. DOMITIUS, a son of Vestilia, who was married first to Herdonius, afterwards to Pompeonius, and at last to Orfitus. He was accordingly a brother of Caesonia, the wife of Caligula. He was invested with the praetorship as early as the reign of Tiberius, and after the expiration of this office was commissioned by Tiberius and afterwards by Caligula to superintend the improvement of the high-roads in Italy, which the carelessness of the magistrates had allowed to fall into decay. While engaged upon this undertaking he committed acts of cruelty and extortion, probably in compliance with commands which he received from Caligula, who rewarded his proceedings with the honours of consul subjectus in A. D. 39. In the reign of Claudius, however, he was taken to account for these proceedings, and those who had been injured by him were indemnified as far CORDUS.

CORDACA (Κορδάκα), a surname of Artemis in Elis, derived from an indecent dance called κορδόμος, which the companions of Pelops are said to have performed in honour of the goddess after a victory which they had won. (Paus. vi. 22. § 1.)

CORDUS, AELIUS, or JUNIUS CORDUS, apparently different designations of the same individual—an historian perpetually quoted by Capitolinus—in his biographies of Albinus, the Maximins, the Gordians, and Maximus with Balbinus. He appears to have been an accurate chronicler of trivial facts. (Curt. Allii. c. ii.)

CORDUS, CAESIUS, governor of Crete, with the title of proconsul, in the reign of Tiberius, was accused by Anacharius Priscus of extortion in his province. The accusation was supported by the inhabitants of Cyrene, which was included in the province of Crete, and Cordus was condemned. (Tac. Ann. iii. 38, 70.)

CORDUS, CREMUTIUS, a Roman historian, who, after having lived long and blamelessly, was impeached by two of his own clients before Tiberius of having praised Brutus and denounced Cassius “the last of the Romans”—“a man,” says Tacitus, “no man at all, a parvenu.” His real offence, however, was the freedom of speech in which he had indulged against Sejanus, for the work in which the objectionable passages occurred had been published for many years, and had been read with approbation by Augustus himself. Perceiving from the relentless aspect of the emperor that there was no room for hope, Cordus delivered an apology, the substance of which has been preserved or fabricated by Tacitus, appealing to the impunity enjoyed under similar circumstances by all preceding annalists, and then quitting the senate-house retired to his own mansion, where he starved himself to death. (A. D. 25.) The subservient fathers ordained that his works should be burned by the acedies in the city, and by the public authorities wherever elsewhere found, but copies were so much the more eagerly treasured in concealment by his daughter Marcia and by his friends, who afterwards gave them again to the world with the full permission of Caligula. A few scanty fragments are contained in the seventh of the Scaevola of Seneca.

(Tac. Ann. iv. 34, 35; Sueton. Octav. 35, Tib. 61, Calig. 16; Senec. Scaev. vii., and especially his Consilium addressed to Marcia, the daughter of Cremutius Cordus, cc. 1 and 22; Dion Cass. lvi. 24.)

CORDUS, JUNIUS. [Cordus, Aelius.]

CORDUS, MUCIUS. This surname was borne by some of the Scaevolae [Scaevola], and occurs on the annexed coin of the Mucia gens. The obverse represents two heads, the one crowned with laurel and the other with a helmet, which would appear from the letters on each side to represent Honos and Virtus: the letters KALENI underneath refer to some members of the Fufia gens. [CALENI.] On the reverse two women are standing, the one on the left representing Italia and the one on the right Roma, the former holding a cornucopia in her hand, and the latter with a sceptre in her hand and her foot on a globe: beneath is KORDUS. Who the Calenus and Cordus ara, mentioned on the coin, is quite uncertain. The figures of Italia and Roma would seem to refer to the times when harmony was established between CORINNA. Rome and the people of Italy after the Social war. (Eckhel, v. pp. 230, 236.)

CORIOLANUS. She was named Mina (the Fly). We have mentioned a younger Corinna of Thbes, also named Myia, who was probably the same with the contemporary of Pindar. And so also is probably a Myia or Corinna of Thespiae who is mentioned (Suidas, s. v. Κοριννα). The fragments that are left may be found in Ch. Wolf's Poët. etc. Fragm. etc. Hamburg, 1734, and in A. Schneider's Poët. Graec. Fragm. Giessen, 1892. [C. P. M.]

CORINNAS (Κόριννας), was, according to Suidas (s. v.), an epic poet, a native of Ilissus, who lived before Homer, in the time of the Trojan war, and wrote an Iliad, from which Homer borrowed the argument of his poem. He also, according to the same authority, sang the war of Durdasus with the Phægianoids. He is likewise said to have been a pupil of Palamedes, and to have written in the Doric characters invented by the latter. (Suidas, s. v.; Eudocia, p. 271; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. i. 16.) [C. P. M.]

CORINTHUS (Κόρινθος), according to the local tradition of Corinth, a son of Zeus and the founder of the town of Corinth. (Paus. ii. 1. § 1; Schol. in Pind. Nem. vii. 155.) There are two other mythical beings of this name. (Paus. iii. § 8; Apollod. iii. 16. § 2.) [L. S.]

CORIOLANUS, C., or more properly, Cn. MARCIUS, the hero of one of the most beautiful of the early Roman legends, was said to have been the son of a descendant of king Ancus Marcius. His mother's name, according to the best authorities, was Vetutia (Plutarch calls her Volumnia). He lost his father while yet a child, and under the training of his mother, whom he loved exceedingly, grew up to be a brave and valiant man; but he was likewise noted for his impious and proud temper. He was said to have fought in the battle by the lake Regillus, and to have won a civic crown in it. To explain his surname, Coriolanus, the legend told how in a war with the Volscians their capital, Corioli, was attacked by the Romans. When the enemy made a sally, Marcius at the head of a few brave men drove them back, and then, single-handed (for his followers could not support him), drove the Volscians before him to the other side of the town. So in memory of his prowess the surname Coriolanus was given him. But he was too proud to be a conqueror, and excited their fear and dislike, and when he was a candidate for the consulship, they refused to elect him. After this, when there was a famine in the city, and a Greek prince sent corn from Sicily, Coriolanus advised that it should not be distributed to the commons, unless they gave up their tribunes. For this he was impeached and condemned to exile. He now took refuge among the Volscians, and promised to assist them in war against the Romans. Attius Tullius, the king of the Volscians, found a pretext for a quarrel, and war was declared. Coriolanus was appointed general of the Volscian army. He took many towns, and advanced plundering and burning the property of the commons, and the Roman allies. At last Coriolanus will be called to the fossa Civilia, or Chillian dyke. Here he encamped, and the Romans in alarm (for they could not raise an army) sent as deputies to him five consuls, offering to restore him to his rights. But he refused to make peace unless the Romans would restore to the Volscians all the lands they had taken from them, and receive all the people as citizens. To these terms the deputies could not
Now, Johannes Cuspianus "De Caesaribus et Imperatoribus" declares, that he saw in the royal Library at Buda a poem in eight books entitled "Johannis by Flavius Cresciusius Corippus", the subject of which was the war carried on against the Africans by Johannes Patricius, and he quotes the first five lines beginning

Signa, duces gentisque feras, Martisque ruinas.

Moreover, we can prove from history that Cuspianus was at Buda between the years 1510 and 1515. Secondly, it is known that as late as 1552 a MS. "De Bellis Libycis" was preserved in the monastery of the Monte Casino, bearing the name of Cresciusius, the first word being "Victorius." This does not correspond, it will be observed, with the commencement given by Cuspianus; but the difference, as we shall soon see, is only apparent. Both of the above MSS. have disappeared and left no trace behind them. Lastly, in the Vallincian library at Rome is a MS. of the tenth century, containing a collection of ancient canons, to which the transcriber has prefixed the following note: "Concordia Canonicum a Cresciusio Africa episcopo digesta sub capitis trecentis: iste nihilum Cresciusio bolla et victorius, quos Johannes Patricius nupl African de Sarmaticis egestis, hexametrar verba, verbis descriptus." &c. From this it was inferred by many scholars, that Cresciusius must have flourished towards the end of the seventh century, since we learn from Cedrenus that, in 697, the Arabians overran Africa, and were expelled by a certain Johannes Patricius despatched thither by the emperor Leontius; hence also Corippus and Cresciusius were generally distinguished from each other by the former having been proposed to be the author of the panegyric upon Justin, the latter of the Concordia Canonicum and the poem "de Bellis Libycis." Various other conjectures were formed and combinations imagined which are now not worth discussing, since a great portion of the doubt and difficulty was removed by Mauchelli in 1814, who discovered the long-lost Johannis in the library of the Marquis of Trivulz at Milan, where it had been overlooked in consequence of having been inserted in the catalogue as the production of a Johannes de Arctio, who lived towards the close of the 14th century, and who appears to have transcribed it into the same volume with his own barbarous effusions. The Prefatio to this Johannis begins

"Victorius, processe, praebatui diece lauros, while the first lines of the poem itself are the same with those quoted by Cuspianus, thus establishing the identity of the piece with that contained in the MSS. of Buda and Monte Casino, and enabling us to determine the full name of the author as given at the head of this article. The theme is a war carried on in Africa against the Moors and Vandals during the reign of Justinian, about the year 550, by a procuscal or majoris magistrate named Johannes, who is the hero of the lay. The campaign in question is noticed by Procopius (B. Y. ii. 28, B. G. iv. 17) and Paulus Diaconus. (De Gestis Longobardorum, I. 305, 307.) Of Johannes, however, we know nothing except what we are told by Procopius and by the poet himself. He was the brother of Pappus; had served along with him on two previous occasions in Africa, under Belisarius in 533, and under Germanus in 537; his father was named Evanits; his wife was the daughter of a king; his son was called Peter; he had been employed in the East against the Persians, and had been recalled from thence to head an expedition against the rebellious Moors. (Procop. l. c. and B. G. iv. 34; J ohanni. i. 197, 380, vii. 576.)

Although the designation and age of Corippus are thus satisfactorily ascertained, and the author of the Johannis is proved to be the same person with the panegyrist of Justinian's nephew, we have no means of deciding with equal certainty whether he is to be identified with the African bishop Cresconius who compiled a Canonum Bre-vierianum and a Concordia Canonicum, the former being a sort of index or table of contents to the latter, which comprises an extensive and important collection of lives of the Church, arranged not chronologically according to the date of the several councils, but systematically according to the nature of the subjects, and distributed under three hundred titles. Saxce and most writers upon the history of ecclesiastical literature place the prelate in the reign of Tiberius III. as low as A. D. 698, this epoch being assigned to him on the double supposition that he was the composer of the Libyan War and that this was the Libyan War of Leontius;
but the latter hypothesis has now been proved to be false. The epithets Africani and Grammatici —attached, as we have already seen, to the name of Corippus in the edito princes of the panegyric, the former pointing out his country, which is clearly indicated by several expressions in the work itself, the latter a complimentary designation equivalent at that period to 'learned,' convey the sum total of the information we possess concerning his personal history.

With regard to his merits, the epigrammatic censure of Beille, that he was a great flatterer arid a little poet, is perhaps not absolutely unjust;
but if we view him in relation to the state of literature in the age when he flourished, and compare him with his contemporaries, we may feel inclined to entertain some respect for his talents. He was evidently well read in Virgil, Lucan, and Claudian;
the last two especially seem to have been his models; and hence, while his language is wonderfully pure, we have a constant display of rhetorical declamation and a most ambitious straining at a philosophical bow, which is the perusal of his verses unattended with profit, insomuch as he frequently sheds light upon a period of history for which our authorities are singularly imperfect and obscure, and frequently illustrates with great life and vigour, the manners of the Byzantine court.
In proof of this, we need only turn to the 45th gibbon, where the striking description of Justin's elevation, and the complicated ceremonies which attended his coronation, is merely a translation "into simple and concise prose" from the first two books of Corippus. The text, as might be anticipated from the circumstance that each poem depends upon a single MS., that one of these has never been collated or even seen by any modern scholar, and that the other has been despo-lated at a late period by an import ignorant copyist,—is mischievously defective; nor can we form any reasonable expectation of its being materially improved.

The Edito Princes of the Panegyric is generally marked by bibliographers as having been printed by Plantin, at Antwerp, in 1581; but Puneicus (De iuretac docevit. L. L. Seneclitus, p.247) speaks as if Ruiz had previously published an edition at Madrid in 1579; to this, or these, succeeded the edition of Thomas Dempster, 8vo, Paris, 1610; of Rivinus, 8vo., Leipzig, 1663; of Ritterbusius, 4to., Alder, 1664; of Gotaeius, 8vo., Alder, 1743; and of Foggini, 4to. Rome, 1777, which completes the list.

The Johannis, discovered as described above, was first printed at Milan, 4to., 1820, with the notes of Mazzuchelli.

Both works will be found in the best form in the new Corpus Scriptorum Historiarum Byzantinum
at present in the course of publication at Bonn.
The Canonum Breviarianum and the Concordia Canonicum are printed entire in the first volume of the Bibliothecæ Juris Canonicæ published by Voelius and Justellis at Paris, fol. 1681.

The Breviarian was first published at Paris by Pithon in 1588, 8vo., and is contained in the Bibliothecæ Petriam Lugduni, vol. ix. [W. R.]

CORISCUS (Kaparos), is mentioned, with Erastus, as a disciple of Plato, by Diogenes (iii.
31, s. 46), who also states, that Plato wrote a letter to Erastus and Coriscus. (iii. 36, s. 61.)
They were both natives of Scepsis in the Troad.
(Disp. l. c.; Strab. xiii. p. 608.) [P. S.]

CORNELIA. 1. One of the noble women at Rome, who was said to have been guilty of poisoning the leading men of the state in B. C. 351, the first instance in which this crime is mentioned in Roman history. Two anecdotes were informed by a slave-girl of the guilt of Cornelia and other Roman women, and in consequence of her information they detected Cornelia and her accomplices in the act of preparing certain drugs over a fire, which they were compelled by the magistrates to drink, and thus perished. (Liv. viii. 18; comp. Val.
Max. ii. 5; § 3; August. de Civ. Dei. iii. 17;
Dict. of Ant. s. v. Venemacia.)

Family of the Cneaus.

2. Daughter of L. Cnna, one of the great leaders of the Marian party, was married to C.
Caesar, afterwards dictator. Caesar married her in B. C. 83, when he was only seventeen years of age; and when Sulla commanded him to put her away, he refused to do so, and chose rather to be deprived of her fortune and to be proscribed himself.
Cornelia bore his daughter Julia, and died before his quiescence. Caesar delivered an oration in praise of her from the Rostra, when he was quiescent. (Plut. Caes. 1, 5; Suet. Caes. 1, 5, 6; Vell. Pat. ii. 41.)

3. Sister of the preceding, was married to Cn.
Domitius Ahenobarbus, who was proscribed by Sulla in B. C. 82, and killed in Africa, whither he had fled. [Ahenobarbus, No. 6.]

Family of the Sulpianes.

4. The elder daughter of P. Scipio Africamus
the elder, was married in her father's lifetime to P.
Scipio Nasica. (Liv. xxxviii. 37; Polyb. xxxii.

5. The younger daughter of P. Scipio Africamus the elder, was married to Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, censor B. C. 169, and was by him the mother of the two tribunes Tiberius and Caius. Gracchus espoused the popular party in the commonwealth, and was consequently not on good terms with Scipio, and it was not till after the death of the latter, according to most accounts, that Gracchus married his daughter. According to other statements, however, Cornelia was married to Gracchus in the life-time of her father, and Scipio is said to have given her to Gracchus, because the latter interfered to save his brother L. Scipio from being dragged to prison. (Plut. T. Gracch. 1; Liv. xxxviii. 57.) Cornelia was left a widow with a young family of twelve children, and devoted herself entirely to their education, rejecting all offers of a second marriage, and adhering to her resolution even when tempted by Ptolemy, who offered to share his crown and bed with her. Of her numerous family three only survived their childhood,—a daughter, who was married to Scipio Africanus the Younger, and her two sons Tiberius and Cnaeus. Cornelia had inherited from her father a love of literature, and united in her person the severe virtues of the old Roman matron with the superior knowledge, refinement, and civilization which then began to prevail in the higher classes at Rome. She was well acquainted with Greek literature, and spoke her own language with that purity and elegance which pre-eminently characterizes well educated women in every country. Her letters, which were extant in the time of Cicero, were models of composition, and it was doubtless mainly owing to her judicious training that her sons became in after-life men distinguished orators and statesmen. (Comp. Cic. Brut. 58.) As the daughter of the conqueror of Hannibal, the mother of the Gracchi, and the mother-in-law of the taker of Carthage and Numantia, Cornelia occupies a prouder position than any other woman in Roman history. She was almost idolized by the people, and exercised an important influence over her two sons, whose greatness she lived to see,—and also their death. It was related by some writers that T. Gracchus was urged on to propose his laws by the reproaches of his mother, who upbraided him with her being called the mother-in-law of Scipio and not the mother of the Gracchi; but though she was doubtless privy to all the plans of her son, and probably urged him to persevere in his course, his lofty soul needed not such inducements as these to undertake what he considered necessary for the salvation of the state. Respect was paid to her by her son Cnaeus, that he dropped a law upon her intercession which was directed against M. Octavius, who had been a colleague of Tiberius in his tribunate. But great as she was, she did not escape the foul aspersions of calumni and slander. Some attributed to her, with the assistance of her daughter, the death of her son-in-law, Scipio Africanus the Younger (Appian, B. C. I. 20); but this charge is probably nothing but the base invention of party malice. She bore the death of her sons with magnanimity, and said in reference to the consecrated places where they had lost their lives, that they were sepultures worthy of them. On the murder of Cnaeus, she retired to Minturnae, where she spent the remainder of her life. Here she exercised unbounded hospitality; she was constantly surrounded by Greeks and men of letters; and the various kings in alliance with the Romans were accustomed to send her presents, and receive the like from her in return. Thus she reached a good old age, honoured and respected by all, and the Roman people erected a statue to her, with the inscription, CORNELIA, MOTHER OF THE GRACCHI. (Plut. T. Gracch. 1, 8; G. Gracch. 4, 19; Orcs. v. 12; Vell. Pat. ii. 7.)

6. Daughter of P. Cornelius Scipio (also called Q. Cæcilius Metellus Scipio, on account of his adoption by Q. Metellus), consul in b. c. 52, was first married to P. Crassus, the son of the triumvir, who perished, in b. c. 53, with his father, in the expedition against the Parthians. In the next year she married Pompey the Great. This marriage was not merely a political one; for Pompey seems to have been captivated by her. She was still young, possessed of extraordinary beauty, and distinguished for her knowledge of literature, music, geometry, and philosophy. In b. c. 49, Pompey sent her, when he abandoned Italy, with his youngest son Sextus to Leucas, where she received her husband upon his flight after the battle of Pharsalia. She accompanied him to the Egyptian coasts, saw him murdered, and fled first to Cyprus and afterwards to Cyrene. But, pardoned by Caesar, she soon afterwards returned to Rome, and received from him the ashes of her husband, which she preserved on his Alban estate. (Plut. Pompe. 55, 66, 74, 76, 78–89; Appian, B. C. i. 63; Dion Cass. xl. 51, xiii. 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 53; Lucan, iii. 23, v. 725, viii. 40, &c.)

Family of the Sullae.

7. Sister of the dictator Sulla, was married to Nonius, and her son is mentioned as grown up in b. c. 88. (Plut. Sull. 10.)

8. Daughter of the dictator Sulla, was married to Q. Pompeius Rufus, who was murdered by the Marian party, in b. c. 88, at the instigation of the tribune Sulpicius. (Liv. Epit. 77; Vell. Pat. ii. 18; Plut. Sull. 8.)

9. Another daughter of the dictator Sulla, was married first to C. Memmius, and afterwards to T. Annius Milo. She is better known by the name of Fausta. [FAUSTA.]

CORNELIA ORISTILLA. [ORISTILLA.]

CORNELIA PAULLA. [PAULLA.]

CORNELIA GENS, patrician and plebeian, was one of the most distinguished Roman gentes, and produced a greater number of illustrious men than any other house at Rome. All its great families belonged to the patrician order. The names of the patrician families are:—AERVINA, BLASIO, CETHGEUS, CINNA, COSSUS, DOBELLA, LENTULUS (with the agnomina Claudia, Codi- annus, Cnes, Getaclitus, Lepus, Malughenism, Marcellianus, Niger, Rufinus, Scipio, Spithatur, Sura), MALUGHENIS, MAMMULA, MERENDA, MERULA, RUFINUS, SCAPULA, SCIPIO (with the agnomina Africanus, Asiaticus, Asina, Barbatus, Calves, Hospitallus, Niccicus, Serapio), SISenna, and SULLA (with the agnome Felix). The names of the plebeian families are BALBUS and GALLUS, and we also find various cognomina, as Chryseogenus, Cat- lekkes, Phagolus, &c., given to freedmen of these gens. There are also several plebeians mentioned without any surname: of these an account is given under CORNELIUS. The following cognomina occur on coins of this gens:—Balbus, Blasio, Cethgeus, Cynna, Lentulus, Scipio, Sisenna, Sulla. Under the empire the number of cognomina increased considerably; of these an alphabetical list is given under Cor- nelius.

CORNELIANUS, a Roman rhetorician, who seems to have lived in the reign of M. Aurelius and Vespasian, and was secretary to the emperor M. Aurelius. The grammarian Phrynichus, who de-dedicated to Cornelius his "Elogia," speaks of him in terms of high praise, and describes him as worthy of the age of Demosthenes. (Comp. Phrynich. s. v. Basilia, p. 223, s. v. ta phrwnia, p. 579, ed. Lobeck.) Fronto (Epist. ad Amma, i. 4, p. 187 and p. 257) mentions a rhetorician of the name of Sulpicius Cornelius, but whether he is the same as the friend of Phrynichus, as Mai supposes, is uncertain, though there is nothing to oppose the supposition. [L. S.]

CORNELIUS. Many plebeians of this name frequently occur towards the end of the republic without any cognomen. [CORNELIA GENES.] Their great number is no doubt owing to the fact mentioned by Appian (B. C. i. 100), that the dictator Sulla bestowed the Roman franchise upon 10,000 slaves, and called them after his own name, "Corneli," that he might always have a large number among the people to support him. Of these the most important are:

1. CORNELIUS, a secretary (secretus) in Sulla's dictatorship, lived to become city quaestor in the dictatorship of Caesar. (Sall. Hist. in Or. Lep.; Cic. de Off. ii. 8.)

2. CORNELIUS PHAGITAS, the commander of a company of soldiers, into whose hands Caesar fell when he was proscribed by Sulla in b. c. 82. It was with difficulty that Cornelius allowed him to escape even after receiving a bribe of two talents, but Caesar never punished him when he afterwards obtained supreme power. (Suet. Caes. 74; Plut. Caes. 1.)

3. C. CORNELIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 67, whom Cicero defended. See below.

4. C. CORNELIUS, a Roman knight, and one of Catiline's crew, under whose direction L. Varinius escaped to sword of Cicero in b. c. 63, but their plan was frustrated by information conveyed to Cicero through Curius and Fulvia. When accused subsequently, he could obtain no one to defend him; but he escaped punishment probably on account of the information he gave respecting the conspiracy. When P. Sulla was accused in b. c. 62 of participation in the conspiracy, Cornelius caused his son to come forward as a witness against him. (Sal. Cat. 17, 28; Cic. pro Sull. 3, 6, 18.)

5. P. CORNELIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 51. (Cic. ad Fam. vili. 8.)

6. C. CORNELIUS, a centurion in the army of young Octavianus, was at the head of the embassy sent to Rome in n. c. 43, to demand in the name of the army the consulship for their general. When the senate hesitated to comply with their demands, Cornelius threw back his cloak, and pointing to the hilt of his sword, exclaimed, "This shall make him consent, if you won't." (Suet. Aug. 26.)

C. CORNELIUS, of a plebeian branch of the Cornelius gens, was quaestor of Pompey the Great. In the year n. c. 67, he was tribune of the plebs, and proposed a law in the senate to prevent the lending of money to foreign ambassadors at Rome. The proposition was not carried, since many of the senators derived profit from the practice, which had led to shameful abuses by the bribery and exactions which it covered. He then proposed that no person should be released from the obligations of a law except by the populace. The senate had of late exercised a power, analogous to that of the British Parliament in passing private acts, which exempt individuals in certain cases from the general provisions of the law. This power the senate was unwilling to be deprived of, and the tribune Servius Galbusus, a colleague of Cornelius, was persuaded to interpose, and prohibit the reading of the rogation by the clerk. Cornelius thereupon read it himself, and a tumult followed. Cornelius took no part in the riot, and witnessed his action by being content with a law, which made the presence of 200 senators requisite to the validity of a dispensing senate's commission. When his year of office was ended, he was accused of majesty by P. Cominius, for reading the rogation in defiance of the intercession of Galbusus; the accusation was dropped this year, but renewed in b. c. 65. Cornelius was ably defended by Cicero (part of whose speech is extant), and was acquitted by a majority of votes. [CETINUS, Nos. 5 and 6.]

In his tribunship, he was the successful proponent of a law, of which the importance can scarcely be over-rated. In order to check the partiality of occasional edicts, it was enacted by the lex Cornelini "ut pro praetore ex edictis ansa perpetuis jussit decernere." (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Edictum.)

Cornelius was a man of blameless private life, and, in his public character, though he was accused of fastidiousness by the nobles, seems to have advocated useful measures. (Asomini, in Cic. pro Cornel.; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 21, 23; Drummans Gesch. Rome, ii. p. 613.) [J. T. G.]

CORNELIUS, succeeded Fabianus as bishop of Rome on the 4th of June, a. d. 231. He is chiefly remarkable on account of the controversy which he maintained with Novatians in regard to the readmission of the Lapa, that is, Christians who after baptism, influenced by the terrors of persecution, had openly fallen away from the faith. Cornelius was disposed to be lenient towards the Novatians, but the emperor Gallus, in a. d. 252, where he soon after died, or, according to some accounts, suffered martyrdom. He is known to have written several Epistles, two of which addressed to Cyprian will be found in the works of that prelate, and in Constancus's EpistolaePontificum, p. 125, while a fragment of a third is preserved in the ecclesiastical history of Eusebius. (vi. 48.) [CYPRIANUS.] [W. R.]

CORNELIUS, SERVITUS. In the Gnaesii-Roman Epitome Legum, composed about a. d. 945 by one Emblitus, and preserved in MS. at Florence (Cod. Laurent. ixxx. 6), it is stated, that Servius Cornelius was employed by the emperor Hadrian, in conjunction with Sabini Julianus, to collect, arrange, and remodel the edicta perpetua. The passage (which, though the looseness of its dates diminishes its value, is the most explicit of the few that relate to this obscure part of legal history) is given by Klunze. (Lehrbuch der Gesch. des Röm. Rechts, p. 54.) [J. T. G.]

CORNAIDES (Kopwabdus), an intimate friend of Epicerus, is spoken of by Cicero (de Fin. v. 31) as paying a visit to Arcesilaus. The MSS. of Cicero have Carneades, but there can be little doubt that Carneades is the correct reading, since the latter is mentioned by Plutarch (non posse suaviter eum secundum Epicur. p. 1089) as a friend of Epicerus, and the former could not possibly have been the friend of Epicerus, as Carneades died in n. c. 129, and Epicurus in n. c. 209.

CORNICIN, a "horn-blower," an agnomn of Postumus Aebutius Elva, consul n. c. 442 [Elya], and a cognomen of the Opia gens. Cicero uses the form Carneus. [See No. 2.]

1. SP. OPPUS CORNIN, a plebeian, one of the two decemvirs, n. c. 450. When the other decemvirs had marched against the enemy, Cornicin was left as the colleague of App. Claudius to take care of the city; and it was he who convoked the senate when the people rose in arms upon the death of Virginia. In the next year, he was sent to prison on the evidence of an old soldier, whom, after twenty-seven years of service, he had ordered to be scourged without any cause; but Cornicin, fearing the result of a trial, put an end to his own life in prison. (Liv. iv. 35, 41, 49, 50, 58; Dionys. x. 36, xi. 23, 44, 46.)

2. (Oppius) CORNINUS, a senator, the son-in-law of Sex. Aurelius Serranus, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 57. (Cic. ad Att. i. 2.)

CORNFICICIA, daughter of Q. Cornificius [Cornificius, No. 2], was sought in marriage by Augustus Thalna in n. c. 45, when she was rather advanced in years and had been married several times; but she refused his offer, because his fortune was not large enough. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 29.)

2. Sister of the poet Cornificius, is said by Hieronymus (Chron. Eusch. Ol. 184. 4) to have written some excellent epigrams, which were extant in his time.

CORNFICICIA, the last surviving daughter of M. Aurelius, was put to death by Caracalla, and a very interesting account of her last moments and last words has recently come to light in the fragments of Dion Cassius discovered by Mai. [Mai. Fragment. Valerius, ii. p. 230.]

W. R.]

CORNFICICIA GENS, plebeian, seems to have come originally from Rhegium. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 25.) No persons of this name occur till the last century of the republic; and the first who obtained any of the higher honours of the state was Q. Cornificius, praetor, n. c. 66. On coins the name is written Cornificius, which is also the form used by Dion Cassius (xlvi. 21).

CORNFICICUS. 1. CORNFICICUS, secretary (serba) of Verres in his praetorship, n. c. 74. (Cic. in Ver. i. 57.)

2. Q. CORNFICICUS, was one of the judges on the trial of Verres, and tribune of the plebs in the following year, n. c. 69. He probably obtained the praetorship in 66, and was one of Cicero's competitors for the consulship in 64. His failure, however, did not make him an enemy of the great orator; he seems to have assisted him in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, and it was to his care that Catilicus was committed upon the arrest of the conspirators. Subsequently in n. c. 62, Cornificius was the first to bring before the senate the sacrilege of Clodius in violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. He probably died soon after this, for he is not mentioned further in the life of Cicero. He is called by Asconius "vir sobrius ac sanus." (Cic. in Verr. Act. i. 10; Ascon. in Teg. Cord. p. 82; Cic. ad Att. i. 1; Sall. Cat. 47; Appian, B. C. ii. 5; Cic. ad Att. i. 13.)

3. Q. CORNFICICUS, son of No. 2, is first mentioned in n. c. 59, as betrothing himself to the daughter of Aurelia Orestilla, the beautiful but profligate widow of Catiline. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 7.) In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, he served in 48 as the quaestor of the former, by whom he was sent into Ilyricum with the title of propraetor. By his prudence and military skill, Cornificius reduced the province to a state of obedience, and rendered no small service to Caesar's cause. (Hirt. B. Alex. 42.) He seems to have returned to Rome in the following year, and was then probably rewarded by Caesar with the augurate, as we find, from Cicero's letters, that he was in possession of that office in the next year. He also formed an intimate friendship with Cicero, several of whose letters to him are extant. (Ad Fam. xii. 17—20.)

Cornificius did not remain long in Rome. In n. c. 46, we find him in Syria, where he was observing the movements of Caecilius Bassus, and in the beginning of the following year he was appointed by Caesar governor of Syria. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 18, 19.) This office, however, he did not hold long, for on the death of Caesar, in n. c. 44, he was entrusted with the provence of Cilicia. This he maintained for the senate against L. Calvius Sabinus, and continued to adhere to the same party on the formation of the triumvirates, in 43. He sent troops to the assistance of Sex. Pompey, and gave shelter and protection to those who had been proscribed by the triumvirs. He refused to surrender his province to T. Sextius, who commanded the neighbouring province of New Africa, and who had ordered him, in the name of the triumvirs, to do so. Hereupon a war broke out between them. The details of this war are related somewhat differently by Appian and Dion Cassius; but so much is certain, that Cornificius at first defeated T. Sextius, but was eventually conquered by the latter, and fell in battle. (Appian, B. C. iii. 85, iv. 36, 53—56; Dion Cass. xlvi. 17, 21; Liv. Epit. 123.)

Cornificius was a man of literary habits and tastes. Cicero speaks highly of his judgment when he sends him in n. c. 45 a copy of his "Orator," but seems to have been somewhat respecting his oratory. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 17, 18.) Many have attributed to him the authorship of the "Rhetorica ad Herennium." Some remarks are made on this subject below.

The following coin refers to this Cornificius. It bears on the reverse the head of Ammon, and on the reverse Juno holding a shield and crowning a man who has a litus in his right hand, with the legend Q. CORNIFICIV AVGVST IMP. From the head of Ammon, it would appear to have been struck in Africa, and the title of Imperator was probably given him by his soldiers after his victory over T. Sextius.

4. L. CORNIFICIUS, was one of the accusers of Milo in b. c. 52, after the death of Clodius. (Ascon. in Milon. pp. 40, 54, ed. Orelli.) The P. Cornificius, a senator, also mentioned by Asconius (Ia Milon. p. 37), is probably the same person.

5. L. CORNIFICIUS, probably, from his pænoc- men, the son of No. 4, was the accuser of M. Brutus in the court by which the murderers of Caesar were tried. He afterwards commanded the fleet of Octavianus in the war against Sex. Pompey, and by his boldness and bravery saved the fleet when it was in great danger off the coast of Sicily (b. c. 38), and took the ship of Democrites, the admiral of the Pompeian squadron. Cornificius again distinguished himself in the campaigns of b. c. 36. He had been left over with the land forces at Tuaramenium, where they were in circumstances of the greatest peril; but by a most bold and dangerous march he arrived at Mylae, and united his army with Agrippa's. For these services he was rewarded with the consulship in the following year, b. c. 35; and he considered himself entitled to such honour from saving the lives of the soldiers, that he was accustomed afterwards at Rome to ride home upon an elephant whenever he alighted. Like the other generals of Augustus, Cornificius was obliged afterwards to expend some of his property in embellishing the city, and according to tradition it was a temple of Diana. (Plut. Brut. 57; Appian, B. C. v. 60, 86, 111—115; Dion Cass. xix. 5—7; Vell. Pat. ii. 79; Dion Cas. xix. 19; Suet. Aug. 29.)

Quintilian speaks (iii. 1. § 21, i. 3, §§ 89, 98) of one Cornificius as the writer of a work on Rhetoric; and, as some of the extracts which Quintilian gives from this work agree in many respects both in form and substance with the "Rhetorica ad Herennium," several critics have ascribed the authorship of the latter treatise to Cornificius. But the difficulties in which this matter is involved are pointed out under Cicero, p. 727, b.; and even if the "Rhetorica ad Herennium" were written by Cornificius, there is no reason to identify him either with Q. Cornificius, the father, or the son [No. 2 or 3], as is usually done. There are also chronological difficulties in this supposition which are pointed out in the Prolegomena to the first volume (p. iv.) of the complete edition of Cicero's works by Schmitz. (Lips. 1814.) The author of the work on Rhetoric referred to by Quintilian may be (though the matter is quite uncertain) the same as the writer of the "Etyma," of which the third book is quoted by Macrobius (Sat. i. 9), and which must have been composed at least subsequently to b. c. 44, as it contained a quotation from Cicero's "De Natura Deorum," which was published in that year. The etymologies of Cornificius, frequently quoted by Festus, were taken undoubtedly from this work, and are rather worse than the usual wretched etymologies of the ancients. Thus, for instance, mære is derived from mœnae, because "aqua fertur natum ut avis;" oscillare from os and eculare; supplex from nœmus "quod nova petantur conjungit," the word for marriage being of course of no consequence! Again, there is a poet Cornificius mentioned by Ovid (Fast. ii. 430), and also by Macrobius, who has preserved an hexameter line and a half of a poem of his, entitled "Glaucus." (Sat. vi. 5.) Donatus, in his life of Virgil (§§ 67, 76), likewise speaks of a Cornificius, who was an enemy and a detractor of the Maenian bard; and Sozomen tells us, that Cornificius is intended under the name of Amyntas in two passages of the Elogenes. (Serv. ad Virg. Æg. ii. 39, v. 8.) Now, it seems probable that the poet mentioned by Ovid and Macrobius are the same; but his identity with the detractor of Virgil is rendered doubtful by the statement of Hieronymus (Chron. Euseb. Ol. 184. 4), that the poet Cornificius perished in b. c. 41, deserted by his soldiers. Hayne, who is followed by Clinton, remarks, that, if the date of Hieronymus is correct, the poet Cornificius must be a different person from the detractor of Virgil, as the latter sat in judgment in the Prolegomena to the "Etyma." But Weichert (Poliorcium Lettowrense Elogiun. p. 167) observes, that as the "Culxus" was written in b. c. 44 and some of the Elogiones before b. c. 41, the rising fame of Virgil may have provoked the jealousy of Cornificius, who is described by Donatus as a man "perversae naturae." At all events, it is likely enough that the poet Cornificius is the same as the Cornificius to whom Catullus addresses his 88th poem.

CORNUUS, occurs as an agnome in the family of the Camerini, who belonged to the patrician Sulphida gens [CAMERINUS], and also as a cognomen of several plebeians whose gens is unknown.

1. C. CORNUUS, tribune of the plebs in b. c. 61, is described by Cicero as a well-meaning man, and resembling Cato in his character, whence he is called Pseudo-Cato. In 57 he held the office of praetor, and was among those who were active in bringing about the recall of Cicero from exile. (Cic. de Att. i. 14, Post. Red. in Som. 9.)

2. M. CORNUUS, a praetorian, served in b. c. 90, as legate in the Marcian war, and distinguished himself as an experienced officer. (Cic. pro Font. 15.) He is in all probability the same person with the Cornusius who, in b. c. 87, opposed Marcus and Cinna, and was saved from destruction through the intercession of his slaves. (Appian, B. C. i. 73; Plut. Mar. 43.)

3. M. CORNUUS, probably a son of No. 2, was praetor urbicus in b. c. 43, and, during the absence of the consuls Hortius and Pansa, he supplied their place at Rome: after the death of the consuls, he was ordered by the senate to superintend their funeral. When Octavianus shortly after demanded the consularship for himself, and advanced towards Rome upon the senate refusing to grant it, the three legions stationed in the city went over to Octavianus, and M. Cornusus, who had the command of one of them, put an end to his life. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 12, 16, Philipp. xiv. 14; Val. Max. v. 2. § 10; Appian, B. C. iii. 92.) [L. S.]
CORNUATUS.

CORNUATUS, a Roman historian, who, according to the account of Suidas (s. e. Κορνουτος, where, however, the account of the philosopher L. Annaeus Cornutus and the historian are jumbled together in one article), seems to have been a contemporary of Livy, but very inferior to him in point of merit. His great wealth and the circumstances of his having no children, attracted crowds of admirers around him, but no further particulars are known about him. (G. J. de Martini, Disput. lit. de L. Annaeo Cornuto, p. 8, &c.) [L. S.]

CORNUATUS, L. ANNAEUS (Ἀνναίος Κορνουτός), one of the commentators on Aristotle, concerning whose life but few particulars are known. The work of Diogenes Laërtius is believed to have contained a life of Cornutus, which, however, is lost. (Sahura, Etrebat. Pict. 889, &c.) Our principal sources of information are Suidas (s. e. Κορνουτος)—where, however, only the last words of the article refer to the philosopher, and all the rest to Cornutus the historian—and Eutocius (p. 273). Cornutus was born at Leptis in Libya, and came, probably in the capacity of a slave, into the house of the Annaeus, which was distinguished for its love of literary pursuits. The Annaeus emancipated him (whence his name Annaeus), and he became the teacher and friend of the poet Persius, on whose intellectual culture and development he exercised a very great influence. He was sent into exile by Nero, for having treasure criticized the literary attempts of the emperor. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 29.) This happened, according to Hieronymus in his Chronicle, in A.D. 68. The account of Dion Cassius furnishes a characteristic feature of the défectio peculiar to the Stoics of that time, to whom Cornutus also belonged, as we see from the fifth satire of Persius. That he was a man of very extensive knowledge is attested by the authority of Dion Cassius, as well as by the works he wrote.

One of the most important of the philosophical productions of Cornutus was his work on Aristotle's Categories, which is referred to by the later commentators, Simplicius and Porphyrius. (Schol. Aristot. p. 49, b. 13, p. 50, a. 22, ed. Brandis; Simplic. fol. 5, a., ed. Basili.) He seems to have been very partial to the study of Aristotle, for he wrote a work against Athenodorus, an opponent of the Alexandrianphilosophy, and his name is mentioned by in his exposition of the works of some of the schools. His treatise, called Beta Smadornos, bore the title Α' θεου Θεολογίας. (Simplic. p. 47, b. 22, ed. Brandis; Porphyrius, Erotes. Arist. Categ. p. 21, ed. Paris; Simplic. fol. 15, b.) He also wrote a philosophical work, entitled Ελληνική Θεωρία, which is probably still extant, and the same as the much mutilated treatise Πελάτις της των θεωριών, edited by in his "Opusculum. Mythol. Phys. Eth." p. 139. (Ritter, Gesch. d. Philos. iv. p. 202.) Others, however, consider this treatise as a mere abridgment of the original work of Cornutus. The other philosophical productions of Cornutus, which were very numerous, are completely lost, and not even their titles have come down to us. He also wrote one or two treatises on grammatical subjects. Thus he made, for example, a commentary on all Virgil's poems, which he dedicated to the poet Silini Italicus. (Suringer, Hist. Crit. Scholast. Lat. ii. p. 416, &c.) According to the fashion of the time, he also tried his hand in tragedy, in conjunction with his friend Senea and his pupil Lucan and Persius (Wecker, Griech. Trag. iii. p. 1456, &c.); and he is even said to have made attempts at writing satires. (Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. iii. p. xvi. 4.) A minute account of his relation to the poet Persius, as well as of his pupils and his literary merits, is given by Ger. de Martini, Disputatio litteraria de L. Annaeco Cornuto, Lugd. Bat. 1825, and in Otto Jahn's Prolegomena to his edition of Persius, Lipsiae, 1843, pp. viii.—xxvii. (Comp. Stuhrl, Aristotelis bei d. Kömern, p. 71, &c.) [A. S.]

CORNUATUS, CAECILIUS, a man of prae-torian rank in the reign of Tiberius, who was in-planted, in a.d. 24, in the affair between young Vibia Severus and his father, and put an end to his life to escape an unjust verdict. (Tac. Ann. iv. 26, &c.) [L. S.]

CORNUATUS TERTULLUS, was consul suffectus in A.D. 101 together with Pliny the Younger, who mentions him several times as a person of great merit. (Eupist. iv. 17, v. 15, vii. 31, 31.)

CORIOBIUS (Κόριοβοῦς), a purple-dyer of Itanus in Crete. When the Thracians were seeking for some one to lead them to Libya, where the Delphic oracle had enjoined them to plant a colony, Coriobus undertook to show them the way. He accordingly conducted a party of them to the island of Platea, off the Libyan coast, and there he was left by them with a supply of provisions, while they sailed back to Thrace to report how matters stood. As they did not however return to Platea at the time appointed, Coriobus was in danger of perishing from hunger, but was relieved by the crew of a Samian ship which had been driven to the island on its way to Egypt. (Herod. iv. 151, 152.) For the connexion of Crete with Them, and of Samos with Cyrene, see Herod. iv. 154, 162—164. [E. E.]

COROEBUS (Κόροεβοῦς), a Phrygian, a son of Mygodon, was one of the heroes that fought in the Trojan war on the side of the Trojans. He was one of the suitors of Cassandra, and was slain by Neoptolemus or Diomedes. (Paus. ix. 27, § 11; Virg. Aen. ii. 341.) [L. S.]

COROEBUS (Κόροεβοῦς), an Elecman, who gained a victory in the stadium at the Olympic games in Ol. 1. (b. c. 775.) According to tradition, he slew the demon 775 whom Apollo had sent into the country of the Argives. He was represented on his tomb in the act of killing Poene, and his statue, which was made of stone, was one of the most ancient that Pausanias saw in the whole of Greece. (Paus. i. 48, § 7, 44, § 1, v. § 3, vii. 26, § 22; Strab. viii. p. 355.) [L. S.]

COROEBUS, architect at the time of Pericles, who began the temple of Demeter at Eleusis, but died before he had completed its task. (Plut. Peric. 13.) [L. U.]

CORONA, SILI'CIUS, a senator, who voted for the acquittal of Brutus and Cassius, when Octa-tarins called upon the court to condemn the murderers of Caesar. The life of Silicius was spared at the time, but he was afterwards included in the proscription, and perished in b. c. 43. Plu-tarch calls him P. Silicius, and Appian Iliicus. (Dion Cass. lxi. 49; Plut. Brut. 27; Appian, B. C. iv. 27.)

CORONATUS, styled in MSS. Pro Clarissi-miss, the author of three pieces in the Latin Anthology (ed. Bem. i. 176, v. 155, 157, or Nos. 549—551, ed. Meyer). The first, consisting of twenty-nine hexameters, is a poetical amplification, possessing no particular merit, of the Virgilian line. Vivo equidem, vitamque eternam per omnia duco; in second and third are short epigrams, ingeniously 45 wrought upon, upon hues fattened with their own eggs. We possess no information with regard to this writer, but he probably belongs to a late period. [W. R.]

CORONIS (Koporos). 1. A daughter of Philegas and mother of Asclepius. (Ov. Fast. i. 291; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 14, 48, 59; comp. Asclepius.)

2. A daughter of Phoroneus, king of Phocis; she was metamorphosed by Athena into a crow, for when she was pursued by Poseidon, she implored the protection of Athena. (Ov. Met. ii. 550, &c.) A third Coronis is mentioned among the Hyades. (Hyg. Prae, 192.) [L. S.]

CORONUS (Koporos). 1. A son of Apollo by Chrysoberis, father of Corax and Lamedon, and king of Sicyon. (Paus. ii. 5. § 5.)

2. A son of Themistocles, grandson of Sisyphus, and founder of Coronea. (Paus. ix. 34. § 5; Müller, Orc. p. 153, &c.)

3. A son of Caemon, was a prince of the Lapi- thae, and father of Leontes and Lyside. He was slain by Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 7; Müller, Orc. pp. 194, 203.)

4. The father of the Argonaut Caemon. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16; comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 57.) [L. S.]

CORREUS, a Gaul, chief of the Bellovacii, was distinguished by a high spirit of independence and an inveterate hatred of the Romans, and was accordingly acknowledged as their commander by all the tribes which, together with the Bellovaci, made war against Caesar in B. C. 51. Correus, conducted the campaign with much ability, and, when he at length met with a decisive defeat, declined to surrender himself, and fell fighting des- perately. (Hirt. B. G. viii. 5–17.) [E. B.]

CORYNUS, a cognomen in the Valeria gens, and merely a longer form of Corvus, the surname of M. Valerius. Many writers give Corvinus as the surname of M. Valerius himsel, and his descen- dants seem to have invariably adopted the form Corvinus. [See CORVUS.] The Messaline Corvin of the Valeria gens are given under MESSALINA.

CORVUS, TACRIS STARKIUS, consul in B. C. 52; Vitia, Don Cæs. i. 25; Plin. Min. 6.) He is probably the same as the Statilius Corvinus who conspired against the emperor Claudius. (Suet. Claud. 13.)

TI. CORUNCANIAUS, a distinguished Roman pontiff and jurist, was descended from a father and a grandfather of the same name, but none of his ancestors had ever obtained the honours of the Roman magistracy. According to a speech of the emperor Claudius in Tacitus, the Coruncanii came from Cæsurium (Ann. x. 24); but Cicero makes the jurist a townsman of Tusculum (pro P. Cæs. 8). Notwithstanding his provincial extraction, this novus homo was promoted to all the highest offices at Rome; and was especially conspicuous in the business of conducting the war against Pyrrhus, the province of Etruria fell to Coruncanius, who was successful in quelling the remaining elements of disaffection, and entirely de- feated the Vulsinienses and Vulcertain. For these victories he was honoured with a triumph early in the following year. After abduding Etruria, he returned towards Rome to aid Lævinus in checking the advance of Pyrrhus. (Appian, Samn. 10. § 5.) In B. C. 270, he is said to have been censor with C. Claudius Canina. Modern writers appear to be ignorant of any ancient historical account of this censorship. In "l'Art de voir les Dates," i. p. 605, Coruncanius is inferred to have been censor in the 34th inumstrum, from the expressions of Valterius Paterculus (ii. 128), and a Claudius is wanting to complete the seven censors in that family mentioned by Suetonius. (Tiber. 1.) Seneca (de Vit. Beat. 31) says, that Cato of Utica was wont to praise the age of M. Curius and Coruncanius, when it was a censorian crime to possess a few thin plates of silver. Niebuhr (iii. p. 553) speaks of this censorship as missing; but, though it is not mentioned by the epitomizer of Livy, we suspect there is some classical authority extant concerning it, known to less modern scholars, for Panticoli (de Clar. Interp. p. 21) says, that Coruncanius was censor with C. Claudius; and Val. Forsterus (Historia Juris, fol. 41, b.) states, that in his censorship the population included in the census amounted to 277,222.

About B. C. 254, Coruncanius was created pontifex maximus, and was the first plebeian who ever filled that office (Livy, Epit. xviii.), although, before that time, his brother jurist, P. Sempronius Saphus, and other plebeians, had been pontifices. (Livy, x. 28.) In B. C. 246, he was appointed dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia, in order to prevent the necessity of recalling either of the consuls from Sicily; and he must have died shortly afterwards, at a very advanced age (Cic. de Senec. 6), for, in Liv. Epit. xix., Caecilius Metellus is named as pontifex maximus.

Coruncanius was a remarkable man. He lived on terms of strict friendship with M. Curius and other eminent statesmen of his day. He was a Roman sago (sapiens), a character more practical than that of a Grecian philosopher, but he was sufficiently versed in the learning of the times. That philosophy which placed the highest good in pleasure he rejected, and, with M. Curius, wished that the enemies of Rome, Pyrrhus and the Sam- nites, could be taught to believe its precepts. He was a manly orator; his advice and opinion were respected in war as well as in peace, and he had great influence in the senate as well as in the public assembly. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 33.) Cicero, who often sounds his praises, speaks of him as one of those extraordinary persons whose greatness was owing to a special Providence. (De Nat. Deor. ii. 66.) To the highest acquirements of a politician he united profound knowledge of pontifical and civil law. Pomponius (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 2. § 39) says, that he left behind no writings, but that he gave many oral opinions, which were handed down to remembrance by legal tradition. Cicero says, that the Pontificem Commentarii afforded proof of his surpassing abilities (Brut. 14.) and, in the treatise de Legibus (ft. 21), he cites one of his memo- randa. Another of his legal fragments is preserved by Pliny. (H. N. v. 23. § 51.) He is supposed to have composed a passage in Séneca (Ep. 114.), that writings of Coruncanius were extant in his time, for he there ridicules the affectation of orators, who, thinking Gracchus and Crassus and Curio too modern, went back to the language of the 13 Tables, of Apius, and of Coruncanius.

There is a passage relating to Coruncanius in Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 8. § 35), which has given occasion to much controversy. He says that Coruncanus was the first who publicly professed law, since, before his time, jurists endeavoured to conceal the jus civile, and gave their time, not to students, but to those who wanted their advice. The statement as to the early concealment of the law has been supposed to be fabulous (Puchius, Institutiones, i. p. 391); but here it is proper to distinguish between the rules applicable to ordinary dealings on the one hand, and the technical regulations of the calendar, of procedure and of civil cases, on the other. Schrader (in Hugo's Civil. Mag., v. p. 187) assumes that it was usual for jurists before Coruncanus to admit patrician students—those at least who were destined for the college of pontiffs—to learn law by being present at their consultations with their clients. He further thinks that Coruncanus did not profess to give any systematic or peculiar instruction in the theory of law, and certainly there are passages which prove that such theoretic instruction was not common in the time of Cicero. (Cic. Brut. 69, de Amic. 1, de Leg. i. 4, de Off. ii. 13.) Schrader therefore comes to the conclusion, that Coruncanus first publicly professed law only in a sense, that is, he was the first to allow plebes and patricians indiscriminately to learn law by attending his consultations. This interpretation, though it is ingenious, and has found favour with Hugo (R. R. G. p. 460) and Zimmern (R. R. G. i. § 53), appears to us to be very strained, and we think Pomponius must have meant to convey, whether rightly or wrongly, first, that before Coruncanus, it was not usual for jurists to take pupils; and, secondly, that the pupils of Coruncanus were not left to gain knowledge merely by seeing business transacted and hearing or reading the opinions given by their master to those who consulted him, but that they received special instruction in the general doctrines of law.

The two Coruncani who were called c. 229 as ambassadors from Rome to Tenta, queen of Illyricum, to complain of the maritime depredations of her subjects, and one of whom at least was put to death by her orders, were probably the sons of the jurist. (Appian, de Rebus Illr. 7; Polyb. ii. 8; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6.) By Polybius they are called Caius and Lucius; by Pliny, P. Junius and Tiberius.

Titis for Tiberius, and Coruncanus for Coruncanus, are ordinary corruptions of the jurist's name.

(Rutilius, Vitae 7Clovem, c. 5; Helencius, Hist. Jur. Civ. § 118; Schwepppe, R. R. G. § 127; L. A. Würffel, Epist. de 7C. Coruncano, Hal. 17; Zimmern, Epist. de Coruncano, [J. T. C.].

CORVUS, a surname in the Aquillia and Valeria gentes. In the latter, the lengthened form Corvus was adopted after the time of M. Valerius Corvus. [See below, No. 3, and Corvus.] 1. L. Aequillius CORVUS, consular tribune in n. c. 388. (Liv. vi. 4.)

2. M. Valerius CORVUS, one of the most illustrious men in the early history of the republic, was born about n. c. 371 in the midst of the struggles attending the Licinian laws. Being a member of the great Valerian house, he had an early opportunity of distinguishing himself, and we accordingly find him serving in n. c. 349 as military tribune in the army of the consul L. Furius Camillus in his campaign against the Gauls. His celebrated exploit in this war, from which he obtained the surname of "Corvus," or "Raven," is, like many other of the achievements of the early Roman heroes, mingled with fable. A Gallic warrior of gigantic size challenged to single combat any one of the Romans. It was accepted by Valerius after obtaining the consent of the consuls, and as he was commencing the combat, a raven settled upon his helmet, and, as often as he attacked the Gaul, the raven flew at the face of the foe, till at length the barbarian fell by the sword of Valerius. A general battle then ensued, in which the Gauls were entirely defeated. On his return to Rome with ten oxen and a golden crown, and the grateful people elected him, in his absence, consul for the next year, though he was only twenty-three years of age. He was consul in n. c. 348 with L. Popilius Laenas. There was peace in that year both at home and abroad: a treaty was made with Carthage. (Liv. vii. 26, 27; Gell. ix. 11; Val. Max. viii. 15. § 5; Eutrop. iv. 6.)

In n. c. 346 Corvus was consul a second time with G. Petulatus Libo. He carried on war against the Volsci, defeated them in battle, and then took Satricum, which he burned to the ground with the exception of the temple of Matar Matura. He obtained permission of the Senate to go to Rome. (Liv. vii. 27; Consorin. de Dis Nat. 17.)

In n. c. 343 Corvus was consul a third time with A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina. Young as he was, Corvus was already regarded as one of the very first generals of the republic, and the state therefore looked up to him to conduct the war against the Samnites, which had broken out in this year. His popularity with the soldiers was as great as his military talents, and he consequently possessed unbounded influence over his troops. He was distinguished by a kind and amiable disposition, like the other members of his house; and in the camp he was in the habit of competing with the common soldiers in the athletic games which amused their leisure hours. It was fortunate for the Romans that they had such a general in the great struggle they were now entering upon. After a hard-fought and most bloody battle, Corvus entirely defeated the Samnites on mount Gaurus above Cumae; a battle which, as Niebuhr remarks, seldom as it is mentioned, is one of the most memorable in the history of the world, since it was a presage of the result of the great contest which had then begun between Sabellians and Latins for the sovereignty of the world. Meanwhile the colleague of Corvus had been in the greatest danger in the mountain passes near Casdium, where the Romans met with such a disaster twenty-one years afterwards; but the army was saved by the valor of P. Decius. Corvus seems to have joined his colleague shortly afterwards, and with their united forces, or with his own alone, he gained another brilliant victory over the Samnites near Susaelua. Forty thousand shields of those who had been slain or had fled, and a hundred and seventy standards are said to have been piled up before the consul. His triumph on his return to Rome was the most brilliant that the Romans had yet seen. Corvus gained these two great victories in his twenty-ninth year, and he is another instance of the fact which we so frequently find in history, that the greatest military talents are mostly developed at an early age. (Liv. vii. 20—33; Appian, Senn. 1.)
In the year following, n. c. 313, Corvus was appointed dictator in consequence of the mutiny of the army. The legion stationed at Capua and the surrounding Campanian towns had openly rebelled, marched against Rome, and pitched their camp within eight miles of the city. Here they were met by Corvus at the head of an army; but before proceeding to use force, he offered them peace. This was accepted by the soldiers, who could place implicit confidence in their favourite general and a member likewise of the Valerian house. Through his influence an amnesty was granted to the soldiers and this was followed by the enactment of several important laws. Another account, however, of this revolt has been preserved, and the whole subject has been investigated by Niebuhr (iii. p. 63, &c.) at great length. (Liv. vii. 40—42.)

In n. c. 325 Corvus was elected consul a fourth time with M. Attilius Regulus, since the Sibylline books had joined the Ausonians of Calessi, and the senate was anxious that the war should be entrusted to a general on whom they could entirely depend. The consul accordingly did not draw lots for their provinces, and that of Calessi was given to Corvus. He did not disappoint their expectations. Calessi was taken without the least surprise, and, in consequence of the importance of its situation, the Romans settled there a colony of 2,500 men. Corvus obtained the honour of a triumph, and also the surname of Calenus from the conquest of the town. (Liv. viii. 18.)

With the exception of the years n. c. 329 and 320, in which he acted as interrex (vii. 17, ix. 7), we do not hear of Corvus again for several years. The M. Valerius, who was one of the legates of the dictator L. Papirius Cursor in the great battle fought against the Samnitis in n. c. 309, is probably the same as our Corvus, since Livy says, that he was created praetor for the fourth time as a reward for his services in this battle, and we know that Corvus held curule dignities twenty-one times. (ix. 40, 41.)

In n. c. 301, in consequence of the dangers which threatened Rome, Corvus, who was then in his 70th year, was again summoned to the dictatorship. Etruria was in arms, and the Marsi, one of the most warlike of the neighbouring people, had also risen. But the genius of Corvus again triumphed. The Marsi were defeated in battle; several of their fortified towns, Millitona, Plesitana, and Fretilia, were taken; and the Marsi were glad to have their ancient alliance renewed on the forfeiture of part of their land. Having thus quickly and easily the want, Corvus, n. c. 323, marched into Etruria; but, before commencing active operations, he had to return to Rome to renew the auspices. In his absence, his master of the horse was attacked by the enemy while on a foraging expedition, and was shut up in his camp with the loss of several of his men and some military standards. This disaster caused the greatest terror at Rome; a "justitium" or universal cessation from business was proclaimed, and the gates and walls were manned and guarded as if the enemy were at hand. But the arrival of Corvus in the camp soon changed the posture of affairs. The Etruscans were defeated in a great battle; and another triumph was added to the laurels of Corvus. (L. 3—5.)

In n. c. 300, Corvus was elected consul for the fifth time with Q. Appuleius Paenas. The state of affairs at home rather than those abroad led to his election this year. There must have been severe struggles between the two orders for some time previously, and probably both of them looked to Corvus as the man most likely to bring matters to an amicable settlement. During his fifth consulship the Oguilani law was passed, by which the colleges of pontiffs and augurs were thrown open to the plebeians. The consul himself renewed the law of his ancestor respecting the right of appeal (provecto) to the people, and rendered it more certain to be observed by affixing a definite punishment for any magistrate who transgressed it. (x. 5, 6—9.)

In n. c. 299 Corvus was elected consul a sixth time in place of T. Manlius Torquatus, who had been killed by a fall from his horse while engaged in the Etruscan war. The death of so great a man, and the superstitious feeling attending it, inclined the people unanimously to appoint Corvus to the vacant office. The Etruscans, who had been elated by the death of Torquatus, no sooner heard of the arrival of Corvus, than they kept close within their fortifications, nor could he provoke them to a battle, although he set whole villages on fire. (x. 11.)

From this time, Corvus retired from public life; but he lived nearly thirty years longer, and reached the age of a hundred. His health was sound and vigorous to the last, and he is frequently referred to by the later Roman writers as a memorable example of the favours of fortune. He was twice dictator, six times consul, and had filled the curule chair twenty-one times. He lived to see Pyrrhus driven out of Italy, and the dominion of Rome firmly established in the peninsula. He died about n. c. 217, seven years before the commencement of the first Punic war. (Cic. de soc. 17; Val. Max. viii. 13, § 1; Plut. H. N. vii. 48, s. 49; Niebuhr, iii. 124.)

A statue of Valerius Corvus (n. c. 325) was erected by Augustus in his own forum along with the statues of the other great Roman heroes. (Gell. ix. 11; comp. Suet. Aug. 31.)

2. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MAXIMUS CORVUS, son apparently of the preceding, was consul with Q. Caecilius Noctua in n. c. 239; but his name occurs only in the Fasti.

CORYBANTES. [CARKERT AND CYRENE.] CORY'CIA (Korýciα or Korýcia), a nymph, who became by Apollo the mother of Lycurus or Lycurgos, and from whom the Corycian cave in mount Parnassus was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. ii. 23, § 2.) The plaited, Coryciae, is applied to the daughters of Ploutos. (Apoll. Rhod. ii. 710; Ov. Met. i. 320, Harold. xx. 221.)

CORYDUS (Kórudos), a surname of Apollo, under which the god had a temple eighty staadia from Corone, on the sea-coast. (Paus. iv. 34, § 4, &c.)

CORYLAS. [CORVS, No. 1.] CORYPHAEEA (Korýphaia), the goddess who inhabits the summit of the mountain, a surname of Artemis, under which she had a temple on mount Coryphaeaeon, near Epidaurus. (Paus. ii. 23, § 2.) It is also applied to designate the highest or supreme Zeus and is consequently given as an epithet to Zeus. (Paus. ii. 4, § 5.)

CORYPHAE'ASIA (Korýphaeasia), a surname of COSCONIUS.
Athena, derived from the promontory of Corphynion, on which she had a sanctuary. (Paus. iv. 36. § 2) [L. S.]

CORYTHIA/LLIA (Κορυθη/λλία), a surname of Artemis at Sparta, at whose festival of the Thiothnidia the Spartan boys were carried into her sanctuary. (Athen. iv. p. 139.) [L. S.

CORYTHIUS (Κόρυθιος). 1. An Italian hero, a son of Jupiter, and husband of Electra, the daughter of Atlas, by whom he became the father of Jason and Dardanus. He is described as king of Thessaly, and as the founder of Corythus. (Cotton: Serv. ad Aen. iii. 167, vii. 207, x. 719.)

2. A son of Paris and Oenone. He loved Helena and was beloved by her, and was therefore killed by his own father. (Purt. Eret. 54.) According to other traditions, Oenone made use of him for the purpose of provoking the jealousy of Paris, and thereby causing the ruin of Helena. (Conon, Narrat. 22; Tacta. ad Lycoeph. 57.) Others again call Corythus a son of Paris by Helena. (Dictys. Cret. v. 5.) There are four other mythical personages of this name. (Ptolemais: Heph. ii. p. 611; Ov. Met. v. 125, xii. 299; Paus. i. 14. § 6; L. S.)

COSCIA/LIA GENS, plebeian. Members of this gens are first mentioned in the second Punic war, but none ever obtained the honours of the consulship: the first who held a curule office was M. Coscinus, praetor in b. c. 135. [COSCINUS.]

COSCINUS. 1. M. COSCINUS, military tribune in the army of the praetor P. Quintilius Varus, fell in the battle fought with Mago in the land of the Insurbian Gauls, b. c. 203. (Liv. xxx. 18.)

2. M. Coscinus, perhaps grandson of the preceding, praetor in b. c. 153, fought successfully with the Scordisci in Thrace. (Liv. Epit. 56.)

3. C. COSCINUS, praetor in the Social war, b. c. 89, distinguished himself in the command of one of the Roman armies. According to Livy (Epit. 75) Coscinus and Lucecius defeated the Samnites in battle, slew Marius Egnatius, the most distinguished of the enemy's generals, and received the surrender of very many towns. Appian (B. C. i. 52) says, thus Coscinus burnt Sulane, took possession of Camna, and then proceeded to besiege Caesiumi; but a Samnite army came to the relief of the town, which defeated Coscinus and obliged him to fall back upon Camna. Trebiati, the Samnite general, following up his advantage, crossed the Aufidius, but was attacked, immediately after his passage of the river, by Coscinus, defeated with a loss of 15,000 men, and fled with the remnant to Caesiumi. Horace, Coscinus marched into the territories of the Larinates, Venusini, and Apulini, and conquered the Poecilii in two days. Most modern commentators identify Egnatius and Trebiatus, and suppose that Appian has made a mistake in the name (Schweigh. ad App. l.c.); but Livy and Appian probably speak of two different battles.

The above-named Coscinus seems to be the same with the C. Coscinus who was sent into Illyricum, with the title of proconsul, about b. c. 78, and who conquered a great part of Dalmatia, took Salone, and, after concluding the war, returned to Rome at the end of two years' time. (Eutr. vi. 4; Oros. v. 25; comp. Cic. pro Cluent. 33.)

4. C. COSCINUS CALDIDIANUS, adopted from the Calidiana gens, a Roman orator of little merit, distinguished for his vehement action and gesticulation (Cic. Brut. 69), is perhaps the same person as the preceding or succeeding.

5. C. COSCINUS, praetor in b. c. 63, the same year that Cicero was consul, obtained in the following year the province of Pannonia, with the title of proconsul, and was, it seems, on his return accused of extortion, but acquitted. He was one of the twenty commissioners appointed in b. c. 59 to carry into execution the agrarian law of Julius Caesar for dividing the public lands in Campania, but he died in this year, and his vacant place was offered to Cicero by Caesar, who wished to withdraw him from the threatened attack of Clodius. This offer, however, was refused by Cicero. (Cic. pro Sest. 14, in Vatin. 5; comp. Val. Max. viii. 1. § 6; Cic. ad Att. ii. 19, ix. 2, 4; Quintil. xiii. 1. § 16.)

6. C. COSCINUS, tribune of the plebs in b. c. 59, when he was one of the colleagues of P. Vatinius, aedile in 57, and one of the judges in the following year, 56, in the trial of P. Sextius. In the same year, Cato, the tribune of the plebs, purchased of Coscinus some bestiarii which the latter had unduly exhibited the year before in the games of his aedilship. It seems that Coscinus subsequently obtained the aedilsiphip, for Plutarch states, that Coscinus and Gabba, two men of praetorian rank, were murdered by Caesar's soldiers in the mutiny in Campania, b. c. 47, and we know of no other Coscinus who is likely to have been praetor. (Cic. in Vatin. 7, ad Q. Fr. ii. 6; Plut. Caes. 51; comp. Dion. Cass. xiii. 52, Suetonius 80.)

7. COSCINUS, a writer of Epigrams in the time of Martial, attacked the latter on account of the length of his epigrams and their lascivious nature. He is severely handled in two epigrams of Martial. (II. 77, iii. 69; comp. Weichert, Poetorum Latinorum Notitia, p. 249, &c.) Varro speaks (L. L. vi. 36, 89, ed. Müller) of a Coscinus who wrote a grammatical work and another on "Actiones," but it is uncertain who he was.

It is also doubtful to which of the Coscinii the following coin refers. It contains on the obverse the head of Pallas, with L. Cosc. M. r., and on the reverse Mars driving a chariot, with L. L. C. CN. DOM. It is therefore supposed that this Coscinus was a trimvir of the mint at the time that L. Licinius and Cn. Domitius held one of the higher magistracies; and as we find that they were censors in b. c. 92, the coin is referred to that year. (Eckhel. v. p. 166.)

COSMAGAS, a Thracian chief, and priest of Juno, whose strategem for securing the obedience of his people is related by Polyzenus. (Sueton. viii. 51 and undoubtedly excised the fourth century after Christ. He is said to have been the brother of St. Damiani, with whose name his own is constantly associated, and under which article the particulars of their lives and deaths are mentioned. A medical prescription attributed to them is preserved by Arnaldus Villanovanus (Antiquit. p. 453, in Operis, ed. Basili. 1565), and there are several Greek homilies still extant in MS., written or preached in their honour. Their memory is observed by the Greek and Roman Churches on the 27th of September. (Ada Sac. Sept. vol. vii. p. 425; Böhrer, De Cosma et Dano... Commentarii, Helmst. 1751, 4to; Fabric. Bibli. Gr. vol. ix. p. 68, xiii. 128, ed. vet.; Bozovius, Nomenclator Sanctorum Professions Medocorum; Carpozovius, De Medicis ab Ecclesia pro Sanctis habitis.)

[W. A. G.]

COSMAS (Koσμας), of Jerusalem, a monk, the friend and companion of John of Damascus, and afterwards bishop of Maiuma in Palestine (about A. D. 743), was the most celebrated composer of hymns in the Greek church, and obtained the surname of μελέδος. Among his compositions was a version (εικονικος) of the Psalms of David in an Islamic metre. Many of his hymns exist in MSS., but a compilation of the best has been published. Fabricius mentions, as a rare book, an Aldine edition of some of them. Thirteen of them are printed in Gallond's Biblioth. Patrum. Several of the hymns of Cosmas are acrostics. (Suid. s. v. Χριστιανος δ Αποστολος; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. xi. pp. 173—181, viii. 596.)

[P. S.]

COSMAS (Κοσμας), commonly called INDICOPLESSITES (Indian navigator), an Egyptian monk, who flourished in the reign of Justinian, about A. D. 533. In early life he followed the employment of a merchant, and was extensively engaged in traffic. He navigated the Red Sea, advanced to India, visited various nations, Ethiopia, Syria, Arabia, Persia, and almost all places of the East. Impelled, as it would appear, more by curiosity than by desire of gain, eager to inspect the habits and manners of distant people, he carried on a commerce amid dangers sufficient to appeal the most adventurous. There is abundant reason for believing, that he was an attentive observer of every thing that met his eye, and that he carefully registered his remarks upon the scenes and objects which presented themselves. But a migratory life became irksome. After many years spent in this manner, he bade adieu to worldly occupations, took up his residence in a monastery, and devoted himself to a contemplative life. Possessed of multitudinous knowledge acquired in many lands, and doubtless learned according to the standard of his times, he began to embody his information in books. His chief work is his Topographia Χριστιανωχ, "Topographia Christiana, sive Christianorum Academic de Monte," in twelve books. The last book, as hitherto published, is imperfect at the end. The object of the treatise is to shew, in opposition to the universal opinion of astronomers, that the earth is not spherical, but an extended surface. The arguments adduced in proof of such a position are drawn from Scripture, reason, testimony, and the authority of the fathers. Weapons of every kind are employed against the prevailing theory, and the earth is affirmed to be a vast oblong plain, its length from east to west being more than twice its breadth, the whole enclosed by the ocean. The only value of the work consists in the geographical and historical information it contains. Its author describes in general with great accuracy the situation of countries, the manners of their people, their modes of commercial intercourse, the nature and properties of plants and animals, and many other particulars of a like kind, which serve to throw light on the Scriptures. His illustrations, which are far from being methodically arranged, touch upon subjects the most diverse. He speaks, for example, of the locality where the Israelites passed through the Red Sea, their garments in the wilderness, the terrestrial paradise, the epistle to the Hebrews, the birthday of the Lord, the rite of baptism, the Catholic epistles, Egyptian hieroglyphics, the state of the Christians in India, their bishops, priests, &c. But the most curious and interesting piece of antiquarian information relates to that celebrated monument of antiquity which was placed at the entrance of the city Adulte, consisting of a royal seat of white marble consecrated to Mars, with the images of Hercules and Mercury sculptured upon it. On every side of this monument Greek letters were written, and an ample inscription had been added, as has been generally supposed, by Ptolomy II. Euergetes (s. c. 247—221 B.C.). This was ordered by Cosmas, the author is given, with notes, in the second book of the Topography. It appears, however, from the researches of Mr. Salt, that Cosmas has made two different inscriptions into one, and that while the first part refers to Ptolomy Euergetes, the second relates to some Ethiopian king, whose conquests are commemorated on the inscription. The author also inserts in the work, in illustration of his sentiments, astronomical figures and tables. We meet too with several passages from writings of the fathers now lost, and fragments of epistles, especially from Athanasius.

Phocas (cod. 36) reviewed this production without mentioning the writer's name, probably because it was not in the copy he had before him. He speaks of it under the title of Χριστιανωχ Βίος, "Christianorum liber, Expositio in Octateuchum;" the former, as containing the opinion of Christians concerning the earth; the latter, because the first part of the work treats of the treatises of Moses and other things described in the Pentateuch. The same writer affirms, that many of Cosmas's narratives are fabulous. The monk, however, relates events as they were commonly received and viewed in his own time. His dictum is plain and familiar. So far is it from approaching elegance or elevation, that it is even below mediocrity. He did not aim at pompous or polished phraseology; and in several places he modestly acknowledges that his mode of expression is homely and inelegant.

Manuscripts vary much in the contents of the work. It was composed at different times. At first it consisted of five books; but in consequence of various attacks, the author added the remaining seven at different periods, enlarging, correcting, and curtailing, so as best to meet the arguments of those who still contended that the earth was spherical. This accounts for the longer and shorter forms of the production in different manuscript copies. The entire treatise was first published by Bernard de Montfaucon, from a MS. of the tenth century, in Greek and Latin, in his Observa Novae traditionis Christianae, fol. Paris, 1768, vol. ii. pp. 112—346, to which the editor prefixed an able and learned preface. This is the best edition. It is also printed in the Bibliotheca Vett. Patrum edited by Gallund, Ven. 1768, vol. ix.
COSINIUS.

We learn from Cosinus himself, that he composed a Universal Cosmography, as also Astronomical tables, in which the motions of the stars were described. He was likewise the author of a Commentary on the Canticles and an exposition on the Psalms. These are now lost. Leo Allatius thinks that he wrote the Chronicon Alexandrinum; but it is more correct to affirm, with Cave, that the author of the Chronicle borrowed largely from Cosmas, copying without scruple, and in the same words, many of his observations. (Montfaucon, *Nova Collectio Patrum et Scriptor. Graecior. vol. ii.; Cave, Historia Literaria, vol. i. pp. 515-16, Oxford, 1702; Bischoff, Gesch. der German. Philologie, p. 55.)

COSMAS, a Greek Roman jurist, usually named COSMAS MAGISTER, probably because he filled the office of magister officiorum under Romanus Senior; although Reiz, in the index of proper names subjoined to his edition of Harenopolus in the supplementary volume of Meermann's Theaurus, is inclined to think that Magister was a family surname. In Leucanius (J. G. R. ii. pp. 166, 167) are two sententiae (ψηφοι) of Cosmas in the style of imperial constitutions, as if he had been authorized by Romanus to frame legal regulations. It farther appears from a Novell of Romanus, published in the collection of Leucanius (l. p. 149), that Cosmas was appointed by the emperor in the composition of his laws. Hence Assemani (Bibl. Jur. Oriental, lib. ii. c. 29, pp. 589—594) is disposed to ascribe to Cosmas a legal work which is preserved in manuscript in the Royal Library at Vienna. It is a system or compendium of law, divided into 50 titles, and compiled in the first year of Romanus Senior (A. d. 919 or 920) under the name Διάλογος τῶν ἐν ἑπτάδι ἔκτελεσιν. (Lambecius, *Comment. in Bibl. Vindob. vi. p. 38; Zachariae, Hist. J. G. R. § 37.) The preface and tit. 1. of this work were first published by Zachariae in his edition of the Procheiron of Basilieus (δικαίωσεν τῶν, Heidelb. 1837). Codenus (in Constantino et Romanu) mentions Cosmas as a patrician and logotheta dromi, the hippodromus being the name of the highest court of justice in Constantinople. Harenopolus, in the preface to his Hexabiblia, acknowledges his obligations to the Roman of Magister (τὰ Ρώμαικα τοῦ Μαγαστῆρος λεγομένα), and Jac. Godfrey supposes that Cosmas is meant. In this, as in most other questions in the history of Graeco-Roman law, there is great difficulty in arriving at the truth; but we believe the Magister referred to by Harenopolus to be Eustathius Patricius Romanus. (Reiz, *Ad Harenopol. in Moern. Thes. vii. p. 6, n. 8, ib. pp. 392, 400; Pohl, *ad Suprae. Notit. Rust. p. 15, n. (9), ib. p. 52, n. (7); Zachariae, Hist. Jur. G. R. § 41.) [J. T. G.]

COSMAS (Κόσμας), a MOC, according to the title in Brunck's Anacolutha, but according to that in Stephen's edition of the Planedium Anthropology, a mechanician, is the author of one epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Anab. iii. p. 197; Jacobs, iv. p. 96.) Whether he is the same person as COSMAS INDEPLEDISTES, or as the COSMAS OF JERUSALEM, or whether he was different from both, is altogether uncertain. [P. S.]

COSIOS, king of Parthia. [ARSACES XXV.]

COSIOS, king of Persia. [SASSANIDAE.]

COSINIUS, the name of a Roman family which came from Tibur. None of its members ever obtained any of the higher offices of the state.

1. L. COSINIUS, of Tibur, received the Roman franchise in consequence of the condemnation of T. Caecilius, whom he had accused. (Cic. pro Balb. 25. He is perhaps the same as the Cosinius who was one of the legates in the army of the praetor P. Varinius, and who fell in battle against Spartacus, b. c. 73. (Plut. Cass. 9.)

2. L. COSINIUS, a Roman knight and son of the preceding (Cic. pro Balb. 23.), was a friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Varro. Cicero mentions his death in b. c. 45, and expresses his grief at his loss. (Cic. *ad Att. i. 19, 20, ii. 1, ad Fam. xii. 23; Var. R. R. iv. 1; ad Att. xii. 46.)

3. L. COSINIUS ANCIULLUS, a freedman of Nero, 2, is mentioned and excused by Cicero in Letters to Sen. Sulpicius in b. c. 46. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. xiii. 23.

4. COSINIUS, a Roman knight and a friend of Nero's, was poisoned by mistake by an Egyptian physician, whom the emperor had sent for in order to cure his friend. (Plin. H. N. xxxix. 4. s. 30.)

COSUS, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelia gens. This family produced many illustrious men in the fifth century before the Christian era, but afterwards sunk into oblivion. The term "Cosus" was afterwards revived as a praenomen in the family of the Lentuli, who belonged to the same gens. The Cosus and Malignineses were probably one family originally. For at first both these surnames were united, as for instance, in the case of Serc. Cornelius Cosus Maligninensis, consul in b. c. 435. [MALIGNINENS.]

Afterwards, however, the Cosus and Malignineses became two separate families.

1. SER. CORNELIUS M. F. L. N. COSUS, one of the three consular tribunes in b. c. 434, though other authorities assign consuls to this year. (Diod. xii. 53; Liv. iv. 25.]

2. SER. CORNELIUS (M. F. L. N.) COSUS, probably brother of the preceding, was consul in b. c. 429 with T. Quinctius Pompon Cincinnatus, and two years afterwards, in b. c. 426, one of the four consular tribunes, when he was entrusted with the care of the city, while his three colleagues had the conduct of the war against Veii. But the latter having met with a repulse, Cosus mounted the walls. Aemilius Mamercius dictated, who in his turn appointed Cosus master of the horse.

It was this Cosus who killed Luc Tolumnius, the king of the Veii, in single combat, and dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius—the second of the three instances in which the spoils opima were won. But the year in which Tolumniun was slain, was a subject of dispute even in antiquity. Livy following, as he says, all his authorities, places it in b. c. 457, nine years before the consulship of Cosus, when he was military tribune in the army of Man. Aemilius Mamercinus, who is said to have been dictator in that year likewise. At the same time the historian brings forward several reasons why this was improbable, and mentions in particular that Augustus had discovered a crenen brevispines in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, on which it was stated that the consul Cosus had won these spoils. But as the year of Cosus's consulship was, according to the annalists, one of pestilence and dearth without any military operations, it is probable that Tolumnius was slain by Cosus in the year of his consular tribunate, when he was master of the horse, especially since it is expressly placed in that year by some writers. (Val. Max. iii. 2, § 4; Ann. Vict. de Viro. ill. 25.

In dedicating the spoils, Cosus would have added
3. P. CORNELIUS A. P. F. N. Cossus, consul tribune in b. c. 415. (Liv. iv. 49; Dion. xiii. 34.)

4. CN. CORNELIUS A. F. M. N. Cossus, consul, tribune in b. c. 414, and consul in 409 with L. Furius Medullinus II., the year in which plebeian quaestors were first created. (Liv. iv. 49, 54; Dion. xiii. 38.)

5. A. CORNELIUS A. P. M. N. Cossus, brother of No. 4, consul in b. c. 413 with L. Furius Medullinus. (Liv. iv. 51; Dion. xiii. 43.)

6. P. CORNELIUS A. F. M. N. Cossus, brother of Nos. 4 and 5, consul tribune in b. c. 408, in which year a dictator was appointed on account of the war with the Volsci and Aquil. (Liv. iv. 55; Dion. xiii. 104.)

7. P. CORNELIUS M. F. L. N. Rutulus Cossus, dictator in b. c. 408, defeated the Volsci near Antium, laid waste their territory, took by storm a fort near lake Pucinus, by which he made 3000 prisoners, and then returned to Rome. He was consul tribune in b. c. 406. (Liv. iv. 56, 58.)

8. CN. CORNELIUS P. F. A. N. Cossus, consul tribune in b. c. 406, when he was left in charge of the city while his colleagues marched against Veii, consul tribune a second time in 404, and a third time in 401, in the last of which years he laid waste the country of the Cenapates, but the enemy did not venture upon a battle. Cossus was a moderate man in the party struggles of his day. He caused a third stipendium to be paid to those horsemen, who were not supplied with a horse by the state, and was supposed to have procured the elevation of his half-brother or cousin, the plebeian P. Licinius Calvis, to the consulship tribunate in b. c. 400. (Liv. iv. 56, 61, v. 10, 12.)

9. A. CORNELIUS MALAUDINUS Cossus, consul tribune in b. c. 365, when he ravaged the territory of the Falisci, and consul in 353 with L. Valerius Potitus; but he and his colleagues were obliged to resign their office in consequence of some defect in the election, and L. Lucretius Flavius Tricipitum and Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus were appointed in their stead. (Liv. v. 24; Festus.)

10. A. CORNELIUS Cossus, was appointed dictator in b. c. 385, partly on account of the Volscian war, but chiefly to crush the designs of Manlius. The dictator at first marched against the Volsci, whom he defeated with great slaughter, although their forces were augmented by the Latini, Hernici and Umbrians, and returned to Rome, threw Manlius into prison, and celebrated a triumph for the victory he had gained over the Volsci. (Liv. vi. 11—16.)

11. A. CORNELIUS Cossus, consul, tribune in b. c. 369, and a second time in 367, in the latter of which years the Licinian laws were passed. (Liv. vi. 86, 42.)

12. A. CORNELIUS Cossus Avina. [Arvina.] Cossutia, the first wife of C. Julius Caesar, belonged to an equestrian family, and was very rich. She was betrothed to Caesar by his parents, while he was very young, but was divorced by him in his seventeenth year, that he might marry Cornelia, the daughter of Cnina. (Suet. Cn. 1.)

Cossutia, gens of equestrian rank (Suet. Caes. 1), never attained to any importance. It is conjectured by some from Cicero’s mention of the Cossutianae tabulae, near Cesarea, in Gallia Cisalpina (ad Fam. xvi. 27), that the Cossutii came originally from that place. On coins of this gens we find the cognomens Maridius and Sinacula, but none occur in history.

COSSTUATUS CAPITO. [Capito, p. 602, a.]

M. COSSTUATUS, a Roman knight, a man of the greatest respectability and integrity, who lived in Sicily during the administration of Verres, and defended Xeno before the latter. (Cic. Verr. iii. 22, 30.)

Cossutius, a Roman architect, who rebuilt at the expense of Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria the temple of the Olympian Zeus at Athens, about b. c. 168, in the most magnificent Corinthian style. The temple, however, in its present form, which had been deprived of its pillars by Sulla, was finished by Hadrian. (Vitr. Propr. vii.; Liv. xii. 20; Vell. Pat. i. 10; Athen. v. p. 594, n.; Suid. ix. p. 396; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5; Jacob., Amath. ii. p. 240; Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. i. n. 362, 363.)

Cottius, a king of the Dacians, who was conquered in the reign of Augustus by Lentulus. (Flor. iv. 12; Hor. Carm. iii. 8, 18.) He seems to be the same as the Cortio, king of the Getae, to whom, according to M. Antony, Augustus be- trothed his daughter Julia, and whose daughter Augustus himself sought in marriage. (Suet. Aug. 63.)

Q. COTTIUS surnamed ACHILLES on account of his bravery, accompanied, as a legate, the consul Q. Metellus Macedonicus in his campaign against the Cutiliarii in Spain, b. c. 143, and distinguished himself by slaying two of the enemy in single combat. (Val. Max. iii. 2, § 21.)

Cotta, AURELIUS, I. C. Aurelius Cotta, was consul in b. c. 232, with P. Servilius Gemina, and both consuls carried on the war in Sicily against the Carthaginians with great success. Among several other places they also took Himera, but its inhabitants had been secretly removed by the Carthaginians. Afterwards Cotta borrowed ships from Hiero, and having united them with the remanents of the Roman fleet, he sailed to Lipara, the blockade of which he left to his tribune, Q. Casius, with the express order not to engage in a battle; but, during the absence of the consul, Cassius notwithstanding allowed himself to be drawn into an engagement, in which many Romans were killed. On being informed of this Cotta returned to Lipara, besieged and took the town, put its inhabitants to the sword, and, having deprived Cassius of his office of tribune, Cotta was celebrated for the strict discipline which he maintained among his troops, and of which several instances are on record. During the siege of Lipara one of his own kinmen, P. Aurelius Pecuniola, was scourged and degraded to the rank of a common soldier, because through his fault a part of the camp was set on fire, in consequence of which almost the whole camp fell into the hands of the enemy. It was probably during the same campaign, that he acted with great vigour towards the equites who refused to obey his commands. (Frontin. Strateg. iv. 1, § 22.) At the close of his consulship Cotta triumphed over the Carthaginians and Sicilians. In 248 he obtained the consulship a second time, together with his former colleague, P. Servilius Geminus, and again fought in Sicily against the Carthaginians. Carthala in vain endeavored to make a division by attacking the coasts of Italy, but further particulars are not known about him. (Zonar. viii. 14, 16; Oros. iv. 9; Cic. Acad. ii. 26; Frontin. Strateg. iv. 1. § 31; Val. Max. vii. 7; § 4; Fast. Capit.)

2. M. Aurinius Cotta, was plebian aedile in b. c. 216, and in had in 312 the command of a detachment at Puteoli under the consul App. Claudius Pulcher. Nine years later, in b. c. 205, he was appointed decemvir suorum, in the place of M. Pomponius Matho. The year after this he was sent as ambassador to Philip of Macedonia, and protected the Roman allies who had to suffer from the inroads of the Macedonians. After the conclusion of the war against Carthage, he urged the necessity of proceeding with energy against Philip. He died, in b. c. 201, as decemvir suorum, in which office he was succeeded by M. Aemilius Glabrio. (Liv. xxiii. 30, xxxiv. 22, xxv. 33, xxxv. 26, 42, xxvi. 3, 5, 50.)

3. C. Aurinius Cotta, was praetor urbana, in b. c. 202, and consul in 200, with P. Sulpius Galba. He obtained Italy as his province, and with it the command in the war against the Dolians, Insaurians and Cenomaniacs, who, under the command of Hamilton, a Carthaginian, had invaded the Roman dominion. The praetor, L. Furius Purpureus, however, had the merit of conquering the enemies; and Cotta, who was ignominy at the laurels being snatched from him, occupied himself chiefly with plundering and ravaging the territory of the enemy, and gained much honor by his conduct, while the praetor's enterprise was glorified as a triumph. (Liv. xxx. 26, 27, xxxvi. 5, 6, 10, 11, 21, 22, 47, 49; Zonar. ix. 25; Oros. iv. 20.)

4. M. Aurinius Cotta, was legate of L. Cornelius Scipio, in b. c. 189, during the war against Antiochus. He returned to Rome with the ambassadors of Antiochus, with Eumenes and the Rhodians, to report to the senate the state of affairs in the East. (Liv. xxxvii. 83.)

5. L. Aurinius Cotta, was tribune of the soldiers, in b. c. 181, and commanded, together with Sex. Julius Caesar, the third legion in the war against the Ligurians. (Liv. xi. 27.)

6. L. Aurinius Cotta, was tribune of the people in b. c. 154, and in reliance on the inviolable character of his office he refused paying his creditors, whereupon however his colleagues declared, that unless he satisfied the creditors they would support them in their claims. In b. c. 144, he was consul together with Ser. Sulpius Galba, and disputed in the senate which of them was to obtain the command against Vivathus in Spain; but Scipio Aemilianus carried a decree that neither of them should be sent to Spain, and the command in that country was accordingly prolonged to the pro-consul Publius Maximus Aemilius. Subsequently Cotta returned to the army by Scipio Aemilianus, and although he was guilty of glaring acts of injustice he was acquitted, merely because the judges wished to avoid the appearance of Cotta having been crushed by the overwhelming influence of his accusers. Cotta was defended on that occasion by Q. Metellus Macedonicus. Cicero states that Cotta was considered a veterator, that is, a man cunning in managing his own affairs. (Val. Max. vi. 4. § 2, 5. § 4, viii. 1. § 11; Cic. pro Muren. 28, pro Font. 18, Brut. 21, Dein Ita Cestii. 21; Tact. Ann. iii. 66.)

7. L. Aurinius Cotta, was consul in b. c. 119, and proposed in the senate that C. Marius, who was then tribune of the people, should be called to account for a law (lex Maria) which he had brought forward relative to the voting in the comitia, and which was voided at the influence of the optimates. Marius, who was summoned accordingly, appeared in the senate, but, instead of defending himself, threatened Cotta with imprisonment unless he withdrew his motion. L. Cæcilius Metellus, the other consul, who supported Cotta, was really thrown into prison by the command of Marius, none of whose colleagues would listen to the appeal of the consul, so that the senate was compelled to yield. (Flut. Mor. 4; Cic. De Leg. iii. 17.) From Appian (Hispr. 10) it might seem as if Cotta had taken part with his colleague Metellus in the war against the Illyrians, but it may also be that Appian mentions his name only as the consul of that year, without wishing to suggest anything further.

8. L. Aurinius Cotta, was tribune of the people in b. c. 55, together with T. Didius and C. Norbanus. When the last of them brought forward an accusation against Q. Cæpio, Cotta and Didius attempted to interfere, but Cotta was pulled down by force from the tribunal (tempulum). He must afterwards have held the office of praetor, since Cicero calls him a praetorius. Cicero speaks of him several times, and mentions him as a friend of Q. Lutatius Catalus; he places him among the orators of mediocrity, and states that in his speeches he often used to propose new measures, and prayed to be gloried in a certain composure and rudeness which more resembled the style of an uneducated peasant, than that of the earlier Roman orators. (Cic. de Ovad. ii. 47, iii. 11, 12, Brut. 36, 74.)

9. C. Aurinius Cotta, brother of No. 8, was born in b. c. 124, and was the son of Rutulus. He was a friend of the tribune M. Livius Drusus, who was murdered in b. c. 91; and in the same year he sued for the tribuneship, but was rejected, and a few months afterwards went into voluntary exile to avoid being condemned by the lex Varia, which ordained that an inquiry should be made as to who had either publicly or privately supported the claims of the Italian allies in their demand of the franchise. Cotta did not return to Rome till the year b. c. 82, when Sulla was dictator, and in 75 he obtained the consulship, together with L. Octavius. In that year he excited the hostility of the optimates by a law by which he endeavoured to raise the tribuneship from the condition into which it had been thrown by Sulla. The exact nature of this law, however, is not certain. (Cic. Frang. Corn. p. 80 ed. Orelli, with the note of Ascon.; Sallust, Hist. Frang. p. 210, ed. Gerlach.) A lex de judicatiis privatis of Cotta is likewise mentioned by Cicero, (Erat. Ovad. p. 486) which, however, was abolished the year after his brother. In his purpose he abstained from all reform, and Hillman of Manetanica. On the expiration of his office he obtained Gaul for his province, and although he did not carry on any real war in it, he yet demanded a triumph on his return. His request was granted, but on the day before the solemnity was to take place, a wound which he had received many years before burst open, in consequence of which he died the same day. Cotta was one of the most distinguished orators of his time; he is placed by the side of P. Sulpicius and C. Caesar, and Cicero entertained a very high opinion of him. Cicero, who at an early period of his life, and when Sulla still had the power in his hands, pleaded the case of a woman of Arretium against Cotta, characterizes him as a most acute and subtle orator; his arguments were always sound, but calm and dry, and his style often sublime or animated. We still possess a specimen of it among the fragments of Sallust's Historiae. He appears to have occupied himself also with the study of philosophy, for Cicero introduces him as one of the interlocutors in the "De Oratore," and in the third book of the "De Natura Deorum," as maintaining the cause of the Academics. (Cic. de Orat. i. 7, ii. 23, iii. 8, Brutt. 49, 55, 86, 88, 90, Orat. 30, 38, ad Att. xii. 20, in Ver. i. 50, iii. 7, de Leg. Agr. ii. 22, in Pison. 26; Sallust, Hist. Fragmenta, ii. p. 208, ed. Gerl.; Appian, de B. C. i. 37. Compare Meyer, Fragment. Orat. Rom. p. 588, &c., 2nd ed.)

10. M. Aurelius Cotta, a brother of No. 9, was consul in b. c. 74, together with L. Licinius Lucullus. In this year the war against Mithridates broke out again, and while the conduct of it was entrusted to Metellus, Cotta obtained Bithynia for his province, and a fleet to protect the Propontis. When Mithridates marched into Bithynia, with his army, Cotta retreated to Chalcedon, in the port of which his fleet was stationed. In the neighbourhood of Chalcedon a battle was fought, in which Cotta was not only defeated and obliged to take refuge within the walls of Chalcedon, but lost his whole fleet of sixty-four sail. Mithridates, who had to direct his attention towards another quarter, left Cotta at Chalcedon. During this campaign Cotta dismissed his quaestor, P. Oppius, whom he suspected of being bribed by the enemy and plotting against him. On his return to Rome, therefore, Cotta brought an accusation against Oppius, who was defended by Cicero. Afterwards Cotta himself was charged by C. Carbo with having been guilty of extortion in his province of Bithynia, and was condemned. His son, M. Aurelius Cotta, took revenge for this hostility of Carbo towards his father, by accusing Carbo of the same crime, on the very same day that he (M. Cotta) assumed the manly gown. (Liv. Epit. 93; Brut. vi. 6; Sall. Fragmenta, Hist. lib. iv.; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 67; Plut. Lucull. 5, 6, 8; Cic. in Ver. v. 13, pro Murea. 16, pro Opp. Fragmenta. p. 444 ed. Orelli; Dion. Cass. xxxvi. 25; Appian, Mithrid. 71; Val. Max. v. 4, § 4.)

11. L. Aurelius Cotta, a brother of Nos. 9 and 10, was propretor in b. c. 70, in which year he carried the celebrated law (les Aurelia judicaria), which entrusted the judicium to courts consisting of senators, equites, and the tribuni aemili. The main object of this law was to deprive the senators of their exclusive right to act as judges, and to allow other parts of the Roman state a share in the judicial functions, for which reason the law is sometimes vaguely described as having transferred the judicium from the senate to the equites. P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Antoninus Pius were the consuls elect for the year b. c. 65, but both were accused by L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus of ambitio; they were convicted and their accusers were elected consuls in their stead. No sooner had they entered upon their consularship, than P. Antoninus Pius formed a plan with Catiline for murdering the consuls and most of the senators. This conspiracy however was discovered and frustrated. The year after his consularship, b. c. 64, Cotta was censor, but he and his colleague abdicated on account of the machinations of the tribunes. In 63, when Cicero had suppressed the Catilina conspiracy, in the debates upon which in the senate Cotta had taken a part, he proposed a supplicatio for Cicero; and he afterwards showed the same friendship for the unfortunate orator, as he was the first to bring forward in the senate a motion for the recall of Cicero from his exile. During the civil war Cotta belonged to the party of Caesar, whose mother Aurelia was his kinswoman, and when Caesar was alone at the head of the republic, it was rumoured that Cotta, who then held the office of quindecimvir, would propose in the senate to confer upon Caesar the title of king, since it was written in the libri funales that the Parthians, against whom Caesar was preparing war, could be conquered only by a king. After the murder of Caesar, Cotta rarely attended the meetings of the senate from a feeling of despair. He is praised by Cicero as a man of great talent and of the highest prudence. (Ascon. in Cornel. pp. 64, 67, 78, &c.; Cic. in Pison. 16, in Ver. ii. 71, in P. Clod. 7, de Leg. Agr. ii. 17, in Catil. iii. 8, Philip. ii. 6, pro Dom. 26, 32, pro Sext. 34, ad Att. xii. 21, de Leg. Agr. ii. 19, ad Fam. xii. 2; Suet. Caes. 79; Liv. Epit. 97; Vell. Pat. ii. 32; Corn. Nep. Attic. 4; Plut. Cic. 27, Comp. Orelli, Onom. Tull. ii. p. 90.)

12. Aurelius Cotta Messallinus, a son of the orator Messalla, who was adopted into the Aurelia gens. In the reign of Tiberius, with whom he was on terms of intimacy, he made himself notorious for the gratuitous harshness and animosity with which he acted on several occasions. This drew upon him an accusation of the most illustrious senators in A. d. 32, for having spoken disrespectfully of Tiberius; but the emperor himself sent a written defence to the senate, which of course procured his acquittal. Tacitus characterises him as nobilis quiadem, sed ogens ob laxum et per flagellum infamiam. (Plin. H. N. x. 27; Tacit. Ann. ii. 32, iv. 20, v. 3, vi. 5, &c.)

On coins of the Aurelia gens we find the names of M. Cotta and L. Cotta, but there are no means of identifying them with any of the preceding persons. Of the two coins annexed the obverse of the former represents the head of Pallas, the reverse Hercules in a biga, drawn by Erymanthus; the obverse of the latter represents the head of Vulcan with forges behind him, the reverse an eagle standing on a thunderbolt. [L. S. 54]

COTTA, LAURUNCULAEUS, was legate in the army of C. Julius Caesar in Gaul, and distinguished himself no less by his valor than by his foresight and prudence. In B. C. 54, when Caesar, on account of the scarcity of provisio

COTYS or COTYTTO (Kôrês or Kôrvtrôs), a Thracian divinity, whose festival, the Cotyttia (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), resembled that of the Phrygian Cybele, and was celebrated on hills with riotous proceedings. In later times her worship was introduced at Athens and Corinth, and was connected, like that of Dionysus, with licentious frivolity. Her worship appears to have spread even as far as Italy and Sicily. Those who celebrated her festival were called Stàrvrou, from the purifications which were originally connected with the solemnity. (Strab. x. p. 470; Hesych. Suid. s. v. Kôrês, Sàrvróorh; Horat. Epod. xvii. 56; Juven. ii. 93; Virg. Catul. v. 19; A. Melinke, Quest. Sem. p. 41, &c.) [L. S. 54]

COTYS (Kôrês). 1. A king of Paphлагon, seems to have been the same whom Xenophon (Anab. v. 5 § 12, &c.) calls Corylas. Otyas also is only another form of the name. A vassal of the Persian throne, he had thrown off his allegiance to Artaxerxes II., and, when summoned to court, as a test probably of his loyalty, had refused obedience. He therefore listened readily to the recommendation of Spithridates to enter into alliances with Sparta, and having met Aesilaus for this purpose on his entrance into Paphlagon, he left him with a considerable reinforcement for his army. For this service Aesilaus rewarded Spithridates by negotiating a marriage for his daughter with Cotys, B. C. 355. (Xen. Hell. iv. 1 § 3, &c.) The subject of the present article has been identified by some with Thynus, whom Datames conquered and carried prisoner to Artaxerxes about B. C. 364; but this conjecture does not appear to rest on any valid grounds. (See Schneider, ad Xen. Hell. l. c.) [Thyrus.]

2. King of Thrace from B. C. 362 to 358. (See Suid. s. v., where his reign is said to have lasted twenty years; yet he is said to have ruled from the end of this period that we find anything recorded of him. In B. C. 364 he appears as an enemy of the Athenians, the main point of dispute being the possession of the Thracian Chersonesus, and it was at this time that he first availed himself of the aid of the adventurer Charidemus on his desertion from the Athenian service [see p. 684, b].) He also secured the valuable assistance of Iphicateas, to whom he gave one of his daughters in marriage, and who did not scruple to take part with his father-in-law against his country. (Dem. a. Aristot. pp. 663, 669, 672; Pseudo-Aristot. Oecon. ii. 261; Nep. Iphikl. 3; Amandrus, ap. Athen. iv. 181.) In B. C. 362, Miletus, a powerful ally of Cotys, and engaged with the Athenians on his side by promising to cede the Chersonesus to them; but Cotys sent them a letter, obtruding his adversary in promises, and the Athenians passed a decree in the king's favour. It has been thought that this was the same decree which conferred on him the gift of citizenship. (See Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 217; Ep. Phil. de Ala, p. 161, where he is called "Stilus").
CRANAEA.

4. A king of Thrace, took part against Caesar with Pompey, and sent him a body of auxiliaries under his son Scades in B. C. 48. (Caes. Bell. Civ. ii. 4; Lucan. Phars. v. 54.)

5. Son of Rheometacles, king of Thrace. On the death of Rheometacles his dominions were divided by Augustus between his brother Rhescuporis and his son Cotys. Rhescuporis desired to subject the whole kingdom to himself, but did not venture on palpable acts of aggression till the death of Augustus. He then openly waged war against his nephew, but both parties were commanded by TibERIUS to desist from hostilities. Rhescuporis then, feigning a wish for friendly negotiation, invited Cotys to a conference, and, at the banquet which followed, he treacherously seized him, and, having thrown him into chains, wrote to TibERIUS, pretending that he had only acted in self-defence and anticipated a plot on the part of Cotys. He was, however, commanded to release him, and to come to Rome to have the matter investigated, whereupon (A. D. 15) he murdered his prisoner, thinking, says TACITUS, that he might as well have answered for a crime completed as for one half done. Tacitus speaks of Cotys as a man of gentle disposition and manners, and Ovid, in an epistle addressed to him during his exile at TAMI, alludes to his cultivated taste for literature, and claims his favour and protection as a brother-poet. (Tac. Ann. ii. 64—67, iii. 83; Vell. Pat. i. 129; Ov. ex PONT. ii. 9.)

6. A king of a portion of Thrace, and perhaps one of the sons of No. 5. (See TAC. ANN. ii. 67.) In A. D. 58, Calligula gave the whole of Thrace to Rhometacles, son of Rhescuporis, and put Cotys in possession of Armenia Minor. In A. D. 47, when Claudius wished to place Mithridates on the throne of Armenia, Cotys endeavoured to obtain it for himself, and had succeeded in attaching some of the nobles to his cause, but was compelled by the commands of the emperor to desist. (Dion Cass. lxx. 12; Tac. Ann. iii. 9.)

7. King of the Bosporus, which he received from the Romans on the expulsion of his brother Mithridates. As only a few cohorts under Julius Aquila had been left in the country to support the new king, who was himself young and inexperienced, Mithridates endeavoured to recover his dominions by force of arms, A. D. 58; but he was conquered and carried prisoner to Rome. (TAC. ANN. ii. 15—21.)

The second of the coins figured on p. 777, a. belongs to this Cotys, who is sometimes called Cotys L, king of the Bosporus. The coin given below belongs to Cotys II., who reigned under Hadrian, and is mentioned by Anrian in his Periplus. The obverse represents the head of Cotys, the reverse that of Hadrian. (Eichel, ii. pp. 376, 378.)

CRANABA (Краана), a surname of Artemis, derived from a temple on a hill near Plateia in Phocis, in which the office of priest was always held by youths below the age of puberty, and for the service of five years by each youth. (Paus. x. 34. § 4.) [L. S.]

CRANAUS (Κρανάος), an auctoarchon and king of Attica, who reigned at the time of the flood of Deucalion. He was married to Pedias, by whom he became the father of Cranes, Craneschme, and Atthis, from the last of whom Attica was believed to have derived its name. He was deprived of his kingdom by Amphictyon, his son-in-law, and after his death he was buried in the demes of Lampae, where his tomb was shown as late as the time of Pausanias. (Apollod. lii. 14. § 3, Æd., &c.; Paus. i. 2. § 31, 31. § 2.) [L. S.]

CRANE. [Cardell.

CRANTOR (Κράντορ), of Soli in Cilicia, left his native country, and repaired to Athens, in order to study philosophy, where he became a pupil of Xenocrates and a friend of Poleno, and one of the most distinguished supporters of the philosophy of the older Academy. As Xenocrates died B. C. 315, Crantor must have come to Athens previous to that year, but we do not know the date of his birth or his death. He died before Poleno and Crates, and the eulogy was the cause of his death. He left his fortune, which amounted to twelve talents, to Arcesilæus; and this may be the reason why many of Crantor's writings were ascribed by the ancients to Arcesilæus. His works were very numerous. Diogenes Laëritius says, that he left behind Commentaries (Συνομιλία), which consisted of 30,000 lines; but of these only fragments have been preserved. They appear to have related principally to moral subjects and, accordingly, Horace (Ep. i. 2. 4) classes him with Chrysippus as a moral philosopher, and speaks of him in a manner which proves that the writings of Crantor were much read and generally known in Rome at that time. The most popular of Crantor's works at Rome seems to have been that of "On Grief" (De Luctu, Πόνος Εὐθυς), which was addressed to his friend Hippocrates on the death of his son, and from which Cicero seems to have taken almost the whole of the third book of his Tusculan Disputations. The philosopher Pannænius called it a "golden" work, which deserved to be learnt by heart word for word. (Cic. Acad. ii. 44.) Cicero also made great use of it while writing his celebrated "Consolation" on the death of his daughter, Julia; and several extracts from it are preserved in Plutarch's treatise on consolation addressed to Apollonius, which has come down to us.

Cranor was the first of Plato's followers who wrote commentaries on the works of his master. He also made some attempts in poetry; and Diogenes Laëritius relates, that, after scaling up a collection of his poems, he deposited them in the temple of Athena in his native city, Soli. He is accordingly called by the poet Theocritus, in an epitaph which he composed upon him, the friend of the Muse; and we are told, that his chief favorites among the poets were Hymettus and Saurion. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 21—27; Orelli, Comm. Tull. ii. p. 201; Schneider in Zimmermann's Zeitschrift für Alterthumswissenschaften, 1836, Nos. 104, 105; Kayser, De Crantor Academico, Heidelb. 1841.) [A. S.]

CRASSIUS or C RASSUS, a surname borne in early times by many members of the patrician Claudius gens. (Claudius, p. 767.)

CRASSITUUS, a Latin grammarian, was a native of Tarentum and a freedman, and was sur- nameed Pasicles, which he afterwards changed into Pansa. He was first employed in assisting the writers of the mime for the stage, afterwards gave lectures on grammar, and at length wrote a commentary on the obscure poem of C. Helvius Cinna, entitled Smyrna, which gained him great renown: his praises were celebrated in an epigram preserved by Straton, but the meaning of it is difficult to understand. He taught the sons of mixed marriages of the noble families at Rome, and among others Julius Antonius, the son of the triumvir, but eventually he gave up his school, in order to be compared to Verrius Flaccus, and betook himself to the study of philosophy. (Stutt. Itäus. Gramm. 18; Weichert, Poët. Latin. Rhetor., p. 184.)

It is not impossible that this Crassitus was originally the slave of the Crassitius or Crassicius, CRASSUS.

mentioned by Cicero in B.C. 43 (Philipp. v. c. xiii. 2) as one of the friends of Antony. His original name would therefore have been Pasicles, and he would have taken the name of his patron as a matter of course upon manumission. It may be, however, that the Crassidius mentioned by Cicero is the same as the grammarius.

CRASSUS, M. AQUILLIUS, was praetor in B.C. 43, and was sent by the senate into Picioenum to levy troops, in order to resist Octavianus, when he marched upon the city in this year, in order to demand the consulship. Crassus was seized in a slave's dress, and brought to Octavianus, who did not punish him at the time, but afterwards included his name in the proscription. (Appian, B.C. iii. 93, 94.) It is thought by some commentators that we ought to read Aelius instead of Aquilius. If this conjecture be correct, the Crassus mentioned above would be the same as the Aelius, who was included in the proscription, and whose escape is related by Appian. (B.C. iv. 39.)

CRASSUS, CALPURNIUS, descended from the ancient family of the (Licinni?) Crassi, consigned against Nerva; but when his designs were detected, he received no punishment from the emperor, but was merely removed to Tarentum with his wife. Crassus was subsequently put to death. On account of his forming a conspiracy against the life of Trajan. (Aur. Vict. Epit. 12; Dion Cass. xlvii. 3, 16.)

CRASSUS, L. CANTIDIUS, was with Lepidus in Gaul, in B.C. 43, when Antony was compelled to seek refuge there, and was the only instrument in bringing about the union between the armies of Lepidus and Antony. Three years later, in B.C. 40, he was consul suffectus with L. Cornelius Balbus, and afterwards he was one of the legates of Antony, whom he accompanied in his campaign against the Parthians. In B.C. 38, when Antony returned from that expedition, Caesarius Crassus remained in Armenia, and continued the war against those nations with considerable success, for he defeated the Armenians, and also the kings of the Iberians and Albanians, and penetrated as far as the Caucasus. In the campaign which Antony made against the Parthians in B.C. 36, Crassus was as unfortunate as the other Roman generals, all of whom suffered great losses, and were compelled to retreat. In B.C. 32, when Antony resolved upon the war with Octavian, Crassus was commissioned to lead the army, which was stationed in Armenia, to the coast of the Mediterranean. On the outbreak of the war many of Antony's friends advised him to remove Cleopatra from the army, but Crassus was bribed by the queen, opposed this plan, and she accordingly accompanied her lover to the fatal war. Shortly afterwards, however, Crassus also advised Antony to send her back to Egypt, and to fight the decisive battle on the land and not on the sea. This time his advice was disregarded. During the battle of Actium, Crassus who had the command of Antony's land forces, could only act the part of a spectator. After the unfortunate issue of the sea-battle, Crassus and his army still held out for seven days in the hope that Antony would return; but in the end Crassus in despair took to flight, and followed his master to Alexandria, where he informed him of the issue of the contest and of the fate of his army. After the fall of Antony Crassus was put to death by the command of Octavianus. He died as a coward, although in times of prosperity he had been in the habit of boasting that death had no terrors for him. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 21; Dion Cass. xlviii. 32, xliii. 24; Plut. Ant. 34, 42, 56, 63, 65, 66, 71, 79, Com. Dem. c. Ant. 1; Vell. Pat. ii. 85, 87; Oros. vi. 19.) (L.S.)

(D.) Other Licinii Cnæi of uncertain pedigree.
1. P. Licinius C. P. N. Crassus, was grandson of P. Licinius Varus, who was praetor B.C. 208. In B.C. 176 he was praetor, and pleaded that he was bound to perform a solemn sacrifice
as an excuse for not proceeding to his province, Hither Spain. In B.C. 171 he was consul, and appointed to the command against Persians. He advanced through Eporedus to Thessaly, and was defeated by the king in an engagement of cavalry.
(Liv. xii., xiii., xiv.) During his command, he oppressed the Athenians by excessive requisitions of corn to supply his troops, and was accused on this account to the senate.
2. C. Licinius C. P. N. Crassus, brother of
No. 1, was praetor in B.C. 172, and in B.C. 171
served as legatus with his brother in Greece, and commanded the right wing in the unsuccessful battle against Persians. In B.C. 168 he was consul, and in the following year went to Macedonia, instead of proceeding to Cisalpine Gaul, which was his appointed province. (Liv. xiv. 17.)
3. C. Licinius Crassus, probably a son of No.
2, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 145, and according to Cicero (de Amic. 26) and Varro (de Rer. Rust. i. 3), was the first who in his orations to the people turned towards the forum, instead of turning towards the comitium and the curia.
Plutarch (Crass. 5) attributes the introduction of this mark of independence to C. Crassus. He introduced a rogation in order to prevent the colleges of priests from filling up vacancies by co-optation, and to transfer the election to the people; but the measure was defeated in consequence of the speech of the then praetor, C. Lucullus Sapicena. (Cic. Brut. 21.) (Husseiko, Über die Stelle des Farro von den Licinien, Heidelb. 1857.)
4. C. Licinius (Crassus), probably a son of
No. 3. (Dion Cass. Frug. xxiv.)
5. Licinia. [Licinia.]
6. P. Licinius P. P. N. Crassus, Dives, was the son of P. Licinius Varus, and was the first Licinius with the surname Dives mentioned in history. In B.C. 212, though a young man who had never sat in the curule chair, he defeated two distinguished and aged consuls, Q. Fulvius Flaccus and T. Manlius Torquatus, in a hard-fought contest for the office of pontifex maximus. (Liv.
xxv. 5.) In B.C. 211 he was curule aedile, and gave splendid games, remarkable for the crowds with fulling of gold and silver, that were then first exhibited at Rome (Plin. H. N. xxxi. 4); in B.C.
210 he was magister equitum of the dictator Q.
Fulvius Flaccus, and in the same year obtained the censorship, but abdicated (as was usual) in consequence of the death of his colleague. In B.C.
209 he was praetor. In B.C. 205 he was consul with Scipio Africanus, and undertook the task of keeping Hannibal in check in the country of the Bruttii. Here he succeeded in rescuing some towns from the enemy, but was able to do little in consequence of a contagious disease which attacked him and his army. (Liv. xxix. 10.)
In the following year he united his forces with those of the consul Sempronius, to oppose Han nibal in the neighbourhood of Croton, but the Romans were defeated. In B.C. 203, he returned to Rome, and died at an advanced age, B.C. 183, when his funeral was celebrated with games and feasts which lasted for three days, and by a fight of 120 gladiators. (xxxix. 46.) He possessed many gifts of nature and fortune, and added to them by his own industry. He was noble and rich, of commanding form and great corporeal strength, and, in addition to his military accom plishments, was extremely eloquent, whether in addressing the senate or haranguing the people.
In civil and pontifical law he was deeply skilled.
(XXX. 1.) Valerius Maximus (L. I. § 6) gives an example of his religious severity in condemning a Veal ad virgins to be burnt, because one night she neglected her charge of guarding the everlasting fire.
7. P. Licinius Crassus Dives, son of No. 6.
8. P. Licinius Crassus Dives Munatius, was the adopted son of No. 7. (Cic. Brut. 26.) His natural father was P. Munius Scaevola, who was consul B.C. 175. In the year B.C. 131 he was consul and pontifex maximus, and, according to Livy, was the first priest of that rank who went beyond Italy. (Epit. lxxx.) As pontifex maximus, he forbade his colleague, Valerius Flac

was flameth Martianis, to undertake the command against Aristonicus, and imposed a fine upon him, in case of his leaving the sacred rites. The people remitted the fine, but showed their sense of due priestly subordination by ordering the flamenc to obey the pontif. (Cic. Phil. x. 8.) Crassus, though his own absence was liable to similar objection, proceeded to oppose Aristonicus, who had occupied the kingdom of Pergamus, which had been bequeathed by Attalus to the Roman people. His expedition to Asia was unfortunate. He suffered a defeat at Leucae, and was overtaken in his flight between Elaea and Smyrna by the body-guard of the enemy. In order that he might not be taken alive, he struck a Thracian in the eye with his horse-whip, and the Thracian, sm arting with the blow, stabbed him to death. (Val. Max. iii. 2. § 12.) His body was buried at Smyrna, and his head was brought to Aristonicus, who, in the following year, surrendered to Perperna, and was put to death at Rome. He was so minutely skilled in the Greek language, that when he presided in Asia, he was in the habit of giving judgment to those who resorted to his tribunal in any one of five dialects in which they preferred their claim. (Quintil. xi. 2, fin.) Cicero extols him as a good orator and jurist (Cic. Brut. 26 ; compare Dig. I. tit. 2. s. 4), and Gellius (who gives an example of the strictness of his military discipline) says that, according to Sempronius Asillo and other writers of Roman history, he possessed five of the best of good things, "quod esset diutissimum, quod nobilissimum, quod eloquentissimum, quod jurisconsultissimum, quod pontifici maximum." (Gell. i. 13.) How the legal lore of Crassus was on one occasion well-timed is obvious from the case of the slave of Sec. Sulpicius Galba (whose marriage the daughter of Crassus) may be read in Cicero (De Orat. i. 56). By Heineceus (Hist. Juv. Rom. i. 143) and many others, he has been confounded with L.Licinius Crassus, the orator, No. 23. (Rutilius, Vitae JClorum, c. xviii.)

9. M. LICINIUS CRASSUS AEGELUSTUS, son of No. 7, and grandfather of Crassus the trimvir. He derived his cognomen from having never laughed (Plin. H. N. viii. 18), or, as Cicero says, he was not the less entitled to the designation, though Lucullus reports that he laughed once in his life. (Cic. de Fin. v. 50.)

10, 11, 12. LICENIAE. [LICINIA.]

13. M. LICINIUS CRASSUS, son of No. 9, was praetor b. c. 107.

14. P. LICINIUS M. F. P. N. CRASSUS DIVUS, brother of No. 13 and father of the trimvir. He was the proposer of the lex Licinia, mentioned by Gellius (ii. 24), to prevent excessive expense and glutony in banquets. The exact date of this law is uncertain, but it was alluded to by the poet Lucullus, who died before the consulship of Crassus, which took place b. c. 97. The sumptuary law of Crassus was so much approved of, that it was directed by a decree of the senate to take effect immediately after its publication, and before it had been completely passed by the populus. (Macrob. ii. 13.) It was abolished at the proposition of Dumnus in b. c. 98. (Val. Max. ii. 9. § 5.) The extravagance of the games and shows given by the sedites had now become unreasonably great, and Crassus during his aedileship yielded to the prevailing proclivity, (Cic. de Off. ii. 16.) During the consulsip of Crassus, the senate made a remarkable decree, by which it was ordained "ne homo immolaretur,"—a monstrous rite, says Pliny, which up to that time had been publicly solemnized. (Plin. H. N. xxx. 3.) After his consulship, he took the command in Spain, where he remained for several years, and, in the year b. c. 93, was honoured with triumph for his successes in combating the Lusitanian tribes. In the social war, b. c. 90, he was the legate of L. Julius Caesar, and in the following year his colleague in the censorship (Festus, s. a. referri), and with him enrolled in new tribes certain of the Latini and Itali, who were rewarded for their fidelity with the rights of citizenship. In the civil war which commenced soon afterwards, he took part with Sulla and the aristocracy. When Marius and Sulla, after being proscribed, returned to Rome in the absence of Sulla, he stabbed himself in order to escape a more ignominious death from the hands of his partisans. (Liv. Epit. lxxx.)

15. P. LICINIUS CRASSUS DIVUS, son of No. 14, by Venumelia. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 24.) In b. c. 87, he was put to death by the houseman of Fimbria, who belonged to the party of Marius, and, according to Florus (iii. 21. § 14), was massacred before his father's eyes. Appian (B. C. i. p. 394) differs from other historians in his account of this transaction. He relates that the father, after slaying his son, was himself slaughtered by the party in pursuit.

16. LICINIUS CRASSUS DIVUS, a younger brother of No. 15. His praenomen is unknown, and the only particulars of his history which have been recorded are the fact of his marriage in the lifetime of his parents, and his escape from the massacre of this family in b. c. 87. (P. Crassus, i. 16.)

17. M. LICINIUS P. F. M. N. CRASSUS DIVUS, the younger son of No. 14. The date of his birth is not precisely recorded, but it is probable that he was born about the year b. c. 105, for Plutarch states, that he was younger than Pompey (Plut. Crass. 6), and that he was more than sixty years old when he departed (in the year b. c. 55) to make war against the Parthians. (lib. 17.)

In the year b. c. 87, when his father and brother suffered death for their resistance to Marius and Sulla, he was not considered of sufficient importance to be involved in the same doom; but he was obviously watched, and at length it was thought prudent to make his escape to Spain, which he had visited some years before, when his father had the command in that country. How he concealed himself in a cavern near the sea upon the estate of Vibius Pacinnaeus, and how he passed his life in this strange retreat, is related in detail by the lively and amusing pen of Plutarch. After a retirement of eight months, the death of Sulla (b. c. 84) relieved him from his voluntary confinement. He put himself at the head of a needy rabble, for whose sustenance he provided by murdering excursions, and, with 2500 men, made his way to Malaca. There, seizing the vessels in the port, he set sail for Africa, where he met Q. Metellus Pius, who had escaped from the party of Marius. He soon quarrelled with Metellus, and did not remain long in Africa, for when Sulla (b. c. 83) landed in Italy, Crassus proceeded to join that successful general.

He was now brought into competition with Pompey, who also served under Sulla. The mind of Crassus was of an essentially vulgar type. He was noted for envy, but his envy was low and caveling; it was not energetic enough to be cruel and revengeful, even when successful, and it was so far under the control of pusillanimity and self-interest, as to abstain from the open opposition of manly hatred. It was with such feelings that Crassus regarded Pompey; and Sulla played off the rivals against each other. He understood his tools. He gratified Pompey by external marks of honour, and Crassus with gold. The ruling passions, and the ruling power, and the ruling interests of the time, were circumvented. Sulla and Crassus were anxious to supply, and increase the fortunes of his family he was willing to submit to servile dependence, to encounter any risk, and undergo any hardship. He undertook a service of considerable danger in levying troops for Sulla among the Marsei, and he afterwards
(n. c. 83) distinguished himself in a successful campaign in Umbria. He was personally brave, and, by fighting against the remnants of the Marian faction, he was avenging the wrongs of his house.
Sulla put him in mind of this, and rewarded him by donations of confiscated property, or by allowing him to purchase at an almost nominal value the lands of those who were proscribed. Crassus was reported to have sought for gain by dishonest means. He was accused of unduly appropriating the booty taken at Tudor (an Umbrian colony not far from the Tiber), and of placing, without authority, a name in the proscribed lists, in order that he might succeed to an inheritance.
The desire of wealth which absorbed Crassus was neither the self-sufficing love of possession, which enables the miser to despise the hoss of the people while he contemplates the coin in his chest, nor did it spring from that vainglory which made Lucullus value the means of material enjoyment, nor from that lofty ambition which made Sulla and Caesar look upon gold as a mere instrumament of empire. Crassus sought wealth because he loved the reputation of being rich, liked to have the power of purchasing vulgar popularity, and prized the kind of influence which the capitalist acquires over the debtor, and over the man who wants to borrow or hopes to profit. To these objects the administration of civil affairs and warlike command were, in his view, subordinate. He possessed very great ability and steady industry in obtaining what he desired, and soon began to justify his hereditary surname, Dives. He extended his influence by acting as an advocate before the courts, by giving advice in domestic affairs,
by canvassing for votes in favour of his friends,
and by lending money. At one time of his life, there was scarcely a senator who was not under some private obligation to him. He was affable in his demeanour to the common people, taking them by the hand, and addressing them by name.
Rich legacies and inheritances rewarded his assidutious and complaisance to the old and wealthy.
He was a keen and sagacious speculator. He bought multitudes of slaves, and, in order to increase their value, had them instructed in lucrative arts, and sometimes assisted personally in their education. Order and economy reigned in his household. He worked silver-mines, cultivated farms, and built houses which he let at high rents.
He took advantage of the distresses and dangers of others to make cheap purchases. Was there a fire in the city, Crassus might be seen among the throng, bargaining for the houses that were burning or in danger of being burnt.

From such pursuits Crassus was called to action
by that servile war which sprung from and indicated the deplorable state of domestic life in Italy, and was signalized by the romantic adventures
and reverses of the daring but ill-fated Spartacus.
Spartacus had for many months successfully resisted the generals who had been sent to oppose him. A revolt so really dangerous had begun to create alarm, and no confidence was placed in the military talents of the commanders for the year 71, who regularly, according to a still-prevailing custom, would have divided between them the command of the army. But the occasion called for more experienced leaders, and, in the absence of Pompey, who was fighting in Spain, the command of six legions and of the troops already in the field was given to Crassus, who was created praetor. After several engagements fought with various success [SPAR-TACUS], Crassus at length brought the rebel chief to a decisive battle in Iancina. Spartacus was slain with 12,300 (Plut. Pompe. 21), or, according to Livy (Epit. 97), 60,000 of his followers; and of the men that were taken prisoners, 6000 were specified as the road. After the capture of Spartacus, Crassus had hastened operations in order to anticipate the arrival of Pompey, who he feared might reap the credit without having shared the dangers of the campaign. His fears were in some degree verified, for Pompey came in time to cut off 5000 fugitives, and wrote to the senate, "Crassus, indeed, has defeated the enemy, but I have extirpated the war by the roots." Though the victory of Crassus was of great importance, yet, as being achieved over slaves, it was not thought worthy of a triumph; but Crassus was honoured with an ovation, and allowed the distinction of wearing a triumphal crown of bay (laureate) instead of the myrtle, which was appropriate to an ovation.

Crassus now aspired to the consulship, and was not above applying for assistance to his rival Pompey, who had also announced himself a candidate.
Pompey assumed with pleasure the part of proctor, and declared to the people that he should consider his own election valueless, unless it were accompanied with that of Crassus. Both were elected. (n. c. 70) Already had Pompey become a favourite of the people, and already begun to incur the distrust of the optimates, while Caesar endeavoured to increase the estrangement by promoting a union between Pompey and Crassus in popular measures. With their united support, the lex Aurelia was carried, by which the judicia were selected from the populii (represented by the tribuni aequitatis and equites as well as the senate, whereas the senate had possessed the judicia exclusively during the preceding twelve years by the lex Cornelia of Sulla. The jealousy of Crassus, however, prevented any cordiality of sentiment, or general unity of action. He saw himself overborne by the superior authority of his colleague. To gain favour, he entertained the pu-pilates at a banquet of 10,000 tables, and distributed corn enough to supply the family of every citizen for three months; but all this was insufficient to outweigh the reputation of Pompey. The continence between the consuls became a matter of public observation, and, on the last day of the year, the knight C. Aurelius (probably at the instigation of Caesar) mounted the tribune, and announced to the assembled multitude that Jupiter, who had appeared to him in a dream the night before, invited the consuls to be reconciled before they left office. Pompey remained cold and inflexible, but Crassus took the first step by offering his hand to his rival, in the midst of general acclamations. The reconciliation was hollow, for the jealousy of Crassus continued. He privately opposed the Gibulian rotation, which commissioned Pompey to clear the sea of pirates; and Cicero's support of the Manilian law, which conferred the command against Mithridates upon Pompey, rankled in the mind of Crassus. When Pompey returned victorious, Crassus, from timidity or disgust, retired for a time from Rome.

In the year B.C. 65, Crassus was censor with Q. Catulus, the firm supporter of the senate; but the censors, in consequence of their political discordance, passed the period of their office without holding a census or a muster of the equites. In the following year, Crassus failed in his wish to obtain the rich province of Egypt.

Crassus was suspected by some, probably without sufficient reason, of being privy to the first conspiracy of Catiline; and again, in the year B.C. 63, L. Turquinius, who was arrested on his way to Cæsar, affirmed that he was sent by Crassus with a message inviting Catiline to come with speed to the rescue of his friends at Rome; but the senate denounced the testimony of L. Turquinius as a calumny, and Crassus himself attributed the charge to the subornation of Cicero. (Sall. B.C. 48.) The interests of Crassus were opposed to the success of the conspiracy; for it would have required a man of higher order to seize and retain the helm in the confusion that would have ensued.

In the whole intercourse between Crassus and Cicero may be observed a real coldness, with occasional alternations of affected friendship. (Comp. Cic. ad Att. i. 14 and 16, ad Fam. xiv. 2, pro Sext. 17, ad Fam. i. 9, § 6, v. 3.) In his intercourse with others, Crassus was equally unsteady in his likings and enmities. They were, in fact, not deeply-seated, and, without the practice of much hypocrisy, could be assumed or withdrawn as temporary expediency might suggest.

It was from motives of self-interest, without actual community of feeling or purpose, that the so-called triumvirate was formed between Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus. Each hoped to gain the first place for himself by using the others for his purposes, though there can be no doubt that the confederacy was really most profitable to Caesar, and that, of the three, Crassus would have been the least able to stand alone. Caesar had already found Crassus a convenient friend; for in B.C. 61, when Caesar was about to proceed to his province in Further Spain, Crassus became security for his debts to a large amount. It may, at first view, excite surprise that a person of so little independent greatness as Crassus should have occupied the position that he filled, and that men of wider capacity should have entered into a compact to share with him the honours and profits of the commonwealth. But the fact is to be accounted for by considering, that the character of Crassus represented in many points a large portion of the public. While the young, the daring and the inexperienced nearly, the revolutionary, and the democratic, adhered to Caesar,—while the aristocracy, the party of the old constitution, those who affected the reputation of high principle and steady virtue, looked with greater favour upon Pompey,—there was a considerable mass of plain, moderate, practical men, who saw much that they liked in Crassus. Independently of the actual influence which he acquired by the means we have explained, he had the sympathy of those who, without being noble, were jealous of the nobility, and were rich or were occupied in making money. They sympathised with him, because the love of gain was a strong trait in the Roman character, and they saw that his unexampled success in his pursuit was a proof of at least one unquestionable talent—a talent of the most universal practical utility. He was not without literary acquirement, for, under the teaching of the Peripatetic Alexander, he had gained a moderate proficiency in history and philosophy. There was no profligacy in his private conduct to shock decent and respectable mediocrity. He was not above ordinary comprehension. The many could appreciate a worldly and vulgar-minded but safe man, whose principles sat loosely but conveniently upon him, who was not likely to innovate, who was not rash by chance to fall into the silliness of the power, or to shame by an overstrained rigidity of virtue. Thus it was more prudent to combine with Crassus as an ally, than to incur the opposition of his party, and to risk the counter-influence of an enormous fortune, which made the name of Crassus proverbial for wealth. Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 47) values his estates in the country alone at two hundred millions of sesterces. He might have maintained no despicable army at his own cost. Without the means of doing this, he thought that no one deserved to be called rich. In other less stirring times he might have lived and died without leaving in history any marked traces of his existence; but in the period of transition and commotion which preceded the fall of the republic, such elements of power as he possessed could scarcely remain neglected and quiescent.

It was part of the triumviral contract—renewed at an interview between the parties in Luca—that Pompey and Crassus should be a second time consuls together, should share the armies and provinces of the ensuing year, and should exert their influence to secure the prolongation for five years of Caesar's command in Gaul. Notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of L. Domitius Ahemon-barbus, backed by all the authority of Cato of Utica (who was forced on the day of election to leave the Field of Mars with his followers after a scene of serious riot and uproar), both Pompey and Crassus were elected consuls, B.C. 65. A law was passed at the rotation of the tribune C. Trebonius, by which Syria and the two Spanis, with the right of peace and war, were assigned to the consuls for five years, while the Gauls and Illyricum were handed over to Caesar for a similar period. In the distribution of the consular provinces, Crassus took Syria.

Crassus was anxious to distinguish himself in war. Pompey, he saw, had subjugated the Pirates and Mithridates: Caesar had conquered Gaul, and was marching his army victoriously to Germany and Brittain. Mortified at successes which made him feel his inferiority to both, he chose rather to enter upon an undertaking for which he had numerous objects on which to work and influence at home. Armed by the lex Trebonia with power to make war, he determined to exercise his authority by attacking the Parthians. This was a stretch and perversion of the law, for the Parthians were not expressly named in the lex Trebonia, and the Senate, who constitutionally were the proper arbiters of peace and war, refused to sanction hostilities by their decree. Indeed there was not the slightest pretext for hostilities, and nothing could be more flagrantly unjust than the determination of Crassus. It was in express violation of treaties, for in the year B.C. 92, Sulla had concluded a treaty of peace with the Parthians, and the treaty had been renewed by Pompey with their king Pharnaces. The Romans were not very scrupulous in their career of conquest, and they often fought from motives of gain or ambition, but their ostensible reasons generally bore some show of plausibility, and a total disregard of form was offensive to a people who were accustomed in their international dealings to observe certain legal and religious formalities. It was not surprising, therefore, that, apart from all political considerations, the feelings of common justice should excite a strong repugnance to the plans of Crassus, who, having gained his immediate object in obtaining Syria as his province, invoked out into a display of childish vanity and boastfulness, which were alien from his usual demeanour.

C. Atius Capito, the tribune, ordered his officer to arrest Crassus, but was obliged to release him by the intercession of his colleagues. However, he ran on to the gate of the city to intercept the consul, who was anxious without delay to proceed to his destination, and resolved to set out at once without waiting for the termination of his year of office. Posted at the gate, Atius kindled a fire, and with certain fumigations and exhortations and invocations of strange and terrible deities, mingled the most awful curses and imprecations against Crassus. This was done in pursuance of an ancient Roman rite, which was never solemnized on light grounds; for, while it was believed to be fatal to the person devoted, it was also thought to bring calamity upon the person who devoted another. But Crassus was not deterred. He proceeded on his way to Brundisium. The evil omen daunted the army, and seems to have occasioned an unusual attention to disastrous auguries and forebodings, for Plutarch is copious in his account of tokens of misfortune in almost every stage of the expedition.

The route of Crassus lay through Macedon, Thrace, the Hellespont, Galatia, and the northern part of Syria to Mesopotamia. Throughout the whole campaign he exhibited so much imprudence and such a complete neglect of the first principles of military art, that premature age may be thought to have impaired his faculties, though he was now but little more than sixty years old. He was deaf, and looked older than he really was. The aged Deiotarus, whom he met in Galatia, rallied him on his coming late into the field. He was accompanied by some able men, especially the quaestor C. Cassius Longinus (afterwards one of Caesar's murderers) and the legate Octavius, but he did not profit by their advice. He was quite uninform'd as to the character and resources of the enemy he was going to attack; fancied that he should have an easy conquest over unwarlike people; that countless treasures lay before him, and that it would be matter of no difficulty to outstrip the glory of his predecessors, Scipio, Lucullus, Pompey, and push on his army to Euctria and India. He did not attempt to take advantage of the intestine dissensions in Parthia, did not form any cordial union with the Armenians and other tribes who were hostile to the Parthians, and did not obtain correct information as to the position of the enemy's forces, and the nature of the country. On the contrary, he listened to flatterers; he suffered himself to be grossly deceived and misled, and he alienated, by ill-treatment and insolence, those who might have been useful, and were disposed to be friendly. After crossing the Euphrates, and taking Zenodotius in Mesopotamia (a success on which he prided himself as if it were a great exploit), he did not follow up the attack upon Parthin, but gave time to the enemy to assemble his forces and concert his plans and choose his ground. He was advised by Cassius to keep the banks of the Euphrates, to make himself master of Seleucia (which was situated on a canal connecting the Euphrates and the Tigris), and to take Babylon, since both these cities were always at enmity with the Parthians. He chose, however, after leaving 7000 infantry and 1000 cavalry in garrison in Mesopotamia, to re-cross the Euphrates with the remnant of his forces, and to make winter in northern Syria. In Syria he behaved more like a revenue officer than a general. He omitted to muster and exercise the troops, or to review the armour and military stores. It is true that he ordered the neighbouring tribes and chieftains to furnish recruits and bring supplies, but these requisitions he willingly commuted for money. Nor was his culpity satisfied by such gains. At Hierapolis there was a wealthy temple, dedicated to the Syrian goddess Derecto or Atargatis (the Ashteroth of Scripture), who presided over the elements of nature and the productive seeds of things. (Plin. H. N. v. 19; Strab. xvi. ii. 9.) This temple he plundered of its treasures, which it took several days to examine and weigh. One of the ill omens mentioned by Plutarch occurred here. Crassus had a son Publius, who had lately arrived from Italy with 1000 Gallic cavalry to join his father's army. The son, on going out of the temple, stumbled on the threshold, and the father, who was following, fell over him. Josephus (Ant. xiv. 7, Bell. Jud. i. 8) gives a circumstantial account of the plunder of the temple at Jerusalem by Crassus, but the narrative is not free from suspicion, for Jerusalem lay entirely out of the route of Crassus, and was at a distance of between 400 and 500 Roman miles from the winter quarters of the army; and we believe that no historian but Josephus mentions the occurrence; if we except the author of the Latin work "De Bello Judaeico," (i. 21,) which is little more than an enlarged translation of Josephus, and passes under the name of Hegesippus. To the divine judgment for his sacrilege on this occasion, Dr. Prideaux (Conversations, part 2) attributes the subsequent insurrection of Crassus. According to this account, Eleazar, treasurer of the temple, had, for security, put a bar of gold of the weight of 300 Hebrew minae into a hollowed beam, and to this beam was attached the veil which separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. Perceiving that Crassus intended to plunder the temple, Eleazar endeavoured to compound with him, by giving him the third part of the gold on condition that he would spare the other treasures. This Crassus promised with an oath, but had no sooner received the gold, than he seized, not only 2000 talents in money, which Pompey had left untouched, but everything else that he thought worth carrying away, to the value of 8000 talents more.

Orodes (Arsaces XIV.), the king of Parthia, was himself engaged with part of his army, in an invasion of Armenia, but he despatched Surenas, the most illustrious of his nobles and a young accomplished general, into Mesopotamia with the rest of his forces, to hold Crassus in check. Before proceeding to hostilities, he sent ambassadors to Crassus to say that if the Roman general made war by the authority of the senate, the war could only be punished by the destruction of one or other of the parties, but if at the prompting of his own desire, the king would take compassion on his old age, and allow him to withdraw his troops in safety. Crassus replied that he would give his answer at Seleucæin. "Sooner," said the ambassador, Vagises, "shall hair grow on the palm of this hand, than thy eyes behold Seleucæina." Artavases, the king of Armenia, requested Crassus to join him in Armenia, in order that they might oppose Orodes with their united forces; he pointed out to the Roman general that Armenia being a rugged mountainous country, the cavalry, of which the Parthian army was almost wholly composed, would there be useless, and he promised to take care that in Armenia the Roman army should be supplied with all necessaries. In Mesopotamia, on the other hand, the Romans would be exposed to extreme danger on their march through sandy deserts, where they would be unable to procure water and provisions. Crassus, however, determined to march through Mesopotamia, and engaged Artavases to supply him with auxiliary troops; but the king never sent the promised forces, excusing himself on the ground that they were necessary for his own defence against Orodes.

Crassus, in pursuing the imprudent course which he determined upon, was misled by a crafty Armenian chief, called by Plutarch, Ariamenes. This Arab had formerly served under Pompey, and was well known and trusted in the army of Crassus, for which reason he was selected by Surenas to betray the Romans. He offered himself as a guide to conduct them by the shortest way to the enemy. He told the Roman general, that the Parthians durst not stand before him; that unless he made haste, they would escape from him, and rob him of the fruits of victory. Cassius, the legate, suspected Ariamnes of treachery, and warned Crassus, instead of following him, to retire to the mountains; but Crassus, deceived by his fair words and fooled by his flattery, was led by him to the open plains of Mesopotamia. Ariamnes, having accomplished his object, seized a frivolous pretext and rode off to inform Surenas that the Roman army was delivered into his hands, and Crassus soon learned from his scouts, that the Parthians were advancing. The conduct of

* From the Roman ignorance of oriental languages, there is a great variation among historians in the oriental names that occur in the expedition of Crassus. Thus, this chieftain is called by Dion Cassius, Augur or Abgarus, and by the compiler of the Historia Romanae Partithae, attributed to Appian, he is called Acharus. Florus (iii. 11. § 7) names him Musaras. Again, the Armenian King is called by Dion Cassius (xl. 16) Artabazes.
tain. In the course of this expedition,—one of the most disastrous in which the Romans were ever engaged against a foreign enemy,—Crassus is said to have lost 20,000 men killed, and 10,000 taken prisoners. At the time of his death, Artavasdes had made peace with Orodos, and had given one of his daughters in marriage to Pescusus, the son of the Parthian. They were sitting together at the nuptial banquet, and listening to the representation of the Bocchus of Parthia, when a messenger arrived from Surenas, and brought in the head and hand of Crassus. To the great delight of the spectators, passages from the drama (I. 1168 &c.) were applied by the actors to the lifeless head. Orodos afterwards caused melted gold to be poured into the mouth of his fallen enemy, saying, "Sate thyself now with that metal of which in life thou wert so greedy." (Dion Cass. xi. 27; Florus, ii. 11.)

(Plutarch, Crassus; Dion Cass. xxxvii.—xl.; Cic. Epist. passim. The Historia Romanorum Parthica, usually attributed to Appian, is a compilation from Plutarch. All the authorities are collected in Runciman, Greek. Rome. i. pp. 71-114.)

18. P. Licinius Crassus Divus, son of No. 15, and known by the designation of Decoctor; for, though originally very rich, his prodigality and dissipation were so inordinate, that he became insolvent, and his creditors sold his goods. After this, he was often taunted by being addressed as Crassus Divus. (Val. Max. vi. 9. § 12.)

19. M. Licinius Crassus Divus, the elder son of the triumvir (No. 17) by Tertulla. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 8.) From his resemblance to the senator Axius, there was a slander that his mother had been unfaithful to her husband. After his younger brother Publius had left Caesar, Marcus became Caesar's questor in Gaul, and at the breaking out of the civil war, in B.C. 49 was praefect in Cisalpine Gaul. (Cass. B. G. v. 24; Justin xii. 4.) It is possible that he was the husband of the Cae- cilia or Metella, who appears by an inscription in Gruter (p. 377, No. 7) to have been the wife of M. Crassus, and has by some genealogists been wrongly given to the triumvir. (Drummum, Gesch. Rome ii. p. 55.)

20. P. Licinius M. f. Crassus Divus, younger son of the triumvir, was Caesar's legate in Gaul from B.C. 58 to the second consulship of his father. In B.C. 58, he fought against Ariovistus; in the following year, against the Veneti and other tribes in north-western Gaul; and in B.C. 56, he distinguished himself in Aquitania. In the next winter, Caesar sent him to Rome with a party of soldiers who were intended to forward the election of the triumvirs Pompey and Crassus, and he also brought home 1000 Gallic cavalry, who afterwards took part in the Parthian war. Notwithstanding the mutual dislike of Cicero and Crassus the trium- vir, Publius was much attached to the great orator, and derived much pleasure and benefit from his society. In B.C. 58, he strove to prevent the banishment of Cicero, and with other young Ro- mans appeared in public clad in mourning; and, on his return to Rome, in B.C. 55, he exerted himself to procure a reconciliation between Cicero and his father. (Cic. ad Qua. Fr. ii. 9; § 2.) At the death of Cicero (B.C. 43) he was sent by Pompey to Syria, and, in the fatal battle near Carrhae, behaved with the utmost gallantry. (Plut. Crass. 25.) Seeing that he could not rescue his troops, he refused to provide for his own safety, and, as his hand was distanced by being transfixed with an arrow, he ordered his sword-bearer to run him through the body. Though he was more ambitious of military renown than of the fame of eloquence, he was fond of literature. He was a proficient in the art of dancing (Macrob. ii. 10 fin.), and under the teaching of his friend and freedman Apollonius, became well skilled in Greek. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 16.) There is extant a Roman demarior (post. p. 882) which has been usually supposed to refer to him, although the name inscribed and the device on the reverse would equally or better apply to his grandfather, Publius the censor, No. 14. See below, p. 862, a. (Eckhel, v. p. 232; Span. hist. p. 99.)

21. M. Licinius M. f. Crassus Divus, son of No. 19. In B.C. 30, he was consul with Octa- vian, and in the following year, as proconsul of Macedon, he fought with success against the surrounding barbarians. (Liv. Epit. cxxxiv., cxxxv.)

22. M. Licinius M. f. Crassus Divus, son of No. 20. Same consul as B.C. 43. (Dion Cass. Lib. 24.)

23. L. Licinius L. f. Crassus Divus. His pedigree is unknown. He was born B.C. 140, was educated by his father with the greatest care, and received instruction from the celebrated historian and jurist, L. Caecilius Antipater. (Cic. Brut. 26.) At a very early age he began to display his oratorical ability. At the age of twenty-one (or, according to Tacitus, Dial. de Orel. c. 34, two years earlier) he accused C. Carbo, a man of high nobility and eloquence, who was hated by the aristocratic party to which Crassus belonged. Val. Maximus (vi. 5, § 6) gives an instance of his honourable conduct in this case. When the slave of Carbo brought to Crassus a desk filled with his master's papers, Crassus sent back the desk to Carbo with the seal unbroken, together with his slave in chains. Carbo escaped condemnation by poisoning himself with camphor (Cic. ad Famil. ix. 21, Brut. 27); and Crassus, pitying his fate, felt some remorse at the eagerness and success of his accusation. (Cic. Verr. iii. 1.) In the following year (B.C. 118) he defended the proposal of a law for establishing a new colony at Narbo in Gaul. The measure was opposed by the senate, who feared that by the assignment of lands to the poorer citizens, the feverium would suffer from a diminution of the rents of the ager publicus; but, on this occasion, Crassus preferred the quest of popularity to the reputation of consistent adherence to the aristoc- racy. (Cic. Brut. 45, de Off. ii. 18.) By eloquence above his years, he succeeded in carrying the law, and proceeded himself to found the colony. In B.C. 114, he undertook the defence of his kins- woman, the vestal Licinia, who, with two other vestals, Marcia and Aemilia, were accused of incest; but, though upon a former trial his client had been acquitted by L. Caecilius Metellus, pontifex maximus, and the whole college of pontiffs, the energy and ability of his defence were unable to prevail against the severity of L. Cæsius, the sequanae rurum, who was appointed inquisitor by the people for the purpose of reviewing the former lenient sentence. (Vell. i. 15; Cic. de Rec. ii. 55, de Off. ii. 18; Macrobi. i. 19; Clinton, Flutus, n. c. 25, p. 177, ed. de G. C.) In his questorship he was the colleague of Q. Mucius Scaevola, with whom, as colleague, he served every other office except the tribunate of the plebs and the censorship. In his quaestorship he travelled through Macedonia to Athens on his return from Asia, which seems to have been his province. In Asia he had listened to the teaching of Scepsis Metrodorus, and at Athens he received instruction from Charmadas and other philosophers and rhetoricians; but he did not remain so long as he intended in that city, from unreasonable resentment at the refusal of the Athenians to repeat the solemnization of the mysteries, which were over two days before his arrival. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 29.) After his return to Rome, we find him engaged in pleading the causes of his friends. Thus, he defended Sergius Orata, who was accused of appropriating the public waters for the use of his oyster fisheries. (Val. Max. ix. 1, § 1.) He was engaged, on behalf of the same Orata, in another cause, in which the following interesting question arose:—How far is a vendor, selling a house to a person from whom he had previously purchased it, liable to damages for not expressly mentioning in the conveyance a defect in title that existed at the time of the former sale, and of which the purchaser might therefore be supposed to be cognizant? (Cic. de Off. iii. 16, de Orat. i. 59.) He was engaged, in the present, in the business of the waters. (Cic. de Off. ii. 107, but the period of this office was not distinguished by anything remarkable. In n. c. 106 he spoke in favour of the lex Servilia, by which it was proposed to restore to the equites the judicium, which were then in the hands of the senatorium. In the context of the power of being selected as judges, which divided the different orders, prove how much the administration of justice was perverted by partiality and faction. As there is much confusion in the history of the judicium, it may be proper to mention some of the changes which took place about this period. In n. c. 122, by the lex Sempronius of C. Gracchus, the judicium were transferred from the senate to the equites. In n. c. 106, by the lex Servilia of Q. Servilius Caepio, they were restored to the senate; and it is not correct to say (with Walter, Gesch. des Römischen Rechts, i. p. 244, and others), that by this lex Servilia both orders were admitted to share the judicium. The lex Servilia of Caepio had a very brief existence; for about n. c. 104, by the lex Servilia of C. Servilius Glancia, the judicium were again taken from the senate and given to the knights. Much error has arisen from the existence of two laws of the same name and of nearly the same date, but exactly opposite in their enactments. The speech of Crassus for the lex Servilia of Caepio was one of remarkable power and eloquence (Cic. Brut. 49, de Orat. i. 169). He was a leader of the aristocratic party, and was probably in this speech that he attacked Memmius (Cic. de Orat. ii. 59, 60) who was a strenuous opponent of the rotation of Caepio. In n. c. 103 he was exiled, and with his colleague, Q. Scaevola, gave splendid games, in which pillars of foreign marble were exhibited, and lion fights were introduced. (Cic. de Off. ii. 16; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 3, viii. 16. s. 20.) After being praetor and augur, he became a candidate for the concilium, but he studiously kept away from the presence of his father-in-law, Q. Scaevola, the augur, not wishing that one whom he so respected should be a witness of what he considered the degradation of his canvass. (Val. Max. iv. 5. § 4.) He was elected, n. c. 95, with his constant colleague, Q. Scaevola, the pontifex maximus, who must be carefully distinguished from the augur of the same name. During their consulsipship was passed the Lex Licinia Mucia de Civibus regundis, to prevent persons passing as citizens who were not entitled to that character, and to compel all who were not citizens to depart from Rome. The rigour and inhospitality of this law seems to have been one of the promoting causes of the social war. (Asom. in Cic. pro corr. ; Cic. de Off. iii. 11.) During the term of his office, he had occasion to defend Q. Servilius Caepio, who was hated by the equites, and was accused of majestas by the tribune C. Norbanus (Cic. Brut. 35); but Caepio was condemned. Crassus was now anxious to seek for renown in another field. He hastened to his province, Hither Gaul, and explored the Alps in search of an enemy; but he found no opposition, and was obliged to content himself with the subjugation of some petty tribes, by whose depredations he asserted that the province was disturbed. For this trifling success he was not ashamed to ask a triumph, and would perhaps have obtained his demand from the senate, had not his colleague Scaevola opposed such a misapplication of the honour. (Val. Max. iii. 7, § 6; Cic. in Pis. 26.) With this exception, his conduct in the administration of his province was irreproachable. This was admitted by C. Carbo (the son of the Carbo whom he had formerly accused), who accompanied him to Gaul, in order to seek out the materials of an accusation; but Crassus disarmed his opposition by courteious inquiry, and employing Carbo in the planning and execution of affairs.

One of the most celebrated private causes in the annals of Roman jurisprudence was the contest for an inheritance between M. Curius and M. Coponius, which was heard before the centumviri under the presidency of the praetor T. Manilius, in the year n. c. 93. Crassus, the greatest orator of the day, pleaded the cause of Curius, while Q. Scaevola, the greatest living lawyer, supported the claim of Coponius. The state of the case was this. A testator died, supposing his wife to be pregnant, and having directed by will that if the son, who should be born within the next ten months, should die before becoming his own guardian,* M. Curius should succeed as heir in his place. (Cic. Brut. 53, 53.) No son was born.—Scaevola argued that this was a casus omissus, and insisted upon the strict law, according to which Curius could have no claim unless a son were first born, and then died while under guardianship. Crassus contended for the equitable construction, according to which the testator could not be supposed to intend any difference between the case of no son being born, and the case of a son being born and dying before arriving at the age of puberty. The equitable construction contended for by Crassus was approved, and Curius gained the inheritance.

In n. c. 92 he was made censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. A new practice had sprung up in Rome of sending youths to the schools of persons who called themselves Latin rhetoricians. Crassus disapproved the novelty, as tending to rideliness, and calculated rather to encourage effrontery than to sharpen intellect. He thought that the Latinis in almost every valuable acquirement ex creed the Greeks, and was displeased to see his countrymen stoop to an inferior imitation of Grecian customs. The censors suppressed the schools by a proclamation, which may be found in the Dialogue de Oratoribus and in Gellius (xv. 11), and deserves to be referred to as an example of the form of a censorian edict. Though the two censors concurred in this measure, they were men of very different habits and temper, and passed the period of their office in strife and discord. Crassus was fond of elegance and luxury. He had a house upon the Palatium, which, though it yielded in magnificence to the mansion of Q. Catulus upon the same hill, and was considerably inferior to that of C. Aquilius upon the Viminal, was remarkable for its size, the taste of its furniture, and the beauty of itsthead. It was adorned with pillars of Hysmetian marble, with expensive vases, and tri-clinia inlaid with brass. He had two goblets, carved by the hand of Mentor, which served rather for ornaments than for drinking, a gallery provided with fishponds, and some noble tulip-trees shaded his walks with their ample foliage.

Ahenobarbus, his colleague, found fault with such corruption of manners (Plin. H. N. xvii. 1), estimated his house at a hundred million (sexterrion milies), or according to Valerius Maximus
(i. 1. § 4) six million (serapges sesteria) sesterces, and complained of his crying for the loss of a lampeery, as if it had been a daughter. It was a tame lampeery, which used to come at the call of Crassus, and feed out of his hand. Crassus made a public speech against his colleague, and by his great powers of ridicule, turned him into derision; jeerst upon his name (Sueton. Nero, 2), and to the accusation of weeping for a lampeery, replied, that it was more than Ahenobarbus had done upon the loss of any of his three wives. (Aelini, Hist.
Ania, vili. 4.) On many occasions, he availed himself of his power of exciting a laugh against his opponent (Cic. de Or. ii. 59, 60, 70), and was not scrupulous as to the mode. Thus, though he carefully avoided everything that might impair his own dignity, and might seem to his audience to savour of buffoonery, he sometimes jested upon personal deformities, as may be seen by reference to his sally upon L. Aelius Lamia in his speech for C. Aulo (Cic. de Or. ii. 63), and his answer to the troublesome witness, as reported by Pliny. (H. N. xxxv.
4.) Shortly before his death, he spoke in favour of C. Plancus in opposition to the charge of M.
Junius Brutus the Accuser. (Brutus, No. 14.)
Brutus, in allusion to his fine house and effeminate manners, called him the Palatine Venus, and taunted him with political inconsistency for deprecating the senate in his speech for the Narbonian colony, and flattering that body in his speech for the lex Servilia. The successful repartee of Crassus is well known from being recorded by Cicero (de Orat. ii. 54, pro Cluent. 51) and Quintillian (vi. 3. § 44). His last speech was delivered in the senate in b.c. 91, against L. Marcius Philippus, the consul, an enemy of the optimates. Philippus, in opposing the measures of M. Livius Drusus, imprudently asked how, with such a senator, it was possible to carry on the government of the commonwealth. Crassus fixed upon this expression, and on that day seemed to CRASTUS, OCTACILLIUS. 1. M. OCTACILLIUS CRASSUS was consul in B.C. 263 with M. Valerius Marullus, and crossed with a numerous army over to Sicily. After having induced many of the Sicilian towns to surrender, the consuls advanced against Hiero of Syracuse. The king, in compliance with the desire of his people, concluded a peace, which the Romans gladly accepted, and in which he gave up to them the towns they had taken, delivered up the Roman prisoners, and paid a contribution of 200 talents. He thus became the ally of Rome. In B.C. 246 Crassus was consul a second time with M. Fabius Lictor, and carried on the war against the Carthaginians, though nothing of any consequence seems to have been accomplished. (Polyb. i. 16 &c.; Zonar. viii. 9; Batr. 10; Oros. iv. 7; Gallus, i. 6.)

2. T. OCTACILLIUS CRASSUS, apparently a brother of the former, was consul in B.C. 261, with L. Valerius Flaccus, and continued the operations in Sicily against the Carthaginians after the taking of Agrigentum; but nothing is known to have been accomplished during his consulship. (Polyb. i. 20.)

CRASSUS, PAPRIUS. 1. M. PAPRIUS CRASSUS was consul in B.C. 441 with C. Furius Flaccus. (Liv. iv. 12; Diol. xii. 35.)

2. L. PAPRIUS CRASSUS was consul in B.C. 436 with M. Cornelius Maluginenses. They led armies against Veii and Falerii, but as no enemy appeared in the field, the Romans contented themselves with plundering and ravaging the open country. (Liv. iv. 21; Dil. xii. 41.) Crassus was censor in B.C. 424.

3. C. PAPRIUS CRASSUS was consul in B.C. 430 with L. Julius Julus. These consuls discovered, by treacherous means, that the tribes of the people intended to bring forward a bill on the custodi etulorum, and in order to anticipate the favour which the tribes thereby were likely to gain with the people, the consuls themselves proposed and carried the law. (Liv. iv. 30; Cic. de Rte Publ. iii. 35; and Dil. xii. 72.)

4. C. PAPRIUS CRASSUS was consul tribune in B.C. 384. (Liv. vi. 18.)

5. SP. PAPRIUS CRASSUS, consular tribune in B.C. 382. He and L. Papiarius Crassus, one of his colleagues, led an army against Velitrae, and fought with success against that town and its allies, the Prenestines. (Liv. vi. 22.)

6. L. PAPIRIS CRASSUS, consular tribune in B.C. 382, and again in B.C. 376. (Livy. vii. 22; Diod. xv. 71.)

7. L. PAPIRIS CRASSUS, consular tribune in B.C. 368. (Liv. vi. 39; Diod. xv. 76.)

8. L. PAPRIUS CRASSUS was made dictator in B.C. 340 while holding the office of praetor; in order to prevent the war against the revolted Latins, since the consul Manlius was ill at the time. Crassus marched against Antium, but was encamped in its neighbourhood for some months without accomplishing anything. In B.C. 336 he was made consul with K. Dullius, and carried on a war against the Ausonians of Cales. In 330 he was consul a second time, and carried on a war against the inhabitants of Prerumnium. They were commanded by Vituvius Placcus who was conquered by the Romans without much difficulty. In 325 Crassus was magistrate equum to the dictator L. Papiarius Censor, and in 321 he was invested with the censorship. (Liv. viii. 12, 16, 23; Diod. xvi. 29, 92; Cic. de Fam. iv. 21.)

9. M. PAPRIUS CRASSUS, apparently a brother of the preceding, was appointed dictator in B.C. 332 to conduct the war against the Gauls, who were then believed to be invading the Roman dominion; but the report proved to be unfounded. (Liv. viii. 17.)

10. L. PAPRIUS CRASSUS was magistrate equum to the dictator T. Manlius Torquatus, in B.C. 320. (Fast. Cap.)

CRASTINUS, one of Caesar's veterans, who had been the primipilus in the tenth legion in the year before the battle of Pharsalus, and who served as a volunteer in the campaign against Pompey. It was he who commenced the battle of Pharsalus, in B.C. 48, saying that, whether he survived or fell, Caesar should be indebted to him; he died fighting bravely in the foremost line. (Cass. B.C. iii. 91, 92; Fl. iv. 2, 46; Lucan, vii. 171, &c.; Appian, B. C. ii. 62; Plut. Pompey 71, Cass. 44.)

CRATAEIS (κρατάεις), according to several traditions, the mother of Scylla. (Hom. Od. xii. 12; Ov. Met. xii. 749; Hesych. s. v.; Plin. H. N. iii. 10.)

CRATERUS (κρατερός), one of the most distinguished generals of Alexander the Great, a son of Alexander of Orestis, a district in Macedonia, and a brother of Amphoterus. When Alexander the Great set out on his Asiatic expedition, Craterus commanded the ξυπάγμενοι. Subsequently we find him commanding a detachment of the army in the battle of Arbela and in the Indian campaign; but it seems that he had no permanent office, and that Alexander employed called also Caecilius or Pomponius), n. c. 45. He is mentioned also by Horace (Sat. iii. 3. 101), Pausias (Sat. iii. 65), and Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. viii. 5, vol. xiii. p. 96, De Antid. ii. 8, vol. x. p. 147) ; and he may perhaps be the same person who is said by Porphyry (De Abstāin. ab Animāl. i. 20, p. 61, ed. Cantab.) to have cured one of his slaves of a very remarkable disease. [W. A. G.]

CRATERS (Kράτος), a sculpture of the first and by some after Christ, whose statues, executed together with Pythodorus, were much admired, and were regarded as a great ornament of the palaces of the Caesars. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4 § 11.) The words "palatinas domos Caesarum," in that passage, compared with the preceding ones, "Titi Imperatoris domo," are to be understood of the imperial palaces on the Palantine hill, and fix the date of Craters to the time of the first emperors. [L. U.]

CRATES (Kράτωρ), of Athens, was the son of Antigens of the Thespiean demus, the pupil and friend of Poimo, and his successor in the chair of the Academy, perhaps about b. c. 270. The intimate friendship of Crites and Poimo was celebrated in antiquity, and Diogenes Laërtius has preserved an epigram of the poet Antigonus, according to which the two friends were united after death in one tomb. The most distinguished of the pupils of Crites were the philosopher Areialis, Theodorus, the founder of a sect called after him, and Bion Bysthenites. The writings of Crites are lost. Diogenes Laërtius says, that they were on philosophical subjects, on comedy, and also orations; but the latter were probably written by Crites of Tralles. [CRATES of Tralles.] (Diog. Laert. iv. 21—23.) [A. S.]

CRATES (Kράτωρ), of Athens, a comic poet, of the old comedy, was a younger contemporary of Crites, in whose plays he was the principal actor before he betook himself to writing comedies. (Diog. Laert. iv. 23; Aristoph. Epid. 838—540, and Schol.; Anon. de Com. p. xxii.) He began to flourish in Ol. 82, 4, b. c. 449, 439 (see Index Chron.), and is spoken of by Aristophanes in such a way as to imply that he was dead before the Knights was acted, Ol. 88. 4, b. c. 424. With respect to the character of his dramas, there is a passage in Aristotle (Poet. 5) which has been misunderstood, but which seems simply to mean, that, instead of making his comedies vehicles of personal abuse, he chose such subjects as admitted of a more general mode of depicting character. This is confirmed by the titles and fragments of his plays and by the testimony of the Anonymus writer on Comedy respecting his imitator, Pherecrates (p. xxix). His great excellence is attested by Aristophanes, though in a somewhat ironical tone. (Lyc. iv. 7, 8; Aristoph. Av. iii. 1172, 1178; Eccl. 679.) The only fragments of his plays. He excelled chiefly in mirth and fun (Aristoph. l.c.; Anon. de Com. l.c.), which he carried so far as to bring drunken persons on the stage, a thing which Epicharmus had done, but which no Attic comedian had ventured on before. (Ath. x. p. 429, a.) His example was followed by Aristophanes and by later comedians; and with the poets of the new comedy it became a very common practice. (Dion Chrysost. Orat. 32, p. 391, b.) Like the other great comic poets, he was made to feel strongly both the favour and the inconstancy of the people. (Aristoph. l. c.) The Scholion on this passage says, that Crites used to braise the spectators,—a charge which Meineke

CRATES.

CRATES. (Krá'teús), of MALLUS in Cilicia, the son of Thomates, is said by Suidas (s. v.) to have been a Stoic philosopher, but is far better known as one of the most distinguished of the ancient Greek grammarians. He lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, and was contemporary with Aristarchus. He, in reality, with whom supports the name of the Pergamene school of grammar against the Alexandrian, and the system of anomyly (ánomía) against that of analogy (análogya). He is said by Varro to have derived his grammatical system from a certain Chrysippus, who left six books περὶ τῆς ἀνωμαλίας. He was born at Mallus in Cilicia, and was brought up at Tarsus, whence he removed to Pergamum, and there lived under the patronage of Eumenes II. and Attalus II. He was the founder of the Pergamene school of grammar, and seems to have been at one time the chief librarian. About the year 157 B.C., shortly after the death of Eumenes, Crates was sent by Attalus as an ambassador to Rome, where he introduced for the first time the study of grammar. The results of his visit lasted a long time, as may be observed especially in the writings of Varro. (Sueton, de Illust. Grammat. 2.) An accident, by which he broke a leg, gave him the leisure, which his official duties might otherwise have interrupted, for holding frequent grammatical lectures (depóleis). We know nothing further of the life of Crates.

In the grammatical system of Crates a strong distinction was made between κριτικὸς and γραμματικός, the latter of which sciences he regarded as quite subordinate to the former. The office of the critic, according to Crates, was to investigate everything which could throw light upon literature, either from within or from without; that of the grammarian was only to apply the rules of language to clear up the meaning of particular passages, and to settle the text, the prosody, the accentuation, and so forth, of the ancient writers. From this part of his system, Crates derived the surname of Κριτικός. This title is derived by some from the fact that, like Aristotle, Crates gave the greatest attention to the Homeric poems, from his labours upon which he was also renowned Ομηροκριτικός. His chief work is entitled Διδάσκωσις Νίκαιος καὶ Οἰκομηροκριτική, in nine books, by which we are probably to understand, not a recension of the Homeric poems, dividing them into nine books, but that the commentary of Crates itself was divided into nine books.

The few fragments of this commentary, which are preserved by the Scholiasts and other ancient writers, have led Wolff to express a very unfavourable opinion of Crates. As to his emendations, it must be admitted that he was far inferior to Aristarchus in judgment, but he is equally certain that he was most ingenious in conjectural emendations. Several of his readings are to this day preferred by the best scholars to those of Aristarchus. As for his excursions into all the scientific and historical questions for which Homer furnishes an occasion, it was the direct consequence of his opinion of the critic's office, that he should undertake them, nor do the results of his inquiries quite deserve the contempt with which Wolff treats them. Among the ancients themselves he enjoyed a reputation little, if at all, inferior to that of Aristarchus. The school which he founded at Pergamum flourished a considerable time, and was the subject of a work by Ptolemy of Ascalon, entitled περὶ τῆς Κριτικῆς τῶν Ἑλλήνων. To this school Wolff refers the catalogues of ancient writers which are mentioned by Diogonius of Halicarnassus (in τοῖς Ἑλλήνων πιθανοῖς, ii. p. 110, 3, ed. Syllburg), who also mentions the school by the name of τῶν Περγαμείων γραμματικῶν (p. 112, 27). They are also called Κριτικοῖ. Among the catalogues mentioned by Diogonius there can be no doubt that we ought to include the lists of titles (ἀνεργεία) of dramas, which Athenaeus (viii. p. 336 c.) states to have been composed by the Pergamenes.

Besides his work on Homer, Crates wrote commentaries on the Ἐλευθερία of Hesiod, on Euripides, on Aristophanes, and probably on other ancient authors, a work on the Attic dialect (περὶ Ἀττικῆς διαλέκτου), and works on geography, natural history, and agriculture, of all which only a few fragments exist. Some scholars, however, think, that the Crates of Pergamum, whose work on the wonders of various countries is quoted by Pliny (H. N. vii. 2) and Aslian (H. A. xvii. 9), was a different person. The fragments of his works are collected by C. F. Wegener (De Aude Atitatica Litt. Aristarchiae Fauricie, Harn. 1836, 8vo.) There is also one epigram by him in the Greek Anthology (i. 3, Brunck and Jacobs) upon Chouillas. This epigram is assigned to Crates on the authority of its title, Κριτικῶν γραμματικῶν. But Diogenes Laëritius mentions an epigrammatic poet of the same name, as distinct from the grammarians.

CRATES. A very ancient Greek musician, the disciple of Olympus, to whom some ascribed the composition for the flute, which was called ῥόνος Πολυκέφαλος, and which was more usually attributed to Olympus himself. (Plut. de Mus. 7, p. 1153, e.) Nothing further is known of him. [P. S.]

CRATES (Κρατές), of Tarsus, an Academic philosopher, is expressly distinguished by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 114, 117) from Crates of Athens, with whom he has been often confounded. [A. S.]

CRATES (Κρατές) of Tarentum, the son of An- condas, repaired to Athens, where he became a scholar of the Cynic Diogenes, and subsequently one of the most distinguished of the Cynic philosophers. He flourished, according to Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 87), in n. c. 528, was still living at Athens in the time of Demetrius Philereus (Athen. x. p. 422, c.; Diog. Laërt. vi. 90), and was at Tloces in n. c. 307, when Demetrius Philereus withdrew thither. (Plut. Mor. p. 69, c.)

Crateus was one of the most singular phenomena of a time which abounded in all sorts of strange characters. Though heir to a large fortune, he renounced it all and bestowed it upon his native city, since a philosopher had no need of money; or, according to another account, he placed it in the hands of a banker, with the charge, that he should deliver it to his sons, in case they were simpletons, but that, if they became philosophers, he should distribute it among the poor. Diogenes Laërtius has preserved a number of curious tales about Crates, which prove that he lived and died as a true Cynic, disregarding all external pleasures, restricting himself to the most absolute necessaries, and retaining in every situation of life the most perfect mastery over his desires, complete equanimity of temper, and a constant flow of good spirits. While exercising this self-control, he was equally severe against the vices of others; the female sex in particular was severely lashes by him; and he received the surname of the "Door-opener;" because it was his practice to visit every house at Athens, and rebuke its inmates. In spite of the poverty to which he had reduced himself, and notwithstanding his ugly and deformed figure, he inspired Hipparchia, the daughter of a family of distinction, with such an ardent affection for him, that she refused many wealthy suitors, and threatened to commit suicide unless her parents would give their consent to her union with the philosopher. Of the married life of this philosophical couple Diogenes Laërtius relates some very curious facts.

Crateus wrote a book of letters on philosophical subjects, the style of which is compared by Laërtius (vi. 58) to Plato's; but these are no longer extant, for the fourteen letters which were published from a Venetian manuscript under the name of Centas in the Aldine collection of Greek letters (Venet. 1409, 4to.), and the thirty-eight which have been published from the same manuscript by Boissard (Notice et Extraits des Manuscrits de la Bibli. du Roy, vol. xi. part ii. Paris, 1827) and which are likewise ascribed to Crates, are, like the greater number of such letters, the composition of later rhetoricians. Crates was also the author of tragedies of an earnest philosophical character, which are praised by Laërtius, and likewise of some smaller poems, which seem to have been called Παίδεα, and to which the Φαντασία Ευρυμακον quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 158, b.) perhaps belonged. Plutarch wrote a detailed biography of Crates, which unfortunately is lost. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 85—93, 96—98; Bruckn. Anecd. i. p. 186; Jacobs, Antiq. Graec. i. p. 116; Brucker, Hist. Philos. p. 888; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 514.) [A. S.]

CRATES (Κρατές) of Tralles, an orator or rhetorician of the school of Isocrates. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 23.) Rubenken assigns to him the λογεὶς Πολυγνωσίων which Apollodorus (ap. Diog. l. c.) ascribes to the Academic philosopher. (Hist. Crit. Qv. Graec. in Oper. i. p. 370.) Memmius (Comm. in Diog. l. c.) is wrong in supposing that Crates is mentioned by Lucian. (Rhet. Præcept. 29.) The person there spoken of is Cri- tias the sculptor. [P. S.]

CRATES. 1. An artist, celebrated for making cups with carved figures upon them. (Athen. xi. p. 762, b.)

2. A famous digger of channels at the time of Alexander. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 28; Strab. i. p. 407; Steph. Byz. s. s. Αἰγίλος.) [L. U.]

CRATESTPOLIS (Κρατέστπολις), wife of Alexander, the son of Polyperchon, was highly distinguished for her beauty, talents, and energy. On the murder of her husband at Sicyon in n. c. 314 [see p. 126, s.], she kept together his forces, with whom her kindness to the men had made her extremely popular, and when the Sicyonians, hoping for an easy conquest over a woman, rose against the garrison for the purpose of establishing an independent government, she quelled the sedition, and, having crucified thirty of the popular leaders, held the town firmly in subjection for Cassander. [See p. 620.] In n. c. 308, however, she was induced by Ptolemy Lagi to betray Co- rinth and Sicyon to him, these being the only places, except Athens, yet possessed by Cassander in Greece. Cratespolis was at Corinth at the time, and, as her troops would not have consented to the surrender, she introduced a body of Ptolemy's forces into the town, pretending that they were the reinforcement which she had sent for from Sicyon. She then withdrew to Patrae in Achaea, where she was living, when, in the following year (n. c. 307), she held with Demetrius Poliorcetes the remarkable interview to which each party was attracted by the fame of the other. (Diod. xix. 67, xx. 37; Polyæn. viii. 58; Plut. Demetrius, 9.) [E. E.]

CRATESTIPPIDAS (Κρατέστηππίδας), a La- codamonian, was sent out as admiral after the death of Mindarus, n. c. 410, and took the command at Chios of the fleet which had been collected by Phalippus from the allies. He effected, however, little or nothing during his term of office beyond the seizure of the acropolis at Chios, and the restoration of the Chian exiles, and was succeeded by Lysander. (Xen. Hell. i. 1, 52, 5, 1; Diod. xiii. 65, 70.) [E. E.]

CRATEVAS (Κράτεβας), a Greek herballist (Βιολογός) who lived about the beginning of the first century b. c., as he gave the name Μηθηρίδατος to a plant in honour of Mithridates. (Plin. H. N. xxv. 26.) He is frequently quoted by Pliny and Dioscorides, and is mentioned by Galen (De Simplic. Medicam. Temporum. ac Faecult. xi. proem. vol. xi. pp. 795, 797; Comment. in Hippocr. de Nat. Hom.) ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 134; De Antid. i. 2, vol. xiv. p. 7), among the eminent writers on CRATINUS.

The charges which Suidas brings against the moral character of Cratinus, one is unsupported by any other testimony, though, if it had been true, it is not likely that Aristophanes would have been silent upon it. Probably Suidas was misled by a passage of Aristophanes (Acharn. 819, 850) which refers to another Cratinus, a lyric poet. (Schoi. l. c.) The other charge which Suidas brings against Cratinus, that of habitual intemperance, is sustained by many passages of Aristophanes and other writers, as well as by the confession of Cratinus himself, who appears to have treated the subject in a very amusing way, especially in his Lyrism. (See further on this point Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 47-49.)

Cratinus exhibited twenty-one plays and gained nine victories (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 271; Anon. de Com. p. xxix), and that παράθυρος, according to the Scholiast on Aristophanes. (Epid. 513.)

Cratinus was undoubtedly the poet of the old comedy. He gave it its peculiar character, and he did not, like Aristophanes, live to see its decline. Before his time the comic poets had aimed at little beyond exciting the laughter of their audience: it was Cratinus who first made comedy a terrible weapon of personal attack, and the comic poet a severe censor of public and private vice. An anonymous ancient writer says, that to the pleasing in comedy Cratinus added the useful, by accusing evil-doers and punishing them with comedy as with a public scourge. (Anon. de Com. p. xxxi.) He did not even, like Aristophanes, in such attacks unite mirth with satire, but, as an ancient writer says, he hurled his reproaches in the plainest form at the bare heads of the offenders. (Platonic, de Com. 136; Cicero, de Orat. 136; Persius, Sat. i. 123.) Still, like Aristophanes with respect to Sophocles, he sometimes bestowed the highest praise, as upon Cinon. (Plut. Cim. 10.) Pericles, on the other hand, was the object of his most persevering and vehement abuse.

It is proper here to state what is known of the circumstances under which Cratinus and his followers were permitted to assume this license of attacking institutions and individuals openly and by name. It evidently arose out of the close connexion which exists in nature between mirth and satire. While looking for subjects which could be put in a ridiculous point of view, the poet naturally fell upon the follies and vices of his countrymen. The free constitution of Athens inspired him with courage to attack the offenders, and secured for him protection from their resentment. And accordingly we find, that the political freedom of Athens and this license of her comic poets rose and fell together. Nay, if we are to believe Cicero, the law itself granted them impunity. (De Republic. iv. 10: "aequitatis [Græcorum] fuit etiam lege concessum, ut quod vellet comediae do quo vellet nominatim dicere.") The same thing is stated, though not so distinctly, by Themistius. (Orat. viii. p. 110, b.) This flourishing period lasted from the establishment of the Athenian power after the Persian war down to the end of the Peloponnesian war, or perhaps a few years later (about b. c. 460—393). The exercise of this license, however, was not altogether unopposed. In addition to what could be done personally by such men as Cleon and Alcibiades, the latter himself interfered on more than one occasion. In the archonship of Morychides (b. c. 440—439), a law was made prohibiting the comic poets from holding a living person up to ridicule by bringing him on the stage by name (ψηφισμα τον μη κομμένον οροναι) Schol. Arist. *Acharn. 67; Meineke, Hist. Crit. p. 40). This law remained in force for the two following years, and was annulled in the archonship of Kuthymenes. (n. c. 437-436.) Another restriction, which probably belongs to about the same time, was the law that no Areopagites should write comedies. (Plut. Bell. a. Pac. praest. Ath. p. 348, c.) From n. c. 436 the old comedy flourished in its highest vigour, till a series of attacks was made upon it by a certain Scribonius, a politician, with great probability, of having been subsequently Alcibiades himself. This Scribonius carried a law, μη κομμένοις διοικητις τως, probably about n. c. 416-415, which did not, however, remain in force long. (Schol. Arist. *Apol. 1297.) A similar law is said to have been carried by Antimachus, but this is perhaps a mistake. (Schol. Arist. *Acharn. 1149; Meineke, p. 41.) That the brief aristocratic revolution of 411 B. C. affected the liberty of comedy can hardly be doubted, though we have no express testimony. If it declined then, we have clear evidence of its revival with the restoration of democracy in the Freges of Aristophanes and the Olympia of Plato. (n. c. 405-404.) It cannot be doubted that, during the rule of the thirty tyrants, the liberty of comedy was restrained, not only by the loss of political liberty, but by the exhaustion resulting from the war, in consequence of which the choruses could not be maintained with their ancient splendour. We even find a play of Cratinus without Chorus or Parabasis, namely, the Odisseia, but this was during the 88th Olympiad, when the above-mentioned law was in force. The old comedy, having thus declined, was at length brought to an end by the attacks of the dithyrambic poet Cinnaes, and of Agyrbius, and was succeeded by the Middle Comedy (about n. c. 398-392; Meineke, pp. 43, 49.)

Besides what Cratinus did to give a new character and power to comedy, he is said to have made changes in its outward form, so as to bring it into better order, especially by fixing the number of actors, which had before been indefinite, at three. (Anon. de Com. p. xxxii.) On the other hand, however, Aristotle says, that no one knew who made this and other such changes. (Poet. v. 4.)

The character of Cratinus as a poet rests upon the testimonies of the ancient writers, as we have no complete play of his extant. These testimonies are most decided in placing him in the very first rank of comic poets. By one writer he is compared to Aeschylus. (Anon. de Com. p. xxxix.) There is a fragment of his own, which evidently is no vain boast, but expresses the estimation in which he was held by his contemporaries. (Schol. Arist. Eusid. 526.) Amongst several allusions to him in Aristophanes, the most remarkable is the passage in the Knights referred to above, where he likens Cratinus to a rapid torrent, carrying everything before it, and says that for his many victories he deserved to drink in the Prytaneum, and to sit anointed as a spectator of the Dionysia. But, after all, his highest praise is in the fact, that he appeared at the Dionysia of the following year, not as a spectator, but as a competitor, and carried off the prize above Aristophanes himself. His style seems to have been somewhat grandiloquent, and full of tramps, and altogether of a lyric cast. He was very bold in inventing new words, and in changing the meaning of old ones. His choruses especially were greatly admired, and were for a time the favourite songs at banquets. (Aristophanes, l. c.) It was perhaps on account of the dithyrambic character of his poetry that he was likened to Aeschylus, and it was no doubt for the same reason that Aristophanes called him ομφαλόος (Ibn. 357; comp. Etym. Mag. p. 747, 50; Apoll. Lex. Hym. p. 156, 20.) His metres seem to have paraken of the same lofty character. He sometimes used the epic verse. The Cratinus mentioned of the grammarians, however, was in use before his time. (Tol. l. c.) In the invention of his plots he was most ingenious and felicitous, but his impetuous and exuberant fancy was apt to disorder them in the progress of the play. (Platonius, p. xxvii.)

Among the poets who imitated him more or less the ancient writers enumerate Eupolis, Aristophanes, Crates, Telecleides, Strattis, and others. The only poets whom he himself is known to have imitated are Homer and Archilochus. (Platonius, l. c.; Bergk, p. 156.) His most formidable rival was Aristophanes. (See, besides numerous passages of Aristophanes and the Scholia on him, Schol. Plat. p. 330.) Among his enemies Aristophanes mentions οι πεί ακαλλάν (l. c.). What Callias he means is doubtful, but it is most natural to suppose that it is Callias the son of Hippocrates.

There is much confusion among the ancient writers in quoting from his dramas. Meineke has shown that the following plays are wrongly attributed to him: — Θεσπίς Πορφύρης, Πρικά, Πλάδες, Κρισταί, Ψεύδαστα, Αλλοτρογιμέναι. These being deduced, there still remain thirty titles, some of which, however, certainly belong to the younger Cratinus. After all deductions, there remain twenty-four titles, namely, Αρχλοχος, Βουκλαία, Δαμαδές, Δαμασκόαλη, Δραστικείς, Διαστάσεως αυ Πτόλεμως, Διονύσιος, Ερυθός, Ερύκτων, Κλεόβις, Λάκκυς, Μάλκιβως, Νεμίτης, Νέμιος, Οδυσσέας, Πανθρός, Πολιάς, Πολύτα, Ποταμά, Σάτυρος, Σαρίφως, Τραφάυρος, Χειμεύκαμος, Χειρωνός, Χριστά. The difference between this list and the statement of the grammarians, who give to Cratinus only twenty-one plays, may be reconciled on the supposition that some of these plays had been lost when the grammarians wrote; as, for example, the Σάτυρος and Χειμεύκαμος, which are mentioned only in the Diodascalia of the Knights and Acharnians.

The following are the plays of Cratinus, the date of which is known with certainty: —

About 448. Αρχλοχος.

In 425. Χειμεύκαμός, 2nd prize. Aristophanes was first, with the Acharnians.

In 424. Σάτυρος, 2nd prize. Aristophanes was first, with the Knights.

423. Πωλέα, 1st prize.

2nd. Αμπελίας, Κόμος.

Ant. the first part of which is upon Cratinus only.

2. Continus the younger, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, was a contemporary of Plato the philosopher (Diog. Laërt. iii. 28) and of Corythus (Athen. vi. p. 241, c), and therefore flourished during the middle of the 4th century B.C., and as late as 324 B.C. (Clinto. Fast. Æd. ii. xiii.) Perhaps he even lived down to the time of Ptolemy Philadephus (Athen. xi. p. 469, c, compared with vi. p. 242, a), but this is improbable.

The following plays are ascribed to him: —

Γραζετς, Θηραμένος, Ὅμερηδα (doubtful), Τραχαπλογόμος. In addition to which, it is probable that some of the plays which are ascribed to the elder Continus, belong to the younger.

CRATIUS, the grammarian. [BASELIDES, No. 1.]

CRATIUS, a legal professor at Constantinople and makes sermata largitionum, who was charged by Justinian, in A.D. 500, to compile the Digest along with Tribonian, the head of the commission, the professor Theophilus of Constantinople, Dorotheus and Antonius, professors at Berytus, and twelve patroni eumen, of whom Stephanus is the best known. The commissioners completed their task in three years. Continus does not appear to have been further employed in the other compilations of Justinian. The commission is recited in the second præface to the Digest (Const. Tant. § 9), and Continus is one of the eight professors to whom the constitutio Omnem (so called from its initial word), establishing the new system of legal education, is addressed. [J. T. G.]

CRATIUS, a painter at Athens, whose works in the Pompeian, the hall containing all things used in processions, are mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 40. §§ 33, 43.)

[ L. U. ]

CRATIPPUS (Κράτιππος). 1. A Greek historian and contemporary of Thucydides, whose work he completed — ἐν παραλειφθείση βυ ἄνωθεν, ἴσανεν τῆς γέγονας. (Dionysi. Ant. de Thucyd. 16.) The expression of Dionysius leads us to suppose that the work of Cratippus was not only a continuation of the unfinished history of Thucydides, but that he also gave an account of everything that was omitted in the work of Thucydides. The period to which Cratippus appears to have carried his history, is pointed out by Plutarch (de Glor. Athen. 1) to have been the time of Comm. (Comp. Marcellin. Vit. Thucyd. § 33; Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 834.)

2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Mytilene, who was a contemporary of Pompey and Cicero. The latter, who was connected with him by intimate friendship, entertained a very high opinion of him, for he declares him to be the most distinguished among the Peripatetics that he had known (de Off. iii. 2), and thinks him at least equal to the greatest men of his school. (De Divin. i. 3.) Cratippus accompanied Pompey in his flight after the battle of Pharsalia, and endeavoured to comfort and cuss him by philosophical arguments. (Plut. Pompei. 75; comp. Aelian, V. H. vii. 21.) Several eminent Romans, such as M. Marcellus and Cicero himself, received instruction from him, and in B.C. 44 young M. Cicero was his pupil at Athens, and was tenderly attached to him. (Cic. Brut. 31, ad Fam. xii. 16, xvi. 21, de Off. i. 1, ii. 2, 7.) Young Cicero seems also to have visited Asia in company. (Ad Fam. xii. 16.) When Caesar was at the head of the Roman republic, Cicero obtained from him the Roman franchise for Cratippus, and also induced the council of the Areopagus at Athens to invite the philosopher to remain in that city as one of her chief orators, and to continue his instructions in philosophy. (Plut. Cic. 24.) After the murder of Caesar, Brutus, while staying at Athens, also attended the lectures of Cratippus. (Plut. Brut. 24.) Notwithstanding the high opinion which Cicero entertained of the knowledge and talent of Cratippus, we do not hear that he wrote on any philosophical subject, and the only allusions we have to his tenets, refers to his opinions on divination, on which he seems to have written a work. Cicero states that Cratippus believed in dreams and supernatural inspiration (favour), but that he rejected all other kinds of divination. (De Divin. i. 3, 50, 70, 71, ii. 48, 52; Tertull. de Anima. 46.)

CRATOR (Κράτωρ), a freedman of M. Aurelius Verus, wrote a history of Rome from its foundation to the death of Verus, in which the names of the consuls and other magistrates were given. (Theophyl. ad Antol. iii. ex.)

CRATUS (Κράτωρ), the personification of strength, is described as a son of Uranus and Ge. (Hes. Thesp. 367; Aeschyl. Prom. init. Applid. i. 2.)

CRA'TYLUS (Κράτυλος), a Greek philosopher, and an elder contemporary of Plato. He professed the doctrines of Heraclitus, and made Plato acquainted with them. (Aristot. Metaph. i. 6; Appul. de Dogmat. Plat. p. 2, ed. Elm.; Olympiod. Vit. Plat. p. 79, ed. Fischer.) The time at which Plato was instructed by Cratylos, is stated by Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 6) to have been after the death of Socrates; but there are several circumstances which prove that Plato must have been acquainted with the doctrines of Heraclitus at an earlier period, and K. F. Hermann has pointed out that it must have been in his youth that Plato acquired his knowledge of that philosophy. One among the dialogues of Plato is named after his master, Cratylos, who is the principal speaker in it, and maintains the doctrine, that things have received their names according to certain laws of nature (physis), and that consequently words correspond to the things which they designate. Hermogenes, the Eleatic, who had likewise been a teacher of Plato, asserts, on the other hand, that nature has nothing to do with giving things their suitable names, but that words are applied to certain things by the mere mutual consent (synechei) of men. Some critics are of opinion, that the Cratylos introduced by Plato in his dialogue is a different person from the Cratylos who taught Plato the doctrines of Heraclitus, but the arguments adduced in support of this opinion do not seem to be satisfactory. (Stahlbaum, de Platon. Philos. i. 18, &c.; K. F. Hermann, System der Plat. Philos. i. pp. 106, 106, 492, &c.; Lersch, Sprachphilos. der Alten, i. p. 29, &c.)

CREMUTIUS CORDUS. [CORDUS.]

CREON (Κρέων). 1. A mythical king of Corinth, a son of Lynceus. (Hygin. Fab. 25) calls him a son of Memoeus, and thus confounds him with Creon of Thebes. His daughter, Glauce, married Jason, and Medea, who found herself forsaken, took vengeance by sending Glauce a garment which destroyed her by fire when she put CREOPHYLUS.

it on. (Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 20.) According to Hyginus (l. c.) Medea's present consisted of a crown, and Creon perished with his daughter, who is there called Creusa. (Comp. Dion. iv. 54.)

2. A son of Menoeceus, and king of Thbes. After the death of Laius, Creon gave the kingdom to Oedipus, who had delivered the country from the Sphinx; but after Oedipus had laid down the government, Creon resumed it. His tyrannical conduct towards the Argives, and especially towards Antigone, is well known from the Oedipus and Antigone of Sophocles. Creon had a son, Hemon, and two daughters, Henioche and Pyrrha. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8, 7. § 1; Pant. ix. 10. § 3.) A third mythical Creon is mentioned by Apollodorus, (ii. 7. § 8.)

CREON (Κρέων), a Greek rhetorician of uncertain date, who is mentioned in three passages of Suidas (σ. ο. Ἐγκυδώνητοκρήνιος, νεφθόν, and φακικόλογος) as the author of a work on rhetoric (ἐπηρομάχος), of which the first book is quoted, but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]

CREOPHYLUS (Κρεοφήλος). 1. One of the earliest epic poets of Greece, whom tradition placed in direct connexion with Homer, as he is called his friend or even his son-in-law, (Plat. De Rerum N. 3. p. 600, b; Callim. Epigram. 6; Strab. iv. p. 638, &c.; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. i. 2; Eustath. ad Hom. ii. 730; Suidas, s. v.) Creophylus is said to have received Homer into his house, and to have been a native of Chios, though other accounts describe him as a native of Samos or Ios. The epic poem Οἰκείς καὶ Οἰκείας ἠκούει, which is ascribed to him, is said, in some traditions, to have received Homer as a present or as a dowry with his wife. (Proclus, op. Heptast. p. 466, ed. Gaisford; Schol. ad Plat. p. 431, ed. Bekker; Suidas, s. v.) Tradition thus seems to point to Creophylus as one of the most ancient Homeridae, and as the first link connecting Homer himself with the subsequent history of the Homeric poems, for he preserved and taught the Homeric poems, and handed them down to his descendants, from whom Lycurgus, the Spartan lawgiver, is said to have received them. (Plut. Lyce. 4; Heraclet. Pont. Polit. Fragn. 2; Iamblich. Vit. Pythag. ii. 9; Strab. xiv. p. 639.) His poem Οἰκείας contained the contest which Hercules, for the sake of Iole, undertook with Eurytos, and the final capture of Oechalia. This poem, from which Panyasis is said to have copied (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 266), is often referred to, both with and without its author's name, but we possess only a few statements derived from it. (Plut. Lyce. 4; Her. Hist. i. 12; Schol. ad Soph. Trach. 266; Bekker, Anecd. p. 728.) Pausanias (iv. 2 § 3) mentions a poem Ηρείας by Creophylus, but this seems to be only a different name for the Οἰκείας. (Comp. Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 276.) The Hercules which the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 1357) ascribes to Cinaethon, is likewise supposed by some to be a mistake, and to allude to the Οἰκείας of Creophylus. (Wecker, Der Epics. Cyclos. p. 219, &c.; Wölfler, De Cycel. Epics. p. 83, &c.; K. W. Müller, De Cycel. Graec. Epics. p. 82, &c.)

2. The author of Annals of Ephesus (Ἐποβίζεταν), to which Atheneus (viii. p. 361) refers. [L. S.]

CREPEREIUS, the name of a Roman equestrian family, which was distinguished for the strict discipline of its members, but of which otherwise only very little is known. Among the judges in the case of Verres, one M. Crepereius is mentioned by Cicero (in Verri. l. 10), and it is added, that as he was tribunos militaris designatus, he would not be allowed to take a part in the proceedings after the first of January of the c. 69.

There are several coins on which we read the name Q. Creperaius M. F. Roccus, and from the representations of Venus and Neptune which appear on those coins, it has been inferred, that this person had some connexion with Corinth, perhaps after its restoration by J. Cassar, since these divinities were the principal gods of Corinth. (Havercamp, in Morell. Thesaur. Numism. p. 145, &c.) In the reign of Nero we meet with one Creperaius Gallus, a friend of Agrippina, who perished in the ship by means of which Agrippina was to be destroyed. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 5.)

CREPEREIUS CALPURNIUS (Κρεπερείους Καλπουρνίας), a native of Pompeipolis, is mentioned by Lucian (Quom. Hist. conscrib. l.) as the author of a history of the wars between the Romans and Parthians, but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]

CRES (Κρής), a son of Zeus by a nymph of mount Ida, from whom the island of Crete was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Kretis; Pant. viii. 53. § 8.) According to Diodorus (v. 64), Cres was an Eteocretan, that is, a Cretan autochthon. [L. S.]

CRESSENS, a Cynic of Megalopolis, (probably the city in Arcadia, though some believe that Rome is meant by that appellation,) who lived in the middle of the second century after Christ, contemporary with Justin Martyr. The Christian writers speak of his character as perfectly infamous. By Tacton (Or. adv. Graec. p. 157, &c.) he is accused of the most flagrant enormities, and is described as a person who was not prevented by his cynical profession from being "wholly enslaved to the love of money." He attacked the Christians with great acrimony, calling them Atheists; but his charges were refuted by Justin, who tells us, that, in consequence of the refutation, he was apprehensive lest Cressens should plot his death. But whether he was really the cause of Justin's martyrdom or not is uncertain; for, although he is accused of this crime by Eusebius, yet the charge is only made to rest on a statement of Tatian, which however merely is, that "he who advised others to despise death, was himself so much in dread of death, that he plotted death for Justin as a way out of it." His refutation of the success of his intrigues. (Justin, Apolog. ii.; Euseb. H. E. iv. 16; Noldeke, Kirchengesch. i. 1131.)

CRESCONIUS. [Corippus.]

CRES'ILIAS (Κρεσίλιας), an Athenian sculptor, a contemporary of Phidias and Polyclitus. Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 19), in narrating a competition of five most distinguished artists, and among them Phidias and Polyclitus, as to who should make the best Amazon for the temple at Ephesus, mentions Cresilias as the one who obtained the third prize. But as this is an uncommon name, it has been changed by modern editors into Cleisilis or Cleisilus; and in the same chapter (§ 35) an artist, "Desilis," whose wounded Amazons was a colu-bated statue, has also had his name changed into Ctesilias, and consequently the beautiful statues of a wounded Amazon in the Capitol and the Lion are considered as an imitation of the work at Ephesus. Now this is quite as unfounded a supposition as the one already rejected by Winckelmann, by which the dying gladiator of the Capitol was considered to represent another celebrated statue of Ctesilias, who wrought "vulnenum deficiemem, in quo possit intelligi, quantum recte accurat animae;" and it is the more improbable, because Pliny enumerates the sculptors in an alphabetical order, and begins the letter D by Desilias. But there are no good reasons for the insertion of the name of Ctesilias. At some of the late excavations at Athens, there was discovered in the wall of a citadel, before the western frontside of the Parthenon, the following inscription, which is doubtless the identical base- ment of the existing warrior:—

ΗΡΜΟΛΑΥΚΟΣ
ΔΙΕΠΕΡΡΟΥΣ
ΑΣΙΑΡΧΕΝ, ΚΕΡΕΙΑΣ, ΕΠΙΟΞΕΝ.

By this we learn, that the rival of Phidias was called Ctesilas, as two manuscripts of Pliny exhibit, and that the statue praised by Pliny is the same as that which Pausanias (i. 23. § 2) describes at great length. It was an excellent work of bronze, placed in the eastern portico within the Propylaea, and dedicated by Hermolycus to the memory of his father, Dilethrenes, who fell pierced with arrows, b. c. 413, at the head of a body of Thespieans, near Mycale in Boeotia. (Thuc. vii. 29, 30.) Besides these two celebrated works, Ctesilas executed a statue of Pericles the Olympian, from which, perhaps, the bust in the Vatican is a copy. (Ross, Kunstblatt, 1840, No. 12 and 38.)

CRESIUS (Κρησύς), a surname of Dionysus at Argos, where he had a temple in which Ariadne was said to be buried. (Paus. ii. 23. § 7.) [L. S.]

CRESPHONTES (Κρέςφοντες), a Hermæid, a son of Aristomachus, and one of the conmenors of Peloponnesus, who obtained Messenian for his share. But during an insurrection of the Messenian nobles, he and two of his sons were slain. A third son, Aeytus, was induced by his mother, Merope, to avenge his father. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 4, &c.; Paus. ii. 18. § 6, iv. 3. § 31, viii. 5. § 4; comp. Abyrt.) [L. S.]

CRETIS (Κρητής), a daughter of Asterion, and wife of Minos. According to others, she was the mother of Pasiphaë by Helios. (Apollod. iii. i. § 2; Diod. iv. 60.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. iii. 3. § 1; Diol. iii. 71.) [L. S.]

CRETEUS or CATREUS (Κρητεύς), a son of Minos by Pasiphaë or Cretæ, and king of Crete. He is renowned in ancient story on account of his tragic death by the hand of his own son, Altheómenes. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2, iii. 1. § 2; Diol. iv. 39; Paus. viii. 53. § 2; Altheómenes.) [L. S.]

CRETHEUS (Κρηθεύς), a son of Aeolus and Enaeto, was married to Tyra, the daughter of Salmoneus, by whom he became the father of Aeon, Phères, Amythaon, and Hippolytus. He is called the founder of the town of Iолос. (Hom. Od. xi. 236, 238; Apollod. i. 9. § 11; comp. Paus. viii. 25. § 5.) According to another tradition, Cretheus was married to Demodice or Bélide, who loved Phrixus, and as her love was rejected by the latter, she callumino engaged him to Cretheus of having been guilty of improper conduct. (Hygin. Poet. Aes. 3. 20; Paus. iv. 30. § 2.)

CRETHON (Κρήθων), a son of Diocles and brother of Orilochus of Phœre, was slain by Aeneas in the Trojan war. (Hom. Il. v. 542; Paus. iv. 30. § 2.)

CRETIUS, an agnomen of Q. Cæcilius Metellus, consul, b. c. 69, and of several of the Metelli. [METELLUS.]

CRETIUS SILANUS. [SILANUS.]

CREUSA (Κρέουσα). 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Ge. She was a Naiad, and became by Peneus the mother of Hypsea, king of the Leptiæae, and of Siléa. (Phid. Pyth. 8. 30; Diol. iv. 69.)

2. A daughter of Erechtheus and Praxithea, was married to Xuthus, by whom she became the mother of Aeacnes and Ion. (Apollod. i. 7. § 8, iii. 15. § 1; Paus. vii. 1. § 1.) She is also said to have been beloved by Apollo (Paus. i. 23. § 4), and Ion is called her son by Apollo, as in the "Ion" of Euripides.

3. A daughter of Priam and Hécabe, and the wife of Aeneas, who became by her the father of Ascanius and Iulus. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) Conon (Narrat. 41) calls her the mother of Aeneas by Apollo. When Aeneas fled from Troy, she followed him; but she was unable to discover his traces, and disappeared. Aeneas then returned to seek her. She then appeared to him as a shade, consoled him, revealed to him his future fate, and informed him that she was kept back by the great mother of the gods, and was obliged to let him depart from her. (Paus. iii. 725, 728, 753, 758, 775, &c.) In the Legend of Delphi she was represented by Polynogus among the captive Trojan women. (Paus. x. 26. § 1.) A fourth personage of this name is mentioned by Hýginus. (Pab. 25; comp. Creón, No. 1.)

CRINA/GORAS (Κριναγόρας), a Greek epic-grammatical poet, the author of about fifty epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a native of Mytilene, among the eminent men of which city he is mentioned by Strabo, who speaks of him as a contemporary, (xiii. p. 617, sub fin.) There are several allusions in his epigrams, which refer to the reign of Augustus, and on the authority of which Jacobs believes him to have flourished from n. c. 81 to a. D. 3. We may also collect from his epigrams that he lived at Rome (Ep. 24), and that he was richer in poems than in worldly goods. (Ep. 33.)

He mentions a younger brother of his, Eukleides. (Ep. 12.) From the contents of two of his epigrams Raiske inferred, that they must have been written by a more ancient poet of the same name, but this opinion is refuted by Jacobs. Crinogoras often shows a true poetical spirit. He was included in the Anthology of Philip of Thessalonica. (Jacobs, Anth. Grac. pp. 876—878; Fabric. Bibl. Grac. iv. p. 470.)

CRINAS, a physician of Marseilles who practised at Rome in the reign of Nero, A. D. 54—60, and introduced astrology into his medical practice. He acquired a large fortune, and is said by Pline (H. N. xxxix. 5) to have left at his death to his native city the immense sum of ten million sesterces (entitas H. S.) or about 78,123d, after having spent nearly the same sum during his life in building the walls of the city. [W. A. G.]
CRISPUSUS. 381

CRISPUSUS (Křiʰpˈn̩uːs) is the name which, from a comparison of Diodorus (xv. 47), it has been proposed to substitute for Anippos in Xen. Hell. vi. 2, § 36. He was sent by Dionysius I. of Syracuse to Corcyra to the aid of the Spartans with a squadron of ten ships, B. c. 373; but through his imprudence he fell, together with nine of his ships, into the hands of the Peloponnesians. The latter, in the hope of extorting from him a large sum of money, threatened to sell him for a slave, and Crispusus slew himself in despair. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2, §§ 4, 93, &c.; comp. Schneid. ad loc.; Welcker, ad Diad. i. 14; Diod. xvi. 57.) [E. K.]

CRINUS (Křiːn̩us), a Stoic philosopher who is referred to several times by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 62, 68, 76), and seems to have founded an independent school within the boundaries of the Stoic system, since the authority of his followers (οἱ ἐπὶ Κρίνου) is sometimes quoted. He wrote a work called διελεκτρικὴ τέχνη, from which Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 71) quotes an opinion, he is mentioned also by Attian. (Diog. Eep. iii. 2.) Sidus speaks of a Crinus who was a priest of Apollo, and may be the same as the one mentioned in a scholion (ad Hom. H. i. 396). [L. S.]

CRISAMIS. [Kriˈgas]. 1. The fifth in descent from Aesacusius, the son of Dardanus, and the father of Cleomytides I, who probably lived in the eleventh and tenth centuries n. c. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chit. viii. Hist. 135, in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 680, ed. von.) 2. The ninth of the family of the Asclepiades, the son of Socrates II, and the father of Cleomytides II. (Hist. vii. 27.) He is called "king Crismis" (Pausan. Epist. ad Attian., in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 770). But the country from which he reigned is not mentioned. By some writers he is said to have been the father, not of Cleomytides II., but of Theodorus II. [W. A. G.]

CRISPINA, daughter of Brutus Plebiscus [Plebˈskip], was married to Commodus (a.d. 177), and, having proved unfaithful to her husband, was divorced a few years after his accession to the throne, banished to Capreae, and there put to death. (Dion Cass. lxxx. 23, lxxxi. 4; Capitolin. M. Aurel. 27; Luperid. Commod. 5.) [W. R.]

CRISPUSUS, L. BRUTTIUS QUINTIUS, was consul A. D. 224, and fourteen years afterwards (A. D. 238) persuaded the inhabitants of Aquilia to shut their gates and defend their walls against the savage Maximinus, whose rage when he found his attacks upon the city baffled led to those excesses which caused his assassination. [Maximinus]. (Capitolin. Max. dux, c. 21; Herodian. viii. 4.) [W. R.]

CRISPUSUS CAESARIO. [Caesario, p. 535, b.] CRISPUSUS, QUINCTIUS, Crispinsus, occurs as an agnomen in the family of the Roman Caesarii, and in the family of the Roman Caesarii. [Capitolinii, p. 606, a.] The full name of the L. Quinctius Crispinsus, who was praetor in B. C. 186, and who triumphed in B. C. 184, on account of his victories in Spain, was probably L. Quinctius Cencius Capitolinus Crispinsus. (Liv. xxxix. 6, 8, 30, 42.) [L. S.]

CRISPUSUS, RUPITIUS, a Roman equus and contemporary of the emperors Claudius and Nero. He was praetor prior under Claudius, who employed him in arresting and dragging to Rome

V BCURUS. For this service he was rewarded by a large sum of money and the insignia of the quaestorship. In A.D. 53 he was removed from his office at the instigation of Agrippina, who believed him to be attached to the children of Messalina. Crispus was married to the notorious Poppea Sabina, who had a son by him, bearing the same name as his father. She afterwards became the mistress of Nero, and the circumstance, that she had once been the wife of Crispus, was a sufficient reason for the tyrant to send Crispus into exile to Sardinia, A.D. 66, under the pretext of his being an accomplice in a conspiracy. Shortly after when Crispus received the sentence of death, he put an end to his own life. (Tacit. Ann. xii. 4, xiii. 42, xiii. 45, xv. 71, xvi. 17; Senea. Oeuvr. 728 &c.; Plut. Calig. 19.) His son, Iulius Crispus, was likewise put to death by Nero. (Suet. Nero, 35.)

CRISPUS, a person mentioned three times by Cicero as coheir of Mucia. (Ad Att. xi. 5, xiii. 3, 5.)

CRISPUS, brother of Claudius Gothicus and father of Claudius, who by his husband Eutropius was the mother of Constantius Chlorus. Thus Crispus was the great-grandfather of Constantinus Magnus. [W. R.]

CRISPUS, FLAVIUS JULIUS, eldest of the sons of Constantinus Magnus and Minervina, derived his name without doubt from his great-great-grandfather [Crispus], the brother of Claudius Gothicus. Having been educated, as we are told by St. Jerome, under Lectanius, he was nominated Caesar on the 1st of March, A.D. 317, along with his brother Constantinus and the younger Licinius, and was invested with the consulsip ship the year following. Entering forthwith upon his military career, he distinguished himself in a campaign against the Franks, and soon after, in the war with Licinius, gained a great naval victory in the Hellespont, A.D. 323. But unhappily the glory of these exploits excited the bitter jealousy of his step-mother Faustia, at whose instigation he was put to death by his father in the year A.D. 326. [Constantinus, p. 335.] (Euseb. Chron. ad ann. 317; Sozomen. Hist. Eccl. i. 5; Bekkel, vol. viii. p. 100.)

A great number of coins, especially in small brass, are extant bearing the name and effigy of this youth, commonly with the titles Caesar and Princeps Juventutis annexed; on the reverse of one we read the words Akamannius Descitis, which may refer to his success in the West, but the legends for the most part commemorate the exploits of his father rather than his own achievements. [W. K.]

CRISPUS, JULIUS, a distinguished tribune of the praetorians, put to death by Septimius Severus during the Parthian war (A.D. 199), because, being worried of the hardships of the campaign, he had quoted as a sort of pasquinade on the ambitious projects of the emperor the lines in Virgil from the speech of Dares (Aen. xi. 572),

"Sic latet, ut Turno contingat regia conjux,
Nos, animas viles, inhumanas infesta turba, Stetnam cum campis..."

a fact of no great importance in itself, except in so far as it corroborates the accounts of Spartianus, regarding the vindictive cruelty of Severus in all matters affecting his personal dignity. (Dion Cass. lix. 10; comp. Spartian, Sceor. 14.) [W. R.]

CRISPUS, M A RC IUS, served as tribune in Caesar's army during the African war. (Hirtius, Bell. Afr. 77.) He is probably the same as the Q. Marcus Crispus, who is frequently mentioned by Cicero as a brave and experienced soldier. In n. c. 43, he was in Bithynia as proconsul, and when L. Murex solicited his assistance against Bassus, Crispus came with his three legions to Syria. When C. Cassius came to the East, both Crispus and L. Murex surrendered their legions to him. (Clio. in Poson. 23; Plat. xii. 12, ad Pand. xii. 11, ad D儒. ii. 5; Dion. Cass. xivii. 27; Appian. B. C. iii. 77, iv. 58 &c.)

CRISPUS PASSIÉNUS, the husband of Agrippina, and consequently the step-father of the Emperor Nero. He was a man of great wealth and distinction, and in A.D. 42 he was raised to the consulsip ship. He is praised both by Senea the philosopher (Quaest. Nat. iv. Praef., de Benef. i. 15), and by Senea the rhetorician (Contr. ii. 13) as one of the first orators of the time, especially for his senecund and subsili. Quintillian too (vi. 1. § 50, 3, § 74, x. 1, § 24) speaks of him with high esteem and quotes passages from his orations. [L. S.]

CRISPUS, VIBIUS, a Roman orator of great wealth and influence. He was a native of Vercelli and a contemporary of Quintilian. His speeches were most remarkable for their pleasant and elegant style; they were of the judicial kind, and Quintillian places those which he had delivered in civil cases above those spoken on state or public affairs. Vibius Crispus is also mentioned among the delators of his time. Some fragments of his orations are preserved in Quintillian. (Tacit. Hist. ii. 10, iv. 23, 41, Annal. xiv. 28, de Oral. 8; Quintil. v. 13, § 48, viii. 5. §§ 15, 17, x. 1. § 119, xii. 10, § 11; Dion Cass. lix. 2.)

CRISUS or CRISUS (Kólos), a son of Phocas and husband of Antiphaestus, by whom he became the father of Strophius. He is called the founder of Crissa or Cirbia. (Paus. i. 29. § 4; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 33.) [L. S.]

CRITIAS (Koértas). 1. Son of Dorian, a contemporary and relation of Solon's. He lived to the age of more than 90 years. His descendant Critias, the son of Calliascrus, is introduced in the "Timaeus" of Plato (pp. 20—25), as repeating from the old man's account the fable of the once mighty Atlantis, professing to have been derived by Solon from the priests of Egypt. (Comp. Plut. Cleomen., pp. 155, 167, ad fin.)

2. Son of Calliascrus, and grandson of the above. He was one of the pupils of Socrates, by whose instructions he profited but little in a moral point of view, and, together with Alcibiades, gave a colour to his life to the charge against the philosopher of corrupting the youth. Xenophon says, that he sought the company of Socrates for any desire of real improvement, but because he wished, for political purposes, to gain skill in confounding an adversary. We learn, however, from the same authority, that he lived a temperate life as long as his connexion with his great master lasted. (Xen. Mem. i. 2. §§ 12—18, 39.) From a fragment of Critius himself (op. Post. Ael. 33) it appears that he was mainly instrumental in procuring the recall of Alcibiades from banishment. At the time of the murder of the generals who had been victorians at Amphipolis, B. c. 406, we find him in Thessaly fomenting a sedition of the Pe-nesian against their lords, and endeavouring to set up democracy in conjunction with one Proneustheus, which has been supposed by some to be a surname of Jason of Phere. According to Xenophon, he had been banished by a sentence of the people, and this it was which afterwards made him so rancorous in his tyranny. (Xen. Mem. i. 2. § 24, Hell. ii. 3. §§ 15, 36; Schol. ad loc.) On his return to Athens he became leader of the oligarch- chial party, and was chosen to be one of the body called Ephori, probably not a public and legal office, but one instituted among themselves by the oligarchs for the better promotion of their ends. (Lyn. c. Erat. p. 124; Thirlwall’s Grecians, vol. iv. p. 160; Hermann, Pops. Ant. § 166.) He was one of the 39 tyrannicides in c. 404, was conspicuous above all his colleagues for rapacity and cruelty, sparing not even Soccrates himself, and took the lead in the prosecution of Tharamenes when he set himself against the continuance of the reign of terror. He was slain at the battle of Munychia in the same year, fighting against Thimylubus and the exiles. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. §§ 2, 15—56, 4. §§ 1—19, Mem. i. 2. §§ 12—38; Diod. iv. 4; Plat. Apol. p. 32, e; Cic. Tusc. Quast. i. 40.)

Cicero tells us (De Orat. ii. 29), that some speeches of Critias were still extant in his time, and speaks of them as marked by the vigour of matter which distinguished those of Pericles and by a greater copiousness of style. A work of his on politics is also frequently referred to by several writers, such as Plut. (Aet. V. H. c. 13, 17; Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. 2; comp. Plat. Tim. p. 20); some fragments of his elegies are still extant, and he is supposed by some to have been the author of the Peirithous and the Sisyphus (a satyric drama), which are commonly reckoned among the lost plays of Euripides; a tragedy named “Atalanta” is likewise ascribed to him. (Athen. 1. p. 28, b. x. p. 432, c. xi. p. 496, b; Fabric. Bibl. Graece. ii. pp. 252, 254, 294.) As we might suppose a priori from his character, he was but a debater and a dilettante in philosophy, a circumstance which Plato, with his delicate satire, by no means loses sight of (see Protag. p. 339), insomuch that it was not p. 4 of his Cosch. c. 9. (Aet. Tim. p. 29), that he was ἐπισκόπητος ἢν ἐν φιλοσοφίᾳ, ὕμνοις ἐν ἔκφρασε, “a lord among wits, and a wit among lords.” The remains of his poems have been edited separately by N., Bach, Leipzig, 1827.

CRITIAS, a very celebrated Athenian artist, whose workman- ships belong to the more ancient school, the description of which by Lucian (Rhad. Praecep. c. 9) bears an exact resemblance to the statues of Aegina. For this reason, and because the common reading of Phiry (H. N. xxxiv. 19, in.), “Critias Nestocles,” is manifestly corrupt, and the correction of H. Junius, “Nestoces,” is borne out by the Banham manuscript, Critias was considered by Müller (Aegina. p. 102) to have been a citizen of Aegina. But as Pamianus (vi. 2. § 2) calls him Ἀττικός, Thiersch (Epoch. p. 120) assigns his origin to one of the little islands near the coast of Attica, and Müller (Wien. Jahrh. xxxviii. p. 276) to the island of Lemnos, where the Athenians established a colony. All these theories were overthrown by two inscriptions found near the Acropolis, one of which belongs to a statue of Epirheus, who had won a prize running in arms, mentioned by Pamianus (i. 29. § 11), and should probably be restored thus: Εὐγεράμους ἀνδρίτην... Κρίτιας οὖν Ἀθηναὶς ἐποιήτην.

From this we learn, first, that the artist’s name was Critius, not Critias; then that Nestoces in Pliny’s text is a proper name. This Nesioetes was probably so far the assistant of the greater master, that he superintended the execution in bronze of the models of Critias. The most celebrated of their works were, the statues of Harmodius and Aristogeiton on the Acropolis. These were erected b. c. 477. (Marm. Oxom. Epoch. iv.) Critias was, therefore, probably older than Phidias, but lived as late as b. c. 444, to see the greatness of his rival. (Plin. l. c.)

CRITODEMUS (Κριτόδημος), son of Criton, and a disciple of Socrates. He did not however profit much by his master’s instructions, if we may trust the testimony of Aeschines the Sophist (ap. Athen. v. p. 290, a; comp. Casab. ad loc.), by whom he is represented as destitute of refinement and sordid in his mode of living. (Comp. Plat. Protag. p. 57; Xen. Mem. iii. 1. § 8, iii. 6; Athen. v. p. 168, d; Diog. Laert. ii. 121.)

E. E.

CRITODEMUS (Κριτόδημος), a citizen of Lampesus, who appeared at Athens as the representative of Corcyreans in b. c. 346, when the treaty of peace between Philip and the Athenians was about to be ratified, and claimed to be admitted to take the oath on behalf of the Thracian king as one of the allies of Athens. A decree to this effect was passed by the assembly in spite of a strong opposition, as Aeschines asserts, on the part of Demosthenes. Yet when the treaty was actually ratified before the board of generals, Corcyreans was excluded from it. Demosthenes and Aeschines accuse one another of thus having nullified the decree; while, according to Philip’s account, Critodesmus was prevented by the generals from taking the oath. (Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 39, Ep. Phil. ad Ath. p. 160; Dem. de Poli. Leg. p. 383; Thirlwall’s Grecians, vol. v. p. 356.)

CRITODEMUS (Κριτόδημος), a Greek surgeon, said to be of Phrygia (H. N. vii. 17. § 203), is said to have extracted an arrow from the eye of Philip the son of Amyntas, king of Macedon, (probably at the siege of Methone, b. c. 353) so skillfully that, though he could not save his sight, he prevented his face from being disfigured. He is also mentioned by Quintus Curtius (ix. 5) as having been the person who extracted the weapon from the wound which Alexander received in storming the principal fortress of the Mallians, b. c. 326.

The Great received in storming the principal fortress of the Malians in 326.

[Carroll et al.] [W. A. G.] CRITOLAEUS (Kritoláus), the Peripatetic philosopher, was a native of Phaselis, a Greek colony in Lycia, and studied philosophy at Athens under Aristo of Cyn, where he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school. The great reputation which Critolaus enjoyed at Athens, as a philosopher, an orator, and a statesman, induced the Athenians to send him to Rome in B.C. 155, together with Carneades the Academic and Diogenes the Stoic, to obtain a remission of the fine of 500 talents which the Romans had imposed upon Athens for the destruction of Oropus. They were successful in the object for which they came; and the embassy excited the greatest interest at Rome. Not only the Roman youth, but the most illustrious men in the state, such as Scipio Africanus, Laelius, Furius, and others, came to listen to their discourses. The novelty of their doctrines seemed to the Romans of the old school to be fraught with such danger to the morals of the citizens, that Cato induced the senate to send them away from Rome as quickly as possible. (Plut. Cat. Mag. 22; Gell. vii. 14; Macrob. Saturn. i. 5; Cic. de Orat. ii. 37, 38.) We have no further information respecting the life of Critolaus. He lived upwards of eighty-two years, but died before the arrival of L. Crassus at Athens, that is, before B.c. 111. (Lucian, Macrob. 20; Cic. de Orat. i. 11.)

Critolaus seems to have paid particular attention to rhetoric, though he considered it, like Aristotle, not as an art, but rather as a matter of practice (πραγματικά). Cicero speaks in high terms of his eloquence (Quintil. ii. 15, § 23, 17, § 15; Sext. Empir. adv. Mathem. ii. 12, p. 291; Cic. de Fin. v. 5). Next to rhetoric, Critolaus seems to have given his chief attention to the study of moral philosophy, and to have made some additions to Aristotle's system (comp. Cic. Tusc. v. 17; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 416), but upon the whole he devoted very little from the philosophy of the founder of the Peripatetic school. (Stahl, Aristotelica, ii. pp. 83, 135; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 463.)

A Critolaus is mentioned by Pindar (Parall. min. ca. 6, 9) as the author of a work on Epeirus, and of another entitled Ψαληνας; and Gallius (oct. 9) also speaks of an historical writer of this name. Whether the historian is the same as the Peripatetic philosopher cannot be determined. A grammatical Critolaus is mentioned in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. Κριτόλαος). [A.S.] CRITOLAEUS (Kritoláous), an Athenian, who succeeded Dicas in B.C. 147, as strategos of the Achaenae, and was as bitter an enemy of the Romans as his predecessor. As soon as he entered upon his office, he began insulting the Roman ambassadors and breaking off all negotiations with them. After their departure for Italy, he had recourse to all the demagogic artifices that he could devise, in order to render the rupture between the Romans and Achaenae irremediable. During the ensuing winter he travelled from one town to another, infuriating the people by his furious speeches against the Romans. He tried, especially, to work upon the populace in the towns of Greece, and resort to the most iniquitous means to obtain their favour. Thus he extorted a promise from the magistrates of several towns to take care that no debtor should be compelled to pay his debts before the war with Rome should be brought to a close. By these and similar means he won the enthusiastic admiration of the multitude, and when this was accomplished, he summoned an assembly of the Achaenae to meet at Corinth, which was attended by the dregs of the nation, and which conducted its proceedings in the most riotous and tumultuous manner. Four noble Romans, who attended the meeting and tried to speak, were driven from the place of assembly and treated with the grossest insults. It was in vain that the moderate men among the Achaenae endeavoured to bring Critolaus and his partizans to their senses. Critolaus surrounded himself with a body-guard, and threatened to use force against those who opposed his plans, and further deplored them to the multitude as traitors of their country. The moderate and well-meaning persons were thus intimidated, and withdrew. War was therefore declared against Lacedaemon, which was under the especial protection of Rome. In order to get rid of all restraints, he carried a second decree, which conferred dictatorial power upon the strategi. The Romans, or rather Q. Caecilius Metellus, the proctor of Macedonia, had shown all possible forbearance towards the Achaenae, and a willingness to come to a peaceable understanding with them. This conduct was explained by Critolaus as a consequence of weakness on the part of the Romans, who, he said, did not dare to venture upon a war with the Achaenae. In addition to this, he contrived to inspire the Achaenae with the prospect of forming alliances with powerful princes and states. But this hope was almost completely disappointed, and the Achaenae rushed into a war with the gigantic powers of Rome, in which every sensible person must have seen that destruction awaited them. In the spring of B.C. 146, Critolaus marched with a considerable army of Achaenae towards Thermopylae, partly to rouse all Greece to a general insurrection against Rome, and partly to chastise Heraclea, near mount Oeta, which had abandoned the cause of the Achaenae. Metellus even now offered his hand for reconciliation; but when his proposals were rejected, and he himself suddenly appeared in the neighbourhood of Heraclea, Critolaus at once raised the siege of the town, quitted his position, and fled southward. Metellus followed and took him near the town of Scarphe in Locri, where he gained an easy but brilliant victory over the Achaenae. A great number of the latter fell, and 1000 of them were made prisoners by the Romans. Critolaus himself was never heard of after this battle. Livy (Epit. 52) states, that he poisoned himself, but it seems more probable that he perished in the sea or on the marshes on the coast. Critolaus was the immediate cause of the war which terminated in the destruction of Corinth and put an end to the political existence of Greece. His plan of opposing Rome at that time by force of arms was the offspring of a mad brain, and the way in which he proceeded in carrying it into effect shewed what a contemptible and cowardly demagogue he was. (Polyb. xxvii. i. 2, &c., xl. 1, &c.; Plut. vii. 14 and 15; Flor. ii. 16; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 38; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iv. p. 304, &c.) [L.S.] CRITON (Kritôn), of Athens, the friend and disciple of Socrates, is more celebrated in antiquity.

for his love and affection for his master, whom he generously supported with his fortune (Diog. Laërt. ii. 20, 121), than as a philosopher himself. Accordingly, whenever he is introduced in Plato's dialogues, his attachment to Socrates is extolled, and not his philosophical talents. It was Craton who had made every arrangement for the escape of Socrates from prison, and who, tried in vain, to persuade him to fly, as we see from Plato's dialogue named after him; and it was Craton also who closed the eyes of the dying philosopher.

(Plut. Phaedon, p. 118, a.) Craton applied his great riches, which are mentioned by Socrates in a jokey way in the Euthydemus of Plato (p. 304, c.), to the noblest purposes. His sons, of whom he possessed four according to Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 121), and two according to Plato (Euthydem. p. 360, with Heindorff's note), were likewise disciples of Socrates. The eldest of them was Cratobulus.

CIRIUS.

Cirius wrote seventeen dialogues on philosophical subjects, the titles of which are given by Diogenes Laërtius (i. c.). Among these there were the 'Sphaeri,' which is the only work on this subject mentioned in the history of Greek literature before the work of Aristotle. (The passages in Plato's writings, in which Cirius is mentioned, are collected in Groen van Prinsterer, Prosopographia Platonica, p. 200, &c., Lugd. Bat. 1823; comp. Herrmann, Gesch. und System der Platon. Philosophen, i. p. 633.) [A.S.]

CRITON (Κρίτων). 1. Of Aegina, a Pythagorean philosopher, a fragment of whose work, περὶ προστασίας καὶ διάβασμα τῶν θεῶν, is preserved by Stobaeus. (Ser. 3; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. pp. 540, 386.)

2. Of Athens, a comic poet of the new comedy, of very little note. Of his comedies there only remain a few lines and three titles, Αἴαντος, Φαλάκρωμος, and Μεστάγης. (Pollux. ix. 4, 15, x. 7, 35; Ath. iv. 173, b.; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Graec. i. p. 484, iv. pp. 537, 538.)

3. Of Nauxus. [Eudosxus.]

4. Of Pieria, in Macedonia, wrote historical and descriptive works, entitled Παλαιακά, Σφρακουσών κτήσει, Περασκαί, Σιτικάλεα, Σφρακουσών περιήγησις, and περὶ τῆς διαρκείας των Μακεδών. (Suid. s. v.) Immediately before, Suidas has the entry, Κρίτων ἐγέρθη ἐν τοῖς Γενεσίοις. (Comp. Suid. s. v. γέρος; Steph. Byz. Peria.) Whether this was the same person is not known. (Voss. Hist. Graec. p. 423, Westermann; Ebert, de Cirione Pherio in Diss. Soc. i. p. 128.) [F. S.]

CRITON (Κρίτων). 1. A physician at Rome in the first or second century after Christ, attached to the court of one of the emperors (Gal. De Compos. Medecum. sce. Locos, i. 2, vol. xii. p. 443), probably Trajan, A. D. 98—117. He is perhaps the person mentioned by Martial. (Epigr. xi. 60, 6.) He wrote a work on Cosmetics (Κοσμητικὰ) in four books, which were very popular in Galen's time (ibid. p. 446) and which contained almost all that had been written on the same subject by Heracleides of Tarentum, Cleopatra, and others. The contents of each chapter of the four books have been preserved by Galen (Ibid.), by whom the work is frequently quoted, and have been inserted by Fabricius in the twelfth volume of the old edition of his Bibl. Graec. He wrote also a work on Simple Medicines (Περὶ τῶν Ἀπαξ Ἑμαμένων) of which the fourth book is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medecum. sce. Gen. ii. 11, vol. xiii. pp. 516, 362); he is also quoted by Aetius and Paulus Aegineta, and may perhaps be the person to whom one of the letters of Apollonius of Tynna is addressed. (Ep. xvii. ed. Colon. Agrripp. 1633, 8vo.) None of his works are extant, except a few fragments preserved by other authors. He is perhaps the author of a work on Cookery, mentioned by Athenaeus (cii. p. 516.)

2. Another physician of the same name is mentioned by Galen as having belonged to the sect of the Empirici in the fourth or third century before Christ. (De Subjig. Empir. c. 1, vol. ii. p. 340, ed. Chart.) [W. A. G.]

L. CRITONIUS, a Roman, who was aedilis cerealis in n. c. 44. This office had been instituted by J. Caesar, and M. Fannius were the first who filled it. Appian (B. C. iii. 23) relates the following occurrence respecting Critonius. When the Cerealia were celebrated, shortly after the murder of Caesar, and Octavius erected the golden saula with a crown in honour of Caesar,—a distinction which had been conferred upon the dictator by a senatorial consultum,—Cirius declared that he would not suffer Caesar to be thus honoured in the games for which he (Cirius) himself had to pay the expenses. This conduct of a man who had belonged to the party of Caesar, and had been promoted by him (comp. Cic. ad Att. xiii. 21), is indeed surprising; but it may have been the consequence of a strong republican enthusiasm. Another more serious difficulty is contained in the fact, that the Cerealia, at which Octavius is here represented to have been present, were celebrated in the early part of April (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Cereal.), that is, before the time at which Octavius is known to have returned to Rome. Unless, therefore, we suppose that there is some blunder in the account of Appian, we must believe that the celebration of the games in that year was postponed on account of the great confusion that followed after the murder of Caesar. (Drammum, Gesch. Rom. i. p. 128.)

The annexed coin refers to this Cirionius. It bears on the obverse the head of Ceres, and on the reverse two men sitting, with the legend, M. FAN L. CAIV, and it was doubly struck by order of M. Fannius and L. Cirionius in the year that they were aediles cereales. [L. S.]
ratus was not with him. Cleomenes, being obliged to withdraw, concealed himself by a play on the words Kριξ and Κρίνη (κρίνων = man), and kept the refectory Atheneum to turn his hosts with brass, as he would soon need all the defence he could get. (Herod. vi. 50; comp. v. 75.) It was supposed that the resistance had been privately encouraged by Demaratus (vi. 61, 64), and on the deposition of the latter, and the appointment of Leotychides to the throne (vi. 65, 66), Cleomenes again went to Aegina with his new colleague, and, having seized Cius and others, delivered them into the custody of the Athenians. (vi. 73; comp. 85, &c.) Polycrates, the son of Cius, distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis, B.C. 480, and wiped off the reproach of Medium. (vii. 92.) [E. E.]

CROIXUS (Κρίξος), a Gaul, was one of the two principal generals in the army of Spartacus, B.C. 73. Two Roman armies had already been defeated by the revolting gladiators and slaves, when Crixus was defeated in a battle near mount Garumna by the consul L. Gellius, in B.C. 72. Crixus himself was slain, and two-thirds of his army, which consisted of 50,000 men, were destroyed on the field of battle. Spartacus soon after sacrificed 300 Roman captives to the mages of Crixus. (Appian, B.C. i. 116, &c.; Liv. Epit. 93, 96; Sall. Frug. Hist. lib. iii.) [L. S.]

CROBYLUS (Κροβύλος), an Athenian comic poet, who is reckoned among the poets of the new comedy, but it is uncertain whether he really belonged to the middle or the new. About his age we only know for certain, that he lived about or after B.C. 334, but not how long after. Some writers have confounded him with Hegesippus. [Hegesippus.]

The following titles of his plays, and a few lines, are extant:

CROCEIFATAS (Κροκειφατας), a surname of Zeus, derived from a place, Croceae, near Gythium in Laconia. (Paus. iii. 21, § 4.) [L. S.]

CROCON (Κροκον), the husband of Sesaera and father of Meganeira. (Apollod. ill. ii. § 1; Paus. ii. 53, § 2; comp. Anc.) [L. S.]

CROCUS, the beloved friend of Similax, was chance prisoner of the Athenian fleet, and escaped from prison with a piece of silk which he loved without being loved again. According to another tradition, he was metamorphosed by his friend Hermes, who had killed him in a game of dice. (Ov. Met. iv. 283; Scrv. ad Vrg. Geor. iv. 182.) [L. S.]

CROUSUS (Κρούος), the last king of Lydia, of the family of the Mermnades, was the son of Alyattes; his mother was a Carian. At the age of thirty-five, he succeeded his father in the kingdom of Lydia. (B. C. 560.) Difficulties have been raised about this date, and there are very strong reasons for believing that Croesus was associated in the kingdom during his father's life, and that the earlier events of his reign, as related by Herodotus, were not borne the test of joint examination. (Clinton F. H. ii. pp. 297, 298.) We are expressly told that he was made satrap of Adramytium and the plain of Thebes about B. C. 674 or 572. (Nicol. Dumas. p. 243, ed. Cor., supposed to be taken from the Lydian history of Xanthus; Fischer, Griechische Zeitgesch. a. 572 b. c.) He made war first on the Ephesians, and after-wards on the other Ionian and Aeolian cities of Asia Minor, all of which he reduced to the payment of tribute. His war was meditated on account to subdue the insular Greeks also, when either Bias or Pittacus turned him from his purpose by a clever fable (Herod. i. 27); and instead of attacking the islanders he made an alliance with them. Croesus next turned his arms against the peoples of Asia Minor west of the river Halys, all of whom he subdued except the Lydians and Cilicians. His dominions now extended from the northern and western coasts of Asia Minor, to the Halys on the east and the Taurus on the south, and included the Lydians, Phrygians, Mysians, Mardandynians, Chalybes, Paphaghiotians, the Thynian and Dithyandian Thracians, the Carians, Ionians, Dorian, Aeolians, and Pamphylians. The fame of his power and wealth drew to his court at Sardis all the wise men (φιλόσοφοι) of Greece, and among them Solon. To him the king exhibited all his treasures, and then asked him who was the happiest man he had ever seen. The reply of Solon, teaching that no man should be deemed happy till he had finished his life in a happy way, may be read in the beautiful narrative of Herodotus. After the departure of Solon, Croesus was visited with a divine retribution for his pride. He had two sons, of whom one was dumb, but the other excelled all his comrades in manly accomplishments. His name was Atys. Croesus had a dream that Atys should perish by an iron-pointed weapon, and in spite of all his precautions, an accident fulfilled the dream. His other son lived to save his father's life by suddenly regaining the power of speech when he saw Croesus in danger at the taking of Sardis. Adrastus, the unfortunate slayer of Atys, killed himself on his tomb, and Croesus gave himself up to grief for two years. At the end of that time the growing power of Cyrus, who had recently subdued the Median kingdom, excited the apprehension of Croesus, and he conceived the idea of putting down the Persians before their empire became firm. Before, however, venturing to attack Cyrus, he looked to the Greeks for aid, and to their oracles for counsel; and in both points he was deceived. In addition to the oracles among the Greeks, he consulted the Amphiaraus of Lydia, who first told them their truth to be just, by sending messengers to inquire of them at a certain time what he was then doing. The replies of the oracle of Amphiarus and that of the Delphi at Pytho were correct; that of the latter is preserved by Herodotus. To these oracles, and especially to that at Pytho, Croesus sent rich presents, and charged the bearers of them to inquire whether he should march against the Persians, and whether there was any people whom he ought to make his allies. The reply of both oracles was, that, if he marched against the Persians, he would overthrow a great empire, and both advised him to make allies of the most powerful among the Greeks. He of course understood that to conquer the Persians was impossible, and that his empire, and not, as the priests explained it after the event, to his own; and he sent presents to each of the Delphians, who in return granted to him and his people the privileges of priority in consulting the oracle, exemption from charges, and the chief seat at festivals (προεξογενης και άητελην και προδρομ), and that any one of them might at any time obtain certain rights of citizenship (γενισθα Δελφων). Croesus, having now the most unbounded confidence in the oracle, consulted it for the third time, asking whether his monarchy would last long. The Pythia replied that he should flee along the Hermus, when a mule became king over the Medes. By this mule was signified Cyrus, who was descended of two different nations, his father being a Persian, but his mother a Mede. Croesus, however, thought that a mule would never be king over the Medes, and proceeded confidently to follow the advice of the oracle about making allies of the Greeks. Upon inquiry, he found that the Lacedaemonians and Athenians were the most powerful of the Greeks; but that the Athenians were distracted by the civil dissensions between Peisistratus and the Alcmaeonides, while the Lacedaemonians had just come off victorious from a long and dangerous war with the people of Tegae. Croesus therefore sent presents to the Lacedaemonians, with a request for their alliance, and his request was granted by the Lacedaemonians, upon who he had previously conferred a favour. All that they did for him, however, was to send a present, which never reached him. Croesus, having now fully determined on the war, in spite of the good advice of a Lydian named Sardanis (Herod. i. 71), and having some time before made a league with Amasis, king of Egypt, and Labynthus, king of the Babylonians, marched across the Halys, which was the boundary between the Medo-Persian empire and himself. The pretext for his aggression was to avenge the wrongs of his brother-in-law Astyages, whom Cyrus had deposed from the throne of Medin. He wasted the country of the Cappadocians (whom the Greeks called also Syrians) and took their strongest town, that of the Peri, near Sinope, in the neighbourhood of which he was met by Cyrus, and they fought an indecisive battle, which was broken off by night. (a. c. 546.) The following day, as Cyrus did not offer battle, and as his own army was much inferior to the Persian in numbers, Croesus marched back to Sardis, with the intention of summoning his allies and recruiting his own forces, and then renewing the war on the return of spring. Accordingly, he sent heralds to the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Lacedaemonians, requesting their aid at Sardis in five months, and in the meantime he disbanded all his mercenary troops. Cyrus, however, pursued him with a rapidity which he had not expected, and appeared before Sardis before his approach could be announced. Croesus led out his Lydian cavalry to battle, and was totally defeated. In this battle Cyrus is said to have employed the stratagem of opening a passage for his chariots, which could not endure the noise or odour of the camels. Croesus, being now shut up in Sardis, sent again to hasten his allies. One of his emissaries, named Eurybatus, betrayed his counsels to Cyrus (Eurybatus), and before any help could arrive, Sardis was taken by the boldness of a Maradin, who found an unprotected point in its defences, after Croesus had reigned 14 years, and had been besieged 14 days. (Near the end of 546, b. c.) Croesus was taken alive, and devoted to the flames by Cyrus, together with 14 Lydian youths, probably as a thanksgiving sacrifice to the god whom the Persians worship in the symbol of fire. But as Croesus stood in letters upon the pyre, the warning of Solon came to his mind, and having broken a long silence with a groan, he thrice uttered the name of Solon. Cyrus inquired who it was that he called on, and, upon hearing the story, repeated of his purpose, and ordered the fire to be quenched. When this could not be done, Croesus prayed aloud with tears to Apollo, by all the presents he had given him, to save him now, and immediately the fire was quenched by a storm of rain. Believing that Croesus was under a special divine protection, and no doubt also struck by the warning of Solon, Cyrus took Croesus for his friend and counsellor, and gave him for an abode the city of Barrene, near Ecbatana. In his expedition against the Massagetae, Cyrus had Croesus with him, and followed his advice about the passage of the Araxes. Before passing the river, however, he sent him back to Persia, with his own son Cambyses, whom he charged to honour Croesus, and Croesus to advise his son. When Cambyses came to the throne, and invaded Egypt, Croesus accompanied him. In the affair of Parnesia and his son, Croesus at first acted the part of a flattering courtier, though not, as it seems, without a touch of irony (Herod. iii. 34); but, after Cambyses had murdered the latter, Croesus boldly admonished him, and was obliged to fly for his life from the presence of the king. The servants of Cambyses concealed him, thinking that their master would repent of having wished to kill him. And so it happened; but when Cambyses heard that Croesus was alive, he said that he was glad, but he ordered those who had saved him to be put to death for their disobedience. Of the time and circumstances of Croesus's death we know nothing. A few additional, but unimportant incidents in his life, are mentioned by Herodotus. Ctesias's account of the taking of Sardis is somewhat different from that of Herodotus. (Herod. i. 6, 7, 29—34, 130, 153, 207, 298, iii. 14, 34—36, v. 36, vi. 27, 37, 125, 35; Ctesias, Periplus, 4, ed. Lion, ap. Phot. Cod. 73, p. 36, Behkter; Ptol. Hephæst. ap. Phot. Cod. 100, p. 146, b. 21, 148, b. 31; Plut. Sot. 27; Dion. lex. 2, 25—27, 29, 31, 34, xiv. 50; Justin i. 7.) Xenophon, in his historical romance, gives some further particulars about Croesus which are unauthenticated by any other testimony and opposed to that of Herodotus, with whom, however, he for the most part agrees. (Cyr. i. 5, ii. 1, iv. 1, 2, vi. 2, vii. 1, viii. 2.) [P. S.]

CRONUS (Κρόνος), a son of Poseidon, from whom Cronyom in the territory of Corinth was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. ii. 1, § 3.) A son of Lycaon likewise bore this name. (Paus. viii. 3, § 1.)

Ceton (Κέτων), a Corinthian, was the CRONTON (Κροντόν or Κροντών), a patronymic from Cronus, and very commonly given to Zeus, the son of Cronus. (Hom. H. i. 528, ii. 111, &c.) [L. S.]

CRONIUS (Κρόνιος), the name of two mythical personages, the one a son of Zeus by the nymph Himalia (Diod. v. 55), and the other a son of Hippodameia, who was killed by Oenomaus. (Paus. vi. 21, § 7.) [L. S.]

CRONIUS (Κρόνιος), a Pythagorean philosopher. (Porphyry, Vfl. Plot. 29; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi. 19.) Nemæus (de Ass. 2, p. 35) mentions a work of his περὶ παλαγγελιῶν, and Origen is said to have diligently studied the works of Cronius. (Suid. κατ' ἐργάτους.) Porphyry also states, that he endeavoured to explain the fables of the Homeric poems in a philosophical manner. This is all we know about Cronus, although he appears to have been very distinguished among the later Pythagoreans.

CROTONIUS, an engraver of gems, who lived between the times of Alexander and Augustus. (Plin. H. N. xxxvil. 4; Visconti, Oeuv. div. ii. P. 123.) [ L. U.]

CRONUS (Χρόνος), a son of Uranus and Ge, and the youngest among the Titans. He was married to Rhea, by whom he became the father of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, Poseidon, and Zeus. Cheiron is also called a son of Cronus. (Hesiod. Theog. 137, 452, &c.; Apollod. i. 1 § 3, &c.) At the instigation of his mother, Cronus unmanned his father for having thrown the Cyclopes, who were likewise his children by Ge, into Tartarus. Out of the blood thus shed sprung up the Erinyes. When the Cyclopes were delivered from Tartarus, the government of the world was taken from Uranus and given to Cronus, who in his turn lost it through Zeus, as was predicted to him by Ge and Uranus. [Zeus.] The Romans identified their Saturnus with the Cronus of the Greeks. [Saturnus.]

CROTUS (Χρότος), a son of Pan by Eupheme, the nurse of the Muse, with whom he was brought up, and at whose request he was placed among the stars as Sagittarius, as he had been a skilful shooter. (Hygin. Fab. 224; Pödö. Astr. ii. 77.) [ L. S.]

COTES (Κότας). 1. Of Cudius in Caria, and a son of Ctesiuchus or Ctesiarchus. (Suid. s. v. Κότας; Eudoc. p. 268; Tzetza, Choël. i. 62.) Cudius was celebrated from early times as a seat of medical knowledge, and Ctesis, who himself belonged to the family of the Asclepiads, was a physician by profession. He was a contemporary of Xenophon; and if Herodotus lived till B. C. 425, or, according to some, even till B. C. 408, Ctesis may be called a contemporary of Herodotus. He lived for a number of years in Persia at the court of Artaxerxes Mmnon, as private physician to the king. (Strab. xiv. p. 655.) Diodorus (ii. 23) states, that Ctesis was made prisoner by the king, and that owing to his great skill in medicine, he was afterwards drawn to the court, and was highly honoured there. This statement, which contains nothing to suggest the time when Ctesis was made prisoner, has been referred to some critics to the war between Artaxerxes and his brother, Cyrus the Younger, B. C. 401. But at the first place, Ctesis is already mentioned, during that war, as accompanying the king. (Xen. Anab. i. 8, § 27.) Moreover, if as Diodorus and Tzetzes state, Ctesis remained seventeen years at the court of Persia, and returned to his native country in B. C. 398 (Diod. xiv. 46; comp. Plut. Artax. 21), it follows, that he must have gone to Persia long before the battle of Cumax, that is, about B. C. 415. The statement, that Ctesis entered Persia as a prisoner of war, has been doubted; and if we consider the favour with which other Greek physicians, such as Democedes and Hippocrates were treated and how they were sought for at the court of Persia, it is not improbable, that Ctesis may have been invited to the court; but the express statement of Diodorus, that he was made a prisoner cannot be upset by such a mere probability. There are two accounts respecting his return to Cnidus. It took place at the time when Conon was in Cyprus. Ctesis himself had simply stated, that he asked Artaxerxes and obtained from him the permission to return. According to the other account, Conon sent a letter to the king, in which he gave him advice as to the means of humbling the Laeaeananians. Conon requested the bearer to get the letter delivered to the king by some of the Greeks who were staying at his court. When the letter was given for this purpose to Ctesis, the latter inserted a passage in which he made Conon desire the king to send Ctesis to the west, as he would be a very useful person there. (Plut. Artax. 21.) The latter account is not recommended by any strong internal probability, and the simple statement of Ctesis himself seems to be more entitled to credit. How long Ctesis survived his return to Cnidus is unknown.

During his stay in Persia, Ctesis gathered all the information that was attainable in that country, and wrote — 1. A great work on the history of Persia (Στραβονίς), with the view of giving his monarch a comprehensive knowledge of that empire then they possessed, and to refute the errors current in Greece, which had arisen partly from ignorance and partly from the national vanity of the Greeks. The materials for his history, so far as he did not describe events of which he had been an eye-witness, he derived, according to the testimony of Diodorus, from the Persian archives (Σφαῖρας βασιλικά), or the official history of the Persian empire, which was written in accordance with a law of the country. This important work of Ctesis, which, like that of Herodotus, was written in the Ionic dialect, consisted of twenty-three books. The first six contained the history of the great Assyrian monarchy down to the foundation of the kingdom of Persia. It is for this reason that Strabo (xiv. p. 656) speaks of Ctesis as αὐτογράφος τα Ἀσσυρικα καὶ τα Περσικα. The next seven books contained the history of Persia down to the end of the reign of Xerxes, and the remaining ten carried the history down to the time when Ctesis left Persia, i. e. to the year B. C. 398. (Diod. xiv. 46.) The form and style of this work were of considerable merit, and its loss may be regarded as one of the most serious for the history of the East. (Dionys. Hal. De Comp. Verb. 10; Demetr. Phal. De Eloct. §§ 212, 215.) All that is now extant of it is a meagre abridgment in Photius (Cod. 72), and a number of fragments which are preserved in Diodorus, Athenaeus, Plutarch, and others. Of the first portion, which contained the history of Assyria, there is no abridgment in Photius, and all we possess of that part is contained in the second book of Diodorus, which seems to be taken almost entirely from Ctesis. There we find that the accounts of Ctesis, especially in their chronology, differ considerably from those of Berosus, who likewise derived his information from eastern sources. These discrepancies can only be explained by the fact, that the annals used by the two historians were written in different places and under different circumstances. The chronicles used by Ctesis were written by official persons, and those used by Berosus were written by some monastic or priestly historians, both of whom were connected with Peloponnese. The works of these historians were written from a different point of view, and neither was perhaps strictly true in all its details. The part of Cetesia's work which contained the history of Persia, that is, from the sixth book to the end, is somewhat better known from the extracts which Photius made from it, which are still extant. Here again Cetesias is frequently at variance with other Greek writers, especially with Herodotus. To account for this, we must remember, that he is expressly reported to have written his work with the intention of correcting the erroneous notions about Persia in Greece; and if this was the case, the reader must naturally be prepared to find the accounts of Cetesias differing from those of others. It is moreover not improbable, that the Persian chronicles were as partial to the Persians, if not more so, as the accounts written by Greeks were to the Greeks. These considerations sufficiently account, in our opinion, for the differences existing between the statements of Cetesias and other writers; and there appears to be no reason for charging him, as some have done, with wilfully falsifying history. It is at least certain, that there can be no positive evidence for such a serious charge. The court chronicles of Persia appear to have contained chiefly the history of the royal family, the occurrences at the court and the seraglio, the intrigues of the women and eunuchs, and the insurrections of satraps to make themselves independent of the great monarch. Suidas (s. v. Παμφίλδα) mentions, that Pamphila made an abridgment of the work of Cetesias, probably the Persica, in three books.

Another work, for which Cetesias also collected his materials during his stay in Persia, was—2. A treatise on India (Ἰνδία) in one book, of which we likewise possess an abridgment in Photius, and a great number of fragments preserved in other writers. The description refers chiefly to the north-western part of India, and is principally confined to a description of the natural history, the produce of the soil, and the animals and men of India. In this description truth is to a great extent mixed up with fables, and it seems to be mainly owing to this work that Cetesias was looked upon in later times as an author who deserved no credit. But if his account of India is looked upon from a proper point of view, it does not in any way deserve to be treated with contempt. Cetesias himself never visited India, and his work was the first in the Greek language that was written upon that country: he could do nothing more than lay before his countrymen that which was known or believed about India among the Persians. His India must therefore be regarded as a picture of India, even as it was conceived by the Persians. Many things in his description which were formerly looked upon as fabulous, have been proved by the more recent discoveries in India to be founded on facts.

Cetesias also wrote several other works, of which, however, we know little more than their titles: they were—3. Περὶ Ὀροὺ, which consisted of at least two books. (Plut. de Flor. 21; Stob. Prooril. C 18.) 4. Περὶ τῶν Βακχῶν Αἰσιάς (Steph. Byz. s. v. Βακχῶν), which is perhaps the same as the Περὶ γῆσως of which Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Κουστά) quotes the third book. 5. Περὶ Ποταμῶν (Plut. de Flor. 19), and 6. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν ἄρτων. It has been inferred from a passage in Ctesias (v. p. 552, ed. Balz.), that Cetesias also wrote on medicine, but no accounts of his medical works have come down to us.

The abridgment which Photius made of the Persica and Indica of Cetesias were printed separately by H. Stephens, Paris, 1557 and 1594, 8vo., and were also added to his edition of Herodotus. After his time, it became customary to print the remains of Cetesias as an appendix to Herodotus. The first separate edition of these abridgments, together with the fragments preserved in other writers, is that of A. Lami, Göttingen, 1823, 8vo., with critical notes and a Latin translation. A more complete edition, with an introductory essay on the life and writings of Cetesias, is that of Bähr, Frankfurt, 1824, 8vo. (Compare Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 710, &c.; Retig, Ctesia Codiis Vitae cum appendice de libros Ctesiae, Hanov. 1827, 8vo.; K. L. Blum, Herodot und Ctesias, Heidelberg. 1836, 8vo.)

2. Of Ephesius, an epic poet, who is mentioned by Plutarch (de Flor. 11) as the author of an epic poem, Περὶ σίδηρος. His age is quite unknown. Wecker (Der Ephes. Cypria p. 50) considers this Cetesias to be the same as the Musaeus (which he regards as a fictitious name) of Ephesios to whom Suidas and Eudocia ascribe an epic poem, Perseus, in ten books. But this is a mere conjecture, in support of which little can be said.

CUTESIBUS (Κυτσέιβος). 1. A Greek historian, who probably lived at the time of the first Ptolemies, or at least after the time of Demosthenes, for we learn from Plutarch (Dem. 6), that Hermippus of Smyrna referred to him as his authority for some statement respecting Demosthenes. According to Apollodorus (ap. Philog. de Linguea 2), Cutesibus died during a walk at the age of 104, and according to Lucian (Macrob. 22), at the age of 194 years. Whether he was the author of a work, Περὶ Ποταμῶν, referred to by Plutarch (Plut. Χ' Ποταμ. p. 84, G.) is uncertain.

2. A Cynic philosopher, a native of Chalais and a friend of Menedemus. According to Athenaeus, who relates an anecdote about him, he lived in the reign of Antigonus, king of Macedonia. ( Athen. i. p. 15, iv. p. 162.)

[LS.]

CUTESIBUS (Κυτσέιβος), celebrated for his mechanical inventions, was born at Alexandria, and lived probably about b. c. 250, in the reigns of the Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes, though Athenaeus (iv. p. 174) says, that he flourished in the time of the second Euergetes. His father was a barber, but his own taste led him to devote himself to mechanics. He is said to have invented a clepsydra or water-clock, a hydraulic organ (διπορίας) and other machines, and to have been the first to discover the elastic force of air and apply it as a moving power. Vitruvius (lib. viii. praef.) mentions him as an author, but none of his works remain. He was the teacher, and has been supposed to have been the father, of Hero of Alexandria, whose treatise called Θεονομική has also sometimes been attributed to him. (Vitruv. ix. 9, x. 12; Plin. H. N. vii. 37; Athen. iv. p. 174, xi. p. 497; Philo Byzant. ap. Vet. Math. pp. 56, 67, 72; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 591.)

[W. F. D.]

CUTSCILES (Κυτσαίλης), the author of a chronological work (χρονικαὶ ἢ χρόνων), of which two fragments are preserved in Athenaeus (vi. p. 273, x. p. 445.)

[L. S.]

CUTSCILES, the author of a beautiful statue at Samos, of which a similar statue is told by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 606, a.) as that respecting the injury sustained by the Cretan Venus of Praxiteles.

3 N 2
In n. c. 196, Culleo was one of the three ambassadors who were sent to Carthage to complain that Hannibal was forming the design of making war upon the Romans in conjunction with Antiochus. In n. c. 187 Culleo was prator peregrine, and he was appointed by the senate in this year as the commissioner to conduct the inquiry respecting the money of Antiochus, which was said to have been misappropriated by L. Scipio Asiacus and his legates. This appointment was made under a plenitum which had been carried chiefly through the influence of Cato the censor, and which deferred to the latter's nomination of a commissioner to inquire into the matter. The respect which Culleo had paid to P. Scipio was well known, and the friends of the Scipios probably supported his appointment for that reason; though it is stated, on the other hand, that his nomination to the office was brought about by the enemies of Scipio, because he was in reality an enemy to the family, and had been guilty of hypocrisy in the honours he had paid to his deliverer from captivity. But however this may be, L. Scipio and others were condemned by him; from which we may conclude, either that he was in reality in league with the party opposed to the Scipios, or that their guilt was so clear that he dared not acquit even his friends.

In n. c. 184, Culleo was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship, and in 181 was one of the three ambassadors sent to Masinissa and Carthage to ask for assistance in the war against Persians. (Liv. xxx. 43, 45, xxxii. 47, xxxvii. 42, 55, xxxix. 32, xlix. 35; Val. Max. v. 2 § 5; Plut. Apophth. p. 196.)

2. Q. Terentius Culleo, was tribune of the plebs, n. c. 58, the year in which Cicero was banished. He was a friend of Cicero's, and did all in his power to prevent his banishment and afterwards to obtain his recall. He is mentioned by Cicero two years afterwards as one of the minor pontiffs. In the war which followed the death of Caesar we find Culleo in n. c. 43 passing over from the army of Antony to join Lentulus. Culleo was placed by Lepidus to guard the passage of the Alps; but he allowed Antony to cross them without giving resistance. (Cic. ad Att. iii. 15, de Harusp. Resp. 6, ad Fam. x. 34, comp. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 2, ad Att. viii. 12; Appian, B. C. iii. 83.)

L. CULLEOLUS, proconsul, perhaps of Ily-CURIATIUS.

Curium, about B.C. 60, to whom two of Cicero's letters are addressed (ad Fam. xiii. 41, 42), was probably one of the Terentii.

CUMA'NUS, VENTID'IUS. [Felix, AN'tonius.]

CUNCTATOR, a surname given to Q. Fabius Maximus, who fought against Hannibal.

CUPIDINO was, like Amer and Voluptas, a modification of the Greek Eros, whose worship was carried to Rome from Greece. (Cic. op. lact. 180, 14; Plut. Cest. 3; see Eros.) [L. & S.]

C. CUPPENNIUS.

CICERO, a person to whom Cicero wrote a letter in B.C. 44, entreating him to interest himself in the affairs of the inhabitants of Butrintum, and reminding him of the friendship which had existed between the father of Cuppennius and Cicero himself. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 16, b.)

2. The Cuppennius attacked by Horace (Sat. i. 2. 36) on account of his adulterous intercourse with Roman matrons, is said by the Scholiast on Horace to have been C. Cuppienius Libo of Cuma, a friend of Augustus.

There are some coins extant bearing the names of L. Cuppennius and C. Cuppennius; but who these persons were, is not known. (Eckhel, v. P. N. 176, 2.)

CUROTA, the personification of Care, respecting whose connexion with man an ingenius allegorical story is related by Hyginus. (Fab. 220.) [L. & S.]

CURETIES. [Zius.]

CURIA GEN'S, plebeian, is mentioned for the first time in the beginning of the third century B.C., when it was rendered illustrious by M. Curius Dentatus. [Dentatus.] This is the only cognomen which occurs in the gens: for the other members of it, see Curius. [L. & S.]

CURIATIA GEN'S. The existence of a patrician gens of this name is attested by Livy (i. 50, comp. Dionys. iii. 30), who expressly mentions the Curiai among the noble Alban gentes, which, after the destruction of Alba, were transplanted to Rome, and there received among the Patres. This opinion is not contradicted by the fact that in B.C. 409 the Curiai were tribunes of the people and consequently plebeians, for this phenomenon may be accounted for here, as in other cases, by the supposition that the plebeian Curiai were the descendants of freedmen of the patrician Curiaii, or that some members of the patrician gens had gone over to the plebeians. The Alban origin of the Curiaii is also stated in the story about the three Curiaii who in the reign of Tullus Hostilius fought with the three Roman brothers, the Horatii, and were conquered by the cunning and bravery of one of the Horatii, though some writers describe the Curiaii as Romans and the Horatii as Albans. (Livy. i. 24, &c.; Dionys. iii. 11, &c.; Plut. Parr. Gr. et Rom. 16; Flor. i. 3; Ausol. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 4; Zonar. viii. 6; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 343; comp. Horatius.) No members of the patrician Curiaii gens, so far as our records go, rose to any eminence at Rome, and there are but few whose names have come down to us. The only cognomen of the gens in the times of the republic is Fustius. For the plebeians who are mentioned without a cognomen, see Curiaii. [L. & S.]

CURIATIUS. 1. P. CURIA'TIUS, tribune of the people in B.C. 401. The college of tribunes in that year laboured under great unpopularity, as two of them had been appointed by the co-optation of the college under the influence of the patricians. P. Curiaius and two of his colleagues, M. Metilus and M. Minuvis, endeavoured to counteract the unpopularity and turn the hatred of the people against the patricians by bringing a charge against Servius and Virginiius, two military tribunes of the year previous, whom they declared to be the authors of all the mischief and the cause of the people's sufferings. Both the accused were condemned to pay a heavy fine, and the tribunes of the people soon after brought forward an agrarian law, and prevented the tribute for the maintenance of the armies being levied from the plebeians. (Livy. v. 11, 12.)

2. C. CURIATIUS, tribune of the people in B.C. 138, is characterized by Cicero (de Leg. iii. 9) as a homo injusmus. He caused the consuls of the year, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica (whom he nicknamed Seraecipia) and D. Junius Brutus to be thrown into prison for the severity with which they proceeded in levying fresh troops, and for their disregard to the privilege of the tribunes to exempt certain persons from military service. (Livy. Epit. 53; Val. Max. iii. 7 § 2.)

There are extant several coins, on which we read C. Curia. Trig. or C. Curius F., and which may belong to this tribune or a son of his; but it is just as probable that they belonged to some patrician C. Curiaius, about whom history furnishes no information. (Eckhel, v. p. 199, &c.) One C. Servilius Curiaius, who lived in the early period of the empire, is mentioned in an inscription in Oveli (No. 4046) as duumvir in the municipality of Veii. [L. & S.]

CURIATIUS MATERNFUS. [Materinus.]

CURI'IO, the name of a family of the Scribonii gens.

1. C. SCRIBONIUS CURIO, appointed curator maximus in B.C. 174, in the place of C. Mamilius Vitulus, who had been carried off by the plague. (Livy. xii. 26.)

2. C. SCRIBONIUS CURIO, praetor in B.C. 121, the year of C. Gracchus's death, was one of the most distinguished orators of his time. Cicero mentions one of his orations for Sert. Fulvis, who was abused of incest, and states, that when a young man he thought this oration by far the best of all extant orations; but he adds, that afterwards the speeches of Curio fell almost into oblivion. He was a contemporary of C. Julius Caesar Strabo, Cotta, and Antonius, and against the last of these he once spoke in the court of the centumviri for the brothers Cossus. (Cic. Brut. 92, de Invent. 43, de Orat. ii. 23, 33; Schol. Bob. in Argum. Orat. in Cid. el Curion.; Pudc-Cic. ad Herem. ii. 29; Plin. H. N. vii. 41.)

3. C. SCRIBONIUS CURIO, a son of the former. In B.C. 100, when the seditionous tribune L. Appuleius Saturnus was murdered, Curio was with the consuls. In B.C. 90, the year in which the Marsec war broke out, Curio was tribune of the people. He afterwards served in the army of Sulla during his war in Greece against Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, and when the city of Athens was taken, Curio besieged the tyrant Arision in the acropolis. In B.C. 82 he was invested with the praetorship, and in 76 he was made consul together with Cn. Octavius. After the expiration of the consulship, he obtained Macedonia as his province, and carried on a war for three years in the north of his province against the Dardanians and Moesians with great success. He was the first Roman general who advanced in those regions as far as the river Jumne, and on his return to Rome in 71, he celebrated a triumph over the Dardanians. Curio appears to have henceforth remained at Rome, where he took an active part in all public affairs. He acted as an opponent of Julius Caesar, and was connected in intimate friendship with Cicero. When the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators was discussed in the senate, Curio also spoke, and afterwards expressed his satisfaction with Cicero's measures. In the trial of P. Clodius, for having violated the sacra of the Bona Dea, Curio spoke in favour of Clodius, probably out of enmity towards Caesar; and Cicero on that occasion attacked both Clodius and Curio most vehemently in a speech of which considerable fragments are still extant. This event, however, does not appear to have at all interrupted their personal friendship, for Cicero describes him as a man on all occasions; he says, that he was one of the good men of the time, and that he was always opposed to bad citizens. In n. c. 57 Curio was appointed pontifex maximus; he died four years later, n. c. 53. Like his father and his son, Curio acquired in his time some reputation as an orator, and we learn from Cicero, that he spoke on various occasions; but of all the requisites of an orator he had only one, viz., eloquence, and he ex- celed most others in the purity and brilliancy of his diction; but his mind was altogether uncer- tified; he was ignorant without being aware of this defect; he was slow in thinking and inventing, very awkward in his gestures, and without any power of memory. With such deficiencies he could not escape the ridicule of able rivals or of his audience; and on one occasion, probably during his tribuneship, while he was addressing the people, he was gradually deserted by all his hearers. His orations were published, and he also wrote a work against Caesar in the form of a dialogue, in which his son, C. Scribonius Curio, was one of the interlocutors, and which had the same defects as his orations. (The numerous passages in which he is spoken of by Cicero are given in Orelli's Osserv. Tull. ii. p. 558, &c.; comp. Plut. Sul. 14; Appian, Mithrid. 60; Eurip. vi. 2; Oros. iv. 23; Suet. Cæs. 9, 49, 52; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 10; Val. Max. ix. 14. § 5; Plin. H. N. vii. 12; Solin. l. 6; Quintil. vi. 3. § 70.)

4. C. Scribonius Curio, the son of the former, and, like his father, a freedman of Caesar, was an or- tor of great natural talents, which however he left unexcelled from carelessness and want of industry. Cicero knew him from his childhood, and did all he could to direct his great talents into a proper channel, to suppress his love of pleasure and of wealth, and to create in him a desire for true fame and virtue, but without any success, and Curio was and remained a person of most pro- figate character. He was married to Fulvia, who afterwards became the wife of Antony, and by whom Curio had a daughter who was as dissolute as her mother. Owing to his family connexions and several other outward circumstances, he belonged to the party of Pompey, although in his heart he was favorably disposed towards Caesar. After having been governor in Asia, where he had discharged the duties of his office in a praiseworthy manner, he sued for and obtained the tribuneship for the eventful year n. c. 50. Curio, who was us reckless in squandering money as he was insatiable in acquiring it, had by this time contracted enormous debts, and he saw no way of getting out of his difficulties except by an utter confusion of the affairs of the republic. It was believed that he would direct his power and influence as tribune against Caesar, and at first he did so; but Caesar, who was anxious to gain over some of the influential men of the city, paid all Curio's debts on condition of his abandoning the Pompeian party. This scheme was perfectly successful; but Curio was too clever and adroit a person at once to turn his back upon his former friends. At first he continued to act against Caesar; by and by he assumed an appearance of neutrality; and in order to bring about a rupture between himself and the Pompeian party, he brought forward some laws which he knew could not be carried, but which would afford him a specious pretext for deserting his friends. When it was demanded that Caesar should lay down his imperium before coming to Rome, Curio proposed that Pompey should do the same. This demand itself was as fair as the source from which it originated was impure. Pompey shewed indeed a disposition to do anything that was fair, but it was evident that in reality he did not intend to do any such thing. Curio therefore now openly attacked Pompey, and described him as a person wanting to set himself up as tyrant; but, in order not to lose every appearance of neutrality even now, he declared, that if Caesar and Pompey would not consent to lay down their imperium, both must be declared public enemies, and war must be forthwith made against them. This ex- cited Pompey's indignation so much, that he drew to a suburbian villa. Curio, however, continued to act his part in the senate; and it was decreed that Pompey and Caesar should each dismiss one of their legions, which were to be sent to Syria. Pompey cunningly evaded obeying the command by demanding back from Caesar a legion which he had lent him in n. c. 53; and Caesar sent the two legions required, which, however, instead of going to Syria, took up their winter-quarters at Capua.

Soon after, the consul Claudius Marcellus proposed to the senate the question, whether a successor of Caesar should be sent out, and whether Pompey was to be deprived of his imperium? The senate consented to the former, but refused to do the latter. Curio repeated his former proposal, that both the prospects should lay down their power, and when it was put to the vote, a large majority of the senators voted for Curio. Claudius Marcellus, who had always pretended to be a champion of the senate, now refused obedience to its decree; and as there was a report that Caesar was advancing with his army towards Rome, he proposed that the two legions stationed at Capua should be got ready at once to march against Cae- sar. Curio, however, denied the truth of the re- port, and prevented the envoi's command being obeyed. Claudius Marcellus and his colleague, Ser. Sulpicius Rufus now rushed out of the city to Pompey, and solemnly called upon him to underta- ke the command of all the troops in Italy, and save the republic. Cicero declared that he could not quit the city in the character of tribune; he therefore addressed the people, and called upon them to demand of the consuls not to permit Pompey to levy an army. But he was not listened to. Amid these disputes the year of Curio's tribuneship was coming to its close, and as he had good reason to fear for his own safety, he was induced by despair to quit the city and go to Caesar, who was at Ravenna and consulted him as to what was to be done. Curio urged the necessity of at once collecting his troops and marching them against Rome. Caesar, however, was still inclined to settle the question in a peaceful manner, and despatched Curio with a message to the senate. But when Domitius Ahenobarbus was actually appointed Caesar's successor, and when the new tribunes, Antony and Q. Cassius, who followed in Curio's footsteps, were commanded by the consuls to quit the senate, and when even their lives were threatened by the partisans of Pompey, the tribunes together with Curio fled in the night following, and went to Caesar at Ravenna. He and his army received them as men pernecrated, and treated as enemies for their zeal in upholding the freedom of the republic.

The breaking out of the civil war could now be avoided, as Curio collected the troops stationed in Umbria and Etruria, and led them to Caesar, who rewarded him with the province of Sicily and the title of proconsul, n. c. 49. Curio was successful in crushing the party of Pompey in Sicily, and compelled Cato to quit the island. Af-fter having effected this, he crossed over to Africa to attack king Juba and the Pompeian general, P. Attius Varus. Curio was at first successful, but desertion gradually became general in his army, which consisted of only two legions, and when he began to lay siege to Utica, he was attacked by Juba, and fell in the ensuing battle. His troops were dispersed, killed, and taken pri-sers, and only a few of them were able to return to Sicily. Africa was thus again in the hands of the Pompeian party.

C. Scribonius Curio had been one of the main instruments in kindling the civil war between Caesar and Pompey. He was a bold man and profligate to the last degree; he squandered his own property as unscrupulously as that of others, and no means were ample enough to satisfy his demands. His want of modesty knew no bounds, and he is a fair specimen of a depraved and profligate Roman of that time. But he was nevertheless a man of eminent talent, especially as an orator. This Cicero saw and appreciated, and he never lost the hope of being able to turn the talent of Curio into a proper direction. This circumstance and the esteem which Cicero had entertained for Curio's father, are the only things that can account for his tender attachment to Curio; and this is one of the many instances of Cicero's amiable character. The first seven letters of the second book of Cicero's "Epistolae ad Familiares" are addressed to him. (Orali, Ovom. Tulli, ii. p. 526, &c.; comp. Caes. B. C. ii. 23, &c.; Vell. Pat.
ii. 48, 55; Appian. B. C. ii. 23, &c.; Suet. Caes. 29, 36, de Clar. Rhet. 1; Tacit. de Clar. Orat. 37; Liv. Epist. 109, 110; Plin. Caes. 29, &c.; Pomp. 58; Dion Cass. x. 60, &c.; Quintil. vi. 3. § 76; Schol. Bob. in Argum. ad Cic. Orat. in Claud. et Cur.)

[1 L. S.]

CURITIS. A surname of Juno, which is usually derived from the Sabine word curis, a lansc or spear, which according to the ancient notions was the symbol of the imperium and mansionum, and would accordingly designate Juno as the ruling goddess. (Ov. Post. ii. 477, vi. 49; Macrob. Sat. i. 9.) Hartung (Die Hoilg. der Römer. ii. p. 72) finds in the surname Curitis an allusion to a marriage ceremony, in which some of the bride's hair was either really or symbolically cut off with the current point of a sword. (Plin. Quaest. Fam. 87; Ov. Post. ii. 560.)

CURIUS. M. Curius, probably a grandson of M. Curius Dentatus, was tribune of the people in n. c. 199. He and one of his colleagues, M. Fulvius, opposed T. Quinctius Flamininus, who offered himself as a candidate for the consulship, without having held any of the intermediate offices between that of quaestor and consul; but the tribunes yielded to the wishes of the senate. (Liv. xxxii. 7.)

2. M. Curius, is known only through a lawsuit which he had with M. Coponius about an inheritance, shortly before n. c. 91. A Roman citizen, who was anticipating his wife's confinement, made a will to this effect, that if the child should be a son and the child of maturity, M. Curius should succeed to his property. Soon after the testator died, and his wife did not give birth to a son. M. Coponius, who was the next of kin to the deceased, now came forward, and, ap-ppealing to the letter of the will, claimed the proterty which had been left. Q. Mucius Scaevola undertook to plead the cause of Coponius, and L. Licinius Crassus spoke for Curius. Crassus succceeded in gaining the inheritance for his client. This trial (Curiana causa), which attracted great attention at the time, on account of the two ceminent men who conducted it, is often mentioned by Cicero. (De Orat. i. 39, 56, 57, ii. 6, 32, 54, Brut. 39, 52, 53, 73, 93, pro Cael. 10, Topici. 10.)

3. M. Curius (is in some editions called M.
Curius), a friend of Cicero and a relation (consabrother) of C. Cornelius Balbus. He was quaestor urbanius in n. c. 61, and tribune of the people in 58, when Cicero hoped that Curius would protect him against the machinations of P. Clodius. At a somewhat later time, he is called in a letter of Cicero's addressed to him (ad Fam. xii. 49) a governor of a Roman province with the title of proconsul, but it is not known of what province he had the administration. The letter above referred to is the only one extant among the ad Familiares which is addressed to him. In the declaration Post Redimitum in Senatus (i) Cicero states, that he had been quaestor to Curius's father, whereas it is a well-known fact, that Cicero had been quaestor to Sex. Pompeius. This contradiction is usually solved by the supposition, that Curius was the adoptive son of Pompeius. (Cid. ad Fam. ii. 19, ad Quint. Prot. i, 4, pro Flacco. 18.)

4. M. Curius, one of the most intimate friends of Cicero, who had known him from his childhood, and describes him as one of the kindest of men, always ready to serve his friends, and as a very pattern of politeness (urbanitatem). He lived for several years as a negotiator at Patrae in Peloponnessus. At the time when Tiro, Cicero's freedman, was ill at Patrae, n. c. 50 and subsequently, Curius took great care of him. In n. c. 46, Cicero recommended Curius to Serv. Sulpius, who was then governor of Achaea, and also to Aulus, his successor. The intimacy between Curius and Atticus was still greater than that between Cicero and Curius; and the latter is said to have made a will in which Atticus and Cicero were to be the heirs of his property, Cicero receiving one-fourth, and Atticus the rest. Among Cicero's letters to his friends there are three addressed to Curius (vii. 22, 23), and one (viii. 29) is addressed by Curius to Cicero. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 5, 6, viii. 7, 17, 50, xvi. 4, 5, 9, 11, ad Att. viii. 2, 3, xvi. 3.)

5. M. CURIUS, a man notorious as a gambler, who, however, was not notwithstanding this appointed judge by Antony in b.c. 44. (Cic. Phil. v. 5, viii. 9.)

6. C. CURIUS, a brother-in-law of C. Rabirius (the murderer of Saturninus), and father of the C. Rabirius Postumus, who was adopted by C. Rabirius. He was a man of equestrian rank, and is called princeps ordinis equestris. He was the largest farmer of the public revenue, and acquired great wealth by his undertakings, which he spent in such a manner, that he seemed to acquire it only with the view of obtaining the means for showing his kindness and benevolence. Notwithstanding his ample character, he was once accused of having embezzled sums of public money, and with having destroyed a document by fire; but he was most honourably acquitted. (Cic. pro Rabir. perd. 3, pro Rabir. Post. 2, 17.)

7. Q. CURIUS, a Roman senator, who had once held the office of questor, came forward in b.c. 64 as a candidate for the consulship; but he not merely lost his election, but, being a man of a bad character and a notorious gambler, he was even ejected from the senate. He was a friend of Catiline, and an accomplice in his conspiracy; but he betrayed the secret to his mistress Fulvia, through whom it became known to Cicero. Whether he perished during the suppression of the conspiracy, or survived it, is uncertain. In the latter case, he may have been the same as the Curius mentioned by Appian (R. C. v. 137), who was in Bithynia with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and attempted to betray him, for which he paid with his life. (Cic. de Petit. Cons. 3, in Tog. Cons. p. 426, and As. in Tog. Cons. p. 95, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Att. i. 1; Sallust, Catil. 17, 28, 26; Appian, B. C. ii. 3.) [L. S.]

CURIUS FORTUNATIANUS. [FORTUNATIANUS.]

CURIUS, VI. PUSIUS, a commander of the cavalry in Caesar's army, when he commenced the war against Pompey in Italy. Several of Pompey's generals at the time deserted to Vibius Curius. (Cas. B. C. i. 24; Cic. ad Att. ii. 20, ix. 6; Quintil. vi. 3, § 73.) [L. S.]

CURIOPLATAS. [CODINIUS.]

CURIO, the name of a family of the Papirian gens, which was probably given to the first who bore it from distinguishing himself in running.

1. L. PAPRIUS CURIO, censor in b.c. 393, and afterwards twice military tribune, in b.c. 387 and 395. (Liv. vi. 5, 11, ix. 34.)

2. SP. PAPRIUS CURIO, a son of the former, was military tribune in b.c. 380. (Liv. vi. 27.)

3. L. PAPRIUS CURIO, a son of No. 2, does not occur in history till the time when he was made magister equitum to the dictator L. Papius Crassus in b.c. 340. In b.c. 333 he was made consul with C. Forcellis Libo, and according to some writers obtained the same office a second time in b.c. 326; in the year in which the second Samnite war broke out. In the year following he was appointed dictator to conduct the war in place of the consul L. Camillus, who had been taken seriously ill. Curio and his magister equitum, Q. Fabius, afterwards surnamed Maximus, were the most distinguished generals of the time. Shortly after Papius had taken the field, a doubt as to the validity of the auspices he had taken before marching against the enemy, obliged him to return to Rome and take them again. Q. Fabius was left behind to supply his place, but with the express command to avoid every engagement with the enemy during the dictator's absence. But Fabius allowed himself to be drawn into a battle with the Sammites near a place called Imbrinium or Imbrivium, and he gained a signal victory over the enemy. Papius was fearfully exasperated at this want of military discipline, and hastened back to the army to punish the offender. He was prevented, however, from carrying his intention into effect by the soldiers, who sympathized with Fabius, and threatened the dictator with a mutiny. Fabius thereupon fled to Rome, where both the Senate and the people interceded for his behalf. Papius was thus obliged to pardon, though without forgiving him, and returned to the army. He was looked upon by the soldiers as a tyrant, and in consequence of this dispositions of his army, he was defeated in the first battle he fought against the enemy. But, after having condescended to regain the good-will of the soldiers by promising them the booty which they might make, he obtained a most complete victory over the Sammites, and then allowed his men to plunder the country far and wide. The Sammites now sued for a truce, which was granted by the dictator for one year, on condition that they should clothe his whole army and give them pay for a year. Papius thereupon returned to Rome, and celebrated a triumph.

In b.c. 320, Papius Curio was made consul the second (or the third) time, and again undertook the command against the Sammites in Apulia. It was however uncertain, even in the days of Livy, whether the consuls of that year conducted the war with two armies, or whether it was carried on by a dictator and L. Papius as his magister equitum. It is certain, however, that Papius blockaded Luceria, and that his camp was reduced to such extremities by the Sammites, who cut off all supplies, that he would have been lost, had he not been relieved by the army of his colleague, Q. Publius Philo. He continued his operations in Apulia in the year b.c. 319 also, for which he was likewise appointed consul. About this time the Tarantine fleet arrived at Puteoli between the Romans and Sammites, but were hastily rejected by Papius, who now made a successful attack upon the camp of the Sammites: they were compelled to retreat and to leave Luceria to its fate. Seven thousand Sammites at Luceria are said to have capitulated for a free departure, without their arms and baggage; and the Frentinians, who attempted to revolt against the Romans, were obliged to submit as subjects and give hostages. After these things were accomplished, he returned to Rome and celebrated his second triumph.

In b.c. 314 Papius Curio obtained the consulship for the fourth (or fifth) time. Although the war against the Sammites was still going on, neither Papius nor his colleague Publius Philo is mentioned by Livy as having taken part in the campaigns of that year, which were conducted by dictators, while the consuls are said to have remained at home. It is difficult to account for this state of things.

In b. c. 315 Papirius was invested with his fifth (or sixth) consulship. The war against the Sam-nites was still going on, but no battle was fought,
although the Romans made permanent conquests, and thus gave the war a decided turn in their favour. It was, in Lycey states, again doubtful as to who had the command of the Roman armies in that year. In b. c. 309 Papirius was made dictator to conduct the war against the Samnites, to save the army of C. Marcus, who was in great distress in Apulia, and to wipe off the disgrace of Caudium, which Rome had suffered the year before. His appointment to the dictatorship was a matter of some difficulty. Q. Fabius, who had once been his magister equitum, and had nearly been sacrificed by him, was ordered to nominate Papirius. The recollection of what had happened sixteen years before rendered it hard to the feelings of Fabius to obey the command of the senate;
but he sacrificed his own personal feelings to the good of the republic, and he nominated Papirius in the silence of night without saying a word. Papirus now hastened with the reserve legions to the assistance of C. Marcus. The position of the enemy, however, was so formidable, that for a time he merely watched them, though it would have been more in accordance with his vehement temper to attack them at once. Soon after, however, a battle was fought, in which the Samnites were completely defeated. The dictator's triumph on his return to Rome was very brilliant, on account of the splendid arms which he had taken from the enemy: the shields decorated with gold were distributed among the stalls of the bankers around the forum, probably for no other purpose than to be hung out during processions. This triumph is the last event that is mentioned in the life of Pa-pirius, whence we must infer that he died soon after. He had the reputation of being the greatest general of his age. He did not indeed extend the Roman dominion by conquest, but it was he who ruined Rome after the defeat and peace of Caudium, and led her to victory. But he was, notwithstanding, not popular, in consequence of his personal character, which was that of a rough soldier. He was a man of immense bodily strength, and was accustomed to partake of an excessive quantity of food and wine. He had something horrible and savage about him, for he delighted in rendering the service of the soldiers as hard as he could: he punished cruelly and inordinately, and enjoyed the anguish of death in those whom he intended to punish. (Liv. vi. 12, 25, 29, 30, 36,

4. L. PAPIRius CURSOR, a son of No. 3, was censor in B. C. 272. (Frontin. de Aquaed. i. 6.)

5. L. PAPIRius CURSOR, likewise a son of No.
3, was no less distinguished as a general than his father. He was made consul in B. C. 293 with Sp. Carvilius Maximus, at the time of the third Samnite war. The Samnites, after having made immense efforts, had invaded Campania; but the consuls, instead of attacking them there, penetrated into their unprotected country, and thus compelled them to retreat. Papirius took the town of Durolia, and he as well as his colleague ravaged San-nium, especially the territory of Antium. He then pitched his camp opposite the Samnite army near Aquilonia, at some distance from the camp of Carvilius. Several days passed before Papirius attacked the enemy, and it was agreed that Papirus should make an attack upon Cominium on the same day that Papirius offered battle to the Sam-nites, in order to prevent the Samnites from obtaining any succour from Cominiuni. Papirius gained a brilliant victory, which he owed mainly to his cavalry, and the Samnites fled to their camp without being able to maintain it. They however still continued to fight against the two consuls, and even beat Carvilius near Herculanenum; but it was of no avail, for the Romans soon after again got the upper hand. Papirius continued his operations in Samnium till the beginning of winter, and then returned to Rome, where he and his colleague celebrated a magnificent triumph. The booty which Papirius exhibited on that occasion amounted to a great part of the troops with whom he was supplied with the plunder they had been allowed, murmured because he did not, like Carvilius, distribute money among them, but delivered up everything to the treasury. He dedicated the temple of Qui-rinus, which his father had vowed, and adorned it with a solarium horologium, or a sun-dial, the first that was set up in public at Rome. He was raised to the consulship again in B. C. 272, together with his former colleague, Carvilius, for the explorations of their former consulship had made such an impression upon the Romans, that they were looked up to as the only men capable of bringing the wearisome struggle with the Samnites to a close.
They entirely realized the hopes of their nation, for the Samnites, Lucanians, and Brittones were compelled to submit to the majesty of Rome. But we have no account of the manner in which those nations were thus reduced. On his return to Rome, Papirius celebrated his second triumph, and after this event we hear no more of him. (Liv. x.
9, 38, 39—47; Zonar. viii. 7; Oros. iii. 2, iv. 3;

CURTIA GENS, an obscure patrician gens, of whom only one member, C. Curtius Philo, was ever invested with the consulship, in B. C. 445. This Curtius was the author of one of the proofs that the Carthaginians must have been patrician, since the consulship at that time was not accessible to the plebeians;
other proofs are implied in the stories about the earliest Curtii who occur in Roman history. The fact that, in B. C. 57, C. Curtius Peduncæanus was tribune of the people, does not prove the contrary, for members of the gens may have gone over to the plebeians. The cognomina which occur in this gens under the republic are Pediuncæanus, Philo, and Postumus or Postumius. For those who are mentioned in history without a cognomen, see CURTIUS.

CURTIUS, a Roman who belonged to the party of Cæsar, and who, after the victory of his party in B. C. 43, is described as in the possession of an estate at Fundi, which had belonged to C. Sextius Rufus. (Cic. ad Att. xiv. 6, 10.) [L. S.] CURTIUS MARCIUS. [MARCUS CURTIUS.] A Sabine of the time of Romulus. During the war between the Romans and Sabines, which arose from the rape of the Sabine women, the Sabines had gained possession of the Roman ark. When the Roman army was drawn up between the Palatine and Capitoline hills, two chiefs of the armies, Mettus Curtius on the part of the Sabines, and Hostus Hostilus on that of the Romans, opened the contest, in which the latter was slain. While Curtius was glorying in his victory, Romulus and a band of Romans made an attack upon him. Curtius, who fought on horseback, could not maintain his ground; he was chased by the Romans, and in despair he leaped with his horse into a swamp, which then covered the valley afterwards occupied by the forum. However, he got out of it with difficulty at the bidding of his Sabines. Peace was soon after concluded between the Romans and their neighbours, and the swamp was henceforth called locus Curtius, to commemorate the event. (Liv. i. 12, &c.; Dionys. ii. 42; Varr. L. L. v. 148; Plut. Romul. 13.) This is the common story about the name of the locus Curtius; but there are two other traditions, which though they likewise trace it to a person of the name of Curtius, yet refer us to a much later time. According to the first of these, it happened one day that the earth in the forum gave way, sank, and formed a great chasm. All attempts to fill it up were useless, and when at length the aruspices were consulted about it, they declared, that the chasm could not be filled except by throwing into it that on which Rome’s greatness was to be based, and that then the state should prosper. When all were hesitating and doubting as to what was meant, a noble youth of the name of M. Curtius came forward, and declaring that Rome possessed no greater treasure than a brave and gallant citizen in arms, he offered himself as the victim demanded, and having mounted his steed in full armour, he leaped into the abyss, and the earth soon closed over him. This event is assigned to the year n. c. 362. (Liv. vii. 6; Varro, L. c.; Val. Max. v. 6, § 2; Plin. H. N. xv. 18; Festus, s. v. Curtileacum; Plut. Parallel. Min. 5; Stat. Silv. i. 1, 65, &c.; Augustin, de Civ. Del. v. 18.) According to the second tradition, the place called locus Curtius had been struck by lightning, and, at the command of the senate, it was enclosed in the usual manner by the consul C. Curtius Philo, n. c. 441. (Varr. L. L. v. 148.) The spot was afterwards regarded as a bidental, that is, a sacred spot struck by lightning, seeming to be clear from what Pliny (H. N. xv. 18) relates of it. All that we can infer with safety from the ancient traditions respecting the locus Curtius, is, that a part of the district which subsequently formed the Roman forum, was originally covered by a swamp or a lake, which may have obtained the name of Curtius from some such occurrence as tradition has handed down. This lake was afterwards drained and filled up, but on one occasion after this the ground seems to have sunk, a circumstance which was regarded as an omen futurae. In order to avert any evil, and at the same time symbolically to secure the duration of the republic, an altar was erected on the spot, and a regular sacrifice was offered there, which may have given rise to the story about the self-sacrifice of Curtius. (Suet. Aug. 57; Stat. Silv. i. 148.)

3. C. CURTIUS, probably a son of the preceding, lost his property during the proscription of Sulla, and went into exile. Subsequently, however, he was allowed to return through the mediation of Cicero, with whom he had been acquainted from early youth. In n. c. 45 Caesar made him a member of the senate. In the same year, Caesar distributed 'ands among his veterans in Italy; and Curtius, who had spent the little property he had saved in purchasing an estate near Volaterrae, was now in danger of losing it again, applied to Cicero to interfere on his behalf. Cicero accordingly wrote a letter to Q. Valerius Ora, the legate of Caesar, who superintended the distribution of land among the veterans, and requested him to spare the property of Curtius, since the loss of it would render it impossible for him to maintain the dignity of a senator. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 3.)

4. P. CURTIUS, a brother of Q. Salusius, was beheaded in Spain by the command of Cn. Pompeius (the son of the Great), in the presence of the whole army, n. c. 45, for he had formed a secret understanding with some Spaniards that Cn. Pompeius, if he should come to a certain town for the sake of getting provisions, should be apprehended and delivered up into the hands of Caesar. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 18.)

5. Q. CURTIUS, a friend of Verres, is called iudex quaestorium, concerning which nothing further is known. (Cic. in Verr. i. 61.)

6. Q. CURTIUS, a good and well-educated young man, brought in n. c. 54 the charge of ambitus against C. Memmius, who was then a candidate for the consulship. (Cic. ad Qn. Fr. iii. 2.) We possess several coins on which the name of Q. Curtius appears, together with that of M. Silius and Cn. Domitius. The types of these coins differ from those which we usually meet with on Roman coins; and Echhel (Doct. Num. v. p. 200) conjectures, that those three men were perhaps triumvirs for the establishment of some colony, and that their coins were struck at a distance from Rome.

7. CURTIUS, a Roman equus, who once, while dining with Augustus, availed himself of a joke and threw a fish, which was standing on the table, out of the window. (Macrobi. Sat. ii. 4.) Some writers suppose, though without any apparent reason, that he is the same as the Curtius Atticus who lived in the reign of Tiberius. (Atticus. CURTIUS.)

CURTIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

CURTIUS RUFUS, the Roman historian of Alexander the Great. Respecting his life and the time at which he lived, nothing is known with any certainty, and there is not a single passage in any ancient writer that can be positively said to refer to Q. Curtius, the historian. One Curtius Rufus is mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xi. 21) and Pliny (Ep. vii. 27), and a Q. Curtius Rufus occurs in the list of the rhetoricians of whom Suevocianus treated in his work "De Claris Rhetoribus." But there is nothing to shew that any of them is the same as our Q. Curtius, though it may be, as F. A. Wolf was inclined to think, that the rhetorician spoken of by Suetonius is the same as the historian. This total want of external testimony compels us to seek information concerning Q. Curtius in the work that has come down to us under his name; but what we find here is as vague and unsatisfactory as that which is gathered from internal testimonies. There are only two passages in which this work contains allusions to the time at which he lived. In the one (iv. 4, in fin.), in speaking of the city of Tyre, he says, nunquam longa pace vacuita revoventa, sed tale Romanae manumdatiniis accepisset; the other, which is the more important one (x. 9), contains an allusion on the emperor for having restored peace after much bloodshed and many disputes about the possession of the empire. But the terms in which this passage is framed are so vague and indefinite, that it may be applied with almost equal propriety to a great number of epochs in the history of the Roman empire, and critics have with equal ingenuity referred the allusion to a variety of emperors, from Augustus down to Constantine or even to Theodosius the Great, while one of the earlier critics even asserted that Q. Curtius Rufus was a fictitious name, and that the work was the production of a modern writer. This last opinion, however, is refuted by the fact, that there are some very early MSS. of Q. Curtius, and that Jommes Sarisberiensis, who died in A. D. 1182, was acquainted with the work. All modern critics are now pretty well agreed, that Curtius lived in the first centuries of the Christian era. Niebuhr regards him and Petronius as contemporaries of Septimius Severus, while most other critics place him as early as the time of Vespasian. The latter opinion, which also accords with the supposition that the rhetorician Q. Curtius Rufus mentioned by Suetonius was the same as our historian, presents no other difficulty, except that Quintilian, in mentioning the historians who had died before his time, does not allude to Curtius in any way. This difficulty, however, may be removed by the supposition, that Curtius was still alive when Quintilian wrote. Another kind of internal evidence which might possibly suggest the time in which Curtius wrote, is the style and diction of his work; but in this case neither of them is the writer's own; both are artificially acquired, and exhibit only a few traces which are peculiar to the latter part of the first century after Christ. Thus much, however, seems clear, that Curtius was a rhetorician; his style is not free from strained and high-flown expressions, but on the whole it is a masterly imitation of Livy's style, internalized here and there with poetical diction and art of Cato's.

The work itself is a history of Alexander the Great, and written with great partiality for the hero. The author drew his materials from good sources, such as Cleitarchus, Timagenes, and Ptolemaeus, but was deficient himself in knowledge of geography, tactics, and astronomy, and in historical criticism, for which reasons his work cannot always be relied upon as an historical authority. It consisted originally of ten books, but the first two are lost, and the remaining eight also are not without more or less considerable gaps. In the early editions the fifth and sixth books are sometimes united in one, so that the whole would consist of only nine books; and Glauemus in his edition (1556) divided the work into twelve books. The deficiency of the first two books has been made up in the form of supplements by Bruno, Cellarius, and Freinsheim; but that of the last of these scholars, although the best, is still without any particular merit. The criticism of the text of Curtius is complicated with great difficulties, for although the extant MSS. are derived from one, yet some of them, especially those of the 14th and 15th centuries, contain considerable interpolations. Hence the text appears very different in the different editions. The first edition is that of Vindelinus de Spina, Venice, without date, though probably published in 1471. It was followed in 1480 by the first Milan edition of A. Zaratos. The most important among the subsequent editions are the Juntinae, those of Erasmus, Chr. Bruno, A. Junius, F. Modius, Acidaldis, Raderer, Popma, Loccenius, and especially those of Freinsheim, Strassburg, 1640, and Cellarius, 1668. The best edition that was published during the interval between that and our own time is that of H. Seubert, in the Leiden, 1724, etc. Among the modern editions the following are the best: 1. that of Schmieder (Göttingen, 1805), Koken (Leipsig, 1818), Zumpt (Berlin, 1826), Baun stark (Stuttgard, 1829), and J. Mützelf. (Berlin, 1843). Critical investigations concerning the age of Q. Curtius are prefixed to most of the editions here mentioned, but the following may be consulted in addition to them: Niebuhr "Zwei klassische Lat. Schriftsteller des dritten Jahrhunderts," in his Kleine Schriften, i. p. 305, &c.; Butt mann, Uber das Leben des Geschichtschreibers Q. Curtius Rufus. In Beziehung auf A. Hirt's Abhandl. über den abs. Gegenstand, Berlin, 1829; G. Pimper, Uber das Zeitalter des Q. Curtius Rufus in Seelodl's Archiv für Philol. 1824, i. p. 91, &c.

P. CUSPIUS, a Roman knight, had been twice in Africa as the chief director (magister) of the company that farmed the public taxes in that province, and had several friends there, whom Cicero at his request recommended to Q. Valerius Orca, the proconsul of Africa, in B. C. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 6, comp. xvi. 17.)

CUSPIUS FADUS. [FADUS.]

CYAMITES (Καυμίτης), the hero of beans, a mysterious being, who had a small sanctuary on the road from Athens to Eleusis. No particulars are known about him, but Pausanias (i. 37. § 3) says, that those who were initiated in the mysteries or had read the so-called Orphic would understand the nature of the hero.

CYANE (Κυάνη), a Sidonian nymph and playmate of Proserpine, who was changed through the grief at the loss of Proserpine into a well. The Symmecans celebrated an annual festival on that spot, which Hercules was said to have instituted, and at which a bull was sunk into the well as a sacrifice. (Diod. v. 4; Ov. Met. v. 412, &c.) A daughter of Liparius was likewise called Cyane. (Diod. v. 7.)

CYANIPPUS (Κυανιππός), a son of Aegealos and prince of Argos, who belonged to the house of the Bittidae. (Paus. ii. 18. § 4, 30. § 9.) Apollodoros (i. 9. § 13) calls him a brother of Aegealos and a son of Adrastus.

CYATHUS (Κατάσσος), the youthful cup-bearer of Oenone, was killed by Heracles on account of a fault committed in the discharge of his duty. He was honoured at Phlius with a sanctuary close by the temple of Apollo. (Paus. ii. 13. § B.) In other traditions Cyaxares is called Euryonymus. (Diod. iv. 36.)

CYAXARES (Σαχαρός), was, according to Herodotus, the third king of Media, the son of Phraortes, and the grandson of Deioces. He was the most warlike of the Median kings, and introduced great military reforms, by arranging his subjects into proper divisions of spearmen and archers and cavalry. He succeeded his father, Phraortes, who was defeated and killed while besieging the Assyrian capital, Ninus (Ninveh), in B.C. 634. He collected all the forces of his empire to avenge his father's death, defeated the Assyrians in battle, and laid siege to Ninus. But while he was before the city, a huge body of Scythians invaded the northern parts of Media, and Cyaxares marched to meet them, was defeated, and became subject to the Scythians, who held the dominion of all Asia (or, as Herodotus elsewhere says, more correctly, of Upper Asia) for twenty-eight years (B.C. 634—607), during which time they plundered the Medes without mercy. At length Cyaxares and the Medes massacred the greater number of the Scythians, having first made them intoxicated, and the Median dominion was restored. There was a considerable difficulty in reconciling this account with that which Herodotus elsewhere gives (i. 73, 74), of the war between Cyaxares and Alyattes, king of Lydia. This war was provoked by Alyattes having sheltered some Scythians, who had fled to him after having killed one of the sons of Cyaxares, and served him up to his father as a Thyestean banquet. The war lasted five years, and was put an end to in the sixth year, in consequence of the terror inspired by a solar eclipse, which happened just when the Lydian and Median armies had joined battle, and which Thales had predicted. This eclipse is placed by some writers as high as B.C. 625, by others as low as 585. But of all the eclipses between these two dates, several are absolutely excluded by circumstances of time, place, and extent, and on the whole it seems most probable that the eclipse intended was that of September 30, B.C. 610. (Baily, in the Philosophical Transactions for 1811; Olmann in the Schriften der Berl. Acad. 1812—13; Hales, Analyses et Chroniqes, i. p. 74—75; Ideler, Handbuch der Chronologie, i. p. 209, &c.; Fischer, Griechische Zeitrechn., s. a. 610.) This date, however, involves the difficulty of making Cyaxares, as king of the Medes, carry on a war of five years with Lydia, while the Scythians were masters of his country. But it is pretty evident from the account of Herodotus that Cyaxares still reigned, though as a tributary to the Scythians, and that the dominion of the Scythians over Media rather consisted in constant predatory incursions from positions which they had taken in the northern part of the country, than in any permanent occupation thereof. It was probably, then, from B.C. 615 to B.C. 610 that the war between the Lydians and the Medes lasted, till both parties being terrified by the eclipse, the two kings accepted the mediation of Cyaxares, king of Cilicia, and Leotychides of Bithynia (probably Nebuchadnezzar or his father), and the peace made between them was cemented by the marriage of Astyages, the son of Cyaxares, to Aryennis, the daughter of Alyattes. The Scythians were expelled from Media in B.C. 607, and Cyaxares again turned his arms against Assyria, and, in the following year, with the aid of the king of Babylon (probably the father of Nebuchadnezzar), he took and destroyed Ninus. [SARDANAPALUS.] The consequence of this war, according to Herodotus, was, that the Medes made the Assyrians their subjects, except the district of Babylon. He means, as we learn from other writers, that the king of Babylon, who had before been in a state of doubtful subjection to Assyria, obtained complete independence as the reward for his share in the destruction of Nineveh. The league between Cyaxares and the king of Babylon is said by Polybius and Appianus (pp. Buseh. Chron. Arm., and Synercl. p. 210, &c.) to have been sanctioned by the betrothal of Amythia or Amytia, the daughter of Cyaxares, to Nabuchodrossar or Nabuchodonosor (Nebuchadnezzar), son of the king of Babylon. They have, however, by mistake put the name of Asdahages (Astyages) for that of Cyaxares. (Clinton, i. pp. 271, 278.) Cyaxares died after a reign of forty years (B.C. 594), and was succeeded by his son Astyages. (Herod. i. 73, 74, 103—106, iv. 11, 12. vi. 20.) The Cyaxares of Diodorus (ii. 32) is Deioces. Respecting the supposed Cyaxares II. of Xenophon, see CYRUS. [P. S.]

CYBELE. [Rhea.]

CYCHEREUS or CENCHREUS (Συκήρεας), a son of Poseidon and Salamis, became king of the island of Salamis, which was called after him Cycereian, and which he delivered from a dragon. He was subsequently honored as a hero, and had a sanctuary in Salamis. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 7; Diod. iv. 72.) According to other traditions, Cycereus himself was called a dragon on account of his savage nature, and was expelled from Salamis by Eurylechos; but he was received by Demeter at Eleusis, and appointed a priest to her temple. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Κυκήρεας.) Others again said that Cycereus had brought up a dragon, which was expelled by Eurylechos. (Strab. ix. p. 329.) There was a tradition that, while the battle of Salamis was going on, a dragon appeared in one of the Athenian ships, and that an oracle declared this dragon to be Cycereus. (Paus. i. 36. § 1; comp. Texts. of Lyceph. 110, 175; Plut. Thes. 10, Solon. 21.)

CYCLADAS (Κυκλάδαις) was strategus of the Achaeans in B.C. 208, and, having joined Philip V. of Macedonia at Dyne with the Achaean forces, aided him in that invasion of Elis which was checked by P. Scipio Galba. In B.C. 200, Cycladas being made strategus instead of Philopoemen, whose military talents he by no means equalled, Nabis took advantage of the change to make war on the Achaeans. Philip offered to help them, and to carry the war into the enemy's country, if they would give him a sufficient number of their soldiers to garrison Chaleis, Orons, and Corinth in the mean time; but they saw through his plan, which was to obtain hostages from them and so to force them into a war with the Romans. Cycladas therefore answered, that their laws precluded them from discussing any proposal except this for which the assembly was summoned, and this conduct released him from the imposition, under which he had previously laboured, of being a mere creature of the king's. In B.C. 198 we find him an exile at the court of Philip, whom he attended in that year at his conference with Flminimus at Naeaca in Locris. After the battle of Cynoscephalae, B.C. 197, Cyzicédus was sent with two others as ambassador from Philip to Flamininus, who granted the king a truce of 15 days with a view to the arrangement of a permanent peace. (Polyb. xvii. i., xviii. 17; Liv. xxvi. 31, xxxi. 25, xxxii. 19, 32, xxxiii. 11, 12.) [E. E.]

CYCLOPES (Κώδωνες), that is, creatures with round or circular eyes. The tradition about these beings has undergone several changes and modifications in its development in Greek mythology, though some traces of their identity remain visible throughout. According to the ancient cosmogonies, the Cyclopes were the sons of Uranus and Ge; they belonged to the Titans, and were three in number, whose names were Argus, Steropes, and Brontes, and each of them had only one eye on his forehead. Together with the other Titans, they were cast by their father into Tartarus, but, instigated by their mother, they assisted Cronus in usurping the government. But Cronus again threw them into Tartarus, and as Zeus released them in his war against Cronus and the Titans, the Cyclopes provided Zeus with thunderbolts and lightning, Pluto with a helmet, and Poseidon with a trident. (Apollod. i. 1; Hes. Theog. 505.) Henceforth they remained the ministers of Zeus, but were afterwards killed by Apollo for having furnished Zeus with the thunderbolts to kill Aeschylus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 4.) According to others, however, it was not the Cyclopes themselves that were killed, but their sons. (Schol. ad Eurip. Acest. 1.)

In the Homeric poems the Cyclopes are a gigantic, insolent, and lawless race of shepherds, who lived in the south-western part of Sicily, and devoured human beings. They neglected agriculture, and the fruits of the field were reaped by them without labour. They had no laws or political institutions, and each lived with his wives and children in a cave of a mountain, and ruled over them with arbitrary power. (Hom. Od. vi. 5, ix. 106, &c., 190, &c., 240, &c., x. 200.) Homer does not distinctly state that all of the Cyclopes were one-eyed, but Polyphemus, the principal among them, is described as having only one eye on his forehead. According to some, the Cyclopes are called Polyphemus. (Od. vi. 170; Virg. Æne. vi. 433; Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 53.)

A still later tradition regarded the Cyclopes as the assistants of Hephaestus. Volcanoes were the workshops of that god, and Mount Aetna in Sicily and the neighbouring isles were accordingly considered as their abodes. As the assistants of Hephaestus they are no longer shepherds, but make the metal armour and ornaments for gods and heroes; they work with such might that Sicily and all the neighbouring islands resound with their hammering. Their number is, like that in the Homeric poems, no longer confined to three, but their residence is removed from the south-western to the eastern part of Sicily (Virg. Georg. iv. 170, Æne. viii. 433; Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 56, &c.; Eurip. Cyc. 599; Val. Flacc. ii. 429.) Two of their names are the same as in the classical tradition, but new names also were invented, for we find one Cyclops bearing the name of Pyramon, and another that of Aenomas. (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 68; Virg. Æne. viii. 425; Val. Flacc. i. 593.) The Cyclopes, who were regarded as skilful architects in later accounts, were a race of men who appear to be different from the Cyclopes whom we have considered hitherto, for they are described as a Thracian tribe, which derived its name from a king Cyclops. They were expelled from their homes in Thrace, and went to the Cretae (Cretae) and to Lydia. Thence they followed Proetus to protect him, by the gigantic walls which they constructed, against Acrisius. The great fortifications of Argos, Tiryns, and Mycenae, were in later times regarded as their works. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2; Strab. viii. p. 378; Paus. ii. 16. § 4; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 356.) Such walls, commonly known by the name of Cyclopean walls, still exist in various parts of ancient Greece and Italy, and consist of unhewn polygons, which are sometimes 20 or 50 feet in breadth. The story of the Cyclopes having built them seems to be a mere invention, and admits neither of a historical nor geographical explanation. Homer, for instance, knows nothing of Cyclopean walls, and he calls Tiryns merely a πόλις τειχεοσις. (II. 530.) The Cyclopean walls were probably constructed by an ancient race of men—perhaps the Pelasgians—who occupied the countries in which they occur before the nations of which we have historical records; and later generations, being moved by their grandeur as much as ourselves, ascribed their building to a fabulous race of Cyclopes. Analogies to such a process of tradition are not wanting in modern countries; thus several walls in Germany, which were probably constructed by the Romans, are to this day called by the people Riesensmauer or Teufelsmauer.

In works of art the Cyclopes are represented as starchy men with one eye on their forehead, and the place which in other human beings is occupied by the eyes, is marked in figures of the Cyclopes by a line. According to the explanation of Plato (ap. Strab. xiii. p. 692), the Cyclopes were beings typical of the original condition of uncivilized men; but this explanation is not satisfactory, and the cosmogonic Cyclopes at least must be regarded as personifications of certain powers manifested in nature, which is sufficiently indicated by their name. CYCNUUS (Κύκνος). 1. A son of Apollo by Thyria or Hyria, the daughter of Amphimnon. He was a handsome hunter, living in the district between Pleuron and Calydon, and although beloved by many, repulsed all his lovers, and only one, Cycnus, persevered in his love. Cycnus at last imposed upon him three labours, viz. to kill a lion without weapons, to catch alive some monstrous vultures which devoured men, and with his own hand to lead a bull to the altar of Zeus. Phyllus accomplished these tasks, but as, in accordance with a request of Hemides, he refused giving to Phyllus a bull which he had received as a prize, Cycnus was exasperated at the refusal, and leaped into the lake in a rage, which was henceforth called after him the Cycnian lake. His mother Thyria followed him, and both were metamorphosed by Apollo into swans. (Anton. Lib. 12. Ovid (Met. vi. 317, &c.), who relates the same story, makes the Cycnian lake arise from Hyria melting away in tears at the death of her son.

2. A son of Poseidon by Calyce (Calyce), Harpalus, or Scamandracides. (Hygin. Fab. 157; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 147; Tzetts. ad Lycoph. 233.) He was born in secret, and was exposed on the sea-coast, where he was found by shepherds, who seeing a swan descending upon him, called him Cyenus. When he had grown up to manhood, he became king of Colonae in Trasae, and married Proelia, the daughter of Laomedon or of Clytius (Paus. x. 14. § 2), by whom he became the father of Tences and Hemithea. Dieterets Cretenses (ii. 137) mentions different children. Another tradition of Proelia, he married Philonome, a daughter of Crangus, who fell in love with Tences, her stepson, and not being listened to by him calumniated him, so that Cyenus in his anger threw his son together with Hemithea in a chest into the sea. According to others Cyenus himself leaped into the sea. (Verg. Aen. ii. 21.) Afterwards, when Cyenus learned the truth respecting his wife's conduct, he killed Philonome and went to his son, who had landed in the island of Tenedos, and had become king there. According to some traditions, Tences did not allow his father to land, but cut off the anchor. (Conon, Narrat. 28; Paus. x. 14. § 2.) In the war of the Greeks against Troy, both Cyenus and Tences assisted the Trojans, but both were slain by Achilleus. As Cyenus could not be wounded by iron, Achilleus strangled him with the thong of his helmet, or by striking him with a stone. (Comp. Diod. v. 83; Strab. xiii. p. 604; Schol. ad Theocrit. xvi. 49; Dict. Cret. ii. 12, &c.; Od. Met. xii. 144.) Ovid adds, that the body of Cyenus disappeared and was changed into a swan, when Achilleus came to take away his armour.

3. A son of Ares and Pelopin, challenged Hermelles to single combat at Ithone, and was killed in the contest. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 7; Hesiod. Sent. Heros. 315, where Cyenus is a son-in-law of Cycy, to whom Hesperes is going.)

4. A son of Ares and Pyrene, was likewise killed by Hermelles in single combat. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xi. 19.) At his death he was changed by his father Ares into a swan. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 254.) The last two persons are often confused with each other, on account of the resemblance existing between the stories about them. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 147, ad Aristoph. Ran. 963; Hygin. Fab. 31; Athen. i. p. 393.)

5. A son of Sthenelus, king of the Ligurians, and a friend and relation of Phaethon. He was the father of Cinysus and Cupauro. While he was lamenting the fate of Phaethon on the banks of the Eridanus, he was metamorphosed by Apollo into a swan, and placed among the stars. (Ov. Met. ii. 366, &c.; Paus. i. 30. § 3; Serv. ad Aen. x. 180.) A sixth personage of the name of Cyenus is mentioned by Hyginus. (Fab. 97.) [L. S]

CYDAS (K'tas), appears to have been a common name at Gortyna in Crete. It is written in various ways in MSS., but Cydas seems to be the most correct form. (See Drakenborough, ad Liv. xxxii. 5, xlv. 13.)

1. The commander of 500 of the Cretan Gortynii, joined Quintus Flaminius in Thessaly in b. c. 197. (Liv. xxxiii. 3.) This Cydas may be the same as the Cydas, the son of Antialcides, who was cosmus or supreme magistrate at Gortyna, when a Roman embassy visited the island about b. c. 184, and composed the differences which existed between the inhabitants of Gortyna and Cnosus. (Polyb. xxxiii. 15.)

2. A Cretan, the friend of Eumenus, who attempted to negotiate a peace between Eumenus and Antiochus in b. c. 168 (Liv. xlv. 13, 24), may perhaps be the same as No. 1.

3. A native of Gortyna in Crete, a man of the most abandoned character, was appointed by Antony in b. c. 44 as one of the judices at Rome. (Cic. Phil. v. 5, vili. 8.)

CYDIAS (K'tias). 1. An Athenian orator, a contemporary of Demosthenes, of whom Aristotle (Rhet. ii. 6. § 24) mentions an oration peri tés Saako anpolýmxhias, which Ruhken refers to the Athenian colony which was sent to Samos in b. c. 352 ( Dionys. Deinarch. p. 118), so that the oration of Cydias would have been delivered in that year. (Ruhken, Hist. Crit. Orat. Graec. p. lxxv.)

2. One of the early Greek poets whom Platarch (de Fil. in or. Lan. p. 381, e.) classes together with Minnermus and Archilochus. Whether he is the same as the author of a song which was very popular at Athens in the time of Aristophanes, who however is called by the Scholiast (ad Nub. 966) Cydides of Hermione, is uncertain. (Plat. Charm. p. 153, c.; Schaeftle, Delectus Poes. Iamb. et Met. Graec. p. 373, &c.; Berger, Poes. Lyric. Graec. p. 265.) [L. S]

CYDIAS, a celebrated painter from the island of Cythnos, n. c. 364, whose picture of the Argonauts was exhibited in a porticus at Agrippa at Rome. (Rusth. ad Dionys. Perig. 526; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 40. § 26; Dion Cass. liii. 27, Ulrichs, Besch. der Stad. Rom. iii. 3. p. 114.) [L. U.]

CYDIPPE. [AONTUΣ.]

CYDIPPUS (K'tipos) of Mantinea, is mentioned by Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 132) among those who had written on inventions (περὶ συνημματῶν); but nothing further is known about him. [L. S]

CYDON (Κ'δων), the founder of the town of Cydonia in Crete. According to a tradition of Tegae, he was a son of Tegaeus or of Hermes by Aesallias, the daughter of Minos, whereas others described him as a son of Apollo by Aesallias. (Paus. viii. 53. § 2; Steph. Byz. s. v. Kýdon.; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1491.) [L. S]

CYDONIA (Κ'δωνια), a surname of Athena, under which she had a temple at Phrixus in Elis, which was said to have been built by Clymenus of Cydonia. (Paus. vi. 21. § 5.) [L. S]

CYDONIUS DEMETRIUS. [DEMETERS.]

CYLL'ARUS (Κ'λλαρος), a beautiful centaur, who was married to Hylomone, and was killed at the wedding feast of Peirithous. (Ov. Met. xii. 393, &c.) The horse of Castor was likewise called Cyllarus. (Verg. Georg. iii. 90; Val. Max. i. 426; Suidas, s. v.) [L. S]

CYLENN (Κ'λενν), a son of Eulas, from whom mount Cyllene in Arcadia was believed to have received its name. (Paus. viii. 4. § 3.) [L. S]

CYLLENE (Κ'λλένη), a nymph, who became the mother of Lycocon by Pelasgus. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 1.) According to others, she was the wife of Lycaon. (Dionys. Hal. A. R. i. 13.) [L. S]

CYLLENIUS (Κ'λλένιος), a surname of Hermes, which he derived from mount Cyllene in Arcadia, where he had a temple (Paus. viii. 17. § 1), or from the circumstance of Main having given birth to him on that mountain. (Verg. Aen. viii. 139, &c.) [L. S]

CYLLENIUS (Κ'λλένιος), the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Bruck, Aml. ii. p. 282; Jacobs, ii. p. 257), of whom nothing more is known. His name is spelt differently in the MSS. of the Anthology, Καλλικράτης, Καλλικράτης, Καλλικράτης, Καλλικράτης, Πετρίδης. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 878.) [P. S.]

CYLON (Κυλών), an Athenian of noble family and commanding presence, won the prize for the double course (διώλους) at the Olympic games, in B.C. 640, and married the daughter of Mnesarchus, tyrant of Miletus. He was encouraged by these advantages, and especially by his powerful alliance, he conceived the design of making himself tyrant of Athens, and having consulted the Delphic oracle on the subject, was enjoined to seize the Acropolis at the principal festival of Zeus. Imagining that this must refer, not to the Athenian Δία (see Dict. of Ant. p. 333), but to the Olympic games, at which he had so distinguished himself, he made the attempt during the celebration of the latter, and gained possession of the citadel with his partizans, who were very numerous. Here, however, they were closely besieged, the operations against them being conducted by Thucydides, and the nine archons; according to Herodotus, to the Prytanes of the Naucares. (See Dict. of Ant. p. 693; Arnold's Thucydidis, vol. 1. Append. iii. p. 694.) At length, pressed by famine, they were driven to take refuge at the altar of Athena, whence they were induced to withdraw by the archon Megacles, the Alcmaeonid, on a promise that their lives should be spared. But their enemies put them to death as soon as they had them in their power, some of them being murdered even at the altar of the Eumenides. Plutarch relates besides that the suppliants, by way of keeping themselves under the protection of Athena, fastened a line to her statue and held it as they passed from her shrine. When they had reached the temple of the Eumenides the line broke, and Megacles and his colleagues seized on the accident as a proof that the goddess had rejected their supplication, and that they might therefore be massacred in full accordance with religion. Thucydidis and the Scholast on Aristophanes (Eq. 443) tell us, that Cylon himself escaped with his brother before the surrender of his adherents. According to Suidas, he was dragged from the altar of the Eumenides, where he had taken refuge, and was murdered. Herodotus also implies that he was slain with the rest. His party is said by Plutarch to have recovered their strength after his death, and to have continued the struggle with the Alcmaeonides up to the time of Solon. The date of Cylon's attempt is uncertain. Cursini gives, as a conjecture, B.C. 616; while Clinton also conjecturally, assigns it to 620. (Herod. v. 71; Thucyd. i. 128; Suid. s. v. Κυλών ἄρης; Plut. Sol. 12; Pas. i. 28, 40, vi. 25.) [E. E.]

CYNA. [CYNANA.]

CYNAEGERUS (Κυναγέρως), son of Eu- phantom and brother of the poet Aeschylus, distinguished himself by his valour at the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490. According to Herodotus, when the Persians had fled and were endeavouring to escape by sea, Cynaeagus seized one of their ships to keep it back, but fell with his right hand cut off. The story lost nothing by transmission. The next version related that Cynaeagus, on his ship, seeing a pine, grasped it, and, with his vessel with his left, and at length we arrive at the scene of the ludicrous in the account of Justin. Here the hero, having successfully lost both his hands, hangs on by his teeth, and even in his mutilated state fights desperately with the last mentioned weapons, "like a mad wild beast!" (Herod. v. 114; Suid. s. v. Κυναγέρως; Just. ii. 9; Val. Max. iii. 2. § 22; comp. Sueton. Aug. 68.) [E. E.]

CYNAETHUS. [CINASTEHS.]

CYNAE, CYNA, or CYNNA (Κυνά, Κύνα, Κύνα), was half-sister to Alexander the Great, and daughter of Philip by Audata, an Illyrian woman. Her father gave her in marriage to her cousin Amyntas, by whose death she was left a widow in B.C. 336. [AMYNTAS, No. 3.] In the following year Alexander promised her hand, as a reward for his services, to Langara, king of the Arians, but the intended bridegroom was carried off by sickness. Cynane continued unmarried, and employed herself in the education of her daughter, Ada or Eurydice, whom she is said to have trained, after the manner of her own education, to martial exercises. When Archelaus was chosen king, B.C. 323, Cynane determined to marry Eurydice to him, and crossed over to Asia accordingly. Her influence was probably great, and her project alarmed Perdiccas and Antipater, the former of whom sent her brother Aletes to meet her on her way and put her to death. Aletes did so in defiance of the feelings of his troops, and Cynane met her doom with an undaunted spirit. In B.C. 317, Cassander, after defeating Olympias, buried Cynane with Eurydice and Archelaus at Aegae, the royal burying-place. (Art. Amaz. l. 5, op. Phal. p. 70, ed. Bekker; Satyr. op. Alex. xii. p. 557, c; Diod. xix. 52; Polyc. viii. 68; Porson, ad Ael. V. xii. 36.) [E. E.]

CYNISCOS (Κυνίσκος), daughter of Archelaus II, king of Sparta, so named after her grandfather Zeuxidamus, who was also called Cyniscos. (Herod. vi. 71.) She was the first woman who kept horses for the games, and the first who gained an Olympian victory. (Paus. iii. 8. § 1.) Pausanias mentions an epigram by an unknown author in her honour, which is perhaps the same as the inscription he speaks of (vi. 1. § 2) in his account of her monument at Olympia. This was a group of sculpture representing Cynisca with a chariot, charioteer, and horses,—the work of Apellus. (APELLAS.) There were also figures of her horses in brass in the temple of Olympian Zeus (Paus. v. 12. § 9); and at Sparta she had near the gymnasium, called the Platanistas, an heroine. (iii. 15. § 1.) [A. H. C.]

CYNO. [CYNOS.]

CYNOBELLINUS, one of the kings of Britain in the reign of Claudius, the capital of whose kingdom was Camulodunum. (Colchester or Maldon.) He was the father of Caractacus, Togodunus, and Aeduanus. (Dion Cass. lxx. 20, 21; Suet. Cal. 44; Ros. vii. 5.)

CYNORTES or CYNORTAS (Κυνόρτας), a son of Amyclas by Diomed, and brother of Hyacinthus. After the death of his brother Argalus, he became king of Sparta and father of Oebalus or of Pericles. His tomb was shewn at Sparta not far from the Sears. (Paus. iii. 1. § 3, 13. § 1; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Orph. 447.) [L. S.]

CYNOSURA (Κυνόσυρα), an Idaeian goat and one of the nurses of Zeus, who placed her among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 2; Ant. Phoen. 35; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 246.) [L. S.]
CYPRIANUS.

CYNTHIA and CYNTHIUS (Κυνθία and Κυνθίος), surnames respectively of Artemis and Apollo, which they derived from mount Cynthia in the island of Delos, their birthplace. (Callim. hymn. in Del. 10; Hor. Carm. i. 21. 2, iii. 28. 12; Lucan. i. 218.) [L. S.]

CYNULCUS. [Carnelian.] CYNUS (Κῦνος), a son of Opus, and father of Iphodocus and Larymna, from whom Cynus in Locius derived his name. (Paus. ix. 23. § 4; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 277.) [L. S.]

CYNUUS (Κῦνος), a son of Peneus, who is said to have led colonists from Argos into Cynusia, a valley between Argolis and Laconia. (Paus. iii. 2. § 3.) [L. S.]

CYPRARISSUS (Κυπράρις), a youth famed, son of Telephus, was beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus or Silvanus. When he had inadvertently killed his favourite stag, he was seized with inordinate grief, and metamorphosed into a cypress. (Ov. Met. x. 120, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 64, 680, Eclog. x. 23, Gorgy. i. 20.) Another Cyprarius is mentioned by Eustathius. (Ad Hom. ii. ii. 519.) [L. S.]

CYPRIA, CYPRIS, CYPRIGENIA, or CYPRIGENES (Κυπρία, Κυρής, Κυπριγένεα, Κυπριγένη), surnames of Aphrodite, who was born in the island of Cyprus, which was also one of the principal seats of her worship. (Hom. H. r. v. 468; Pind. Os. i. 120, xi. 123, Pyth. iv. 363; Thirl. ill. 3. 34; Hor. Carm. i. 3. 1.) [L. S.]

CYPRICUS, THASCUS. This cultivated prince was a native of Africa, born, although the exact year cannot be ascertained, about the beginning of the third century. We are not acquainted with the particulars of his life as long as he remained a Gentile; but it is evident from his writings that he must have been educated with no common care. St. Jerome and Lactantius assure us, that he practised the art of oratory, and taught rhetoric with distinguished success, and by this or some other honourable occupation he realised considerable wealth. About the year A. D. 246, he was persuaded to embrace Christianity by the exhortations of Cæcilius, an aged presbyter of the church at Carthage, and, assuming the name of the spiritual patron by whom he had been set free from the yoke of Paganism, was henceforward styled Thascius Carcius Cyprianus. At the same period he sold all that he had, and distributed the price among the poor. The popularity acquired by this liberality, combined probably with the reputation he had previously enjoyed, and the price naturally felt in so distinguished a proselyte, secured his rapid elevation. In A. D. 247 he was raised to the rank of a presbyter, and in the course of the following year the bishopric of Carthage was forced upon his reluctant acceptance by a large majority of the African clergy, not without strenuous opposition, however, from a small party headed by Novatus [Novatus] and Felicissimus, whose obstinate resistance and contumacy subsequently gave birth to much disorder and violence. When the persecution of Decius burst forth (A. D. 250), Cyprian, being one of the first marked out as a victim, fled from the storm, in obedience, as he tells us (Epist. xiv.), to an intimation from heaven that thus he might best discharge his duty, and remained in retirement until after Easter of the following year. (A. D. 251.) During the whole of this period he kept up an active correspondence with his clergy concerning various matters of discipline, much of his attention being occupied, as the violence of the persecution began to abate, by the fierce controversies which arose with regard to the readmission of the Lapæi or apostates, who, according to the form and degree of their guilt, were designated Sacrificati, or Thaurificati, or Liberaliaci, and were seeking, now that the danger had passed away, the restoration of their ecclesiastical privileges. Cyprian, although not perfectly consistent throughout in his instructions, always manifested a disposition to follow a moderate course; and while on the one hand he utterly rejected the extreme doctrine of Novatianus, who maintained that the church had no power again to admit the renegades to its communion, so he was equally opposed to the laxity of those who were willing to receive them at once, before they had given evidence of their contrition by lengthened penitence, and finally decided that full forgiveness should not be extended to any of the offenders until God should have granted peace to his servants. Novatus and Felicissimus, taking advantage of these disputes, endeavoured to gain over to their faction many of the impatient and discontented Lapæi. Novatus actually appointed Felicissimus his deacon without the permission or knowledge of his diocesan, who, in his turn caused Felicissimus to be excommunicated; while the latter, far from submitting to the sentence, associated with himself five sedition presbyters, who breaking off in open schism, elected Fortunatus, one of their own number, bishop, and ventured to despacht an epistle to Cornelius, bishop of Rome, announcing their choice. This cabal, however, soon fell to pieces; Cornelius refused to listen to their representations, their supporters gradually dropped off, and their great bond of union was rudely snapped asunder by the defection of their great champion, Novatus, who, upon his visit to Rome at the commencement of A. D. 251, not only ceased to plead the cause of the Lapæi, but espoused to the full extent the views of Novatianus. Severe were these troubles happily averted, and Cyprian once more securely seated in his chair, when fresh disturbances arose in consequence of the notorious contest between Cornelius and Novatianus [Cornelius]; and now the latter, having been exiled from Rome, the former finding a warm supporter in the bishop of Carthage, by whose exertions his authority was acknowledged throughout nearly the whole of Africa. In the month of June, A. D. 252, began what is commonly termed the persecution of Gallus, but which in reality originated in an unauthorized popular movement excited by the refusal of the Christians to join in the prayers and sacrifices offered up on account of the deadly pestilence which was devastating the various provinces of the Roman empire. On this occasion, as formerly, the mob of Carthage loudly demanded that Cyprian should be thrown to the lions; but the danger does not appear to have been imminent, and while in Italy Cornelius was besought by Gallus and Cæcilius Vechiarius to die on the 14th of September, and his successor Lullus suffered martyrdom a few months afterwards (5th March, 253), Africa remained comparatively undisturbed, and the political confusion consequent upon the assumption of the purple by Aemilianus restored to the church external tranquillity, which continued uninterrupted for nearly four years. But in proportion as there was repose from without, so sents us with a very lively picture both of the man and of the times; and while we sometimes remark and regret a certain want of candour and decision, and a disinclination to enunciate boldly any great principles save such as were likely to flutter the prejudices of his clergy, we at the same time feel grateful in being relieved from the headstrong violence, the overbearing spiritual pride, and the arrogant impiety which disgrace the works of so many early controversialists. His character, indeed, and opinions were evidently, in no small degree, formed by the events of his own life. The eminence uniformly exhibited towards the Lapsi was such as might have been expected from a good man who must have been conscious that he had himself, on one occasion at least, considered it more expedient to avoid than to invite persecution, while the extreme views which he advocated with regard to the powers of the church were not surprising in a prelate whose authority had been so long and so fiercely assailed by a body of factious schismatists. On one point only is his conduct open to painful suspicion. He more than once alleged that he had received communications and directions direct from heaven, precisely too with reference to those transactions of his life which appeared most calculated to excite distrust or censure. Those who are not disposed to believe that such revelations were really vouchsafed, cannot fail to observe that the tone and temper of Cyprian's mind were so far removed from fanaticism, that it is impossible to imagine that he could have been deceived by the vain visions of a heated imagination.

In his style, which is awesomely formed upon the model of Tertullian, he exhibits much of the masculine vigour and power of his master, while he skilfully avoids his harshness and extravagance both of thought and diction. The fruits of his early training and practice as a rhetorician are manifest in the lucid arrangement of his matter, and in the copious, flowing, and sonorous periods which are woven by the grace expression to his ideas; but we may here and there justly complain, that loose reasoning and hollow declamation are substituted for the precise logic and pregnant terseness which we demand from a great polemical divine.

The following is a list of Cyprian's works:

1. De Gratia Doni liber, addressed in the form of a letter to his friend Donatus, who appears to have followed in early life the same profession with himself, and to have been converted at the same time. This work was probably composed in A.D. 246, very soon after the admission of its author into the church. It depicts in glowing colours the happy condition to which Cyprians was admitted by the grace of God, and turns aside from Paganism to Christianity; dwells upon the mercy and beneficence by which this change is effected, and upon the importance of the baptismal rite; and draws a striking parallel between the purity and holiness of the true faith as contrasted with the grossness and vice of the vulgar belief. Although frequently placed among the Epistles of Cyprian, it deserves to be considered in the light of a formal treatise.

2. De Idolorum Votis Liber, written in A.D. 247, the year in which he was ordained a presbyter, is imitated from the early Christian Apologies, especially that of Tertullian. Three points are chiefly insisted upon. 1. The folly of raising earthly kings, that is, mere mortal men, to the rank of divinities, the impotence of such imaginary powers, and the emptiness of the science of augury.

2. The Unity of God. 3. The Advent of Christ, and his Consubstantiality with the Father. This tract is expressly ascribed to Cyprian by Jerome in his Epist. ad Magnnum Orat.

3. Testimoniares doctrinarum Judaeorum libri tres. A collection of remarkable texts from Scripture, divided into three books, and illustrated by remarks and applications. Those in the first are quoted for the purpose of proving that the Jews, by their disobedience, had, in accordance with prophecy, forfeited the protection and promises of God; those in the second demonstrate that the Christians had taken their place, and that Jesus was the Messiah foretold in the Old Testament; those in the third exhibit within a short compass the great moral and religious obligations of the Christian life. The precise date at which this compilation was arranged is unknown, but it probably belongs to the early part of Cyprian's career. It is quoted by Jerome (Dial. l. adv. Pelag.) and by Augustine (De Doctrina Christi, iv. 16).

4. De Disciplina et Habitu Virginiurn liber, written in A. D. 248, the year in which he was raised to the episcopate, in imitation of the dissertations of Tertullian, "De Virginibus velandis," "De Habitu Mutilarum," &c., the object being to enforce upon those holy virgins who had made a vow of celibacy the necessity of simplicity in their dress and manner of life. He commences with an encomium on virginity, insists upon the propriety of abstaining from all sumptuous apparel and vain ornaments, from paint, from frequenting baths, marriages, or public spectacles, and concludes with a general exhortation to avoid all luxurious indulgencies. This book is referred to by Jerome (Epist. ad Donatian, et Euseb.) and by Augustine (de Doctrina Christi, iv. 21).

5. De Unitate Ecclesiae Catholicae liber, written and despatched to Rome in A. D. 252, at a period when both Italy and Africa were distracted by the pretensions of Novatianus, with the view of bringing back to the bosom of the church those who had wandered from her pale or were wavering in their allegiance, by pointing out the danger and sin of schism, and by demonstrating the necessity of a visible union among all true Christians. This remarkable treatise is of the utmost importance to the student of ecclesiastical history, since here we first find the doctrine of Catholicalism and of the typical character of St. Peter developed in that form which was afterwards assumed by the bishop of Rome and the successors of Papal sanctity. It is quoted by Augustine (c. Crescent. ii. 38; see also Cyprian. Epist. 51).

6. De Lapis liber, written and despatched to Rome in the month of November, A. D. 252. It may be considered as a sort of supplement to the preceding work, explaining and defending the justice and consistency of that temperate policy which was adopted both by Cornelius and Cyprian with regard to the readmission of fallen brethren into the communion of the church. The tract is quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi. 53), by Augustin (de Adult. Conf. l. 25), and by Pontius (Vit. Cyprian). See also Cyprian, Epist. 51.

7. De Oratone Dominitus liber, written about A. D. 252, in imitation of Tertullian, "De Orat.
including a few addressed to himself or to his clergy. This collection is of inestimable value, not only on account of the light which it throws on the life, character, and opinions of the prelate himself, but from the lively picture which it presents of the state of ecclesiastical affairs, and of a multitude of circumstances of the greatest importance in historical and antiquarian researches. Our limits preclude us from attempting to give any analysis of these documents; but we may remark, that the topics principally considered bear upon the questions, general and local, which we have noticed above as agitating the Church at this epoch, namely, the treatment of the Lapsi, the schism of Novatians and Felicitians, the schism of Novatians, the baptism of infants, the re-baptising of heretics, to which we may add a remarkable discussion on a subject which has been revived in our own day, the necessity of employing wine in the sacrament of the Eucharist, in which Cyprian strongly denounces the tenets of the Aquitani or Encratites (Epist. 63), and employs many expressions which have been constantly appealed to by those opposed to the practice of the Romish church which denies the cup to the laity.

In most editions of Cyprian the tract De Gratia Dei, together with the fragmenta of the letter to the Donatists prefixed to it, are set down as the first two epistles, by which arrangement the number is swollen to eighty-three. Three more were printed by Baluze, which, however, are now admitted to be spurious.

The following works are admitted as authentic by many editors, although they do not rest on such satisfactory evidence as the foregoing:—

The following works, although frequently found bearing the name of Cyprian, and many of them, probably, belonging to the same age, are now rejected by all:—

1. Ad Nocatumum Haereticum, quod Lepis Spes Venias non sit demensage, ascribed by Erasmus to Cornelius. 2. De Disciplina et bono Pastificiâ, inserted in the same manner by Erasmus to Cornelius. 3. De Alexandri. 4. De Montibus Sina et Sinai contra Judaeos. 5. Oratio pro Martyribus—Oratio in Die Passionis sancte et Confessö S. Cypriani, assigned, by many to Cyprian of Antioch. 6. De Resumptione. 7. De Carolisici Christi Operibus, now recognized as the work of Arnold, abbot of Bona Valla. 8. De Singularitate Clericorum. 9. La Symbolon Apostolicum Espositio. The work of Rufinus. 10. Ad Useores Judæorum qui Christiana incursi sunt. 11. De Revoltores Capitis B. Io. Baptistae: in this work mention is made of the Frankish king Pepin. 12. De Deoleti Martyrio, in which mention is made of the Turks! 13. De Deolecto Abonissetor Secund. 14. Dispositio Canonum. 15. De Paschæ Computis, attributed to Cyprian by Julianus Diaconus, and found in the Constantinian MS. 16. Three poems, the author or authors of which are unknown, have been ascribed to Cyprian—Genesis, Salome, Ad Senatorem. The first seems to be the same with that assigned by Gennadius to Salvianus, bishop of Marsillia.

The editions of Cyprian are very numerous. The editio princeps was printed at Rome from a Parisin MS., under the inspection of Andrew, bishop of Aleria, by Swynnheym and Pannartz, 1471, fol. The first edition in which any attempt was made to exhibit a pure text, and to separate the genuine from the spurious works, was that of Erasmus, whose labours are above all praise. It appeared at Bâle, from the press of Froben, in 1520, fol. The two best editions are—1. That printed at Oxford, 1682, fol., and edited by John Fell, bishop of Oxford, to which are subjoined the Annales Cypriani of John Pearson, bishop of Chester; reprinted at Bremen, 1690, fol., with the addition of the Dissertationes Cypriniacæ of Dodwell, which had previously appeared in a separate form, Qvo No publication on this subject contains such an amount of accurate investigation with regard not only to the prelate himself, but also to the whole complicated ecclesiastical history of the times, as the Annales Cypriniacæ of Pearson, an abstract of which has been compiled by Schoene- man, and will be found in his Bibl. Patrum. Lat. i. pp. 80—100 (c. iii. § 3), and a vast mass of valuable matter is contained in the Dissertationes Cypriniacæ of Dodwell.

CYPSELUS (Κυψέλος), a son of Aepytus, father of Merope and father-in-law of Cresphontes, was king of Basilia on the Alpheus in Arcadia. (Paus. iv. 3. § 3, viii. §§ 4. 8, 29. § 4.)

CYPSELUS, of Corinth, was, according to Herodotus (v. 92), a son of Acieon, who traced his descent to Ceneus, the companion of Peirithous. Pausanias (ii. 4. § 4, v. 2. § 4, 17. § 2, and c. 18) describes Cypselus as a descendant of Melos, who was a native of Gonusa near Sicyon, and accompanied the Dorians against Corinth. The mother of Cypselus belonged to the house of the Bacchiadæ, that is, to the Doric nobility of Corinth. According to the tradition followed by Herodotus, she married Acieon because, being ugly, she met with no one among the Bacchiadæ who would have her as his wife. Her marriage remained for some time without issue, and when Acieon consulted the oracle of Delphi about it, a son was promised to him, who should prove formidable to the ruling party at Corinth. When the Bacchiadæ were informed of this oracle, which at the same time threw light upon a previous mysterious oracle, they resolved for their own security to murder the child—of Aetolia. But the persons who were sent out for this purpose were moved by the smiles of the infant, and spared his life. Afterwards, however, they made a second attempt, but they now could not find the child, for his mother had concealed him in Cypselus, from which he derived his name, Cypselus. When he had grown up to manhood, he returned forward, as the champion of the demois of the nobles, and with the help of the people he expelled the Bacchiadæ, and then established himself as tyrant. (Aristot. Politi., v. 8, &c.) The cruelties which he is charged with at the beginning of his reign were the result of the vehement opposition on the part of the Bacchiadæ, for afterwards his government was peaceful and popular, and Cypselus felt so safe among the Corinthians that he could even dispense with a body-guard. (Aristot. Politi., v. 9; Polyaen. v. 31.) Like most other Greek tyrants, Cypselus was very fond of splendid and magnificence, and he appears to have accumulated great wealth. He dedicated at Delphi the chapel of the Corinthians with a bronze palm-tree (Plut. Cons. Spur., Spur., 21, Symp. Quer. viii., 4) and at Olympia he erected a golden statue of Zeus, towards which the wealthy Corinthians were obliged to pay an extraordinary tax for the space of ten years. (Strab. v. 10, 358, 378; comp. Paus. Aristot. Oeconom. ii. 2; Suid. and Phot. s. v. Κόψελος.) Cypselus ruled at Corinth for a period of thirty years, the beginning of which is placed by some in B.C. 658, and by others in 655. He was succeeded in the tyranny at Corinth by his son Periander. The celebrated chest of Cypselus, consisting of cedar wood, ivory, and gold, and richly adorned with figures in relief, of which Pausanias (v. 17, &c.) has preserved a description, is said to have been acquired by one of the ancestors of Cypselus, who kept it in his most costly treasures. It afterwards remained in the possession of his descendants, and it was in this chest that young Cypselus was saved from the persecutions of the Bacchiadæ. His grateful descendants dedicated it in the temple of Hera at Olympia, where it was seen by Pausanias about the end of the second century after Christ. (Comp. Müller, Archæol. d. Kunst. § 57, 2, &c.; Thiersch, Epoch. p. 166, &c.)

CYRENE (Κυρήνη), a daughter of Hypseus or Peneus by Chilampe, a granddaughter of Peneus and Creusa, was beloved by Apollo, who carried her from mount Pelion to Libya, where Cyrene derived its name from her. She became by Apollo the mother of Aristaeus. (Find. Poll. ix. 5, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 590, &c.; Diod. iv. 91; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 42, 517; Cypr. Fab. 161.) It is mentioned by Pausanias (v. 7. 7) calls Anthicus, Nomius, and Argeus sons of Cyrene. (Comp. Aristoph.) There are two other mythical personages of the name of Cyrene. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollod. ii. 5. § 8.)

CYR'IADES stands first in the list of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio (Aureolus), from whose brief, indistinct, and apparently inaccurate narrative we gather that, after having robbed his father, whose old age he had embittered by dissipation and vice, he fled to the Persians, stimulated Supper to invade the Roman provinces, and, having assumed the purple together with the title of Augustus, was slain by his own followers after a short career of cruelty and crime. Gibbon thinks fit to assume that these events took place after the defeat and capture of Valerianus (A.D. 260) but our only authority expressly asserts, that the death of the usurper happened while the emperor was upon his march to the East (A.D. 258 or 259); and by that statement we must necessarily conclude that all other evidence, he content to abide. The medals published by Colsorus and Medicorhina are rejected by numismatologists as unquestionably spurious. (Trebell. Poll. Try. Tryr. i.)

CYRILLUS, a Graeco-Roman jurist, who wrote shortly after the compilations of Justinian were formed. From the scholiast on the Basilica (vii. 89) it may be inferred, that he translated into Greek the Digest or Digest or Digest or Digest (τὸ πάλαιτε, Reis, ad Theoph. p. 1246, § 17). He also composed a commentary on the Digest, which is cited by the name τοῖς—a word which does not mean an alphabetical register, or index in the modern sense. (Bros. ii. pp. 166, 192.) Some have thought that, as τοῖς means a summary abridgment of the contents of the titles, or, more accurately, a sort of commentary or paraphrase; whereas Vitalis (Inst. i. p. 176) mentions a suggestion made to him, that πάλαιτε and τοῖς are used synonymously, the latter word being interpreted in the Glossa Nominalis by δύναμι προερχέται. Cyrius is designated, along with Stephanus (who also wrote an Index), by the name Τοῖςωτώτα. (Bros. iii. p. 415.) On the authority of Ant. Augustinus, Suarez (Notit. Basil. i. 19) cites Matt. Bislaris (in Praef. Supraoj.) to show that Cyrius interpreted the Digest κατ’ ἐκφρασίαν, but, in the edition of Bislaris published by Bp. Beveridge (Synodicon ii.), the name of Cyrius does not occur in the context referred to. Cyrius also commented upon the Code. (Bros. iii. pp. 69, 61.) Sometimes he is quoted by the scholiasts on the Basilica, and sometimes his opinions are embodied in the text. (Bros. v. pp. 44, 82, 421, Bros. iv. p. 410.) He does not appear to have commented upon the Novellae; and Reis (ad Theoph. pp. 1245, 1245) has observed, that both Cyrius and Stephanus must have written before A.D. 555, when the 115th Novella was promulgated. In Bros. v. 225 is a quotation from Cyrius stating the law de Inefficacio Testamento as it existed before it was altered by the 115th Novella, which an eminent jurist could scarcely have overlooked or been ignorant of.

G. B. Zacharina seems to think that there were two jurists named Cyrilus: one, who was among the preceptors of the jurists that flourished in the time of Justinian; another, who was among the jurists that flourished in the period immediately after the compilation of the Corpus Juris. (Hist. J. G. Dom. i. 14, 1, n. ib. § 14, 5, 6.) Zacharina indeed does not expressly say that there were two, but, unless he thinks so, his mode of statement is calculated to mislead. The early Cyrilus is referred to (if Zacharina properly expresses his meaning) in Bros. i. pp. 583, 464 (ed. Heimbach), in both of which passages he is designated by the honourable title Heros. In the passage, p. 464, Heros Patricius, who was a contemporary of Justinian, seems (as quoted by the Scholiast) to call Cyrilus "the general schoolmaster of the world;" but the meaning is ambiguous, and the high-flown compliments to Cyrilus may be the Scholiast's own. It is the later Cyrilus (if Zacharina expresses what he intends) who, in Bros. i. p. 789 (ed. Heimbach), cites Stephanus, his contemporary and brother commentator. We do not agree with Zaccariae in this hypothesis of two Cyrilli; and it is to be observed, that in Bas. i. p. 649 (ed. Heimbach) the supposed earlier Cyrillus of Zaccariae is treated as the author of a commentary on the title de Pactic.)

In Bas. iii. pp. 50, 51 (ed. Fabrot), Cyrillus is represented as quoting a constitution of Alexius Comnenus (A.D. 1061—1118), and, in Bas. v. p. 431 and vii. p. 89, mention is made of the edition of Cyrillus, which is supposed by Assenmann and Pohl to mean his edition of the Basilica. Hence Assenmann (Bibli. Jur. Orient. ii. 20, p. 404) comes to the conclusion, that Cyrillus was posterior to Alexius; and Pohl (ad Sacris. Notit. Basil. p. 69, n. σ) thinks, that there were two jurists of the name, one on which reference is made to Alexius. In the passages of early jurists which are appended as notes to the text of the Basilica, interpolations and alterations were often made, in order to accommodate them to a later state of the law; and the apparent anachronisms thus produced occasion considerable difficulty in the legal biography of the lower empire. (Heimbach, de Basil. Orig. p. 31.)

The fragments of Gneso-Roman jurists appended by way of commentary to the 8th book of the Basilica were first published by Rahnen from a manuscript at Leyden in the 3rd and 5th volumes of Meurnioen's Thesaurus. Among them are frequent extracts from Cyrillus.

In the Glossae Nominae, of which Labbe made a collection that was published after his death (Paris, 1673, Londinii, 1617), are Glossaries which have been commonly attributed to Philoxenus and Cyrillus. Reza (ad Theoph. p. 1246) thinks it improbable that these Glossaries were either edited by Philoxenus and Cyrillus, or extracted by others from their interpretations, but that they certainly have been interpolated and altered by later hands. Hanbold (Just. Jur. Rom. prin. p. 150, n. k.) sees no sufficient reason for attributing to Cyrillus the Glossary that passes under his name. [J.T.O.]

CYRILLUS (Κύριλλος), ST., was a native of ALEXANDRIA, and nephew of Theophilus, bishop of the same place. The year of his birth is not known. After having been a presbyter of the church at Alexandria, he succeeded to the episcopal chair on the death of Theophilos, A.D. 412. To this office he was no sooner elected than he gave full scope to those dispositions and desires that guided him through an unquiet life. Unbounded ambition and vindictiveness, jealousy of opponents, ill-directed cunning, apparent zeal for the truth, and an arrogant desire to lord it over the churches, constituted the character of this vehement patriarch. His restless and turbulent spirit, bent on self-aggrandisement, presents an unfavourable portrait to the impartial historian. Immediately after his elevation, he entered with vigour on the duties supposed to devolve on the prelate of so important a city. He banished from it the Jews, who are said to have been attempting violence towards the Christians, threw down their synagogue and plundered it, quarrelled with Creates, and set himself to oppose heretics and heathens on every side. According to Sozomes, he also shut up the churches of the Novatians, took away all their sacred vessels and ornaments, and deprived Theopemptus, their bishop, of all he had. (Histor. Eccl., vii. 7.) But his efforts were chiefly directed against Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople; and the greater part of his life was passed amid aggregating scenes, resulting from this persevering opposition. In consequence of an epistle written by Cyril to the Egyptian monks which had been carried to Constantinople, Nestorius and his friends were naturally offended. When Cyril understood how much Nestorius had been hurt by this letter, he wrote to him in justification of his conduct, and in explanation of his faith, to which Nestorius replied in a calm and dignified tone. Cyril's answer repeats the admonitions of his first letter, expounds anew his doctrine of the union of natures in Christ, and defends it against the consequences deduced in his opponent's letter. Nestorius was afterwards induced by Lampon, a presbyter of the Alexandrian church, to write a short letter to Cyril breathing the true Christian spirit.

In the mean time the Alexandrine prelate was endeavouring to lessen the influence of his opponent by statements addressed to the emperor, and also to the princesses Pulcheria, Arcadian, and Marina; but Theodosius was not disposed to look upon him with a friendly eye because of such epistles; for he feared that the prelate aimed at exciting disagreement and discord in the imperial household. Cyril also wrote to Celestine, bishop of Rome, informing him of the heresy of Nestorius, and asking his co-operation against it. The Roman bishop had previously received some account of the controversy from Nestorius; though, from ignorance of Greek, he had not been able to read the letters and discourses of the Constantinopolitan prelate. In consequence of Cyril's statement, Celestine held a council at Rome, and passed a decree, that Nestorius should be deposed in ten days unless he recanted. The execution of this decree was entrusted to Cyril. The Roman prelate also sent several letters through Cyril, one of which, a circular letter to the Eastern patriarchs and bishops, Cyril forwarded with additional letters from himself. This circular was afterwards sent by John of Antioch to Nestorius. Soon after (A.D. 430), he assembled a synod at Alexandria, and set forth the truth in opposition to Nestorius's tenets in twelve heads or anathemas. A letter was also drawn up addressed to Nestorius, another to the officers and members of the church at Constantinople, inducing them to oppose their patriarch, and a third to the monks. With these anathemas he sent four bishops as legates to Nestorius, requiring of him to subscribe them if he wished to remain in the communion of the Catholic church and retain his see. Celestine's letter, which he had kept back till now, was also despatched. But Nestorius refused to retract, and answered the anathemas by twelve anti-anathemas. In consequence of these mutual excommunications and recriminatory letters, the emperor Theodosius the Second was induced to summon a general council at Ephesus, commonly reckoned the third ecumenical council, which was held A.D. 431. To this council Cyril and many bishops subservient to his views repaired. The pious Isidoro in vain reproached with the fiory Alexandrine prelate. Nestorius was accompanied by two imperial ministers of state, one of whom had the command of soldiers to protect the council. Cyril presided, and urged on the business with impatient haste. Nestorius and the imperial commissioners requested that the proceedings might be delayed till the arrival of John of Antioch and the other eastern bishops, and likewise of the Italian and Sicilian members; but no delay was allowed. Nestorius was condemned as a heretic. On the 27th of June, five days after the commencement of the council, John of Antioch, Theodoret, and the other eastern bishops, arrived. Uniting themselves with a considerable part of the council who were opposed to Cyril's proceedings, they held a separate synod, over which John presided, and deposed both Cyril and Memnon his associate. Both, however, were soon after restored by the emperor, while Nestorius was compelled to return to his cloister at Antioch. The emperor, though at first opposed to Cyril, was afterwards wrought upon by various representations, and by the intrigues of the monks, many of whom were bribed by the Alexandrian prelate. Such policy procured many friends at court, while Nestorius having also fallen under the displeasure of Pulcheria, the emperor's sister, was abandoned, and obliged to retire from the city into exile. Having triumphed over his enemy at Ephesus, Cyril returned to Egypt. But the deposition of Nestorius had separated the eastern from the western churches, particularly those in Egypt. In A.D. 432, Cyril and the eastern bishops were excommunicated by the emperor to enter into terms of peace. In pursuance of such a proposal, Paul of Emessa, in the name of the Orientalis, brought an exposition of the faith to Alexandria, sufficiently catholic to be subscribed by Cyril. He returned with another from Cyril, to be subscribed by the Easterns. This procured peace for a while. But the spirit of the Alexandrian bishop could not easily rest; and soon after the disputes were renewed, particularly between him and Theodoret. In such boons he continued to be involved till his death, A.D. 444.

According to Cave, Cyril possessed piety and indomitable zeal for the Catholic faith. But if we may judge of his piety by his conduct, he is scarcely entitled to this character. His learning was not according to the standard of the times in which he lived. He had a certain kind of naivety and ingenuity which frequently bordered on the mystical; but in philosophical comprehension and metaphysical acumen he was very defective. Theodoret brings various accusations against him, which represent him in an unamiable and even an unorthodox light. He charges him with holding that there was but one nature in Christ; but this seems to be only a consequence derived from his doctrine, just as Cyril deduced from Nestorius's writings a denial of the divine nature in Christ. Theodoret, however, brings another accusation against him which cannot easily be set aside. It is, his having courted Hypatia, a noble Alexandrian lady addicted to the study of philosophy, to be torn to pieces by the populace. Cave, who is partial to Cyril, does not deny the fact, though he thinks it incredible and inconsistent with Cyril's character to assert that he sanctioned such a proceeding. (Suidas, s. v. Ὑπάτια.)

As an interpreter of Scripture, Cyril belongs to the allegorising school, and therefore his exegetical works are of no value. In a literary view also, his writings are almost worthless. They develop the characteristic tendency of the Egyptian mind, its proneness to mysticism rather than to clear and accurate conceptions in regard to points requiring to be distinguished. His style is thus characterised by Photius (Cod. 49): ἐν Κύριλλῳ ἡμῶν ἐνίκη ἐκκλησιαστῶν καὶ δόγμα πολλάκις τῆς προφορᾶς πνευμ.

Cyrillus.

In his work against Julian, it is more florid than usual, though never rising to beauty or elegance. It is generally marked by considerable obscurity and ruggedness. Cyril's extant works are the following:—

Grapheyn (i.e. polished or highly-wrought commentaries) on the Pentateuch. This work appeared at Paris in Latin, 1605; and was afterwards published in Greek and Latin by A. Schott, Antwerp, 1618.

Concerning adoration and worship in spirit and in truth, in 17 books.

Commentaries on Isaiah, in 5 books.

A Commentary on the twelve minor Prophets. This was separately published in Greek and Latin at Ingolstadt, 1605.

A Commentary on John, in 10 books.

A treatise (thesaurus) concerning the holy and consubstantial Trinity.

Seven dialogues concerning the holy and consubstantial Trinity. To these a compendium of the seventh dialogue is subjoined, or a summary of the arguments adduced in it.

Two dialogues, one concerning the incarnation of the only-begotten, the other proving that Christ is one and the Lord. These dialogues, when taken with the preceding, make the eight and ninth.

Scholia on the incarnation of the only-begotten. Far the greater part of the Greek text is wanting. They exist entire only in the Latin version of Mercator.

Another brief tract on the same subject.

A treatise concerning the right faith, addressed to the emperor Theodosius. It begins with the third chapter.

Thirty paschal homilies. These were published separately at Antwerp in 1618. Fourteen homilies on various topics. The last exists only in Latin.

Sixty-one epistles. The fourth is only in Latin. Some in this collection were written by others, by Nestorius, Arcadius, John of Antioch, Celestine, bishop of Rome, &c. &c.

Five books against Nestorius, published in Greek and Latin at Rome, in 1603.

An explanation of the twelve chapters or anathemas.

An apology for the twelve chapters, in opposition to the eastern bishops.

An apology for the same against Theodoret.

An apology addressed to the emperor Theodosius, written about the close of A.D. 431.

Ten books against Julian, written A.D. 433.

A treatise against the Anthropomorphites.

A treatise upon the Trinity.

Of his lost works mention is made by Liberaetus of "Three books against exerts of Diodorus and Theodorus." Fragments of this work are found in the Acts of Synods. (5 Collat. 5.) Genadius says, that he wrote a treatise concerning the termination of the Synagogue, and concerning the faith against heretics. Ephrem of Antioch speaks of a treatise on imposibility and another upon suffering. Eusebius of Constantinople cites a fragment from Cyril's oration against those who say that we should not offer up petitions for such as have slept in the faith. Nineteen homilies on Jeremiah were edited in Greek and Latin by Cor-derius, at Antwerp, 1618, 8vo, under the name of Cyril; but it has been ascertained that they belong to Origen, with the exception of the last, which was written by Clement of Alexandria. A liturgy inscribed to Cyril, translated from Arabic into Latin by Victor Schalch, was published at Augsburg, 1604, 4to. Cyril's works were published in Latin by George of Trebizond at Basel in 1546, 4 volumes; by Gentianus Heretvis at Paris, 1573, 1603, 2 vols. They were published in Greek and Latin by Aubert, six volumes, Paris, 1633, fol. This is the best edition. (Soc. Sac., that after the Nicene creed had been generally adopted, he approved of and embraced its dogmas. Epiphanius speaks in express terms of his Semi-Arianism, and even Tertullian acknowledges the fact. His coldness towards the Nicenians and his intimacy with the Eusebians, give colour to this opinion. But he was by no means disposed to carry out doctrines beyond the written word, or to wander into the regions of speculation. His published writings attest his orthodoxy and firm belief in the Nicene creed.

Among his works are also preserved a homily on the case of the paralytic man (John v. 1—16), and a letter to the emperor Constantius, giving an account of the luminous cross which appeared at Jerusalem, 351.

His writings were published in Latin at Paris, 1589, and his Catechism in Greek at the same place, 1564, &c.; in Greek and Latin at Cologne, 1564. Theodoret edited them all in Greek and Latin at Paris in 1603, &c.; and afterwards Dion Petavius at Paris, 1628, &c. They were reprinted from Theodoret’s edition, at Paris in 1631, &c.; along with the works of Synesius of Cyrene. A much better edition than any of the preceding was that of Thomas Milton, in Greek and Latin, Oxford, 1703, &c. The best is that of the Benedictine monk, A. A. Tottée, Paris, 1720, &c. The preface contains a very elaborate dissertation on the life and writings of Cyril. (See Tottée’s preface; Cave’s Historia Literaria, vol. i. pp. 211, 212, Oxford, 1740; Schröck, Kirchengeschichte, vol. xii. p. 348, &c.; Theodoret, Histor. Ecclesiast. lib. ii. and v.; Tillemont, Eccles. Mem. vol. viii.; Guérice, Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, vol. i. pp. 344, 345, note 3, fünfte Auflage; Mordock’s Mosaike, vol. i. p. 241, note 16.)” [S. D.]

Cyril (Κύριλλος), of Scythopolis, a Palestinian monk, belonging to the sixth century. In the sixteenth year of his age he made a profession of the monastic life in his native place. Prompted, by a desire to see sacred places, he visited Jerusalem, and, by the advice of his mother, put himself under the care of John the Silentian, by whom he was sent to the famous monastery of Lauma. Leontius, prefect of the monastery, received him into the order of the monks. The time of his birth and death is alike unknown. About A.D. 557, he wrote the life of St. John the Silentian. This is still extant, having been published in Greek and Latin by Henschelius and Papebrochius in the Acta Sanctorum, 13th of May. He also wrote the life of Euthymius the abbot, who died 472, which is extant, but in an interpolated form, which was published by Cotelerius in Greek and Latin in his Monumenta Ecclesiae Graecae, vol. ii., Paris, 1681, &c. It is also in the Acta Sanctorum, January 20. In addition to these, he wrote the life of St. Sabas, the ancient Latin version of which, before it was corrupted by Simeon, was published by Bollandus in the Acta Sanctorum belonging to the 20th of January. It is given in Greek and Latin in Cotelerius’s Monumenta, vol. iii. p. 230. (Cave, Histor. Literar. vol. i. p. 529.)” [S. D.]

Cyrinus (Kyros), two mythical personages, from the one of whom the island of Cyrinus or Cyrne (Cernea) derived its name (Serv. ad Virg. Elog. i. 39, 167); and the other was regarded as the founder of Cyrinus, a town in Cazan. (Diod. v. 60.)” [L. S.]

Cyrilius (Κυριλλος). 1. An Athenian, who, on the approach of Xerxes, when the Athenians had resolved to quit their city, advised his countrymen to remain and submit to the foreign invader. For this cowardly advice, Cyrillus, together with his wife and children, was stoned to death by the Athenians. (Dem. de Coron. p. 296; Cic. de Nat. div. iii. 11.) 2. Of Pharnacia, is mentioned by Stobæus (xi. p. 530) as one of the companions of Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expeditions, who afterwards wrote an account of the exploits of Alexander. Nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]

Cyrillus the Elder (Κύριλλος ὁ παλαιός or ὁ πρότερος), the founder of the Persian empire. The life of this prince is one of the most important portions of ancient history, both on account of the magnitude of the empire which he founded, and because it forms the epoch at which sacred and profane history became connected: but it is also one of the most difficult, not only from the almost total want of contemporary historians, but also from the tables and romances with which it was overlaid in ancient times, and from the perverseness of modern writers, of the stomp of Rollin and Hales, who have followed the guidance, not of the laws of historical evidence, but of their own notions of the right interpretation of Scripture. Herodotus, within a century after the time of Cyrus, found his history embellished by those of the Persians who wished to make it more imposing (οἱ βουλημένοι ἑμισθοῦν τὸν κύρος), and had to make his choice between four different stories, out of which he prefers to have selected the account given by those who wished to tell the truth (τὸν ἄθροι ὁμόθυμον λόγον, i. 53). Nevertheless his narrative is evidently founded to some extent on fabulous tales. The authorities of Ctesias, even the royal archives, were doubtless corrupted in a similar manner, besides the accumulation of errors during another half century. Xenophon does not pretend, what some modern writers have pretended for him, that his Cyropaedia is anything more than an historical romance. In such a work it is always impossible to separate the framework of true history from the fiction: and even if we could do this, we should have gained but little. Much reliance is placed on the sources of information which Xenophon possessed in the camp of the younger Cyrus. No idea can be more fallacious; for what sort of stories would be current there, except the fables which Herodotus contains, but which would readily and alone pass for true in the camp of Cyrus? One thing we know for certain, i.e., that there was nothing but what was good of the great ancestor whose name he bore, and whose fame he aspired to emulate? And even if Xenophon was aware of the falsity of these tales, he was justified, as a writer of fiction, in using them for his purpose. Xenophon is set up against Herodotus. The comparative value of their authority, in point of time, character, and means of information, is a question which, by itself, could never have been decided by a sober-minded man, except in favour of Herodotus. But it is thought that the account of Xenophon is more consistent with Scripture than that of Herodotus. This is a lucky assumption, and an unjustifiable scholastic allusion to the time of Cyrus are so brief, that they can only be interpreted by the help of other authorities.
the accounts of the modern Persian writers it is impossible to separate the truth from the falsehood.

The account of Herodotus is as follows: In the year B.C. 594, Astyages succeeded his father, Cyrus, as king of Media. He had a daughter whom he named Mandane. In consequence of a dream, which seemed to portend that her offspring should be master of Asia, he married her to a Persian named Cambyses, of a good house, but of a quiet temper. A second dream led him to send for his daughter, when she was pregnant; and upon her giving birth to a son, Astyages committed it to Harpagus, his most confidential attendant, with orders to kill it. Harpagus, moved with pity, and fearing the revenge of Mandane, instead of killing the child herself, gave it to a herdsman of Astyages named Mitradas, who was to expose it, and to satisfy Harpagus of its death. But while the herdsman was in attendance on Astyages, his wife had brought forth a still-born child, which they substituted for the child of Mandane, who was reared as the son of the herdsman, but was not yet called Cyrus. The name he bore seems from a passage of Strabo (xx. p. 729) to have been AGRADATES, ΑΥΓΑΡΑΔΑΤΟΥ. When he was ten years old, his true parentage was discovered by the following incident. In the sports of his village, the boys chose him for their king, and he ordered them all exactly as was done by the Median king. One of the boys, the son of a noble Median named Artembasra, disobeyed his commands, and Cyrus caused him to be severely scourged. Artembasra complained to Astyages, who sent for Cyrus, in whose person and courage he discovered his daughter's son. The herdsman and Harpagus, being summoned before the king, told him the truth. Astyages forgave the herdsman, but revenged himself on Harpagus by serving up to him at a banquet the flesh of his own son, with other circumstances of the most refined cruelty. As to his grandson, by the advice of the Magians, who assured him that his dreams were fulfilled by the boy's having been a king in sport, and that he had nothing more to fear from him, he sent him back to his parents in Persia.

When Cyrus grew up towards manhood, and showed himself the most courageous and amiable of his fellows, Harpagus, who had conceived a truly oriental desire of revenge under the mask of most profound submission to his master's will, sent presents to Cyrus, and ingratiated himself with him. Among the Medians it was easy for Harpagus to form a party in favour of Cyrus, for the tyranny of Astyages had made him odious. Having organized his conspiracy, Harpagus sent a letter secretly to Cyrus, inviting him to take revenge upon Astyages, and promising that the Medes should desert to him. Cyrus called together the Persians, and having, by an ingenious practical lesson, excited them to revolt from the Median supremacy, he was chosen as their leader. Upon hearing of this, Astyages summoned Cyrus, who replied that he would come to him sooner than Astyages himself would wish. Astyages armed the Medes, but was so infuriated (συνοδηγος εις) as to give the command to Harpagus, "forgetting," says Herodotus, "how he had treated him." In the battle which ensued, some of the Medes deserted to Cyrus, and the main body of the army died of their own accord. Astyages, having impaled the Magians who had deceived him, armed the youths and old men who were left in the city, led them out to fight the Persians, and was defeated and taken prisoner, after a reign of 85 years, in B.C. 559. The Medes accepted Cyrus for their king, and thus the supremacy which they had held passed to the Persians. Cyrus treated Astyages well, and kept him with him till his death. The date of the accession of Cyrus is fixed by the unanimous consent of the ancient chroniclers. (African. op. Euseb. Præp. Evan. x. 10; Clinton, Fast. Hist. ii. s. 559.) It was probably at this time that Cyrus received that name, which is a Persian word (Kohr), signifying the Sun.

In the interval during which we hear nothing certain of Cyrus, he was doubtless employed in consolidating his newly-acquired empire. Indeed there are some notices (though not in Herodotus) from which we may infer that a few of the cities of Media refused to submit to him, and that he only reduced them to obedience after a long and obstinate resistance. (Xen. Anab. iii. 4. § 7.)

The gradual consolidation and extension of the Persian empire during this period is also stated incidentally by Herodotus in introducing his account of the conquest of Lydia, which is the next event recorded in the life of Cyrus. It took place in 546 B.C. [CROESUS]

The Ionian and Aeolian colonies of Asia Minor now sent ambassadors to Cyrus, offering to submit to him on the same terms as they had obtained from Croesus. But Cyrus, who had in vain invited the Ionians to revolt from Croesus at the beginning of the war, gave them to understand, by a significant fable, that they must prepare for the struggle with Cyrus, as they had done with Croesus; and that the Ionian alliance on the terms they offered. The other Ionian states fortified their cities, assembled at the Panionium, and, with the Aeolians, sent to Sparta for assistance. The Lacedaemonians refused to assist them, but sent Cyrus a message threatening them with their displeasure if he should meddle with the Greek cities. Having sent back a contemptuous answer to this message, Cyrus returned to the Median capital, Ecbatana, taking Croesus with him, and committing the government of Sardis to a Persian, named Tabalus. He himself was eager to attempt the conquest of Babylon, the Bactrian nation, the Scæna, and the Egyptians. He had no sooner left Asia Minor than a revolt of the states which had lately formed the Lydian empire was raised by Prynnes, a Persian; but, after a long and obstinate resistance, the whole of Asia Minor was reduced by Harpagus. [HARPA- GUS; PACYTES.] In the mean time, Cyrus was engaged in subduing the nations of Upper Asia, and particularly Assyria, which since the destruction of Ninus had Babylon for its capital. Its king was Labytus, the Belshazzar of Daniel. [LABYTNUS.] Cyrus marched against Babylon at the head of a large army, and in great state. He carried with him a most abundant supply of provisions for his table; and for his drink the water of the Chones, which flows by Susa, was carried in silver vessels. He passed the river Gyndes, a tributary of the Tigris, by diverting its water into a great number of rills, and arrived before Babylon in the second spring from the commencement of his expedition. Having defeated in battle the whole forces of the Bablyonians, he laid siege to the city, and after a long time he took it by diverting the course of the Euphrates, which flowed through the midst of it, so that his soldiers entered Babylon by the bed of the river. So entirely unprepared were the Babylonians for this mode of attack, that they were engaged in revelry (ἐν σκάψειον), and had left the gates which opened upon the river unguarded. This was in B.C. 538.

After Cyrus had subdued the Assyrians, he undertook the subjugation of the Medes, a people dwelling beyond the Araxes. Cyrus offered to marry Tomyris, the queen of this people; but she refused the offer, saying, that he would not have, but the kingdom of the Medes. The details of the war which followed may be read in Herodotus. It ended in the death of Cyrus in battle. Tomyris caused his corpse to be found among the slain, and having cut off the head, threw it into a bag filled with human blood, that he might satiate himself (she said) with blood. According to Herodotus, Cyrus had reigned 29 years. Other writers say 50. He was killed in B.C. 529. (Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. sub anno.)

The account of Ctesias differs considerably in some points from that of Herodotus. According to him, there was no relationship between Cyrus and Astyages, the father of the Median king Cyrus. Astyages fled to Ecbatana, and was there concealed by his daughter Amytis, and his husband, Spitamenes, whom, with their children, Cyrus would have put to the torture, had not Astyages discovered himself. When he did so, he was put in fetters by Ochus, but soon afterwards Cyrus himself set him free, honoured him as a father, and married his daughter Amytis, having put her husband to death for telling a falsehood. Astyages. Ctesias also says, that Cyrus made war upon the Scythe, who voluntarily submitted to him, when they heard of his reconciliation with Astyages and Amytis. He mentions a war with the Sacae, in which Cyrus was taken prisoner and ransomed. He gives a somewhat different account of the Lydian war. (Ctesias, Pers. c. 5; Croesus.)

Cyrus met with his death, according to Ctesias, by a wound received in battle with a nation called the Carians, who were assisted by the Ionian tribe at the beginning of the expedition against the Sacae, and says, that Cyrus was at first defeated but afterwards victorious. He also says, that Cyrus made an expedition into Indis, from which country he escaped with difficulty.

The chief points of difference between Xenophon and Herodotus are the following: Xenophon represents Cyrus as brought up at his grandfather's court, as serving in the Median army under his uncle Cyaxares, the son and successor of Astyages, and of whom Herodotus and Ctesias know nothing; as making war upon Babylon simply as the general of Cyaxares, who remained at home during the latter part of the Assyrian war, and permitted Cyrus to assume without opposition the power and state of an independent sovereign at Babylon; as marrying the daughter of Cyaxares; and at length dying quietly in his bed, after a short and sorrowful conclusion to his children and friends. The Lydian war of Cyrus is represented by Xenophon as a sort of episode in the Assyrian war, occasioned by the help which Croesus had given to the Assyrians in the first campaign of Cyrus against them.

Xenophon agrees for the most part with Hero-dorus; but he says, that Cyrus was taken prisoner by the Scythian queen (evidently meaning Tomyris), and that she crucified or impaled him.

Other variations, not worth specifying, are given by the chronographers and compilers. To form a complete and consistent life of Cyrus out of these statements is obviously impossible; but the leading events of his public life are made out with tolerable certainty, namely, the dethronement of Astyages, the conquest of the Lydian and Assyrian empires, his schemes to become master of all Asia and of Egypt, and his death in a battle with one of the Assyrians, which he wished to subdue. His acquisition of the Median empire was rather a revolution than a conquest. Herodotus expressly states, that Cyrus had a large party among the Medes before his rebellion, and that, after the defeat of Astyages, the nation voluntarily received him as their king. This was very natural, for besides the harshness of the government of Astyages, Cyrus was the next heir to the throne, the Medes were eminently, and the Persians were hardly, the kingdom remained, as before, the united kingdom of "the Medes and Persians," with the difference, that the supremacy was transferred from the former to the latter; and thus in process of time it came to be generally called the Persian empire, though the kings and their people were still, even down to the time of Alexander, often spoken of as Medes. If Cyrus had quietly succeeded to the throne, in virtue of his being the grandson of the Median king Astyages, it seems difficult to account for this change. The mere fact of Cyrus's father being a Persian is hardly enough to explain it.

With regard to the order of Cyrus's conquests in Asia, there seems much confusion. It is clear that there was a struggle for supremacy between Cyrus and the king of Babylon, the latter having become master of Mesopotamia and Syria by the conquests of Nebuchadnezzar. It was in fact a struggle between the Indo-Aryan tribes, which formed the Medo-Persian empire, and the Semitic tribes under the king of Babylon, for the supremacy of Asia. We can scarcely determine whether Cyrus was defeated by the forces of the Medes, the Medes and Babylon, or the Medes and Babylon, and perhaps in this matter Xenophon may have preserved something like the true succession of events. That Croesus was in alliance with Babylon is stated also by Herodotus, who however, makes Croesus entirely the aggressor in the Lydian war. No clear account can be given of his campaigns in Central Asia, but the object of it was evidently to subdue the whole of Asia as far as the Indus.

With respect to the main points of difference between Herodotus and the Cyropaedia, besides what has been said above of the historical value of Xenophon's book, if it could be viewed as a history at all, its real design is the great thing to be kept in view; and that design is stated by Xenophon himself with sufficient clearness. He wished to show that the government of men is not so difficult as is commonly supposed, provided that the ruler be wise; and to illustrate this he holds forth the example of Cyrus, whom he endows with all virtue, courage, and wisdom, and whose conduct is meant for a practical illustration and his discourses for an exposition of the maxims of the Socratic philosophy, so far as Xenophon was capable of understanding it. Of course it would not have done to have represented this hero ideal of a philosophic king as the dethroner of his own grandson, as the true Asiatic despot and conqueror, and as the victim of his own ambitious schemes. It seems incredible that any one should rise from the perusal of the Cyropaedia without the firm conviction that it is a romance, and, moreover, that its author never meant it to be taken for anything else; and still more incredible is it that any one should have recognized in the picture of Xenophon the verisimilitude of an Asiatic conqueror in the sixth century before Christ. That Cyrus was a great man, is proved by the empire he established, and none can deny that a good and virtuous man of his age and country, we need not doubt; but if we would seek further for his likeness, we must assuredly look rather at Genghis Khan or Timour than at the Cyrus of Xenophon.

It has, however, been supposed, that the statement of Xenophon about Cyaxares II. is confirmed by Scripture; for that Dareius the Mede, who, according to Daniel, reigns after the taking of Babylon (for two years, according to the chronologers) and before the first year of Cyrus, can be no other (this is the utmost that can be asserted) than Cyaxares II. This matter seems susceptible of a better explanation than it has yet received.

1. Xenophon’s Cyaxares is the son of Astyages; Dareius the Mede is the son of Ahasuerus. Now, it is almost beyond a doubt that Ahasuerus is the Greek form of the Persian name or title which the Greeks called Xerxes, and Cyaxares seems to be simply the form of the same word used in the Median dialect. Cyaxares, the son of Phraortes, is called Ahasuerus in Tobi xiv. 15. It is granted that this argument is not decisive, but, so far as it goes, it is against the identification.

2. After the taking of Babylon, Dareius the Mede receives the kingdom, and exercises all the functions of royalty, with great power and splendour, evidently at Babylon. But in Xenophon it is Cyrus who does this, and Cyaxares never comes near Babylon at all after its capture, but remains in Media, totally eclipsed and almost superseded by Cyrus. There are other arguments which seem to show clearly that, whoever Dareius the Mede may have been (a point difficult enough to decide), he was not the Cyaxares of Xenophon. The matter cannot be further discussed here; but the result of a most careful examination of it is, that in some important points the statements of Xenophon cannot be reconciled with those of Daniel; and that a much more probable explanation is, that Dareius was a noble Median, who held the sovereignty as the viceroy of Cyrus, until the latter found it convenient to fix his court at Babylon; and there are some indications on which a conjecture might be founded that this viceroy was Astyages. It is quite natural that the year in which Cyrus began to reign in person at Babylon should be reckoned (as it is by the Hebrew writers) the first year of his reign over the whole empire. This view is confirmed by the fact, that in the prophecies of the destruction of Babylon it is Cyrus, and not any Median king, that is spoken of. Regarding this difficulty, then, as capable of being explained, it remains that Xenophon’s statement about Cyaxares II. is entirely unsupported. Xenophon seems to have introduced Cyaxares simply as a foil to set off the virtues of Cyrus.

In the passage of Aeschylus, which is sometimes quoted as confirming Xenophon [Aristophanes], the two kings before Cyrus are clearly Phraortes and Cyaxares, or Cyaxares and Astyages. At all events, no room is left for Cyaxares II. The most natural explanation seems to be, that Phraortes, in whose reign the Persians were subjected to the Medes, and who was therefore the first king of the united Medes and Persians, is meant in the line

Μέτοικος γὰρ ὁ δ’ πρῶτος ἀρέμνων στρατός.

The next line admirably describes Cyaxares, who took Ninus, and consolidated the empire.

Άλλας δ’ εκείνον πᾶς τὸς ἔργον ἴστρεν.

If so, Astyages is omitted, probably because he did not complete his reign, but was dethroned by Cyrus, who is thus reckoned the third Medo-Persian king, Τριτός δ’ ἀν’ ἀνέδρο Κόρου. For the ἀν’ ἀνέδρο surely refers to the person who is called πρῶτος. On the other hand, the account which Herodotus gives of the transference of the Median empire to the Persians is in substance confirmed by Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, Anaximenes, Dinon, Ctesias, Amyntas, Strabo, Cephalion, Justin, Plutarch, Polyæmus, and even by Xenophon himself in the Anabasis, as above quoted. (See Clinton, i. pp. 252, 269.) Much light would be thrown on the subject if the date of Cyrus’s birth could be fixed; but this is impossible. Dinon says, that he was seventy at his death; but this is improbable for various reasons, and Herodotus evidently considered him much younger.

None but the sacred writers mention the edict of Cyrus for the return of the Jews. A motive for that step may be perhaps found in what Herodotus says about his designs on Egypt. The very remarkable prophecy relating to the destruction of Babylon and the restoration of the Jews by Cyrus is in Isaiah xlv. xlv., besides other important passages in Isaiah and Jeremiah, which predict the fall of Babylon without mentioning the name of Cyrus, and the corresponding history is in the books of Daniel, Ezra, and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23. The language of the proclamation of Cyrus, as recorded both in Ezra i. 2 and Chron. xxxvi. 22, seems to commemorate the idea that he was himself, as he might easily be through Daniel, with the prophecy of Isaiah. “The Lord God of heaven . . . hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah” (compare Isaiah xlv. 16, xlv. 13); but beyond this one point there is nothing to sustain the notion of Hales and others, that Cyrus was more than an unconscious instrument in accomplishing the designs of Providence. The contrary is intimated in Isaiah xlv. 5.

In the East Cyrus was long regarded as the greatest hero of antiquity, and hence the fables by which his history is obscured. The Persians remembered him as a father (Herod. iii. 69, 160), and his fame passed, through the Greeks, to the Europeans, and the classical writers abounded with allusions to him. His sepulchre at Pasargadæ was visited by Alexander the Great. (Arrian, vi. 29; Plut. Alex. 69.) Pasargadæ is said to have been built on the spot where Cyrus placed his camp when he defeated Astyages, and in its immediate neighbourhood the city of Persepolis grew up. The tomb of Cyrus has perished, but his name is found on monuments at Xarghab, north of Persepolis, which place, indeed, some antiquarians take Cyrus, the Younger, the second of the four sons of Darius Nothus, King of Persia, and of Par- yssias, was appointed by his father commander (έκα- ρασις or στρατηγός) of the maritime parts of Asia Minor, and satrap of Lydia, Phrygia, and Cappadocia. For the c. 407. He carried with him a large sum of money to aid the Lacedaemonians in the Peloponnesian war, and by the address of Lysander he was induced to help them even more than his father had commissioned him to do. The bluntness of Callistratidas caused him to withdraw his aid, but on the return of Lysander to the command it was renewed with the greatest liberality. [Callistratidas; Lysander; Tissaphernes.] There is no doubt that Cyrus was already meditating the attempt to succeed his father on the throne of Persia, and that he sought through Lysander to provide for aid from Sparta. Cyrus, indeed, betrayed his ambitious spirit, by putting to death two Persians of the blood royal, for not observing in his presence a usage which was only due to the king. It was probably for this reason, and not only on account of his own ill health, that Darius summoned Cyrus to his presence. (c. 403.) Before leaving Sardis, Cyrus sent for Lysander and assigned to him his revenues for the prosecution of the war. He then went to his father, attended by a body of 500 Greek mercenary troops and taking with him Tissaphernes, nominally as a mark of honour, but really for fear of what he might do in his absence. He arrived in Media just in time to witness his father’s death and the accession of his elder brother, Artaxerxes Mmemon (c. 404), though his mother, Parysatis, whose favourite son Cyrus was, had endeavoured to persuade Darius to appoint him as his successor, on the ground that he had been born after, but his brother Artaxerxes before, the accession of Darius. This attempt, of course, excited the jealousy of Artaxerxes, which was further enflamed by information from Tissaphernes, that Cyrus was plotting against his life. Artaxerxes, therefore, arrested his brother and condemned him to death; but, on the intercession of Parysatis, he spared his life and sent him back to his satrapy. Cyrus now gave himself up to the design of dethroning his brother. By his ability and by presents, he endeavoured to corrupt those of the Persians who past between the court of Artaxerxes and his own; but he relied chiefly on a force of Greek mercenaries, which he raised on the pretext that he was in danger from the hostility of Tissaphernes. When his preparations were complete, he commenced his expedition against Babylon, giving out, however, even to his own soldiers, that he was only marching against the robbers of Pisidia. When the Greeks learnt his real purpose, they found that they were too far committed to him to draw back. He set out from Sardis in the spring of c. 401, and, having marched through Phrygia and Cilicia, entered Syria through the celebrated pass of Alarodas across the Euphrates at Daisaphes, and marched down the river to the plain of Cumaxa, 500 stadii from Babylon. Artaxerxes had been informed by Tissaphernes of his designs, and was prepared to meet him. The numbers of the two armies are variously stated. Artaxerxes had from 400,000 to a million of men; Cyrus had about 100,000 Asiatics and 13,000 Greeks. The battle was at first altogether in favour of Cyrus. The Greek troops on the right routed the Asiatics who were opposed to them; and he himself pressed forward in the centre against his brother, and had even wounded him, when he was killed by one of the king’s body-guard. Artaxerxes caused his head and right hand to be struck off, and sought to have it believed that Cyrus had fallen by his hand. Parysatis took a cruel revenge on the suspected slayers and mutilators of her son. The details of the expedition of Cyrus and of the events which followed his death may be read in Xenophon’s Anabasis. This attempt of an ambitious young prince to usurp his brother’s throne led ultimately to the greatest results, for by it the path into the centre of the Persian empire was laid open to the Greeks, and the way was prepared for the conquests of Alexander. The character of Cyrus is drawn by Xenophon in the brightest colours. It is enough to say that his ambition was girdled by all those brilliant qualities which win men’s hearts.

Cyrus, a historian of uncertain age, is the author of a work Περί Ανδροχών Ελέεις written in the Aldine collection of the Greek orators, reprinted, more correctly, in Walz’s Greek Orators, viii. p. 386, &c. Fabricius suspects that the anonymous work entitled Προς Ανδροχών Ελέεις was written by the same person. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vi. pp. 102, 128; Walz, l. c.; Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Babelsamkeit, § 104.)

Cyrus (Kūros), the name of several physicians.
1. Cyrus (called also in some editions Syrus), a native of Alexandria, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He was first a physician and philosopher, and afterwards became a monk. He is said to have been an eloquent man, and to have written against Nestorius. (S. Gymnulius, de Illustr. Frr. c. 81.)

2. A physician at Edessa, one of whose medicines is quoted by Aëtius (ii. 2, 91, p. 299), and who attained the dignity of Archiater. He must have lived between the second and fifth centuries after Christ, as the office of Archiater was first conferred on Andromachus, the physician of Nero. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Archiater.)

3. A physician, probably of Lampacus, son of Apollonius, who obtained the dignity of Archiater. He is mentioned in a Greek inscription found at Lampacus, as having, besides many other acts of liberality, presented to the senate one thousand Attic drachmae, i. e. (reckoning the drachma to be worth nine pence three farthings) forty pounds, twelve shillings, and six pence. (Spin. Alcion. Erudit. Antiquit. p. 142, quoted by Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 134, ed. vet.)

4. A physician at Rome in the first century B.C., mentioned in a Latin inscription as having been the physician of Livia, the wife of Drusus.
Cyrus, who afterwards married the emperor Augustus. (Spon, quoted by Fabric, l.c.)

5. Cyrus, St., was a native of Alexandria, where he practised medicine gratuitously and with great reputation. He was a Christian, and took every opportunity of endeavouring to convert his patients from paganism. During the persecution of Diocletian he fled to Arabia, where he was said to heal diseases not so much by his medicines as by miraculous powers. He was put to death with many torments by the command of the prefect Syracuse, in company with several other martyrs, A. D. 300; and his remains were carried to Rome, and there buried. His memory is celebrated on the thirty-first of January both by the Roman and Greek churches. (Acta Sanctar., Irenaeus, Heptap., Bezaeus, Nonn. Sanct., Pastor., Medic., C. B. Carpoquios, De Medicis ob Eccles., De Stoeis habitis.) [W. A. G.]

Cyrus, an architect, who lived at Rome at the time of Cicero, and died on the same day with Clodius, n. c. 52. (Cic. ad Fam., vii. 14, ad Att. ii. 3, ad Qu. Fr. ii. 21, ad Philon. 17.) [L. U.]

Cyrus, Christian. 1. An Egyptian, belonging to the fifth century, afterwards bishop of Smyrna, according to the testimony of Theophanes. His pietical talents procured him the favour of the empress Eudocia. Under Theodosius the Younger he filled the office of governor of the praetorium, and exarch of the city of Constantinople. When Eudocia withdrew to Jerusalem, A. D. 445, he fell under the emperor's displeasure. This led to his retirement from civil offices and his joining the clerical order. It is the express testimony of Theophanes that, by order of Theodosius, he was made bishop of Smyrna. After he was elevated to the episcopal dignity, he is said to have delivered a discourse to the people on Christmas day, in which he betrayed great ignorance of divine things. He lived till the time of the emperor Leo. Suidas says, that on his retirement from civil authority he became εκπαιδευτής τῶν ἱησοῦ εἰς Κωνσταντίας της Φρυγίας; but whether this means bishop of Cotysea in Phrygia is uncertain. It is not known whether he wrote anything. (Cave, Historia Literaria, vol. i.; Suidas, s. v.)

2. An Egyptian bishop belonging to the seventh century. He was first bishop of Phasis A. D. 620, and afterwards patriarch of Alexandria, A. D. 630–640. It was owing to the favour of Heraclius, the emperor, that he was appointed over the latter place. In 633 he attempted to make peace between the Theodosians or Severians and the Catholics, and for that purpose held a synod at Alexandria, in which he proposed a Libellus Satisfactionum in nine chapters. This truce was to be subscribed by the Theodosians, and then they were to be admitted into the bosom of the church. But the seventh chapter favoured the Monothelite heresy, and led to much dispute. In 638, Heraclius published an Esteth or formula of faith drawn up by Sergius, in which he clearly stated that there was but one will in Christ. This was subscribed by Cyrus, a circumstance that served to confirm its truth in the eyes of many. Cyrus died A. D. 640. Besides the Libellus Satisfactionum, he wrote three letters to Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, which are still extant. Both are printed in the Concilia, vol. vi. (Cave, Historia Literaria, vol. i.; Murdock's Mosleim, vol. i.; Gneicker's Handbuch, vol. i.; Gieseler's Text-book, by Cunningham, vol. i.) [S. D.]

Cyrus, Theodorus Prodomus. [Theodorus.]

Cytheria, Cytheria, Cytheria, (Κύθηρα, Κυθήρα, Κυθηρίδα), different forms of a surname of Aphrodite, derived from the town of Cythera in Crete, or from the island of Cythera, where the goddess was said to have first landed, and where she had a celebrated temple. (Hom. Od. vii. 288; Herod. i. 105; Paus. iii. 23, § 1; Aesch. De Myst. ii. 4, 5.) [L. S.]

Cytheris, a celebrated courtesan of the time of Cicero, Antony, and Gallus. She was originally the freedwoman and mistress of Volumnius Etrusculus, and subsequently she became connected in the same capacity with Antony, and with Gallus the poet, to whom, however, she did not remain faithful. Gallus mentioned her in his poems under the name of Lycoris, by which name she is spoken of as being by the Scholasticus Cruquius on Horace. (Sat. i. 2. 55, 10. 77; comp. Serv. ad Verg. Bologn. x. 1; Cic. Phil. ii. 24, ad Att. x. 10, 16, ad Pomp. ix. 26; Plut. Ant. 9; Plin. H. N. viii. 16.) [L. S.]

Cyctherius Philoxenus. [Philoxenus.]

Cyctherius Ptolemaeus. [Ptolemaeus.]

Cytissorus (Κυτίσσωρ), a son of Phrixus and Chalciole or Iph PERSON. (Apollod. i. 9, § 1; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1123, 1149.) [L. S.]

Cyzicus (Κυζικός), a son of Aeneas and Aneto, the daughter of Eusoros. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 948; Val. Flacc. iii. 3.) According to others, he was himself a son of Eusoros and others again make him a son of Apollo by Stilbo. (Hygin. Fab. 16; Conon, Narrat. 41; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. l. c.) He was king of the Doliotes at Cyrus on the Propontis. In compliance with an oracle he received the Argonauts kindly, when they landed in his dominion. When, after their departure, they were cast back upon the shore by a storm and landed again at night-time, they were mistaken by the Doliotes for a hostile people, and a struggle ensued, in which Cyzicus was slain by Hecules or Jason. On the next morning the mistake was discovered, and the Argonauts mourned for three days with the Doliotes over the death of their king, and celebrated funeral games in his honour. (Apollod. i. 9, § 18; Conon, Narrat. 41, who gives a different account.) [L. S.] DABAR, the son of Massagruada, of the family of Masinissa, but whose father was the son of a concubine, was an intimate friend of Bocchus, the king of Mauretania, by whom he was sent to Sulla to negotiate the peace which ended in the surrender of Jugurtha. Dabar was afterwards present at the interview between Bocchus and Sulla. (Sall. J. 108, 109.)

D'CYLIΔ (Δευτερακια), the Dactyls of mount Ida in Phrygia, fabulous beings to whom the discovery of iron and the art of working it by means of fire was ascribed. Their name Dactyls, that is, Fingers, is accounted for in various ways; by their number being five or ten, or by the fact of their serving Helen just as the fingers serve the hand, or by the story of their having lived at the foot of Mount Ida. (Pollux, i. 4; Strab. x. p. 473; Diod. v. 64.) Most of our authorities describe Phrygia as the original seat of the Dactyls. (Diod. vii. 7; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1120; Strab. l. c.) There they were connected with the worship of Iliana. They are sometimes confounded or identified with the Curettes, Corybantes, Cabeiri, and Tεtheliches; or they are described as the fathers of the Cabeiri and Corybantes. (Strab. x. p. 466; Schol. ad Aet. 33; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iv. 153.)

This confusion with the Cabeiri also accounts for Samothrace being in some accounts described as their residence (Diod. v. 64; comp. Arnob. adv. Gent. iii. 41); and Dio- dorus states, on the authority of Cretan historians, that the Dactyls had been occupied in incestuous and other magic pursuits; that thereby they excited great wonder in Samothrace, and that Orpheus was their disciple in these things. Their connexion or identification with the Curettes even led to their being regarded as the same as the Roman Panentes. (Arnob. iii. 40.) According to a tradition in Clemens Alexandrinus (Strab. i. p. 369) the Dactyls did not discover the iron in the Phrygian Ida, but in the island of Cyprus; and others again transfer them to mount Ida in Crete, although the ancient traditions of the latter island scarcely contain any traces of early working in metal there. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 1120; Phiri. H. N. vii. 57.) Their number appears to have originally been three: Celina (the smelter), Dannamunneo (the hammer), and Aenoe (the anvils). (Schol. ad Apollon. i. c.) To these others were subsequently added, such as Scythe, the Phrygian, who invented the smelting of iron (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 262), Hermes (Strab. i. c.), and Delias. (Dioscor. Praep. Eng. x. p. 475.) Apollonius Rhodius mentions the hero Tithias and Cyllenus as the principal Dactyls, and a local tradition of Elia mentioned, besides Hermes, Paeconius, Epimedes, Jasius, and Idas or Acesidas as Dactyls; but these seem to have been beings altogether different from the Idaean Dactyls, for to judge from their names, they must have been healing divinities. (Paus. v. 7. § 4, 14. § 5, 8, § 1, vi. 21 § 5; Strab. viii. p. 355.) Their number is also stated to have been five, ten (five male and five female ones), fifty-two, or even one hundred. The tradition which assigns to them the Cretan Ida, as their habitation, describes them as the earliest inhabitants of Crete, and as having gone thither with Mygdon (or Minos) from Phrygia, and as having discovered the iron in mount Berycuss. (Diod. v. 64; Cic. de Nat. Doer. iii. 16.) With regard to the real nature of the Dactyls, they seem to be no more than the mythical representations of the discoverers of iron and of the art of smelting metals with the aid of fire; for the importance of this art is sufficiently great for the ancients to ascribe its invention to supernatual beings. The original notion of the Dactyls was afterwards extended, and they are said to have discovered various other things which are useful or pleasing to man; thus they are reported to have introduced music from Phrygia into Greece, to have invented rhythm, especially the dactylic rhythm. (Plut. de Mus. 5; Dionys. p. 474, ed. Potschi; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 360.) They were in general looked upon as mysterious sorcerers, and are therefore also described as the inventors of the Ephyseian incantation formulæ; and persons when suddenly frightened used to pronounce the names of the Dactyls as words of magic power. (Plut. de Fae. in Orb. Euen. 30; compare Lobech, de Idaeis Dactyliis; Woecker, Die Aescklg. Triib. p. 108, &c.) [L.S.]

DAIDIAS, a writer on agriculture, mentioned by Varro. (R.R. i. 18.)

DAEDALUS (Δαιδάλος). 1. A mythical personage, under whose name the Greek writers personified the earliest development of the arts of sculpture and architecture, especially among the Athenians and Cretemans.

Though he is represented as living in the early heroic period, the age of Minos and of Theseus, he is not mentioned by Homer, except in one doubtful passage. (See below.)

The ancient writers generally represent Daedalus as an Athenian, of the royal race of the Erechtheidae (Paus. vii. 4. § 5; Plut. These. 18.) Others called him a Cretan, on account of the long time he lived in Crete. (Aeschin. Isid. 12; Eustath. ad Hom. H. vi. 593; Paus. vii. 53. § 3.) According to another account (the full account of him (iv. 76—79), he was the son of Merton, the son of Eupalinus, the son of Erechtheus. (Comp. Plato, Ion. p. 553; Paus. vii. 4. § 5.) Others make him the son of Eupalinus, or of Palamanus. (Paus. iv. 3. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 39, corrected by 274; Snid. v. Περικυκλειη; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 14.) His mother is called Aléippe (Apollod. iii. 15. § 9), or Iphinoé (Pheraeod. ap. Schol. Soph. Oed. Col. 463), or Phraisime (Schol. ad Plut. rep. p. 529.) He devoted himself to sculpture, and made great improvements in the art. He instructed his sister’s son, Calos, Talas, or Perdix, who soon came to surpass him in skill and ingenuity, and Daedalus killed him through envy. (Paus. 9.) Being condemned to death by the Areopagita for this murder, he went to Crete, where the fame of his skill obtained for him the friendship of Minos. He made the well-known wooden cow for Pasiphaë; and when Pasiphaë gave birth to the Minotaur, Daedalus constructed the labyrinth, at Creossus, in which the monster was kept. (Apollod. t. c.; Ovid. Met. viii.: the labyrinth is a fiction, based upon the Egyptian labyrinth, from which Diodorus says that of Daedalus was copied (l. 97): there is no proof that such a building ever existed in Crete. (Hoeck, Creta, i. p. 56.) For his part in this affair, Daedalus was imprisoned by Minos; but Pasiphaë released him, and, as Minos had seized all the ships on the coast of Crete, Dædæhus procured wings for himself and his son Icarus (or made them of wood), and fastened them on with wax. Dædæhus himself flew safe over the Aegean, but, as Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax by which his wings were fastened on was melted, and he dropped down and was drowned in the sea. The Aegean, which was called after him the Icarian sea. According to a more precise version of the story, Pasiphaē furnished Dædæhus with a ship, in which he fled to an island of the Aegean, where Icarus was drowned in a hasty attempt to land. According to both accounts, Dædæhus fled to Sicily, where he was protected by Cocalus, the king of the Sicani, and where he executed many great works of art. When Minos heard where Dædæhus had taken refuge, he sailed with a great fleet to Sicily, where he was treacherously murdered by Cocalus or his daughters. (Hygin. Fab. 40, 44.)

Dædæhus afterwards left Sicily, to join Iolalan, son of Iphicles, in his newly founded colony in Sardinia, and there he executed many other works, which were also called Dædælean in the time of Diodorus (iv. 30), who makes no doubt to refer to the Nymphae, which were also attributed to Iolalan. (Pseud.-Arist. de Mirab. Aescul. 100.) Another account was, that he fled from Sicily, in consequence of the pursuit of Minos, and went with Ariadnæ to Sardinia. (Paus. x. 17. § 3.) Of the stories which connect him with Egypt, the most important are the statements of Diodorus (i. 91), that he executed works there, that he copied his labyrinth from that in Egypt, that the style (σαπφος) of his statues was the same as that of the ancient Egyptian statues, and that Dædæhus himself was worshipped in Egypt as a god.

The later Greeks explained these myths after their usual absurd plan. Thus, according to Lucian, Dædæhus was a great master of astrology, and taught the science to his son, who, scorning above plain truths into transcendental mysteries, lost his reason, and was drowned in the abyss of difficulties. The fable of Pasiphaē is also explained by making her a pupil of Dædæhus in astrology, and the bull is the constellation Taurus. Phaëthous explains the wings of Dædæhus as meaning the invention of sails. (Comp. Paus. ix. 11. § 3.) If these fables are to be explained at all, the only rational interpretation is, that they were poetical inventions, setting forth the great improvement which took place in the mechanical as well as in the fine arts, at the age of which Dædæhus is a personification, and also the support geographical course by which the fine arts were first introduced into Greece.

When, therefore, we are told of works of art which were referred to Dædæhus, the meaning is, that such works were executed at the period when art began to be developed. The exact character of the Dædæhalian epoch of art will be best understood from the statements of the ancient writers respecting his works. The following is a list of the works of sculpture and architecture which were ascribed to him: In Crete, the cow of Pasiphaē and the labyrinth. In Sicily, near Messarit, the Colymbethra, or reservoir, from which a great river, named Abalon, flowed into the sea; near Argizenitum, an impregnable city upon a rock, in which was the royal palace and treasury of Cocalus; in the territory of Salinas a cave, in which the vapour arising from a subterranean fire was received in such a manner, as to form a pleasant vapour bath. He also enlarged the summit of Mount Eryx by a wall, so as to make a firm foundation for the temple of Aphrodite. For this same temple he made a honeycomb of gold which could scarcely be diseased from a distance; a new temple of Aphrodite at Dodonæa adds, that he was said to have executed many more works of art in Sicily, which had perished through the lapse of time. (Diod. l. c.)

Several other works of art were attributed to Dædæhus, in Greece, Italy, Libya, and the islands of the Mediterranean. Temples of Apollo at Capua and Cumæ were ascribed to him. (Sil. Ital. xii. 102; Virg. Aen. vi. 14.) In the islands called Electraeae, in the Adriatic, there were said to be two statues, the one of tin and the other of brass, which Dædæhus made to commemorate his arrival at those islands during his flight from Minos. They were the images of himself and of his son Icarnus. (Pseud.-Arist. de Mirab. Aescul. 91; Steph. Byz., s. e.) At Monemissa in Cαrni there was a statue of Artemis ascribed to him. (Steph. Byz., s. e.) In Egypt he was said to be the architect of a most beautiful propylæum to the temple of Hephaistos at Memphis, for which he was rewarded by the erection of a statue of himself and made by himself, in that temple. (Diod. i. 97.) Scylax mentions an altar on the coast of Libya, which was sculptured with lions and dolphins by Dædæhus. (Periplus, p. 53, ed. Hudson.) The temple of Artemis Britomartis, in Crete, was ascribed to Dædæhus. (Solimnus, 11.) There is a passage in which Pausanias mentions all the wooden statues which he believed to be the genuine works of Dædæhus (ix. 46. § 2), namely, two in Bocotia, a Hercules at Thebes, respecting which there was a curious legend (Paus. ix. ii. §§ 2, 3; Apollod. ii. 6. § 3), and a Tropæomus at Lethæia; in Crete, an Artemis Britomartis at Olus, and an Athena at Cænus (the χρυσα of Ariadne is spoken of below); at Delos, a small terminal wooden statue of Aphrodite, which was said to have been made by Dædæhus for Ariadne, who carried it to Delos when she fled with Theseus. Pausanias adds, that these were all the works of Dædæhus which remained at his time, for that the statue was recovered by the Argives in the Heraeum and that which Antiphemus had removed from the Sicaniæ city, Omphec, to Gelos, had perished through time. (Comp. viii. 46. § 2.) Elsewhere Pausanias mentions, as works ascribed to Dædæhus, a folding seat (θόρυβος δαλαξίαν) in the temple of Athena Polias at Athens (i. 27. § 1), a wooden statue of Hera at Corinth (ii. 4. § 5), and another on the confines of Messeniæ and Arcadie (viii. 33. § 2).

The inventions and improvements attributed to Dædæhus are both artistic and mechanical. He was the reputed inventor of carpentry and its chief tools, the saw, the axe, the plumb-line, the auger or gimlet, and glue. (Hesych. s. v. θέρυς; Plin. H. N. vii. 56; Varro, op. Choris. p. 106, ed. Putsch.) He was said to have been taught the art of carpentry by Minerva. (Hygin. Fab. 69.) Others attribute the invention of the saw to Periök or Talus, the nephew of Dædæhus. (Periök. I.) In naval architecture, the invention of the mast and yards is ascribed to Dædæhus, that of the sails to Icarnus. (Plin. l. c.) In statutory, the improvements attributed to Dædæhus were the opening of the eyes and of the feet, which had been formerly closed (κοιμώδης, κοίμησις χωρίου, the figures of Daedalus were called δαίμονεστα, and the extending of the bands, which had been formerly placed down close to the sides (κατακολλημα, καθαίρω τελεοεις κακοκαθαρίας, Dial. i. c.; Suid. s. v. Δαίμονεστα). In consequence of these improvements, the ancient writers speak of the statues of Daedalus as being distinguished by an expression of life and even of divine inspiration.

(Paus. ii. 4, § 5; Plato, passim, and particularly Men. p. 97, ed. Steph.; Aristot. Politi. i. 4: the last two passages seem to refer to automata, which we know to have been called Daedaliam imagos: Aristotle mentions a wooden figure of Aphrodite, which was moved by quickeriver within it, as a work ascribed to Daedalus, de Anim. i. 3, § 9: see further, Janius, C. U. C. (p. 64.) The difficult passage in Plato (Hipp. Meg. iii. 281, d.) is rightly explained by Thiersot, as being only comparative, and as meant not in disparagement of Daedalus, but in praise of the artists of Plato’s time. The material in which the statues of Daedalus were made, was wood. The only exception worth noticing is in the passage of Pausanias (ix. 40, § 2), παροικόν δέ [Καισαρια] καί τῆς Ἀρδείας χώρας, δό καὶ καὶ Ὀμοροὺς ἐν Ἰακείδε μεμήγατο σπουδαιότατον, ἐπεξεργαζόμενον ἑστὼ ἐπὶ Λευκοῦ λίθου. (Comp. v. 4, § 3.) The passage of Homer is in the description of the shield of Achilles (II. xviii. 590—598):

Ἐν δὲ χρυσὸν πολλὴν περικυκτὸν ἀρμενίσμας, Τῆς τελοῦν οὖν τοῦ ἑν Κυκεοῦ εὐρήχων Δαίμονεστα περιτύπωσεν κακοκαθαρίας Ἀράδην.

Now the mention of a group of dancers as a work of Daedalus, the material, white stone,—the circumstance of the poet’s representing Hephaestus as copying the work of a mortal artist,—and the absence of any other mention of Daedalus in Homer,—all this is, at the least, very suspicious. It cannot be explained by taking χρυσὸν to mean a sort of dance which Daedalus invented (�行εροειν), for we never hear of Daedalus in connexion with dancing (Böttiger, Anm. 46), and a sufficient number of examples can be produced from Homer of δαίμονεστα meaning to make or manufacture. Unless the passage be an interpolation, the best explanation is, that χρυσὸν means simply a place for dancing; and, further, it is not improbable that Δαίμονεστα may be nothing more than an epithet of Hephaestus, who is the great artist in Homer, and that the verb χωρεῖν, which in the Daedalus was personified, had its origin in the misunderstanding of this very passage. At all events, the group seen by Pausanias at Cnossus, if it really was a group of sculpture, must have been the work of an artist later than the Daedalian period, or at the very end of it.

From these statements of the ancient writers it is not difficult to form some idea of the period in the history of art which the name of Daedalus represents. The name itself, like the others which are associated with it, such as Empelus, implies skill.

The earliest works of art, which were attributed to the gods, were called δαίμονεστα. Passing from mythology to history, we find sculpture taking its rise in idolatry; but the earliest idols were nothing more than blocks of wood or stone, which were worshipped under the name of some god. (Paus. vii. 22, § 3.) The next effort was to express the attributes of each particular divinity, which was at first done only by forming an image of the head, probably in order to denote purely intellectual attributes: hence the origin of terminal busts, and the reason for their remaining in use long after the art of sculpturing the whole figure had attained to the highest perfection. But there were some deities for the expression of whose attributes the bust was not sufficient, but the whole human figure was required. In the earliest attempts to execute such figures, wood would naturally be selected as the material, on account of the ease of working it. They were ornamented with real drapery and bright colours. It was to such works, especially, that the name δαίμονεστα was applied, as we are informed by Pausanias (ix. 3, § 2), who adds, that they were so called before Daedalus was born at Athens. The accuracy and the expression of such images was restricted not only by the limited skill of the artist, but also, as we see so strikingly in Egyptian sculpture, by the religious laws which bound him to certain forms. The period represented by the name of Daedalus was that in which such forms were first broken through, and the attempt was made to give a natural and lifelike expression to statues, accompanied, as such a development of any branch of art always is, by a great improvement in the mechanics of art. The period when this development of art took place, and the degree of foreign influence implied in the fables about Daedalus, are very difficult questions, and cannot be discussed within the limits of this article. The ancient traditions certainly point to Egypt as the source of Greek art. (See especially Böttiger, Anm. 46.) But without regarding this point in any way, we may refer to the Egyptian and Etruscan and earliest Greek antiquities, as giving some vague idea of what is meant by the Daedalian style of sculpture. The remains called Cyclopean give a similar notion of the Daedalian architecture. The Daedalian style of art continued to prevail and improve down to the beginning of the fifth century B.C., and the artists of that long period were called Daedalids, and claimed an actual descent from Daedalus, according to the well-known custom by which art was hereditary in certain families. This genealogy was carried down as late as the time of Socrates, who claimed to be a Daedalid. The most important of the Daedalids, besides his son Icarus, and his nephew Talos or Perdix, were Scyllus and Diphyes, whom some made the sons of Daedalus (Paus. i. 15, § 1), Endoeus of Athens (Paus. i. 26, § 3), Learchus of Rhigium (Paus. iii. 17, § 6), and Oinatas of Aegina. (Paus. v. 25, § 7.) All these, however, lived long after the period in which Daedalus is placed. Besides Icarus, Daedalus was said to have had a son, Japyx, who founded Iapygia. (Strab. vi. p. 379; Eustath. ad Dionys. Perip. 379.)

A δαίμονεστα of the Athenian φωλίκη Κέρκυρας bore the name of Δαίμονεστα (Meurs. de Att. Perr. s. n.). Festas called δαίμονεστα were kept in different parts of Greece.

2. Of Sicyon, a statuary in bronze, the son and disciple of Patrocles, who is mentioned by Pline among the artists of the 5th Olympiad. Daedalus erected a trophy for the Eleusians in the Altes after a victory over the Lacedaemonians in the same year, which lasted n. c. 401—399. Besides this trophy, Daedalus made several statues of athletes, and DAIAPHANTUS. 929

DAIAPHANTUS (Δαιφαντός, a. Thicen, who

DAIMON (Δαίμων), a divinity connected with the Eleusinian mysteries. According to Pausanias (i. 38. § 7) she was a daughter of Oceanus, and became by Hermes the mother of Eleusis; but others called her a sister of Styx; while a third account represents her as identical with Aphrodite, Dometar, Hor, or Persphone. (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 847; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 648.) [L. S.]

DAIUS (Δαίους), of Colonae, apparently an historian, who wrote on the history of his native city. (Strab. xiii. p. 612.) [L. S.]

DAIETONAS (Δαιετόνας), a statue of Sicyon, made a statue of the Eleusinian thespian Teutumus (Strab. ii. p. 70), and Androctonus reigned at the time when Seleucus was laying the foundation of the subsequent greatness of his empire, about B.C. 312. (Justin. xiv. 4.) This fact at once shows the impossibility of what Cusano described (ad Diog. Laert. i. 1) as an attempt to prove, that the historian Ephorus had stolen whole passages from Daimachus's work, since Ephorus lived and wrote before Daimachus. The latter wrote a work on India, which consisted of at least two books. He had probably acquired or at least increased his knowledge of those eastern countries during his embassy; but Strabo nevertheless places him at the head of those who had circulated false and fabulous accounts about India. (Comp. Athen. ix. p. 394; Harpocr. s. v. Ἕφυθεις; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhode i. 588.) We have also mention of a very extensive work on sieges (πολιορκητικά διηγήματα) by one Daimachus, who is probably the same as the author of the Indica. If the reading in Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Λακεδαίμων) is correct, the work on sieges consisted of at least 56 (Δ) books. (Comp. Eustath. ad Hom. ii. 681.) The work on India is lost, but the one on sieges may possibly be still concealed somewhere for Marcus (in Cretzer's Vox Aeterna, p. 1330) states, that he saw a MS. of it. It may be that our Daimachus is the same as the one quoted by Plutarch (Conjurer, Solon, ccm Publ. 4) as an authority on the military exploits of Solon. In another passage of Plutarch (Lycurg. 12) one Laimachus (according to the common reading) is mentioned as the author of a work περὶ εἰςκειμένων, and modern critics have changed the name Laimachus into Daimachus, and consider him to be the same as the historian. In like manner it has been proposed in Diogenes Laertius (i. 50) to read Δαιμαχος οἱ Πλατανεῖς instead of Δαιμαχος οἱ Πλαταιοῖς, but these are only conjectural emendations. [L. S.]

was slain at the battle of Mantinea, B. C. 362. It is said that Epaminondas, after he had received his mortal wound, asked successively for Diaphantus and Iphialdês, and, when he heard of their death, advised his countrymen to make peace. (Plut. Apol. 24; Ael. V. H. xii. 3.) [E. E.]

DAIPPUS or DAIPPIUS (Δαίππος), a statuary who made statues of athletes (Paus. vi. 12. § 3, 16. § 4), and a statue which Pliny (xxxiv. 3. s. 19. § 26) calls Periysyomenon, for which Brother would read παρακριβεύως. He is mentioned in two other passages of Pliny (i. c. 19, 19. § 7), where all the MSS. give Laippus, through a confusion between Δ and Ά. From these two passages it appears that he was a son of Lysippus, and that he flourished in the 12th Olympiad, i.e. 506, and onwards. [P. S.]

DAIION, a writer on geography and botany, who is quoted by Pliny. (H. N. vi. 36, xxi. 75.) He is mentioned among the foreign authors made use of by Pliny, and must have lived in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. O.]

DAIMONIUS. [DAIMONIUS.]

DAIMONIUS. [DAIMONIUS.]

DAMASCUS (Δαμασκός). 1. King of Ilyasus in Rhodes (contemporary with Ardas, king of Lydia, and Phraeretis, king of Media), married, in obedience to the Delphic oracle, the daughter of Aristotle Messene, and from this marriage sprang the family of the Diogenides, who were celebrated for their victories at Olympia. [ARISTOGENES.] The following is their genealogy.

Aristogenes. daughter Damasgus (Diogonos).

Dorius.

Damasgus.

Diogoras.

Achaeus.

Dorius.

Echeus. Peisodorus.

In this pedigree the name of the first Diogonos is inserted by Clavier and Clinton, to supply one generation, which seems to be wanting in Pausanias.

2. Of the second Damasgus nothing is known but his name.

3. The third Damasgus was victor in the panathenaeum on the same day on which his brother Achaeus was victor in boxing. [DIOROGAS. (Pind. Ol. 7, and Schoi.; Paus. ii. 24, § 1, ed. vi. §§ 1, 2; Athen. V. H. x. 1; Cic. Tusc. ii. 46; Clinton. Fast. Hell. i. pp. 234, 255.) [P. S.]

DAMASGUS (Δαμασκός), the author of thirteen epigrams in the Greek Anthology, from the contents of some of which his time is fixed at the end of the third century B.C. He was included in the Garland of Meleager. It is not known whether he is the same person as the Damasgus who is cited by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Άρτεμις). The name is also given by the Scholiast to Apollonius Rhodius (i. 224) in the form Demasgus. (Brunck, Auct. ii. 38, iii. 331; 3 o

Rhodians missed one trireme, and not knowing whether it had been taken by the enemy, they sent out Da mogaros with six quick-sailing vessels to search for it. Mithridates attacked him with twenty-five ships, and Damagoras retreated, till about sunset the king's fleet withdrew. Damagoras then sailed forth again, sunk two of the king's ships, and drove two others upon the coast of Lycia, and in the night returned to Rhodes. (Appian, Mithrid.

DAMALIS (Δαμαλίς), the wife of the Athene general, Chares. She accompanied her hus band, and while he was stationed with his fleet near Byzantium, she died. She is said to have been buried in a neighbouring place, the name of Damalis, and to have been honoured with a monument of the shape of a cow. According to a mythical tradition, Io on her wandering landed at Damalis, and the Chalcedonians erected a bronze cow on the spot. (Symeon Mag. de Constant. Por

DAMARATUS. [Demaratus.]

DAMARET. [Demaret.]

DAMASCenus, JOANNES ('Ιωάννης Δα μασκενος), a voluminous ecclesiastical writer, who flourished during the first half of the eighth cen tury after Christ, in the reigns of Leo Isauricus and Constantine VII. He was a native of Da mascus, whence he derived his surname, and be longed to a family of high rank. His controversial powers procured him the surname of Chrysocrassos, but he was also stigmatized by his enemies with various derogatory nicknames, such as Sarabata, Mansur, and Arcas. He devoted himself to the service of the church, and after having obtained
the dignity of presbyter, he entered the monastery of St. Saba, at Jerusalem, where he spent the re mainder of his life, devoting himself to literary pursuits, especially the study of theology. He seems to have died, at the earliest, about A. D. 756, and his tomb was shown near St. Saba down to a very late period. He is regarded as a saint both by the Greek and Latin churches; the former cel brates his memory on the 29th of November and the 4th of December, and the latter on the 6th of May. His life, which is still extant, was written by Joannes, patriarch of Jerusalem; but little conf idence can be placed in it, as the facts are there mixed up with the most incredible stories.
It is printed in Surina's Lives of the Saints, under the 6th of May.

All the writers who mention Joannes Damas cenus agree in asserting, that he surpassed all his contemporaries as a philosopher and by the exten sive range of his knowledge. This reputation is sufficiently supported by the great number of his works which have come down to us, though he was extremely deficient in critical judgment, which is most apparent in the stories which he relates in confirmation of the doctrines he propounds. He was a strong opponent of those who insisted upon removing all images from the Christian churches, and upon abolishing prayers for the dead. We pass over the several collections of his works,
as well as the separate editions of single treatises, and only refer our readers to the best edition of his works, which was prepared and edited by Michael le Quien, Paris, 1712, in 2 vols. fol., though it is far from containing all the works that are mentioned in his treatise. They are buried in MS. in the various libraries of Europe. It con tains the following works:
1. Κεφαλαία φιλοσο
φική, or the main points of philosophy and dialec tics.
2. Περὶ αἰρέσεως, on heresies and their origin.
3. Ἐνδοτικές διαρκείς τῆς διοδοθὲν πίστεως,
an accurate exposition of the orthodox faith.
4. Περὶ τῶν διαδαλλώσεως τὰς ἁγίας ἑιδονῶν, as treatise against those who opposed the use of images in churches. 5. Λήθες περὶ ἄνθρωπο
νομάτων, that is, a confession of faith. 6. Τίμαι, ὁ ἄνδρας, a work against the Jacobites and Monophysites, or Eutychians. 7. Κατὰ Μαρκυλίων ἐκθέσεως, a discourse against the Manichaeans. 8. Περὶ τῶν Δαρκονίων καὶ Χριστιανών, a dialogue between a Samaritan and a Christian. 9. Περὶ διακονίων, a fragment on dragons. 10. Περὶ ἁγίας τριάδος,
on the holy trinity. 11. Περὶ τῶν τριαστῶν ἁμάρτων, on the hymn entitled Trisagion. 12. Περὶ τῶν
ἀγίων εὐσεβῶν, on fasts. 13. Περὶ τῶν ὅστις τῆς πνευμώνων φύσεως, on the eight spirits of wick edness. 14. Εἰσαγωγή δογμάτων τουχειδίων, elementary instruction in the Christian dogmas.
15. Περὶ εὐθύνης φύσεως, a treatise directed against the Acheiropoiets. 16. Περὶ τῶν ἐν τῷ Κριτῇ Ἰωάννου ἐνεργείων καὶ λοιπῶν φύσεως διδάσκαλων, on the twofold will and action of Christ, and on the other physical properties.
17. "Εκεῖ διαβολεύσαι κατὰ διάτυπα αἰρέσεως τῶν Νεστοριανῶν, against the heresies of the Nestoriana. 10. Ανατροπή τῶν ἁγίων εὐσεβῶν,
a fragment on the nature of man.
21. A treatise on those who had died in the faith of Christ, and on the manner in which their souls may be benefited by masses and alms. 22. A letter on confession. 23. Αἰχμάς ἁπαθείως περὶ τῶν ἁγίων καὶ σεπτῶν εἰδώλων, an oration on the veneration due to sacred images. 24. An epis tle on the same subject, addressed to Theophilus.
25. Περὶ τῶν ἁγίων, on the feast of unleavened bread. 26. An epistle addressed to Zacharias, bishop of the Doni. 27. An exposition of the Christian faith: it is only in Latin, and a transla tion from an Arabic MS. 28. Some poems in imambles on sacred subjects. 29. An abridgment of the interpretation of the letters of St. Paul by Joannes Chrysostomus. 30. Περὶ παραλλαγά sacred parallels, consisting of passages of Scripture compared with the doctrines of the early fathers.

DAMASCenus, NICOLAUS (Νικολάου Δα μασκενος), a famous Greek polyhistor, who lived in the time of Herod the Great and the emperor Augustus, with both of whom he was connected by intimate friendship. He was, as his name in dicates, a native of Damascus, and the son of An tipater and Statroche. His parents were distin guished no less for their personal character than for their wealth, and his father, who was a highly esteemed orator, was not only invested with the highest dignities in his native place, but was employed on various embassies. Nicolaus and his brother Ptolemaeus were instructed from their childhood in everything that was good and useful.
Nicolaus in particular shewed great talents, and even before he attained the age of puberty, he obtained the reputation of being the most accomplished among the youths of his age; and at that early age he composed tragedies and comedies, which met with general applause. But he soon abandoned these poetical pursuits, and devoted himself to rhetoric, music, mathematics, and the philosophy of the time. He was fond of his philosophical studies in common with Nicolaus, and the amicable relation between the two men was strengthened by these common pursuits. In b. c. 14, he prevailed upon Herod to interfere with Agrippa on behalf of the citizens of Ilium, who were to be severely punished for having been apparently wanting in attention to Agrippa's wife, Julia, the daughter of Augustus. It was about the same time that he used his influence with Herod to prevail upon Agrippa to put an end to the annoyances to which the Jews in Ionia were constantly exposed. In a conversation with Herod Nicolaus once directed his attention to the advantages which a prince might derive from history; and the king, who was struck by the truth of the observation, entreated Nicolaus to write a history. Nicolaus complied with the request, and compiled a voluminous work on universal history, the accomplishment of which, in his opinion, surpassed even the hardest of the labours of Heracles. In b. c. 13, when Herod went to Rome to pay Augustus a visit, he took Nicolaus with him, and both travelled in the same vessel. On that occasion, Nicolaus made Augustus a present of the finest fruit of the palm-tree, which Augustus henceforth called Nicola, a name by which that fruit was known down to the middle ages. Some writers speak of cakes (φάκους άντερ) which Nicolaus presented to Augustus, but this is evidently a mistake. (Suid. s. a. Νικόλαος; Athen. xiv. p.552; Plat. Sympos. viii. 4; Iudor. Orig. xvii. 7; Plin. H. N. xii. 4.) When Herod, by his success against some Arab chiefs, had drawn upon himself the enmity of Augustus, and the latter declined to receive any ambassadors, Herod, who knew the influence which Nicolaus possessed with the emperor, sent him to negotiate. Nicolaus, by very skilful management, succeeded in turning the anger of Augustus against the Arabs, and in restoring the friendship between Augustus and Herod. When Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Herod, were suspected of plotting against their father, Nicolaus endeavoured to induce the king not to proceed to extremities against his sons, but in vain: the two sons were put to death, and Nicolaus afterwards degraded himself by defending and justifying this cruel act of his royal friend.

On the death of Herod, Archelaus succeeded to the throne, chiefly through the exertions of Nicolaus. We have no account of what became of Nicolaus after this event, and how long he survived it.

Plutarch (I. c.) describes Nicolaus as possessing a tall and slender figure, with a red face. In private life, as well as in intercourse with others, he was a man of the most amiable disposition: he was modest, just, and liberal in a high degree; and although he disdained himself of his flattery and partiality towards Herod, he neglected the great and powerful at Rome so much, that he is censured for having preferred the society of plebeians to that of the nobles. The information which we have here given is derived partly from a life of Nicolaus, written by himself, of which a considerable portion is still extant, from Suidas, and from Josephus. (Antiq. Jud. xvi. 15, 16, 17, xvii. 16.) The writings of Nicolaus were partly poetical, partly historical, and partly philosophical. With regard to his tragedies, we know only the title of one, called Λεγέδαντα or Λεγέδαοι (Bustath. ad loc. 926), which has been lost. A considerable fragment of one of his comedies, which consists of 44 lines, and gives us a favourable opinion of his poetical talent, is preserved in Stobaeus. The most important, however, among his works were those of an historical nature. 1. The first is his autobiography, which we have already mentioned. 2. A universal history, which consisted of 144 books. (Athen. vi. p. 249.) Suidas states, that it contained only 80 books, but the 124th is quoted by Josephus. (Antiq. Jud. xii. 3.) The title ιστορία καθολική, under which this work is mentioned by Suidas, does not occur elsewhere. As far as we can judge from the fragments still extant, it treated chiefly of the history of the Asiatic nations; but whether the ιστορίαι τοιαύται of which Photius (Bibl. Cod. 189) speaks is the same as the universal history, or only a portion of it, or whether it was a separate work, cannot be determined with any certainty. The universal history was composed at the request of Herod, and seems to have been a hurried compilation, in which Nic- olaus, without exercising any criticism, incorporated whatever he found related by earlier historians. 3. A life of Augustus. This work is lost, like the rest, with the exception of excerpts which were made from it by the command of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. These excerpts show that the author was not much concerned about accuracy, and that the biography was more of a eulogy than of a history. Some writers have been of opinion, that this biography formed part of the universal history; but there seems to be no ground for this hypothesis. 4. A life of Herod. There is no express testimony for a separate work of this name, but the way in which Josephus speaks of the manner in which Nicolaus treated Herod, and defended his cruelties, or passed them over in silence, if he could not defend them, surely admits of a doubt as to the existence of a separate work on the life of Herod. 5. Ηθος παραδοξός παραγεγρηκτικόν, that is, a collection of singular customs among the various nations of the earth. It was dedicated to Herod (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 189), and Stobaeus has preserved many passages from it. Valesius and others think that these passages did not originally belong to a separate work, but were extracted from the universal history. Of his philosophical works, which consisted partly of independent treatises and partly of paraphrases of Aristotle's works, no fragments are extant, except a few statements in Simplicius' commentaries on Aristotle. The extant fragments of Nicolaus were first edited in a Latin version by N. Cragius, Geneva, 1583, 4to. The Greek originals with a Latin translation were first edited by H. Valesius in his "Excerpta Polybii, Didobi," &c., Paris, 1634, 4to. The best and most complete edition, with Latin translations by Valesius and H. G. Stobaeus, is that of J. C. Orrili, Leipsig, 1804, 8vo. It also contains a good dissertation on the life and writings of Nicolaus by the Abbé Serim, which originally appeared in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, vi. p. 466, &c. In 1811, Orelli published a supplement to his edition, which contains notes and emendations by A. Cony, Creuzer, Schweighäuser, and others. [L. S.]

DAMASCUS (Δαμασκαο), the Syrian (δ Ἀραμ) of Damascus, whence he derived his name, the last of the renowned teachers of the Neo-Platonic philosophy at Athens, was born towards the end of the fifth century of the Christian era. His national Syrian name is unknown. He repaired at an early period to Alexandria, where he first studied rhetoric under the rhetorician Theon, and mathematics and philosophy under Ammonius, the son of Hermaeus (see p. 146, n.), and Isidorus. From Alexandria Damascius went to Athens, where Neo-Platonism existed in its setting glory under Marinus and Zenodotus, the successors of the celebrated Proclus. He became a disciple of both, and afterwards their successor (whence his surname of δ Ἀδαμσεσ), and he was the man who taught in the cathedral of Plato's philosophy at Athens; for in the year 529 the emperor Justinian closed the heathen schools of philosophy at Athens, and most of the philosophers, and among them Damascius, emigrated to king Chosroes of Persia. At a later time (533), however, Damascius appears to have returned to the West, since Chosroes had stipulated in a treaty of peace that the religion and philosophy of the heathen vortaries of the Platonic philosophy should be tolerated by the Byzantine emperor. (Brucker, Hist. Philos. ill. p. 345; Agathia, Scholaet. ill. p. 49, Sc., p. 67, Sc.) We have no further particulars of the life of Damascius; we only know that he did not, after his return, found any school either at Athens or at any other place, and that thus the heathen philosophy ended with its extinction in Asia in the 6th century. No Platonic ideas from the school of Proclus were preserved in the Christian church down to the later times of the middle ages.

Only one of Damascius's numerous writings has yet been printed, namely, "Doubts and Solutions of the first Principles, (Ἀσβία καὶ Λογία τῶν Πλατωνίων φράσεων), which was published (but not complete) by J. Kopp, Franceol. 1828. 8vo. In this treatise Damascius inquires, as the title intimates, respecting the first principle of all things, which he finds to be an imponderable and unspeakable divine depth, being all in one, but undivided. The struggles which he makes in this treatise to force into words what is not susceptible of expression, have been blamed by many of the modern philosophers as being somewhat tautology, but received the just admiration of others. This work is, moreover, of no small importance for the history of philosophy, in consequence of the great number of notices which it contains concerning the older philosophers.

The rest of Damascius's writings are for the most part of commentaries on works of Aristotle and Plato: of these the most important are: 1. Ἀσβία καὶ Λογία εἰς τῶν Πλατωνίων Παρεξήγησιν in a manuscript at Venice. 2. A continuation and completion of Proclus's commentary on Plato's Parmenides, printed in Cony's edition of the works of Damascius, Paris, 1827, 8vo., vol. vi. p. 255, &c. We have access to some commentaries of Damascius on Plato's Timaeus, Archytas and other dialogues, which seem to be lost. 3. Of the commentaries of Damascius on Aristotle's works we only know of the commentary on Aristotle's treatise "de Coelo," of which perhaps a fragment is extant in the treatise περὶ τῶν γεννητῶν, published by Iriarte (Catal. Miss. Bibl. Madrid, i. p. 130) under the name of Damascius. Such a commentary of Damascius as extant in manuscript (παραβαλλόμενος, in Aristot. lib. ii. de Coelo) is also mentioned by Labbeus (Bibl. Nova. MSS. pp. 119, 169). The writings of Damascius περὶ καταστάσεως, περὶ τοῖν ήκοιν, and περὶ δύναμιν, cited by Simplicius in his commentary on Aristotle's Physics (vol. 189, b. 183, a. 189, b.), are perhaps only parts of his commentaries on the Aristotelian writings. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 294) attributes them to his composition as part of the παραβαλλόμενα attributed to Damascius by Suidas, 1. p. 506), of which Photius (Cod. 242, comp. 181) has preserved a considerable fragment, and gives at the same time some important information respecting the life and studies of Damascius. This biography appears to have been reckoned by the ancients the most important of the works of Damascius. 5. Αὐτογενῆ, in 4 books, of which Photius (Cod. 130) also gives an account and specifies the respective titles of the books. (Comp. Westermann, Iterum Mirabil. Scriptores, Proleg. p. xxix.) Photius praises the succinct, clear, and pleasing style of this work; though, as a Christian, he in other respects vehemently attacks the heathen philosopher and the tendency of his writings. 6. Besides all these writings, there is lastly a fragment of a commentary on Hippocrates's "Aphorisms," in a manuscript produced, with others of his in the library at Constantinople. (See below.) There is also an epigram in the Greek Anthology (ii. 179, ed. Jacobus, comp. Jacob. Comment. in Anthol. xiii. p. 890) likewise ascribed to him. For further particulars, see Kopp's Preface to his edition of Damascius, περὶ πρωτών δράσεων, and Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 79, 83, 230. Among the discourses of Damascius the most important are Simplicius, the celebrated commentator on Aristotle, and Eulamius. [A. S.]

DAMAŬSCIUS (Δαμασκός), the author of a short Greek commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, first published by F. R. Dietz in his Scholia in Hippocr. et Gal. Regim. Press, 1834, 8vo. This Damascius is perhaps the same as the celebrated Neo-Platonic philosopher mentioned above; but the matter is quite problematical. [W. A. G.]

DAMASIPPUS (Δαμασιππός), a Macedonian, who after having assassinated the members of the synedrioi of Phaceus, a Macedonian town, fled with his wife and children from his country, when Ptolemy Physson came to Greece and raised an army of mercenaries, Damasippus also engaged in his service, and accompanied him to Crete and Libya. (Polyb. xxxii. 25.) [L. S.]

DAMASIPPUS, L. JUVENII BRUTUS. [Brutus, No. 19.]

DAMASIPPUS, LICINIIUS. 1. LICINIUS DAMASIPPUS, a Roman senator of the party of Pompey, who was with king Juba in n. c. 49. During Caesar's African war, in n. c. 47, we again meet him among the enemies of Caesar. Damasippus had quitted Italy and sailed to Spain, where they were thrown back by a storm to Hippo, where the fleet of P. Sillus was stationed. The the jurisdiction of the civil magistrate, and re-dered amenable to their own courts alone.

The extant works of Damasus are:

I. Seven epistles written between the years 373—384, addressed to the bishops of Illyria, to Paulinus, to Acholus and other bishops of Macdonla, and to St. Jerome, together with an Epistola Syriaca against Apollinaris. These refer, for the most part, to the controversies then agitating the religious world, and are not without value as materials for ecclesiastical history. The second, to Paulinus, consists of two parts, which in some editions are arranged separately, so as to make the whole number amount to eight. In addition to the above, which are entire, we have several fragments of letters, and it is known that many have perished. See the "Epistola Pontifi-

II. Upwards of forty short poems in various measures and styles, religious, descriptive, lyrical, and panegyric, including several epitaphs. None of these, notwithstanding the testimony of St. Jerone and other ecclesiastics, are authentic, and are remarkable for their scarcity in the landscap of sacred poetry, and have not, as some authentic epigrams of the same class, the same degree of excellence. The rules of classical prosody are freely disregarded: we observe a propensity to indulge in jingling cadences, thus leading the way to the rhyming versification of the monks, and here and there some specimens of acrostic dexte-riety. These pieces were published separately in several of the early editions of the Christian poets; by A. M. Merenda, Rom. fol. 1754; and a selection comprising his "Sanctorum Elogia" is included in the "Opera Veterum Poëtarum Latinorum" by Maittaire, 2 vols. fol. Lond. 1713.

Among the lost works of this author are those reckoned several epistles; a tract de Virginitate, in which prose and poetry were combined; summaries in hexameter verse of certain books of the Old and New Testament (Hieron. Epist. ad Euseb. de Custod. Virgini., and Acta Martyrum Romanorum Petri Eusebios et Marcellini (Euguiart, op. Surium, de probatis sanct. Hist. vol. iii. p. 561).

Several De creta; a book entitled Liber de Vitis Pontificum Romanorum; and all the epistles not named above are deemed spurious.

The earliest edition of the collected works is that prepared by Sarrasinius and published by Ubaldisus under the patronage of cardinal Francisco Barberini, Rom. 410. 1658. They are con-

DAMOTELIS (Σαμωτέλης). 1. A Spartan, through whose treachery, according to one account, Cleomenes was defeated by Antigonus at the battle of Sellasia, b. c. 222. (Phylarch. op. Phil. Cleomenis, p. 65, &c.) Damotelles is said in Plutarch to have had the office of commander of the Cryptae (see Dist. of Ant. a. c.), which would qualify him for the service of reconnoitring assigned to him by Cleomenes before the engagement.

2. An Aeolian, was one of the ambassadors whom his countrymen, by the advice of the Athenians, sent to Rome in b. c. 190 to negotiate with the senate for peace. He returned in the ensuing year without having accomplished his object. M. Fulvius, the consul, having crossed over from Italy against them, the Aeolians once more despatched Damotelles to Rome; but, having ascertained on his arrival at Leucas that Fulvius was on his way through Epirus to besiege Ambracia, he thought it better to return to Rome than to encounter the Roman general. We hear of him again among those who came to Fulvius at Ambracia to sue for peace, which was granted by the consul and afterwards ratified by the senate. [DANIS, No. 2.] (Polyb. xxxi. 3, xxxii. 8, 12, 13; Liv. xxxvii. 8.) [E. B.]

DAMOXENUS (Σαμωξανος) was an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, and perhaps partly of the middle. Two of his plays, entitled Συντρόφος and Σαρτος πρινθρός, are mentioned by Athenaeus, who quotes a long passage from the former, and a few lines from the latter. Elsewhere he calls him, less correctly, Damoxenus. The longer fragment was first published, with a Latin version, by Hugo Grotius, in his Excerpta ex Plutarchi et Cleomedis Gracici, Par. 1626, 4to. (Ath. i. p. 15, b., iii. p. 101, f., xi. p. 469, a.; Smith, s. v.; Endoe. p. 131; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Comm. Græc. i. p. 484, &c., iv. p. 529, &c., p. 843, &c.) [P. S.]

DANAB (Δανάβ). See ACRISIUS. We may add here the story which we meet with at a later time in Italy, and according to which Danais went to Italy, built the town of Arden, and married Pilanmus, by whom she became the mother of Daunus, the ancestor of Tuscan. (Verg. Aen. vii. 427, 409, with Servius's note.) [L. S.]

DANATDES (Δανάτδης), the fifty daughters of Danais, whose names are given by Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 5) and Hyginus (P. ld. 170), though they are not the same in both lists. They were betrothed to the fifty sons of Aegeus, but were compelled by their father to promise him to kill their husbands on the first night, with the swords which he gave them. They fulfilled their promise, and cut off the heads of their husbands with the exception of Hypermenaestra alone, who was married to Lynceus, and whom he spared his life. (Pind. Nem. x. 7.) According to some accounts, Amynome and Borhyce also did not kill their husbands. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ix. 200; Eustath. ad Dion. Per. 380.) Hypermenaestra was punished by her father with imprisonment, but was afterwards restored to her husband Lynceus. The Danides buried the corpses of their victims, and were purified from their crime by Hermes and Athena at the command of Zeus. Danais afterwards found it difficult to obtain husbands for his daughters, and he invited men to public contests, in which his daughters were given as prizes to the victors. (Pind. Pyth. ix. 117.)
DANAUS.

Pindar mentions only forty-eight Dænæs as having obtained husbands in this manner, for Hypermnestra and Amymone are not included, since the former was already married to Lyneus and the latter to Poseidon. Pausanias (vii. 1. § 3. Comp. iii. 12. § 2.; Herod. ii. 96) mentions, that Automate and Sceao were married to Archite and Archander, the sons of Achæna. According to the Scholiast on Euporides (Heeb. 395), the Danaides were killed by Lyneus together with their father. Notwithstanding their purification mentioned in the earlier writers, later poets relate that the Danaides were punished for their crime in Hades by being compelled everlastingly to pour water into a vessel full of holes. (C. Ar. v. 462. Hist. Lycur. ii. 11. § 2.; Thib. iii. 3. 79.; Hyg. Fab. 168.; Serv. ad Aen. x. 497.) Strabo (viii. p. 371) and others relate, that Danaus or the Danaides provided Argos with water, and for this reason four of the latter were worshipped at Argos as deities; and this may possibly be the foundation of the story about the punishment of the Danaides. Ovid calls them by the name of the Belides, from their grandfather, Belus; and Herodotus (ii. 171), following the tales of the Egyptians, says, that they brought the mysteries of Demeter Theosphoros from Egypt to Peloponnesus, and that the Pelasgian women there learned the mysteries from them. [L. S.]

DANAUS (Anæads), a son of Belus and Anchoïa, and a grandson of Poseidon and Libyra. He was brother of Aegyptus, and father of fifty daughters, and the mythical ancestor of the Danaids. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4., &c.) According to the common story he was a native of Chonnis, in the Thebais in Upper Egypt, and migrated from thence into Greece. (Herod. ii. 91.) Belus had given Danaus Libyra, while Aegyptus had obtained Arabian. Danaus had reason to think that the sons of his brother were plotting against him, and fear or the advice of an oracle (Bustath. ad Hom. p. 37.), induced him to build a large ship and to embark with his daughters. On his flight he first landed at Rhodes, where he set up an image of Athena Lindia. According to the story in Herodotus, a temple of Athena was built at Lindus by the daughters of Danaus, and according to Strabo (v. p. 594) Thesmophoros was worshipped there by Libyans and Carthaginians, and called them thus after the names of three Danaids. From Rhodes Danaus and his daughters sailed to Peloponnesus, and landed at a place near Lerna, which was afterwards called from this event Apobathuni. (Paus. ii. 38. § 4.) At Argos a dispute arose between Danaus and Gelamor about the government, and after many discussions the people deferred the decision of the question to the next day. At its dawn a wolf rushed among the cattle and killed one of the oxen. This occurrence was the Argives an event which seemed to announce to them in what manner the dispute should terminate, and Danaus was accordingly made king of Argos. Out of gratitude he now built a sanctuary of Apollo Lyceus, who, as he believed, had sent the wolf. (Paus. ii. 19. § 3. Comp. Serv. ad Aen. iv. 677., who relates a different story.) Danaus also erected two wooden statues of Zeus and Artemis, and dedicated his shield in the sanctuary of Hera. (Paus. ii. 19. § 6; Hygin. Fab. 176.) He is further said to have built the acropolis of Argos and to have provided the place with water by dig-
According to Aristotle, the great wealth of Daphnus had made him an object of jealousy by the lower populace. (Diod. xiii. 86, 87, 92, 96; Arist. Pol. v. 5.) [E. H. B.]

DAPHNE (Δάφνη), a fair maiden who is mixed up with various traditions about Apollo. According to Pausanias (x. 5. § 8) she was an Oread and an ancient priestess of the Delphic oracle to which she had been appointed by Ge. Diodorus (iv. 68) describes her as the daughter of Teiresias, who is better known by the name of Manto. She was made prisoner in the war of the Epigoni and given as a present to Apollo. A third Daphne is called a daughter of the river-god Ladon in Arcadia by Ge (Paus. vili. 20. § 1; Telest. ad Lyceum. 6; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. i. 16), or else the river-god Peneus in Thessaly (Or. Met. l. 452; Hyg. Fab. 203), or lastly on Mount Amyclas. (Paus. xiv. 15.) She was extremely beautiful and was loved and pursued by Apollo. When on the point of being overtaken by him, she prayed to her mother, Ge, who opened the earth and received her, and in order to console Apollo she created the ever-green laurel-tree (Δάφνη), of the boughs of which Apollo made himself a wreath. Another story relates that Leucippus, the son of Oenomaus, king of Pisa, was in love with Daphne and approached her in the disguise of a maiden and thus hunted with her. But Apollo’s jealousy caused his discovery during the bath, and he was killed by the nymphs. (Paus. vii. 20. § 2; Pau-

DAPHNIS (Δάφνις), a Sicilian hero, to whom the invention of bucolic poetry is ascribed. He is called a son of Hermes by a nymph (Diod. iv. 84), or merely the beloved of Hermes. (Aelian, V. H. x. 18.) Ovid (Met. iv. 275) calls him an Idaean shepherd; but it does not follow from this, that Ovid connected him with either the Phrygian or the Cretan Ida, since Ida signifies any woody mountain. (Etym. Magn. s. v.) His story runs as follows: The nymph, his mother, exposed him when an infant in a charming valley in a laurel grove, from which he received his name of Daphnus, and for which he is also called the favourite of Apollo. (Serv. ad Virg. Elog. x. 26.) He was brought up by nymphs or shepherds, and he himself became a shepherd, avoiding the bundling crowds of men, and spending his time among Mount Actaeon winter and summer. A Naiad (her name is different in different writers, Echeneis, Xenea, Nomia, or Lyce.—Paus. Ero. 29; Schol. ad Theocrit. i. 65, vili. 73; Serv. ad Virg. Eelog. viii. 68; Phylarg. ad Virg. Elog. v. 20) fell in love with him, and made him promise never to form a connexion with any other maiden, adding the threat that he should become blind if he violated his vow. For a time the handsome Daphnis resisted all the numerous temptations to which he was exposed, but at last he forgot himself, having been made intoxicated by a princess. The Naiad accordingly punished him with blindness, or, as others relate, changed him into a stone. Previous to this time he had composed bucolic poetry, and with it delighted Artemis during the chase. According to others, Steichorchus made the fate of Daphnis the theme of his bucolic poetry, which was the earliest of its kind. After having become blind, he invoked his father to help him. The god accordingly raised him up to heaven, and caused a well to gush forth on the spot where this happened. The well bore the name of Daphnis, and at it the Sicilians offered an annual sacrifice. (Serv. ad Virg. Elog. v. 20.) Phyllargyuris, on the same passage, states, that Daphnis tried to console himself in his blindness by songs and playing on the flute, but that he did not live long after; and the Scholiast on Theocritus (viii. 93) relates, that Daphnis, while wandering about in his blindness, fell from a steep rock. Somewhat different accounts are contained in Servius (ad Virg. Elog. viii. 68) and in various parts of the Idylls of Theocritus. [L. S.]

DAPHNIS, a Greek orator, of whom a fragment in a Latin version is preserved in Statius Thebais (de Fig. Sca. 159), and in which name Pitho was wrongly altered into Daphnudius. No particulars are known about him. (Ruhnken, ad Eust. Leg. p. 52, and Hist. Crit. Ort. Graec. p. 93.) [L. S.]

DAPHNIS, an architect of Miletaus, who, in conjunction with Paconius, built a temple to Apollo at Mileta, of the Ionic order. (Vitruv. vii. 4. 16.) He lived later than Cersiphon, since Paconius was said to have finished the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which was begun by Cersiphon. (Vitruv. i. 2.)

DAPHINO'PATES, THEODORUS (Δαφινοπάτης ὁ Θεόδορος), an ecclesiastical writer, who lived about the middle of the tenth century after Christ. He is called a patrician and sometimes magister, and was invested with the office of primus a secretis at the court of Constantine. He seems to have written a history of Byzantium (Joan. Scylites, Proef. c. 5; Codex, Hist. p. 2), but no distinct traces of it are left. Of his many theological writings, only two are printed, viz. 1. An oration upon the transfer of the hand of John the Baptist from Antioch to Constantinople, which took place in A. D. 535. The year after, when the anniversary of this event was celebrated, Theodorus delivered his oration upon it. A Latin translation of it is printed in the Acta Sanctorum under the 29th of August. The Greek original, of which MSS. are extant in several libraries, has not yet been published. 2. Aposthismata, that is, extracts from various works of St. Chrysostom, in thirty-three chapters. They are printed in the editions of the works of St. Chrysostom, vol. vii. p. 659, ed. Diaris, and vol. viii. p. 660, ed. Dusmae (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. x. p. 356, &c; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. p. 316, ed. London, 1698.)

DAPHNUS (Δάφνος), a physician of Ephesus, who was introduced by Athenaeus in his Deipnosophistae (i. p. 1) as a contemporary of Galen in the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

DAPYX (Δάπηξ), the chief of a tribe of the Getae. When Crassus was in Thrace, n. 29. B.C., another chief of the Getae, was at war with Dapyx, and called in the assistance of Crassus. Dapyx was defeated, and obliged to take refuge in a stronghold, where he was besieged. A Greek, who was in the place, betrayed it to Crassus, and as soon as the Getae perceived the treachery, they killed one another, that they might not fall into the hands of the Romans. Dapyx too endured his life on that day. (Dion Cass. lii. 26.) [L. S.]

DARDANUS (Δάρδανος), a son of Zeus and Electra, the daughter of Atlas. He was the brother of Jason, Jason, Jason, and Jason, Action, and Harmonia, and his native place in the various tra-DARDANUS, the fourth in descent from Aeaeus, the son of Sthenus I., and the father of Crisamis I., who lived probably in the eleventh century B.C. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chil. vii. Hist. 155, in Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. xii. p. 680, ed. vett.)

DAREIUS or DARIUS (Δαρείος, Δαρείας), the eldest son of Hystaspes (Gustaspes), was one of the seven Persian chiefs who destroyed thesamp of Sardis, after whose death Dareius obtained the throne. He was a member of the royal family of the Achaeamenes (Herod. i. 209), in a branch collateral to that of Cyrus. The meaning of the genealogy given by Xerxes (Herod. vii. 11) seems to be this:

Achaeamines,
| Teispes.
|
| Cambyses.
|
| Cyrus.
|
| Aranes.
|
| Hystaspes.
|
| Cambyses.
|
| Smerdis.
|
| Atossa.
|
| Dareius.
| Xerxes.

When Cyrus undertook his expedition against the Massagetae, Dareius, who was then about twenty years old, was left in Persia, of which country his father Hystaspes was satrap. The night after the passage of the Araxes, Cyrus dreamt that he saw Dareius with wings on his shoulders, the one of which overshadowed Asia and the other Europe.
Inferring that Dareius had formed a conspiracy against him, Cyrus sent back Hystaspes into Persia to watch his son. (Herod. i. 269, 210.) Dareius attended Cambyses to Egypt as one of his bodyguard. (Herod. iii. 139; Syl. t.) After the detection of the imposture of the Magian, Dareius went to Susa just at the time when the conspiracy against the usurper was formed, and he was associated with the six other conspirators, who, by his advice, resolved to act without delay. [SMERDIS.]

The discussions among the Persian chiefs, which ensued upon the death of the Magian, ended in favour of the monarchical form of government, which was advocated by Dareius. Among all himself was chosen to the kingdom by a sign, which had been agreed on by the conspirators, and which Dareius, with the aid of his groom Ochares, contrived to obtain for himself, n. c. 551. This account, instead of being a fiction, is quite in accordance with the spirit of the Persian religion. (Heeren's Asia Antiqua Reserches, ii. p. 350; comp. Tac. Germ. 10.)

The usurpation of Smerdis seems to have been an attempt on the part of the Medes to regain their supremacy. The conspirators against him were noble Persians, and in all probability the chiefs of Persian tribes. Their discussion about the form of government to be adopted is evidently related by Herodotus according to Greek rather than Oriental notions. The proposition to share the supreme power among themselves seems to be what Herodotus means by an aristocracy, and this scheme may be traced in the privileges for which the conspirators afterwards stipulated with Dareius, but it is very difficult to conceive in what sense a democracy could have been proposed. At all events, the accession of Dareius confirmed both the supremacy of the Persians, and the monarchical form of government. The other conspirators stipulated for free admission to the king at all times, with one exception, and for the selection of his wives from their families. A dispute soon arose respecting the exercise of the former privilege between the royal servants and Intaphernes, one of the seven; and Dareius, thinking, from the conduct of Intaphernes, that a conspiracy had been formed against himself, put him to death with all his male relations except the twins. (Herod. iii. 110, 119.) He henceforth enjoyed undisputed possession of his throne, but we find the seven employed in distant governments and expeditions.

It was in the reign of Dareius that the consolidation of the Persian empire was effected, so far at least as it ever was; for in truth it never possessed a sure principle of cohesion. Cyrus and Cambyses had been engaged in continual wars, and their conquests had added to the Persian empire the whole of Asia (up to India and Scythia), except Armenia. (Herod. iii. 60.) After strengthening himself by alliances with the royal house, from which he took three wives, namely, the two daughters of Cyrus, Atossa and Artystone, and Pamys, the daughter of Cyrus’s son Sogdites, and with the chief of the seven, Ones, whose daughter Pho- dime he married, and after erecting a monument to celebrate his acquisition of the kingdom, he began to set in order the affairs of his vast empire, which he divided into twenty satrapies, assigning to each its amount of tribute. Persis proper was exempted from all taxes, except those which it had formerly been used to pay. From the attention which he paid to his revenues, and from his love of money, Dareius was called by the Persians καπηλας. (iii. 89, 117.) A detailed account of his satrapies and revenues is given by Herodotus. (iii. 90, &c.) His ordinary residence was at Susa, which he greatly improved. (Aelian, N. A. i. 59; Plin. H. N. vi. 27, s. 31.)

The seven months of the reign of Smerdis had produced much confusion throughout the whole empire. His remission of all taxes for three years, if it be true, must have caused Dareius some trouble in reimposing them. It cannot be doubted that the governors of the provinces would seize the opportunity of laying claim to independence. We have an example in the conduct of one of the governors of Sardis, who, in addition to his cruel and treacherous murder of Polycrates and other acts of tyranny, put to death a noble Persian, Mitrobonas, the governor of Dyscelium in Bithynia, with his son, and killed a royal messenger whom Dareius sent to rebuke him. Dareius was prevented from marching against Orestes in person, on account of his recent accession to the throne and the power of the offender; but one of his couriers, named Bagasus, effected the death of Orestes by gaining over his body-guard of 1000 Persians. In consequence of this event the Greek physician Democedes fell into the hands of Dareius, and cured him of a spinal ailment, and was established at his court—a most important event in the history of the world, for Democedes used his influence with Atossa to persuade Dareius to attack Greece. [DEMOCEFDES.] Dareius sent him, with fifteen noble Persians, to examine the coasts of Greece, of which they made a sort of map. Democedes escaped from his companions, who, after a great variety of adventures, got back safe to Dareius. (Herod. iii. 135—138.)

The great struggle between the despotism of Asia and the freedom of Europe was now beginning. The successive rulers of Western Asia had long desired to extend their dominion across the Aegean into Greece; but both Creesus and Cyrus had been prevented from making the attempt, the former by the growth of the Persian power, the latter by his wars in Central Asia. Dareius, who already, as seen in the dream of Cyrus, overshadowed Asia with one wing, now began to spread the other over Europe. He attacked Sardis under the pretext of restoring SYLON, but his further designs in that quarter were interrupted by the revolt of the Babylonians, who had profited by the period of confusion which followed the death of Cambyses to make every preparation for rebellion. After a siege of twenty months, Babylon was taken by a stratagem of ZORYXUS, and was severely punished for its revolt, probably about B.C. 516.

The reduction of Babylon was soon followed by Dareius’s invasion of Scythia (about B.C. 513, or 505 according to Wesseling and Clinton). The cause of this expedition is very obscure. Herodotus (iv. 1, 83) attributes it to the belligerent spirit of the Scyths to take vengeance on the Scythians for their invasion of Media in the time of CYAXARES,—far too remote a cause, though very probably used as a pretext. Ctesias says, that on the occasion of a predatory incursion into Scythia by the satrap of Cappadocia, the Scythian king had sent a letter of defiance to Dareius, and that this provoked him to the war. The only rational motives which can now he assigned are the desire of curbing tribes which had been, and might be again, dangerous to the empire, especially during the projected invasion of Greece; and perhaps too of laying open the way to Greece by the conquest of Thrace. The details of the expedition also are difficult to trace. Dareius crossed the Thracian Bosporus by a bridge of boats, the work of Mandrocles, a Samian emigrant, who constructed his passage by setting up two pillars, on which the names of the tribes composing his army were recorded in Greek and Assyrian letters. Thence he marched through Thrace to the delta of the Danube, where he found a bridge of boats already formed by his fleet, which had been sent round in the mean time to the mouth of the river. This bridge he would have broken up after the passage of his army; but by the advice of Coes, the commander of the forces of Mytilene, he left it guarded by the Greeks, many of whom served in his fleet, under their tyrants, with orders to break it up if he did not return within sixty days. The sixty days elapsed, and Miltiades, the tyrant of the Thracian Chersonesus, endeavored to prevail on his fellow-Greeks to take Dareius at his word, and thus to cut off his retreat; but Histiaei, the tyrant of Miletus, pointed out the probability that, if so serious a blow were inflicted on the Persian power, they, the tyrants, who were protected by Persia, must fall. The bridge was therefore preserved, but a feint was made of destroying it, in order to deceive the Scythis, who were thus rendered less active in the pursuit of Dareius. The king was now in full retreat, his expedition having entirely failed, through the impossibility of bringing the Scythis to an engagement. If we are to believe Herodotus, he had penetrated far into the interior of Russia, and yet he had not been much distressed for provisions; and he recrossed the Danube with so large an army, that he detached a force of eighty thousand men for the conquest of Thrace, under Megabazus, who subdued that country and Paeonia, and received the symbols of submission, earth and water, from Amyntas, the king of Macedonia. Dareius re-entered Asia by the Hellespont, which he crossed at Sestos, and at this time at Sardis, whence he sent Otanes to reduce those maritime cities on the north coast of the Aegean, Hellespont, and Bosporus, which still remained independent. The most important conquest of Otanes, were Byzantium, Chalcedon, and the islands of Imbrus and Lemnos. [Otaness.] Dareius himself then returned to Sardis, leaving Artaphernes governor of Sardis. These operations were succeeded by a period of profound peace (about B. C. 500-501). The events which interrupted it, though insignificant in themselves, brought on the struggle in which the Athenians first, and then the other Greeks, repulsed the whole power of Persia. These events belong to the history of Greece, and to the biographies of other men. [Aristogoras; Histiaius; Hippias; Mardonius; Miltiades; Artaphernes, &c.; Thirkill's Hist. of Greece, ii. c. 14.] It is a debated question whether Dareius was accidentally involved in his war with Greece by the course of events, or whether he simply took advantage of the opportunity to carry out a long cherished design. Herodotus takes at the latter view, which seems to be borne out fully by the invasion of Scythia, the reduction of Thrace, and some minor circumstances. The period of peace which preceded the war was, no doubt, simply a matter of necessity, after the wars of the early part of the reign, and especially after the Scythian disaster. Even Thrilliwali, who takes the other view (p. 191), attributes elsewhere an aggressive policy to Dareius (p. 199). So great, however, was Dareius's power, that he could easily subdue the free states of Greece, that the force sent to subdue them was quite insconsiderable when compared with the army which marched to the invasion of Scythia. The battle of Marathon convinced him of his error, but still left him the idea that Greece must be easily crushed by a greater armament. He therefore called out the whole force of his empire; but, after three years of preparation, his attention was called off by the rebellion of Egypt, and the dispute between his sons for the succession [Ari- bioness; Xerxes]; and the decision of this dispute was very soon followed by his death, n. c. 485, after a reign of 36 years, according to Herodotus (comp. Clinton, F. H. ii. p. 313), or 31, according to Diodorus (Comp. Clinton, F. H. ii. p. 313). There are two other events in the reign of Dareius which deserve notice: namely, the expedition against Libya, at the time of the Scythian expedition (Herod. iv. 145—205), and the voyage of Seylax of Caryanda down the Indus, which led to the discovery and subjugation of certain Indian tribes, whose position is uncertain (iv. 44). Diodorus (i. 33, 55, 55) mentions some particulars of his relations to Egypt, from which it appears that he devoted much attention to public works and legislative reforms in that as well as in the other parts of his empire. The children of Dareius were, by the daughter of Gobryas, whom he had married before he came to the throne, Artabannes and two others; by Atossa, Xerxes, Hystaspes, Achaemenes, and Masiates; by Anyzostes, Arasanes and Gobryas; by Parmys, Ariiamonds; and by Phatargus, the daughter of his brother Artanes, Abrocome and Hyperanthe. Diodorus mentions a daughter, Mandane. The inscriptions at Persepolis in which his name appears are fully described by Groteff (Beltiana) and Hückl. (Vet. Med. et Pers. Monum.) Hückl shews that the sepulchre which Dareius caused to be constructed for himself is one of those in the hill called Raekirn. (Herod. iii. 70—160, iv. 31- 4, vii. 1—4; Ctes. Pers. 14—10, ed. Lion; Diod. ii. 5, x. 17, xi. 2, 57, 74; Justin. i. 10, ii. 3, 5, 8, 10, vii. 3. For his relations to the Jews, see Zom. iv. 5, v. 1; Hagg. i. 1; Zoph. i. 1; Joseph. Anti. xi. 3, 5.) 2. Dareius II., was named Ochus (fayos) before his accession, and was then surnamed Notthus ([Nodos]), from his being one of the seventeen bastard sons of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, who made him satrap of Hyrcania, and gave him in marriage his sister Parysatis, the daughter of Xerxes I. When Sogdianus, another bastard son of Artaxerxes, had murdered the king, Xerxes II., he called Ochus to his court. Ochus promised to go, but delayed till he had collected a large army, and then he declared war against Sogdianus. Artabius, the commander of the royal cavalry, Araxes, the satrap of Egypt, and Artaxerxes, the satrap of Armenia, deserted to him, and placed the diadem upon his head according to Ctesias, against his will, B. C. 424—123. Sogdianus gave himself up to Ochus, and was put to death. Ochus now assumed the name of Dareius. He was completely under the power of three eminents, Artaxerxes, Artabazanes, and Athoas, and of his wife, Parysatis, by whom, before his accession, he had two children, a daughter Amistria, and a son Araces, who succeeded him by the name of Artaxerxes (II. Mmnon). After his accession, Parysatis bore him a son, Cyrus (Cyrus the Younger), and a daughter, Artostia. He had other children, all of whom died early, except his fourth son, Oxendra. (Ctes. 49, ed. Linn.) Platarch, quoting Ctesias for his authority, calls the sons of Dareius and Parysatis, Artesia (afterwards Artaxerxes), Cyrus, Ostanes, and Oxendra. (Arct. I.)

The weakness of Dareius's government was soon shown by repeated insurrections. First his brother Artares revolted, with Artaphernes, the son of Megabyzus. Their Greek mercenaries, in whom their strength consisted, were bought off by the royal general Arsatyas, and they themselves were taken prisoners by treachery, and, at the instigation of Parysatis, they were put to death by fire. The rebellion of Plisuthes had precisely a similar result. (n. c. 414.) [Tissaphernes.] A plot of Artaxerxes, the chief eunuch, was crushed in the bud; but a more formidable and lasting danger soon showed itself in the rebellion of Egypt under Amuysates, who in n. c. 414 expelled the Persians from Egypt, and reigned there six years, and at whose death (n. c. 409) Dareius was obliged to recognise his son Pausiris as his successor; for at the same time the Medes revolted: they were, however, soon subdued. Dareius died in the year 406—404 B.C., and was succeeded by his eldest son Artaxerxes II. The length of his reign is differently stated: it was really 19 years. Respecting his relations to Greece, see Cyr. Ly. Sander, Tissaphernes. (Ctes. Pers. 44—56; Diod. xii. 71, xiii. 36, 70, 108; Xen. Hell. ii. 2, § 19, ii. 1. § 8, Anab. i. 1. § 1; Nehem. xii. 22.)

3. Dareius III, named Codomannus before his accession, was the son of Arsames, the son of Ostanes, a brother of Artaxerxes II. His mother Sisygambis was the daughter of Artaxerxes. In a war against the Caduates he killed a powerful warrior in single combat, and was rewarded by the king, Artaxerxes Ochus, with the satrapy of Armenia. He was raised to the throne by Bagoes, after the murder of Arses (n. c. 359), in which some accused him of a share; but the charge was inconsistent with the universal testimony borne to the mildness and excellence of his character, by which he was as much distinguished as by his personal beauty. He rid himself of Bagoes, whom he punished for all his crimes by compelling him to drink poison. Codomannus had not, however, the qualities nor the power to oppose the impetuous career of the Macedonian king. [Alexander I.] The Persian empire ended with his death, in n. c. 330. (Diod. xvii. 5, &c.; Justin, x. 5, and the writers of the history of Alexander.) [P. S.]

DAREIUS (Δαρείος), the eldest son of Xerxes I., was put to death by his brother Artaxerxes, to whom Artabazanes and Spataries accused him of the murder of Xerxes, which they had themselves committed. (n. c. 465.) The story is told, with some important variations, by the following writers. (Ctes. Pers. 29, ed. Linn.; Diod. xi. 69; Justin, iii. 1.) [P. S.]

DARIUS (Δαρείος), the eldest son of Artaxerxes II. Mmnon, was designated as successor to the crown, and permitted to wear the upper tiara, by his father, towards the close of his life, in order to settle a dispute respecting the succession which had arisen between Dareius and his younger brother Ochus. Dareius was then fifty years old. It was customary on such occasions for the king to make his successor-elect a present of anything he chose to ask. Dareius asked for Aspasia, a favorite concubine of his father's. Artaxerxes left the matter to the lady's choice, and she preferred Dareius, at which the king was so enraged, that he broke the solemn promise, and devoted Aspasia to the service of Artemis. The resentment of Dareius against his father, and his jealousy of his brother were inflamed by Thrasyllus, who had received a somewhat similar injury from Artaxerxes, and the prince formed an expedition, with several of his bastard brothers, against his father's life, which was detected, and Dareius was put to death. (Plut. Artax. 26—29; Justin, x. 1, 2.) [P. S.]

DARES (Δαρές), was, according to the Iliad (v. 9), a priest of Hephaestus at Troy. There existed in antiquity an Iliad or an account of the destruction of Troy, which was believed to be more ancient than the Homeric poems, and in fact to be the work of Dares, the priest of Hephaestus. (Ptolem. Hepist. i.; Eustath. ad Hom. Od. xi. 531.) Both these writers state, on the authority of Antipater of Acarnania, that Dares advised Hector not to kill Patroclus, and Eustathius adds, that Dares, after deserting to the Greeks, was killed by Odysseus, which event must have taken place after the fall of Troy, since Dares could not otherwise have written an account of the destruction of the city. In the time of Aelian (V. I. xi. 2; comp. Isid. Orig. i. 41) the Iliad of Dares, which he calls Πολυδέκατοι, was still known to exist; he too mentions the belief that it was more ancient than Homer, and Isidore states that it was written on palm-leaves. But no part or fragment of this ancient Iliad has come down to us, and it is therefore not easy to form a definite opinion upon the question. It is, however, of some interest to us, on account of a Latin work on the destruction or Troy, which has been handed down to us, and pretends to be a Latin translation of the ancient work of Dares. It bears the title [Dares Phryg. de Iliac. Troyn. L.]. It consists of 44 chapters, and is preceded by a letter purporting to be addressed by Corn. Nepos to Sallustius Crispus. The writer states, that during his residence at Athens he there met with a MS. of the ancient Iliad of Dares, written by the author himself, and that on perusing it, he was so much delighted, that he forthwith translated it into Latin. This letter, however, is a manifest forgery. No ancient writer mentions such a work of Corn. Nepos, and the language of the treatise is full of barbarisms, such as no person of education at the time of Nepos could have been guilty of. The name of Corn. Nepos does not occur in connexion with this alleged translation previous to the 1st century. These circumstances have led some critics to believe, that the Latin work bearing the name of Dares is an abridgment of the Latin epic of Josephus Icannus (Joseph of Exeter, who lived in the 12th century), and there are indeed several expressions in the two works which would seem to favour the opinion, that the author of the one borrowed from the other; but the differences and discrepancies in the statements of the two works are so great, that they alone are sufficient to overthrow the hypothesis. Dederich, the last editor, is inclined to think that the author of our work was a real Roman of the 5th, 6th, or 7th century. The work itself is evidently the production of a person of little education and of bad taste: it seems to consist of a number of extracts made from several writers, and put together without any judgment; there is scarcely anything in the work that is striking or novel. But, notwithstanding all this, the work was very popular in the 15th and 16th centuries, like everything else referring to the war of Troy. Hence several editions and translations were made of it. It was then and is still usually printed together with the work of Dictys Cretensis. The first edition appeared at Cologne, in 1470; the first in which care was bestowed upon the text, is that of J. Mercerus. (Paris, 1618, and Amsterdam, 1631, 12mo.) The subsequent editions give the text of Mercerus, such as those of Anne Ducier (Paris, 1680, and Amsterdam, 1702, 4to.), U. Ohrecent (Strassb. 1691, 8vo.), and others. The best and most recent edition is that of A. Dederich (Bonn, 1837, 8vo.), who has appended it to his edition of Dictys, and prefixed an interesting dissertation upon Dares and the work bearing his name. [L. S.]

DAS'US. I. He commanded the garrison of Castries in n. c. 218, and being bribed by Hannibal, he surrendered the place to him, whereby the Carthaginians, who were encamped on the Trubia, obtained plentiful stores of provisions. (Liv. xxi. 48.)

2. Of Salapia. He and Blattius were the leading men at Salapia, and he favoured Hannibal, while Blattius advocated the interests of Rome; at least as much as he could do in secret. But as Blattius could effect nothing without Dasius, he at length endeavoured to persuade him to espouse the part of the Romans. But Dasius, unwilling to support his rival, informed Hannibal of the schemes of Blattius. Both were then summoned by Hannibal. Blattius, when he appeared before the Carthaginian general, accused Dasius of treachery; and Hannibal, who had not much confidence in either of them, dismissed them both. However, Blattius tried to detain him, but the Salapians with their Punic garrison were surrendered to the Romans. Dasius was killed in the massacre which ensued. This happened in n. c. 210. (Liv. xxvi. 38; Appian, Anab. 45, &c.) [L. S.]

DAS'US, AL'TINNIUS, of Arpi. When P. Sempronius and Q. Fabius, in n. c. 213, had taken up their positions in Lucania and Apulia against Hannibal, Dasius went at night time into the camp of Fabius, and offered to deliver up Arpi into his hands, if the consul would give him an appropriate reward. Fabius consulted with his other officers, and, as Dasius had on a former occasion betrayed the Romans, as he now proposed to betray Hannibal, it was resolved that for the present he should be destroyed. In the mean time, his absence had created considerable uneasiness at Arpi, and a report of his treachery reached Hannibal, who is said to have availed himself of the opportunity to confiscate the property of the traitor, and also to order his mother and her children to be buried alive. (Liv. xxiv. 45.) [L. S.]

DATAMES (Δατάμης), a Carian by birth, the son of Camissares by a Scythian mother. His father being surnamed Cilicia under Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), and high in the favour of that monarch, Datames became one of the king's bodyguard; and having in this capacity distinguished himself in the war against the Cadusii, was appointed to succeed his father (who had fallen in that war) in the government of his province. Here he distinguished himself both by his military abilities and his zeal in the service of the king; and reduced to subjection two satrapies who had revolted from Artaxerxes, Tithys, governor of Paphalagonia, and Aspis of Catabasius. He was in consequence entrusted by the Persian king with the chief command of an army despatched for the recovery of Egypt; but the machinations of his enemies at the Persian court, and the risks to which he was in consequence exposed, induced him to change his plan, and throw off his allegiance to the king. He withdrew with the troops under his command into Cappadocia, and made common cause with the other satraps who had revolted from Persia. Artabazus, one of the generals that remained faithful to the king, advanced against him from Ptolemais, but was entirely defeated. The great reputation that Datames had acquired induced Artaxerxes to direct his utmost exertions to effect his subjection, but Autophradates, who was sent against him with a large army, was obliged to retire with heavy loss. Datames, however, though constantly victorious against open foes, ultimately fell a victim to treachery, and, after evading numerous plots that had been formed against his life, was assassinated at a conference by Mithridates, who had gained his confidence by assuming the appearance of hostility to the king. (Corn. Nep. Datames; Diod. xv. 91; Polyan. vii. 21, 29, § 1.)

Datames appears to have obtained the highest reputation in his day for courage and ability in war, which caused his fame to extend even among the Greeks, though he did not come into personal collision with them. Cornelius Nepos (to whose biographical sketch we owe the only connected narrative of his life) calls him the bravest and most able of all barbarian generals, except Hamilcar and Hannibal; but there is much confusion in the accounts of the events that befell him, and it is difficult to assign the anecdotes of him recorded by Polyænus to their proper place in his history. The chronology of the events related by Nepos is also very obscure; but according to that author and Diodorus it would appear that Datames must have died before Artaxerxes, probably b. c. 362. Clinton is, however, of opinion that a much longer interval elapsed between his revolt and his death (Clinton, F. H. vel. iii. p. 423, not.) [E. E. B.]

DATAPHERNES (Δατάφερνης), a Persian in the confidence of Darius, and one of those who betrayed him to Alexander, b. c. 329. He joined Spitamenes, satrap of Sogdiana, in his revolt, and, when their cause became desperate, took refuge among the Dacians, who, according to the account of Polyænus, delivered him up in chains to Alexander. (Att. Anab. iii. 29, 30, iv. 1, &c.; Diod. xvii. 83; Curt. vii. 5, 6, &c., viii. 3; Franchis, ad loc.) [E. E. B.]

DATIS (Δάτις), a Mede, who, together with Artaphernes, had the command of the forces which were sent by Dareios Hystaspis against Eretria and Athens, and which were finally defeated at DAURISSES.

Marathon in n. c. 490. (Herod. vi. 94, &c.) [Artaphernes, No. 2.] When the amanuensis, who was on its way to Greece through the Aegean sea, the Delians fell in alarm from their island to Tenos; but Datis re-assured them, professing that his own feelings, as well as the commands of the king, would lead him to spare and respect the birthplace of "the two gods." The obvious explanation of this conduct, as arising from a notion of the correspondence of Apollo and Artemis with the sun and moon, is rejected by Müller in favour of a far less probable hypothesis. (Herod. vi. 97; Müller, Dor. ii. 3. § 6, 6; § 10; Thrillwalt's Greece, vol. ii. p. 231; Spanheim, ad Caliha. Hymn. in Del. 255.) The religious reverences of Datis is further illustrated by the anecdote of his restoring the statue of Apollo which some Phocceans in his army had stolen from Delium in Boeotia. (Herod. vii. 118; Paus. x. 28; Suid. et. a. Δαρίς.) His two sons, Armaanthes and Tithaes, commanded the cavalry of Xerxes in his expedition against Greece. (Herod. vii. 88.) He admired the Greek language, and tried hard to speak it; failing in which, he thereby at any rate unwittingly enriched it with a new word—Δαυριάς. (Suid. l. c.; Arist. Pol. 289; Schol. ad loc.) [E. E.]

Datis (Δαρίς) is mentioned by the Raveña Scholarist on Aristophanes (v. 86) as one of the four sons of Carcinus the elder [see p. 613], though other authorities speak only of three. That there were four is also distinctly stated by the comic poet Pherecrates. (Ap. Schol. ad Arist. Vesp. 1509.) By the Scholarist on the Peace (289), Datis is again mentioned as a tragic poet, and the Scholarist on the Wasps (1502) tells us that only one, viz. Xenoeces, was a poet, while the other three were choral dancers. From these considerations, Meineke has conjectured with much probability that Datis was only a nickname for Xenoeces, expressive of imputed barbarism of style, Δαυριάς. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Cont. Graec. p. 513, &c., where in p. 515, Philocles occurs twice erroneously for Xenoeces.) [E. E.]

DAUNUS (Δαυνός or Δάυνος). 1. A son of Lycaon in Arcadia, and brother of Iapyx and Peneutas. These three brothers, in conjunction with Ilyrians and Messapians, landed on the eastern coast of Italy, expelled the Aequians, took possession of the country, and divided it into three parts, Dauina, Peneutia, and Messapia. The three tribes together bore the common name Iapygians. (Anton. Lib. 31.)

2. A son of Pilumnum and Danae, was married to Venilia. He was the father of at least the most ancient among the ancestors of Tarsus. (Virg. Aen. ix. 4, and Serv. on ix. 148.)

3. A king of Apulia. He had been obliged to flee from Ilyria, his native land, into Apulia, and gave his name to a portion of his new country. (Danaii.) He is said to have had hospitably received Diomedes, and to have given him his daughter Euippe in marriage. (Pest. s. e.; Plin. H. N. iii. 11 comp. Diomedes.)

DAURISSES (Δαυρισσεις), the son-in-law of Darius Hyystaspis, was one of the Persian commanders who were employed in suppressing the Ionian revolt. (n. c. 498.) After the defeat of the Ionian army at Ephesus, Daurises marched against the cities on the Hellespont, and took Dardanus, Abydus, Perseb, Lampaus, and Paraeus, each in one day. He then marched against the Carians, who had just joined in the Ionian revolt, and defeated them in two battles; but shortly afterwards Daurises fell into an ambush, and was killed, with a great number of the Persians. (Herod. v. 116 —121.) [P. S.]

DAVID, of Nerken, a learned Armenian philosopher and a commentator on Plato and Aristotle, was a relation of the Armenian historian, Moses of Chorene, and lived at the end of the fifth and the beginning of the sixth century after Christ. He studied at Athens under Syriacus, the preceptor of Proclus, and was one of those later philosophers who made it their chief aim to harmonize the Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy. Of the life and writings of David much important information is given by C. Fr. Neumann, "Memoire sur la Vie et les Oeuvres de David, Paris, 1829;" Jahrh. für wissensch. Kritik, 1829, p. 797, &c. David wrote several philosophical works in the Armenian and Greek languages, and translated some of the writings of Aristotle into the Armenian. His commentaries on the Categories of Aristotle and likewise on the Isagoge of Porphyry, which are still extant, are not without some merit, and are principally of importance for the information which they contain respecting the history of literature. (Stahr, Aristotelis, vol. i. pp. 206, 207, ii. pp. 63, 66, 69, 197.) Whether he was alive when the philosophers were exiled from Athens by the emperor Justinian, and returned into Asia in consequence of their expulsion, is uncertain. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. iii. pp. 290, 485, v. p. 738.) His commentaries were translated into Arabic and Hebrew, and manuscripts of such translations are still extant. (Buhle's Aristot. vol. i. p. 298; Neumann in the Nouveau Journal Asiatique, vol. i.) There is another commentator on Aristotle, of the same name, but a different person, namely, David the Jew. (Jordain, Recherches sur l'Age et l'Origine des Traductions Latines d'Arist., Paris, 1819, pp. 196, 197.) [A. S.]

DAZA MAXIMINUS. [MAXIMINUS.]

DECATEPHORUS (Δεκατεφθορος), that is, the god to whom the tenth part of the booty is dedicated, was a surname of Apollo at Megara. Pausanias (i. 42. § 5) remarks, that the statues of Apollo Pythius and Decatephorus at Megara resemble each other. (Strab. 1. 9.)

DECIBALUS (Δεκίβαλος), was probably a title of honour among the Dacians equivalent to chief or king, since we find that it was borne by more than one of their rulers (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. c. 10), and that the individual best known to history as the Decibalus of Dion Cassius is named Dieropanens by Orosius, and Dorpheneus by Jornandes. This personage was for a long series of years, under Domitian and Trajan, one of the most enterprising and formidable among the enemies of Rome. Having displayed great courage in the field and extraordinary ability in every department of the military art, he was raised to the throne by the reigning sovereign, Pius, who abdicated in his favour. The new monarch quickly crossed the Danube, attacked and drove in the Roman outposts, defeated and slew Appius Sabinus, governor of Moesia, and, spreading devastation far and wide throughout the province, gained possession of many important towns and fortresses. Upon receiving intelligence of these calamities, Domitian hastened (A.D. 89) with all the troops he could collect to Illyria, and, rejecting the pacific though insulting overtures of Decelalus, committed the chief command to Cornelius Fuscus at that time prefect of the praetorium, an officer whose knowledge of war was derived from studies prosecuted within the halls of a marble palace amid the luxuries of a licentious court. The imperial general having passed the frontier on a bridge of boats at the head of a numerous army, perished after a most disastrous campaign, and the legions were compelled to retreat with the loss of many prisoners, an eagle, and the whole of their baggage and artillery. This failure again called forth Domitian from the city, but although he repatriated to Mucia hisudit bounded purpose of assuming the direction of affairs, he carefully abstained from exposing his person to the dangers of a military life, and moving from town to town, abandoned himself to his foul appetites, while his officers sustained fresh dishonour and defeat. Occasional glimpses of success, however, appear from time to time to have checked the victorious career of the barbarians, and especial mention is made of the exploits of a certain Julianus, who, in an engagement near Tapae, destroyed great numbers of the foe, and threatened even the royal residence, while Vespasian, who held the second place in the Dacian kingdom, escaped with difficulty by casting himself among the rebels and feigning death until the danger was past. At length Domitian, harassed by an unprofitable and protracted struggle, and alarmed by the losses sustained in his contest with the Quadi and Marcomanni, was constrained to solicit a peace which he had more than once refused to grant. Decelalus despatched his brother, Diegis or Degis by name, to conclude a treaty, by whom some prisoners and captured arms were restored, and a regal diadem received in return. But the most important and disgraceful portion of the compact was for a time carefully concealed. Notwithstanding his pompous pretensions to victory and the mockery of a triumph, the emperor had been compelled to purchase the forbearance of his antagonist by a heavy ransom, had engaged to furnish him with a large body of artilleries skilled in fencing and instruments for the arts of peace or war, and, worst of all, had submitted to an unheard of degradation by consenting to pay an annual tribute. These occurrences are believed to have happened between the years A.D. 86—90, but both the order and the details of the different events are presented in a most confused and perplexing form by ancient authors.

Trajan soon after his accession determined to wipe out the stain contracted by his predecessor, and at once refused to fulfill the conditions of the league. Quitting the city in his fourth consulship (A.D. 101), he led an army in person against the Dacians, whom he defeated near Tapae, the scene of their former misfortunes, after an obstinate struggle, in which both parties sustained severity. Pressing onwards, a second victory was gained by Iulius Quietus, commander of the Moorish cavalry, many strongholds were stormed, the spoils and trophies taken from Fuscus were recovered, and the capital, Sarmizegetusa (Zeupiμελεκτεροε), was invested. Decelalus having in vain attempted to temporize, was at length compelled to repair to the presence of the prince, and to submit to the terms imposed by the conqueror, who demanded only the restitution of all plunder, but the cession of a large extent of territory. Trajan then returned to Rome, celebrated a triumph, and assumed the title of Dacius. The war having been, however, soon renewed (A.D. 104), he resolved upon the permanent occupation of the regions beyond the Danube, threw a bridge of stone across the river about six miles below the rapid, now known as the Iron Gates, and being thus enabled to maintain his communications with ease and certainty, succeeded, after encountering a desperate resistance, in subjugating the whole district, and reducing it to the form of a province. (A.D. 105.) Decelalus, having seen his palace captured and his country enslaved, perished, by his own hands, and might not fall alive into the hands of the invaders. His head was sent to Rome, and his treasures, which had been ingeniously concealed beneath the bed of the river Sargetia, (now the Istrig, a tributary of the Marosch,) which flowed beneath the walls of his mansion, were discovered and added to the spoil.

MAGN. DECÉN'TIUS, the brother or cousin of Magnentius, by whom, after the death of Constans, he was created Caesar, A.D. 351, and raised to the consulate the following year. During the war in Gaul against the Alemanni, Decentius was defeated by Chnodomarius, the leader of the barbarians, and upon this, or some previous occasion, the Treviri, rising in rebellion, closed their gates and refused to admit him into their city. Upon receiving intelligence of the death of Magnentius, to whose aid he was hastening, and finding that foes surrounded him on every side so as to leave no hope of escape, he strangled himself at Sens on the 18th of August, A.D. 353. The medals which assign to this prince the title of Augustus are deemed spurious by the best authorities. His name appears upon genuine coins under the form MAG. O M. MGENTEUS, leaving it doubtful whether we ought to interpret the contraction by Magnus or Magnentius.

Decentius is called the brother of Magnentius by Victor, de Caes. 42, by Eutropius, x. 7, and by Zonaras, xii. 8, 9; the kinsman (consanguuminosum—γένεωνωντομον) by Victor, Epist. 42, and by Zosimus, ii. 43, 54. See also Ann. Marc. xvi. 6. § 4, xvi. 12. § 5; Fast. Ida. [W. R.]

DECIA GENS, plebeian, but of high antiquity, became illustrious in Roman history by two members of it sacrificing themselves for the preservation of their country. The only cognomens that occur in this gens are Mrs and Subulo: for those who are mentioned without a surname see Decius.

Decianus, Appuleius. 1. C. Appuleius Decianus was tribune of the people in B.C. 90. In that year he brought a charge against L. Valerius Flaccus, the nature of which is unknown.

He also brought an accusation against L. Furius, one of the tribunes of the year previous, who opposed the recall of Metellus Numidicus. It seems to have been on this occasion that he laments before the public assembly the fate of L. Appuleius Saturninus and Servilius Glancia, and endeavoured to create disturbances to avenge their death. In consequence of these proceedings he himself was condemned, and went into exile to Pontus, where he engaged in the service of Mithridates. (Cic. pro Ril. par. 2; pro Flacc. 32; Schol. Bohm. p. 230, ed. Orelli; Val. Max. viii. 1. § 2; Appian, R. C. i. 38.)

2. C. Appuleius Decianus, a son of No. 1, lived as negotiator in Asia Minor, at Pergamus, and at Apollonia. He was repeatedly charged with having committed acts of injustice and violence towards the inhabitants of Apollonia, for he appears to have been a person of a very avaricious and insolent character, and in the end he was condemned by the praetor Flaccus, the son of the L. Valerius Flaccus, who had been accused by Decianus, the father. In B.C. 59, Decianus took vengeance upon Flaccus by supporting the charge which D. Lucullus brought against him. (Cic. pro Flacc. 29—33; Schol. Bohm. pp. 230, 240, 242, ed. Orelli.)

Decianus, C. Plautius, was consul in B.C. 329 with L. Aemilius Mamercinus. It was his province during his consulship to continue the war against Preruminus, while his colleague was engaged in raising another army to meet the Gauls, who were reported to be marching southward. But this report proved to be unfounded, and all the Roman forces were now directed against Preruminus. The town was taken, its walls were pulled down, and a strong garrison was left on the spot. On his return Decianus celebrated a triumph. During the discussions in the senate as to what punishment was to be inflicted upon the Preruminites, Decianus humanely endeavoured to alleviate their fate. According to the Poet, C. Plautius Decianus was consul also in the year following; but Livy mentions in his speech P. Clodius Proculus. In B.C. 312, C. Plautius Decianus was censor with Appius Claudius, and after holding the office eighteen months, he laid it down, in accordance with the lex Aemilia, while Appius Claudius, refusing obedience to the law, remained censor alone. (Livy. viii. 20, 22, ix. 29, 33; Val. Max. vi. 2. § 1; Frontin. de Aquaept. i. 5; Diodor. xx. 39.) [L. S.]

Decianus, Cato. [Cato.]

Decius, Decius Saxa. [Saxa.]

Decimius. The Decimius appear to have been originally a Samnian family of Boeotiam, at least the first of the name belonged to that place, and the others who occur in history were probably his descendants, who after obtaining the Roman franchise settled at Rome. The only cognomen among the Decimii is Flavus. The following list contains those who are mentioned without a cognomen.

1. Numerius Decius, of Boeotiam in Samnium, is called the most illustrious person in all

Samnium, both by his noble descent and his wealth. In B.C. 217 he joined the Roman army against Hannibal with 8000 foot and 500 horse, at the command of the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus. With these forces Decius appeared in the rear of Hannibal, and thus decided a battle which was taking a very unfavourable turn for Mucius, the magister equitum. Two custodia were taken on that day, and 6000 Carthaginians were slain, but the Romans too lost 5000 men. (Liv. xxii. 24.)

2. C. Decius, was sent in B.C. 171 as ambassador to Crete to request the Cretans to send auxiliaries for the war against Perseus of Macedonia. In 169 he was praetor peregrinus, and in the year following he was sent with two others as ambassador to Antiochus and Ptolemy, to bring about a reconciliation between the two kings, and to declare that, whichever of them should continue hostilities, should cease to be treated as the friend and ally of Rome. On that occasion Decimus and his colleagues visited the island of Rhodes at the request of the Rhodians themselves, and on his return to Rome his report was in favour of the Rhodians, in so much as he endeavoured to throw the guilt of their hostility towards Rome upon some individuals only, while he tried to exculpate the body of the people. (Liv. xiii. 35, xili. 11, 14, xiv. 14, xiv. 16.)

3. M. Decius, was sent with Tiberius Claudius Nero as ambassador to Crete and Rhodes in B.C. 172, just before the outbreak of the war with Perseus, for the purpose of discovering whether they had been tempted by Perseus, and of trying to renew their friendship with Rome. (Liv. xiii. 19.)

4. L. Decius, was sent in B.C. 171 as ambassador to the Illyrian king Genthius, to try to win him over to the side of the Romans during the war against Perseus. But he returned to Rome without having effected anything, and was suspected of having accepted bribes from the king. (Liv. xili. 37, 45.)

5. C. Decius, a person who had held the office of quaestor (quaestorius), and belonged to the party of Pompey. In B.C. 47 he was in the island of Ceria to take care of the provisions for the Pompeians, but on the arrival of Sallust, the historian, who was then a general of Caesar, Decius immediately quit the island, and fled in a small vessel. (Caes. Bell. Afr. 34.) He seems to have been the same as the C. Decius who was a friend of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16.) [L. S.]

Decius 1. M. Decius, one of the deputies sent to the senate by the plebeians during their secession to the sacred mount in B.C. 495. (Dionys. vi. 86.)

2. M. Decius, tribune of the people in B.C. 311, when he carried a plebiscitum, that the people should appoint dumeviri naves to restore and equip the Roman fleet. (Liv. ix. 30.)

3. P. Decius, one of the legates who in B.C. 186 brought to Rome the news of the defeat of the Illyrians, and of the capture of their king Genthius. (Liv. xii. 20.)

4. P. Decius, according to Cicero (de Orat. ii. 31) and Ammianus Victor (de Vill. III. 72), whereas Livy (ii. 61) calls him Q. Decius, was tribune of the people in B.C. 120. L. Optimus, who had been consul the year before, was brought to trial by the tribune Decius for having caused the murder of C. Gracchus, and for having thrown citizens
DECIUS.

Decius the wrongs he had inflicted upon Rhegium. He gave him something which he was to apply to his eyes, and which, however painful it might be, he was to continue till the physician should return from Messana. The order was obeyed, but the pain became at last quite unbearable, and Decius in the end found that he was quite blind. After the death of Pyrrhus, in B.C. 271, Fabricius was sent out against Rhegium; he besieged the place, and took it. All the survivors of the Campanian legion that fell into his hands, upwards of three hundred men, were sent to Rome, where they were scourged and beheaded in the forum. The citizens of Rhegium who were yet alive were restored to their native place. Decius put an end to himself in his prison at Rome. (Appian, Sannit. Excerpt. ix. 1—3; Diodor. Fragm. lib. xxii.; Liv. Epit. 13, 15; Polyb. i. 7; Val. Max. vii. 7. § 15.) [L. S.]

DECIUS, Roman emperor, A.D. 249—251, whose full name was G. MESSUUS QUINTUS TRAJANVS DECIUS, was born about the close of the second century at Bubalia, a village in Lower Pannonia, being the first of a long series of monarchs who traced their origin to an Illyrian stock. We are altogether unacquainted with his early career, but it appears to have been contrived, with an important military command upon the Danube in A.D. 245, and four years afterwards was earnestly solicited by Philippus to undertake the task of restoring subordination in the army of Moesin, which had been disorganized by the revolt of Marinus. [PHILIPPUS; MARINVS.] Decius accepted this appointment with great reluctance, and many misgivings as to the result. On his appearance, the troops deeming their guilt beyond forgiveness, offered the envoy the choice of death or of the throne. With the sword pointed to his heart he accepted the latter alternative, was proclaimed Augustus, and forced by the rebels to march upon Italy, having previously, according to Zonara, written to assure his sovereign that his faith was still unbroken, and that he would resign the purple as soon as he could escape from the thraldom of the legions. Philippus, not trusting these professions, hastened to meet his rival in the field, encountered him in the vicinity of Verona, was defeated, and slain. This event took place towards the end of A.D. 249.

The short reign of the new prince, extending to about thirty months, was chiefly occupied in warring against the Goths, who now, for the first time, appeared as a formidable foe on the northeastern frontier, and having crossed the Danube, under Guiva their chief, were ravaging the Thracian provinces. The details of their invasion are to be found in Jornandes, Zosimus, and the fragments of Desenipus, but these accounts appear so contradictory, that it is impossible, in the absence of an imperial historian, to explain or reconcile their statements. It would seem that the barbarians, in the first instance, repulsed Decius near Philippopolis, and were thus enabled to take that important city, but having lost their best troops during these operations, and finding themselves surrounded by the Romans who were now advancing from different points, they offered to purchase an unmolested retreat by the surrender of their prisoners and plunder. These overtures being rejected, the Goths turned to bay, and gave battled near Abritium late in the year A.D. 251. After a deadly struggle, their desperate valour, aided by the incalculable confidence of the Romans, prevailed. The son of the emperor was slain by an arrow, while Decius himself, with his best troops, became entangled in a marsh, and were cut to pieces or engulfed.

Some proceedings in the civil administration of this epoch, which at first sight would be considered as wholly without connexion with each other, but which were in reality intended to promote the accomplishment of the same object, deserve special attention. The increasing weakness of the state was every day becoming more painfully apparent, and the universal corruption of public morality was justly regarded as a deep-seated canker which must be eradicated, before any powerful effort could be made for restoring healthful vigour to the body politic. Two remedies suggested themselves, and were immediately called into action. It was determined to revive the censorship and to persecute the Christians. It was hoped that, by the first, order and decency might be revived in the habits of social life; it was imagined that, by the second, the national religion might be restored to its ancient purity, and that Rome might regain the favour of her gods. The death of Decius prevented the new censor, Valerian, the same who afterwards became emperor, from exerting an authority which could scarcely have produced any beneficial change; but the eager hate of Pagan zealots was more prompt in taking advantage of the imperial edict, and made much havoc in the church. Rome, Antioch, and Jerusalem, lamented the martyrdom of their bishops Fabianus, Bahylas, and Alexander; Origens was subjected to cruel tortures, while Alexandria was the scene of a bloody massacre. In Africa, vast numbers, falling away from the truth, disowned their belief, and after the danger was past, the readmission of these renegades, comprehended under the general appellation of Lapsi, gave rise to various bitter controversies, which distracted for a long period the ecclesiastical councils of the west. [CYPRIANES.]

Of the general character of Decius it is impossible to speak with certainty, for our authorities are scanty, and the shortness of his public career afforded little opportunity for its development. Victor pronounces a warm panegyric, declaring that his disposition was most amiable, that he was highly accomplished, mild and affable in his civil relations, and a gallant warrior in the field. Zosimus and the Christian historians, writing under the influence of strong feeling, have severally represented him as a model of justice, valour, liberality, and all kingly virtues, or as a monster of iniquity and savage cruelty, while even, in modern times, the tone adopted by Tillemont on the one hand, and by Gibbon on the other, can scarcely be pronounced fair or dispassionate, the language of the latter especially being such as to mislead the unlearned reader both as to the nature and extent of our information, and to induce him to conclude that we possess materials for pronouncing a judgment which do not in reality exist.

(Victor, De Caes. 29; Epist. 29; Entrop. ix. 4; Trebell. Pollio Valerian. c. 1; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi. 39, &c; Zosim. i. 21—23; Zonar. xii. 19, 20; Jornandes, R. G. c. 16, &c. For the family of Decius, see HERENNIA EPIREMUSILLA, HERENNII EPIREMUSICI, HISTILOIANUS.) [W. B.]

DECIUS, a Roman statuary, by whom there was an admired colossal head in the Capitol. He perhaps lived in the first century B.C., but his date is very doubtful. [CHARIS].

[PI. S.]

DECLANUS, a sophist of Patrae, who is mentioned with great praise by Lucian. [Asia. 2].

Nothing more is known of him. [P. S.]

DECLANUS, an architect and mechanic in the time of Hadrian, who employed him to move the colossus of Nero, which stood in front of the golden house. The work was effected by the aid of twenty-four elephants. (Spartian, Hist. 19, where different critics read Decianus, Decianianus, Decarianus, Decratianus, and Decremeatianus.) [P. S.]

DECIUS, commanded a stronghold in Africa during the insurrection of Taifaartius in A.D. 20. He was a brave and skilful soldier, and led his men out to an open battle, as he did not like the inactivity of a besieged. He had only a few soldiers, and they were not of the best kind; but although he was seriously wounded, he continued to fight like a lion, until he fell. [Tac. Ann. iii. 20]. [L. S.]

DEI'CTAES (Δεοκτάς), is mentioned by Paterius (Epist. 13) as an author from whom he relates the story about Harpaluce. We may thus infer that he wrote on mythical subjects. [L. S.]

DECTION (Δεκτικία), a Greek grammarian, who wrote a commentary on Lycophon's Cassandra, which is referred to in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. ἡμιο; comp. Valckenaer, Épiphr. Hippolyt. p. 291). [L. S.]

DEI'CTICUS, TULLIUS, was consul in b. c. 81, with Cornelius Dolabella, during the dictatorship of Sulla; but the consuls of that year were only nominal, as Sulla had all the power in his hands. (Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 14; Gallius, xv. 28; Appian, B. C. c. 100). [L. S.]

DEIANEIRA (Διανέαρα). 1. A daughter of Althaea by Oeneus, Dionysus, or Drexamenu (Apollod. i. 8. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 31, 33), and a sister of Meleager. When Meleager died, his sisters lamented his death at his grave; Artemis, in her anger touched them with her staff, and changed them into birds, with the exception of Deianeira and Gorge, who were allowed, by the solicitation of Dionysus, to retain their human forms. (Antonius, Lib. 2). Subsequently Achelous and Hercules, who both loved Deianeira, fought for the possession of her. She became the wife of Hercules, and afterwards unwittingly caused his death, whereupon she hung herself. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 3, 6. § 7; Diod. iv. 34, &c; comp. ACHAEIUS; HERACLES; DREXAMENUS.)

2. One of the daughters of Nereus and Doris. (Apollod. i. 2. § 7). [L. S.]

DEICOON (Δεικών). 1. A son of Hercules by Mepara, was killed by his own father during his ravings. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 9; Schol. ad Hom. Od. ix. 263).
DEIMA. 2. A Trojan hero, son of Pegasus, was a friend of Aeneas, and slain by Agamemnon. (Hom. II. v. 84.)

DEIDAMEIA (Δειδάμεια). 1. A daughter of Bellerophon and wife of Evander, by whom she became the mother of Sarpedon. (Dod. v. 79.) Homer (II. vi. 197) calls her Laodamia.

2. A daughter of Lycomedes in the island of Scyros. When Achilles was concealed there in maiden’s attire, Deidameia became by him the mother of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus, and, according to others, of Oneirias also. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 7; Ptolem. Heph. 3.)

3. The wife of Perithous, who is commonly called Hippodamia. (Plut. Thea. 39; comp. Hippodamia.)

DEIDAMEIA (Δειδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Aeaeus, king of Epeirus, and sister of Pyrrhus. While yet a girl she was betrothed by her father to Alexander, the son of Roxana, and having accompanied that prince and Olympias into Macedonia, was besieged in Pydna together with them. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4; Dod. xix. 35; Justin. xiv. 6.) After the death of Alexander and Roxana, she was married to Demetrias Poliorcetes, at the time when the latter was endeavouring to establish his power in Greece, and thus became a bond of union between him and Pyrrhus. (Plut. Demet. 25, Pyrrh. 4.) When Demetrias proceeded to Asia to support his father against the confederate kings, he left Deidameia at Athens; but after his defeat at Ipsus, the Athenians sent her away to Megara, though still treating her with royal honours. She soon after repaired to Cilicia to join Demetrias, who had just given his daughter Stratouene in marriage to Seleucus, but had not been there long when she fell ill and died, n. c. 300. (Plut. Demet. 30, 32.) She left one son by Demetrias, named Alexander, who is said by Plutarch to have spent his life in Egypt, probably in an honourable captivity. (Plut. Demet. 53.)

2. Daughter of Pyrrhus II., king of Epeirus, after the death of her father and the murder of her uncle Ptolemy, was the last surviving representative of the royal race of the Aeaeans. She threw herself into Ambrazia, but was induced by the offer of an honourable espousal to surrender. The Epikots, however, determining to secure her liberty by extirpating the whole royal family, resolved to put her to death; she fled for refuge to the temple of Artemis, but was murdered in the sanctuary itself. (Polyb. viii. 52; Justin. xxviii. 3, by whom she is erroneously called Laudamina; Paus. iv. 35. § 3.) The date of this event cannot be accurately fixed, but it occurred during the reign of Demetrias II. in Macedonia (n. c. 239—229), and probably in the early part of it. Schorn (Gesch. Griechenl. p. 86) supposes Deidameia to be a daughter of the elder Pyrrhus, not the younger, but this is certainly a mistake. [E. H. 13.]

DEIMA (Δείμα), the personification of fear. She was represented in the form of a fearful woman, the sister of Medesia, daughter of Medea’s children of Corinth. (Paus. ii. 3 § 6.)

DEIMACHUS (Δειμαχος), four mythical personages. (Apollod. i. 6 § 9, 7, § 3; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 955, c.; Plut. Quaest. Gr. 41.)

DEIMAS (Δίμας), a son of Dardanus and Chrysea, who when his family and a part of the Arcadian population emigrated, remained behind in Arcadia. (Dion. Hal. i. 61.)

DEINARCHUS (Δειναρχος). 1. The last and at the same time the least important among the ten Aetolian orators, born at Corinth about n. c. 361. (Dionys. Deinarch. 4.) His father’s name was Sosthenes, or, according to Suidas (s. a. Δειναρχος), Socrates. Though a native of Corinth, he lived at Athens from his early youth. Public oratory there reached its height about this time, and Deinarchus devoted himself to the study of it with great zeal under the guidance of Theophrastus, though he also profited much by his intercourse with Demetrias Phalerus. (Dionys. l. c. 2; Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 560; Phot. Bibli. p. 496, ed. Bekker; Suidas, l. c.) As he was a foreigner, and did not possess the Athenian franchise, he was not allowed to come forward himself as an orator on the great questions which then divided public opinion at Athens, and he was therefore obliged to content himself with writing orations for others. He appears to have commenced this career in his twenty-sixth year, about B. C. 336, and as about that time the great Attic orators died one after another, Deinarchus soon acquired considerable reputation and great wealth. He belonged to the friends of Phocion and the Macedonian party, and took a very active part in the disputes as to whether Harmipus, who had openly deserted the cause of Alexander the Great, should be tolerated at Athens or not. The time of his greatest activity is from B. C. 317 to B. C. 307, during which time Demetrias Phalerus conducted the administration of Athens. But when in B. C. 307 Demetrias Poliorcetes advanced against Athens, and Demetrias Phalerus obtained leave to take flight, Deinarchus, who was suspected on account of his equivocal political conduct, and who was anxious to save his riches, fled to Chalcis in Eu Boea. It was not till fifteen years after, B. C. 292, that, owing to the exertions of his friend Theophrasus, he obtained permission to return to Athens, where he spent the last years of his life, and died at an advanced age. The last event of his life of which we have any record, is a law-suit which he instituted against his faithless friend, Proxenus, who had robbed him of his property. But in what manner the suit ended, is unknown. The principal source of information respecting the life of Deinarchus is his treatise of Diaramous, from which is derived the greater part of what is preserved in Plutarch (Vit. X. Orat. p. 850), Photius (Bibl. p. 496, ed. Bekker), Suidas (L. c.), and others.

The number of orations which Deinarchus wrote is uncertain, for Demetrias of Magnesia (ap. Dionys. l. c. 1; comp. Suidas and Endec. p. 130) ascribed to him one hundred and sixty, while Plutarch and Photius speak only of sixty-four genuine orations; and Dionysius is of opinion, that among the eighty-seven which were ascribed to him in his time, only sixty were genuine productions of Deinarchus. Of all these orations three only have come down to us entire, and all three refer to the question of Harmipus. One was directed against the Phocians, and the third against Aristogeiton. It is, however, not improbable that the speech against Theocles, which is usually printed among those of Demostenes, is likewise a work of Deinarchus. (See pp. 1333 and 1336 of that oration; Dionys. Hal. l. c. 10; Libri. Argum.; Harpocrat. s. v. Æphoion and Θεοκλῆς; Apostol. Proverb. xix. 49.)
DEINARCHUS. 951

DEINIAS (Δεινίας). 1. One of a club of wits at Athens (γελωτούσων), called "the Sixty," of which the orator Callimedes also was a member. The date therefore may be placed about n. c. 325. (Athen. xiv. p. 614, c.) He is perhaps the same whom Demosthenes mentions as a skilful orator. (c. Lep. p. 501.)

DEINIAS, is mentioned by Pliny among the most ancient painters of monochromes. (xxxv. 8. s. 34.) [P. S.]

DEINOCRADES. [DEINOCRATES.]

DEINOCRATES (Δεινοκράτης). 1. A Syracusian, who was originally a friend of Agathocles, who on that account spared his life in the massacre at Syracuse by which he had established himself in the city. (Paus. b. c. 317.) Afterwards, however, in n. c. 312, we find Deinocrates commanding the Syracusan exiles in the war in which the Carthaginians supported them against Agathocles. The latter, when he fled from Africa and returned to Sicily at the end of n. c. 307, found Deinocrates at the head of so formidable an army, that he offered to abduct the tyrants and restore the exiles, stipulating only for the possession of two fortresses with the territory around them. But the ambition of Deinocrates, who preferred his present power to the condition of a private citizen in Syracuse, led him to reject the offer. Agathocles, however, defeated him in a battle, and then submitted. He was received into favour by the tyrants, who gave him the command of a portion of his forces, and retained him in his confidence to the end. (Diod. xix. 8, 104, xx. 77, 79, 89, 90.)

2. A Messenian, went to Rome in n. c. 133, to justify the revolt of Messene from the Achaean. On his arrival, his hopes were raised by finding that Phalinnutus, who was a personal friend of his and an enemy to Philopoemen, the Achaean leader, was about to pass into Greece on an embassy to Prusias and Seleucus. Phalinnutus promised him his services, and, when he had reached Naupactus, sent to Philopoemen and the other magistrates, desiring them to call an assembly of the Achaean. Philopoemen, however, was aware that Phalinnutus had not come with any instructions on the subject from the senate, and he therefore answered that he would comply with his request if he would first state the points on which he wished to confer with the assembly. This he did not venture to do, and the hopes of Deinocrates accordingly fell to the ground. Shortly after this, Philopoemen was taken prisoner by the Messenians, and Deinocrates was prominent among those who caused him to be put to death. In the ensuing year the authors of the revolt were obliged to yield to the wishes of the Messenian people for peace, and Lycurgas, the Achaean general, having been admitted into the city, commanded the execution of Deinocrates and the chiefs of his party; but Deinocrates anticipated the sentence by suicide. His qualifications as a state were, according to Polybius, of the most superficial character. In political respects, for instance, he was utterly deficient. (Polyb. xxv. 5, 12; Liv. xxxix. 49; Plut. Philop. 18—21; Plin. nat. Hist. 20.)

DEINOCRATES (Δεινοκράτης), a most distinguished Macedonian architec in the time of Alexander the Great. He was the architect of the new temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which was built after the destruction of the former temple by Herostratus. [Cheriphron.] He was employed by Alexander, whom he accompanied into Egypt, in the building of Alexandria. Deinocrates laid out the ground and erected several of the principal buildings. Besides the works which he actually erected, he formed a design for cutting mount Atlas into a statue of Alexander, to whom he presented his plan upon his accession to the throne; but the king forbade the execution of the project. The right hand of the figure was to have held a city, and in the left there would have been a basin, in which the water of all the mountain streams was to pour, and thence into the sea. Another curious work which he did not live to finish, is mentioned under Arsinöe [pp. 366, 367]: this fixes the time of the architect's death. The so-called monument of Hephaestion by Deinocrates was only a funeral pile (τραύμα, Diod. xvi. 115), though a very magnificent one. It formed a pyramid, rising in successive terraces, all adorned with great magnificence. (Plin. v. 10, s. 11, vii. 37, s. 39, xxxiv. 14, s. 42; Vitruv. i. 1 § 4, ii. praef.; Strab. xiv. pp. 640, 641; Val. Max. i. 4, ext. 1; Amm. Marc. xxii. 16; Scal. 38, 43; Plut. Alex. 72, de Alex. Vict. ii. § 2; Lucian, pro Ioann. c. de cons. Hist. 12; Tzetzs. Chil. viii. 190, xii. 387.) There is immense confusion among these writers about the architect's name. Pliny calls him Dinocharis, or, according to some of the MSS., Tymochares or Timocharis; Stobæus has Xepocharis; Plutarch, Xepocharis; and, among other variations, Eustathius (ad Hom. ii. § 239) calls him Dios of Theboum. [P. S.]

DEINÖLOUCHUS (Δείνολοχος), a comic poet of Syracuse or Agrigentum, was, according to, some, the son, according to others, the disciple of Epicharmus. He lived about b. c. 498, and wrote fourteen plays in the Doric dialect, about which he only knew from a few titles, that some of them were on mythological subjects. (Suid. s. v.; Fauriel, Bibl. Grecque. ii. p. 436; Gysinus, de Doriens. Comm. i. p. 81.)

DEINÖMACHA (Δεινομάχη), daughter of Meganeus, the head of the Alemaonidae, grand-daughter of Cleisthenes, and mother of Lahibius. (Plut. Aet. 1; Athen. v. p. 219, c.; Ael. V. H. ii. 1; see also Alcibiades, p. 92, n., and the passages there referred to.)

DEINÖMACUS (Δεινομάχος), a philosopher, who agreed with Calliphus in considering the chief good to consist in the union of virtue with bodily welfare, which Cicero calls a joining of the man with the beast. The doctrine is thus further expounded by Empedocles, who states that there is an equilibrium between virtue and vice, and both are of them evil to man; but pleasure is so from the first, while virtue only becomes so after experience. (Cic. de Fin. v. 8, de Off. iii. 33, Tusc. Quaest. v. 39; Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 21.) The Deinomachus, whom Lucian introduces in the Philopseudes, is of course a different person, and possibly a fictitious character. [E. E.]

DEINO'/MENES (Δεινόμην). 1. Father of Gelon, Hiero, and Thaerusius, successively tyrants of Syracuse. (Herod. vii. 145; Pind. Pyth. i. 154, ii. 34.)

2. One of the guards of Hieronymus, king of Syracuse, in the plot against whose life he joined. When Hieronymus had marched into Leontini, and had arrived opposite the house where the murderers were posted, Deinomenes, who was close behind him, stopped under pretence of exalitig his foot from a knot which confined it, and thus checked the advance of the multitude, and separated the king from his guards. The assassins then rushed on Hieronymus and slew him. (n. c. 215.) His attendants turned their weapons against Deinomenes, but he escaped with a few wounds, and was soon after elected by the Syracusans one of their generals. (Liv. xxiv. 7, 25.) [B. E.]

DEINO'MENES (Δεινόμην), a sotyntary, whose statues of Io, the daughter of Inachus, and Callisto, the daughter of Lycaon, stood in the Acropolis at Athens in the time of Pausanias. (Paus. i. 25, § 1.) Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19) mentions him among the artists who flourished in the 95th Olympiad, n. c. 400, and adds, that he made statues of Protasithia and Pythodorus the wrestler. (A. H. § 15.) Taittian mentions a statue by him of Besantia, queen of the Paeans. (Orat. ad Graec. 53, p. 116, ed. Worr.) His name appears on a base, the statue belonging to which is lost. (Bökina, Corp. Inscrip. i. No. 470.) [P. S.]

DEION (Δείων), one of the chief men of Rhodes, who, when the war broke out between Perseus and the Romans (n. c. 171), vainly endeavored to induce his countrymen to pay no regard to the letter which C. Lucretius had sent to ask for ships, and which Deion pretended was a forgery of their enemy Eumenes, king of Pergamus, designed to involve them in a ruinous war. But, though he failed on this occasion, he still kept up a strong opposition to the Roman party. In n. c. 167, after the defeat of Perseus, the Rhodians delivered him up to the Romans by way of propitiating them. Polybius calls him a bold and crouetous adventurer, and censures him for what he considers an unworthy clinging to life after the ruin of his fortunes. (Polyb. xxvi. 6, 11, xxvii. 2, xxviii. 5, xxx. 6—8; Liv. xiv. 1. 28, 29, xiv. 22.) [E. E.]

DEION or DEIRON (Δείων, Δειρόν), one of the men of Cleitarchus, the historian of Alexander's expedition. He wrote a history of Persia, to which C. Nepos (Con. 5) refers as the most trustworthy authority on the subject. He had, however, a large fund of credulity, as we may trust Pliny. (H. N. x. 49.) He quotes also in the following passages—Plut. Alex. 9, Artax. 1, G. 9, 10, 13, 19, 22, Them. 27; Aeth. ii. p. 67, b., iv. p. 146, c., xl. p. 593, f., xxvii. pp. 556, b., 560, 6, 609, a., xiv. pp. 633, d., 652, b.; Cic. de Div. i. 25; Ael. H. A. xvii. 10, V. H. vii. 11; Diog. Laert. i. 8, ix. 50, in which two passages we also find the erroneous reading Alc. [E. E.]

DEINO'STRATUS (Δεινόστρατος), a geometer. He is stated by Ptolomaus to have been one of the brother of Menaechnus, and a contemporary and follower of Plato. (Comm. in Evol. c. iv.) The two brothers, according to Ptolomaus, made the whole of geometry more perfect (τευχομεν) than before. Pappus (lib. iv. prop. 25) has handled down the curve which is called the quadratrix of Deinostatus for squaring the circle, which Nicomedes and others afterwards used. This curve is made by the intersection of a revolving radius of a circle with a line moving perpendicularly to the first position of that radius, both moving uniformly, and so that the extremity of the moving perpendicular descends from the circumference to the centre while the revolving radius describes a right angle.

[A. De M.]

DEIOCES (Διοκέτης), the founder of the Median empire, according to Herodotus, who states that, after the Assyrians had held the empire of Upper Asia 520 years, various nations revolted from them, and first of all the Medes. Soon after this, Deioces, the son of Phimortes, a wise man among the Medes, desiring the tyranny, became an arbiter for his own village; and the fame of his justice attracted to him suitors from all quarters, till at last the Medes chose him for their king. He immediately assumed great royal state, and made the Medes provide him with a body-guard and build him a fort. He then built the city of Agbatami (Ecbatana), in the centre of which he resided, hidden from the public view and transacting all business through messengers, in order, says Herodotus, to prevent the plots which his former equals might have been drawn into by jealousy. The few who were admitted to his presence were required to observe the strictest decorum. His administration of justice was very severe, and he kept a body of spies and informers throughout the whole country. After a reign of thirty-five years, during which he ruled the six tribes of the Medes without attempting any foreign conquest, Deioces died, and was succeeded by his son, Phimortes. (Herod. i. 93—102.)

There are considerable difficulties in settling the chronology of the Median empire. Herodotus gives the reigns as follows:

Deioces 53 years. (i. 102.)
Phimortes 22 (ibid.)
Cyaxares 40 (i. 106.)*
Astyages 33 (i. 130.)

Total, 150

Now, since the accession of Cyrus was in B.C. 560—533, the accession of Deioces would fall in B.C. 710—709, which is confirmed by Diodorus (ii. 32), who says that, "according to Herodotus, Cyaxares [meaning Deioces] was chosen king in the second year of the 17th Olympiad." (n. c. 711—710.) It also agrees with what may be inferred from Scripture, and is expressly stated by Josephus (Ant. x. 2), that the Medes revolted after the destruction of the army of Sennacherib, and the death of that king. (v. c. 711.) Moreover, the Lydian dynasty of the Mermnadse is computed by Herodotus to have lasted 170 years, down to the taking of Sardis in B.C. 546. It therefore began in B.C. 716. Now, it may be inferred, with great probability, from the statements of Herodotus, that the Mermnadse, who preceded the Mermnadi in Lydia, were Assyrian governors. If so, here is another reason for believing that the great Assyrian empire was broken up in consequence of the destruction of its army at the Battle of Sennacherib. The small difference by which the last date (B.C. 716) exceeds what it ought to be according to this view, might be expected from the difficulty of fixing these dates within two or three years; and, moreover, the date of the capture of Sardis is disputed, some bringing it as low as B.C. 542.

A difficulty still remains. Herodotus mentions an interregnum, and it seems from his language to have been not a short one, between the revolt of the Medes and the accession of Deioces; and he is supposed to give the sum total of the Median rule as 156 years. With reference to the former point, it may be supposed that the 53 years assigned to Deioces include the interregnum, a supposition extremely probable from the length of the period, especially as the character which Deioces had gained before his accession makes it most unlikely that he was a very young man; and, on the other hand, the Scriptural chronology forbids our carrying up the revolt of the Medes higher than B.C. 712 at the very utmost. As to the supposed period of 156 years, the truth is, that Herodotus says nothing about such a period. He says (i. 130), that the Medes had ruled over Asia above the river Halys 128 years, πάντας δὲ τοὺς εἰς Ἑρμήνευμα ἱπποὺς, which does not mean, that the 28 years of the Scythian rule are to be added to the 126 years, but that they are to be deducted from it. The question then arises, from what period are the 126 years to be dated? The most probable solution seems to be that of Kalinsky and Clinton, who supposed that the date to which the 128 years would lead us back, namely (559+128=687) B.C., was that of the accession of Deioces, and that the 22 years which remain out of the 53 ascribed to him by Herodotus (v. c. 748—687) formed the period of the interregnum.

The account of Cyrus, which is preserved by Diodorus, is altogether different from that of Herodotus. After relating the revolt of Arbaces [Arbaces], he gives the following series of Median reigns (ii. 32—34):

1. Arboes 28 years.
2. Mandanes 50
3. Sosaneus 30
4. Artaces 50
5. Arbiaces 22
6. Artaces 40
7. Artynes 22
8. Astibar 40
9. Asparas, whom he identifies with Astyages [Asparas] [35] with Astyages 317

This would place the revolt of the Medes in B.C. (559+317=876). Now this account disagrees with that of Herodotus in all the names, and in the events ascribed to each reign, except the last; but the two lists agree in the numbers assigned to the last three reigns.

In the list of Eusebius, the fifth king, Arbaces, is omitted, and then follow Deioces, Phimortes, Cyaxares, Ashadages (Astyages), as in Herodotus, but with different numbers, whence Clinton conjectures that the 25 years assigned to Arbaces were really those of the interregnum before Deioces. No successful attempt has yet been made to reconcile Herodotus, Ctesias, and Eusebius. Diodorus supposed the interregnum of Herodotus to extend over several ages, and Eusebius adopts the same

* Including the 23 years of the Scythian rule, αὐτὸς τοῖς Ἑρμήνευμα ἱπποῖς.

* This number, which is omitted by Diodorus, is supplied from Herodotus.
DEIOTARUS.

idea in his tables, when he reckons a long period without kings between Arubes and Deioea. (Compare Sarapaneus, and Clinton, F. H. i. Append. c. 3.) [P. S.]

DEIOCHUS (Διοκχος), of Proconnesus, is mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Hist. i. 25) as one of the earliest Greek historians, who lived previous to the time of Herodotus. He is probably the same person as the Deiochaus, whom Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Διοκχος) calls a native of Cyzicus, and who wrote a work on Cyzicus (μετὰ Κυζικοῦ), which is frequently referred to by the Schoolmist on Apollonius Rhodius, who, however, calls him by his proper name only once (on l. 189), and in all the passages refers to him under the name of Διοκχος, or Διοκχος. (Schol. ad Apoll. i. 981, 966, 976, 987, 988, 1037, 1062, 1063, 1065, 1155, 1086. [L. S.]

DEION (Διον). 1. A son of Aeolus and Eratoe, was king in Phocis and husband of Diomedé, by whom he became the father of Asterope, Acteus, Actor, Phylacus, and Cephalus. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3, 9. § 4.) After the death of his brother, Salmoneus, he took his daughter Tertea into his house, and gave her in marriage to Cretheus. His name occurs also in the form Deionus. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1683.)

2. A son of Hercules and Megara, and brother of Deicoon. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 6.) [L. S.]

DEIONE (Διονη). It is, that the daughter of Deo or Deemer, is used as a name for Persophone. (Callimach. Fragm. 48.) It occurs also as a proper name of the mother of Miletus. (Cv. Met. ix. 442.) [L. S.]

DEIONEUS (Διόνεας). 1. Father of Dion. When he violently extorted from his son-in-law the bridal gifts, Dion invited him to his house, and caused him to be thrown into a pit filled with fire, in which he perished. (Pind. Pyth. ii. 30.)

2. A son of Dorymus of Oechalia, whom Theseus married to Perigune, the daughter of Sinna. (Plut. These. 8.) [L. S.]

DEIOPHA (Διόφηα), a daughter of Triptolemus and mother of Edomopus, or, according to others, of Triptolemus. (Paus. i. 14. § 2; Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 1108; Aristot. Mirab. 145, 291.) [L. S.]

DEIOPHA, a fair Lydian nymph, who belonged to the suite of Hera, and whom she promised as a reward to Aeolus if he would assist her in destroying the fleet of Aeneas. (Virg. Aen. i. 79.) [L. S.]

DEIOPITIS (Διοπίτης), a son of Priam, who was slain by Odysseus. (Hom. Il. xii. 420; Apollod. iii. 12. § 8.) [L. S.]

DEIOTARUS (Διοταρος). 1. Tetrach of Cappadokia, who is said by Plutarch to have been a very old man in n. c. 54, when Crassus, passing through Galatia on his Parthian expedition, milled him on his building a new city at his time of life. He must therefore have attained to mature manhood in n. c. 95, the year of the birth of Cato of Utica, whose father's friend was he, and who, we know, was left an orphan at a very early age, (Plut. Crass. 17, Cat. Min. 12. 15; Pseudo-Appian, Parth. p. 136; comp. Cato, p. 647, a.) Deiotarus adhered firmly to the Romans in their wars in Asia, and in n. c. 74 defeated in Phrygia the generals of Mithridates. For his services he was honoured by the senate with the title of king, and, probably in n. c. 55, the year of the death of Mithridates, had Gadelonitis and Armenia Minor added to his dominions. Appian, apparently by an oversight, says that Pompey made him tetrach of Galatia. He succeeded, indeed, doubtless by Roman favour, in encroaching on the rights of the other tetrarchies of that district, and obtaining nearly the whole of it for himself. (Strab. xii. pp. 547, 557; Cass. ad loc.; Plut. Pompey 39; Appian, Bell. Mithr. 114; Cic. pro Deiot. 13, Phil. xi. 12, de Harr. Resp. 13; Hist. Bell. Alex. 97.) In n. c. 51, when Cicero was encamped at Cyzistra on the borders of Cappadocia, for the protection of Cappadocia and Sileia against the Parthians, Deiotarus offered to join him with all his forces, and was indeed on his way to do so, when Cicero sent to inform him that events had rendered his assistance unnecessary. (Cic. Phil. xi. 18, ad Fam. viii. 10, xv. 1, 2, 4.) In the civil war, Deiotarus attached himself to the cause of Pompey, together with whom he effected his escape in a ship after the battle of Pharsalia in n. c. 48. (Plut. Pompey 75; Appian, Bell. Civ. ii. 71; Caes. Bell. Civ. iii. 4; Cic. de Bello iv. 97, pro Deiot. 3, 4; Lucan. Phars. v. 20, 8. 209.) In n. c. 47 he applied to Domitian, who accepted his submission. (Suet. Cael. 81.) Against Pharnaces, who had taken possession of Armenia Minor, and who in the campaign which followed defeated the Roman and Galatian forces near Nicopolis. (Hirt. Bell. Alex. 34—41, 65—77; Appian, Bell. Civ. ii. 91; Plut. Caes. 50; Dion Cass. xili. 45—48; Sueton. Jul. 85; Cic. ad Fam. xv. 15, pro Deiot. 5.) When Caesar, in the same year, came into Asia from Egypt, Deiotarus received him with submission, and endeavoured to excuse the aid he had given to Pompey. According to Hierius (Bell. Alex. 57, 79), Caesar left him his title of king, but gave his tetrarchy to Mithridates of Pergamus. Cicero tells us (de Bello i. 18, comp. Phil. ii. 37), that he was deprived both of his tetrarchy and kingdom, not however of his regal title (pro Deiot. 13), and fined. (Dion Cass. xili. 63.) That Caesar did indeed bestow on Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, a portion of the kingdom of Deiotarus, but that he gave the latter a part of what he took away from Pharnaces, and so in fact enlarged his territory; but this seems inconsistent with the whole tenor of what we find in Cicero.

In the autumn of the same year, the cause of Deiotarus was unsuccessfully pleaded by Brutus before Caesar at Niraea in Bithynia. (Cic. Brut. 5, ad Att. xiv. 1.) In n. c. 45, he was defended by Cicero before Caesar, in the house of the latter at Rome, in the speech (pro Ruy Deiotaro) still extant. From this it appears that his grandson, Castor, had accepted of a design against Caesar's life when he received him in Galatia, and also of an intention of sending troops to the aid of Cæcilius Bussus. (See p. 472.) Strabo, however, speaks of Castor as the son-in-law of Deiotarus, and says that the old king put him to death together with his wife, Deiotarus's own daughter; and Suidas tells us that he did so because Castor had accused him to Caesar. Vossius conjectures that the Castor mentioned by Cicero was son to the one whom Strabo and Suidas speak of, and that Deiotarus put the latter to death because he had instigated the younger Castor to accuse him. (Strab. xii. p. 566; Suid. s. v. Κταόν; Cass. Bell. Civ. iii. 4; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 12; Voss. de Hist. Græc. p. 203, ed. Westerman; comp. the language of Cicero, pro Deiot. 10, 11.) At this time Bessamias and Ilera, DEIPHOBUS. emissaries of Deiotarus, were at Rome to look after his interests (Cic. pro Deiot. 14, 15); and they were still there in the following year, u. c. 44, when Hiernia, after the murder of Caesar, appears to have obtained from Antony, through Fulvia, the restitution of his master's dominions for 10,000 sesterces (88,541L. 13s. 4d.). Deiotarus, however, had seized by force on the territory in question as soon as he heard of Caesar's death. (Cic. Phil. ii. 37, ad Att. xiv. 12, 19, xvi. 3.) In u. c. 42, he joined the party of Brutus and Cassius at the request of the former, and after Cassius had vainly endeavoured to attach him to them. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24.) He was succeeded by Deiotarus II. (No. 2), his only surviving son, all the rest of his children having been put to death by him, according to Plutarch, in order that his kingdom in the hands of his successor might not be born of its power. (Plut. de Stoic. Rerum. 32.) This account, if true, warns us to make a large deduction from the praises lavished on him by Cicero. He appears to have had a full share of superstition, and to have been in the habit of paying much attention to auguries. (Cic. de Div. i. 15, ii. 38, 37.)

DEIPYLE. 955 also slew Ascalaphus, and while he was tearing the helmet from his enemy's head, he was wounded by Mercirius, and led out of the tumult by his brother, Polites. (xiii. 517, &c.) When Aethina wanted to deceive Hector in his fight with Achilles, she assumed the appearance of Deiphobus. (xxii. 227,) He accompanied Helen to the wooden horse in which the Achaeans were concealed. (Od. iv. 276.) Later traditions describe him as the conqueror of Achilles, and as having married Helen after the death of Paris, for he had loved her, it is said, before, and had therefore prevented her being restored to the Greeks. (Hygin. Fab. 110; Dictys. Cret. i. 10, iv. 22; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 169; Tat. ad Lycoth. 169; Schol. ad Hom. H. xxiv. 251; Eurip. Troch. 960.) It was for this reason that, on the fall of Troy all the hatred of the Achaeans was let loose against him, and Odysseus and Menelaus rushed to his house, which was among the first that were consumed by the flames. (Hom. Od. viii. 517; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 310.) He himself was killed by Helen (Hygin. Fab. 240); according to other traditions, he fell in battle against Palamedes (Dares Phryg. 26); or he was slain and fearfully mangled by Menelaus (Dict. Cret. v. 13; Quint. Smyrn. xiii. 384, &c.; Etalath. ad Hom. p. 894.) In this fearful condition he was found in the lower world by Aeacids, who erected a monument to him on cape Rhohestus. (Virg. Aen. vi. 485, &c.) His body, which remained unburied, was believed to have been changed into a plant need not hypochondria. (Paus. viii. 22 § 2) saw a statue of him at Olympia, a work of Lycius, which the inhabitants of Apollonia had dedicated there.

2. A son of Hippolytus at Amyclaia, who purified Hercules after the murder of Iphithus. (Apollod. ii. 6 § 2; Diod. iv. 31.) [L. S.]

DEIPHONTES (Διπόντης), a son of Antimachus, and husband of Hymetos, the daughter of Temenus the Heracleide, by whom he became the father of Antimenes, Xanthippus, Argeus, and Orsobia. When Temenus, in the division of Peloponnesus, had obtained Argos as his share, he bestowed all his attentions upon Hymetos and her husband, for which he was murdered by his sons, who themselves neglected. But after the death of Temenus, the army declared for Hymetos and the right of his successors. (Apollod. ii. 8 § 5.) According to Pausanias (ii. 19 § 1), the sons of Temenus formed indeed a conspiracy against their father and Deiphontes; but after Temenus's death it was not Deiphontes that succeeded him, but Ceusus. Deiphontes, on the other hand, is said to have lived at Epidaurus, whither he went with the army which was attached to him, and from whence he expelled the Tyanian king, Pityreus. (Paus. ii. 26 § 2.) His brothers-in-law, however, who grudged him the possession of their sister Hymetos, went to Epidaurus, and tried to persuade her to leave her husband; and when this attempt failed, they carried her off by force. Deiphontes, who was not with them, was killed one of them, Cerynes, he wrestled with the other, who held his sister in his arms. In this struggle, Hymetos was killed by her own brother, who then escaped. Deiphontes carried her body back to Epidaurus, and there erected a sanctuary to her. (Paus. ii. 28 § 3.) [L. S.]

DEIPYLE (Διπύλη), a daughter of Aeadrus and Amphithea. She was the wife of Tydcus, by whom she became the mother of Diomedes. (Apoll. i. 8 § 5, 9 § 13.) Servius (ad Aen. l. 101) and Hyginus (Fab. 69) call her Delphie. [L. S.]

DEITYLUS (Δείτυλος), three mythical beings concerning whom nothing of interest is related. (Hom. Il. v. 325; Hygin. Fab. 15, 109.) [L. S.]

DEJIUS and DEJILA (Δεϊϊς and Δεϊλα, surnames of Apollo and Artemis respectively), which are derived from the island of Delos, the birthplace of these two divinities. (Verg. Aen. vi. 12, Eclog. vii. 29; Val. Flacc. l. 446; Orph. Hymn. 33. 8.) They are likewise applied, especially in the plural, to other divinities that were worshipped in Delos, viz. Demeter, Aphrodite, and the nymphs. (Aristoph. Thesm. 323; Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 169, Hymn. in Del. 323; Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. Del. 157.) [L. S.]

Q. DEIUS, a Roman eques, who seems to have lived as a negotiator in Asia, where in n. c. 44 he joined Dolabella. Afterwards he went over to Cassius and then joined M. Antony, who sent him, in n. c. 41, to Egypt to summon Cleopatra to appear before him at Tarsus in Cilicia. Cleopatra, trusting to the power of her personal charms, obeyed the command and went to Antony. In n. c. 36, Dellius was engaged on some business in Judaea, and on that occasion he is said to have advised Alexander, the daughter of Hyrcanus and widow of Alexander, to send the portraits of her beautiful children to Antony in order to win the favour of the trimviri. In the same year he accompanied Antony on his expedition against the Parthians. In n. c. 34, when Antony marched into Armenia, Dellius was sent before him to Armenia, to pull him into security by treacherous promises. When the war of Actium broke out, n. c. 31, Dellius and Amyntas were sent by Antony from Galatia to Macedonia to collect auxiliaries; but before the fatal battle was fought, Dellius deserted to Octavian. This step was nothing extraordinary in a man of his kind, who had successively belonged to all the parties of the time; but he is said to have been led to this last desertion by his fear of the fate of his father. (Strab. x. p. 523, with Casanbon's correction.) This work is completely lost, and we cannot even say whether it was written in Latin or in Greek; but we have reason for believing that Plutarch's account of that war (Ant. 87—52) was taken from Dellius, so that probably we possess at least an abridgment of the work. (Plut. Ant. 59.) In the time of Seneque (Ses. p. 7) there existed some letters of Dellius to Cleopatra of a lascivious nature, which are now likewise lost. Our Q. Dellius is probably the same person as the Dellius to whom Horace addressed the beautiful third ode of the second book. (Comp. Dion Cass. xix. 39, l. 13, 23; Vell. Pat. ii. 84; Joseph. Ant. Jud. xv. 2 § 6; Plut. Ant. 25; Zonar. x. 29; Senece de Clement. i. 10.) [L. S.]

DELMATICUS, a surnamed of L. Cassius Metellus, consul in n. c. 119. [METELLUS.]

DELMATIO or DALMATIO. 1. Son of Constantius Chlorus and his second wife, Flavia Maximina Theodora. From his half-brother, Constantine the Great, he received the title of censor, which had lain dormant since the attempt of Decius to revive it in the person of Valerian, and now appears for the last time among the dignitaries of Rome. Dalmatio was entrusted with the task of investigating the charge brought by the Arians against Athanasius of having murdered Arsenius, bishop of Hypsela [ATHANASIUS, p. 394], and appears to have died before the year a. d. 335. (Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. p. 283.) He was the father of

2. FLAVIUS JULIUS DELMATIO, who was educated at Narbonne under the care of the rhetorician Exaporrias; distinguished himself by suppressing the rebellion of Calcearius in Cyprus; was appointed consul a. d. 333; two years afterwards was created Caesar by his uncle, whom he is said to have ressembled strongly in disposition; upon the division of the empire received Thrace, Macedonia, together with Achaia, as his portion; and was put to death by the soldiers in a. d. 337, sharing the fate of the brothers, nephews, and chief ministers of Constantine.

It must be observed that there is frequently great difficulty in distinguishing Dalmatio the father from Dalmatio the son. Many historians believe the former to have been the consul of a. d. 333, and the conqueror of Calcearius, the date of whose revolt is very uncertain. A few coins of the younger in gold, silver, and small brass, are too to be found in all large collections, and on these his name is conjointed with the title of Chesar and Prisippeos Augusteoteis, the orthography being for the most part Dalmatiois, although Dalmatioiis also occasionally appears. (Asiiin. Prof. 17; Vitor. Epit. 41, de Caesar, 1, Excerpt. Vales. § 35; Theophan. Chronograph. p. 262; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. pp. 251, 259, 261, 313, and his note, p. 664, in which he discusses at length the dates connected with the history of Dalmatioiis and Hannibalians. [W. R.]

DELPHNIA (Δειφνία), a surnamed of Artemisia at Athens. (Pollux, x. 119.) The masculine form Delphinus is used as a surnamed of Apollo, and is derived either from his slaying the dragon Delphine or Delphyne (usually called Python), who guarded the oracle at Pytho, or from his having shewn the Cretan colonists the way to Delphi, while riding on a dolphin or metamorphosing himself into a dolphin. (Theod. Lyceph. 206.) Under this name Apollo had temples at Athens, Chios, in Cret, Cydima, and Massalia. (Paus. i. 19. § 1; Plut. Thes. 14; Strab. iv. p. 179; Müller, Asiect. p. 154.)

DELPHUS (Δήφος). 1. A son of Poseidon and Melanthe, a daughter of Deucalion, from whom the town of Delphi was believed to have derived its name. (Theod. Lyceph. 206; comp. Ov. Met. vi. 130.)

2. A son of Apollo by Celaeno, the daughter of Hyamus, and, according to others, by Thymis, the daughter of Castorius, or by Melaena, the daughter of Cepheus. Tradition pointed to him also as DEMADOLAS, an Athenian statesman and orator, a contemporary of Philip, Alexander the Great, and Antipater. He is said to have been a person of very low origin, and to have at one time even served as a rover. (Quintil. ii. 17. § 12; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. ii. 16; Suidas, s. v. Δημάδωλος.) But by his extraordinary talents, his demagogic artifices, and treachery, he rose to a very prominent position at Athens; he used his influence, however, in such a manner, that Plutarch (Phoc. 1) justly terms him the ἀξιώτως, that is, the shipwreck or ruin of the city. He belonged to the Macedonian party, and entertained a deadly hatred of Demosthenes, against whom he came forward as early as the time of the war against Olynthus, n. c. 349 (Suidas, l. c.), and to whom he continued hostile to the last; for when, on the approach of Antipater and Craterus, Demosthenes and his friends quitted the city, Demades induced the people to pronounce sentence of death upon them. (Plut. Demosth. 28; Phot. Biblioth. p. 69, ed. Bekker.) In the battle of Chaeronea he fell into the hands of the Macedonians; and when Philip, during the revelries with which he celebrated his victory, reviewed the prisoners, Demades frankly but politely blamed him for his conduct, and Philip was so well pleased with the flattery imputed in the censure, that he not only restored Demades to his liberty, but set free all the Athenian prisoners without ransom, and concluded a treaty of friendship with Athens. (Diog. xvi. 87; Gell. xii. 10; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. i. 13.) The manner in which he was treated by the king on that occasion, and the rich presents he received from him—it is said that he once received the large sum of ten talents—made him an active champion in the cause of Macedonia, to whose interests he literally sold himself. He pursued the same course towards Alexander, the son and successor of Philip; and his flattery towards the young king went so far, that the Athenians, unable to bear it, inflicted a heavy fine upon him. (Aelian, V. H. v. 12; Athen. vi. p. 251.) But when Heracles came to Athens, Demades, not scruple to accuse his bribes also. (Deinarch. c. Demosth. § 89, c. Aristog. § 15.) When Alexander subsequently demanded the surrender of the Athenian orators who had instigated the people against him, Demades was bribed by the friends of Demosthenes with five talents to use his influence to save him and the other patriots. He accordingly framed a cunning decree, in which the people excused the orators, but promised to surrender them, if they should be found guilty. The decree was passed, and Demades with a few others was sent as ambassador to Alexander, and prevailed upon the king to pardon the Athenians and their orators. (Diog. vili. 15; Plut. Demosth. 32.) In n. c. 338 he undertook the administration of a part of the public money at Athens, which Böck (Polid. Econ. of Athens, p. 169, &c., 2nd edit.) has shown to have been the theoren; and when the people demanded of him a sum of money to support those who had revolted against Alexander, Demades persuaded them to give up that plan by appealing to their love of pleasure. (Plut. Fronto. Rei Publ. Ger. 25.) By thus supporting the Macedonian cause, and yet receiving large bribes from the opposite party when opportunities offered, he acquired considerable property, which however was squandered by his extravagant and dissolute mode of living. His conduct was so bad, and he so recklessly violated the laws of his country, that he was frequently punished with heavy fines, and once even with atima. But in n. c. 322, when Antipater marched with his army against Athens, the people, who were alarmed in the highest degree, and had no one to mediate between them and Antipater, recalled their sentence of atima, and sent Demades, with Phocion and some others, as ambassadors to Antipater, who however refused, perhaps on the instigation of Demades, to grant peace on any other terms than complete submission. (Diog. xviil. 18; Paus. vii. 10. § 1.) In n. c. 318, when Antipater was ill in Macedonia, the Athenians, unable to bear the pressure of the Macedonian garrison in Mynychin, sent Demades as ambassador to him with a petition to remove the garrison. Antipater was at first inclined to listen to the request; but while Demades was staying with him, Antipater discovered among the papers left by Perdiccas some letters addressed to him by Demades, in which he urged Perdiccas to come to Europe and attack Antipater. The latter at first kept his discovery secret; but when Demades pressed him for an answer respecting the removal of the garrison, two Mymychin, Antipater, without giving any answer, gave up Demades and his son, Deneas, who had accompanied his father on this embassy, to the executioners, who forthwith put them to death. (Diog. xviil. 48; Arrian, ap. Phot. Biblioth. p. 70; Athen. xiii. p. 581.) Plutarch (Phoc. 30) attributes the execution of Demades to Cassander.

Demades was a man without character or principle, and was accessible to bribes from whatever quarter they came, ever ready to betray his country and his own party. Even the good he did sprang from the basest motives. The ancients have preserved many features which illustrate his conduct. Three is a celebrated story preserved by Diodorus: (th. 1, 20, 30, Proor. Rei Publ. Ger. 25; Athen. xii. 44; Aelian, V. H. xii. 13.) He owed his influence in the public affairs of Athens to his natural skill and his brilliant oratorical powers, which were the pure gift of nature, and which he never cultivated according to the rules of art. He always spoke extemporarily, and with such irresistible force and abundance of wit, that he was a perfect match for Demosthenes himself, and Quintilian does not hesitate to place him by the side of Pericles. (Cic. Orat. 26, Brut. 9; Plut. Demosth. 8, 10, 11, Apophth. p. 101; Quintil. ii. 17. § 12, xil. 10. § 48.) Both Cicero and Quintilian express the belief that Demades left no written orations behind him. But from a passage in Tzetzes (Chil. vi. 36), it is clear that the rhetorician, from whom he copied, possessed orations which were attributed to Demades. There is extant a large fragment of an oration bearing the name of Demades (ποίημα Θρακεράος), which must have been delivered in n. c. 326, and in which he defends his conduct during the period of Alexander's reign. It was found by I. Bekker in no less than six MSS., and is printed in the collections of the Attic orators, but its genuineness is still doubtful. Suidas attributes to Demades also a history of Delos and of the birth of Leto's children, but this work can scarcely have been the production of our Demades, and we know of no other person of this name to whom it can be ascribed. (Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Orat. Gr. p. 71, &c.; J. G. Hauptmann, Disputatio qua De demad. et illi tributum, Frugm. orat. consideratur, Gera, 1768, 4to, reprinted in Reiske's Oratores, iv. p. 248, &c.; H. Lardy, Dissertatio de Demade Oratoro Atheniensi, Berlin, 1834, 8vo.; Wester-mann, Gesch. d. griech. Borettanm. § 54, notes 11–14.)

DEMAGNETIS (Δημαγόρος), a surname of Sosias, derived from the name of a temple of his on the Alpheus. (Paus. vi. 21. § 4. [L.S.]

DEMA'GORGAS (Δημαγόρας), of Samos, is mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (A. R. i. 72), together with Agathysus, as a writer who agreed with Cephalon respecting the date of the foundation of Rome. But whether Demagoras was a poet like Agathyllus or not is uncertain. He is often mentioned by the grammarians. (Bel-cker, Anecd. p. 377; Bachmann, Anecd. i. p. 68; Eustath. ad Il. i. 558; Badoc. p. 35; Apostol.

Proc. ii. 51; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoenix 7.) [L.S.]

DEMARATIA, daughter of Hiero, king of Syracusae, was married to Andromedus, the guardian of Hieronymus. After the assassination of the latter, she persuaded her husband to seize on the sovereign power; but his heart failed him, and he surrendered the citadel to the opposite party. After the establishment of the republic, she was put to death, together with her niece Harmonia. (Livy, xxiv. 22–25.) [E. H. B.]

DEMARIUS (Δημαρίου), 15th Eupronym, reigned at Sparta from about n. c. 510 to 491. Pausanias speaks of him as sharing with Cleomenes the honour of expelling Hippias (n. c. 510) (Paus. iii. 7 § 7), and Plutarch (de Virtut. Mtd. p. 243, 3.) unites their names in the war against Argos. Under Telesilas, he says "the Argive women beat back Cleomenes (Ανατρεπόμενος) and thrust out Demarius" (ΔΣΟΙΟΛΟΥ), as if the latter had for a time effected an entrance. "He had gained," says Herodotus (vi. 70), "very frequent distinction for deeds and for counsels, and had in particular won for his country, alone of all her kings, an Olympic victory in the four-horse chariot-maze."

His career, however, was cut short by dissensions with his colleague. In the invasion, by which Cleomenes proposed to wreak his vengeance on Athens, Demarius, who was joint commander, on the arrival of the army at Eleusis, followed the example of the Corinthians, and refused to cooperate any further. The other allies began now to move away, and Cleomenes was forced to follow. (Herodot. v. 75.) Henceforward we may easily imagine that his fury at his indignities, and their general incomparability of temper, would render the feud between the two amongst and obsolete. In n. c. 491 Cleomenes while in Aegina found himself thwarted there, and intrigues against him, by his adversary, who encouraged the Aeginetans to insult him by refusing to acknowledge the unaccredited authority of a single king. Cleomenes returned, and set the whole of his vehement unscrupulous energy to work to rid himself of Demarius, calling to his aid Leotychides, next heir to the house of Procles, whom Demarius had, moreover, made his enemy by robbing him of his affianced bride, Pericles, daughter of Chelnon. (Herodot. vi. 61, 65.)

The birth of Demarius had been as follows:—

King Ariston had twice married without issue. While his second wife was still alive, either in anxiety for an heir or out of mere passion, he sought and by a curious artifice obtained as his third the wife of his friend Agetus, a woman of remarkable beauty. He enticed the husband into an agreement, that each should give the other whatever he asked; and when Agetus had chosen his gift, Ariston demanded in return that he should give him his wife. A son was born. Ariston was at the time judging the eponymous month, when its tidings were brought, and counting the months on his fingers, said in their presence, "It cannot be mine." His doubts, however, appeared no further: he owned the child, and gave it, in allusion to the public prayer that had been made by the Spartans for an heir to his house, the name of Demarius. (Ibid. vi. 61–64.)

The father's expression was now brought up against the son. Leotychides declared him on oath to be wrongfully on the throne; and, in the consequent prosecution, he brought forward the ephors, who had then been sitting with Ariston, to bear evidence of his words. When the case was referred to the Delphian oracle, and was by it, through the corrupt interference of Cleomenes, decided for the accuser, who was in consequence mised to the throne. (Ibid. vi. 64–66.)

Demarius, some time after, was sitting as magistrate at the Gymnopedian games. Leotychides sent his attendant to ask the insulting question, how it felt to be magistrate after being king. Demarius, stung by the taunt, made a hasty and menacing reply; covered up his face, and withdrew home; sacrificed there, and taking the sacred entrails, sought his mother and conjured her to let him know the truth. She replied by an account which assuredly leaves the modern reader as doubtful as before, but gave him perhaps the conviction which she wished, that his father was either Ariston or the hero Asteaspeus; and, in any case, he seems to have made up his mind to regain, by whatever means, his original rank. He went to Elis under pretext of a journey to Delphi, and here perhaps would have intrigued for support, had not the Spartans suspected and sent for him. He then retired to Zycanthus, and on being pursued thither, made his way into Asia to king Dareius. (Ibid. vi. 67–70.)

At the court of Persia he was favourably received, and is said, by stating the Spartan usage, to have forwarded the claim of Xerxes to the throne to the exclusion of his brothers born before their father's accession; and on the resolution being taken of invading Greece, to have sent, with what intent or feeling Herodotus would not venture to determine, a message, curiously concealed (Δημαρίων), to his countrymen at Sparta, conveying to the intelligence. (Ibid. vii. 3. 239.)

Henceforward Demarius performs in the story of Herodotus with high dramatic effect the part of the unheeded counsellor, who, accompanying the invasion and listened to by Xerxes, saw the weakness of those countless myriads, and ventured to combat the extravagant unthinking confidence of their leader. Thus at Dorieus, after the numbering of the army; thus at Thermopylae, when he explained that it was for battle the Spartans were trimming their hair; thus, after the pass was won, when Xerxes owned his wisdom, and he is said to have given the farsighted counel of occupying Cythera. And thus finally he, says the story, was with Dionys in the plain of Thriss, when they heard the mystic Eleusinian cry, and saw the god and the maidens on their way descending the assistant deities, to the Grecian fleet. (Ibid. vii. 101—105, 209, 234, 235, viii. 65.)

Leaving the imagination of Herodotus and his informants responsible for much of this, we may safely believe that Demaratus, like Hippias before, accompanied the expedition in the hope of vengeance and restoration, and, probably enough, with the mixed feelings ascribed to him. Pausanias (iii. 7. § 7) states, that his family continued long in Asia; and Xenophon (Hellen. iii. 1. § 6) mentions Eurythymes and Procles, his descendants, as lords of Pergamus, Tuthimnia, and Halisarna, the district given to their ancestor by the king as the reward of his services in the expedition. The Cyrenian and the Trojan Procles at Tarquinia (Aen. viii. 8. 17.) “To this family also,” says Müller (Dor. bl. l. 9. § 8), “belongs Procles, who married the daughter of Aristotle, when the latter was at Attarneus, and had by her two sons, Procles and Demaratus. (Sext. Empir. adv. Math. p. 518, ed. Col.)” (See below.) Plutarch’s anecdote (Them. c. 29), that he once excited the king’s anger by asking leave to ride through Sardis with the royal tiara, and was restored to favour by Themistocles, can only be said not to be in contradiction to the chronology. (Clinton, F. H. ii. p. 206.) [A. H. C.]

DEMARATUS (Δημαράτος), a merchant-noble of Corinth, and one of the Baeacidae. When the power of his clan had been overthrown by Cypselus, about 825, he fled from Corinth, and settled at Tarquinii in Etruria, where he had mercantile connexions. According to Strabo, he brought with him a large body of retainers and much treasure, and thereby gained such influence, that he was made ruler of Tarquinii. He is said also to have been accompanied by the painter Cleophaustus of Corinth, and by Eucheir and Euphramus, masters of the plastic arts, and together with these refinements, to have even introduced the knowledge of alphabetical writing into Etruria. He married an Etrurian wife, by whom he had two sons, Aruns and Lucmoire, afterwards L. Tarquinii Priscus. (Liv. i. 34; Dionys. iii. 46; Polyb. vi. 2; Strab. v. p. 219, viii. p. 379; Cic. Tusc. Quest. v. 37; Tac. Ann. x. 14; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 3, 12; Pluteus, Rom. Hist. iii. p. 85.) (See above.) For the Greek features pervading the story of the Tarquinii, see Macaulay’s ‘Lays of Ancient Rome,’ p. 80. [E. E.]

DEMARATUS (Δημαράτος), a Corinthian, connected by hospitality with the family of Philip of Macedon. It was through the mediation of Demaratus that Alexander returned home from Illyria, where he had taken up his abode in consequence of the quarrel between himself and his father at the marriage of the latter with Cleopatra, n. c. 317. (Plut. Alex. 9.) [E. E.]

DEMARATUS (Δημαράτος). 1. A son of Pythis, who was Aristotle’s daughter by his wife of the same name. He and his brother, Procles, were pupils of Theophrastus. (Diog. Laërt. v. 5; Fr. Bibl. Græca. iii. pp. 485, 504.) He appears to have been named after Demaratus, king of Sparta, from whom his father, Procles, was descended.

2. A Corinthian author of uncertain date, who is quoted by Plutarch. (Ages. 15.) He is perhaps the same whose work called τραγωδοσίαν, on the subjects of Greek tragedy, is referred to by Clem. Alex. Protrept. c. 3; Stob. Floril. xxxix. 32, 33; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 45, 1289; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. pp. 289, 294; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 425, ed. Westermann.)

3. A Spartan, who is said to have retorted upon the epigram on the subjugation of Greece usually ascribed to Hadrian (Antih. ii. p. 265) by writing under it a line from a speech of Achilles to Patroclus. (Iliad x. 70.) When inquiry was made to who had “stamped” the imperial epigram, he replied by a parody on Archilochus (Frags. ii.):

Ειλι μὲν εὐθραύς Έσωπλοιν πολεμεῖτε, π. τ. λ.

The story seems to rest on the authority of a note in the Vatican MS. This does not, however, give the name of Demaratus, which occurs in the version of the anechoe in the Anthology of Pindar. (See Jacob, ed. Antih. l. c.) [E. E.]

DEMARCURUS (Δημαρκύρος), son of Pidocus, a Syracusan. He was one of the generals sent out to replace Hermocrates and his colleagues in the command of the Syracusan auxiliaries in Greece, when those generals were banished. (Thuc. viii. 85; Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 30.) After his return he appears to have taken a leading part in public affairs, and became one of the most powerful opponents of the rising power of Dionysius. He was in consequence put to death at the instigation of the latter, at the same time with Daphneus, shortly after Dionysius had been appointed general autocrator. (Diod. xii. 98.) [E. H. B.]

DEMARITRE (Δημαρίτρη), daughter of Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum, was wife of Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse. She is said by Diodorus to have exerted her influence with Gelon to grant the Carthaginians peace on moderate terms after their great defeat at Himera. n. c. 480. In return for this service they sent her a crown of gold of the value of a hundred talents, with the produce of which, or more probably in commemoration of the event, she caused to be struck for the first time the large silver coins, weighing 10 Attic drachmae or 50 Sicilian trierarchs, to which the name of Dama- retion was given in her honour. (Diod. xi. 26; Schol. in Pind. Od. ii. 11; Hev. e. w. Δαμαρίτρην, Pollux, ix. 80; Amm. illust. di Coripp. Archel. vol. ii. p. 81.) After the death of Gelon she married his brother and successor Polyzeuth. (Schol. in Pind. Od. ii. 26.) [E. H. B.]

DEMEAS. [DAMES.] [E. E.]

DEMETER (Δημήτηρ), one of the great divinities of the Greeks. The name Demeter is supposed by some to be the same as γη μήτηρ, that is, mother earth, while others consider Deo, which is synonymous with Demeter, as connected with θεα and δαίμων, and as derived from the Cretan word θεα, barley, so that Demeter would be the mother or giver of barley or of food generally. (Hom. Il. v. 500.) These two etymologies, however, do not suggest any difference in the character of the goddess, but leave it essentially the same. Demeter was the daughter of Cronus and Rhea, and sister of Hestia, Hera, Aides, Poseidon, and Zeus. Like the other children of Cronus she was devoured by her father, but he gave her forth again after taking the emetic which Metis had given him. (Hesiod. Thog. 492, &c.; Apollod. l. 2. § 1.) By her brother Zeus, Demeter became the mother of Persephone (Proserpina) and Dionysus (Hesiod. Thog. 912; Dial. iii. 62), and by Poseidon of Despoina and the horse Arion. (Apoll. Hymn. l. 3. § 6; Paus. v. 37. § 6.) The most prominent part of Demeter's power is the rape of her daughter Persephone by Pluto, and this story not only suggests the main idea embodied in Demeter, but also directs our attention to the principal seats of her worship. Zeus, without the knowledge of Demeter, had promised Persephone to Pluto, and while the unsuspecting maiden was gathering flowers which Zeus had caused to grow in order to tempt her and to favour Pluto's scheme, the earth suddenly opened and she was carried off by Aidos and Pluto. Her cries of anguish were heard only by Hecate and Helios. Her mother, who heard only the echo of her voice, immediately set out in search of her daughter. The spot where Persephone was believed to have been carried into the lower world is different in the different traditions; the common story places it in Sicily, in the neighbourhood of Enna, on Mount Etna, or between the wells Cyane and Arethusa. (Hygin. Fab. 146, 274; Ov. Met. v. 385, Fast. iv. 422; Dial. v. 3, Gic. in Ver. iv. 48.) This legend, which points to Sicily, though undoubtedly very ancient (Pind. Nem. i. 17), is certainly not the original tradition, since the worship of Demeter was introduced into Sicily by colonists from Megara and Corinth. Other traditions place the rape of Persephone at Erimenes on the Cephissus, in the neighbourhood of Eleusis (Orph. Hymn. 17. 15), at Colonus in Attica (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 1590), in an island of the Atlantic Ocean near the coast of Spain (Orph. Argon. 1190), at Hermione in Peloponneseus (Apollod. l. 5, § 1; Strab. vii. p. 372), in Crete (Schol. ad Hesiod. Thog. 914), or in the neighbourhood of Pisa, (Paus. vi. 21. § 1.) Others again place the event at Phenexus in Arcadia (Conon, Narr. 15), or at Cyzicus (Propert. iii. 21, 4), while the Homeric hymn on Demeter places it in the plain of Nysa in Asia. In the Iliad and Odyssey the rape of Persephone is not expressly mentioned. Demeter wandered about in search of her daughter for nine days, without taking any nectar or ambrosia, and without bathing. On the tenth she met Hecate, who told her that she had heard the cries of Persephone, but did not know who had carried her off. Both then hastened to Helios, who revealed to them that Pluto had been the ravisher, and with the consent of Zeus, Demeter in her anger at this news avoided Olympus, and dwelt upon earth among men, conferring presents and blessings wherever she was kindly received, and severely punishing those who repulsed her or did not receive her gifts with proper reverence. In this manner she came to Celene at Eleusis. (Celsus.) As the goddess still continued in her anger, and produced famine on the earth by not allowing the fields to produce any fruit, Zeus, anxious that the race of mortals should not become extinct, sent Iris to induce Demeter to return to Olympus. (Comp. Paus. viii. 42. § 2.) But in vain. At length Zeus sent out all the gods of Olympus to conciliate her by entreaties and presents; but she vowed not to return to Olympus, nor to restore the fertility of the earth, till she had seen her daughter again. Zeus accordingly sent Hermes into Erebus to fetch back Persephone. Aidos and Pluto, indeed, to Persephone returning, but gave her a part of a pomegranate to eat, in order that she might not always remain with Demeter. Hermes then took her in Pluto's chariot to Eleusis to her mother, to whom, after a hearty welcome, she declared her faith. At Eleusis both were joined by Hecate, who henceforth remained the attendant and companion of Persephone. Zeus now sent Rhea to persuade Demeter to return to Olympus, and also granted that Persephone should spend only a part of the year (i.e. the winter) in subterraneous darkness, and that during the rest of the year she should remain with her mother. (Comp. Ov. Met. v. 565, Fast. iv. 914; Hygin. Fab. 140.) Rhea accordingly descended to the Itharian plain near Eleusis, and conciliated Demeter, who now again allowed the fruits of the fields to grow. But before she parted from Eleusis, she instructed Triptolomus, Diodes, Eumolpus, and others in the mode of her worship and in the mysteries.

These are the main features of the myths about Demeter, as it is contained in the Homeric hymn; in later traditions it is variously modified. Respecting her connexions with Jasion or Jasion, Tantalus, Melissa, Cycnus, Eryx, Pan, and others, see the different articles. Demeter was the goddess of the earth (Eurip. Bacch. 276), and more especially of the earth as producing fruit, and consequently of agriculture, whence human food or bread is called by Homer (I, xiii. 232) the gift of Demeter. The notion of her being the author of the earth's fertility was extended to that of fertility in general, and she accordingly was looked on also as the goddess of marriage (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 58), and was worshipped especially by women. Her priestess also initiated young married people into the duties of their new situation. (Pint. de Off. conj. 1.) As the goddess of the earth she was like the other θεός θαύμων, a subterraneous divinity, who worked in the regions inaccessible to the rays of Helios. As agriculture is the basis of a well-regulated social condition, Demeter is represented also as the friend of peace and as a law-giving goddess. (Σερβοφόρος, Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 138; Orph. Hymn. 59. 4; Virg. Aen. iv. 58; Hom. Il. v. 500; Ov. Met. v. 341; Paus. vii. 15. § 1.) The myths of Demeter and her daughter embodies the idea, that the productive powers of the earth: or marriage: or are concealed during the winter season; the goddess (Demeter and Persephone, also called Cera, are here identified) then rules in the depth of the earth mournful, but striving upwards to the all-animating light. Persophone, who has eaten of the pomegranate, is the crucified flower that returns in spring, dwells in the region of light during a portion of the year, and nourishes men and animals with her fruits. Later philosophical writers, and perhaps the mysteries also, referred the disappearance and return of Persophone to the burial of the body of man, and the immortality of his soul. Demeter was worshipped in Crete, Delos, Argolis, Attica, the western coast of Asia, Sicily, and Italy, and her worship consisted in a great measure in tragic mysteries. Among the many festivals celebrated in her honour, the Theosophoria and Elenismia were the principal ones. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Chloris, Hesed, Theosophoria, Elenismia, Megalithia Chthonia.) The sacrifices offered to her consisted of pig, the symbol of fertility, bulls, cows, honey-cakes, and fruits. (Macrobi, Sat. i. 12, iii. 11; Dion. v. 4; Paus. ii. 35, 4, iv. 42, in fin.; Os. Pas. iv. 545.) Her temples were called Megara, and were often built in groves in the neighbourhood of towns. (Paus. ii. 35, 4, 40, 8, vii. 26, 4, viii. 34, 5, ix. 25, 5; Strab. viii. p. 344, ix. p. 435.) Many of her surnames, which are treated of in separate articles, are descriptive of the character of the goddess. She was often represented in works of art, though scarcely one entire statue of her is preserved. Her representations appear to have been brought to ideal perfection by Praxiteles. (Paus. i. 2, 4.) Her image resembled that of Hera, in its maternal character, but had a softer expression, and her eyes were less widely opened. She was represented sometimes in a sitting attitude, sometimes walking, and sometimes riding in a chariot drawn by horses or dragons, but always in full attire. Around her head she wore a girdle of corn-ears or a simple riband, and in her hand she held a sceptre, corn-ears or a poppy, sometimes also a torch and the mystic basket. (Paus. iii. 19, 4, viii. 31, 1, 42, 4; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8, 19.) She appears most frequently on Gems and vases. The Romans received the worship of Demeter, to whom they applied the name of Ceres, from Sicily. (Val. Max. i. 1, § 1.) The first temple of Ceres at Rome was vowed by the dictator A. Postumius Albinus, in B.C. 496, for the purpose of averting a famine with which Rome was threatened during a war with the Latins. (Dion. vi. 17, comp. i. 33; Tacit. Ann. ii. 49.) In introducing this foreign divinity, the Romans acted in their usual manner; they instituted a festival with games in honour of her (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Cerealita), and gave the management of the sacred rites and ceremonies to a Greek priestess, who was usually taken from Naples or Velia, and received the Roman franchise, in order that the sacrifices on behalf of the Romans might be offered under a Roman citizen. (Cic. pro Balb. 24; Festus, s. v. Graeca sacra.) In all other respects Ceres was looked upon very much in the same light as Tellus, whose nature closely resembled that of Ceres. Pigs were sacrificed to both divinities, in the seasons of sowing and in harvest time, and also at the burial of the dead. It is strange to find that the Romans, in adopting the worship of Demeter from the Greeks, did not at the same time adopt the Greek name Demeter. The name Ceres can scarcely be explained from the Latin language. Servius informs us (ad Aen. ii. 325), that Ceres, Pales, and Fortuna were the penates of the Etruscans, and it may be that the Romans identified Demeter with the name of a divinity of a similar nature, whose worship subsequently became extinct, and left no trace except the name Ceres. We remarked above that Demeter and Persophone or Cora were identified in the mythus, and it may be that Ceres is only a different form for Cora or Core. But however this may be, the worship of Ceres soon acquired considerable political importance in Rome. The property of traitors against the republic was often made over to her temple. (Dionys. vi. 89, viii. 79; Plin. H. N. xxiv. 4, a. 9; Liv. ii. 41.) "The decrees of the senate were deposited in her temple for the inspection of the tribunes of the people." (Liv. iii. 53, xxxiii. 25.) If we further consider that the aediles had the special superintendence of this temple, it is very probable that Ceres, whose worship was like the plebeians, introduced at Rome from without, had some peculiar relation to the plebeian order. (Müller, Dor. ii. 10, § 3; Priller, Demeter und Persephone, ein Cyclopa Mythol. Untersuch., Hamburg, 1837, 8vo; Welcker, Ztschrift für die Alterkunst, l. 1, p. 98, &c.; Niebuhr, Hist. d. Röm. i. p. 621; Hartung, Die Römer der Römer, ii. p. 155, &c.)

DEMETERIANUS (Δεμητεριανός), of Ravenna, the father of the celebrated rhetorician Apollonius, lived in the time of the emperor Alexander Severus, and was no less distinguished as a rhetorician than as a critical mathematician. (Philostr. Vita. Soph. ii. 33, § 1; Suidas, s. v. 'Aσδρανός.)

DEMETERS (Δημητρίας). 1. Son of Aithraemus, commander of one of the squadrons of Macedonian cavalry under Alexander. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 11, iv. 27, v. 21.)

2. Son of Pythoxas, surnamed Phileon, one of the select band of cavalry, called eφαρίστοι, in the service of Alexander. (Arrian, Anab. iv. 12; Philostr. Alci. 54.)

3. One of the body-guards of Alexander, was suspected of being engaged in the conspiracy of Philotas, and expelled in consequence. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 27.)

4. A son of Ariarathes V., king of Cappadocia, commanded the forces sent by his father in 154 B.C. to support Attalus in his war against Prusias. (Polyb. xxxiii. 10."

5. A native of Gadara in Syria, and a freedman of Pompey, who shewed him the greatest favour, and allowed him to accumulate immense riches. After the conquest of Syria, Pompey rebuilt and restored at his request his native town of Gadara, which had been destroyed by the Jews. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4, § 4, de Bell. Jud. i. 7, § 7.) An anecdote related by Plutarch shows the excessive adulation paid him in the East, on account of his well-known influence with Pompey. (Plut. Pompe. 40, Cal. Min. 13.)

[Rev. B. H.]

DEMETRIUS (Δημήτριος), king of BACTRIA, son of Euthydemus. Polybius mentions (xi. 34), that when Antiochus the Great invaded the territories of Euthydemus, the latter sent his son Demetrius, then quite a youth, to negotiate with the Syrian king; and that Antiochus was so much pleased with the young man's appearance and manners, that he confirmed Euthydemus in his sovereignty, and promised one of his own daughters in marriage to Demetrius. The other notices we possess of this prince are scanty and confused; but it seems certain (notwithstanding the opinion of those chiefly advanced by Dacier, Hist. Reg. Grœcœmum Bactriæn, p. 93), that Demetrius succeeded his father in the sovereignty of Bactria, where he reigned at least ten years. Strabo particularly mentions him as among those Bactrian kings who made extensive conquests in northern India (Strab. xii. 11, § 1), though the limit of his acquisitions cannot be ascertained. Justin, on the contrary, calls him "rex Indorum" (xii. 6), and speaks of him as making war on and besieging Eucriades, DEMETRIUS.

King of Bactria. Mionmet (Saggio, vol. viii, p. 478) has suggested that there were two Demetris, one the son of Buthodmus, the other a king of northern India; but it does not seem necessary to have recourse to this hypothesis. The most probable view of the matter is, that Bactrias revolted from Demetris, while the latter was engaged in his wars in India, and established his power in Bactria proper, or the provinces north of the Hindoo Koosh, while Demetris retained the countries south of that barrier. Both princes may thus have ruled contemporaneously for a considerable space of time. (Comp. Wilson's Bactria, pp. 229-231; Lassen, Gesch. der Bactr. Könige, p. 230; Ranol Rochette, Journ. des Savans, for 1855, p. 521.) It is probably of this Demetris that we are to ascribe the foundation of the city of Demetrias in Achaesia, mentioned by Isidore of Charax (p. 8, ed. Hudson; see Lassen, p. 239). The chronology of his reign, like that of all the Bactrian kings, is extremely uncertain; his accession is placed by M. R. Rochette in B.C. 130 (Journ. des Savans, Oct. 1855, p. 594), by Lassen in 185 (Gesch. der Bactr. Könige, p. 282), and it seems probable that he reigned about 20 or 25 years. (Wilson's Art.aaas, p. 281.)

DEMETRIUS (Amphiarctus). L. king of Macedon, son of Antipater; father of Alexander the Great; or the Besieger, was the son of Antigonus, king of Asia, and Stratonice, the daughter of Corineus. He was distinguished when a young man for his affectionate attachment to his parents, and he and Antigonus continued, throughout the life of the latter, to present a rare example of unanimity. While yet very young, he was married to Phila, the daughter of Antipater and widow of Cенetes, a woman of the noblest character, but considerably older than himself, in consequence of which it was not without difficulty that he was persuaded by Antigonus to consent to the match. (Plut. Demetrius, 14.) He accompanied his father in his campaign against Bucephalus, and commanded the select body of cavalry of the third at the battle of Gabiene (B.C. 317), at which time he was about twenty years old. (Diod. xix. 29.) The following year he commanded the whole right wing of the army of Antigonus in the second battle of Gabiene (id. xix. 40); and it must be mentioned to his credit, that after the capture of Bucephalus, he interceded earnestly with his father to spare his life. (Plut. Euseb. 18.) Two years afterwards, he was left by Antigonus in the chief command of Syria, while the latter proceeded to carry on the war in Asia Minor. In the spring of B.C. 312, Ptolemy invaded Syria with a large army; and Demetris, contrary to the advice of his father, encamped his forces within sight of Gaza, where his father had left with him as a council of war, hastened to give him battle at Gaza, but was totally defeated and lost the greater part of his army. This reverse compelled him to abandon Tyre and the whole of Syria, which fell into the hands of Ptolemy, and Demetres retired into Cilicia, but soon after in part retrieved his disaster, by surprising Ciles (who had been sent against him by Ptolemy) on his march near Myus, and taking him and his whole army prisoners. (Diod. xix. 80-88, 93; Plut. Demetrius, 6, 6.) He was now joined by Antigonus, and Ptolemy immediately gave way before them. Demetres was now employed by his father in an expedition against the Nabataean Arabs, and in a more important one to recover Babylon, which had been lately occupied by Seleucus. This he accomplished with little difficulty, but did not complete his work, and without waiting to reduce one of the forts or citadels of Babylon itself, he left a force to continue the siege, and returned to join Antigonus, who almost immediately afterwards concluded peace with the confederates, B.C. 311. (Diod. xix. 96-98, 100; Plut. Demetrius, 7.) This did not last long, and Ptolemy quickly renewed the war, which was however almost confined to maritime operations on the coasts of Cilicia and Cyprus, in which Demetres, who commanded the fleet of Antigonus, obtained many successes. In B.C. 307, he was de-aposthed by his father with a powerful fleet and army to endeavour to wrest Greece from the hands of Cassander and Ptolemy, who held all the principal towns in it, notwithstanding that the freedom of the Greek cities had been expressly guaranteed by the treaty of 311. He first directed his course to Athens, where he was received with enthusiasm by the people as their liberator. Demetris the Phalerus, who had in fact governed the city for Cassander during the last ten years, was expelled, and the fort at Marmicha taken. Mogroa was also reduced, and its liberty proclaimed; after which Demetris took up his abode for the winter at Athens, where he was received with the most extravagant flatteries: divine honours being paid him under the title of the Preserver (Δεσπότης), and his name being ranked with those of Dionysus and Demeter among the tutelary deities of Athens. (Plut. Demetrius, 8-13; Dio. xix. 45, 46.) It was at this time also that he married Eurydice, the widow of Ophellus of Cypre, an Athenian by birth, and a descendant of the great Miltiades. (Plut. Demetrius, 14.)

From Athens Demetres was recalled by his father to take the command of the war in Cyprus against Ptolemy. He invaded that island with a powerful fleet and army, defeated Ptolemy's brother, Menelaus, who held possession of the island, and took over the city of Salamis, which was besieged closely both by sea and land. Ptolemy himself advanced with a numerous fleet to the relief of his brother; but Demetres was prepared for his approach, and a great sea-fight ensued, in which, after an obstinate contest, Demetres was entirely victorious: Ptolemy lost 120 ships of war, besides transports; and his naval power, which had hitherto been regarded as invincible, was utterly annihilated. (B.C. 306.) Menelaus immediately afterwards surrendered his army and the whole of Cyprus into the hands of Demetres. It was after this victory that Antigonus for the first time assumed the title of King, which he bestowed also at the same time upon his son. He soon after quickly followed by their rival monarchs. (Diod. xx. 47-53; Plut. Demetrius, 15-18; Polyben. iv. 7. § 7; Justin, xiv. 2.)

Demetres now for a time gave himself up to luxury and revelry in Cyprus. Among other prisoners that had fallen into his hands in the late victory was the noted courtesan, Lamia, who, though no longer in the prime of her youth, soon obtained the greatest influence over the young king. (Plut. Demetris, 16. 19, 27; Athen. iv. p. 128, xiii. p. 577.) From these enjoyments he was, however, soon compelled to rouse himself, in order to take part with Antigonus in his expedition against Egypt: but the fleet which he commanded suffered severely from storms, and, after meeting with many disasters, both father and son were compelled to retreat. (Diod. xx. 73—76; Plut. Demetr. 19.) In the following year (n. c. 305) Demetrius determined to punish the Rhodians for having refused to support his father and himself against Ptolemy, and proceeded to besiege their city both by sea and land. The siege which followed is rendered one of the most memorable in ancient history, both by the vigorous and able resistance of the besieged, and by the extraordinary efforts made by Demetrius, who displayed on this occasion in their full extent that fertility of resource and ingenuity in devising new methods of attack, which earned for him the surname of Polecetes. The gigantic machines with which he assailed the walls, the largest of which was called the Helepolis or city-taker, were objects of admiration in succeeding ages. But all his exertions were unavailing, and after the siege had lasted above a year, he was at length induced to conclude a treaty, by which the Rhodians engaged to support Antigonus and Demetrius in all cases, except against Ptolemy, n. c. 304. (Diod. xx. 81—88, 91—100; Plut. Demetr. 21, 22.)

This treaty was brought about by the intervention of envoys from Athens; and thither Demetrius immediately hastened, to relieve the Athenians, who were at this time hard pressed by Cassander. Landing at Aulis, he quickly made himself master of Chalcis, and compelled Cassander not only to raise the siege of Athens, but to evacuate all Greece south of Thermopylae. He now again took up his winter-quarters at Athens, where he was received as before with the most extravagant flatteries, and again gave himself up to the most unbounded licentiousness. With the spring of 303 he hastened to resume the work of the liberation of Greece. Sicyon, Corinth, Argos, and all the smaller towns of Arcadia and Achaea, which were held by garrisons for Ptolemy or Cassander, successively fell into his hands; and it seems probable that he even extended his expeditions as far as Lacedaemon and Corea. (See Droysen, Gesch. d. Nachh. p. 511; Thirlwall's Greece, vii. p. 533.) The liberty of all the separate states was proclaimed; but, at a general assembly held at Corinth, Demetrius received the title of commander-in-chief of all Greece (ψυχαν της Ἑλλαδος), the same which had been formerly bestowed upon Philip and Alexander. At Argos, where he made a considerable stay, he married a third wife—Deidamia, sister of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus—though both Phila and Eurydice were still living. The debaucheries in which he indulged during his stay at Athens, where he was seen dancing with women among the sacred precincts of the Parthenon, where he was lodged, were such as to excite general indignation; but nothing could exceed the meanness and servility of the Athenians towards him, which was such as to provoke at once his wonder and contempt. A curious monument of their abject servility remains to us in the Ithyllaphilic hymn preserved by Athenaeus (vi. p. 253). All the laws were, at the same time, violated in order to allow him to be initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries. (Plut. Demetr. 28—27; Diod. xx. 100, 102, 103; Polyb. iv. 7 §§ 3, 8; Athen. vi. p. 253, xv. p. 697.)

The next year (n. c. 302) he was opposed to Cassander in Thessaly, but, though greatly superior in force, effected little beyond the reduction of Phoecae. This inactivity came at a critical time: Cassander had already concluded a league with Lysimachus, who invaded Asia, while Seleucus advanced from the East to co-operate with him. Antigonus was obliged to summon Demetrius to his support, who concluded a hasty treaty with Cassander, and crossed over into Asia. The following year their combined forces were totally defeated by those of Lysimachus and Seleucus in the great battle of Ipsus, and Antigonus himself perished, n. c. 301. (Diod. xx. 106—113; Plut. Demetr. 28, 29.) Demetrius, to whose impetuousness the loss of the battle would seem to be in great measure owing, fled to Ephesus, and from thence set sail for Athens: but the Athenians, on whose devotion he had confidently reckoned, declined to receive him into their city, though they gave him up his fleet, with which he withdrew to the Isthmus. His fortunes were still by no means hopeless: he was at the head of a powerful fleet, and still master of Cyprus, as well as of Tyre and Sidon; but the jealousies of his enemies soon changed the face of his affairs; and Ptolemy having entered into a closer union with Lysimachus, Seleucus was incensed at the conduct of the latter. Struggling against the claims of Demetrius by his first wife, Phila. By this alliance Demetrius obtained the possession of Cilicia, which he was allowed to wrest from the hands of Pleistarchus, brother of Cassander; but his refusal to cede the important towns of Tyre and Sidon, disturbed the harmony between him and Seleucus, though it did not at the time lead to an open breach. (Plut. Demetr. 80—83.)

We know nothing of the negotiations which led to the conclusion of a treaty between Demetrius and Ptolemy almost immediately after the alliance between the former and Seleucus, but the effect of these several treaties was the maintenance of peace for a space of near four years. During this interval Cassander was continually gaining ground in Greece, where Demetrius had lost all his possessions; but in n. c. 297 he determined to reassert his supremacy there, and appeared with a fleet on the coast of Attica. His efforts were at first unsuccessful; his fleet was wrecked, and he himself badly wounded in an attempt upon Messenia. But the death of Cassander gave a new turn to affairs. Demetrius made himself master of Aegina, Salamis, and other points around Athens, and finally of that city itself, after a long blockade which had reduced the inhabitants to the last extremities of famine. (n. c. 295. Concerning the chronology of these events compare Clinton, P. L. II. p. 175, with Droysen, Gesch. d. Nachh. p. 360, and Thirlwall's Greece, viii. p. 5, n.) Lachares, who from a demagogue had made himself tyrant of Athens, escaped to Thebes, and Demetrius had the generosity to spare all the other inhabitants. He, however, retained possession of Munychia and the Poliorcetes, and subsequently fortified and garrisoned the hill of the Museum. (Plut. Demetr. 33, 34; Paus. i. 25. §§ 7, 8.) His arms were next directed against the Spartans, whom he defeated, and laid siege to their city, which seemed on the point of falling into his hands, when he was suddenly called away by the state of affairs in Macedonia. Here the dissensions between Antipater and Alexander, the two sons of Cassander, had led the latter to seek foreign aid to his support; and he sent embassies at once to Demetrius and to Pyrrhus, who had been lately reinstated in his kingdom of Epirus. Pyrrhus was the nearest at hand, and had already defeated Antipater and established Alexander on the throne of Macedonia, when Demetrius, unwilling to lose such an opportunity of agrandizement, arrived with his army. He was received with apparent friendliness, but mutual jealousies quickly arose. Demetrius was informed that the young king had formed designs against his life, which he anticipated by causing him to be assassinated at a banquet. He was immediately afterwards acknowledged as king by the Macedonian army, and proceeded at their head to take possession of his new domain. (Plut. Demetr. 35—37, Pyrrh. 6, 7; Justin. xvi. 1; Pana. i. 10, § 1, ix. 7, § 3; Enec. Arm. p. 155.)

While Demetrius had by this singular revolution become possessed of a kingdom in Europe, he had lost all his former possessions in Asia: Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy having taken advantage of his absence in Greece to reduce Cilicia, Cyprus, and the cities which he had held on the coasts of Phoenicia and Asia Minor. He, however, concluded a peace with Lysimachus, by which the latter yielded to him the remaining portion of Macedonia, and turned his whole attention to the affairs of Greece. Here the Boeotians had taken up arms, supported by the Spartans under Cleonymus, but were soon defeated, and Thebes taken after a short siege, but treated with mildness by Demetrius. After his return to Macedonia he took advantage of the absence of Lysimachus and his captivity among the Goths to invade Thrace; but though he met with little opposition there, he was recalled by the news of a fresh insurrection in Boeotia. To this he speedily put an end, repulsed Pyrrhus, who had attempted to invade Thessaly to effect a diversion in favour of the Boeotians, and again took Thebes after a siege protracted for nearly a year. (b. c. 290.) He had again the humanity to spare the city, and put to death only thirteen (others say only ten) of the leaders of the revolt. (Plut. Demetr. 95, 49; Diod. xxi. Exc. i. Exc. xix. p. 167.) Pyrrhus was now one of the most formidable enemies of Demetrius, and it was against that prince and his allies the Aetolians that he next directed his arms. But while he himself invaded and ravaged Epirus almost without opposition, Pyrrhus gained a great victory over his lieutenant Pantauchus in Aetolia; and the next year, Demetrius being confined by a severe illness at Pella, Pyrrhus took advantage of the opportunity to overrun a great part of Macedonia, which he, however, lost again as quickly, the moment Demetrius was recovered. (Plut. Demetr. 41, 43, Pyrrh. 7, 10.)

It was about this time that Demetrius concluded an alliance with Agathocles, king of Syracuse, whose daughter Lamassa, the wife of Pyrrhus, had previously surrendered to him the important island of Corcyra. (Plut. Pyrrh. 11; Diod. xxi. Exc. 11.) But it was towards the East that the views of Demetrius were mainly directed: he aimed at nothing less than recovering the whole of his father's dominions in Asia, and now hastened to conclude a peace with Pyrrhus, that he might continue his preparations uninterrupted. These were on a most gigantic scale: if we may believe Ptolemy, he had assembled not less than 98,000 foot and near 12,000 horse, as well as a fleet of 600 ships, among which were some of 15 and 16 banks of oars. (Plut. Demetr. 43.) But before he was ready to take the field, his adversaries, alarmed at his preparations, determined to forestall him. In the spring of b. c. 287, Ptolemy sent a powerful fleet against Greece, while Pyrrhus (notwithstanding his recent treaty) on the one side and Lysimachus on the other simultaneously invaded Macedonia. But Demetrius's greatest danger was from the defection of his own subjects, whom he had completely alienated by his proud and haughty bearing, and his lavish expenditure on his own luxuries. He first marched against Lysimachus, but a sudden rising of discontent among his troops, he suddenly retired to face Pyrrhus, who had advanced as far as Beroea. This was a most unfortunate step: Pyrrhus was at this time the hero of the Macedonians, who no sooner met him than they all declared in his favour, and Demetrius was obliged to fly from his camp in disguise, and with difficulty made his escape to Cassandria. (Plut. Demetr. 44, Pyrrh. 11; Justin. xvi. 2.) His affairs now appeared to be hopeless, and even his wife Phila, who had frequently supported and assisted him in his adversities, now poisoned herself in despair. But Demetrius himself was far from despairing: he was still master of Thessaly and some part of Greece, though Athens had again shaken off his yoke: he was able to raise a small fleet and army, with which, leaving his son Antigonus to command in Greece, he crossed over to Miletus. Here he was received by Eurydice, wife of Ptolemy, whose daughter Ptolemais had been promised him in marriage as early as b. c. 301, and their long delayed nuptials were now solemnized. Demetrius at first obtained many successes; but the advance of Agathocles with a powerful army compelled him to retire. He now threw himself boldly into the interior of Asia, having conceived the daring project of establishing himself in the eastern provinces of Seleucus. But his troops refused to follow him. He then passed over into Cilicia, and after various negotiations with Seleucus, and having suffered the greatest losses and privations from famine and disease, he found himself abandoned by his troops and even by his most faithful friends, and had no choice but to surrender himself a prisoner to Seleucus. (b. c. 286.) That king appears to have been at first disposed to treat him with honour, but took alarm at his popularity with the army, and sent him as a prisoner to the Syrian Chersonesus. Here he was confined at one of the royal residences, where he had the liberty of hunting in the adjoining park, and does not seem to have been harshly treated. Seleucus even professed an intention of restoring him to liberty, and indignantly rejected the proposal of Lysimachus to put him to death; but the restless spirit of Demetrius could ill brook confinement, and he gave himself up without restraint to the pleasures of the table, which brought on an illness that proved fatal. His death took place in the third year of his imprisonment and the fifty-fifth of his age, b. c. 283. (Plut. Demetr. 45—52; Poly. vi. 9; Diod. xxi. Exc. Vales. p. 562.) His remains were sent by Seleucus with all due honours to his son Antigonus, who interred them at Demetrius in Thessaly, a city which he had himself founded. (Plut. Demetr. 53.)

There can be no doubt that Demetrius was one of the most remarkable characters of his age: in restless activity of mind, facility of resources, and
during promptitude in the execution of his schemes, he has perhaps never been surpassed; but prosperity always proved fatal to him, and he constantly lost by his luxury and volupturnicousness the advantages that he had gained by the vigour and activity which adversity never failed to call forth. His life was in consequence a continued succession of rapid and striking vicissitudes of fortune. It has been seen that he was guilty of some great crimes, thought on the whole he can be charged perhaps with fewer than any one of his contemporaries; and he showed in several instances a degree of humanity and generosity very rarely displayed at that period. His boasted sin was his unbounded licentiousness, a vice in which, says Plutarch, he surpassed all his contemporary monarchs. Besides Lamia and his other mistresses, he was regularly married to four wives, Phila, Eurydice, Diodamine, and Poltemats, by whom he left four sons. The eldest of these, Antigonus Gonatas, eventually succeeded him on the throne of Macedonia.

According to Plutarch, Demetrius was remarkable for his beauty and dignity of countenance, a remark fully borne out by his portrait as it appears upon his coins, one of which is annexed. On this his likeness is represented with horns, in imitation of Dionysus, the deity whom he particularly sought to emulate. (Plut. Demet. 2; Echhel, ii. p. 192.)

Of his children two bore the same name:—

1. Demetrius, surmounted the Handsome (δανεύτης), whom he had by Poltemats, daughter of Poltemy Soter, and who was consequently brother of Antigonus Gonatas. He was first married to Olympias of Larissa, by whom he had a son Antigonus, surmounted Dosen, who afterwards succeeded to the throne of Macedonia. (Euseb. Arm. i. p. 101, fol. ed.) After the death of Magnes, king of Cyrene, his widow, Arsinoe, wishing to obtain support against Poltemy, sent to Macedonia to offer the hand of her daughter Berenice, and with it the kingdom of Cyrene, to Demetrius, who readily embraced the offer, repaired immediately to Cyrene, and established his power there without opposition. How long he continued to hold it we know not; but he is said to have given general offence by his haughty and unpopular manner, and carried on a criminal intercourse with his mother-in-law, Arsinoe. This was deeply resented by the young queen, Berenice, who caused him to be assassinated in her mother's arms. (Justin, xxvi. 3; Euseb. Arm. i. pp. 157, 159; Niebuhr's Kleine Schriften, p. 229; Droysen, Hellemss. ii. p. 292, &c.) According to a probable conjecture of Droy- sen's (ii. p. 215), it must have been this Demetrius, and not, as stated by Justin (xxvi. 2), the son of Antigonus Gonatas, who defeated Alexander of Epirus when he invaded Macedonia.

2. Demetrius, surmounted the Thin (δ θείος), whom he had by an Illyrian woman, and of whom nothing is known but his name mentioned by Plutarch. (Plut. Demet. 55.)

DEMETRIUS (Δανευτης) II, king of Mac- donia, was the son of Antigonus Gonatas, and succeeded his father in b.c. 239. According to Justin (xxvi. 2), he had distinguished himself as early as b.c. 266 or 265, by the defeat of Alexander of Epirus, who had invaded the territories of his father; but this statement is justly rejected by Droysen (Hellensm. ii. p. 214) and Niebuhr (Kleine Schriften, p. 228) on account of his extreme youth, as he could not at this time have been above twelve years old. (See, however, Euseb. Arm. i. p. 160; Thirwall's Greece, vol. viii. p. 90.) Of the events of his reign, which lasted ten years, b.c. 239–239 (Polyb. ii. 44; Droysen, ii. p. 400, not.), our knowledge is so imperfect, that very opposite opinions have been formed concerning his character and abilities. He followed up the policy of his father Antigonus, by cultivating friendly relations with the tyrants of the different cities in the Peloponnesus, in opposition to the Achaean league (Polyb. ii. 44), at the same time that he engaged in war with the Aetolians, which had the effect of throwing them into alliance with the Achaeans. We know nothing of the details of this war, which seems to have arisen for the possession of Acmantium; but though Demetrius appears to have obtained some successes, the Aetolians on the whole gained ground during his reign.

He was assisted in it by the Boeotians, and at one time also by Agron, king of Illyria. (Polyb. ii. 26, xxv. 5; Schorn, Gesch. Griechenlands, p. 88; Droysen, ii. p. 440; Thirwall's Greece, viii. pp. 118–125.) We learn also that he suffered a great defeat from the Dardanians, a barbarian tribe on the north-western frontier of Macedonia, but it is quite uncertain to what period of his reign we are to refer this event. (Proc. Trog. Pompeii, lib. xxviii.; Liv. xxxi. 28.) It was probably towards the commencement of it that Olympias, the widow of Alexander of Epirus, in order to secure his support, gave him in marriage her daughter Phthia (Justin, xxviii. 1), notwithstanding which he appears to have taken no steps either to prevent or avenge the death of Olympias and her two sons. Demetrius had previously been married to Statonice, daughter of Antiochus Soter, who quit them him in disgust on his second marriage with Phthia, and retired to Syria. (Justin, l. e.; Euseb. Arm. i. p. 164; Joseph. c. Ajon. l. 22; Niebuhr's Klein. Schriften, p. 253.)

[According to a conjecture of Droysen's (ii. p. 215), it must have been this Demetrius, and not, as stated by Justin (xxvi. 2), the son of Antigonus Gonatas, who defeated Alexander of Epirus when he invaded Macedonia.]

2. Demetrius, surmounted the Thin (δ θείος),

DEMETRIUS II.

DEMETRIUS (Δανευτης), a Greek of the island of Phaës in the Adriatic. He was in the service of the Illyrians at the time that war first broke out between them and Rome, and held Corcyra for the Illyrian queen Teuta; but treacherously surrendered it to the Roman fleet, and became a guide and active ally to the consuls in all their subsequent operations. (Polyb. ii. 11.) His services were rewarded, after the defeat and submision of Tenta, with a great part of her dominions, though the Romans seem never to have thoroughly trusted him. (Polyb. l. c. ; Appian, Phygr. c. 6.) He afterwards entered into alliance with Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, and assisted him in the war against Cleomenes. (Polyb. ii. 65, iii. 16.) Thinking that he had thus secured the powerful support of Macedonia, and that the Romans were too much occupied with the Gallic wars, and the danger impending from Hannibal, to punish his breach of faith, he ventured on many acts of pitiful hostility. The Romans, however, immediately sent the consul L. Aemilius Paullus over to Illyria (n. c. 219), who quickly reduced all his strongholds, took Pharsus itself, and obliged Demetrius to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. (Polyb. iii. 16, 18, 19; Appian, Phygr. 8; Zonar. viii. 20.) At the court of this prince he spent the remainder of his life, and became his chief adviser. The Romans in vain sent an embassy to the Macedonian king to demand his surrender (Liv. xxii. 53); and it was at this instigation that Philip determined, after the battle of Thrasyone, to conclude an alliance with Hannibal and make war upon the Romans. (Polyb. v. 101, 105, 108; Justin, xxix. 2.) Demetrius was a man of a daring character, but prepossessing and desistent in judgment; and while supporting the cause of Philip in Greece, he was led to engage in a rash attempt to take the fortress of Ithome by a sudden assault, in which he himself perished. (Polyb. iii. 19.) Polybius ascribes most of the violent and unjust proceedings of Philip in Greece to the advice and influence of Demetrius, who appears to have been a man of much ability, but wholly regardless of faith and justice. (Polyb. vii. 13, 14.)

DEMETRIUS (Δημήτριος), younger son of Philip V, king of Macedonia, but his only son by his legitimate wife, the elder brother Persaeus being the son of a concubine. (Liv. xxxix. 55.) After the battle of Cynoscephalae, Philip was obliged to give up Demetrius, then very young, to Flamininus as a hostage, and he was subsequently sent to Rome in the same capacity, B.C. 198. (Liv. xxxix. 13, 30, xxxv. 33; Polyb. xviii. 52.) Five years afterwards he was honourably restored to his father, Philip having at this time obtained the favour of Rome by his services in the war against Antiochus. (Liv. xxxvi. 53; Polyb. xx. 13; Zonar. ix. 10.) But this did not last long, and Philip finding himself unseated on all sides by the machinations of Rome, and her intrigues among his neighbours, determined to try and avert, or at least delay, the impending storm, by sending Demetrius, who during his residence at Rome had obtained the highest favour, as his ambassador to the senate. The young prince was most favourably received, and returned with the answer, that the Romans were willing to excuse all the past, out of good-will to Demetrius, and from their confidence in his friendly dispositions towards them. (Liv. xxxix. 94, 47; Polyb. xxvii. 14, xxiv. 1-9; Justin, xxxii. 2.) But the favour thus shown to Demetrius had no effect (as was doubtless the design of the senate) of exciting against him the jealousy of Philip, and in a still higher degree that of Persaeus, who suspected his brother, perhaps not without cause, of intending to supplant him on the throne after his father's death, by the assistance of the Romans. Persaeus therefore endeavoured to effect his ruin by his intrigues; and having failed in accomplishing this by accusing him falsely of an attempt upon his life, he suborned Didas, one of Philip's generals, to accuse Demetrius of holding treasonable correspondence with the Romans, and of intending to escape to them. A forged letter, pretending to be from Flamininus, appeared to confirm the charge; and Philip was induced to consign him to the custody of Didas, by whom he was secretly put to death, as it was supposed, by his father's order. (Liv. xxxix. 53, xl. 4-15, 20-24; Polyb. xxiv. 7, 8; Justin, xxxii. 2; Zonar. ix. 22.) Demetrius was in his 26th year at the time of his death; he is represented by Livy as a very amiable and accomplished young man; but it may well be doubted whether he was altogether so innocent as he appears in that author's eloquent narrative. (See Niebuhr's Lect. on Roman History, vol. i. p. 572, ed. by Dr. Schmitz. [E. H. B.])

DEMETRIUS POLIORCETES. [DEMETRIUS L. KING OF MACEDONIA.] L., king of Syria, surnamed Soter (Sωτήρ), was the son of Seleucus IV. (Philopator) and grandson of Antiochus the Great. While yet a child, he had been sent to Rome by his father as a hostage, and remained there during the whole of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. He there formed an intimacy with the historian Polybius. After the death of Antiochus, being now 23 years old, he demanded of the senate the seal at liberty and allowed to occupy the throne of Syria in preference to his cousin, Antiochus Eupator. His request however having been repeatedly refused by the senate, he fled secretly from Rome, by the advice and with the connivance of Polybius, and landed with a small fleet at Tripolis in Phoenicia. The Syrians immediately declared in his favour; and the boy Antiochus with his tutor Lysias were seized by their own guards and put to death. (Polyb. xxxi. 12, 19-23; Appian, Syr. 46, 47; Justin, xxxiv. 3; Liv. Epit. xlvii.; Euseb. Arm. p. 166, fol. edit.; 1 Mac. vii.; Zonar. ix. 25.) As soon as he had established himself in the kingdom, Demetrius immediately sought to conciliate the favour of the Romans by sending them an embassy with valuable presents, and surrendering to them Lepidus, who in the preceding reign had assassinated the Roman envoy, Cn. Octavius. Having thus succeeded in procuring his recognition as king, he appears to have thought that he might regulate at his pleasure the affairs of the East, and expelled Heracleides from Babylon, where as satrap he had made himself highly unpopular; for which service Demetrius first obtained from the Babylonians the title of Soter (Polyb. xxxii. 4, 6; Dio. Exc. Leg. xxx.; Appian, Syr. 47.) His measures against the Jews quickly drove them to take up arms again under Judas Maccabaeus, who defeated Nicoran, the general of Demetrius, and concluded an alliance with the Romans, by which they declared the independence of Judaea, and forbade Demetrius to oppress them. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 10; 1 Mac. vii. viii.) He further incurred the enmity of the Romans by expelling Ariamnes from Cappadocia, in order to constitute a client under his own; the Roman senate espoused the cause of Ariamnes, and immediately restored him. (Polyb. xxxii. 20; Appian, Syr. 47; Liv. Epit. xlvii.; Justin, xxxv. 1.)

While Demetrius was thus surrounded on all sides by enemies, his own subjects at Antioch were completely aliented from him by his luxury and intemperance. In this state of things, Heracleides, whom he had expelled from Babylon, set up against him an impostor of the name of Balas, who took the title of Alexander, and pretended to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. This competitor appears to have been at first unsuccessful; but, having obtained the powerful protection of Rome, he was supported also with large forces by Attalus, king of Pergamus, Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and Ptolemy Philometor, as well as by the Jews under Jonathan Maccabaeus. Demetrius met him in a pitched battle, in which he is said to have displayed the utmost personal valour, but was ultimately defeated and slain. (Polyb. xxxii. 14, 16; Appian, Syr. 67; Diod. Exc. Vales. xxxiii.; Justin, xxxii. 1; Joseph. Ant. xill. 2; 1 Macc. x.; Eus. Arm. p. 160.) Demetrius died in the year B.C. 150, having reigned between eleven and twelve years. (Clinton, F. H. iii. p. 323; Polyb. iii. 5.) He left two sons, Demetrius, surnamed Nicator, and Antiochus, called Sideotes, by whom subsequently ascended the throne.

COIN OF DEMETRIUS I.

DEMETRIUS (Aequitus) II., king of Syria, surnamed NICATOR (Nukatôr), was the son of Demetrius Soter. He had been sent by his father for safety to Cnidos, when Alexander Balaus invaded Syria, and thus escaped falling into the hands of that usurper. After the death of his father he continued in exile for some years; but the vicious and fickle character of Balaus having rendered him generally odious to his subjects, Demetrius determined to attempt the recovery of his kingdom, and assembled a body of mercenaries from Crete, with which he landed in Cilicia, B.C. 148 or 147. Ptolemy Philometor, who was at the time in the southern provinces of Syria with an army, immediately declared in his favour, and agreed to give him his daughter Cleopatra, who had been previously married to the usurper Balaus, for his wife. With their combined forces they took possession of Antioch, and Alexander, who had retired to Cilicia, having returned to attack them, was totally defeated at the river Oenoparas. Ptolemy died of the injuries received in the battle, and Balaus, having fled for refuge to Aboe in Arabia, was murdered by his followers. (Justin, xxxv. 2; Liv. Epit. Hl.; Diod. Exc. Phob. xxxii.; Appian, Syr. 67; Joseph. Ant. xill. 4; 1 Macc. xi.) For this victory Demetrius obtained the title of Nicator; and now deeming himself secure both from Egypt and the usurper, he abandoned himself to the grossest vices, and by his excessive cruelties alienated the minds of his subjects, at the same time that he estranged the soldiery by dismissing all his troops except a body of Cretan mercenaries. This conduct emboldened one Diodotus, surnamed Tryphon, to set up Antiochus, the infant son of Alexander Balas, as a pretender against him. Tryphon obtained the powerful support of Jonathan Maccabaeus, and succeeded in establishing his power firmly in a great part of Syria, and even in making himself master of Antioch. Demetrius, whether despairing of recovering these provinces, or desirous of collecting larger forces to enable him to do so, retired to Seleucia and Babylon, and from thence was led to engage in an expedition against the Parthians, in which, after various successes, he was defeated by Strangem, his whole army destroyed, and he himself taken prisoner, B.C. 138. (Justin, xxxvi. 1, xxxvii. 9; Liv. Epit. iii.; Appian, Syr. 67; Joseph. Ant. xill. 5; 1 Macc. xiv.)

According to Appian and Justin it would appear that the revolt of Tryphon did not take place till after the captivity of Demetrius, but the true sequence of events is undoubtedly that given in the book of the Maccabees. He was, however, kindly treated by the Parthian king Mithridates (Arsaces VI.), who though he sent him into Hyrcania, allowed him to live there in regal splendour, and even gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage. After the death of Mithridates he made various attempts to escape, but notwithstanding these was still liberally treated by Phraates, the successor of Mithridates. Meanwhile his brother, Antiochus Sidetes, having overthrown the usurper Tryphon and firmly established himself on the throne, engaged in war with Parthia, in consequence of which Phraates brought forward Demetrius, and sent him into Syria to operate a diversion against his brother. This succeeded better than the Parthian king had anticipated, and Antiochus having fallen in battle, Demetrius was able to re-establish himself on the throne of Syria, after a captivity of ten years, and to maintain himself there in spite of Phraates, B.C. 128. (Justin, xxxviii. 9, 10; Eus. Arm. p. 167; Joseph. Ant. xill. 8, § 4.) He even deemed himself strong enough to engage in an expedition against Egypt, but was compelled to abandon it by the general dissatisfaction both of his soldiers and subjects. Ptolemy Philuscon took advantage of this to set up against him the pretender Alexander Zebina, by whom he was defeated and compelled to fly. His wife Cleopatra, who could not forgive him his marriage with Rhodogune in Parthia, refused to afford him refuge at Ptolemais, and he fled to Tyre, where he was assassinated while endeavouring to make his escape by sea, B.C. 125. (Justin, xxxix. 1; Joseph. Ant. xill. 9, § 3, Eus. Arm. p. 168; Clinton, F. H. iii. pp. 333-3.) According to Appian (Syr. 68) and Livy (Epit. ix.), he was put to death by his wife Cleopatra. He left two sons, Seleucus, who was assassinated by order of Cleopatra, and Antiochus, surnamed

COIN OF DEMETRIUS II.
DEMETRIUS.

Grypus. Demetrius II. bears on his coins, in addition to the title of Nicator, those of Theos Philadelphia. From the dates on them it appears that some must have been struck during his captivity, as well as both before and after. This accords also with the difference in the style of the portrait: those struck previous to his captivity having a youthful and beardless head, while the coins subsequent to that event present his portrait with a long beard, after the Parthian fashion. (Eckhel, iii. pp. 229–31) [E. H. B.]

DEMETRIUS (Δημήτριος) III., king of Syria, surnamed Eucarerus, was the fourth son of Antiochus Grypus, and grandson of Demetrius II. During the civil wars that followed the death of Antiochus Grypus, Demetrius was set up as king of Damascus or Coele Syria, by the aid of Ptolemy Lathonus, king of Cyprus; and after the death of Antiochus Eusebes, he and his brother Philip for a time held the whole of Syria. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13, § 4.) His assistance was invited by the Jews against the tyranny of Alexander Janneus; but though he defeated the prince in a pitched battle, he did not follow up his victory, but withdrew to Beroea. War immediately broke out between him and his brother Philip, and Straton, the governor of Beroea, who supported Philip, having obtained assistance from the Arabians and Parthians, blockaded Demetrius in his camp, until he was compelled by famine to surrender at discretion. He was sent as a prisoner to Mithridates, king of Parthia (Arsaces IX.), who detained him in an honourable captivity till his death. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 14.) The coins of this prince are important as fixing the chronology of his reign; they bear dates from the year 218 to 294 of the era of the Seleucidae, i. e. B.C. 94–69. The surname Eumenes is not found on these coins, some of which bear the titles Theos Philopator and Soter; others again Philometor Euergetes Callinicus. (Eckhel, iii. pp. 245–6.) [E. H. B.]

COIN OF DEMETRIUS III.

DEMETRIUS (Δημήτριος), literary. The number of ancient authors of this name, as enumerated by Fabricius (Hist. Gr. xi. p. 413, &c.), amounts to nearly one hundred, twenty of whom are reckoned by Digenes Locrians. We subjoin a list of those who are mentioned by ancient authors, and exclude those who are unknown except from unpublished MSS. scattered about in various libraries of Europe.

1. Of ADRAMYTTON, surnamed Ixion, which surname is traced to various causes, among which we may mention, that he was said to have committed a robbery in the temple of Hera at Alexandria. (Suidas, s. v. Δημήτριος; Diog. Laërt. v. 84.) He was a Greek grammarian of the time of Augustus, and lived partly at Pergamus and partly at Alexandria, where he belonged to the critical school of Aristarchus. He is mentioned by the author of the following works: 1. Εὐγενής ὁ Ὀσίνων, which is often referred to. (Suid. loc. cit.; Endec. p. 132; Schol. Venet. ad Hor. i. 424, iii. 18, vi. 437; Villeison, Proleg. ad Apollon. Lex. p. 27.) 2. Εὐχερεύς ὁ Ὅσιόδος. (Suidas.) 3. Εὐγενεμωτσίαν καὶ Εὐγεναλωτσίαν. ( Athen. ii. p. 50, iii. p. 64.) 4. Περὶ τῆς Αλεξάνδρου διαλέκτου. (Athen. ix. p. 383.) 5. ἄριστα λεξίκα, of which a few fragments are still extant. (Schole ad Arisb. Ap. 1556, Rom. 76, 196, 310, 1001, 1021, 1227.)

2. Of THEOCRENA, a Cynic philosopher, and a disciple of Thracobrus. (Diog. Laërt. v. 65.)

3. Of ALEXANDRIA, a Peripatetic philosopher. (Diog. Laërt. v. 84.) There is a work entitled ἡ πρὸς Ἀλεξανδρίαν, which has come down to us under the name of Demetrius Phalerus, which however, for various reasons, cannot be his production: writers of a later age (see e. g. §§ 76, 231, 246, 308) are referred to in it, and there are also words and expressions which prove it to be a later work. Most critics are therefore inclined to ascribe it to our Demetrius of Alexandria. It is written with considerable taste, and with reference to the best authors, and is a rich source of information on the history of philosophy in the world and the production of our Demetrius, who is known to have written on oratory (τέχνα καταγωγίας, Diog. Laërt. i. 1), it must have been written in the time of the Antonines. It was first printed in Aldus's Rhetor Graeci, v. i. p. 573, &c. Separate modern editions were made by J. G. Schneider, Altenburg, 1779, 8vo., and Fr. Goller, Lips. 1837, 8vo. The best critical text is that in Walz's Rhetor. Graeci, vol. i. init., who has prefixed valuable prolegomena.

4. Of ASPENDUS, a Peripatetic philosopher, and a disciple of Apollonius of Soli. (Diog. Laërt. v. 83.)

5. Of EUTHYNY. See below.

6. Of BYZANTIUM, a Greek historian, was the author of two works (Diog. Laërt. v. 83), one containing an account of the migration of the Gauls from Europe to Asia, in thirteen books, and the other a history of Ptolemy Philadelphia and Antiochus Soter, and of their administration of Libya. From the contents of these works we may infer, with some probability, that Demetrius lived either shortly after or during the reign of those kings, under whom the migration of the Gauls took place, in B.C. 279. (Schmidt, de Postibus Veterum in narratis, Erpel. Guillerm. p. 14, &c.)

7. Of BYZANTIUM, a Peripatetic philosopher (Diog. Laërt. v. 83), who is probably the same as the Demetrius (id. ii. 20) beloved and instructed by Crito, and wrote a work which is sometimes called τετραμοιρια, and sometimes τετραμοιρια (unless they were different works), the fourth book of which is quoted by Athenaeus (x. p. 482, comp. xii. p. 548, xiv. p. 653). This is the only work mentioned by ancient writers; but, besides some fragments of this, there have been discovered at Herculaneum fragments of two other works, viz. τετραμοιρια of ἐν διαλέκτοις, and τετραμοιρια ἐν διαλέκτοις. (Volland. Herod. i. p. 106, &c., ed. Oxford.) It is further not impossible that this philosopher may be the same as the one who tried to dissuade Catu at Utica from committing suicide. (Plut. Cæs. M° M. 65.)

8. Surnamed CALLATIANUS. [Callatianus.]

9. CHROMATIUS. [Chromatius.]

10. CHNYSODATIUS. [Chnysodatius.]

11. Surnamed CYRTON, a Cynic philosopher at Alexandria, in the reign of Constantius, who, suspecting him guilty of forbidden practices, ordered to their works, from which we may infer, that he lived about the middle of the eleventh century after Christ. He wrote an exposition of the heresy of the Jacobites and Chatizarians, which is printed with a Latin translation in Combesius. (Aetiusius Nov. u. p. 261.) Another work on prohibited marriages is printed in Leundavius. (Jes Grecio-Rom. u. p. 392.) Some works of his are still extant in MS. in the libraries of Paris, Rome, and Milan. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. xi. p. 414.)

18. An epic poet, of whom, in the time of Diogenes Laertius (v. 85), nothing was extant except three verses on envious persons, which are still preserved. They are quoted by Suidas also (s. v. θησαυροὶ) without the author's name.

19. An epicurean philosopher, and a disciple of Protagoras, was a native of Leontia. (Diog. Laetr. x. 26; Strab. xiv. p. 658; Sext. Emp. Pyrrh. Hypoth. § 137, with the note of Fabric.)

20. Of Erythrae, a Greek poet, whom Diogenes Laertius (v. 85) calls a ποιητής ἁρπαγών ἀρρίστου, and who also wrote historical and rhetorical works. He seems to have been a contemporary of the grammarians Tyrannion, whom he opposed. (Suid. s. v. Τυράννιον.)

21. Of Erythrae, a Greek grammarian, who obtained the civic franchise in Zennus. (Diog. Laetr. vi. 84.)

22. Surrounded by philosophers, is mentioned among the grammarians who wrote on the Homeric poems. (Schol. Pind. ad Hom. Il. viii. 233, xiii. 137.)

23. Of Ilium, wrote a history of Troy, which is referred to by Eustathius (ad Hom. Od. xi. p. 452) and Budocia (p. 129.)

24. The author of a work on the kings of the Jews, from which a statement respecting the captivity of the Jews is quoted. (Hieronym. Catul. Ill. Script. 38; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 146.)

25. Of Magnesia, a Greek grammarian, a contemporary of Cicero and Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 11, iv. 11.) He had, in Cicero's recollection, sent Atticus a work of his on concord, περὶ ὄρθορροις, which Cicero also was anxious to read. A second work of his, which is often referred to, was of an historical and philological nature, and treated of poets and other authors who bore the same name. (Diog. Laetr. i. 38, 79, 112, ii. 59, 56, v. 3, 75, 49, vi. 70, 84, 88, vii. 169, 185, viii. 84, ix. 15, 27, 35, x. 13; Plut. Viti. X. Orat. pp. 841, 847; n. Demosth. 15, 27, 28, 30; Harpocrat. s. v. Ἰωάννις, and many other passages; Athen. xiii. p. 611; Dionys. Deinarch. 1.) This important work, to judge from what is quoted from it, contained the lives of the persons treated of, and a critical examination of their merits.

26. Surnamed Moschus, a Greek grammarian, who is the author of the argumentum ad Athed, which bear the name of Orpheus. It is said, that there are also glosses by him upon the same poem in MS. at Paris. He lived in the 16th century of our era. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. xi. p. 418.)

27. Of Odesa, is mentioned as the author of a work on his native city. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Οδέας.)

28. Phaleus, the most distinguished among all the literary persons of this name. He was at once an orator, a statesman, a philosopher, and a poet. His surname Phaleus is given him from his birthplace, the Attic demes of Phalearus, where he was born about Ol. 108 or 109, B. C. 345. He was the son of Phaiostatus, a man without rank or property (Diog. Laërt. v. 75; Aelian, V. H. xii. 49); but notwithstanding this, he rose to the highest honours at Athens through his oratorical powers and his perseverance. He was educated, together with the poet Menander, in the school of Thessal. He began his public career about B. C. 325, at the time of the disputes respecting Harpalus, and soon acquired a great reputation by the talent he displayed in public speaking. He belonged to the party of Phocion; and as he acted completely in the spirit of that statesman, Cassander, after the death of Phocion in B. C. 317, placed Demetrius at the head of the administration of Athens. He filled this office for ten years in such a manner, that the Athenians in their gratitude conferred upon him the most extraordinary distinctions, and no less than 360 statues were erected to him. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Diod. xix. 78; Corn. Nep. Mitil. 6.) Cicero says of his administration, "Atheniensium rem publicam exanguem jam et Jackson sustentavit." (De Rei Publ. ii. 1.) But during the latter period of his administration he seems to have become intoxicated with his extraordinary good fortune, and he abandoned himself to every kind of dissipation. (Athen. vi. p. 272, xii. p. 542; Aelian, V. H. ix. 9, where the name of Demetrius Poliorcetes is a mistake for Demetrius Phalerus; Polyb. xii. 13.) This conduct culled forth a party of malcontents, whose exertions and intrigues were crowned in B. C. 307, on the approach of Demetrius Poliorcetes to Athens, when Demetrius Phalerus was obliged to take to flight. (Plut. Demet. 8; Dionys. Deinarch. 3.) His enemies even contrived to induce the people of Athens to pass sentence of death upon him, in consequence of which his friend Menander nearly fell a victim. All his statues, with the exception of one, were demolished. Demetrius Phalerus first went to Thebes (Plut. Demet. 9; Diod. xx. 46), and thence to the court of Ptolemy Lagi at Alexandria, with whom he lived for many years on the best terms, and who is even said to have entrusted to him the revision of the laws of his kingdom. (Aelian, V. H. iii. 17.) During his stay at Alexandria, he devoted himself mainly to literary pursuits, ever cherishing the recollection of his own country. (Plut. de Estilo. p. 692, 4.) The successor of Ptolemy Lagi, however, was hostile towards Demetrius, probably for having advised his father to appoint another of his sons as his successor, and Demetrius was sent into exile to Upper Egypt, where he is said to have died of the bite of a snake. (Diog. Laërt. v. 78; Cic. pro Rosc. Post. 9.) His death appears to have taken place soon after the year B. C. 283.

Demetrius Phalerus was the last among the Attic orators worthy of the name (Cic. Brut. 8; Quint. x. 1. § 80), and his orations bore evident marks of the decline of oratory, for they did not possess the sublimity which characterized those of Demosthenes: those of Demetrius were soft, insipid, and rather effeminate, and his style was graceful, elegant, and blooming (Cic. Brut. 8, 92, de Orat. ii. 25, 27; Quint. x. 1. § 80); but he maintained within a large measure between the sublime grandeur of Demosthenes, and the flourishing declamations of his successors. His numerous writings, the greater part of which he probably composed during his residence in Egypt (Cic. de Fin. v. 9), embraced subjects of the most varied kinds, and the list of them given by Diogenes Laërtius (v. 80, &c.) shows that he was a man of the most extensive acquirements. Those works, which were partly historical, partly political, partly philosophical, and partly poetical, have all perished. The work on elocution (περὶ ἐλέγχου) which has come down under his name, is probably the work of an Alexandrian sophist of the name of Demetrius. (See above, No. 3.) It is said that A. Mili has discovered in a Vatican palimpsest some genuine fragments of Demetrius Phalerus. For a list of his works see Diogenes Laërtius, who has devoted a chapter to him. (v. 5.) His literary merits are not confined to what he wrote, for he was a man of a practical turn of mind, and not a mere scholar of the closet; whatever he learned or knew was applied to the practical business of life, of which the following facts are illustrations. The performance of tragedy had greatly fallen into disuse at that time at Athens, on account of the great expenses involved in it; and in order to afford the people less costly and yet intellectual amusement, he caused the Homeric and other poems to be recited on the stage by rhapsodists. (Athen. viii. p. 620; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1473.) It is also believed that it was owing to his influence with Ptolemy Lagi that books were collected at Alexandria, and that he thus laid the foundation of the library which was formed under Ptolemy Philadelphus. There is, however, no reason whatever for calling him the first in the series of librarians at Alexandria, any more than there is for the belief that he took part in the Greek translation of the Septuagint. A life of Demetrius Phalerus was written by Aeschylides (Athen. xii. p. 567), but it is lost. Among the modern works upon him and his merits, see Bonamy, in the Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscrip. vol. viii. p. 157, &c.; H. Dohrn, De Vite et Rebus Demetrii Phaleri, Kiel, 1823, 4to.; Parthey, Die Alexandria. Museen, pp. 35, &c., 38, &c., 71; Ritschl, Die Alexandria. Biblioth. p. 15.

29. A PLATONIC PHILOSOPHER who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Dionysius, about B. C. 85. (Lucian, de Calumnia. 16.) He was opposed to the extravagant luxuries of the court of Ptolemy, and was charged with drinking water and not appearing in woman's dress at the Dionysia. He was punished for being compelled publicly to drink a quantity of water, and to wear a woman's clothes. His writings are probably the same as the Demetrius mentioned by M. Aurelius Antoninus (viii. 25), whom Gatterer confounds with Demetrius Phalerus.

30. Surnamed PUGIL, a Greek grammian, is mentioned as the author of a work περὶ διδασκαλίας (Eryth. Mag. s. v. μαθητής), and seems also to have written on Homer. (Apollon. Soph. s. v. διδασκάλον.)

31. Of SACALASSUS, the author of a work entitled Παθοσκόποικα (Lucian, de Hist. Conserv. 32.)

32. Of SALAMIS, wrote a work on the island of Cyprus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Σαλαμίς.)

33. Of SC nộps, was a Greek grammarian of the time of Aristarchus and Crates. (Strab. xiii. 13.) He has the title Ἀθηναίος Μακεδόνης, and was an acute philologer. (Diog. Laërt. v. 84.) He was the author of a very extensive work which is very often referred to, and bore the title Τρισομᾶς Βιομερέως. It consisted of at least twenty-six books. (Strab. xiii. p. 603 and passim; Athen. iii. pp. 80, 91; Steph. Byz. s. v. Σαλαμίς.) This work was an historical and geographical commentary on that part of the second book of the Iliad in which the forces of the Trojans are enumerated. (Comp. Haplocrat. s. v. Ἀρέστός, Ἀρώτηρας; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1123, 1165.) He is sometimes simply called the Scepsian (Strab. ix. pp. 438, 439, x. pp. 456, 472, 473, 489), and sometimes simply Demetrius. (Strab. xii. pp. 551, 552, xiii. pp. 596, 600, 602.) The numerous other passages in which Demetrius of Scepsis is mentioned or quoted, are collected by Westermann on Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 179, &c.

34. Of Smyrna, a Greek rhetorician of uncertain date. (Diog. Laërt. i. 84.)

35. Of the Cynic philosopher, was educated in the school of the sophist Rhodius, and was an intimate friend of the physician Antiphilus. He is said to have travelled up the Nile for the purpose of seeing the pyramids and the statue of Memnon. (Lucian, Taur. 27, adv. Indoct. 19.) He appears, however, to have spent some part of his life at Corinth, where he acquired great celebrity as a teacher of the Cynic philosophy, and was a strong opponent of Apollonius of Tyana. (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iv. 25.) His life falls in the reigns of Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Vespasian, and Domitian. He was a frank and open-hearted man, who did not scruple to express even the most powerful when he thought that they deserved it. In consequence of this, he was sent into exile, but he preserved the same noble freedom and independence, notwithstanding his poverty and sufferings; and on one occasion, when the emperor Vespasian during a journey met him, Demetrius did not show the slightest symptom of respect. Vespasian was irked enough to take no other vengeance except by calling him a dog. (Senec. de Benef. vii. 1, 8; Suet. Vespas. 13; Dion Cass. lxxvi. 13; Tacit. Ann. xvi. 84, Hist. iv. 40; Lucian, de Salut. 65.)

36. SYNEKLEUS. See No. 17.

37. A Syrian, a Greek rhetorician, who lectured on rhetoric at Athens. Cicero, during his stay there in n. c. 75, was a very diligent pupil of his. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 71.)

38. Of Tarasus, a poet who wrote Satyric dramas. (Diog. Laërt. v. 85.) The name Tarasus, which Diogenes applies to him, is believed by Casaubon (de Satyr. Poës. p. 153, &c., ed. Rams horn) to refer to a peculiar kind of poetry rather than to the native place of Demetrius. Another Demetrius of Tarusus is introduced as a speaker in Pindar's work de Oenomaus Defuncta, where he is described as returning home from Britain, but nothing further is known about him.

39. A TRAGUS actor, mentioned by Herchius (s. v. Δημήτριος): he may be the same as the M. Demetrius whom Acreon (ad Horat. Sat. i. 10. 18, 79) describes as a "σπονδυλώνεις, i. e. modulator, histrio, actor fabularum." Horace himself treats him with contempt, and calls him an ape. Weichert (de Horat. Odeckt. p. 283, &c.) supposes that he was only a person who lived at Rome in the time of Horace and taught the art of scenic declamation; while others consider him to be the Sicilian, Demetrius Megan, who obtained the Roman franchise from J. Caesar through the influence of Dolabella, and is often mentioned under the name of P. Cornelius.

40. Of Troezen, a Greek grammars, who is referred to by Athenaeus. (i. p. 29, iv. p. 139.) He is probably the same as the one who, according to Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 74), wrote against the sophists.

Besides these, there are some writers of the name of Demetrius who cannot be identified with any of those here mentioned, as neither their native places nor any surnames are mentioned by which they might be recognized. For example, Demetrius the author of "Pamphylica." (Tzetz. ad Lyceok. 440, Demetrius, the author of "Argo-licata." (Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 14), and Demetrius the author of a work entitled περὶ τῶν πατρών Ἀργο-

τῶν. (Ath. xvi. p. 590.) In Sidonius (s. e. Tosti), where we read an Epitaphian of "Demetrius," we have probably read "Decimius." [L. S.]

DEMETERS (Δημήτριος), of Bithynia, an epigrammatic poet, the author of two discourses on the cow of Myron, in the Greek Anthology. (Brucke, Art. ii. 65; Jacobs, ii. 64.) It is not known whether he was the same person as the philosopher Demetrios of Bithynia, son of Diph-

thus, whom Diogenes Laërtius mentions (v. 84). Diogenes (v. 85) also mentions an epic poet named Demetrios, three of whose verses he preserves; and also a Demetrius of Tarasus, a satyrical poet [see above, No. 39]; and another Demetrius, an libac, whom he calls περὶ τῶν Ἀργοτῶν. The epigrams of Demetrios are very indifferent. [P. S.]

DEMETERS (Δημήτρις), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy. (Diog. Laërt. v. 85.) The fragments which are ascribed to him contain allusions to events which took place about the 92nd and 94th Olympiads (p. c. 412, 404); but there is another in which mention is made of Seleucus and Agathocles. This would bring the life of the author below the 118th Olympiad, that is, up to 100 years after the period mentioned by the other fragments. The only explanation is that ofClinton and Meineke, who suppose two Demetrii, the one a poet of the old comedy, the other of the new. That the inter fragment belongs to the new comedy is evident from its subject as well as from its date. To the elder Demetrius must be assigned the Demetrias (iii. p. 108, &c.), Aelian (N. A. xii. 10), Hesychius (s. e. Δημήτριος), and the Etymologicum Magnum (s. e. Δημήτριος). Other quotations, without the mention of the play from which they are taken, are made by Athenaeus (ii. p. 56, &c.) and Stoebaeus (Florieg. ii. 1). The only fragment of the younger Demetrios is that mentioned above, from the Αρεσταφίτης (Ath. ix. p. 405, c.), which fixes his date, in Clinton's opinion, after 299 n. c. (Clinton, P. H. sub ann.; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. i. pp. 254—255; ii. pp. 676—678; iv. pp. 539—540.) [P. S.]

DEMETERS (Δημήτριος), the name of several ancient physicians who are often confounded together, and whom it is not always easy to distinguish with certainty.

1. A native of Apeana in Bithynia, who was a follower of Herophilus, and therefore lived probably in the third or second century n. c. He is frequently quoted by Caelius Aurelianus, who has preserved the titles of some of his works, and some extracts from them. In some places he is called "Alateus" (De Morb. Acul. iii. 18, p. 249; De Morb. Chron. ii. 2, p. 367), but this is only a mistake for "Apeana," as is proved by the same passage being quoted in one place (p. 249) from Demetrius Aulitudes, and in another from Demetrius
DEMETRIUS. (De Morb. Chor., v. 9, p. 581.) He is also several times quoted by Soranus. (De Arte Obstetr. pp. 99, 101, 102, 206, 210, 285.)

2. A physician called by Galen by the title of Archirach (De Anat. i. 1, vol. xiv. p. 4; De Thes. ad Pannon. c. 12, vol. xiv. p. 261), must have lived about 200 years before Galen, and it was as early as his time that title was not invented till the reign of Nero. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Archirach.) Galen speaks of him as a contemporary.

3. A native of Bithynia, who is quoted by Heracleides of Tarentum (apud Gal. De Compos. Medic. sec. Gen. iv. 7, vol. xiii. p. 732), must have lived about the third or second century b. c., as Maestus, the tutor of Hermelides, was a pupil of Herophilus. He is probably the same person as the native of Apamea.

4. DEMETRIUS PEPAGOMENUS. (Pepagomenus.) [W. A. G.] DEMETRIUS, artist. 1. An architect, who, in conjunction with Paeonius, finished the great temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which the Chaliphrion had begun about 220 years before. He probably lived about b. c. 340, but his date cannot be fixed with certainty. Vitruvius calls him servus Diaeneus, that is, a sordo deos. (Vitr. VII. Praef. § 16; Cerchiph.)

2. A statuary of some distinction. Pliny mentions his statue of Ysusamine, who was a priestess of Athena for sixty-four years; his statue of Athena, which was called Musica (jovitiva), because the serpents on the Gorgon's head sounded like the strings of a lyre when struck; and his equestrian statue of Simon, who was the earliest writer on horsemanship. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 15.) Now Xenophon mentions a Simon who wrote peπη peπην, and who dedicated in the Eleusinian at Athens a horse, the base of which his own feats of horsemanship (τε ἐναντίον ηγα) were represented in relief (πεπη peπην, 1, v. s. 1.) The Eleusinian was built by Pericles. It would seem therefore that Simon, and consequently Demetrius, lived between the time of Pericles and the latter part of Xenophon's life, that is, in the latter half of the fifth or the former half of the fourth century b. c. It is not likely, therefore, that he could have been a contemporary of Lysippus, as Meyer supposes. Hirt mentions a bust relief in the Museo Nani at Venice, which he thinks may have been copied from the equestrian statue of Simon. (Schol. d. Bild. Kunst. p. 191.)

According to Quintilian (xii. 10), Demetrius was blamed for adhering in his statues so closely to the likeness as to impair their beauty. He is mentioned by Diogenes Laertius (v. 35). There can be little doubt that he is the same person as Demetrius of Alcope, whose bronze statue of Pellichus is described by Lucian (Philipp. 18, 20), who, on account of the defect just mentioned, calls Demetrius ὁ θεσσαλιος τις, ἀλλ' ἄνθρωπος. A Δημητριους Δημητριους γαβερες is mentioned in an extant inscription. (Böckh, i. 1850, No. 1409.)

3. A painter, whose time is unknown. (Diog. Laer. v. 63.) Perhaps he is the same who is mentioned by Diodorus (Enc. Vul. xxxii. 5) as Δημητριους δε τοπογραφεις. He, as Miller reads, τοπογραφης (Arch. d. Kunst. § 132, 2), and who lived at Rome about a. c. 164. Valerius Maximus calls him pictor Alexandrinas (v. 1. § 1).

DEMIANUS, CLAUDIUS, a contemporary of Nero. He had been thrown into prison by L. Vetus, the proconsul of Asia, for his criminal conduct, but was afterwards, on the recommendation of the Emperor, released, and was made a freedman of L. Vetus, in acceding his patron. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 16.) [L. S.]

DEMIOPHON, a king of Phigalaus, who, in order to avert a pestilence, was commanded by an oracle every year to sacrifice a noble maiden. He obeyed the command, and had every year a maiden drawn by lot, but did not allow his own daughters to draw lots with the rest. One Mastusius, whose daughter had been sacrificed, was indignant at the king's conduct, and invited him and his daughters to a sacrificial feast. Mastusius killed the king's daughters, and gave their blood in a cup to the father to drink. The king, on discovering the deed, ordered Mastusius and the cup to be thrown into the sea, which hence received the name of the Mastusian. (Herod. Hist. ii. 40.) [L. S.]

DEMIOBURUS (Δημιοβύρος), the author, according to the Vatican Codex, of a single epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Aph. iii. 257; Jacobs, iv. 224, No. nii, xiii. 889.) [P. S.]

DEMO (Δήμος), a name of Demeter. (Suid. s. v. Δήμος.) It also occurs as a proper name of other mythical beings, such as the Cumean Sibyl (Paus. x. 13, § 1) and a daughter of Celus and Metaneira, who, together with her sisters, kindly received Demeter at the well Callichoros in Attica. (Hom. Hyg. in Cer. 109.) [L. S.]

DEMOCEDES (Δημοκέδης), the son of Calliphon, a celebrated physician of Crotona, in Magna Graecia, who lived in the sixth century b. c. He left his native country and went to Aegina, where he received from the public treasury the sum of one talent per annum for his medical services, i. e. (if we reckon, with Hussey, Ancient Weights and Money, &c., the Aeginetan drachma to be worth one shilling and a penny three farthings) not quite 344. The next year he went to Athens, where he was paid one hundred minae, i. e. rather more than 4067; and the year following he removed to the island of Samos in the Aegean sea, and received from Polycrates, the tyrant, the increased salary of two talents, i. e. (if the Attic standard be meant) 4677. 10s. (Herod. iii. 131.) He accompanied Polycrates when he was seized and put to death by Oroetes, the Persian governor of Sardis (a. c. 529), by whom he was himself seized and carried prisoner to Sam to the court of Dareios, the son of Hystaspes. Here he acquired great riches and reputation by curing the king's foot, and the breast of the queen Atossa. (Ibid. c. 136.) This is added by Dion Chrysostom (Hist. i. 3 Inedit. p. 652, sq.), that Dareios ordered the physicians who had been unable to cure him to be put to death, and that they were saved at the intercession of Democedes. Notwithstanding his honours at the Persian court, he was always desirous of returning to his native country. In order to effect this, he pretended to enter into the views and interests of the Persians, and procured by means of Atossa that he should be sent with some nobles to explore the coast of Greece, and ascertain in what parts it might be most advantageously established. When they arrived at Tarentum, the king, Aristophilides, out of kindness to Democedes, seized the Persians as spies, which afforded the physician
DEMOCOPUS MYRILLA. 973

Democopus developed his talents and principles in all probability under the direction of Democritus, and he came forward as a public orator as early as B.C. 322, when Antipater demanded of the Athenians to deliver up to him the leaders of the popular party. (Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 847.) Some time after the restoration of the democracy he supported Socrates, who proposed a decree that no philosopher should teach in a school without the sanction of the senate and people, and that any one acting contrary to this law should be punished with death. (Diod. Laërt. v. 33; Athen. v. pp. 187, 215, xi. p. 508, xiii. p. 610; Pollux, ix. 42; Euseb. Praep. Evang. xx. 2; Comp. Sophocles.) Democopus left behind him not only several orations (a fragment of one of them is preserved in Rutilius Lupus [p. 7, &c.], but also an extensive historical work, in which he related the history of his own time, but which, as Cicero says, was written in an oratorio rather than an historical manner. (Cic. Brut. 83, de Orat. ii. 23.)

The twenty-first book of it is quoted by Acheon (vi. p. 292, &c. Comp. Plut. Democrit. 361) under the title of "Satrap," and the reception of a few fragments, his orations as well as his history are lost. (Droysen, Gesch. der Nachfolger Alexander. p. 497, &c., and more especially his essay in the Zeitschrift für die Alterthumswissenschaft für 1836, Nos. 20 and 21; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Berodik. § 53, notes 12 and 13, § 72, note 1.)

3. Of Leucome in Attica, was married to the mother of Democritus, who mentions him in his orations against Aphobus (pp. 810, 836). Ruhnken (ad Rutil. Lapp. p. 7, &c.) confounds him with the nephew of Democritus.

4. Of Soil, a Greek poet, of whom Plutarch (Demetr. 27) has preserved a sarcasm upon Demetrius Poliorcetes. (Ib. S.)

DEMOCRITUS. (Δημοκρίτος.) 1. Of Phigaleia, one of the ancient Greek historians. (Dionys. de Thucydid. i. 5; Strab. i. p. 58.)

2. An Attic orator, and a contemporary of Democritus, among whose opponents he is mentioned. (Timaeus, op. Harpocrat. s. v. το ἐλπίδι τῶν.) He was a disciple of Theophrastus, and is chiefly known as the defender of the children of Lycurgus against the enmities of Moecrides and Menexerchus. (Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 842, D.) It seems that in the time of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, some orations of Democritus were still extant, since that critic (Deisarch. 11) attributes to him an oration, which went by the name of Demarchus. It must be observed that Dionysius and Suidas call this orator by the patronymic form of his name, Democleides, and that Ruhnken (Hist. crit. orat. Graec. p. 92) is inclined to consider him as the same person with Democleides who was anchoret in n. c. 316. (Diod. xix. 17.)

3. Surnamed the Beautiful, an Athenian youth, who was beloved by Demetrius Poliorcetes, and on one occasion being surprised by his lover in the bath, escaped from his voluptuous embraces by leaping into a caldron filled with boiling water. (Plut. Demetr. 24.)

DEMOCOON (Δημοκόος), a natural son of Priam, who came from Abydos. A statue of his father was set up by the Greeks against the Delphi, and was slain by Orestes. (Hom. II. iv. 500; Appollod. iii. 12, § 5.) [L. S.]

DEMOCOPUS MYRILLA, was the architect. of the theatre at Synnace, about c. 420. (Eur. stat. ad Hom. Od. iii. 60.) [P. S.]

DEMOCRATIES. [Democrates.

DEMOCRATIES (Δημοκρατία). 1. Of Aphi dna, an Attic orator of the time of Demostenes, who belonged to the anti-Macedonian party. He bequeathed to the son of Sphelius, and was sold with other ambassadors to Pharnaces II. to carry off the library of the state with the Athenians.
He was also one of the am bassadors who accompanied Demostenes to the thebes, to complete a treaty with them against Philip. As an orator he seems to have been a man of second rate. (Demosth. de Coron. pp. 235, 291.) A fragment of one of his orations is preserved in Aristoteles. (Rhod. iii. 4, § 3.)

2. A Pythagorean philosopher, concerning whom absolutely nothing is known. A collection of metaphysics, called the golden sentences (γνώμαι χρυσᾶς) has come down to us under his name, and are distinguished for their soundness and sim plicity. They are written in the Ionic dialect, from which some writers have inferred, that they were written at a very early period, whereas others think it more probable that they are the production of the age of J. Caesar. But nothing can be said with certainty, for want of both external and internal evidence. Some of these sentences are quoted by Stobaeus, and are found in some MSS.
under the name of Democritus, which however seems to be a mere mistake, arising from the re semblance of the two names. They are collected and printed in the several editions of the sentences of Democritus. [Democrites.

3. An Epicurean philosopher, who according to Plutarch (c. Epiphr. p. 1160) was charged by Epiphrus with having copied from his works. He may possibly be the same as the Democritus who corresponding to the same Plutarch (Polid. Prooept. p.
608) lived at Athens about b. c. 340.

4. Of Tenedos, a distinguished wrestler, of whom there was a statue at Olympia. (Paus. vi.
17, § 1.) He is probably the same as the one of whom an anecdote is related by Aelian. (V. H. iv. 15.)

[ I. S.]

DEMOCRINES (Δημοκρίνω), a Greek gramm arian, who is referred to in the Venetian Scholia on Homer (II. ii. 744. Comp. Villoison, Proleg.
pp. xxx.)

[ I. S.]

DEMOCRITUS. [Democritus.

DEMOCRITUS (Δημοκρίτως), was a native of Abdera in Thrace, an Ionian colony of Teos. (Aristot. de Coel. iii. 4; Meteor. ii. 7, with Ideler's note.) Some called him a Milesian, and the name of his father too is stated differently. (Diog. Laer.
x. 34, &c.) His birth year was fixed by Apol lodorus in Ol. 80. 1, or c. c. 460, while Thrasylus had referred it to Ol. 77. 3. (Diog. Laer. i. c.
§ 41, with Menage's note; Gallus, xvii. 21; Clinton, F. H. ad num. 460.) Democritus had called himself forty years younger than Anaxagoras.
His father, Hegesistratus,—or as others called him Damasippus or Atenocritus,—was possessed of so large a property, that he was able to receive and treat Xerxes on his march through Abdera. De mocritus spent the inheritance, which his father left him, on travels into distant countries, which he undertook to satisfy his extraordinary thirst for knowledge. He travelled over a great part of Asia, and, as some state, he even reached India and Aethiopia. (Cic. de Fin. v. 19; Strabo, xvi.
p. 703; A. H. C. Geffers, Quaestiones Democrit.
p. 15, &c.) We know that he wrote on Babylon and Meroi; he must also have visited Egypt, and Diodoros Siculus (i. 98) even states, that he lived there for a period of five years. He himself de clared (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 364.), that among his contemporaries none had made greater journeys, seen more countries, and made the acquaintance of more men than himself, without giving himself no thing but himself more to himself than himself. Among the last he mentions in par

DEMOCRITUS.

cause," as Diogenes says, "he had foretold them some things which the event proved to be true." This had probably reference to his knowledge of natural phenomena. His fellow-citizens honoured him with presents in money and bronze statutes. Even the soffer Tiron, who in his sili spared no one, speaks of Democritius only in terms of praise. He died at an advanced age (some say that he was 108 years old), and even the manner in which he died is characteristic of his medical knowledge, which, combined as it was with his knowledge of nature, caused a report, which was believed by some persons, that he was a sorcerer and a magician. (Plin. H. N. xxiv. 17, xxx. 1.) His death is placed in Ol. 105. 4, or n. c. 357, in which year Hippocrates also is said to have died. (Clinton, F. H. ad ann. 357.) We cannot leave unnoticed the tradition that Democritius deprived himself of his sight, in order to be less disturbed in his pursuits. (Cic. de Fin. v. 29; Gellius, x. 17; Diog. Laërt. ix. 39; Cic. Tusc. v. 39; Menage, ad Diog. Laërt. ix. 43.) But this tradition is one of the inventions of a later age, which was fond of piquant anecdotes. It is more probable that he may have lost his sight by too severe application to study. (Brandis, l. c. p. 298.) This loss, however, did not diminish the cheerful disposition of his mind and his views of human life, which prompted him everywhere to look at the cheerful and comical side of things, which later writers took to mean, that he always laughed at the follies of men. (Sene. de Ira, ii. 10; Aelian, V. H. iv. 20.)

Of the extent of his knowledge, which embraced not only natural sciences, mathematics, mechanics (Brandis, in the Rhein. Mus. iii. p. 134, &c.), grammar, music, and philosophy, but various other useful arts, we may form some notion from the list of his numerous works which is given by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 46—49), and which, as Diogenes expressly states, contains only his genuine works. The grammarians Thalassius, a contemporary of the emperor Tibereus, arranged them, like the works of Plato, into tetralogies. The importance which was attached to the researches of Democritius is evident from the fact, that Aristotle is reported to have written a work in two books on the problems of Democritius. (Diog. Laërt. v. 26.) His works were composed in the Ionic dialect, though not without some admixture of the local peculiarities of Abdera. (Philopo. in Arist. de gener. et corr. fol. 7, a; Simplic. ad Arist. de Coelo, fol. 156, a; Suid. s. a. purus.) They are nevertheless much praised by Cicero on account of the poetical beauties and the liveliness of the style, and even by the poets, who used to use his works of Plato. (Graec. van Prater. l. c.; Cic. de Div. ii. 64, de Orat. i. 11, Orat. 20; Dionys. de Compos. verb. 24; Plut. Sympos. v. 7, p. 683.) Pyrrhon is said to have imitated his style (Euseb. Praep. Evang. xiv. 6), and even Tiron praises it, and calls it πέραςυν καὶ φιλόπων λέξις. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 40.) Unfortunately, not one of his works has come down to us, and the treatise which we possess under his name is considered spurious. Callimachus wrote glosses upon his works and made a list of them (Suid. s. al.); but they must have been lost at an early time, since even Simplicius does not appear to have read them (Pepencort, de Atominorum doctrina, p. 32), and since comparatively few fragments have come down to us, and these fragments refer more to ethics than to physical matters. There is a very good collection of these fragments by F. G. A. Mullach, "Democritii Abderitae operum fragmenta." Berlin, 1843, 8vo. Besides this work, which contains also elaborate dissertations on the life and writings of Democritius, the student may consult—1. Concerning the spurious works and letters of Democritius, see Fabric. Bibli. Gr. i. p. 383, &c., ii. pp. 641, 639, iv. p. 333, &c. The philosophy of Democritius has, in modern times been the subject of much investigation. Hegel (Vorlesung. üb. Gesch. d. Philosoph. i. p. 379, &c.) treats it very briefly, and does not attach much importance to it. The most minute investigations concerning it are those of Ritter (Gesch. d. Philosophen i. p. 359), Brandis (Rhein. Mus. iii. p. 133, &c., and Gesch. der Ornith. u. Röm. Philosophen i. p. 294, &c.), Petersen (Hist. Philos. Studien. i. p. 24, &c.), Pepencort (Stövorum doctrum), and Mullach (l. c. pp. 373—419).

It was Democritius who, in his numerous writings, carried out Lencippus's theory of atoms, and especially in his observations on nature. These atomists took the task of proving that the quantitative relations of matter were its original characteristics, and that its qualitative relations were something secondary and derivative, and of thus doing away with the distinction between matter and mind or power. (Brandis, l. c. p. 294.) In order to avoid the difficulties connected with the supposition of primitive matter with definite qualities, without admitting the coming into existence and annihilation as realities, and without giving up, as the Eleatic philosophers did, the realm of variation and its changes, the atomists derived all definiteness of phenomena, both physical and mental, from elementary particles, the infinite number of which were homogeneous in quality, but heterogeneous in form. This made it necessary for them to establish the reality of a vacuum or space, and of motion. (Brandis, l. c. p. 303, &c.) Motion, they said, is the eternal and necessary consequence of the original variety of atoms in the vacuum or space. All phenomena arise from the infinite variety of the form, order, and position of the atoms in forming combinations. It is impossible, they add, to derive this supposition from any higher principle, for a beginning out of nothing is impossible. (Diog. Laërt. Anax. ii. 6, p. 742, b. 20, ed. Bekker; Brandis, l. c. p. 309, &c.) The atoms are impenetrable, and therefore offer resistance to one another. This creates a swinging, world-producing, and whirligig motion. (This reminds us of the joke in the Clouds of Aristophanens about the god Δίας!) Now as similars attract one another, there arise in that motion real things and beings, that is, combinations of distinct atoms, which still continue to be separated from one another by the vacuum. The first cause of all existence is necessity, that is, the necessary predetermination and necessary succession of cause and effect. This they called chance, in opposition to the ραχια of Ammonius. But it does the highest honour to the mind of Democritius, that he made the discovery of causes the highest object of scientific investigations. He once said, that he preferred the discovery of a true cause to the possession of the kingdom of Persia. (Dionys. Alex. ap. Euseb. Præp. Evan. xiv. 27.) We must not, therefore, take the word chance (καινή) in its vulgar acceptation. (Brandis, l. c. p. 319.) Aristotle understood and used the word in its proper sense. (Plato, Apol. ii. 4. p. 196. 11; Simplic. fol. 74.) as he generally valued him highly, and often says of him, that he had thought on all subjects, searched after the first causes of phænomena, and endeavored to find definitions. (De Generat. et Corrupt. i. 2, 3, Metaph. M. 4, Phys. ii. 2. p. 194, 20, de Part. Anim. i. p. 642, 26.) The only thing for which he censures him, is a disregard for teleological relations, and the want of a comprehensive system of induction. (De Respiratione, ένεργεία ζωής, and an invention of those who were too idle to think. (Dionys. ap. Euseb. Præp. Evan. xiv. 27.) Aristotle therefore, expressly states, Beside the infinite number of atoms existing in infinite space, Democritus also supposed the existence of an infinite number of worlds, some of which resembled one another, while others differed from one another, and each of these worlds was kept together as one thing by a sort of shell or skin. He derived the four elements from the form of the atoms predominating in each, from their quality, and their relations of magnitude. In deriving individual things from atoms, he mainly considered the qualities of warm and cold. The warm or fire-like he took to be a combination of fine, spherical, and very movable atoms, as opposed to the cold and moist. His mode of proceeding, however, was, first carefully to observe and describe the phænomena themselves, and then to attempt his atomistic explanation, whereby he essentially advanced the knowledge of nature. (Papencook, l. c. p. 45, &c.; Brandis, l. c. p. 327.) He derived the soul, the origin of life, consciousness, and thought, from the finest fire-atoms (Aristot. de Anim. i. 2, ed. Trendelenburg); and in connexion with this theory he made very profound physiological investigations. It was for this reason that, according to him, the soul while in the body acquires perceptions and knowledge by corporeal contact, and that it is affected by heat and cold. The sensitive perceptions themselves were to him affections of the organ or of the subject perceiving, dependent on the changes of bodily condition, on the difference of the organs and their quality, on air and light. Hence the difference, &c., of taste, colour, and temperature, are only conventional. (Sext. Empir. adv. Math. viii. 135), the real causes of those differences being in the atoms.

It was very natural, therefore, that Democritus described even the knowledge obtained by sensuous perception as obscure (σκοτεῖν κρατεῖν). A clear and pure knowledge is only that which has reference to the true principles or the true nature of things, that is, to the atoms and space. But knowledge derived from reason was, in his opinion, not specifically different from that acquired through the senses; for conception and reflection were to him only effects of impressions made upon the senses. (Artemidorus, l. c. p. 247, 26.) He admitted, therefore, expressly, that Democritus did not consider mind as something peculiar, or as a power distinct from the soul or sensuous perception, but that he considered knowledge derived from reason to be sensuous perceptions. (De Anim. i. 2. p. 404, 27.) A purer and higher knowledge which he opposed to the obscure knowledge obtained through the medium of the senses, must therefore have been to him a kind of sensation, that is, a direct perception of the real nature of things, for this reason he assumed the three criteria (εἰς τοίς): 1. Phænomena as criteria for discovering that which is hidden: 2. Thought as a criterion of investigation; and 3. Assertions as criteria of desires. (Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 140; Brandis, l. c. p. 334.) Now as Democritus acknowledged the uncertainty of perceptions, and as he was unable to establish a higher and purely spiritual source of knowledge as distinct from perceptions, we often find him complaining that all human knowledge is uncertain, that in general either nothing is absolutely true, or at least not clear to us (δεικνύω, Aristot. Metaph. Π. 5), that our senses grope about in the dark (δεικνύω τε καί ταύτα, ἐν βίοις γὰρ η δεικτεῖα, which Cicero translates in præfatu varietatem usse.)

In his ethical philosophy Democritus considered the acquisition of peace of mind (εἰθυδία) as the end and ultimate object of our actions. (Diog. Laërt. i. 72, άρτε ὅ ἀδιαν άνθρωπος, εν βίοι γὰρ η δεικτεῖα, which Cicero translates in præfatu varietatem usse.)

The titles of the works which the ancient ascribed to Democritus may be found in Diogenes Laërtius. We find among them: 1. Works of ethics and practical philosophy. 2. On natural science. 3. On music and poetry, on rhythm and poetical beauty (Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst. i. p. 24, &c.), and on Homer. 5. Works of a linguistic and grammatical nature; for Democritus is one of the earliest Greek philosophers that made language the subject of his investigations. (Lereh, Sprachphilosophie der Alten, i. p. 13, &c.) 6. Works on medicine. 7. On agriculture. 8. On painting. 9. On mythology, history, &c. He had even occupied himself with success, with music; and Vitruvius (Irauf. Lib. viii. comp. Sene. Epist. 90) ascribes to him certain inventions, for example, DEMOCRITUS. 1. Of Ephesus, works worked on the Epiphanius and the temple of the Samothrace. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 49.) A fragment of his is preserved in Athenaeus. (xii. p. 525.)

3. Of Smyrni, is recommended by Cicero to the proconsul A. Aulienus (ad Fam. xiii. 78), as a highly educated man. [L. S.]

DEMODAMAS (Δημοδάμας), of Miletus or Haliarnassus, is called Solon et Antiochus by Pliny, (H. N. vi. 16.) He appears to have written a geographical work on Asia, from which Pliny derived great assistance. He is mentioned also by Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. "Ἀσσαντα", and is probably the same as the Demodamas who according to Athenaeus (xv. p. 682) wrote a work on Haliarnassus. (περὶ Ἀλιαρνασοῦ.) [L. S.]

DEMOCREDITUS (Δημοκρέτιος). 1. The famous bard of the Odyssey, according to the fashion of the heroic ages delighted the guests of king Alcinous during their repast by singing about the feats of the Greeks at Troy, of the love of Ares and Aphrodite, and of the wooden horse. (Od. viii. 62, &c.; xii. 27.) He is also mentioned as the bard who sang Aegisthous to guard Clytemnestra, and to expose Agamemnon in a desert island. (Od. iii. 267; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1466.) Eustathius describes him as a Laconian, and as a pupil of Automedes and Perimedes of Argos. He adds that he won the prize at the Pythian games and then followed Agamemnon to Mycenae. One story makes Odysseus recite Democritus's song about the destruction of Troy during a contest in Tyrrhenian. (Ptolem. Heph. 7.) On the throne of Apollo at Amycla, Democritus was represented playing to the dance of the Phainaeus. (Paus. iii. 18. § 7.) Later writers, who look upon this mythical minstrel as a historical person, describe him as a native of Corcyra, and as an aged and blind singer (Od. vii. 272), who composed a poem on the destruction of Troy (Δοξὸν ἄρον), and on the marriage of Hephæstus and Aphrodite. (Plut. de Mus. 3; Eudoc. p. 407; Phot. Bibl. p. 152, ed. Bekker.) Phintarch (de Plauc. 10) refers even to the first book of an epic poem on the exploits of Hercules. (Πρακτικα.) But all such statements are fabulous; and if there existed any poems under his name, they were certainly forgeries.

2. A companion and friend of Aeneas, who was killed by Halesa. (Verg. Aen. x. 413.) [L. S.]

DEMOCRITUS (Δημοκρίτος). 1. Among the dialogues bearing the name of Plato there is one entitled Democritus, from the person addressed therein; but whether this Democritus is the friend of Socrates and father of Theages, who is introduced as one of the interlocutors in the dialogue Theages, is uncertain. But the dialogue Democritus is now acknowledged on all hands to be a fabrication of a late sophist or rhetorician. (C. F. Hermann, System der Platon. Philosoph. i. p. 414, &c.)

2. One of the Athenian generals, who commanded a fleet in the Hellespont, and in the spring of s. c. 424, recovered the town of Antara (Thuc.). Though a favorite person of this name is mentioned by Polybius, (v. 53.) 1 De

DEMODOCUS (Δημοδόκος) of Leras, the author of four epigrams in the Greek Anthology, containing bitter attacks upon the Chians, Cappadocians, and Cilicians. (Brucke, Ausl. ii. 56; Jacobs, ii. 56, xiii. 698.) He is mentioned by Aristotle. (Edic. Nicou. vii. 9.) [P. S.]

DEMODOCUS (Δημοδόκος), a physician of Croton. [DEMODOCES.]

DEMOLEON (Δημόλεων). There are four mythical beings of this name, a centaur (Or. Met. xiii. 355, &c.), a son of Phrixus and Challicope (Hygin. Fab. 14), a son of Antenor and Thenea, who was slain by Achilles (Hom. II. xx. 394), and a son of Hippusas, who was slain by Paris. (Quint. Smyrn. x. 119, &c.) [L. S.]

DEMOLEUS, a Greek, who had been slain by Aeneas, and whose cloak of mail was offered by him as a prize in the games which he celebrated in Sicily. (Verg. Aen. v. 258, &c.) [L. S.]

DEMON (Δημών). 1. The author of an Attic (480 B.C.), or a history of Attica, against which Philochorus wrote his Attica, from which we may infer that Demon lived either shortly before or at the time of Philochorus. (Plut. Thes. 19, 29; Athen. iii. p. 591; Suid. s. e. προσοδοτέα.)

2. He is probably the same as the author of a work on proverbial (περὶ παρομοίων), of which some fragments are still extant, (Steph. s. v. Δωδών; Harpocrat. s. v. Μισσοί λέον; hesych. s. v. Proverb. v. 29; Apostol. v. 44, xiii. 26, xxvii. 28, xx. 27; Arrius. Virg. pp. 186, 463) and of a work on sacrifices (περὶ Στυρίων; Harpocrat. s. v. προσοδοτέα.) The fragments of the works of Demon are collected in Siebel's Phenomena (Demonis, Citoloumi et istor 480 μετέχειθεν, 1812. [See especially p. vii. &c., and p. 17, &c., and in C. and Th. Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec. p. 578, &c. Comp. p. lxxxvi. &c.)

2. Of the demes of Paeonia in Attica, was a son of Demosthenes's sister, and distinguished himself as an orator; he belonged, like his great kinsman, to the anti-Macedonian party. When, after the death of Alexander, Demosthenes was still in exile and tried to rouse the Greeks to a vigorous resistance against the Macedonians, Demon proposed a decree to recall him. It was joyfully passed by the Athenians, and Demosthenes returned in triumph. (Plut. Demosth. 27; Athen. viii. p. 341, xiii. p. 593, where a son of his, Phryton, is mentioned.) [L. S.]

DEMONASSA (Δημονασσα). 1. The wife of Irus, and mother of Eurydamas and Evritus. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollon. Rhod. I. 74.)

2. A daughter of Amphiaras and Eriphyle, was the wife of Thersander, by whom she became the mother of Tisamenus. (Paus. iii. 15. § 6, ix. 5 § 8.)

3. The mother of Aegialeus by Adrastus. (Hygin. Fab. 71.) [L. S.]

DEMOPHANES.

DEMOPHANES. He probably lived in the time of Hadrian, though the exact date of his birth and death is unknown. We owe our knowledge of his character to Lucian, who has painted it in the most glowing colours, representing him as almost perfectly wise and good. He adds that he has written an account of Demanox. "In order that the young who wish to apply to the study of philosophy may not be obliged to confine themselves to examples from antiquity, but may derive from his life also a model for their imitation." Of his friends the best known to us was Epictetus, who appears to have exercised considerable influence in the direction of his mind. By birth a Cyprian, he removed to Athens, and there joined the Cynical school, chiefly from respect to the memory of Diogenes, whom he considered the most faithful representative of the life and virtues of Socrates. He appears, however, to have been free from the austerity and moroseness of the sect, though he valued their indifference to external things; but we do not find that he contributed anything more to the cause of science than the original Cynics. His popularity at Athens was so great, that people vied with each other for the honour of offering him the strongest and best preparations for their respect by large donations of apples. He contrived some edium by the freedom with which he rebuked vice, and he was accused of neglecting sacrifice and the Eleusinian mysteries. To these charges he returned for answer, that "he did not sacrifice to Athens, because she could not want his offerings," and that "if the mysteries were bad, no one ought to be initiated; if good, they should be divulged to everybody," — the first of which replies is symptomatic of that vague kind of Deism which used so generally to conceal itself under an affectation of reverence for the popular gods. He never married, though Epictetus begged him to do so, but was met by the request that his wife might be one of Epictetus's daughters, whose own bachelor life was not very consistent with his urging the duty of giving birth to and educating children. This and other anecdotes of Demanox recorded by Lucian, show him to have been an amiable, good-humoured man, leading probably a happy life, beloved and respected by those about him, and no doubt contrasting favourably with others in those times called themselves votaries of those ancient systems which, as practical guides of life, were no longer necessary in a world to which a perfect revelation had now been given. [CRESCENS.] Demanox died when nearly a hundred years old, and was buried with great magnificence, though he had declared it a matter of perfect indifference to him if his body were thrown to the dogs. (Lucian, Demanox; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil., vol. ii. pars. i. 2. 6.)

[GE. E. C.]

DEMONICUS (Δημόνικος), a daughter of Agenor and Epicaste, who became by Ares the mother of Eumen, Molus, Pylus, and Theatus. (Apollod. i. 7, § 7.) Hesiod (ap. Schol. ad Hom. II. xiv. 200) calls her Democede. [L. S.]

DEMONICUS (Δημόνικος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, of whom one fragment is preserved by Athenaeus (ix. p. 410, d.), who gives Ἀχιλλεινος as the title of the play; but perhaps it should rather be Ἀχιλλεινος. (Meineke, Frug. Com. Græc. i. p. 492, iv. p. 570.)

DEMONIAKON (Δημονιακόν), Megalopolis, a Philosopher, and a disciple of Arataeus. (Plut. Philog. p. 1.) He and Eudemus were the chief persons who delivered Megalopolis from the tyranny of Aristodemus, and also assisted Aratus in abolishing tyranny at Sicyon. For a time they were entrusted with the administration of the state of Cyrene, and Philoecmen in his youth had enjoyed their friendship. (Polyb. x. 25.) [L. S.]

DEMOPHILUS. (Δημοφίλος.) DEMOPhilus (Δημοφίλος). 1. The son of Epimenides, an historian, in the reign of Alexander the Great. He continued his father's history by adding to it the history of the Sacred War from the taking of Delphi and the plunder of its temple by Philip the Macedon, b. c. 357. (Diod. xvi. 14; Snid. s. a. "Εφοποιοι, where "Εφοποιοι should be read for "Εφοποιοι; Athen. vii. p. 232, d.; Schol. Hom. II. xiii. 301; Vossius, de Hist. Græc. p. 58, ed. Westermann.)

2. An Athenian comic poet of the new comedy. The only mention of him is in the Prologue to the Asinaria of Plautus, who says, that his play is taken from the Οραγος of Demophilus, v. 10—13, "Haec nunc Graece est Otagos Fabulæ. Demophilus scripsit, Marcus vorit barbaræ. Asinaria traduci voluit esset, sed in eam inest lepos ludusque in hee Comedidia." Meineke observes that, judging from the "lepos ludusque" of the Asinaria, we have no need to regret the loss of the Οραγος. (Meineke, Frgg. Com. Graece. i. p. 491.)

3. A Pythagorean philosopher, of whose personal history nothing is known. He wrote a work entitled Βιον Σεπαρια, treating of practical ethics, parts of which are still extant, in the form of a selection, entitled γεωμετρικά δημοκρατία, from which we may infer that the whole work must have been of the highest order of excellence. The extant portion of it was first printed by Lucas Holstenius in his collection of the ancient writers on practical morals, Rome, 1638, 8vo., Lugd. Bat. 1639, 12mo.; then by Gale, in his Opusc. Mediol. Cant. 1670, 8vo., Amst. 1688, 8vo., also with the Oxford edition of Maximus Tyrius, 1677, 12mo., and with Weisstein's Epictetus, Amst. 1750, 12mo.; in a separate form by J. Swedberg, Stockholm, 1682, 8vo., and more correctly by I. A. Schier, Lips. 1754, 8vo., and lastly by J. C. Orrili, in his Opusc. Graec. Vel. Sentent. Lips. 1819, 8vo. [P. S.]

DEMOPhilus, artists. 1. Of Himera, a painter, who flourished about a. c. 424, was said by some to have been the teacher of Zeuxis. (Plin. xxxv. 9. s. 38, § 2; Ζευξις)

2. An architect of little note, wrote Ρακετα Συμμετριαμα. (Vitr. vii. Praecep. § 14.) See also DABOPhilus.

DEMOPHON or DEMOPOHON (Δημοφῶν or Δημοφῶν). 1. The youngest son of Celaus and Metaneira, who was entrusted to the care of De- meter. He grew up under her without any human food, being fed by the goddess with her own milk, and ambrosia. During the night she used to place him in fire to secure to him eternal youth; but once she was observed by Metaneira, who disturbed the goddess by her cries, and the child Demophon was consumed by the flames. (Apollod. i. 5, § 1; Ov. Fast. iv. 515, &c; & Hygin. Fab. 147; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 254.)

2. A son of Theseus and Phaedra, and brother of Acramas. (Diod. iv. 62; & Hygin. Fab. 48.) According to Pindar (ap. Plut. Thes. 28), he was the son of Theseus by Antiope. He accompanied the Greeks against Troy (Homer, however, does
DEMOSTHENES. 979

DEMOSTHENES (Δημοσθένης), son of Akistes, Athenian general, is one of the prominent characters of the Peloponnesian war. He was appointed in the sixth year, n. c. 426, to the command with Procles of a squadron of thirty ships sent on the annual cruise around Peloponnesus. Their first important efforts were directed against Lecens; and with the aid of a large force of Acarnamnians, Zancynthians, Cephalenians, and Corcyreans, it seemed highly probable that this important ally of Sparta might be reduced. And the Acarnamnians were urgent for a blockade. Demosthenes, however, had conceived, from the information of the Messenians, hopes of a loftier kind; and, at the risk of offending the Acarnamnians, who presently declined to co-operate, sailed with all his views to Naupactus. The Corcyreans had also left him, but he still persevered in his project, which was the reduction of the Aetolians—an operation which, once effected, would open the way to the Phocians, a people ever well disposed to Athens, and so into Boeotia. It was not too much to hope that northern Greece might thus be wholly detached from the Spartan alliance, and the war made strictly Peloponnesian. The success of the first move in this plan depended much on the aid of certain allies among the Ozolian Locrians, who were used to the peculiar warfare of the enemy. These, however, were remiss, and Demosthenes, fearing that the rumour of his purpose would rouse the whole Aetolian nation, advanced without them. His fear had been already realized, and as soon as the resources of his archery were exhausted, he was obliged to retreat, and this retreat the loss of his guide rendered even more disastrous than might have been expected for a force of heavy-armed men amidst the perpetual assaults of numerous light armed enemies. "There was every kind of flight and destruction," says Thucydides, "and of 300 Athenians there fell 120, a loss rendered heavy beyond proportion, through the peculiar excellence of this particular detachment." (Thuc. iii. 91, 94, 98; Diod. xii. 60.) This, however, seemed to be hardly the worst consequence. The Aetolians sent ambassadors to Sparta, to ask aid to reduce Naupactus; and, when received under the command of Eurylochos 3000 men-at-arms. The Ozolian Locrians were overawed into decided alliance. But Naupactus Demosthenes was enabled to save by reinforcements obtained on urgent entreaty from the offended Acarnamnians; and Eurylochos led off his forces for the present to Calydon, Pleuron, and Prochisium. Yet this was but the preliminary of a more important movement. The Ambraiots, on a secret understanding with him, advanced with a large force into the country of their ancient enemy, the Amphictyonic Argos; they posted themselves not far from the town, at Olpae. Eurylochos now broke up, and, by a judicious route, passing between the town itself and Crenae, where the Acrabarians had assembled to intercept him, effected a junction with these allies. Presently, on the other hand, Demosthenes arrived with twenty ships, and under his conduct the final engagement took place at Olpae, and was decided, by an ambuscade which he planted, in favour of the Athenians and Acrabarians. An almost greater advantage was gained by the compact entered into with Menedauns, the surviving Spartan officer, for the underneath withdrawal of the Peloponnesians. And, finally, having heard that the whole remaining force of Ambracia was advancing in support, he succeeded further in waylaying and almost exterminating it in the battle of Idomene. The Athenians received a third part of the spoils, and the amount may be estimated from the fact, that the share of Demosthenes, the only portion that reached Athens in safety, was no less than 800 panoplies. (Thuc. iii. 102, 105—114; Diod. xii. 60.)

Demosthenes might now safely venture home: and in the next year he was allowed, at his own request, though not in office, to accompany Eury- medon and Sopheicles, the commanders of a squadron destined for Sicily, and empowered to use their services for any object he chose on the Peloponnesian coast. They, however, would not hear of any delay, and it was only by the chance of stress of weather, which detained the fleet at Pylos, his choice for his new design, that he was enabled to effect his purpose. The men themselves while waiting took the fancy to build him his fort; and in it he was left with five ships. Here he was assailed by the Lacedaemonians, whom the news had recalled out of Attica, and from Corea, and here with great spirit and success he defeated their attempt to carry the place on the sea side. The arrival of forty Athenian ships, for which he had sent, and their success in making their way into the harbour, reversed his position. The Lacedaemonians, who in their siege of the place had occupied the neighbouring island, were now cut off and blockaded, and Sparta now humbled herself to ask for peace. The arrogancy of the people blighted this promise; and as the winter approached it became a question whether the whole advantage was not likely to be lost by the escape of the party. Demosthenes, however, was devising an expedition, when joined or rather, in fact, superseded by Cleon (CLEON), who nevertheless was shrewd enough not to interfere, possibly had even had intention of it throughout. His Aeolian disaster had taught him the value of light and the weakness of heavy arms. Land- ing near (c. 454) with a force of which one-third only were full-armed, by a judicious distribution of his troops, and chiefly by the aid of his archers and towards, he effected the achievement, then almost incredible, of forcing the Spartans to lay down their arms. (Thuc. iv. 2—40; Diod. xii. 61—63.)

The glory of this success was with the vulgar given to Cleon, yet Demosthenes must have surely had some proportion of it. He was probably henceforth in general esteem, as in the Knights of Aristophanes, coupled at the head of the list of the city's generals with the high-born and influential Nicia. We find him in the following year (c. 454) with a force of which one-third only were full-armed, by a judicious distribution of his troops, and chiefly by the aid of his archers and towards, he effected the achievement, then almost incredible, of forcing the Spartans to lay down their arms. (Thuc. iv. 2—40; Diod. xii. 61—63.)

he or Hippocrates had mistaken the day; his arrival was too early, and the Boeotians, who had moreover received information of the plot, were enabled to bring their whole force against Demosthenes, and yet be in time to meet his colleague at Delium. The whole design was thus overthrown, and Demosthenes was further disgraced by a repulse in a descent on the territory of Sicyon. (Thuc. iv. 68—74, 76, 77, 89, 101; Diod. xii. 65—69.)

He does not reappear in history, except among the signatures to the truce of the tenth year, b.c. 422 (Thuc. v. 10, 24), till the fourteenth, b.c. 413. On the occasion of his proposed expedition to Sicily, giving an account of the relief of Syracuse by Gylippus, he was appointed with Eurymedon to the command of the reinforcements, and, while the latter went at once to Sicily, he remained at home making the needful preparations. Early in the spring he set sail with sixty-five ships; and after some delays, how far avoidable we cannot say, at Aegina and Corea, on the coasts of Peloponnesus and of Italy, reached Syracuse a little too late to prevent the first naval victory of the besieged. (Thuc. vii. 16, 17, 20, 26, 31, 33, 35, 42.)

The details of this concluding portion of the Syracusan expedition cannot be given in a life of Demosthenes. His advice, on his arrival, was to make at once the utmost use of their own present strength and their enemies' consternation, and then at once, if they failed, to return. No immediate conclusion of the siege could be expected without the recovery of the high ground commanding the city, Himera. After some unsuccessful attempts by day, Demosthenes devised and put into effect a plan for an attack, with the whole forces, by night. It was at first sigillum successful, but the tide was turned by the resistance of a body of Boeotians, and the victory changed to a disastrous defeat. Demosthenes now counselled an immediate departure, either to Athens, or, if Nicia, whose professions of master acquaintance with the internal state of the besieged greatly influenced his brother generals, really had grounds for hope, at any rate from their present unhealthy position to the safe and wholesome situation of Thapsus. Demosthenes reasoned in vain: then ensued the fatal delay, the return of Gylippus with fresh reinforcements, the late consent of Nicia to depart, and the infuriated recall of it on the eclipse of the moon, the first defeat and the second of the all-important ships. In the latter engagement Demosthenes had the chief command, and retained even in the hour of disaster sufficient coolness to see that the only course remaining was to make a landing. He makes his way through the blockading ships and force their way to sea. And he had now the voice of Nicia with him: the army itself in desperation refused. In the subsequent retreat by the land, Demosthenes for some time is described simply as cooperating with Nicia, though with the separate command of the second and rearward division. This, on the sixth day, through its greater exposure to the enemy, was unable to keep up with the other; and Demosthenes, as in his position was natural, looked more to defence against the enemy, while Nicia thought only of speedy retreat. The consequence was that, having fallen about five miles and a half behind, he was surrounded and driven into a plot of ground planted.
DEMOSTHENES.

with olives, fenced nearly round with a wall, where he was exposed to the missiles of the enemy. Here he surrendered, towards evening, on condition of the lives of his soldiers being spared. His own was not.

In confinement at Syracuse Nicia and he were once more united, and were treated with great kindness by the unworthy decree of the Syracusan assembly, against the voice, says Diodorus and Plutarch, of Hermocrates, and contrary, says Thucydides, to the wish of Glyippus, who coveted the glory of conveying the two great Athenian commanders to Sparta. (Thuc. vii. 42—97; Diod. xiii. 10—33; Plut. Nicia, 20—28.) Timaeus, adds Plutarch, related that Hermocrates contrived to apprise them of the decree, and that they fell by their own hands. Demosthenes may be characterized as an unfortunate man. Had his fortune but equalled his ability, he had achieved perhaps a name greater than any of the generals of his time. In the largeness and boldness of his designs, the quickness and justness of his insight, the risk he bore along with his contemporaries. In Aetolia the crudeness of his first essay was cruelly punished; in Acmantia and at Pylos, though his projects were even favoured by chance, yet the proper result of the one in the reduction of Ambracia was prevented by the jealousy of his allies; and in the other his individual glory was stolen by the shameless Cleon. In the designs against Megara and Bocotia failure again attended him. In his conduct of the second Syracusan expedition there is hardly one step which we can blame: with the exception of the night attack on Epipolae, it is in fact a painful exhibition of a defeat step by step effected over reason and wisdom by folly and inflation. It is possible that with the other elements of a great general he did not combine in a high degree that essential requisite of moral firmness and command: he may too have been less accurate in attending to the details of execution than he was farsighted and fertile in devising the outline. Yet this must be doubtful: what we learn from history is, that to Demosthenes his country owed her superiority at the peace of Nicias, and to any rather than to him her defeat at Syracuse. Of his position at home among the various parties of the state we know little or nothing: he appears to have been of high rank: in Aristophanes he is described as leading the charge of the Hippoips upon Cleon (Equites, 242), and his place in the play throughout seems to imply it. [A. H. C.] DEMOSTHENES (Ammonius), the greatest of the Greek orators, was the son of one Demosthenes, and born in the Attic demos of Paeanin. Respecting the year of his birth, the statements of the ancient differ as much as the opinions of modern critics. Some of the earlier scholars required in the express testimony of Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Epp. ad Att. i. 4), who says that Demosthenes was born in the year preceding the hundredth Olympiad, that is, B.C. 394, or n. c. 385. Gellius (xv. 38) states that Demosthenes was in his twenty-seventh year at the time when he composed his orations against Androtion and Timocrates, which belong to n. c. 355, so that the birth of Demosthenes fell full five years after, a period which is admitted by Clinton. (F. H. ii. p. 436, &c., 3rd edit.) According to the account in the lives of the Ten Orators (p. 845, D.) Demosthenes was born in the archonship of Dexiontus, that is, n. c. 355, and this statement has been adopted by most modern critics, such as Becker, Böckh, Westermann, Thirlwall, and others; whereas some have endeavoured to prove that n. c. 384 was his birth-year. The opinion now most commonly received is, that Demosthenes was born in n. c. 365. For detailed discussions on this question the reader is referred to the works mentioned at the end of this article.

When Demosthenes, the father, died, he left behind him a widow, the daughter of Glycon, and two children, Demosthenes, then a boy of seven, and a daughter who was only five years old. (Plut. Dem. 4; Dem. c. Apolob. ii. p. 836; Aeschin. c. Ctesiph. § 171; Boeckh, Corp. Inscrip. i. p. 46.) During the last moments of his life, the father had entrusted the protection of his wife and children and the care of his property, partly capital and partly a large sword manufactury, to three guardians, Apolobus, a son of his sister Demophon, a son of his brother, and an old friend Therrippides, to coinage new, and to the widow and receive with her a dowry of eighty minae; the second was to marry the daughter on her attaining the age of majority, and was to receive at once two talents, and the third was to have the interest of seventy minae, till Demosthenes, the son, should come of age. (Dem. c. Apolob. i. pp. 814, 816, ii. 840.) But the first two of the guardians did not comply with the stipulations made in the will, and all three, in spite of all the remonstrances of the family, united in squandering and appropriating to themselves a great portion of the handsome property, which is estimated at upwards of fourteen talents, and might easily have been doubled during the minority of Demosthenes by a prudent administration. But, as it was, the property gradually was so reduced, that when Demosthenes became of age, his guardians had no more than seventy minae, that is, only one twelfth of the property which the father had left. (Dem. c. Apolob. i. pp. 812, 823, 818, ii. Onet. p. 865.) This shameful conduct of his own relatives and guardians unquestionably exercised a great influence on the mind and character of Demosthenes, for it was probably during that early period that, suffering as he was through the injustice of those from whom he had a right to expect protection, his strong feeling of right and wrong was planted and developed in him, a feeling which characterizes his whole subsequent life. He was thus thrown upon his own resources, and the result was great self-reliance, independence of judgment, and his oratory, which was the only art by which he could hope to get justice done to himself.

Although Demosthenes passed his youth amid such troubles and vexations, there is no reason for believing with Plutarch (Dem., 4), that he grew up neglected and without any education at all. The very fact that his guardians are accused of having refused to pay his teachers (c. Apolob. i. p. 829) shows that he received some kind of education, which is further confirmed by Demosthenes's own statement (de Coron. pp. 812, 815), though it cannot be supposed that his education comprised much more than an elementary course. The many debated discourses which are mentioned as his teachers, must be conceived to have become connected with him after he had attained the age of manhood. He is said to have been instructed in philosophy by Plato. (Plut. Dem. 5, Vit. X Oret.)
The suit against Aphobus had made Meidias a formidable and implacable enemy of Demosthenes (Dem. c. Aphob. ii. 10). Meidias was the most active member of a coterie, which, although yet without any definite political tendency, was preparing the ruin of the republic by violating its laws and sacrificing its resources to personal and selfish interests. The first acts of open hostility were committed in b. c. 361, when Meidias forced his way into the house of Demosthenes and insulted the members of his family. This led Demosthenes to bring against him the action of κατηγορία, and when Meidias, after his condemnation did not fulfill his obligations, Demosthenes brought against him a εἰς τα φύλακας (Dem. c. Meid. iii. 6). Meidias seemed to be unable to prevent any decision being given for a period of eight years, and at length, in b. c. 354, he had an opportunity to take revenge upon Demosthenes, who had in that year voluntarily undertaken the choremia. Meidias not only endeavored in all possible ways to prevent Demosthenes from discharging his office in its proper form, but attacked him with open violence during the celebration of the great Dionysia. (Dem. c. Meid. p. 518.) Such an act committed before the eyes of the people demanded reparation, and Demosthenes brought an action against him. Public opinion condemned Meidias, and it was in vain that he made all possible efforts to intimidate Demosthenes, who remained firm in spite of all his enemy's machinations, until at length, when an amiable arrangement was proposed, Demosthenes accepted it, and withdrew his accusation. It is said that he received from Meidias the sum of thirty minae. (Plut. Dem. 12; Aeschin. c. Cleisth. § 52.) The reason why Demosthenes withdrew his accusation was in all probability his fear of the powerful party of which Meidias was the leader; his accepting the sum of thirty minae, which, however, can scarcely be treated as an authentic fact (Isthm. Epist. iv. 203), has been looked upon as an illegal act, and has been brought forward as a proof that Demosthenes was accessible to bribes. But the law which forbade the dropping of a public accusation (Dem. c. Meid. p. 529)
DEMOSTHENES

does not appear to have been always strictly observed, as it was merely intended to prevent frivolous and unfounded accusations. If, on the other hand, Demosthenes did receive the thirty minae, it does not follow that it was a bribe, for that sum may have been required of him as a fine for dropping his accusation against Meidias, or Demosthenes may have regarded that sum as a satisfactory acknowledgement of the guilt of his enemy. This affair belongs to the year B.C. 353, in which also the extant oration against Meidias was written, but as Demosthenes did not follow up the suit, the oration was left in its present unfinished state.

Demosthenes had some years before this event
come forward as a speaker in the public assembly, for in B.C. 355 he had delivered the orations against Leptines and Androcles (Dionys. Ep. ad Amm. i. 4), and in B.C. 333 the oration against Timocrates. The general esteem which Demosthenes enjoyed as early as that time is sufficiently attested by the fact, that in B.C.
334, in spite of all the intrigues of Meidias, he was confirmed in the dignity of bouleutēs, to which he had been elected by lot (Dem. c. Meid.
p. 531), and that in the year following he conducted, in the capacity of archon, the usual theoria, which the state of Athens sent to the festival of the Nemean Zeus (c. Meid. p. 552). The active part he took in public affairs is further attested by the orations which belong to this period:
in B.C. 354 he spoke against the projected expedition to Euboea, though without success, and he himself afterwards joined in it under Phocion.
(Dem. de Pace, p. 58, c. Meid. p. 558.) In the same year he delivered the oration περὶ συμμορίων, in which he successfully dissuaded the Athenians from their foolish scheme of undertaking a war against Persia (Dem. de Rhet. Lib. p. 192), and in B.C. 353 he spoke for the Megalopolitans (οἱ Μεγαλοπολίται), and opposed the Spartans, who had solicited the aid of Athens to reduce Megalopolis.

The one hundred and sixth Olympiad, or the period from B.C. 356, is the beginning of the career of Demosthenes as one of the leading statesmen of Athens, and henceforth the history of his life is closely mixed up with that of his country; for there is no question affecting the public good in which he did not take the most active part, and support with all the power of his oratory what he considered right and beneficial to the state. King Philip of Macedonia had commenced in B.C. 356
his encroachments upon the possessions of Athens in the north of the Aegean, and he had taken possession of the towns of Amphipoles, Pydna, Poti-daeus, and Thessalonica. During the year he had convinced to keep the Athenians at a distance, to deceive them and keep them in good humour by delusions and apparently favourable promises.
Demosthenes was not, indeed, the only man who saw that these proceedings were merely a prelude to greater things, and that unless the king was checked, he would attempt the subjugation, not only of Athens but of all Greece; but Demosthenes was the only person who had the honesty and the courage openly to express his opinions, and to call upon the Greeks to unite their strength against the common foe. His patriotic feelings and convictions against Macedonian aggravization are the groundwork of his Philippics, a series of the most splendid and spirited orations. They did not, it is true, produce the desired results, but the fault was not his, and the cause of their failure must be sought in the state of general dissolution in the Greek republics at the time; for while Philip occupied his threatening position, the Phocians were engaged in a war for life and death with the Thebans; the states of Peloponnesus

looked upon one another with mistrust and hatred, and it was only with great difficulty that Athens
could maintain a shadow of its former supremacy.
The Athenians themselves, as Demosthenes says, were indolent, even when they knew what ought to be done; they could not rouze themselves to an energetic opposition; their measures were in most cases only half measures; they never acted at the right time, and indulged in spending the treasures of the republic upon costly pomp and festivities, instead of employing them as means to ward off the danger that was gathering like a storm at a distance. This disposition was, moreover, fostered by the ruling party at Athens. It was further an unfortunate circumstance for Athens that, although she had some able generals, yet she had no military genius of the first order to lead her forces against the Macedonians, and make head against him. It was only on one occasion, in B.C. 355, that the Athenians gained decided advantages by a deraision of their fleet, which prevented Philip passing Thermopylae during the war between the Phocians and the Thebans. But a report of Philip's illness and death soon made room for the old apathy, and the good-will of those who would have acted with spirit was paralyzed by the entire absence of any definite plan in the war against Macedonia, although the necessity of such a plan had been pointed out, and proposals had been made for it by Demosthenes in his first Philippic, which was spoken in B.C. 353. Philip's attack upon Olynthus in B.C. 349, which terminated in the year following with the conquest of the place, deprived the Athenians of their last stronghold in the north. At the request of the Olynthians, the orations of Demosthenes and Aeschyline on the embassy (περὶ παρακρατείας), which contain statements so much at variance and so contradictory, that it is next to impossible to come to any certain conclusions, although, if we consider the characters of the two orators, the authority of Demosthenes is entitled to higher credit than that of Aeschylines. The former may, to some extent, have been labouring under a delusion, but Aeschylines had the intention to deceive. The following particulars, however, may be looked upon as well established. During the Olynthian war, Philip had expressed his willingness to conclude a peace and alliance with Athens, and the Athenians, who were tired of the war and unable to form a coalition against the king, had accepted the proposal. Philocrates accordingly advised the Athenians to commence negotiations and to send an embassy to Philip. Demosthenes supported the plan, and Philocrates, Aeschines, and Demosthenes were among the ambassadors who went to the king. The transactions with Philip are not quite clear, though they must have referred to the Phocians and Thebans also, for the Phocians were allied with Athens, and the Athenian ambassadors probably demanded that the Phocians should be included in the treaty of peace and alliance between Macedonians and Athenians. As far as we know, however, Philip was inclined to agree to, since he had already resolved upon the destruction of the Phocians. It is, therefore, very probable that he may have quitted the ambassadors by vague promises, and have declined to comply with their demand under the pretext that he could not make a public declaration in favour of the Phocians on account of his relation to the Thessalians and Thebans. After the return of the ambassadors to Athens, the peace was discussed in two successive assemblies of the people, and it was at length sanctioned and sworn to by an oath to the king's ambassadors. Aeschines consured Demosthenes for having hurried the conclusion of this peace so much, but the Athenians did not even wait for the arrival of the deputies of their allies, who had been invited, and the contradictory manner in which Demosthenes himself (De Fals. Leg. p. 346, de Cor. p. 232) speaks of the matter seems indeed to cast some suspicion upon him; but the cause of Demosthenes's acting as he did may have been the vague manner in which Philip had expressed himself in regard to the Phocians. At any rate, however, quick decision was absolutely necessary, since Philip was in the meantime making war upon Cersobleptes, a king of Thrace, and since, in spite of his promises to spare the possessions of Athens in the Chersonese, he might easily have been tempted to stretch out his hands after them; in order to prevent this, it was necessary that Philip, as soon as possible, should have signed the treaty of peace and alliance with Athens. It was on this occasion that the treacherous designs of Aeschines and his party became manifest, for notwithstanding the urgent admonitions of Demosthenes not to lose any time, the embassy to receive the king's oath (ἐν τούτῳ ἀμαρτάων), of which both Aeschines and Demosthenes were again members (the statement in the article Aeschines, p. 87, that Demosthenes was not one of the ambassadors, must be corrected: see Newman in the Classical Museum, vol. i. p. 145), set out with a slowness as if there had been no danger whatever, and instead of taking the shortest road to Macedonia by sea, the ambassadors travelled by land. On their arrival in Macedonia they quietly waited till Philip returned from Thrace. Nearly three months passed away in this manner, and when at length Philip arrived, he deferred taking his oath until he had completed his preparations against the Phocians. Accompanied by the Athenian ambassadors, he then marched into Thessaly, and it was not till his arrival at Phene that he took his oath to the treaty, from which he now excluded the Phocians. When the ambassadors arrived at Athens, Demosthenes immediately and boldly denounced the treachery of his colleagues in the embassy; but in vain. Aeschines succeeded in allaying the fears of the people, and persuaded them quietly to wait for the issue of the events. Philip in the meantime passed Thermopylæ, and the fate of Phocis was decided without a blow. The king was now admitted as a member of the Amphictyonic league, and the Athenians, who had allowed themselves to act the part of mere spectators during those proceedings, were now unable to do anything, but still they ventured to express their indignation at the king's conduct by refusing their sanction to his becoming a member of the Amphictyonic league. The mischief, however, was done, and in order to prevent still more serious consequences, Demosthenes, in b. c. 356, delivered "the peace" (Ἀποκατάστασις), and the people gave way.

From this time forward the two political parties are fully developed, and openly act against each other; the party or rather the faction to which Aeschines belonged, was bribed by Philip to oppose the true patriots, who were headed by Demosthenes. He was assisted in his great work by such able men as Lycurgus, Hyperides, Polyaeus, Hegesippus, and others, and being supported by his confidence in the good cause, he soon reached the highest point in his career as a statesman and orator. The basis of his power and influence was the people's conviction of his incorruptible love of justice and of his pure and enthusiastic love of his country. This conviction manifested itself clearly in the vengeance which the people took upon the treacherous Philocrates. (Aeschin. c. Clearch. ſ 79.) But this admiration and reverence for real and virtuous greatness soon cooled, and it was in vain that Demosthenes endeavoured to place the other men who had betrayed their country to Philip in their embassy to him, in the same light as Philoctemus (Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 376), for the people were unwilling to sacrifice more than the one man, whom the Macedonian party itself had given up in order to save the rest. It was undoubtedly owing to the influence of this party that Aeschines, when after a long delay he consented to render an account of his conduct during the embassy, incurred such an amount of obloquy as to prevent understanding the vehement attacks of Demosthenes in the written oration περὶ σωταρτηκλείας. (Aeschines, p. 38.)

In the mean time Philip followed up his plans for the reduction of Greece. With a view of drawing the Peloponnesians into his interests, he tried to win the confidence of the Argives and Messenians, who were then perplexed by Sparta; he even sent them subsidies and threatened Sparta with an attack. (Dem. Phil. ii. p. 69.) Sparta did not venture to offer any resistance, and the Athenians, who were allied with Sparta, felt unable to do anything more than send ambassadors to Peloponnesus, among whom was Demosthenes, to draw the Peloponnesians away from the Macedonians, and to caution them against his intrigues. (Dem. Philipp. ii. p. 70, &c.) In consequence of these proceedings, ambassadors from Philip and the Peloponnesians met at Athens to complain of the Athenians favouring the ambitious schemes of Sparta, which aimed at suppressing the freedom of the peninsula, and to demand an explanation of their conduct. The Macedonian party at Athens, of course, supported those complaints; their endeavours to disguise Philip's real intentions and to represent them to the people in a favourable light, nerved an opportunity for Demosthenes, when the answer to be sent to the king was discussed in the assembly, n. c. 344, to place in his second Philip the proceedings and designs of the king and his Athenian friends in their true light. The answer which the Athenians sent to Philip was probably not very satisfactory to him, for he immediately sent another embassy to Athens, headed by Python, with proposals for a modification of the late peace, although he subsequently denied having given to Python any authority for such proposals. (Dem. de Halones, p. 81.)

Philip had for some time been engaged in the formation of a navy, and the apprehensions which the Athenians entertained on that score were but too soon justified. When these were hissing and fretted, than he took possession of the island of Halkis, which belonged to Athens. The Athenians sent an embassy to claim the island back; but Philip, who had found it in the hands of pirates, denied that the Athenians had any right to claim it, but at the same time he offered to make them a present of the island, if they would receive it as such. On the return of the ambassadors to Athens in n. c. 343, the argument on Halkis (πορθέν Άλον) was delivered. It is usually printed among the orations of Demosthenes, but belongs in all probability to Hesegippus. This and other similar acts of aggression, which at length opened the eyes of the Athenians, roused them once more to vigorous and energetic measures, in spite of the efforts of the Macedonian party to keep the people quiet. Embassies were sent to Acanthia and Peloponnese to counterpoise Philip's schemes in those quarters (Dem. Phil. iii. p. 129), and his expedition into Thrace, by which the Chaeronean was threatened, called forth an energetic demonstration of the Athenians under Diogenes. The complaints which Philip then made roused Demosthenes, in n. c. 342, to his powerful oration προ τον εν Χερεσσιον, and to his third Philippic, in which he describes the king's faithlessness in the most glaring colours, and exhorts his countrymen to unite and resist the treacherous aggressor. Soon after this, the tyrants whom Philip had established in Bithia were expelled through the influence and assistance of Demosthenes (Diod. S. C. vii. p. 254); but it was not till n. c. 341, when Philip laid siege to Piraeus and attacked Byzantium, that the long-suppressed indignation of the Athenians burst forth. The peace with Philip was now declared violated (n. c. 340); a fleet was sent to relieve Byzantium (Plut. Philoc. 14), and Philip was compelled to withdraw without having accomplished anything. Demosthenes was the soul of all these energetic measures. He had proposed, as early as the Olynthian war, to apply the theoricon to defray the expenses of the military undertakings of Athens (Dem. Olynth. iii. p. 31); but it was not till Philip's attack upon Byzantium that he succeeded in carrying a decree to this effect. (Dionys. Eph. ad Amm. i. 11.) By his law concerning the triarchy (τριάρχου περιπατησις), he further regulated the symmoric on a new and more equitable footing. (Dem. de Coron. p. 360, &c.) He thus at once gave a fresh impulse to the maritime power and enterprise of Athens, n. c. 340.

Philip now assumed the appearance of giving himself no further concern about the affairs of Greece. He carried on war with his northern neighbours, and left it to his hirelings to prepare the last stroke at the independence of Greece. He calculated well; for when in the spring of n. c. 340 the Amphictyons assembled at Delphi, Achaeans, who was present as pylagoras, effected a decree against the Locricians of Amphissa for having unlawfully occupied a district of sacred land. The Amphicassanes rose against this decree, and the Amphictyons summoned an extraordinary meeting to deliberate on the punishment to be inflicted upon Amphissa. Demosthenes foresaw and foretold the unfortunate consequences of a war of the Amphictyons, and he succeeded at least in persuading the Athenians not to send any deputies to that extraordinary meeting. (Dem. de Coron. p. 275; Aeschim. c. Cheph. § 125, &c.) The Athenians however decreed war against Amphissa, and the command of the Amphictyonic army was given to Cotylus, an Areopagite, but the expedition failed from want of spirit and energy among those who took part in it. (Dem. de Coron. p. 277.) The consequence was, that in n. c. 339, at the next ordinary meeting of the Amphictyons, king Philip was appointed chief commander of the Amphictyonic army. This was the very thing which he had been looking for. With the appearance of justice on his side, he now had an opportunity of establishing himself with an armed force in the very heart of Greece without opposition, and when the Athenians received the news of his having seized possession of Elatea, they were thrown into the deepest consternation. Demosthenes alone did not give up all hopes, and he once more roused his countrymen by bringing about an alliance between Athens and Thebes. The Thebans had formerly been favoured by Philip, but his subsequent neglect of them had effaced the recollection of it; and they now clearly saw that the fall of Athens would inevitably be followed by their own ruin. They had before opposed the war of the Amphictyons, and when Philip now called upon them to allow his army to march through their territory or to join him in his expedition against Athens, they indignantly rejected all his handsome proposals, and threw themselves into the open arms of the Athenians. (Dem. de Coron. p. 298, &c.) This was the last grand effort against the growing power of Macedonia; but the battle of Chaeronea, on the 7th of Mетaplethron, n. c. 338, put an end to the independence of Greece. Thebes paid dearly for its resistance, and Athens, which expected a similar fate, resolved at least to perish in a glorious struggle. The most prodigious efforts were made to meet the enemy; but Philip unexpectedly offered to conclude peace on tolerable terms, which it would have been madness to reject, for Athens thus had an opportunity of at least securing its existence and a shadow of its former independence. The period which now followed could not be otherwise than painful and gloomy to Demosthenes, for the evil might have been averted had his advice been followed in time. The catastrophe of Chaeronea might indeed to some extent be regarded as his work; but the people were too generous and too well convinced of the purity of his intentions, as well as of the necessity of acting as he had acted, to make him responsible for the unfortunate consequences of the war with Philip. It was, on the contrary, one of the most glorious acknowledgments of his merits that he could have received, that he was requested to deliver the funeral oration upon those who had fallen at Chaeroneia, and that the funeral feast was celebrated in his house. (Dem. de Coronea, p. 320, &c.) But the fury of the Macedonian party and of his personal enemies gave full vent to itself; they made all possible efforts to humble or annihilate the man who had brought about the alliance with Thebes, and Athens to the verge of destruction. Accusations were brought against him day after day, and at first the most notorious scytophants, such as Siscles, Diondas, Melanthus, Aristogiton, and others, were employed by his enemies to crush him (Dem. de Coronea, p. 310); but the more notorious they were, the more it was for Demosthenes to show that it was not only mere slander before the people. But matters soon began to assume a more dangerous aspect when Aeschines, the head of the Macedonian party, and the most implacable opponent of Demosthenes, came forward against him. An opportunity offered soon after the battle of Chaeronea, when Ctesiphon proposed to reward Demosthenes with a golden crown for the conduct he had shewn during his public career, and more especially for the patriotic disinterestedness with which he had acted during the preparations which the Athenians made after the battle of Chaeronea, when Philip was expected at the gates. (Dem. de Coronea, p. 266.) Aeschines attacked Ctesiphon for the proposal, and tried to show that it was not only an illegal form, but that the conduct of Demosthenes did not give him any claim to the public gratitude and such a distinction. This attack, however, was not aimed at Ctesiphon, who was too insignificant a person, but at Demosthenes, and the latter took up the gauntlet with the greater readiness, as he now had an opportunity of justifying his whole political conduct before his countrymen. Reasons which are unknown to us delayed the decision of the question for a number of years, and it was not till b.c. 330 (Plut. Dem. 24) that the trial was proceeded with. Demosthenes on that occasion delivered his oration on the crown (πέργυρισμα). Aeschines did not obtain the fifth part of the votes, and was obliged to quit Athens and spend the remainder of his life abroad. All Greece had been looking forward with the utmost intense interest to the issue of this contest, though few could have entertained any doubt as to which would carry the victory. The oration on the crown was, in all probability, like that of Aeschines against Ctesiphon, revised and altered at a later period.

Greece had in the mean time been shaken by new storms. The death of Philip, in b.c. 336, had revived among the Greeks the hope of shaking off the Macedonian yoke. All Greece rose, and especially Athens, where Demosthenes, although weighed down by domestic grief, was the first joyfully to proclaim the tidings of the king's death, to call upon the Greeks to unite their strength against Macedonia, and to form new connexions in Asia. (Plut. Dem. 23; Aeschin. c. Ctesiph. § 161; Diad. xvii. 3.) But the sudden appearance of young Alexander with an army ready to fight, dampened the enthusiasm, and Athens sent an embassy to him to sue for peace. Demosthenes was one of the ambassadors, but his feelings against the Macedonians were so strong, that he would rather expose himself to the ridicule of his enemies by returning after having gone half way, than act the part of a suppliant before the youthful king. (Plut. Dem. 23; Aeschin. c. Ctesiph. § 161.) But no sooner had Alexander set out for the north to chastise the rebellious neighbours of Macedonia, than a false report of his death called forth another insurrection of the Greeks. Thebes, which had suffered most severely, was foremost; but the insurrection spread over Arindia, Argos, Elis, and Athens. However, with the exception of Thebes, there was no energy anywhere. Demosthenes carried indeed a decree that succours should be sent to Thebes, but no efforts were made, and Demosthenes alone, and at his own expense, sent a supply of arms. (Diod. xvi. 8.) The second sudden arrival of Alexander, and his destruction of Thebes, in b.c. 335, put an end to all further attempts of the Greeks. Athens submitted to necessity, and sent Demades to the king as mediator. Alexander demanded that the leaders of the popular party, and among them Demosthenes, should be delivered up to him; but he yielded to the entreaties of the Athenians, and did not persist in his demand.

Alexander's departure for Asia is the beginning of a period of gloomy tranquillity for Greece; but party hatred continued in secret, and it required only some spark from without to make it blaze forth again in undiminished fury. This spark came from Harpalus, who had been left by Alexander at Babylon, while the king proceeded to India. When Alexander had reached the easternmost point of his expedition, Harpalus with the treasures entrusted to his care, and with 6000 mercenaries, fled from Babylon and came to Greece. In b.c. 325 he arrived at Athens, and purchased the protection of the city by distributing his gold among the most influential demagogues. The reception of such an open rebel could not be viewed by the Macedonian party otherwise than as an act of hostility towards Macedonia itself; and it was probably at the instigation of that party, that Antipater, the regent of Macedon, and Olympias called upon the Athenians to deliver up the rebel and the money they had received of him, and to put to trial those who had accepted his bribes. Harpalus was allowed to escape, but the investigation concerning those who had been bribed by him was instituted, and Demosthenes was among the persons suspected of the crime. The accounts of his conduct during the presence of Harpalus at Athens are so confused, that it is almost impossible to arrive at a certain conclusion. Theopompus (ap. Plut. Dem. 25, comp. Vit. X Oral. p. 846) and Deinarchus in his oration against Demosthenes state, that Demosthenes did accept the bribes of Harpalus; but Pausanias (ii. 33. § 4) expressly acquires him of the crime. The authority of his accusers, however, is very questionable, for in the first place they do not agree in the detail of their statements, and secondly, if we consider the conduct of Demosthenes throughout the discussion about Harpalus, if we remember that he opposed the reception of the rebel, and that he voluntarily offered himself to be tried, we must own that it is at least highly improbable that he should have been guilty of common bribery, and that it was not his guilt which caused his condemnation, but the implacable hatred of the Macedonian party, which eagerly seized this favourable opportunity to rid itself of its most formidable opponent, who was at that time abandoned by his own friends from sheer timidity. Demosthenes defended himself in an oration which Athenaeus (xiii. p.892) calls περὶ τοῦ χρυσοῦ, and which is probably the same as the one referred to by others under the title of αἰαξογία τῶν δῷων. (Dionys. de Adm. vi d. c. 57, Ep. ad Amin. i. 13.) But Demosthenes was declared guilty, and thrown into prison, from which however he escaped, apparently with the connivance of the Athenian magistrates. (Plut. Dem. 26, Vit. X Orat. p. 846; Anonym. Vit. De Mont. p. 150.) Demosthenes quitted his country, and resided partly at Troezen and partly in Aegina, looking daily, it is said, across the sea towards his beloved native land.

But his exile did not last long, for in b. c. 323 Alexander died, and the news of his death was the watchword for a fresh rise of the Greeks, which was organized by the Athenians, and under the vigorous management of Leosthenes it soon assumed a dangerous aspect for Macedonia. (Diod. xviii. 10.) Demosthenes, although still living in exile, joined of his own accord the embassies which were sent by the Athenians to the other Greek states, and he roused them to a fresh struggle for liberty by the fire of his oratory. Such a devotedness to the interests of his ungrateful country disarmed the hatred of his enemies. A decree of the people was passed on the proposal of Demosthenes, a native of the city of Thessaly, that Alexander should be solemnly recalled from his exile. A trireme was sent to Aegina to fetch him, and his progress from Peracus to the city was a glorious triumph: it was the happiest day of his life. (Plut. Dem. 27, Vit. X Orat. p. 846; Justin. xiii. 5.) The military operations of the Greeks and their success at this time, seemed to justify the most sanguine expectations, for the army of the united Greeks had advanced as far as Thessaly, and besieged Antipater at Lamia. But this was the turning point; for although, even after the fall of Leosthenes, the Greeks succeeded in destroying the army of Leotnatus, which came to the assistance of Antipater, yet they lost, in b. c. 322, the battle of Cannae. This defeat alone would not have decided the contest, but had not the zeal of the Greeks gradually cooled, and had not several detachments of the allied army withdrawn. Antipater availed himself of this contemptible disposition among the Greeks, and offered peace, though he was cunning enough to negotiate only with each state separately. Thus the cause of Greece was forsaken by one state after another, until in the end the Athenians were left alone to contend with Antipater. It would have been folly to continue their resistance single-handed, and they accordingly made peace with Antipater on his own terms. All his stipulations were complied with, except the one which demanded the surrender of the popular leaders of the Athenian people. The Athenian leaders, Antipater and Craterus thereupon marched towards Athens, Demosthenes and his friends took to flight, and, on the proposal of Demades, the Athenians sentenced him to death. Demosthenes had gone to Calauria, and had taken refuge there in the temple of Poseidon. When Archias, who hunted up the fugitives everywhere, arrived, Demosthenes, who was summoned to follow him to Antipater, took poison, which he had been keeping about his person for some time, and died in the temple of Poseidon, on the 10th of Pyanepolion, b. c. 322. (Plut. Dem. 29, Vit. X Orat. p. 816; Lucian, Encom. Dem. 43, &c.)

Thus terminated the career of a man who has been ranked by persons of all ages among the greatest and noblest spirits of antiquity; and this fame will remain undiminished so long as sterling sentiments and principles and a consistent conduct through life are regarded as the standard by which a man's worth is measured, and not simply the success—so often merely dependent upon circumstances—by which his exertions are crowned. The very calamities which have been heaped upon Demosthenes by his enemies and detractors are amongst the coarse and complicated web of lies which was devised by Aeschines, and in which he himself was caught, and lastly, the odious insinuations of Thespomus, the historian, which are credulously repeated by Plutarch,—have only served to bring forth the political virtues of Demosthenes in a more striking and brilliant light. Some points there are in his life which perhaps will never be quite cleared up on account of the distorted accounts that have come down to us about them. Some minor charges which are made against him, and affect his character as a man, are almost below contempt. It is said, for example, that he took to flight after the battle of Chaeronea, as if the inhabitants of the town had failed him (Plut. Dem. 20, Vit. X Orat. p. 845; Aeschin. c. Cleop. §§ 175, 244, 283); that, notwithstanding his domestic calamity (his daughter had died seven days before) he rejoiced at Philip's death, which shows only the predominance of his patriotic feelings over his personal and selfish ones (Plut. Dem. 22; Aeschin. c. Cleop. § 77); and lastly, that he shed tears on going into exile—a fact for which he deserves to be loved and honoured rather than blamed. (Plut. Dem. 20.) The charge of perversity which is repeatedly brought against him by Aeschines, has never been substantiated by the least evidence. (Aeschin. c. Cleop. § 175, c. Tiss. arch. § 131, de Pala Lctis. § 165; Plut. Dem. 15.) In his administration of public affairs Demosthenes is perfectly spotless, and free from all the crimes which the men of the Macedonian party committed openly and without any disguise. The charge of bribery, which was so often raised against him by the same Aeschines, must be rejected altogether, and is a mere distortion of the fact that Demosthenes accepted subsidies from Persia for Athens, which assuredly stood in need of such assistance in its struggles with Macedonia; but there is not a shadow of a suspicion that he ever accepted any personal bribes.

His career as a statesman received its greatest lustre from his powers as an orator, in which he has not been equalled by any man of any country. Our own judgment on this point would necessarily be one-sided, as we can only read his orations; but among the contemporaries of Demosthenes there was scarcely one who could point out any definite fault in his oratory. By far the majority looked up to him as the greatest orator of the time, and it was only men of such over-refined and hypercritical tastes as Demetrius Phalereus who thought him either too plain and simple or too harsh and strong (Plut. Dem. 9, 11); though some found those features more striking in reading his orations, while others were more impressed with them in hearing him speak. (Comp. Dionys. de Adm. vi d. c. 57. Demost. 22; Cist. de Orat. ii. 36, Brut. 36; Quintil. ix. 3, § 6.) These peculiarities, however, are far from being faults; they are, on the contrary, proofs of his genius, if we consider the temptations which natural defects hold out to an inconstant orator to pursue the opposite course. The obstacles which his physical constitution threw in his way when he commenced his career, were so great, that a less courageous and persevering man than Demosthenes would at once have been intimidated and entirely shrunk from the arduous career of a public orator. (Plut. Dem. 6, &c.) Those early difficulties with which he had to contend, led him to bestow more care upon the composition of his orations than he would otherwise have done, and produced in the end, if not the impossibility of speaking extempore, at least the habit of never venturing upon it; for he never spoke without preparation, and he sometimes even declined speaking when called upon in the assembly to do so, merely because he was not prepared for it. (Plut. Dem. 6, Plut. X Orat. p. 847, &c.) This is, however, no reason for believing that all the extant orations were delivered in that perfect form in which they have come down to us, for most of them were probably subjected to a careful revision before publication; and it is only the oration against Meidias, which, having been written for the purpose of being delivered, and being afterwards given up and left incomplete, may be regarded with certainty as a specimen of an oration in its original form. This oration alone sufficiently shows how little Demosthenes trusted to the impulse of the moment. It would lead us too far in this article to examine the manner in which Demosthenes composed his orations, and we must refer the reader to the various modern works cited below. We shall only add a few remarks upon the causes of the mighty impression which his speeches made upon the minds of his hearers. The first cause was their pure and ethical character; for every sentence exhibits Demosthenes as the friend of his country, of virtue, truth, and public decency (Plut. Dem. 13); and as the struggles in which he was engaged were fair and just, he could without scruple unmask his opponents, and wound them where they were vulnerable, though he never resorted to acrophonic artifices. The second cause was his intellectual superiority. By a wise arrangement of his subjects, and by the application of the strongest arguments in their proper places, he brought the subjects before his hearers in the clearest possible form; any doubts that might be raised were met by him headlong, and thus he proceeded calmly but irresistibly towards his end. The third and last cause was the magic force of his language, which being majestic and yet simple, rich yet not bombastic, strange and yet familiar, solemn without being orated, grave and yet pleasing, concise and yet fluent, sweet and yet impressive, carried away the minds of his hearers. That such orations should notwithstanding sometimes have failed to produce the desired effect, was owing only to the spirit of the times.

Most of the critical works that were written upon Demosthenes by the ancients are lost; and, independently of many scattered remarks, the only important critical work that has come down to us is that of Diocles of Halicarnassus, entitled πρὸς τὴν τοῦ Δαμοσθένους δικαίωσιν. The acknowledged excellence of Demosthenes' orations made them the principal subjects of study and speculation with the rhetoricians, and called forth numerous imitators and commentators. It is probably owing to those rhetorical speculations which became as early as the second century B.C., that a number of orations which are decidedly spurious and unworthy of Demosthenes, such as the ἄργυρα εἰρήναι and the πόροις, were incorporated in the collections of those of Demosthenes. Others, such as the speech on Halesus, the first against Aristogeiton, those against Theocles and Neaem, which are undoubtedly the productions of contemporary orators, may have been introduced among those of Demosthenes by mistake. It would be of great assistance to us to have the commentaries which were written upon Demosthenes by such men as Didymus, Longinus, Hermogenes, Sallustius, Apollonides, Theon, Gymnastus, and others; but unfortunately most of what they wrote is lost, and scarcely anything of importance is extant, except the miserable collection of scholia which have come down to us under the name of Ulpius, and the Greek argumenta to the orations by Libanius and other rhetoricians.

The ancient state, that there existed 63 orations of Demosthenes (Plut. V. X Orat. p. 847; Phot. Bibl. p. 490), but of these only 61, and if we deduct the letter of Philip, which is strangely enough counted as an oration, only 60 have come down to us under his name, though some of these are spurious, or at least of very doubtful authenticity. Besides these orations, there are 56 Evdeka to public orations, and six letters, which bear the name of Demosthenes, though their genuineness is very doubtful.

The orations of Demosthenes are contained in the various collections of the Attic orators by Aldus, H. Stephens, Taylor, Reiske, Dakas, Bekker, Dobson, and Baier and Sunnep. Separate editions of the orations of Demosthenes alone were published by Aldus, Venice, 1504; at Basle in 1552; by Feliciano, Venice, 1543; by Morellus and Laminus, Paris, 1570; by H. Wolf, 1572 (often reprinted); by Anger, Paris, 1790; and by Schaefer, Leipzig and London, 1822, in 9 vols. 8vo. The first two contain the text, the third the Latin translation, and the others the critical apparatus, the indices, &c. A good edition of the text is that by W. Dindorf, Leipzig, 1825, 3 vols. 8vo. We subjoin a classified list of the orations of Demosthenes, to which are added the editions of each separate oration, when there are any, and the literature upon it.

I. Political Orations.

A. Orations against Philip.

Editions of the Philippics were published by J. Bekker (Berlin, 1816, 1825 and 1835), C. A. Rüdiger (Leipzig, 1816, 1829 and 1833), and J. T. Vörcel. (Frankfurt, 1920.)

1. The first Philippic was delivered in B.C. 352, and is believed by some to be made up of two distinct orations, the second of which is supposed to commence at p. 48 with the words Δὲ μὴ γείτονι. (Dionys. Ep. ad Amm. i. 10.) But critics down to the present time are divided in their opinions upon this point. The common opinion, that the oration is one whole, is supported by the MSS., and is defended by Brun, in the Philol. Beiträge aus der Schweiz, vol. i. p. 91, &c. The opposite opinion is very ably maintained by J. Held, Prolegomena ad Dem. Orat. quae vulgo prima Phil. dialect., Vratslaviae, 1831, and especially by Seebbeck in the Zeitschrift für d. Alterthumswiss., for 1833, No. 91, &c.

2-4. The first, second, and third Olynthiac orations belong to the year B.C. 349. Dionysius
DEMOSTHENES.

(Ep. ad Amm. i. 4) makes the second the first, and the third the second in the series; and this order has been defended by R. Rankeisten, De Orat. Olynth, or. divinae, Leips. 1821, which is reprinted in vol. i. of Schaefer’s Apparatus. The other order is defended by Becker, in his German translation of the Philipics, i. p. 103, &c., and by Westermann, Stäve, Ziemann, Petronz, and Brückner, in separate dissertations. There is a good edition of the Olynthian orations, with notes, by C. H. Froehner and C. H. Funkhähnel, Leipsig, 1834, 8vo.

5. The oration on the Peace, delivered in B. c. 346. Respecting the question as to whether this oration was actually delivered or not, see Becker, Philippiscse Reden, i. p. 222, &c., and Vömel, Prolegomen. ad Orat. de Pace, p. 249, &c.

7. On Halouceus, B. c. 343, was suspected by the ancient themselves, and ascribed to Hegesippus. (Liban. Argum. p. 75; Harpocrat. et Eym. m. s. v.; Phot. Bibli. p. 491.) Weisake endeavored to vindicate the oration for Demosthenes in Dissertatio super Orat. de Halouco, Lubben, 1808, but he is defeated by Becker in Schaefer’s Archiv. for 1828, t. p. 64, &c., Philippiscse Reden, ii. p. 201, &c., and by Vömel in Odonistou Hugensii esse orationem de Halouco, Frankf. 1830, which published a complete edition of this oration under the name of Hegesippus in 1833.

9. The fourth Philippic, belongs to B. c. 341, but is thought by nearly all critics to be spurious. See Becker, Philippiscse Reden, ii. p. 491, &c.; W. H. Veesreg, Orat. Philipp. IV. Demosth. adjunctionar, Groningen, 1816.

10. The fifth Philippic, belongs to B. c. 341, but is thought by nearly all critics to be spurious. See Becker, Philippiscse Reden, ii. p. 491, &c.; W. H. Veesreg, Orat. Philipp. IV. Demosth. adjunctionar, Groningen, 1816.

11. Περὶ τής Ἐπιστολής τῆς Φιλίππου, refers to the year B. c. 340, but is a spurious oration. Becker, Philipp. Reden, ii. p. 516, &c.

B. Other Political Orations.

12. Περὶ Στράτευμα, refers to B. c. 355, but is acknowledged on all hands to be spurious. F. A. Wolf, Proleg. ad Lysipp. p. 124; Schaefer, Apparal. Crit. i. p. 686.

14. Τρεῖ Μεγαλοπος, B. c. 355.

15. Περὶ τῆς Ρωμαίων Αλεξάνδρας, B. c. 351.

16. Περὶ τῶν πρὸς Ἀλεξάνδρων συνθήκης, refers to B. c. 325, and was recognized as spurious by the ancient themselves. (Dionys. de Administr. et diei. Dem. 57; Liban. Argum. p. 211.)

II. JUDICIAL OR PRIVATE ORATIONS.

17. Περὶ Στέφάνου, or on the Crown, was delivered in B. c. 330. There are numerous separate editions of this famous oration; the best are by I. Bekker with scholia, Halle, 1813, and Berlin, 1825, by Bremi (Gotha, 1834), and by Dissen (Göttingen, 1837). Comp. F. Winnewitz, Comment. Historiae et Chronolog. in Demosth. Orat. de Coron., Monasterii, 1829. The genuineness of the documents quoted in this oration has of late been the subject of much discussion, and the most important among the treatises on this question are those of Dryssen (Ueber die Aechtlichkeit der Urkund. in Demosth. Rede vom Kranz, in the Zeitschrift für die Alterthumsk. für die Alterthumsk. fo. 1839, and reprinted separately at Berlin, 1839), and F. W. Newman (Classical Museum, vol. i. pp. 141—169), both of whom deny the genuineness, while Vömel in a series of programs (commenced in 1841) endeavours to prove their authenticity. Comp. A. F. Wolder, de Forma koderns. Orat. Demosth. de Coron. Leipzig, 1825; L. C. A. Brielie, Comment. de Demosth. Orat. pro Ctesip. praesid. Iesn. 1832.

18. Περὶ τῆς Παρασκευῆς, delivered in B. c. 342.

19. Περὶ τῆς ἀδελφίας πρὸς Δησιώμνη, was spoken in B. c. 355, and has been edited separately by F. A. Wolf, Halle, 1789, which edition was reprinted at Zürich, 1831.

20. Καθὸ Μεθίοι περὶ τοῦ κοσκινῆ, was composed in B. c. 355. There are separate editions by Buttmann (Berlin, 1833 and 1835), Blume (Sud. 1820), and Meier (Halle, 1835). Compare Böckh, Ueber die Zeitverhältnisse der Mithrae in der Abhahh. der Berlin. Akad., for 1820, p. 60, &c.

21. Καθὸ του Ἀποτίκηνα παραπλοῦς, belongs to B. c. 355, and has been edited separately by Funkhähnel, Leipsig, 1830.

22. Καθὸ του Κοινοῦ, B. c. 352. See Rampf, De Charidamo Oris, Gissam, 1811.

24 and 25. The two orations against Aristo- gelon belong to the time after B. c. 328. The genuineness of these two orations, especially of the first, was strongly doubted by the ancients themselves (Dionys. de Admir. et diei. Dem. 57; Harpo. s. v. Θεάνης and νεόλης; Pollux, x. 155), though some believed them to be the productions of Demosthenes. (Liban. Argum. p. 769; Phot. Bibli. p. 491.) Modern critics think the first spurious, others the second, and others again both. See Schmitz, in the Exaurus to his edition of Demosthenes, p. 106, &c.; Westermann, Quast. Demosth. iii. p. 96, &c.

26 and 27. The two orations against Aphiobus were delivered in B. c. 364.

29 and 30. The two orations against Onetor. See Schneissner, de Re Tuleari et. Athen., &c., Freiburg, 1829. The genuineness of these orations is suspected by Böckh, Pubb. Econ. Athen. Index, s. v. Demosthenes.

31. Παραγραφὴ πρὸς Ωνίστικος, falls after the year B. c. 355.

32. Περὶ της Αθηνασίας παραγραφή, is of uncertain date.

33. Περὶ της Ψυχεικας περισσομερων, was spoken in B. c. 332. See Raumunk, Prolegom. in Orat. Demosth. adv. Phorm., Heidelberg, 1826.
III. SHOW SPEECHES.

59. Ἕπειρος, refers to b. c. 338, but is un questionably spurious. (Dionys. de Ἀδριν. vi dic.
Dem. 23, 44; Liban. p. 6; Harpocrt. s. v. Ἀρχαῖ
καὶ Κερατοῖς; Phot. Bibl. p. 491; Suid. s. v. Ἀγορατή· Bekker, Anecd. p. 354; Westerm.
na., Quaest. Dem. ii. p. 49, &c.) Its genuineness is defended by Becker (Demost. als Staatsm.

60. Ἕπειρος is like the former, a spurious production. (Dionys. de Ἀδριν. vi dic. Dem. 44.
Liban. p. 6; Pollux, iii. 144; Phot. Bibl. l. c.; Westerm., Quaest. Dem. ii. p. 70, &c.)

Among the lost orments of Demosthenes the following are mentioned:—

61. Ἀριστοκρατίας ἀνωτέρωτος Ἀριστοκρατίας. (Dionys. Deiniarch. 11.) 2. Κατά Μέλαντος. (Pollux, viii. 53; Harpocr. s. v. Ἑλεκ-τέκειν.) 3. Πρὸς Ἀρκετοῦκαν παραγραφή. (Bekcker, Anecd. p. 90.) 4. Πειρούς (Alex. xiii. p. 592) is perhaps the same as the ἀνωτάτων ἐπι-τηγός. (Dionys. ᾿Επ. ad Ann. i. 12, who, however, in Demost., 57, declares it a spurious orna-tion.) 5. Τεχνή τενενώτως Ἀρχαῖος, was a fragment according to Dionysius. (Demost., 57.) 6. Κατὰ Δημώδης. (Bekker, Anecd. p. 335.) A fragment of it is probably extant in Alexand. de Pigur. p. 478, ed. Walz. 7. Πρὸς Καρκίλλα πε-ρὶ τοῦ ἐπειθείαματος. (Harpocrt. s. v. Ἐπειθε ίαμα, where Dionysius doubts its genuineness.)

8. Ἕπειρος ἤπειρος, probably not a word of Demosthenes. (Suid. s. v. Ἀμα.) 9. Ἐπειθείας ἠπειto Deinarchus.

DEMOSTHENES (Ἀγοράτης). 1. The father of the orator. See above.

2. A Bithynian, wrote a history of his native country, of which the tenth book is quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium. (ἐν. Ὀλυμπαῦ; Ἀκοῦλος; comp. s. v. θάνατος, ἀνθρώπου, Ἀρχαῖος, Ἀρχαῖος; Ἑτυμ. Mag. s. v. Ἡραία.) He further wrote an account of the foundations of towns (σημαία), which is likewise several times quoted by Stephanus. Euphorion wrote a poem against this historian under the title of Ἀγοράτη, of which a fragment is still extant. (Bekker, Anecdot. p. 1303; comp. Meineke, de Euphorione, p. 31.)

3. A Thracian, a Greek grammarian, who wrote according to Suidas (s. v.) a work on the dithyrambic poets (περὶ διθυραμβικῶν), a paraphrase of Homer's 'Iliad' and of Hesiod's 'Theogony' and an epitome of the work of Damogenus of Hermaclea.

(Weitweiter, Quaest. Dem. iv. pp. 38, 39.)

4. Surnamed the Little (5 μικρῶς), a Greek rhetorician, who is otherwise unknown; but some fragments of his speeches are extant in Bekker's Anecdota (pp. 133, 140, 168, 170, 179). [L. S.]
DEMOSTHENES MASSALIOTÆ, or MASSILLÆNSIS (ὁ Μασσαλιώτης), a native of Marseilles, and the author of several medical formulae preserved by Galen, must have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacoon. (Gal. De Conpos. Medicam. sec. Gen. v. 15. vol. xiii. p. 826.) For some persons he is supposed to be the same as Demosthenes Philalethes, which seems to be quite possible. He is sometimes called simply Massaliotae or Massilius. (Gal. l. a. p. 355; Aëtius, iv. 2, 56, p. 726.) See C.C. Kühn, Additum, ad Elench. Medicor. Veter. a J. A. Fabricio, &c., exhibetam, where he has collected all the fragments of Demosthenes that remain. [W. A. G.]

DEMOSTHENES PHILELAI (Δημοσθένης ὁ Φιλελαῖ), a physician, who was one of the pupils of Alexander Philalethes, and belonged to the school of medicine founded by Herophilus. (Gal. De Differ. Puls. iv. 4. vol. viii. p. 727.) He probably lived about the beginning of the Christian era, and was especially celebrated for his skill as an orator. He wrote a work on the Pulse, which is quoted by Galen (l. c.), and also one on Diseases of the Eyes, which appears to have been extant in the middle ages, but of which nothing now remains but some extracts preserved by Aëtius, Paulus Aegineta, and other later writers. [W. A. G.]

DEMOSTRATUS (Δημοστράτους). 1. An Athenian orator and demagogue, at whose profession Alcibiades, Nicias, and Lamachus were appointed to command the Athenian expedition against Sicily. He was brought on the stage by Eupolis in his comedy entitled Εὐπόρις. (Plut. Alc. 18, Nic. 12; Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Or. Graec. p. xlv.)

2. The son of Aristophon, an ambassador from Athens to Sparta, is supposed by Ruhnken (l. c.) to have been the grandson of the orator. (Xen. Hel. vi. 3. § 2.)

3. In a person of the same name Eupolis exhibited his comedy Αὐτάκλασα. (Ath. v. p. 216, d.) He is ranked among the poets of the new comedy on the authority of Suidas (s. v. τραγεία, Δημοστράτους Δημοστράτου), but here we ought probably to read Τιμοθύτατος, who is known as a poet of the new comedy. [TIMOSTRATUS.] (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. i. pp. 110, 560.)

4. A Roman senator, who wrote a work on fishing (ἄλλωσις) in twenty-six books, one on aquatic divination (τοίχη τῆς ιεροπομηνης), and other miscellaneous works connected with history. (Suid. s. v. Δημοστράτους; Aelian, N. A. xiii. 21. xv. 4, 9, 19.) He is probably the same person from whose history, meaning perhaps a natural history, Pliny quotes (H. N. xxxvi. 6), and the same also as Demostatus of Apameia, the second book of whose work "On Rivers" (τοίχη τοιαύτης) Plutarch quotes. (De Flor. 13; comp. Eudoc. p. 128; Phot. Bibl. Cod. cxi.; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 427, 428, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.]

DEMOELES (Δημωήλης), one of the twelve authors, who according to Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 12) had written on the pyramids, but is otherwise unknown. [L. S.]

DEMITIMUS (Δημῆτιμος), an Athenian and in all probability of Theophrastus, with whom he devoted himself to the study of philosophy. Theophrastus in his will bequeathed to him a house, and appointed him one of his executors; but further particulars are not known. (Diog. Laërt. v. 55, 56.) [L. S.]

DEMOCRAENUS. [Δημοκραῖνος.]

DEMIUS (Δημῖος). If the reading in Athenaeus (xiv. p. 660) is correct, Demus was the author of an Atticis, of which the first book is there quoted. (Att. ii. 168. 6.) The reading at any rate, where else, Casaubon proposed to change the name into Κλαερωτόμος, who is well known to have written an Attis. If the name Demus is wrong, it would be safer to substitute Δημῖος than Κλαερωτόμος, as Demus wrote an Attis, which consisted of at least four books. [L. S.]

DENDRITES (Δαινδρίτης), the god of the tree, a surname of Dionysus, which has the same import as Dassylus, the giver of foliage. (Plut. Sympoes. 5; Paul. I. 43. § 8.) [L. S.]

DENDRITIS (Δαινδρίτης), the goddess of the tree, occurs as a surname of Helen at Rhodes, and the following story is related to account for it. After the death of Menelaus, Helen was driven from her home by two natural sons of her husband. She fled to Rhodes, and sought the protection of her friend Polyxen, the widow of Tlepolemus. But Polyxen bore Helen a grudge, since her own husband Tlepolemus had fallen a victim in the Trojan war. Accordingly, once while Helen was bathing, Polyxen sent out her servants in the disguise of the Erinnyes, with the command to hang Helen on a tree. For this reason the Rhodians afterwards built a sanctuary to Helen Dendritis. (Paus. iii. 19. § 10.) [L. S.]

DENSUS, JULIUS, a man of equestrian rank of the time of Nero. In A. D. 56, he was accused of being too favourably disposed towards Britannicus, but his accusers were not listened to. (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 10.) [L. S.]

DENSUS, SEMPRONIUS, a most distinguished and noble-minded man of the time of the emperor Galba. He was a critic of a pretentious cohort, and was commissioned by Galba to protect his adopted son Piso Lecinianus, at the time when the insurrection against Galba broke out, A. D. 70. When the rebels approached to seek and murder Piso, Densus rushed out against them with his sword drawn, and thus turned the attention of the persecutors towards himself, so that Piso had an opportunity of escaping, though he was afterwards caught and put to death. (Tact. Hist. i. 45.) According to Dion Cassius ( liv. 6) and Plutarch (Galb. 26) it was not Piso, but Galba himself who was thus defended and protected by Densus, who fell during the struggle. [L. S.]

DENTATUS, M. CURIUS (some writers call him M. Curius Dentatus), the most celebrated among the Curiis, is said to have derived his cognomen Dentatus from the circumstance of having been born with teeth in his mouth. (Plin. H. N. vii. 15.) Cicero (pro Mureno, 15) calls him a homo nomen, and it appears that he was of Sabine descent. (Cic. pro Sulla, 7; Schol. Bob. p. 364 ed. Orelli.) The first office which Curius Dentatus is known to have held was that of tribune of the people, in which he distinguished himself by his opposition to Appius Claudius the Blind, who while presiding as interrex at the election of the consuls, refused, in defiance of the law, to preside over the asseveration of votes for plebeian candidates. Curius Dentatus, therefore, compelled the senate to make a decree by which any legal election was sanctioned beforehand. (Cic. Brut. 14; Aurel.
DENTATUS.

Vict. de Vir. Illust. 33.) The year of his tribunship is uncertain. According to an inscription (Oscol. Inscrip. Lat. No. 593) Appius the Blind was consul in the year 407 B.C. (x. 11) we know, that one of his inter-regia belongs to

n. c. 299, but in that year Appius did not hold the elections, so that this cannot be the year of the tribunship of Dentatus. In n. c.

290 he was consul with P. Cornelius Rufinus, and both fought against the Samnites and gained certain decisive victories over them, that the war which had lasted for 49 years, was brought to a close, and the Samnites sued for peace which was granted to them. The consuls then triumphed over the Samnites. After the end of this campaign Curius Dentatus marched against the Sabines, who had revolted from Rome and had probably supported the Samnites. In this undertaking he was again so successful, that in one campaign the whole country of the Sabines was reduced, and he celebrated his second triumph in his first consulship.

The Sabine then received the Roman civitates without the suffrage. (Vell. Pat. i. 14,) but a portion of their territory was distributed among the plebeians. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 426.)

In n. c. 263, Dentatus was appointed prae-tor in the place of L. Caecilius, who was slain in an engagement against the Samnites, and he forthwith sent ambassadors to the enemy to negotiate the ransom of the Roman prisoners; but his ambassadors were murdered by the Samnites. Aurelius Victor mentions an event of Curius over the Lucanians, which according to Niebuhr (iii. p.

437) belonged either to n. c. 260 or the year preceeding, in n. c. 275 Curius Dentatus was consul

a second time. Pyrrhus was then returning from Sicily, and in the levy which Dentatus made to complete the army, he set an example of the strictest severity, for the property of the first person that refused to be conscripted and sold, when the man remonstrated he himself too is said to have been sold. When the army was ready, Dentatus marched into Samnium and defeated Pyrrhus near Beneventum and in the Arusinian plain so completely, that the king was obliged to quit Italy.

The triumph which Dentatus celebrated in that year over the Samnites and Pyrrhus was one of the most magnificent that had ever been witnessed:

it was adorned by four elephants, the first that were ever seen at Rome. His disinterestedness and frugality on that occasion were truly worthy of a great Roman. All the booty that had been taken in the campaign against Pyrrhus was given up to the republic, but when he was nevertheless charged with having appropriated to himself a portion of it, he asserted on oath that he had taken nothing except a wooden vessel which he used in sacrificing to the gods. In the year following, n. c. 274, he was elected consul a third time, and carried on the war against the Lucanians,

Samnites, and Bruttians, who still continued in arms after the defeat of Pyrrhus. When this war was brought to a close Curius Dentatus retired to his farm in the country of the Sabines, where he spent the remainder of his life and devoted himself to agricultural pursuits, though still ready to serve his country when needed, for in n. c. 272

he was invested with the censorship. Once the Samnites sent an embassy to him with costly presents. The ambassadors found him on his farm, sitting at the hearth and roasting turnips. He rejected their presents with the words, that he preferred ruling over those who possessed gold, to possessing it himself. He was celebrated for his diligence as one of the noblest specimens of ancient Roman simplicity and frugality. When after the conquest of the Sabines lands were distributed among the people, he refused to take more than any other soldier, and it was probably on that occasion that the republic rewarded him with a house and 500 jugers of land. He is said ever to have been accompanied by more than two grooms, when he went out as the commander of Roman armies, and to have died so poor, that the republic found it necessary to provide a dowry for his daughter. But such reports, especially the latter, are exaggerations or misrepresentations,

for the property which enabled a man to live comfortably in the time of Curius, appeared to the Romans of a later age hardly sufficient to live at all; and if the state gave a dowry to his daughter, it does not follow that he was too poor to provide her with it, for the republic may have given it to her as an acknowledgment of her father's merits. Dentatus lived in intimate friendship with the greatest men of his time, and he has acquired no less fame from the useful works he constructed than from his victories over Pyrrhus

and the Samnites, and from his habits of the good early days of Rome. In n. c. 272, during his censurship, he built an aqueduct (Anemisia Vetus), which carried the water from the river Anio into the city. The expenses were covered by the boot-

y which he had made in the war with Pyrrhus.

Two years later he was appointed summius to superintend the building of the aqueduct, but five days after the appointment he died, and was thus prevented from completing his work. (Frontini.

De Aequaud. i. 6; Anr. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 33.)

He was further the benefactor of the town of Reate

in the country of the Sabines, for he dug a canal

or canals from lake Velinus through the rocks, and thus carried its water to a spot where it falls

from a height of 140 feet into the river Nar

(Nera). This fall is still the celebrated fall of Terni, or the cascada delle Marmore. The Reatians by that means gained a considerable district of excellent arable land, which was called Rosen.

(Cic. de Att. iv. 15, pro Scaur. 2; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 712.) A controversy has recently been raised by Zumpt (Abhauall. der Berlin. Akademie 1836, p. 185, &c.) respecting the M. Curius, who led the water of lake Velinus into the Nar. In the time of Cicero we find the town of Reate engaged in a law-suit with Interamna, whose territory was suffering on account of that canal, while the territory of Reate was benefited by it. Zumpt naturally asks "how did it happen that Interamna

did not bring forward its complaints till two centuries and a half after the construction of the canal?" and from the apparent impossibility of finding a proper answer, he ventures upon the supposition, that the canal from lake Velinus was a private undertaking of the age of Cicero, and that

M. Curius who was quaestor in n. c. 60, was the author of that undertaking. But our ignorance of many matters relating to Interamna and Reate before the time of Cicero, does not prove that there were no such quarrels previously, though a long period might elapse before, perhaps owing to some unfavourable season, the grievance was felt by In-teramna. Thus we find that throughout the mid-DECYLLIDAS. 593

In b. c. 399 he was sent to supersede Thibron in the command of the army which was employed in the protection of the Asiatic Greeks against Persia. On his arrival, he took advantage of the jealousy between Pharamazes and Tissaphernes to divide their forces, and having made a treaty with the latter, proceeded against the midland Aeolis, the satrapy of Pharamazes, towards whom he entertained a personal dislike, as having been once subjected through his means to a military punishment when he was harmed at Abydus under Lysander. In Aeolis he gained possession of nine cities in eight days, together with the treasures of Mania, the late satrapess of the province. As he did not wish to burden his allies by wintering in their country, he concluded a truce with Pharamazes, and marched into Bithynia, where he maintained his army by plunder. In the spring of 398 he left Bithynia, and was met at Lampeusus by Spartan commissioners, who announced to him the continuance of his command for another year, and the satisfaction of the home government with the discipline of his troops as contrasted with their condition under Thibron. Having heard from these commissioners that the Greeks of the Thracian Chersonesus had sent an embassy to Sparta to ask for aid against the neighbouring barbarians, he said nothing of his intention, but concluded a further truce with Pharamazes, and, crossing over to Bithynia, built a wall for the protection of the peninsula. Then returning, he besieged Acharne, of which some Chian exiles had taken possession, and reduced it after a long siege. Having thus removed the hostility between Tissaphernes and Dercyllidas, but in the next year, n. c. 397, ambassadors came to Sparta from the Ionians, representing that by an attack on Caria, where the satrap's own property lay, he might be driven into acknowledging their independence, and the orphi accordingly desired Dercyllidas to invade it. Tissaphernes and Pharamazes now united their forces, but no engagement took place, and a negotiation was entered into, Dercyllidas demanding the independence of the Asiatic Greeks, the satraps the withdrawal of the Lacedaemonian troops. A truce was then made till the Spartan authorities and the Persian, but should decide respectively their respective requisitions. In n. c. 396, when Aegean was crossed into Asia, Dercyllidas was one of the three who were commissioned to ratify the short and hollow armistice with Tissaphernes. After this, he appears to have returned home. In n. c. 394 he was sent to carry the news of the battle of Corinth to Agesilus, whom he met at Amphipolis, and at whose request he proceeded with the intelligence to the Greek cities in Asia which had furnished the Spartans with troops. This service, Xenophon says, he gladly undertook, for he liked to be absent from home,—a feeling possibly arising from the mortifications to which, as an unmarried man so old that he was, there had been none. (See Dict. of Ant. p. 597.) He is said to have been characterized by roughness and cunning,—qualities denoted respectively by his nicknames of "Seythus" and "Sisyphus," if indeed the former of these be not a corrupt reading in Athenaeus for the second. (Xen. Heli. iii. 1. §§ 8—28, ii. §§ 1—20, 4. § 6, iv. 3. §§ 1—3, Aem. v. 6. § 24, Diod. xiv. 38, Plut. Lyc. 15; Athen. x1. p. 560, c.) DERCYNUS.

2. A Spartan, who was sent as ambassador to Pyrrhus when he invaded Sparta in B.C. 272 for the purpose of placing Cleonymus on the throne.

[CHLIDONIS; CLIONYMUS.] Plutarch records an apocryphal of Dercyllidas on this occasion with respect to the invader: "If he is a god, we fear him not, for we are guilty of no wrong; if a man, we are as good as he." (Plut. Apophth. Lac. vol. ii. p. 128, ed. Tauchn.; Plut. Pyrrh. 26, where the saying is ascribed to one Moundridas.) [E. L.]

DERCYLLIDAS (Dercyllidas), the author of a voluminous work on Plato's philosophy, and of a commentary also on the Timaois, neither of which is extant. (Fabr. It. Graec. iii. pp. 95, 152, 170, ed. Itinera, and the authorities there referred to.) [R. E.]

DERCYLLUS or DERCYLLUS (Dercyllus, Dercyllus), an Athenian, was one of that embassy of ten, in which Aeschines and Demosthenes were included, and which was sent to Philip to treat on the subject of peace in n. c. 347. In n. c. 346, the same ambassadors appear to have been again deputed to ratify the treaty. (See the Argument prefixed to Dem. de Fat. Leg. p. 536; Aesch. de Fat. Leg. p. 41; Thucydides' Greece, vol. vi. p. 356; comp. the decree ap. Dom. de Cor. p. 255; Classical Museums, vol. i. p. 145.) Dercyllus was also one of the three ambassadors sent to convey to Philip, then marching upon Phocias, the complimentary and cordial decree of Philocles, and to attend the Amphictonic council that was about to be convened on the affairs of Phocias. When, however, the ambassadors had reached Chalcis in Euboea, they heard of the destruction of the Phocian towns by Philip, and of his having taken part entirely with the Thebans, and Dercyllus returned to Athens with the alarming news; but the embassy was still desired to proceed. (Aesch. de Fat. Leg. pp. 10, 46, c. Cles. p. 65; Dom. de Cor. p. 257; de Fat. Leg. pp. 350, 355.) It is perhaps the same Dercyllus whom Plutarch mentions as "general of the country" (συνεκτείνων χώρας στρατηγικώς, in n. c. 348). When Nicanor, having been called on to withdraw the Macedonian garrison from Munychia, consented to attend a meeting of the council in the Peirameus, Dercyllus forced a design to seize him, but he became aware of it in time to escape. Dercyllus is also said to have warned Phocian in vain of Nicanor's intention of making himself master of the Peirameus. (Plut. Phoc. 32; Nep. Phoc. 2; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachf. Alex. p. 253.) [E. E.]

DERCYLLUS or DERCYLLUS (Dercyllus, Dercyllus), a very ancient Greek writer, mentioned above, and in connexion with Argus, the latter being a different person probably from the author of the Νάσαυ, with whom Meineke identifies him. We find the following works of Dercyllus referred to: 1. Ἀργολικά. 2. Ἡτταλικά. 3. Ἀγραλικά. 4. Κρήται. 5. Σικυωνικά, apparently on the fables relating to the Satyrs. 6. Πιλη πρόναι. 7. Πιλή Ἀλέξων. The exact period at which he flourished is uncertain. (Plut. Petr. Min. 17, 58, de Flux. 8, 10, 19, 22; Athen. ill. p. 88 L; Clem. Alex. Strom. I. p. 139, ed. Syll.; Schol. ad Eur. Traged. 14; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 418.) [E. E.]

DERCYNNUS (Δέρκυννος), a son of Dercyllus, and brother of Albion. (Apollod. li. 5. § 10.) Pomponius Mela (ii. 5) calls him Bergion. [L. S.]

DEUCALION.

DERDAS (Δέρδας), a Macedonian chief, who joined with Philip, brother of Perdicas II., in rebellion against him. Athens entered into alliance with them, a step, it would seem, of doubtful policy, leading to the hostility of Perdicas, and the revolt, under his advice, of Potidæa, and the foundation of Olynthus. The Athenian generals who arrived soon after those events acted for a while against Perdicas with them. (Thuc. i. 57—59.) Derdas himself probably died about this time, as we hear of his brothers in his place (c. 69), one of whom Pausanias probably was. (c. 61.) Derdas (Δέρδας), a prince of Elymenia, and probably of the same family, is the cousin of Perdicas II. mentioned above. As he had reason, from the example of Amyntas II. (see p. 154, l.), to fear the growing power of Olynthus, he zealously and effectually aided the Spartans in their war with that state, from B.c. 392 to 379. (Xen. Hell. v. 2, 3; Died. xx. 19—23.) We learn from Theopompos (ap. Athan. x. p. 456, d.), that he was taken prisoner by the Olynthians, but it does not appear on what occasion; nor is it certain whether he is the same Dardas to whom Aristotle alludes. (Polit. v. 10, ed. Bekker.) Dardas, whose sister Phila was one of the wives of Philip, was probably a different person from that of the same family. (Ath. xiii. p. 557, e.)

DERRHAIATIS (Δέρρηιατις), a surname of Artemis, which she derived from the town of Derrhion on the road from Sparta to Arcadia. (Paus. iii. 20, § 7.)

DESIDERIUS, brother of Magenius, by whom he was created Caesar and soon after put to death, when the tyrant, finding that his position was hopeless, in a transport of rage, massacred all his relations and friends, and then, to avoid falling into the power of his rival, perished by his own hands. According to Zonaras, however, Desiderius was not actually killed, but only grievously wounded, and upon his recovery surrendered to Constantius. No genuine medals of this prince are extant. (Zonar. xiii. 9; Julian, Orat. frag.; Chron. Alexand. p. 680; ed. 1615; Bekker, vol. viii. p. 124.) [W. R.]

DESILAUS (Δεσίλαος), a satyrical, whose Doryphorus and wounded Amazon are mentioned by Pliny (xxxiv. 8. 19. § 15). There is no reason to believe, with Meyer and Müller, that the name is a corruption of Κταλαίας; but, on the contrary, the wounded Amazon in the Vatican, which they take for a copy of the work of Ctesilaus, is probably copied from the Amazon of Desilaus. (Ross, Aristoph. loc. cit., No. 12.) [CRESILAS.] [F. S.]

DSEPΩNA (Δεσπώνα), the mistress, occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Apiridota (Theocrit. xx. 100), Demeter (Aristoph. Thesm. 266), and Persephone. (Paus. viii. 37, § 6; comp. Persipheon.) [L. S.]

DEUCALION (Δευκαλίων), 1. A son of Prometheus and Clymene. He was king in Phthia, and married to Pyrrha. When Zeus, after the treatment he had received from Lycaon, had resolved to destroy the degenerate race of men who inhabited the earth, Deucalion, on the advice of his father, built a ship, and carried into it stores of provisions; and when Zeus sent a flood all over the earth, he and Pyrrha, accompanied by the ship and Pyrrha alone were saved. After their ship had been floating about for nine days, it landed, according to the common tradition, on mount Parnassus; others made it land on mount Othrys in Thessaly, on mount Athos, or even on Aetna in Sicily. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 64; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 41; Hygin. Fab. 153.) These differences in the story are probably nothing but local traditions; in the same manner it was believed in several places that Deucalion and Pyrrha were not the only persons that were saved. Thus Megarus, a son of Zeus, escaped by following the screams of cranes, which led him to the summit of mount Ossa (Paus. i. 40. § 1); and the inhabitants of Delphi were said to have been saved by following the howling of owls, which led them to the summit of Parnassus, where they founded Lycoreia. (Paus. x. 6. § 2.) When the waters had subsided, Deucalion offered up a sacrifice to Zeus Phryxus, that is, the helper of fugitives, and thereupon the god sent Hermes to him to promise that he would grant any wish which Deucalion might entertain. Deucalion prayed that Zeus might restore mankind. According to the more common tradition, Deucalion and Pyrrha went to the sanctuary of Themis, and prayed for the same thing. The goddess bid them cover their heads and throw the bones of their mothers behind them in walking towards the temple. After some doubts and scruples respecting the meaning of this command, they agreed in interpreting the bones of their mother to mean the stones of the earth; and they accordingly threw stones behind them, and from those thrown by Deucalion there sprung up men, and from those of Pyrrha women. Deucalion then descended from Parnassus, and built his first abode at Opus (Pind. Ol. i. 45), or at Cyrus (Strab. i. 425; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 64), where in later times the tomb of Pyrrha was shewn. Concerning the whole story, see Apollod. i. 7. § 2; Ov. Met. i. 206, 6c. There was also a tradition that Deucalion had lived at Athens, and the sanctuary of the Olympic Zeus there was regarded as his work, and his tomb also was shewn there in the neighbourhood of the sanctuary. (Paus. i. 18. § 3.) Deucalion was by Pyrrha the father of Heleus, Amphictyon, Protogeneus, and others. Strabo (ix. p. 435) states, that near the coast of Phthiotis there were two small islands of the name of Deucalion and Pyrrha.

2. A son of Minos and Pasiphae or Crete, was an Argonaut and one of the Calydonian hunters. He was the father of Idomeneus and Molus. (Hom. Il. xiii. 451; Apollod. iii. 1. § 3, 3; IV. iv. 69; Hygin. Fab. 14, 173; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 192.)

3. A son of Hyperius and Hypso, and brother of Amphion. (Val. Flacc. i. 365; comp. Apollon. Rhod. i. 176.)

4. A son of Hercules by a daughter of Theopis. (Hygin. Fab. 162.)

5. A Trojan, who was slain by Achilles. (Hom. Il. xx. 477.)

DEVERRA, one of the three symbolic beings—their names are Pilumus, Intercidion, and Deverra—whose influence was sought by the Romans, at the birth of a child, as a protection for the mother against the vexations of Sylvania. The night after the birth of a child, three men walked around the house: the first struck the threshold with an axe, the second knocked upon it with a pestle, and the third swept it with a broom. These symbolic actions were believed to prevent Sylvania from entering the house, and were looked upon as symbolic representations of civilized or agricultural life, since without an axe no tree can be felled, a pestle is necessary to pound the grain, and corn is swept together with a broom. (Augustin, de Civ. Dei, v. 9; Harung, Die Relig. der Römer, ii. p. 175.)

DEXAMENUS (Δέξαμενος), a centaur who lived in Bura in Achaea, which town derived its name from his large stable for oxen. (Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Del. 102; Etymol. M. s. v.) According to others he was a King of Oeaeus, and the father of Deianeira, who was killed during his stay with Dexamenes, who had hospitably received him. Heracles on parting promised to return and marry her. But in his absence the centaur Eurynius sued for Deianeira's hand, and her father out of fear promised her to him. On the wedding day Heracles returned and slew Eurynius. (Hygin. Fab. 38.) Deianeira is usually called a daughter of Oeneus, but Apollodorus (ii. 5. § 5) calls the daughter of Dexamenes, Mnesimache, and Diodorus (iv. 38) Hippolyte. [L. S.]

DEXRITES (Δεξιρτής), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, whose drama entitled 'Kro f' itself, was produced at Athens in the year 416, as is stated by Aristophanes. (iii. p. 124, b.) Suidas (s. v.) also refers to the passage in Athenaeus. (Meinecke, Frag. Com. Graec. i. p. 492, iv. p. 571.)

DEXIPPUS (Δέξιππος), a Lacedaemonian, was residing at Gela when Sicily was invaded for the second time by the Carthaginians under Hannibal, the grandson of Hamilcar, in B. C. 406. At the request of the Agrigentines, on whom the storm first fell, he came to their aid with a body of mercenaries which he had collected for the purpose; but he did not escape the charge of corruption and treachery which proved fatal to four of the Agrigentine generals. When the defence of Agrigentum became hopeless, Dexippus returned to Gela, the protection of that place having been assigned him by the Syracusans, who formed the main stay of the Grecian interest in the island. Not long after, he was dismissed from Sicily by Dionysius, whose objects in Gela he had refused to aid. (Diod. xiii. 85, 87, 88, 93, 96.)

DEXIPPUS (Δέξιππος), a comic poet of Athens, respecting whom no particulars are known. Suidas (s. v. Kopyrorida) mentions one of his plays entitled Ονείσιος, and Eutocia (p. 182) has preserved the titles of four others, viz. Αντανακλασία, Φίλονυξα, Ιππομηχασία, and Δαίδαλος-Δέξιππος. Meinecke, in his Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. iv., has overlooked this poet. [L. S.]

DEXIPPUS (Δέξιππος), a commentator on Plato and Aristotle, was a disciple of the Neoplatonic philosopher Iamblichus, and lived in the middle of the fourth century of the Christian era. We still possess a commentary of Dexippus on the Categories of Aristotle, in the form of a dialogue, which, however, is printed only in a Latin translation. It appeared at Paris, 1540, 8vo., under the title of "Questionum in Categorias libri tres, interprete J. Bernardino Felicium," and again at Venice, 1546, &c., after the work of Porphyry la Pracœcum. The Greek title in the Madrid Codex is Λογικὴ φιλοσοφίαν περιεχὲν τινα των Αριστοτελεων καθηγητῶν τῆς Ἀθηναίων. In this work the author explains to one Selenus the Aristotelian Categories, and endeavours at the same time to refute the objections of Plutarch.
(Plut. Eumed. vi. 1, 2, 3; comp. Simplic. ad Arist. Catog. fol. 1, &c.; Tzetzes, Chalcid. vi. Hist. 274.)

Specimens of the Greek text are to be found in Iliad, Cod. Bibl. Matth. Catalog. pp. 185, 274, Suid. a. v. Δεξιππος, Hecontomnus, prince of Caria (B. C. 385-577), sent for him to cure his sons, Mausolus and Phidias, of a dangerous illness, which he undertook to do under condition that Hecontomnus should cease from waging war against his country.
(Suid. v. έλεη.) He wrote some medical works, of which nothing but the titles remain. He was blamed by Eusebius for his excessive severity in restricting the quantity of medicine he gave to his patients. (Galen, de Scoa Opt. c. 14, vol. i. p. 144; Comment. I. in Hippocr.
703, 744; De Venae Scoa. acte. Eciasistr. c. 9, vol. xi. p. 182.) He is quoted by Plutarch (Sympos.
vii. 1) and Aulus Gellius (xvii. 11) in the controversy that was maintained among some of the ancient physicians as to whether the drink passed down the windpipe or the gullet. [W. A. G.]

DEXIPPOS, PUBLIUS HERENNIIUS, a Greek rhetorician and historian, was a son of Polemaeus and born in the Attic demes of Hermus. (Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. i. n. 380, p. 430, &c.) He lived in the third century after Christ, in the reigns of Claudius Gothicus, Tacitus, Aurelia-Porphyry. p. 21.) He was regarded by his contemporaries and later writers as a man of most extensive learning; and we learn from the inscription
just referred to, that he was honoured at Athens with the highest offices that existed in his native city. In A.D. 262, when the Goths penetrated into Greece and ravaged several towns, Dexippus proved that he was no less great as a general and a man of business than as a scholar, for, after the capture of Athens, he gathered around him a number of bold and courageous Athenians, and took up a strong position on the neighbouring hills.
Though the city itself was taken by the barbarians,
and Dexippus with his band was cut off from it,
he made an unexpected descent upon Peiraeus and took vengeance upon the enemy. (Dexipp.

We are not informed whether Dexippus wrote any rhetorical works; he is known to us only as an historical author. Photius (Bibl. Cod. 82) has preserved some account of three historical works of Dexippus. 1. Τὰ μερὰ Ἀλέξανδρος, in four books. It was a history of Macedonia from the time of Alexander, and by way of introduction, the author prefixed a sketch of the preceding history, from the time of Camm the king of Macedonia. (Comp. Euseb. Chron. 1.) 2. Σέπτουνα ἴστορικον, or Ευπατίνα (p. 58) calls it, χρονική ἴστορια, was a chronological history from the mythical ages
down to the accession of Claudius Gothicus, A.D.
268. It consisted probably of twelve books, the twelfth being quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium (α. v. Εὐπατίνα), and it is frequently referred to by the writers of the Augustan history. (Lamp.
Alex. Sec. 49; Capitolin. Maxima. Jan. 6, Trea
Corol. 2, 9, Maxima. et Balbin. 1; Treb. Plll.
Gall. 15, Triq. Plll. 82, Claud. 12; comp.
Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. v. 24.) 3. Α᾿κρατέον, that is, an account of the war of the Goths or Scythians, in which Dexippus himself had fought. It com-enced in the reign of Decius, and was brought to a close by Aurelian. Photius praises the style and diction of Dexippus, especially in the third work, and looks upon him as a second Thucydides;
but this praise is highly exaggerated, and the fragments still extant shew, that his style has all the traits of the late Greek rhetoricians. The fragments of Dexippus, which have been considerably increased in modern times by the discoveries of A.
May (Collect. Scrip. Vol. ii. p. 319, &c.), have been collected by I. Beckes and Niesius in the first volume of the Scripores Historiae Byzantinae, Bonn, 1839, &c.

Dexter, Afiniustus, was consul successively in A.D. 98, in the reign of Trajan (Plin. Epist.
v. 14) and a friend of Martial, (Epigr. vii. 27.)
He was killed during his consulship. [L. S.]

Dexter, D. Domitius, was consul in A.D.
196, in the reign of Septimius Severus, who appointed him prefect of the city. (Spartan. Seem.
8; Fasti.)

DIA (Διά), a daughter of Delmenus and the wife of Ixion. (Schol. ad Pind. Phth. i. 39.) Her father is also called Eliomus. (Didot. iv. 69; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 62.) By Ixion, or according to others, by Zeus (Hygin. Fab. 165), she became the mother of Pelithous, who received his name from the circumstance, that Zeus when he attempted to seduce her, ran around her (τριπ-θεός) in the form of a horse. (Eustath. ad Hom.
p. 101.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Schol. ad Pind. Od. i. 144; Tzetz. ad Lycoth. 480.) Din is also used as a surname of Hebe or Ganymede, who had temples under this name at Philus and Sicyon. (Strab. viii. p.
382; Paus. ii. 18. § 3.)

Diadematus, a surname of L. Caecilius Metellus, consul in B. C. 117.

Diamumianus or Diamumenus, M. Opellius, the son of M. Opellius Macrinus and Nonia Cola, was born on the 19th of September, A.D. 298.
When his father was elevated to the purple, after the murder of Caracalla on the 8th of March, A.D. 217, Diamumianus received the titles of Caesar, Princeps Junioribus, Antoninus, and eventually of Imperator and Augustus also.
Upon the victory of Egiabalus, he was sent to the charge of Artabanus, the Parthian king, but was betrayed and put to death about the same time with Macrinus.

This child is celebrated on account of his surpassing beauty by Lampadius, who declares, that the he show resplendent like a heavenly star, and was beloved by all who looked upon him on account of his surpassing grace and comeliness. From his maternal grandfather he inherited the name of Diademus, which upon his quasi-adoption into the family of the Antonines was changed into Diadumenianus. (Dion Cass. Ixxviiii. 4, 17, 19, 34, 38-40; Herodian. v. 9; Lamprid. Diadem. ; Capitolin. Morin. 10.) [W. R.]

DIAETHUS (Διαθεύς), the author of commentaries on the Homeric poems, which seem to have been chiefly of an historical nature, and are referred to in the Venetian scholia on the Iliad. (Plut. Mor. l. 175. v. 1.) [L. S.]

DIAEURUS (Διαεύρος), a man of Megalopolis, succeeded Menalciades of Lacedaemon as general of the Achaeans in B.C. 150. Menalciades, having been assailed by Callirrates with a capital charge, saved himself through the favour of Diæurus, whom he bribed with three talents (Callirrates, No. 4, p. 559, b.); and the latter, being much and generally condemned for this, endeavoured to divert public attention from his own conduct to a quarrel with Lacedaemon. The Lacedaemonians had appealed to the Roman senate about the possession of some disputed land, and had received an answer that the possession of all causes, except those of life and death, rested with the great council of the Achaeans. This answer Diæurus so far garbled as to omit the exception. The Lacedaemonians accused him of falsehood, and the dispute led to war, wherein the Lacedaemonians found themselves no match for the Achaeans, and resorted accordingly to negotiation. Diæurus, affirming that his hostility was not directed against Sparta, but against her disturbers, procured the banishment of 24 of her principal citizens. These men fled for refuge and protection to Rome, and whether Diæurus went to oppose them, together with Callirrates, who died by the way. The cause of the exiles was supported by Menalciades, who assured the Spartans, on his return, that the Romans had declared in favour of their independence, while an equally positive assurance to the opposite effect was given by Diæurus to the Achaeans,—the truth being that the senate had passed no final decision at all, but had promised to send commissioners to settle the dispute. War was renewed between the parties, B.C. 143, in spite of the prohibition of the Romans, to which, however, Diæurus, who was again general in B.C. 147, paid more obedience, though he endeavoured to bring over the towns round Sparta by negotiation. When the decree of the Romans arrived, which severed Sparta and several other states from the Achaean league, Diæurus took a leading part in keeping up the indignation of the Achaeans, and in urging them to the acts of violence which caused war with Rome. In the autumn of 147 he was succeeded by Crito- laus, but the death of the latter before the expiration of his year of office once more placed Diæurus at the post of danger, according to the law of the Achaeans, which provided in such cases that the predecessor of the deceased should resume his authority. The number of his army he swelled with emancipated slaves, and enforced strictly, though not impartially, the levying of the proscripted but only partially dividing his forces by sending a portion of them to garrison Megara and to check there the advance of the Romans. He himself had taken up his quarters in Corinth, and Metellus, the Roman general, advancing thither, sent forward ambaassadors to offer terms, but Diæurus threw them into prison (though he afterwards released them for the bribe of a talent), and caused Sosianates, the lieutenant-general, as well as Philipus of Corinth, to be put to death with torture for having joined in recommending negotiation with the enemy. Being deputated by Mummius before the walls of Corinth, in B.C. 146, he made no further attempt to defend the city, but fled to Megalopolis, where he slew his wife to prevent her falling into the enemy's hands. On his arrival at Athens, he killed himself with poison, thus (says Pausanias) rivalling Menalciades in the cowardice of his death, as he had rivalled him through his life in avisiure. (MENALCIDAS.) (Polyb. xxxviii. 2, xl. 2, 4, 5, 9; Paus. vii. 12, 6, 8; Clinton. F. H. sub annis 149, 147, 146.) [E. B.]

DIA/GORAS (Διαγόρας), the son of Telecleides or Telecytus, was born in the island of Melos (Milo), one of the Cyclades. He was a poet and a philosopher, who throughout antiquity was regarded as an atheist (αθεός). With the exception of this one point, we possess only very scanty information concerning his life and literary activity. All that is known is carefully collected by M. H. E. Meier (in Erseh. u. Graber's Altn. Ennoiopagog. xxiv. pp. 439—448).

The age of this remarkable man can be determined only in a general way by the fact of his being called a disciple of Democritus of Abdera, who taught about B.C. 436. But the circumstance that, besides Bacchylides (about B.C. 435), Pindar also is called his contemporary, is a manifest anachronism, as has been already observed by Brandis. (Gesch. d. Griech. Philos. p. 341.) Nearly all the ancient authorities agree that Melos was his native place, and Tatius, a late Christian writer, who calls him an Athenian, does so probably for no other reason but because Athens was the principal scene of the activity of Diagonas. (Tatian. Oral. ad. Graec. p. 164, a.) Lobechi (Aegypt. p. 370) is the only one among modern critics who maintains that the native country of Diagonas is uncertain. According to a tradition in Hesychius Milesius and Suidas, Democritus the philosopher ransomed him for a very large sum from the captivity into which he had fallen in the cruel subjugation of Melos under Alcibiades (B.C. 411), and this account at all events serves to attest the close personal relation of these two kindred-minded men, although the details respecting the ransom, for instance, may be incorrect. The same authors further state, that in his youth Diagonas had acquired some reputation as a lyric poet, and this is probably the cause of his being mentioned together with the lyric poets Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchylides. Thus he is said to have composed ἄθικα, μέλη, παιδεῖς, ἕγορθα, and dithyrambs. Among his encomia is mentioned in particular an eulogy on Ariainthes of Argos, who is otherwise unknown,* another on Nicodorus, a statesman of Mantinea, and a third upon the Mantinians. Diagonas is said to have lived in intimate friendship with Nicodorus, who was celebrated as a statesman and lawyer in his native place, and lived, according to Periplus (ad Aelian, V. H. ii. 23), at the time of Aratus and Memon. The foolish Aelian, who has preserved this statement, declines any further discussion of this relation; but, though he knew worse than the recent poet, he thought it objectionable to say anything in praise of a man who was so hostile to the gods (Σωτὸς ἦσαν αἱ διαγγέλων). But still he informs us, that Diagoras assisted Nicocorus in his legislation, which he himself praises as very wise and good. Wachsmuth (Hellen. Alterth. i. 2, p. 90) places this political activity of the two friends about the beginning of the Peloponnesian war.

* The change in the constitution of Mantinea by the ἑυκούσιος took place with the assistance of Argos (Wachsmuth, Helian. Alterth. i. 2, p. 89, i. 1, p. 180), and Ariainthes of Argos was probably a person of some political importance.

We find Diagoras at Athens as early as s. c. 424, for Aristophanes in the Clouds (830), which were performed in that year, alludes to him as a well-known character; and when Socrates, as though it were a mistake, is there called a Melian, the poet does so in order to remind his hearers at once of Diagoras and of his attacks upon the popular religion. In like manner Hippon is called a Melian, merely because he was a follower of Diagoras. It can scarcely be doubted that Diagoras was acquainted with Socrates, a connexion which is described in the scholia on Aristophanes as if he had been a teacher of Socrates. Fifteen years later, s. c. 411, he was involved, as Diodorus (xii. 6) informs us, by the democratic party in a lawsuit about impurity (διαουάρθρη ἡμῶν ἐν ἀρχάλεο), and he thought it advisable to escape its result by flight. Religion seems to have been only the pretext for that accusation; for the mere fact of his being a Melian made him an object of suspicion with the people of Athens. In b. c. 416, Melos had been conquered and cruelly treated by the Athenians, and it is not at all impossible that Diagoras, indignant at such treatment, may have taken part in the party-strife at Athens, and thus have drawn upon himself the suspicion of the democratic party, for the opinion that heterodoxy was persecuted at Athens, and that the priests in particular busied themselves about such matters, is devoid of all foundation. (Bernhardy, Gescl. d. Griech. Lit. i. p. 322.) All the circumstances of the case lead us to the conclusion, that the accusation was altogether and essentially of a political nature.

All that we know of his writings, and especially of his poems, shews no trace of irreligion, but on the contrary contains evidence of the most profound religious feeling. (Philodemus in the Heroclesnit, ed. Drummond and Walpole, p. 164.) Moreover, we do not find that out of Athens the charge of διατριβή was taken notice of in any other part of Greece. All that we know for certain on the point is, that Diagoras was one of those philosophers who, like Socrates, certainly gave offence by their views concerning the worship of the national gods; but we know, what liberation the Athenian comedy could take in this respect with impunity. There is also an anecdot of Diagoras, for want of other fire-wood, once threw a wooden statue of Hermes into the fire, in order to cook a dish of lentils, and, if there is any truth in it, it certainly shews his liberal views respecting polytheism and the rude worship of images. (Meier, l. c. p. 445.) In like manner he may have ridiculed the common notions of the people respecting the actions of the gods, and their direct and personal interference with human affairs. This, too, is alluded to in several very characteristic anecdotes. For example, on his flight from Athens by sea to Pallene he was overtaken by a storm, and on hearing his fellow-passengers say, that this storm was sent them by the gods as a punishment, because they had an oath broken, Diagoras showed them other vessels at some distance which were struggling with the same storm without having a Diagoras on board. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 37.) This and similar anecdotes (Diog. Laërt. vi. 59) accurately describe the relation in which our philosopher stood to the popular religion. That he maintained his own position with great firmness, and perhaps with more freedom, wit, and boldness than was advisable, seems to be attested by the fact, that he in particular obtained the epithet of διατριβή in antiquity. Many modern writers maintain that this epithet ought not to be given to him, because he merely denied the διατριβή of interference of God with the world; but though atheists, in the proper sense of the word, have never existed, and in that sense Diagoras was certainly not an atheist, yet as he did not believe in the personal existence of the Athenian gods and their human mode of acting, the Athenians could hardly have regarded him as other than an atheist. In the eulogy on his friend Nicocorus he sang Kατά διαγόρα καλόν ὑμιν τὰ πάντα μπροστάς εὐελεκτώ, But to return to the accusation of Diagoras, in consequence of which he was obliged to quit Athens. That time was one in which scepticism was beginning to undermine the foundations of the ancient popular belief. The trial of those who had broken down the statues of Hermes, the profanation of the mysteries, and the accusation of Aleiabrides, are symptoms which show that the unbelief, nourished by the speculations of philosophers and by the arts of the sophists, began to appear very dangerous to the conservative party at Athens. There is no doubt that Diagoras paid no regard to the established religion of the people, and he may occasionally have ridiculed it; but he also ventured on direct attacks upon public institutions of the Athenian worship, such as the Eleusinian mysteries, which were so venerated by the votaries of the gods; and he is said to have prevented many persons from becoming initiated in them. These at least are the points of which the ancients accuse him (Craterus, op. Socr. Aristoph. l. c.; Tarchaeus, op. Socr.; Lysias, c. Andocid, p. 214; Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 37; Tatian, adv. Grec. p. 164, a.), and this statement is also supported by the circumstance, that Melanthius, in his work on the mysteries, mentions the decree passed against Diagoras. But, notwithstanding the absence of accurate information, we can discover political motives through all these religious disputes. Diagoras was a Melian, and consequently belonged to the Doric race; he was a friend of Diogenes; and he was hated by Athens, and had only recently given up its alliance with Athens; the Dorians and Ionians were opposed to each other in various points of their worship, and this spark of hostility was kindled into a glowing hatred by the Peloponnesian war. Diagoras fled from Athens in time to escape the consequences of the attacks which his enemies had made upon him. He was therefore punished by Stelaeutus, that is, he was condemned, and the pejorative was engraved on a column, promising a prize for his head, and one talent to the person who should bring his dead body to Athens, and two talents to him who should deliver him up alive Athenians. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 1015, 1078; Diod. xiii. 6.) Melanthius, in his work on the mysteries, had preserved a copy of this philosophy. That the enemies of the philosopher acted on that occasion with great injustice and animosity towards him, we may infer from the manner in which Aristophanes, in his Birds, which was brought upon the stage in that year, spoke of the matter; for he describes that decree as having been framed in the republic of the birds, and ridicules it by the ludicrous addition that a prize was offered to any one who should kill a dead tyrant. Meier, with full justice, infers from this passage of Aristophanes, that the poet
did not approve of the proceedings of the people, who were instigated by their leaders, had become frightened about the preservation of the constitution, and were thus misled to various acts of violence.
The mere fact that Aristophanes could venture upon such an insinuation shows that Diogoras was by no means in the same bad odour with all the Athenians who had voted to Pallene in Acharna, which town was on the side of Lacedaemon from the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and before any other of the Achaean towns. (Thucy-
d. ii. 9.) It was in vain that the Athenians demanded his surrender, and in consequence of this refusal, they included the inhabitants of Pallene in the same decree which had been passed against Diogoras. This is a symptom of that fearful passion and blindness with which the Athenian people, misguided as it was by demagogues, tore itself to pieces in those unfortunate trials about those who had upset the Hermec. (Wachsmuth, L. c. ii. 2, p. 192; Droysen, in his Introduct. to the Birds of Aristoph. p. 240, &c.) For all that we know of Diogenes, his expressions and opinions, his accusation and its alleged cause, lead us to see in him one of the numberless persons who were suspected, and were fortunate enough to escape the consequences of the trial by flight. From Pallene he went to Corinth, where, as Suidas states,
he died.

Among the works of Diogoras we have mention of a work entitled Φιλόσος Αἴγυς,† in which he is said to have theoretically explained his atheism, and to have endeavoured to establish it by arguments. This title of the work, which occurs also as a title among the works of Democritus and other Greek philosophers (Diog. Laërt. ix. 40, mentions the Λέγεσ Φιλόσος of Democritus, and concerning other works of the same title, see Lobeck, Ath. oph. p. 368, &c.), leads us to suppose that Diogoras treated in that work of the Phrygian divinities, who were received in Greece, and endeavoured to explain the mythoses which referred to them; it is probable also that he drew the dif-
f erent mysteries within the circle of his investigations, and it may be that his accusers at Athens referred to this work. The relation of Diogoras to the popular religion and theology of his age em-

not be explained without going back to the opinions of his teacher, Democritus, and the intellectual movement of the time. The atomistic philososophy had substituted for a world-governing deity the relation of cause and effect as the sources of all things. Democritus explained the wide-spread belief in gods as the result of fear of unusual and unaccountable phenomena in nature; and, starting from this principle, Diogoras, at a time when the object of his researches had been accomplished, epecially in the minds of the young, came forward with the decidedly sophistical doctrine, that there were no gods at all. His attacks seem to have been mainly directed against the dogmas of Greek theology and mythology, as well as against the established forms of worship. The expression of the Scholiast on Aristophanes (Rut. 329), that Diogoras, like Socrates, introduced new divinities, must probably be referred to the fact, that according to the fashion of the sophists, which is caricatured by Aristophanes in the Clouds, he substituted the active powers of nature for the activity of deities. The objections that the Corinthians have come down to us render it probable that he did this in a witty manner, somewhat bordering upon frivolity; but there is no passage to show that his disbelief in the popular gods, and his ridicule of the established, rude, and materialistic beief of the people, produced anything like an im-oral conduct in the life and actions of the man.
On the contrary, all accounts attest that he discharged the duties of life in an exemplary manner, that he was a moral and very estimable man, and that he was in earnest when in the eulogy on Arethusa of Augus he said: Σέδες, Σέδες ἐπὶ παντός λέγων τοὺς φύσιν ἀρέσκωσίαν! We do not feel inclined, with Meier, to doubt the statement that he distinguished himself not only as a philosopher, but also as an orator, and that he possessed many friends and great influence; for though we find it in an author of only secondary weight (Dian Chrysost. Hom. IV in prim. Epist. ad Co-

DIAFORAS (Διαφώρος), a Greek physician, who is quoted by Pliny as one of the authors from whom the materials for his Natural History were derived. (Index to books xii. xiii. xxii. xxvi., and H. N. xx. 76.) He must have lived in or before the third century n. c., as he is mentioned by Erasistratus (apud Dioscor. De Mtil. med. iv.
65, p. 557), and may perhaps be the native of Cyprus quoted by Eriacus. (Glos. Hippocr. p.
806.) One of his medical formulae is preserved by Aëtius (suetub. ii. serm. 3, c. 168, p. 333), and he may perhaps be the physician mentioned by an anonymous Arabic writer in Casiir. (Biblith. Arabito-Hebra. Eth. v. l. p. 237.) Some persons have tried to identify him with an Egyptian slave of Democritus; but there is no evidence that they were the same person, nor is the philosopher (as far as the writer is aware) anywhere said to have been a physician.

was very celebrated for his own victories, and those of his sons and grandsons, in the Grecian games. He was descended from Damagetis, king of Ilyus, and, on the mother's side, from the Mesenian hero, Aristomenes. [Damagetis.] The family of the Etratids ceased to reign in Rhodes after B.C. 690, but they still retained great influence. Diogoras was victor in boxing twice in the Olympian games, four times in the Isthmian, twice in the Pythian and twice in the Pylian. He had therefore the high honour of being a pentathlonist, that is, one who had gained crowns at all the four great festivals. He also obtained many victories in games of less importance, as at Athens, Aegina, Megara, Pellene, and Rhodes.
There is a story told of Diogoras which displays
most strikingly the spirit with which the games were regarded. When an old man, he accompanied his sons, Anaxilas and Damagetis, to Olympia.
The young men, having both been victorious, carried their father through the assembly, while the spectators showered garlands upon him, and congratulated him as having rescued the family honour at the Olympic games. The temple of Diogoras and his descendants was celebrated by Pindar in an ode (Ol. vii.) which was inscribed in golden letters on the wall of the temple of Athene at Cnidus in Rhodes. Their statues were set up at Olympia in a place by themselves. That of Diogoras was made by the Megarian statuary, Callicles.
The time at which Diogoras lived is determined by his Olympic victory, in the 79th Olympiad. (B.C. 464.)
Pindar's ode concludes with forebodings of misfortune to the family of the Etratids, which were realized after the death of Diogoras through the growing influence of Athens. [DOROTEA.] [Find.

know that the Arventine was first occupied by the conquered Sabines who were transplanted to Rome (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 657; Dionys. iii. 43), and it is stated that shortly before the decemviral legislation the Arventine was assigned to the plebeians, and that the law ordaining this assignment was kept in the temple of Diana (Dionys. x. 32; Liv. iii.
54). It seems clear that Diana's worship was introduced at Rome by the Sabines and Latins on their becoming plebeians, and that this temple was worshiped by them in particular without the state taking any notice of her, or ordaining any festival in honour of her. Varro (de L. L. v. 74) moreover expressly attests, that the worship and name of Diana had come from the Sabines. Now, as the religion of the Latins and Sabines did not differ in any essential point from that of the Romans, we may ask what Roman divinity corresponded to the Sabine or Latin Diana? Diana loved to dwell in groves and in the neighbourhood of wells; she inspired men with enthusiasm and madness; she dreaded the very sight of male beings so much, that she appeared only in the moon-light; and about her herself she remained a virgin (Hor. Epod. ii. 1.
464; Plut. Quast. Rom. 3; Fest. s. v. Iacetilia; Augustin. de Civ. Dei. vii. 16); and these characteristics at one show a striking resemblance between Diana and Feronia or Fauna Fata. This circumstance, and the fact that Diana was the godess of the moon, also render it easy to conceive how the Romans afterwards came to identify Diana with the Greek Artemis, for Fauna Fata bore the same relation to Picus and Fauna that Artemis bore to Apollo. (Hartung. Die Religion der Rom.
p. 207, c.; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome. 1. p. 367,
c.)

DIAS (Δῆας), of Ephesus, a Greek philosopher of the time of Philip of Macedon. He belonged to the Academicians, and was therefore considered a Sophist, that is, a rhetorician. When he saw the threatening position of Philip towards Greece, he prevailed upon the king to turn his arms against Asia, and advised the Greeks to accompany him on his expedition, saying that it was an honourable to serve abroad for the purpose of preserving freedom at home. (Phi. Instr. Phil. Soph. 1. 3.)

[Π. Σ.]

DIANA, an original Italian divinity, whom the Romans completely identified with the Greek Artemis. The earliest trace of her worship occurs in the story about Servius Tullius, who is said to have dedicated to her a temple on the Aventine, on the site of Sexflitii. (Augustus.) It is added that, as Diana was the protectress of the slaves, the day on which that temple had been dedicated was afterwards celebrated every year by slaves of both sexes, and was called the day of the slaves (Diascoromai; Fest. s. v. Diacsoromai dic.) Plut.
Quast. Rom. 100; Martial. xii. 67.) Besides that day of the slaves, we hear of no festival of Diana in early times, which may be accounted for by supposing that either she was a divinity of inferior rank, or that her worship had been introduced at Rome without being sanctioned or recognized by the government, that is, by the ruling patriars. The former cannot have been the case, as the goddess was worshiped by the plebeians and the Latins as their patron divinity; for a tradition related that the plebeians had emigrated twice to the Aventine, where stood the temple of Diana (Liv. ii. 32, 38 15, Sall. i. 31); and that temple which Servius Tullius built on the Aventine was founded for the benefit of the Latin subjects, who assembled and sacrificed there every year. (Dionys. iv. 26; comp. Liv. i. 45; Plut. Quast. Rom. 4.) The Sabines and Latins, who formed the main stock of the plebeians, were in all probability the original worshipers of Diana at Rome. Now as we

DIBUTADES, of Sicily, was the reputed inventor of the art of modelling in relief, which an accident first led him to practice, in conjunction with his daughter, at Corinth. The story is, that the daughter traced the profile of her lover's face
as thrown in shadow on the wall, and that Dibutades filled in the outline with clay, and thus made a face in relief, which he afterwards hardened with fire. The work was preserved in the Nymphaeum till the destruction of Corinth by Mammianus.
(Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. 45.) Pliny adds, that Dibutades invented the colouring of plastic works by adding a red colour to them (from the existing works of this kind it seems to have been red sand), or modelling them in red chalk; and also that he was the first who made masks on the edges of the gutter tiles of the roofs of buildings, at first in low relief (στροφα), and afterwards in high relief (ετερωμα). Pliny adds "Hinc et fastigium templorum orti," that is, the terra-cotta figures which Dibu-

DICAERCHUS. (Δικαερχος), an Aetolian, who played a conspicuous part in the Aetolian war against the Romans. He was employed on several embassies, and afterwards engaged in the service of Philip of Macedon, who sent him out to conquer the Cyclades, and employed him in a fleet of twenty sail to carry on piracy. He appears to have been a most audacious and insolent person, for on his expedition against the Cyclades he erected altars to Αιτωλοι and Παροικοί, wherever he landed. (Polyb. xxiv. 10, xviii. 37, xx. 10, xiii. 14; Liv. xxxv. 12; Diod. Excerc. de Ven. et Pl. p. 572; Brundstätter, Diet Geschichts. des Aetol. Landes, p. 273.)

[DICAERCHUS (Δικαερχος). 1. A celebrated Peripatetic philosopher, geographer, and historian, and a contemporary of Aristotle and Theophratus. He was the son of one Theodorus, and born at Messana in Sicily, though he appears to have spent the greater part of his life in Greece Proper, and especially in Peloponnesus. He was a disciple of Aristotle (Cic. de Leg. iii. 6), and a friend of Theophratus, to whom he dedicated some of his writings. Most of Aristotle's disciples are mentioned also among those of Plato, but as this is not the case with Dicaearchus, Osann (Beiträge zur Griech. u. Rom. Lit. ii. p. 1, &c.) justly infers that Dicaearchus was one of Aristotle's younger disciples. From some allusions which we meet with in the fragments of his works, we must conclude that he survived the year B.C. 296, and that he died about B.C. 285. Dicaearchus was highly esteemed by the ancients as a philosopher and as a writer of most extensive information upon a great variety of things. (Cic. Tusc. i. 18, de Off. ii. 5; Varro, de Rer. Rust. i. 2.) His works, which were very numerous, are frequently referred to, and many fragments of them are still extant, which shew that their loss is one of the most severe in Greek literature. His works were partly geographical, partly political or historical, and partly philosophical; but it is difficult to draw up an accurate list of them, since many which are quoted as distinct works appear to have been only sections of greater ones. The fragments extant, moreover, do not always enable us to form a clear notion of the works to which they properly belong. Among his geographical works may be mentioned—1. On the heights of mountains. (Plin. H. N. ii. 65; Geminus, Elem. Astron. 14.) Suidas (s. v. Δικαερχος) mentions κατατηρήσεις τῶν ἐπὶ Πελοπόννησου ὄρων, but the quotations in Pliny and Geminus shew that Dicaearchus's measurements of heights were not confined to Peloponnesus, and Suidas therefore probably quotes only a section of the whole work. 2. Πύργου (Lydus, de Mens. p. 98, 17, ed. Bekker). This work was probably the text written in explanation of the geographical maps which Dicaearchus had constructed and given to Theophratus, and which seem to have consisted of the whole world, as far as it was then known. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 2; comp. Diod. Laer. v. 51.) 3. Αναγράφη τῆς Ἑλλάδος. A work of this title, dedicated to Theophratus, and consisting of 150 iambic verses, is still extant under the name of Dicaearchus; but its form and spirit are both unworthy of Dicaearchus, and it is in all probability the production of a much later writer, who made a metrical paraphrase of that portion of the Πύργου which referred to Greece. Buttmann is the only modern critic who has endeavoured to claim the work for Dicaearchus in his «De Dicaearcho ejusque operibus quibus inscribatur Bios Ἑλλάδος et Αναγράφη τῆς Ἑλλάδος.» Naumburg, 1832, 4to. But his attempt is not very successful, and has been ably refuted by Osann, (Allgem. Schriftwechsel für 1838, No. 140, &c.)

the Ἑρμηνείας of Dionysius. Cicero intended to make use of this work, which seems to have been written in the form of a dialogue, for his treatise de Gloria. (Ad Att. xiii. 30.) Among his philosophical works may be mentioned—7. Λεοντικός, in three books, which derived its name from the fact that the scene of the philosophical dialogue was laid at Mytilene in Lesbos. In it Dicaearchus endeavoured to prove that the soul was mortal. (Cic. Tusc. i. 11.) Cicero (ad Att. xiii. 132), when speaking of the work, says that it probably means the Λεοντικός. Another philosophical work,—8. Κορωνωικος, which likewise consisted of three books, was a sort of supplement to the former. (Cic. Tusc. i. 10.) It is probably the same work as the one which Cicero, in another passage (de Off. ii. 5), calls “de Intercitu Hominium.” Some other works, such as Πολιτεία Σωφρινοῦ (Suid.), Ὀλυμπιακὸς ἔγχρων or ἔγχρωμον ( Athen. xiv. p. 620), Παναθηναίος (Schol. ad Aristoph. Vesp. 564), and several others, seem to have been merely chapters of the Θεοι τῆς Ἑλλάδος. A work περί τῆς ἐν Σωφρίνου (Athen. xiii. p. 603) seems to have been the work of a different person, who may have been the historian Gellius. This work was performed at Athens. The work Φαίδωνος περὶ σκίνθος has no foundation except a false reading in Cicero (ad Att. xiii. 39), which has been corrected by Petersen in his Phaedri Epigraphiae Graecae, p. 11. There are lastly some other works which which are of a grammatical nature, and are usually believed to have been the productions of our philosopher, viz. Περὶ Ἀλκαλῶν ( Athen. xi. pp. 460, 479, xv. pp. 666, 668), and Περὶ τῶν Ἡρώων καὶ Σωφρίνου μάθων (Sext. Empir. adv. Geomet. p. 310), but may have been the works of Dicaearchus, a grammarian of Locassaron, who, according to Suidas, was a disciple of Aristotle, and seems to have been alluded to in Apollonius. (De Prov. p. 520.) A valuable dissertation on the writings of Dicaearchus is contained in Osann (L. e. p. 1, &c.), and the fragments have been collected and accompanied by a very interesting discussion by Maximil. Fuhr, Dicerecchii Messeniæ quoque superius compositio, edita et illustrata, Darmstadt, 1841, 4to.

2. Of Tarentum, is mentioned by Lambiuchus (de Vt. Philagor. 36) among the celebrated Pythagorean philosophers. Some writers have been inclined to attribute to him the Θεοὶ which are mentioned among the works of the Peripatetic Dicaearchus. (See Fuhr, l. c. p. 49, &c.) [L. S.]

Dicaeoboles (Δικαιομόδων), a writer of Chios, whose essays (Δικαιομοδία) are referred to by Athenaeus. ( xi. p. 608, 4.) [E. E.]

Dicaeogena (Δικαιογένα), a Grecian tragic and dithyrambic poet, of whom nothing is known except a few titles of his dramas. One of these, the Εἰρήνη, is supposed to be by having not been a tragedy, but a cyclic epic poem. (Suid. s. v.; Aristot. Poet. 16, with Ritter's note, p. 199; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 295.) [P. S.]

Dicaeus (Δικαέους), a son of Poseidon, from whom Dicaeus, a town in Thrace, is said to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Δικαέους.) [L. S.]

Dicle (Δικήλη), the personification of justice, was, according to Athenaeus, a daughter of Zeus and Themis, and the sister of Eunomia and Birenne. She was considered as one of the Horae; she watched the deeds of men, and approached the throne of Zeus with lamentations whenever a judge violated justice. (Hesiod. Op. 258, &c.) She was the enemy of all falsehood, and the protector of a wise administration of justice (Orph. Hymn. 42, 61); and Hesychia, that is, tranquillity of mind, was her daughter. (Pind. Pyth. viii. 1; comp. Apollod. i. 3, § 1; Hygin. Fab. 188; Eiod. v. 72.) She is frequently called the attendant or councillor (ὑπηρέτης or χειρήρ) of Zeus. (Soph. Oed. Col. 1877; Pint. Alex. 68; Arrian, Anab. iv. 9; Orph. Hymn. 61. 2.) In the tragedians, Dike appears as a divinity who severely punishes all wrong, evildoers. She is shown as a true daughter of justice, who pierces the hearts of the unjust with the sword made for her by Aesculapius. (Aeschyl. Choep. 639, &c.) In this capacity she is closely connected with the Erinyes (Aeschyl. Eum. 510), though her business is not only to punish injustice, but also to reward virtue. (Aeschyl. Agam. 773.) The idea of Dike as justice personified is most perfectly developed in the dramas of Sophocles and Euripides. She was represented on the chest of Cypselus as a handsome goddess, dragging Aesichus (Injustice) with one hand, while in the other she held a staff with which she beat her. (Paus. v. 18; comp. Herodotus, i. 152.)

D'certas (Δίκητας), a Thelian, was sent by his countrymen to Q. Marcellus Philippus and the other Roman commissioners at Chalcis (c. c. 171) to excuse the conduct of their state in having allied itself with Perseus. He went reluctantly, as being still an adherent to the Macedonian cause, for which he was accused at Chalcis, together with Neon and Ismenias, by the Thelian exiles of the Roman party. Ismenias and he were thrown into prison, and there put an end to their own lives. (Polyb. xxvii. 1, 2; Liv. xili. 98, 94, 44.) [E. E.]

Dicon (Δίκων), the son of Calimbrotus, was victor in the foot-race five times in the Pythian games, twice in the Isthmian, four times in the Nemean, and at Olympia once in the boys' foot-race, and twice in the men's; he was therefore a τερεμοδικής. His statues at Olympia were equal in number to his victories. He was a native of Caulonia, an Achaean colony in Italy; but after all his victories, except the first, he caused himself, for a sum of money, to be proclaimed as a Synecus. One of his Olympic victories was in the 98th Olympiad, n. c. 384. (Paus. vi. 3, § 5; Auth. Graec. iv. p. 142, No. 120, ed. Jacobs, Auth. Pol. xiii. 15; Krause, Olymp. p. 271, Gymn. n. Agon. ii. p. 755.) [P. S.]

Diotabus (Διόταβας), a surname of Zeus, derived from mount Diete in the eastern part of Crete. Zeus Dicteus had a temple at Phaestus, on the banks of the river Potheraeus. (Steb. x. p. 478.) [L. S.]

Dite (Δίτη), a nymph from whom mount Diete in Crete was said to have received its name. She was beloved and pursued by Minos, but she threw herself into the sea, where she was caught up and saved in the nets (Δίτητωρ) of fishermen. Minos then desisted from pursuing her, and ordered the district to be called the Dictaean. (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 171; comp. Brictomartis.) [L. S.]

Dictyna (Δικτύνα), [DICTYNNA.]

Dictys (Δικτύς), the name of three mythical personages. (Or. Met. iii. 614, xii. 355; Apollod. i. 9, 46.) [L. S.]

Dictys Cretenesis. The grammarians and other writers who belong to the decline of the Roman empire, missed probably by the figments of the Alexandrian sophists, believed that various persons who flourished at the time of the Trojan war, DICTY'S CRETENSIS.

had committed to writing, in prose and verse, records of the principal events, and that Homer had derived from these sources the materials for his poem. In this number was included Dictys of Crete, a follower of Idomeneus, and his name is attached to a manuscript in Athens nosed the 17th century, entitled "Dictys Cretensis de Bello Trojano," or perhaps more accurately, "Ephemeris Bollii Trojani," professing to be a journal of the leading events of the contest. To this is prefixed an introduction or prologue containing an account of the preservation and discovery of the work. We are here told that it was composed by Dictys of Gronesus at the joint request of Idomeneus and Meriones, and was inscribed in Phocinean characters on tablets of lime wood or paper made from the bark. The author having returned to Crete in his old age, gave orders with his dying breath that his book should be buried in the same grave with himself, and accordingly the MS. was enclosed in a chest of tin, and deposited in his tomb. There it remained undiscovered for ages, when in the thirteenth year of Nero's reign, the sepulchre was burst open by a terrible earthquake, the coffin was exposed to view, and observed by some shepherds, who, having ascertained that it did not, as they had at first hoped, contain a treasure, conveyed it to their master Eupraxis (or Eupraxides), who, in his turn presented it to Rutillus Rufus, the Roman governor of the province, by whom both Eupraxis and the casket were despatched to the emperor, Nero, upon learning that the letters were in Phocinean, summoned to his presence men skilled in that language, by whom the contents were explained. The whole having been translated into Greek, was deposited in one of the public libraries, and Eupraxis was dismissed loaded with rewards.

This introduction is followed by a letter addressed by a Q. Septimius Romanus to a Q. Arcadius Rufus, in which the writer, after giving the substance of the above tale, with a few variations, informs his friend, that the volume having fallen into his hands, he had been induced, for his own amusement and the instruction of others, to convert the whole, with some condensations, into the Latin language, with the addition of notes, and that the author of the introduction supposes the original MS. of Dictys to have been written in the Phocinean language, while Septimius expressly asserts, that the characters alone were Phocineian and the language Greek. We may add to this account, that the writers of the Byzantine period, such as Johannes Malelos, Constantinus Porphyrogentius, Georgius Cedrenus, Constantinus Manasses, Johannes and Isaacus Tzetzes, with others, quote largely from this Dictys as an author of the highest and most unquestionable authority, and he certainly was known as early as the age of Achian. The piece itself contains a history of the Trojan war from the birth of Paris, to the death of Ulysses. The compiler not unfrequently differs widely from Homer, adding many particulars, and recording many events of which we find no trace elsewhere. Most of these, although old traditions and legends are obviously mingled with fictions of a later date, were probably derived from the bard of the epic cycle; but the whole narrative is carefully pragmatized, that is, all miraculous events and supernatural agency are entirely excluded. In style Septimius evidently strives hard to imitate the ancient models, especially Sallust, and occasionally not without success, although both in tone and phrasing we detect a close resemblance to the style of Appuleius and Aulus Gellius.

In the absence of all positive evidence, it is a wide field to be thrown open for conjecture with regard to the real author of this work, the period at which it was actually composed, and the circumstances under which it was given to the world. Setting aside its alleged origin and discovery as quite unworthy of credit, many questions present themselves. Have we any proof that there ever was a Greek original at all? If there was a Greek compilation on the same subject, are there sufficient grounds for believing that what we now possess was derived from it? Is it not more probable that the Latin chronicle was the archetype, or, at all events, independent, and that the introduction and prefatory epistle were deliberate forgeries devised for the purpose of attracting attention and securing respect in days of ignorance and credulity? Again, if we admit that this is really a translation from a Greek original, at what epoch and in what manner did that original first appear? Is the story of the presentation to Nero a pure fabrication? Are Septimius and Arcadius real personages? If they are, to what end do they belong? To these inquiries, which have been answered by different critics in most contradictory terms, we reply: 1. It is certain that a Greek history of the Trojan war bearing the name of Dictys was in circulation among the Byzantines named above, by some of whom, who had no knowledge of Latin, the ipsissima verba are cited. 2. It is impossible to read the Latin Dictys without feeling convinced that it is a translation. The Grecisms are numerous and palpable, so that no one who examines the examples adduced by Perizonius can entertain any doubt upon this head. 3. It is a translation, fairly executed, of the narrative used by the Byzantines. This is proved by its close correspondence with the fragments found in Malelos and others, while the want of absolute identity in particular passages is fully explained by the assumption that it was not a full and literal but a compressed and modified version. 4. Those materials which are external and independent grounds for rejecting the epistle of Septimius to Arcadius as spurious; but so common were these names under the empire, that it is impossible to fix with any degree of certainty upon the individuals indicated. Hence, while the date of the letter is placed by some as early as the middle of the second century, Perizonius refers it to the time of Dioceletian, while others bring it down as low as Constantine, or even a century later. 5. Lastly, among the multitude of hypotheses proposed with reference to the origin of the work, one is so ingenionis, that it deserves to be rescued from oblivion. 1 In the latter of his two Dialogues, Archelaus, in the thirteenth year of his reign, and that Crete was actually invaded by an earthquake at that very period. Hence Perizonius supposes that Eupraxis, a wily slanderer, well aware of the passion displayed by the emperor for everything Greek, and more especially of his love for the tale of Troy, forged this production under the name of his countryman, Dictys, with regard to whom traditions may have been current, caused it to be transcribed into Phocinean characters, as bearing the closest resemblance to the
DICTYS CRETENSIUS.

Cadmeian letters first employed by the Hellenes, and finally, availing himself of the happy accident of the earthquake, announced the discovery in a manner which could scarcely fail to excite the most intense curiosity. According to these views, we may suppose the introduction to have been attached to the Greek copy by the first editor or transcription, and not inserted into the Latin version of Septimius; and this idea is confirmed by the circumstances, that some MSS. contain the introduction only, while others omit the introduction and insert the letter. Those who wish to obtain full information upon the above and all other topics connected with the subject, will find the whole evidence stated and discussed in the admirable dissertation of Perizonius, first printed in the edition of Smidts, Amst. 1702, and inserted in almost all subsequent editions, and in the introduction of Diderich, the most recent commentator.

The compilations ascribed to Dicytus and Dares [Darnus], although destitute of any intrinsic value, are of considerable importance in the history of modern literature, since they are the chief fountains from which the legends of Greece first flowed into the romances of the middle ages, and then mingled with the popular tales and ballads of England, France, and Germany. The Tale of Troy, according to Dunlop, in his History of Fiction, was first versified by Barneol de Saint More, an Ange-Norman minstrel, who lived in the reign of our second Henry, and borrowed his groundwork of events from Dicytus and Dares. This metrical essay seems in its turn to have served as a foundation for the famous chronicle of Gervase, the Abbot of Canterbury, in the 12th century, who published a romance in Latin prose upon the siege of Troy, including also the Argonautic expedition and the war of the Seven against Thebes. In this strange medley, the history, mythology, and manners of the West and of the East, of the Greeks in the heroic age, and of the Arabian invaders of Christendom, are mingled in the most fantastic confusion. The compound was, however, well suited to the taste of that epoch, for it was received with unbounded enthusiasm, and speedily translated into many European languages. From that time forward the most illustrious houses eagerly strove to tame their pedigrees from the Trojan line, and the monkish chroniclers began to refer the origin of the various states whose fortunes they recorded to the arrival of some Trojan colony.

Under these circumstances, we need not feel surprised that Dicytus Cretensis was among the earliest works which exercised the skill of the first typographers. That which is usually recognized as the editio princeps is in 4to. In Gothic characters, containing 68 leaves of 27 lines to the page, and is believed to have issued from the press of Ul Zell at Cologne, about 1470. Another very ancient edition in Roman characters, containing 56 leaves of 33 lines, is in the Fussinger library, and was probably printed at Venice not long after the former. Of more modern impressions the best are those of Mercerus, 12mo, Paris, 1618, reprinted at Amst. 12mo. 1630, containing a new recension of the text from two MSS. not before collated; of Anna Tanqu. Fabri fil. in usum Delphini, 4to., Paris, 1688; and of Lud. Smith, in 4to. and 8vo, Amst. 1702, which held the first place until it was superseded by that of Doderich, 8vo, Brem, 1835, which is very far superior to any other, comprising a great mass of valuable matter collected by Orielli, among which will be found collations of two very old and important MSS., one belonging to St. Gall and the other to Borne. (In addition to the dissections of Perizonius and Diderich, see Wopke's Adversus Criticos in Octavo, 1717, and remarks of Hildebrand in Jahn's Jahrb. fur Philol. xxiii. 3, p. 278, &c.)

DIDAS, a Macedonian, governor of Paeonia for Philip V., was employed by Perseus to insinuate himself into the confidence of his younger brother, Demetrius, for the purpose of betraying him. When Demetrius, aware that he was suspected by his father, determined to take refuge with the Romans, Didas gave information of the design to Perseus, who used it as a handle for excusing his brother to the king. Philip, having resolved to put Demetrius to death, employed Didas as his instrument, and he removed the prince by poison b. c. 181. He is afterwards mentioned as commanding the Paeonian forces for Perseus in his war with the Romans, b. c. 171. (Liv. xl. 21—24, xlii. 51, 55.)

DIDIA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned until the latter period of the republic, whence Cicero (pro Moro. 8) calls the Didii novi homines. The only member of it who obtained the consulship was T. Didius in b. c. 98. In the time of the republic no Didius bore a cognomen. [L. S.]

DYDIUS, 1. T. Didius, probably the author of the samptarria lex Didia, which was passed eighteen years after the lex Fannia, that is, in b. c. 143 (Maec. Sol. ii. 19), in which year P. Didius seems to have been tribune of the people. The lex Didia differed from the Fannia inasmuch as the former was made binding upon all Italy, whereas the latter had no power except in the city of Rome. There is a coin belonging to one T. Didius, which shews on the reverse two male figures, the one dressed, holding a shield in the left and a whip or vine in the right hand. The other figure is naked, but likewise armed, and under these figures we read T. DEID. It is usually supposed that this coin refers to our T. Didius, and Pighius (Annal. ii. p. 492) conjectures with some probability, that T. Didius, some years after his tribunship, about b. c. 138, was sent as praetor against the revolted slaves in Sicily. If this be correct, the figures on the coin may perhaps have reference to it. (Morell. Theaur. p. 151; Eckhel, Doctrin. Nam. v. p. 201.)

2. T. Didius, a son of No. 1, expelled, according to Pliny (H. N. 44; comp. Rufus, Brev. 8, and Ammian. Marcell. xxvii. 4, where we read M. Didius instead of T. Didius), the Scordisci who had invaded the Roman province of Macedonia, and triumphed over them. (Cic. in Pison. 25.) According to the narrative of Florus, this victory was gained soon or immediately after the defeat of the consul C. Cato, in b. c. 114, and was followed by the victories of M. Livius Drusus and M. Mi-nianus Rufus. It has, therefore, been supposed that at the time of Cato's defeat, b.c. 114, T. Didius was praetor of Illyricum, and that in this capacity he repelled the Scordisci, who, after having defeated Cato, ranged over Macedonia. But this supposition is not without its difficulties, for in the first place, we know of no war in Illyricum at that time which might have required the presence of a praetor. In the second place, it would be strange to find that T. Didius, who was praetor in b.c. 114, did not obtain the consulship till 15 years later, especially as he had gained a victory and a triumph in his praetorship, whereas the ordinary interval between the praetorship and consulship is only the space of two years. According to Ciceron (l.c.), T. Didius triumphed in Macedonia, and he had therefore taken the administration of Macedonia and not of Illyricum; moreover, Florus's account of the time of the victory of Didius over the Scordisci is erroneous, for we learn from the Chronicle of Eusebius (clxx. 39), that the victory of Didius over the Scordisci took place in the 4th consulate of C. Marcus, that is, in b.c. 100, and consequently 14 years later than the narrative of Florus would lead us to suppose. This also leaves us the usual interval of two years between the praetorship and the consulship, which Didius had in b.c. 98 with Q. Caecilius Metellus. In this year the two consuls carried the lex Caecilia Didia. (Socr. Bub. ad Cic. pro Sext. p. 610; Cic. pro Dom. 16, 20, pro Sext. 64, Philo, v. 3.) Subsequently Didius obtained the proconsulship of Spain, and in b.c. 93 he celebrated a triumph over the Cebeltherians. (Fast. Triumph. Cic. pro Pomp. 25.) Respecting his proconsulship of Spain, we learn from Appian (Hispan. 69, &c.), that he cut to pieces nearly 20,000 Vaeceans, transplanted the inhabitants of Termessus, conquered Colenda after a siege of nine months, and destroyed a colony of robbers by enticing them into his camp and then ordering them to be cut down. (Comp. Frontin. Strat. i. 8, § 5, ii. 10, § 1.) According to Sallust (ap. Gell. ii. 27; comp. Plut. Sertor. 3) Sertorius served in Spain as military tribune under Didius. Didius also took part in the Marsei war, which soon after broke out, and he fell in a battle which was fought in the spring of b.c. 89. (Appian, B. G. i. 40; Vell. Pat. ii. 16; Ov. Fast. vi. 667, &c.) According to a passage in Plutarch (Sertor. 12), Didius was beaten and slain ten years later, by Sertorius in Spain, but the reading in that passage is wrong, and instead of Sertorius, or as some read it Vibius, we ought to read Flaminius. (Ruinker, ad Vell. Pat. ii. 16.) There is a coin figured on p. 602, b, which refers to our T. Didius: the reverse shows a portico with a double row of pillars, and bears the inscription T. Didius. IMP. VIB. PUL. From this we see, that T. Didius received the title of imperator in Spain (Sallust. l.c.), and that after his return to Rome he restored or embellished the villa publica in the Campus Martius. The obverse shows the head of Concordia, her attendants and that of P. Fuentius Capito, who struck the coin, and on it commemorated an act of the life of Didius, with whose family, as we may infer from the image of Concordia, Fuentius Capito was connected by marriage. (Teeckel, Doctr. Numm. v. p. 130.)

3. T. Didius, perhaps a son of No. 2, was tribune of the people, in b.c. 65, with L. Aurelius Cotta. In the disputes arising from the accusation which one of their colleagues brought against Q. Caepio, Didius and Cotta were driven by force from the tribunal. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 47; comp. Cotta, No. 8.)

4. C. Didius, a legate of C. Julius Caesar, who sent him, in b.c. 46, to Spain against Cn. Pompeius. In the neighbourhood of Carteum he gained a naval victory over Arrius Varus, and in the following year he set out from Gadis with a fleet in pursuit of Cn. Pompeius, who had taken to flight. Pompeius was compelled to land, and Didius took or burnt his ships. Didius himself likewise landed, and after Pompeius had been killed by Caesennius Lento, Didius was attacked by the Lusitanian soldiers of Pompeius, and fell under their strokes. (Dion Cass. xiii. 14, 31, 40; Bell. Hisp. 37, 40.)

5. Q. Didius, was governor of Syria in b.c. 31, a post to which he had probably been appointed by M. Antony; but, after the battle of Actium, he deserted Antony, and prevailed upon the Arabs to burn the fleet which Antony had built in the Arabian gulf. (Dion Cass. lii. 7.)

M. Didius Salvius Julianus, afterwards named M. Didius Commodus Severus Julianus, the successor of Pertinax, was the son of Petronius Didius Severus and Claria Aemilia, the grandson or great-grandson of Salvius Julianus, so celebrated as a jurist. Under Hadrian, who took up the cause of the Cati, ruled Dalmatia and Lower Germany, and was placed at the head of the commissariat in Italy. About this period he was charged with having conspired against the life of Commodus, but had the good fortune to be acquitted, and to witness the punishment of his accuser. Bithynia was next consigned to his charge; he was consul for the second time in a.c. 179, along with Pertinax, whom he succeeded in the proconsulship of Africa, from whence he was recalled to Rome and chosen praefectus vigiles.

Upon the death of Pertinax, the Praetorian assassins publicly announced that they would bestow the purple on the man who would pay the highest prize. Flavius Sulpicius, praefect of the city, father-in-law of the murdered emperor, being at that moment in the camp, to which he had been dispatched for the purpose of soothing the troops, proceeded at once to make liberal proposals, when Julianus, having been roused from a banquet by his wife and daughter, arrived in all haste, and being unable to gain admission, stood before the gateway and cried. "Vercingetorix and the Arval prize." The bidding went on briskly for a while, the soldiers reporting by turns to each of the two competitors, the one within the fortifications, the other outside the rampart, the sum tendered by his rival. At length, Sulpicius having promised a donative of twenty thousand sesterces a head, the throne was about to be knocked down to him, when Julianus, no longer adding a small amount, shouted that he would give twenty-five thousand. The guards thereupon closed with the offers of Julianus, threw open their gates, saluted him by the name of Commodus, and proclaimed him emperor. The senate was compelled to notify the election. But the populace, after the first confusion had subsided, did not tamely submit to the dishonour brought upon the state. Whenever the prince appeared in public he was saluted with groans, imprecations, and shouts of "rober and paricide." The mob endeavoured to obstruct his progress to the Capitol, and even ventured to assault him with stones. This state of public feeling having become known, Pescennius Niger in Syria, Septimius Severus in Illyria, and Claudius Albinus in Britain, each having three legions under his command, refused to acknowledge the authority of Julianus, who for a time made vigorous efforts to maintain his power. Severus, the nearest and therefore most dangerous foe, was declared a public enemy; deputies were sent from the senate to persuade the soldiers to abandon him; a new general was nominated to supersede him, and a centurion despatched to take his life. The praetorians, long strangers to active military operations, were marched into the Campus Martius, regularly drilled, and exercised in the construction of fortifications and field works. Severus, however, having secured Albinus by declaring him Caesar; advanced steadily towards the city, made himself master of the fleet at Ravenna, defeated the Crispinus, the praetorian prefect, who had been sent forward to arrest his progress, and gained over to his party the ambassadors commissioned to seduce his troops. On the other hand, the praetorians, destitute of discipline, and sunk in debauchery and sloth, were alike incapable of offering any effectual resistance to an invader, and indisposed to submit to restraint. Matters being in this desperate state, Julianus now attempted negotiation, and offered to share the empire with his rival. But Severus turned a deaf ear to these overtures, and still pressed forwards, all Italy declaring for him as he advanced. At last the praetorians, having received assurances that they should suffer no punishment, provided they would give up the body of Septimius and the Prefect of the Praetorians and offer no resistance, suddenly seized upon the ringleaders of the late conspiracy, and reported what they had done to Sullus Massalla, the consul, by whom the senate was hastily summoned and informed of these proceedings. Forthwith a formal decree was passed proclaiming Severus emperor, awarding divine honours to Pertinax, and denouncing death to Julianus, who, deserted by all except one of his prefects and his son-in-law, Repentinus, was slain in the palace by a common soldier in the 61st year of his age and the third month of his reign.

DIDUS.

DIDO.

The words of Dion Cassius, who was not only in Rome at the period in question, but actually attended the meeting of the senate held on the very night when the bargain was concluded. We cannot suppose that he was ignorant of the real facts in the case. We cannot imagine any motive which could induce him to fabricate a circumstantial and improbable falsehood. (Dion Cass. lxxxii. 11—17; Spartan. Did. Julian.; Capitolini. Portius, sub flum, ii. 6. § 9, 7. § 4; Evrett. viii. 9; Victor. Ctes. xix.; Zosim. i. 7.)

DIDUS CALLUS. [CALLUS,]

DIDO SCABVA. [SCARVA.]

DIDO (Διώδος), also called Elisha, who is probably her more genuine name in the eastern traditions, was a Phoenician princess, and the reputed founder of Carthage. The substance of her story is given by Justin (xviii. 4, c.), which has been embellished and variously modified by other writers, especially by Virgil, who has used the story very freely, to suit the purposes of his poem. (See especially books i. and iv.) We give the story as related by Justin, and refer to the other writers where they present any differences. After the death of the Tyrian king, Mutgo (comp. Joseph. a. Apion. i. 16, where he is called Matgenus; Serv. ad Aen. i. 442, 642, who calls him Methore; others again call him Belus or Ageron). the people gave the government to his son, Pygmalion; and his daughter Dido or Elissa married her uncle, Agenor (Serv. ad Aen. i. 443, calls him Sicheus, and Servius, on this passage, Sicharbas), a priest of Hæresias, which was the highest office in the state next to that of king. Acrabas possessed extraordinary treasures, which he kept secret, but a report of them reached Pygmalion, and led him to murder his uncle. (Comp. Virg. Aen. i. 349, &c., where Sicheus is murdered at an altar; whereas J. Malalas, p. 162, &c., ed. Bonn, and Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg. 195, represents the murder as having taken place during a journey, or during the chase.) Hereupon, Dido, who according to Virgil and others was informed of her husband's murder in a dream, pretended that, in order to forget her grief, she would in future live with her brother Pygmaelion, and so set out on all possible occasions for quitting her country. The servants whom Pygmalion sent to assist her in the change of her residence were gained over by her, and having further induced some noble Tyrians, who were dissatisfied with Pygmaelion's rule, to join her, she secretly sailed away in search of a new home. The party first landed in the island of Cyprus, where their number was increased by a priest of Zeus, who joined them with his wife and children, and by their carrying off by force eighty matrons to provide the emigrants with wives. In the mean time, Pygmalion, who had heard of the flight of Dido, profited his brother in pursuit of her: but was prevented by the entreaties of his mother and by the threats of the gods (Serv. ad Aen. i. 368, gives a different account of the escape of Didò); and she thus safely landed in a bay on the coast of Africa. Here she purchased (according to Serv. ad Aen. i. 367, and Eustath. loc, of king Hiäbaras) as much land as might be covered with the hide of a bull; but she ordered the hide to be cut up into the thinnest possible stripes, and with them she surrounded a great extent of country, which she called Byrsa, from Sīpere, i.e. the hide of a bull. (Comp. Virg. Aen. i. 367; Servius, ad loc., and ad iv. 670; Silius Ital. Pan. i. 25; Appian, Pan. i.) The number of strangers who flopped to the new colony from the neighboring districts, for the sake of commerce and profit, soon raised the place to a town community. The kinship of the new colonists, especially the inhabitants of Utica, supported and encouraged them (Procop. Belle. Ven. i. 10); and Dido, with the help of the Libyans, who were under the promise of paying them an annual tribute, built the town of Carthage. In laying the foundations of the city, the head of a bull was found, and afterwards the head of a horse, which was a still more favourable sign. (Virg. Aen. i. 443, with Servius’s note; Sil. Ital. Pan. ii. 410, &c.) As the new town soon rose to a high degree of power and prosperity, King Hiberbas or Jarbas, who began to be jealous of it, summoned ten of the noblest Carthaginians to his court, and asked for the hand of Dido, threatening them with a war in case of his demand being refused. The deputies, who on their return dreaded to inform their queen of this demand, at first told her that Hiberbas wished to have somebody who might instruct him and his Libyans in the munera of civilized life; and when they expressed a doubt as to whether anybody would be willing to live among barbarians, Dido assured them, and declared that every citizen ought to be ready to sacrifice everything, even life itself, if he could thereby render a service to his country. This declaration roused the courage of the ten deputies, and they now told her what Hiberbas demanded of her. The queen was thus caught by the law which she herself had laid down. She lamented her fate, and perpetually uttered the name of her late husband, Aeneas; but at length she answered, that she did not think the fate of her new city might call her. She took three months to prepare herself, and after the lapse of that time, she erected a funeral pile at the extreme end of the city: she sacrificed many animals under the pretense of endeavouring to soothe the spirit of Aeneas before celebrating her new nuptials. She then took a sword into her hand, and having ascended the pile, she said to the people that she was going to her husband, as they desired, and then she plunged the sword into her breast, and died. (Comp. Serv. ad Aen. i. 340, iv. 38, 325, 674.) So long as Carthage existed, Dido was worshipped there as a divinity. (Sil. Ital. Pan. i. 81, &c.) With regard to the time at which Dido is said to have founded Carthage, the statements of the ancients differ greatly. According to Servius (ad Aen. iv. 459), it took place 40 years before the foundation of Rome; that is, in n. c. 794; according to Velleius Paterculus (i. 6), it was 65 years, and according to Justin (xviii. 6) and Orosius (iv. 6), 73 years, before the building of Rome. Josephus (c. Apion. i. 18; comp. Synecellus, p. 148) places it 143 years and eight months after the building of the temple of Solomon, that is, n. c. 891; while Eusebius (Chron. n. c. 971, ap. Synecell. p. 545; comp. Chronic. n. c. 1003) places the event 133 years after the taking of Troy, that is, in n. c. 1075; and Philon placed it upon 37 or 50 years before the taking of Troy. (Euseb. Chron. n. c. 798; Synecell. p. 824; Appian, Pan. i.) In the story constructed by Virgil in his Aeneid, he makes Dido, probably after the example of Nicias, a contemporary of Aeneas, with whom she falls in love on his arrival in Africa. As her love was not returned, and Aeneas hastened to seek the new home which the gods had promised him, Dido in despair destroyed herself on a funeral pile. The anachronism which Virgil thus commits is noticed by several ancient writers. (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 459, 682, v. 4; Macroch. Soc. v. 17, vi. 2; Auson. Epigr. 110.)

[DIDYMUS (Δίδυμος), is mentioned by Antoninus Liberalis (23) as the author of a work on Metamorphoses, of which the third book is there quoted.]

[2. S.]

[DIDYMUS (Δίδυμος). i. A celebrated Alexandrian grammarian of the time of Cleo and the emperor Augustus. He was a disciple or rather a follower of the school of Aristarchus (Ἀρισταρχός, Lehrs. de Aristarcho stud. Honor. p. 18, &c.), and is said to have been the son of a dealer in salt fish. He was the teacher of Apion, Heracleides Ponticus, and other eminent men of the time. He is commonly distinguished from other grammarians of the name of Didymus by the surname χαλκοπυρήνας, which he is said to have received from his indefatigable application to study. But he also bore the nickname of βιβλιοθήκης, for, owing to the multitude of his writings, it is said it often happened to him that he forgot what he had stated, and thus in later productions contradicted what he had said in earlier ones. Such contradictions happen the more easily the more a writer confines himself to the mere business of compiling; and this seems to have been the case to a very great extent with Didymus, as we may infer from the extraordinary number of his works, even if it were not otherwise attested. The sum total of his works is stated by Athenaeus (iv. p. 139) to have been 300, and by Seneque (Ep. 68) 4000. (Comp. Comp. ad. Aen. iii. 3, § 19.)

III. i. 5, 6.) Didymus’s single books or rolls seem to be counted as separate works; or else many of them must have been very small treatises. The most interesting among his productions, all of which are lost, would have been those in which he treated on the Homeric poems, the criticism and interpretation of which formed the most prominent portion of his literary pursuits. The greater part of what we now possess under the name of the minor Scholia on Homer, which were at one time considered the work of Didymus, is taken from the several works which Didymus wrote upon Homer. Among them was one on the Homeric text as constituted by Aristarchus (φίλος Ἀρισταρχοῦ), a work which appears to be of great importance to us, as he entered into the detail of the criticisms of Aristarchus, and revised and corrected the text which the latter had established. But the studies of Didymus were not confined to Homer, for he wrote also commentaries on many other poets and prose writers of the classical times of Greece. We have mention of works of his on the lyric poets, and especially on Bacchylides (Theophil. Ep. 8; Ammon. s. e. Νεοπήδες) and Pindar, and the better and greater part of our scholia on Pindar is taken from the commentary of Didymus. (Böckh, Proef. ad Schol. Psid. p. xvii. &c.) The same is the case with the extant scholia on Sophocles. (Böckh, de Aesclepi. Sophocelis, et Euripidos interpretibus Graecis, p. 106, &c.) In the scholia on Aristophanes, too, Didymus is often referred to, and we further know that he wrote commentaries on Euripides, Ion, Phrynichus (Athen. ix. p. 371), Cratinus (Hesych. s. e. Κρατέας; Athen. xi. p. 501), Menander (Etymol. Gud. p. 338, 25), and others. The Greek orators, DIDYMUS.

Democritus, Isaeus, Hyperides, Deinarchus, and others, were likewise commented upon by Didymus. Besides these numerous commentaries, we have mention of a work on the phraseology of the tragic poets (περὶ τραγῳδοκομίων λέξεως), of which the 26th book is quoted. (Macrobi. Sat. v. 18; Hippocr. s. v. ἔργολοφος.) A similar axiom (Acts xiv. 15) was employed by Irenaeus on the phraseology of the epic poets, and Hezychius made great use of it, as he himself attests in the epistle to Eutocius. (Comp. Euthym. M. p. 492, 53; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 1139, iv. 1058.) A third work of the same class was on words of ambiguous or uncertain meaning, and consisted of at least seven books; and a fourth treated on false or corrupt expressions. He further published a collection of Greek proverbs, in thirteen books (πρὸς τοὺς περὶ παραίων συντακτόν), from which is taken the greater part of the proverbs contained in the collection of Zenobius. (Schneidewin. Corpus Papyri Graec. Græc. i. p. xiv.) A work on the laws of Solon is mentioned in the works of Plutarchus (Sol. 1) under the title περὶ τῶν ἔθνων Πλούταρχου. Didymus appears to have been acquainted even with Roman literature, for he wrote a work in six books against Cicero's treatise "de Re Publica." (Ammian. Marcell. xxii. 16, 17), which afterwards induced Suetonius to write against Didymus. (Suid. s. v. Τραγῳδία.) Didymus stands at the close of the period in which a comprehensive and independent study of Greek literature prevailed, and he himself must be regarded as the father of the scholars who were satisfied with compiling or abridging the works of their predecessors.

In the collection of the Geoponica there are various places ascribed to the name of Didymus, from which it might be inferred that he wrote on agriculture or botany; but it is altogether uncertain whether these extracts belong to our Alexandrian grammarian, or to some other writer of the same name. It is very probable that, with Suidas, we ought to distinguish from our grammarian a naturalist Didymus, who possibly may be the same as the one who wrote a commentary on Hippocrates, and a treatise on stones and different kinds of wood (περὶ παραγωγῆς καὶ πατριών δημοσίων), a treatise which has been edited by A. Mai as an appendix to the fragments of the Epid. (Milan, 1819, 21.) See Gräfenhan, Gesch. der Klass. Philol. in Altertum, i. p. 405, &c.

2. An Alexandrian grammarian, commonly called the younger (δός): he taught at Rome, and wrote, according to Suidas (s. v. Διόμως), περὶ καὶ περὶ διδασκαλίας, and many other excellent works. In a preceding article, however, Suidas attributes the περὶ καὶ περὶ διδασκαλίας to two books on one Didymus Areus, an Academic philosopher, who lived at Rome in the time of Nero. (Comp. Euseb. Præp. Evang. xi. 23; Eudoc. p. 193.)

3. With the praenomen Claudius, a Greek grammarian, who, according to Suidas (s. v. Διόμως), wrote upon the mystical and allegorical, and a work on Analogy among the Romans. He further made an epitome of the works of Heracleon, and some other works. A fragment of his epitome is preserved in Stobaeus. (Serv. 101; comp. Lorsch, Die Sprachfehler der Alten, pp. 74, 143, &c.)

4. Of Alexandria, lived in the fourth century of the Christian era, and must be distinguished from Didymus the monk, who is spoken of by Socrates. (Hist. Eccles. iv. 33.) At the age of four years, and before he had learnt to read, he became blind; but this calamity created in him an invincible thirst after knowledge, and by intense application he succeeded in becoming not only a distinguished grammarian, rhetorician, dialecticist, mathematician, musician, and physician (Sozom. iv. 25; Sozom. iii. 15; Rufin. x. 7; Theodoret. iv. 29; Nicephor. i. 17), but also in acquiring a most extensive knowledge of sacred literature. He devoted himself to the service of the church, and was no less distinguished for the exemplary purity of his conduct than for his learning and acquirements. In A.D. 399, when Hieronymus wrote his work on illustrious ecclesiastical authors, Didymus was still alive, and professor of theology at Alexandria. He died in A.D. 396 at the age of eighty-five. As professor of theology he was at the head of the school of the Catechumeni, and the most distinguished personages of that period, such as Hieronymus, Rufinus, Palladius, Ambrosius, Evagrius, and Isidorus, are mentioned among his pupils. Didymus was the author of a great number of theological works, but most of them are lost. The following are still extant:—

1. "Libro de Spiritu Sancto." This Greek original is lost, but we possess a Latin translation made by Hieronymus, about A.D. 389, which is printed among the works of Hieronymus. Although the author as well as the translator intended it to be a single book (Hieronym. Catul. 109), yet Marcianus in his edition of Hieronymus has divided it into three books. The work is mentioned by St. Augustine (De Genesi ad Litteram, iii. 28) and Nicephorus (ix. 17). Separated editions of it were made at Cologne, 1531, 8vo., and a better one by Fuchta, Helmstädt, 1614, 8vo. 2. "Breves Enarrationes in Epistolam Canonicam." This work is likewise extant only in a Latin translation, and was first printed in the Cologne edition of the first work. It is contained also in all the collections of the works of the fathers. The Latin translation is the work of Epiphanius, and was made at the request of Cassiodorus. (Casiod. de Institut. Divin. viii.)

3. "Liber adversus Manicheos." This work appears to be incomplete, since Damascenus (Parallel. p. 507) quotes a passage from it which is now not to be found in it. It was first printed in a Latin version by F. Turrianius in Petavius's appendix Sanct. ad Cat. Litt. D., Venice, 1603, and at Colone in 1608. It was reprinted in some of the Collections of the Fathers, until at last Combes had in his "Auctoritatem novissimam" (ii. p. 21, &c.) published the Greek original. (Paris, 1672, fol.)

4. περὶ Τρόπων. This work was formerly believed to be lost, but J. A. Mingarelli discovered a MS. of it, and published it with a Latin version at Bologna, 1769, fol. A list of the lost works of Didymus is given by Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ix. p. 274, &c.; compare Cave, Hist. Ed. i. p. 205; Guicciardini, de Schola Alexandr. ii. p. 122, &c. (L.S.) But a part of it is preserved in Petavius's appendix, by one who lived perhaps in the third century after Christ, as he is quoted by Aëtius (tetrab. ii. serm. ii. c. 15, p. 256) and Alexander Trallianus (De Med. vii. 13, p. 235), by whom he is called σοφοφάτας. He may perhaps be the native of Alexandria who is mentioned by Suidas as having written fifteen books on Agriculture, and who is frequently quoted in the collection of writers called Geonopoi (lib. i.
DIOCLEIDES, 1009

DITRIPHIUS (Διτριφής, Thuc. vii. 29), probably distinct from the Ditrphes of Thuc. viii. 64, was entrusted, n. c. 413, with the charge of carrying home the Thuricans mercenaries who arrived at Athens too late to sail for Syracuse with Demosthenes, and were, to save expense, at once dismissed. He made on the way deserts upon Boeotia at Tanagra, and at Mycaleus, the latter of which places he surprised, and gave up to the savage butchery of his barbarians. Boeotian forces came up with them, however, in their retreat to the ships, and cut down a considerable number. Ditrphes himself, however, not improbably fell. Pausanias (i. 23. § 2, 3) saw a statue of him at Athens, representing him as pierced with arrows; and an inscription containing his name, which was doubtless cut on the base of this statue, has been recently discovered at Athens, and is given on p. 890, a. This Ditrphes is probably the same as the Ditrphes mentioned by Aristophanes (Aves, 798, 1440), satirized in one place as a leader of the fashion of chariot-driving; in another as a forward upstart, who had advanced himself, if the Scholast understood the joke, to military office by the trade of basket-making. The date of "the Birds," n. c. 414, would be rather a confirmation of the identity of the two men. [A.H. C.]

D'ILLIUS APONIA'NUS. [APONIANUS.]

D'ILLIUS VO'CAULA. [VOCULA.]

DINDYMEN (Δινδυμη or Δινδύμην), a surname of Cybele, derived either from mount Dindymus in Phrygia, where a temple was believed to have been built by her to the Argonauts (Apoll. Rhod. i. 985, with the Schol. Strab. xii. p. 575; Callim. Epyr. 42; Horat. Carm. i. 10. 5; Catull. 63, 91; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 617), or from Dindymus, the husband of Maeron and mother of Cybele. (Diod. iii. 58.) [L. S.]

DION. [DION.] 1010

DIONE (Διόνε), an Athenian, who, when the people were highly excited about the mutilation of the Hermene, n. c. 415, and ready to credit any information whatever, came forward and told the following story to the council:—Private business having taken him from home on the night on which the busts were defaced, he had seen about 300 men enter the orchestra of the theatre, and was able by the light of the full moon to observe their features perfectly. At the time he had no idea of the purpose of their assembling, but the next day he heard of the affair of the Hermene, and taxed some of the 800 with it. They bribed him to secrecy by the promises of two talents, which they afterwards refused to pay, and he had therefore to come given information. This story was implicitly believed at the time, and many persons mentioned as guilty by Dileoides were imprisoned, while the informer himself received a crown of honour and a public entertainment in the Prytaneum. Soon afterwards, however, Androcles (who with several of his relations was among the prisoners) came forward with his version of the matter, which contradicted that of Dileoides. It was also remembered that the moon was not visible on the night on which the latter professed to have marked by its light the faces of the accused. He was driven, therefore, to confess that his evidence was false, and he added (which was, perhaps, equally false), that he had been suborned to give it by two men named Alchibdis and Amia. Both of these sought safety by flight, and Diocles was put to death. (Andoc. de Myst. pp. 6—9; Thuc. vi. 60; Phryn. ap. Plut. Alc. 29; Diod. xiii. 2.)

DIOCLES (Διοκλῆς), of Abdera, is mentioned in Athenaeus (for this seems to be the meaning of the passage) as having admirably described the famous engine called Ἐλασόρα (the City-taker), which was made by Epimachus the Athenian for Demosthenes Fucus, a king of Rhodos. (Andoc. p. 206, d.; Diod. xii. 91; Wesselius, ad loc.; Plut. Democ. 21; Vitruv. x. 22.)

DIOCLES (Διοκλῆς), the son of Oroniceus and father of Crethon and Orosicles, was a king of Phere. (Hom. Il. v. 540, &c. Od. iii. 488; Paus. iii. 38. § 2.)

DIOCLES (Διοκλῆς), a Syracusan, celebrated for his code of laws. No mention of his name occurs in Thucydides, but according to Diodorus he was the proposer of the decree for putting to death the Athenian generals Demosthenes and Nicias. (Diod. xiii. 19.) He is called by Diodorus upon this occasion the most eminent of the Athenian generals at Syracuse who had been to have been at this time the leader of the popular or democratic party, in opposition to Hermocrates. The next year (c. xxiv. 321), if the chronology of Diodorus be correct, a democratic revolution took place, and Diocles was appointed with several others to frame and establish a new code of laws. In this he took so prominent a part, that he threw his colleagues quite into the shade, and the code was ever after known as that of Diocles. We know nothing of its details, but it is praised by Diodorus for its conciseness of style, and the care with which it distinguished different offences and assigned to each its peculiar penalty. The best proof of its merits is, that it continued to be followed as a civil code not only at Syracuse, but in many others of the Sicilian cities, until the island was subjected to the Roman law. (Diod. xiii. 35.)

The banishment of Hermocrates and his party (b. c. 410; see Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 27) must have left Diocles undisputed leader of the commonwealth. The next year he commanded the forces sent by Syracuse and the other cities of Sicily to the relief of Himera, besieged by Hannibal, the son of Gisco. He was, however, unable to avert its fate, and withdrew from the city, carrying off as many as possible of the inhabitants, but in such haste that he did not stay to bury those of his troops who had fallen in battle. (Diod. xiii. 59—61.) This circumstance probably gave rise to discontent at Syracuse, which was increased when Hermocrates, having returned to Sicily and obtained some successes against the Carthaginians, sent back the bones of those who had perished at Himera with the highest honours. The revulsion of feeling thus excited led to the banishment of Diocles, b. c. 408. (Diod. xiii. 65, 75.) It does not appear whether he was afterwards recalled, and we are at a loss to connect with the subsequent revolutions of Syracuse the strange story told by Diodorus, that he stole himself with his own sword, to shew his respect for some of his laws, which he had thoughtlessly infringed by coming armed into the place of assembly. (Diod. xiii. 33.) A story almost precisely similar is, however, told by the same author (xii. 19) of Charondas [CHARONDAS], which renders it at least very doubtful as regarding Diocles. Yet it is probable that he must have died about this time, as we find no mention of his name in the civil dissensions which led to the elevation of Dionysius. (Hubmann, Diocles Gesetzgeber der Siziliker, Annaber, 1842.) [E. H. B.]

DIOCLES (Διοκλῆς).—1. A brave Athenian, who lived in exile at Megara. Once in a battle he protected with his shield a youth whom he loved, but he lost his own life in consequence. The Megarians revered the gallant man with the trophies of a hero, and instituted the festival of the Dio- cles, which they celebrated in the spring of every year. (Theocrit. xii. 27, &c.; Aristoph. Acharn. 774; Plut. Thes. 10; Dic. of Ant. s. v. Διοκλῆς.)

2. The name of three wealthy Sicilians who were robbed by Verres and his satellites. (Cic. in Verr. iii. 56, 40, v. 7, iv. 15.)

DIOCLES (Διοκλῆς), literary. 1. Of Athens. See below.

2. Of Cnidus, a Platonic philosopher, who is mentioned as the author of Διαγραφή, from which a fragment is quoted in Eusebius. (Praep. Evang. xiv. p. 731.)

3. Greek GRAMARIAN, who wrote upon the Homeric poems, and is mentioned in the Venetian Scholia (ad xii. 103) along with Dionysius Thrax, Aristarchus, and Clearchus on the subject of Greek accents. A dream of his is related by Artemidorus. (Onom. iv. 72.)

4. Of Magnesia, was the author of a work entitled ἐπισκοπὴ τῶν ἠλέουσαν, and of a second on the lives of philosophers (ἐπισκοπὴ τῶν ἠλέουσαν), of both of which Diogenes Laërtius appears to have made great use. (II. ii. 12, 13, 20, 36, 37, 91, 98, 103, vii. 48, 102, 168, 179, 181; ix. 61, 65, x. 12.)

5. Of Corinth, the earliest Greek historian, who wrote about the foundation of Rome, and whom Q. Fabius Pictor is said to have followed in a great many points. (Plut. Rom. 3, 8; Fest. s. v. Romam.) How long he lived before the time of Fabius Pictor, is unknown. Whether he is the same as the author of a work on heroes (ἐπισκοπὴ τῶν ἠλέουσαν) is uncertain, which is mentioned by Ptolomy (Quaest. Gramm. 40), and of a history of Persia (Περσικα), which is quoted by Josephus (Ant. Jud. x. 11, § 1), is likewise uncertain, and it may be that the last two works belong to Diocles of Rhodes, whose work on Aetolia (Ἀετωλία) is referred to by Ptolomy. (De Flor. 22.)

6. Of Sybaris, a Pythagorean philosopher (Tamb. Vit. Pythag. 85), who is distinguished from another Pythagorean, Diocles of Philus, who is mentioned by Tzambichus (Vit. Pythag. 35) as one of the most zealous followers of Pythagoras. The latter Diocles was still alive in the time of Aristogenes (Diog. Laërt. viii. 46), but further particulars are not known about him. [L. S.]

DIOCLES (Διοκλῆς), of Athens, or, according to others, of Philus, and perhaps in fact a Philisian by birth and an Athenian by citizenship, was a comic poet of the old comedy, contemporary with Summyron and Phyllilus. (Suid. s. v.) The following plays of his are mentioned by Suidas and Eudocia (p. 123) and freely quoted by the grammarians: Δέκαχα, Θηλαττα, Κύλωνας (by others ascribed to Callias), Μελαττα, Οἰσαίος and Οἰκείος, which are only mentioned by Suidas and Eudocia, are suspicious titles. He seems to have been an elegant poet. (Meineke, Frag. Conv. Gramm. ii. pp. 251-253, ii. pp. 838-841.) [P.S.]

DIOCLES (Διοκλῆς), a geometer of unknown
DIOCLETIANUS.

Diocletianus Valerius, was born near Salona in Dalmatia, in the year A.D. 245, of most obscure parentage; his father, according to the accounts commonly received, which are, however, evidently hostile, having been a freedman and provincial scribe, while the future emperor himself was indebted for liberty to a senator Anullius. Were this last statement true he must have been born while his parent was a slave; but this is impossible, for, as Niebuhr has pointed out, the Roman law, even as it stood at that period, would have prevented the son from being enlisted in the legions. From his mother, Decula, or Diocletianus was recorded henceforth as the village where she dwelt, he inherited the appellation of Decius or Diocles, which, after his assumption of the purple, was Latinized and expanded into the more majestic and sonorous Diocletianus, and attached as a cognomen to the high-patrician name of Valerius. Having entered the army he served with high reputation, passed through various subordinate grades, was appointed to most important commands under Probus and Aurelian, in process of time was elevated to the rank of consul suffectus, followed Carus to the Persian war, and, after the death of that emperor on the banks of the Tigris (Carrhae), remained attached to the court during the retreat in the honourable capacity of chief captain of the palace guards (domestici). When the fate of Numerianus became known, the troops who had met in solemn assembly at Chalcedon, for the purpose of nominating a successor, declared with one voice that the man most worthy of the sovereign power was Diocletianus, who, having accepted the preferred dignity, signified his accession by slaying with his own hands Arrius Aper prefect of the praetorians, who was arraigned of the murder of the deceased prince, his son-in-law (Numerianus). The proceedings upon this occasion were characterized by an intemperate haste, which gave plausibility to the report, that the avenger of Numerianus, notwithstanding his solemn protestations of innocence and disinterested zeal, was less eager to satisfy the demands of justice than to avert suspicion from himself and to remove a formidable rival, especially since he did not scruple to confess that he had long anxiously sought to fulfill a prophecy delivered to him in early youth by a Gaulish Druides, that he should mount a throne as soon as he had slain the wild-bear (Aper). These events took place in the course of the year 284, known in chronology as the era of Diocletianus, or the era of the martyrs, an epoch long employed in the calculations of ecclesiastical writers, and being in the time of the Christians. After the ceremonies of installation had been completed at Nicomedia, it became necessary to take the field forthwith against Carinus, who was hastening towards Asia at the head of a numerous and well-disciplined army. The opposing armies met near Margus in upper Moesia, and, after an obstinate struggle, victory declared for the hardy veterans of the Western legions; but while Carinus was hotly pursuing the flying foe he was slain by his own officers [Carinus]. His troops, left without a leader, fraternized with their late enemies. Diocletianus was acknowledged by the confederate armies, and was immediately confirmed in undisputed possession of the imperial crown. The conqueror used his victory with praiseworthy and politic moderation. There were no proscriptions, no confiscations, no banishments.
DIOCLETIANUS.

ments. Nearly the whole of the ministers and attendants of the deceased monarch were permitted to retain their offices, and even the praetorian prefect Aristobulus was continued in his command. There was little prospect, however, of a peaceful reign. In addition to the inaudacious spirit which prevailed universally among the soldiery, who had been accustomed for a long series of years to create and dethrone their rulers according to the suggestions of interest, passion, or caprice, the empire was threatened in the West by a formidable insurrection of the Bagaudae under Aelianus and Amantus [AELIANUS], in the East by the Persians, and in the North by the turbulent movements of the wild tribes upon the Danubian. Feeling himself unable to cope single-handed with so many difficulties, Diocletian resolved to assume a colleague who should enjoy, nominally at least, equal rank and power with himself, and relieve him from the burden of undertaking in person distant wars. His choice fell upon the brave and experienced, but rough and unlettered soldier Maximianus [MAXIMIANUS HERCIULUS], whom he invested with the title of Augustus, at Nicomedia, in 286. At the same time the associated rulers adopted respectively the epithets of Jovius and Herculis, either from some superstitions motive, or, according to the explanation of one of the panegyrists, in order to declare to the world that while the elder possessed supreme wisdom to devise and direct, the younger could exert irresistible might in the execution of all projects.

The new emperor hastened to quell, by his presence, the disturbances in Gaul, and succeeded without difficulty in chastising the rebellious boors. But this achievement was but a poor consolation for the loss of Britain, and the glory of the two Augusti was dimmed by their forced acquiescence in the insolent usurpation of Carausius. [CARAU-
SIIUS.]

Meanwhile, dangers which threatened the very existence of the Roman dominion became daily more imminent. The Egyptians, ever factious, had now risen in open insurrection, and their leader, Achillas, had made himself master of Alexandria; the savage Blumnyus were ravaging the country, and a vast army of the Persians; Ballism and Julianus had assumed imperial ornaments at Carthage; a confederacy of five rude but warlike clans of Atala, known as the Quingangtianse (or Quingangtianas), was spreading terror throughout the more peaceful districts of Africa; Tiridates, again expelled from Armenia, had been compelled once more to seek refuge in the Roman court; and Narses having crossed the Tigris, had recovered Mesopotamia, and openly announced his determination to re-unite all Asia under the sway of Persia; while the Germans, Goths, and Sarazians were ready to pour down upon any unguarded point of the long line of saltwater bordering the mouths of the Rhine to the Euxine. In this emergency, in order that a vigorous resistance might be opposed to these numerous and formidable attacks in quarters of the world so distant from each other, and that the loyalty of the generals commanding all the great armies might be firmly secured, Diocletian resolved to introduce a new system of government. It was determined that, in addition to the two Augusti, there should be two Caesars also, that the whole empire should be divided among these four potentates, a certain fixed and definite portion being assigned to each, within which, in the absence of the rest, his jurisdiction should be absolute. All, however, being considered as colleagues working together for the accomplishment of the same object, the decrees of one were to be binding upon the rest; and while each Caesar was, in a certain degree, subordinate to the Augusti, the three junior members of this mighty partnership were required distinctly to recognise Diocletian as the head and guide of the whole. Accordingly, on the 1st of March 292, Constantius Chlorus and Galerius were proclaimed Caesars at Nicomedia, and to knit more firmly the connecting bonds, they were both called upon to repudiate their wives; upon which the former received in marriage Theodotus, the step-daughter of Maximian; the latter Valeria, the daughter of Diocletian. In the partition of the provinces the two younger princes were appointed to the posts of greatest labour and hazard. To Constantius were assigned Britain, Gaul, and Spain, the chief seat of government being fixed at Treves; to Galerius were intrusted Illyricum, and the whole line of the Danube, with Sirmium for a capital; Maximian resided at Milan, as governor of Italy and Africa, together with Sicily and the islands of the Tyrrhenian Sea; while Diocletian retained Thrace, Egypt, Syria, and Asia in his own hands, and established his court at Nicomedia. The immediate results of this arrangement were most auspicious. Maximianus routed the Mauritanian hordes, and drove them back to their mountain fastnesses, while Julianus being defeated and perish'd by his own hands; Diocletian invested Alexandria which was captured after a siege of eight months, and many thousands of the seditions citizens were slain, Basirias and Coptos were levelled with the ground, and all Egypt, struck with terror by the success and severity of the emperor, sunk into abject submission. In Gaul an invading host of the Alemani was repulsed with great slaughter after an obstinate resistance, Boulogne, the naval arsenal of Carausius, was forced to surrender, and the usurper having soon after been murdered by his chosen friend and minister, Allectus, the troops of Constantius effected a landing in Britain in two divisions, and the whole island was speedily recovered, after it had been diplomatically occupied for nearly ten years. In the East the struggle was more severe; but the victory, although deferred for a while, was even more complete and more glorious. Galerius, who had quitted his own province to prosecute this war, sustained in his first campaign, a terrible defeat in the plains of Carchae. The scattered army, however, was speedily recruited by large drafts from the veterans of Illyria, Moesia, and Dacia, and the Roman general, taught caution by experience, advanced warily through the mountains of Armenia, carefully avoiding the open country where cavalry might act with advantage. Persevering steadily in his course, he at length, with 25,000 men, fell unexpectedly upon the careless and confident foe. They were completely routed, and the harem of Narses, who commanded in per-sion and escaped with great difficulty, fell into the hands of the conquerors. The full fruits of this victory were secured by the wise policy of Diocletian, who resolved to seize the opportunity of offering a peace by which he might receive a moderate but certain advantage. A treaty was concluded, by which the independence of Armenia was guaranled, and all Mesopotamia, together with five provinces beyond the Tigris and the command of the defiles of Caucasus, were ceded to the Romans. For forty years the conditions of this compact were observed with good faith, and the repose of the East remained undisturbed.

The long series of brilliant achievements, by which the barbarians had been driven back from every frontier, were completed when Diocletian entered upon the twelfth year of his reign, and the garrisons commanded by Constantius were still so remote, and so numerous, that they had far outstripped the most which Rome had witnessed since the days of Aurelian.

But neither the mind nor the body of Diocletian, who was now fifty-nine years old, was able any longer to support the unceasing anxiety and toil to which he was exposed. On his journey to Nicomedia he was attacked by an illness, from which, after protracted suffering, he scarcely escaped with life, and, even when immediate danger was past, found himself so exhausted and depressed, that he resolved to abdicate the purple. This resolution seems to have been soon formed, and it was speedily executed, for in the month of May, A.D. 305, in the hundredth year of the city where he had first assumed the purple, in the presence of the army and the people, he solemnly divested himself of his royal robes. A similar scene was enacted on the same day at Milan by his reluctant colleague, Constantius Chlorus and Galerius being now, according to the principles of the new constitution, raised to the dignity of Augusti, Flavius Severus and Maximinus Daza were created Caesars. Diocletian returned to his native Dalmatia, and passed the remaining eight years of his life near Salona in philosophic retirement, devoted to rural pleasures and the cultivation of his garden. Aurelius Victor has preserved the well-known anecdote, that when solicited at a subsequent period, by the ambitious and discontented Maximin, to resume the honours which he had voluntarily resigned, his reply was, "Would you could see the vegetables planted by my hands at Salona, you would then never think of urging such an attempt." His death took place at the age of sixty-seven. The story in the Epitome of Victor, that he put himself to death in order to escape the violence which he apprehended from Constantius and Licinius, seems to be unsupported by external evidence or internal probability.

Although little doubt can be entertained with regard to the general accuracy of the leading facts enumerated in the above outline, the greatest confusion and embarrassment prevail with regard to the more minute details of this reign and the chronological arrangement of the events. Medals afford little or no aid, the biographies of the Augustan historians end with Carinus, no contemporary record has been preserved, and those portions of Ammianus Marcellinus and Zosimus which must have been devoted to this epoch have disappeared from their works, purposely omitted or destroyed, as some have imagined, by Christian transcribers, who were determined if possible to prevent any flattering picture of their persecutor or any charity to his glories from being transmitted to posterity. Hence we are thrown chiefly upon the meagre and unsatisfactory compilations of Eutropius, the Victories, and Festus; the vague and lying hyperboles of the panegyrists, and the avowedly hostile declamations of the author of the work, De Mortibus Persecutorum [Carcellius], and other writers of the same stamp. Hence, from sources so scanty and so impure, it is extremely difficult to derive such knowledge as may enable us to form a just conception of the real character of this remarkable man.

It is certain that he revolutionized the whole political system of the empire, and introduced a scheme of government, afterwards fully carried out and perfected by Constantine, as much at variance with that pursued by his predecessors as the power exercised by his new magistracy was with the old. He differed from the authority of the constitutional magistrates of the republic. The object of this new and important change, and the means by which it was sought to attain that object, may be explained in a few words. The grand object was to protect the person of the sovereign from violence, and to insure a regular legitimate succession, thus putting an end to the rebellions and civil wars, by which the world had been torn to pieces ever since the extinction, in Nero, of the Julian blood. To accomplish what was sought, it was necessary to guard against insubordination among the people by means of two crowned Caesars residing on more exposed frontiers, against mutiny among the praetorians at home, and against the faint spark of free and independent feeling among the senate and populace of Rome. Little was to be apprehended from the soldiery at a distance, unless led on by some favourite general; hence, by placing at the head of the four great armies four commanders all directly interested in preserving the existing order of things, it was believed that one great source of danger was removed, while two of those being marked out as heirs apparent to the throne long before their actual accession, it seemed probable that on the death of the Augusti they would advance to the higher grade as a matter of course, without question or commotion, their places being supplied by two new Caesars. Jealousies might undoubtedly arise, but these were guarded against by rendering each of the four jurisdictions as distinct and absolute as possible, while it was imagined that an attempt on the part of any one member of the confederacy to render himself supreme, would certainly be checked at once by the cordial combination of the remaining three, in self-defence. It was resolved to treat the praetorians with little ceremony; but, to prevent any outbreak, which despaired might have rendered formidable, they were gradually dispersed, and then deprived of their privileges, while their former duties were discharged by the Jovian and Herulian battalions from Illyria, who were firm in their allegiance to their native princes. The degredation of Rome by the removal of the court, and the creation of four new capitals, was a death-blow to the influence of the Senate, and led quickly to the destruction of all old patriotic associations. Nor was less care and forethought bestowed on matters apparently trivial. The robe of cloth of gold, the slippers of silk dyed in purple, and embroidered with gems, the regal diadem wreathed around the brow, the titles of Lord and Master and God, the Jewels of tiara and crown with the insignia of a complicated etiquette which fenced round the imperial presence, were all attributed by short-sighted observers to the insolent pride of a Dalmatian slave intoxicated with unlooked-for prosperity, but were in reality part and parcel of a sagacious and well meditated plan, which sought to encircle the person of the sovereign with a sort of sacred and mysterious grandeur.

Passing over the military skill of Diocletian, we can scarcely refuse to acknowledge that the man who formed the scheme of restoring the Roman empire, and executed his plan within so brief a space of time, must have combined a bold and capacious intellect with singular prudence and practical dexterity. That his plans were such as a profound statesman would approve may fairly be questioned, for it needed but little knowledge of human nature to foresee, that the ingenious but complicated machine would never work with smoothness after the regulating hand of the inventor was withdrawn; and, accordingly, his death was the signal for a succession of furious struggles among the rival Caesars and Augusti, which did not terminate until the whole empire was remitted under Constantine. Still the great social change was accomplished; a new order of things was introduced which determined the relation between the sovereign and the subject, until the final downfall of the Roman sway, upon principles not before recognized in the Western world, and which to this day exercise no small influence upon the political condition of Europe.

One of the worst effects, in the first instance, of the revolution, was the vast increase of the public expenditure, caused by the necessity of supporting two imperial and two vice-regal courts upon a scale of oriental splendour, and by the magnificence policies raised the dignity or policy of the different rulers for the embellishment of their capitals or favourite residences. The amount of revenue required could be raised only by increased taxation, and we find that all classes of the community complained bitterly of the merciless exactions to which they were exposed. Yet, on the whole, Diocletian was by no means indifferent to the comfort and prosperity of his people. Various monopolies were abolished, trade was encouraged, a disposition was manifested to advance merit and to repress corruption in every department. The views entertained upon subjects connected with political economy are well illustrated by the singular edict lately discovered at Stratonicea, by Colonel Lounès. The wages of labourers and artisans, together with the maximum price, throughout the world, of all the necessaries and commodities of life. It is not possible to avoid being struck by the change wrought upon the general aspect of public affairs during the years, not many in number, which elapsed between the accession and abolition of Diocletian. He found the empire weak and shattered, threatened with immediate dissolution, from intestine discord and external violence. He left it strong and compact, at peace within, and triumphantly abroad, stretching from the Tigris to the Nile, from the shores of Holland to the Euxine. The chief feature in the character of this reign was the terrible persecution of the Christians. The conduct of the prince upon this occasion is the more remarkable, because we are at first sight unable to detect any motive which could have induced him to permit such atrocities, and one of the most marked features in his character was his earnest avoidance of harsh measures. The history of the affair seems briefly this: The pagans of the old school had formed a close alliance with the sceptical philosophers, and both perceived that the time was now arrived for a desperate struggle which must finally establish or destroy their supremacy. This faction found an organ in the relentless Galerius, stimulated partly by his own passions, but especially by the resentment of his mother, who was notorious for her devotion to some of the wildest and most revolting rites of Eastern superstition. As the health of Diocletian declined, his mind sunk in some degree under the pressure of disease, while the influence of his associate Augusta became every day more strong. At length, after repeated and most urgent representations, Galerius succeeded in extorting from his colleague—for even the most hostile accounts admit that the consent of Diocletian was given with the greatest reluctance—the first edict which, although stern and tyrannical in its ordinances, positively forbade all personal violence. But when the proclamation was torn down by an indignant believer, and when this act of contumacy was followed by a conflagration in the palace, occurring under the most suspicious circumstances, and hesitatingly ascribed by Galerius to the Christians, the emperor considered that the grand principle for which he had been so strenuously contending, the supreme majesty and inviolability of the royal person, was openly assailed, and thus was persuaded without further resistance to give his assent to those sacrilegious decrees which for years deluged the world with innocent blood. It is not improbable that the intellects of Diocletian were seriously affected, and that his malady may have amounted to absolute insanity. (Aurel. Victor, de Caes. 39, Epit. 39; Zonar. xii. 31.) [W. COIN OF DIOCLETIANUS.

DIOC/CRUS or DIO/SCORUS (Διοκτέσσας or Διοκτέσηας), a commentator on the orations of Demosthenes. (Ulpian, ad Dom. Phil. iv. inf.) [L. S.] DIO/CORUS (Διοκτήσηας), historical. 1. A commander of Amphipolis in the reign of king Persius of Macedonia. When the report of the king's defeat at Pellae reached Amphipolis, and Diodorus feared lest the 2000 Thracians who were stationed as garrison at Amphipolis should revolt and plunder the place, he induced them by a cunning stratagem to leave the town and go to Emathia, where they might obtain rich plunder. After they had left the town, and crossed the river Strymon, he closed the gates, and Persius soon after took refuge there. (Liv. lxi. 44.) 2. The tutor of Demetrius. When Demetrius was kept in captivity at Rome, Diodorus came to him from Syria, and persuaded him that he would be received with open arms by the people of Syria if he would but escape and make his appearance among them. Demetrius readily listened to him, and sent him to Syria to prepare everything and to explore the disposition of the people. (Polyb. xxii. 20, 21.) [L. S.] DIO/CORUS (Διοκτήσηας), literary. 1. Of ADAM/PTYIUM, a rhetorician and Academic philosopher. He lived at the time of Mithridates, under whom the doctrines of Diodorus we possess only fragmentary information, and not even the titles of his works. It is certain that it was he who fully developed the dialectic art of the Megarics, which so frequently degenerated into mere shallow sophistry. (Cic. Acad. ii. 24, 47.)

He seems to have been much occupied with the theory of proof and of hypothetical propositions. In the same manner as he rejected in logic the divisibility of the fundamental notion, he also maintained, in his physical doctrines, that space was indivisible, and consequently that motion was a thing impossible. He further denied the coming into existence and all multiplicities both in time and in space; but he considered the things that fill up space as one whole composed of an infinite number of indivisible particles. In this latter respect he approached the atomistic doctrines of Democritus and Diogenes. In regard to things possible, he maintained that only those things are possible which actually are or will be; possible was, further, with him identical with necessary; hence everything which is not going to be cannot be, and all that is, or is going to be, is necessary; so that the future is as certain and defined as the past. This theory approached the doctrine of fate maintained by the Stoics, and Chrysippus is said to have written a work, ζητω διονυσιατικα, against the views of Diodorus. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 191; Cic. de Fato, 6, 7, 9, ad Fam. ix. 4.)

He made use of the false etymology called Sorites, and is said to have invented two others of the same kind, viz. the θυμοκερασιανες and the κερατινης λγος. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 111.) Language was, with him, as with Aristotle, the result of an agreement of men among themselves. (Lersch, Sprachphilos. der Alte i. p. 42; Deycks, de Megaricorum Doctrina, p. 64, &c.)

7. Of Croton, a Pythagorean philosopher, who is otherwise unknown. (Iamblich. Viti. Pythag. 33.)

8. Of Elea, is quoted as the author of elegies by Parthenius (Erod. 13), who relates from him a story about Daphnis.

9. Of Eryx, is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 70) as the author of a work on the life and philosophy of Anaximander.

10. Surnamed Perihermes, was probably a native of Athens, and wrote on topographical and geographical subjects. He lived at the time of and after Alexander the Great; for it is clear, from some fragments of his works, that he wrote at the time when Athens had only twelve phylae, that is, previous to B.C. 308; and Athenaeus (xiii. p. 521) states, that Diodorus was acquainted with the rhetorician Anaximenes. We know only of two works of Diodorus Periegetes, viz. 1. Περι θεωρων, which is supposed to have been written by Harpocration; 2. Περι θεωρων of Byzantium, and from which a considerable number of statements are preserved in consequence. 2. Περι μυστουρων, or on monuments, (Plut. Theist. 32, comp. Thea. 36, Clem. 16, Vit. X Ovrat. p. 849; Athen. xiii. p. 691.) It is not impossible that he may also be the author of a work on Miletus (περι Μιλησιου συγγραμμα, Schol. ad Plut. Morax. p. 300; comp. Proller, Polemon, Fragm. p. 170, &c.)

11. Of Priene, is mentioned as a writer upon agriculture, but is otherwise unknown. (Varro, de R. R. i. 1; Columella, i. 1; Plin. H. N. i. 16, lib. xv. 87, &c.)

12. The Sicilian, usually called Diodorus SICULUS, was a contemporary of Caesar and Augustus. (Suid. s. v. διοδωρος; Euseb. Chron. ad annum 96.) He spent thirty years upon his work, which period probably includes the time he spent in travelling and collecting materials. As it embraced the history of all ages and countries, and thus supplied the place, as it were, of a whole library, he called it Βιβλιοθηκη, or, as Eusebius (Præp. Evang. i. 6) says, Βιβλιοθηκη ιστοριων. The time at which he wrote his history may be determined pretty accurately from internal evidence: he not only mentions Caesar's invasion of Britain and his crossing the Rhine, but also his death and apotheosis (iv. 4, iv. 19, v. 21, 25); he further states that he was in Egypt in O. 190, that is, a. e. 20; and Scaliger (Animad. ad Euseb. p. 156) has made it highly probable that Diodorus wrote his work after the year a. e. 8, when Augustus corrected the calendar and introduced the intercalation every fourth year.

The whole work of Diodorus consisted of forty books, and embraced the period from the earliest mythical ages down to the beginning of J. Caesar's Gillive war. Diodorus himself further mentions, that the work was divided into three great sections. The first, which consisted of the first six books, contains the history of the mythical times previous to the Trojan war. The first books of this section contain the myths of the countries, and the latter books of those of the Greeks. The second section consisted of eleven books, which contained the history from the Trojan war down to the death of Alexander the Great; and the third section, which contained the remaining 23 books, treated of the history from the death of Alexander down to the beginning of Caesar's Gillive war. Of this great work considerable portions are now lost. The first five books, which contain the early history of the Eastern nations, the Egyptians, Achaeopians and Greeks, are extant entire; the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth books are lost; and the remaining books of the second section of the work is complete again, and contains the history from the second Persian war, a. e. 480, down to the year a. e. 302. The remaining portion of the work is lost, with the exception of a considerable number of fragments and the Excerpta, which are preserved partly in Photius (Bibl. Cod. 244), who gives extracts from books 31, 32, 33, 36, 37, 39, and 40, and partly in the Elegy made at the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, from which they have successively been published by H. Stephens, Fulv. Ursinus, Valensis, and A. Mai. (Odiert. Notae Script. ii. p. 1, &c. p. 566, &c.)

The work of Diodorus is constructed upon the plan of annals, and the events of each year are placed by the side of one another without any internal connection. In composing his Bibliotheca, Diodorus made use, independent of his own observations, of all sources which were accessible to him; and had he exercised any criticism or judgment, or rather had he possessed any critical powers, his work might have been of inestimable value to the student of history. But Diodorus did nothing but collect that which he found in his different authorities: he thus jumbled together history, myth, polemics, legends, and fables, the latter often misunderstood or mutilated his authorities, and not seldom contradicts in one passage what he has stated in another. The absence of criticism is manifest throughout the work, which is in exact devoid of all the higher requisites of a history. But notwithstanding all these drawbacks, the extant portion of this great compilation is to us of the highest importance, on account of the great mass of materials which are there collected from a number of writers whose works have perished. Diodorus frequently mentions his authorities, and in most cases he has undoubtedly preserved the substance of their precursors, often supplanting them. His Hist. Diod., in the Comment. Societ. Gotting. vols. v. and vii., and reprinted in the Biplont edition of Diodorus, vol. i. p. xix. &c., which also contains a minute account of the plan of the history by J. N. Eyring, p. cv., &c.) The style of Diodorus is on the whole clear and lucid, but not always equal, which may be owing to the different character of the works he used or abridged. His dictum holds the middle between the archaic or refined Attic, and the vulgar Greek which was spoken in his time. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 70.)

The work of Diodorus was first published in Latin translations of separate parts, until Vinc. Oespeus published the Greek text of books 16-20, Basel, 1559, 4to., which was followed by H. Stephens' edition of books 1-5 and 11-20, with the excerpts of Photius, Paris, 1569, fol. The next important edition is that of N. Rhodomanus (Hanover, 1604, fol.), which contains a Latin translation. The great edition of P. Wesseling, with an extensive and very valuable commentary, as well as the Eclipses of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, as far as they were then known, appeared at Amsterdam, 1746, 2 vols. fol. This edition was reprinted, with some additions, at Biplont (1793, &c.) in 11 vols. 8vo. The best modern edition is that of L. Dindorf, Leipzig, 1828, 6 vols. 8vo. The new fragments discovered and published by A. Mai were edited, with many improvements, in a separate volume by L. Dindorf, Leipzig, 1828, 8vo. Wesseling's edition and the Biplont reprint of it contain 65 Latin letters attributed to Diodorus. They had first been published in Italian in Pietro Carrara's Storia di Catana, 1639, fol., and were then printed in a Latin version by Abraham Preiger in Rarmanna's Theaer. Astro. Sicilia, vol. x. and in the old edition of Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiv. p. 229, &c. The Greek original of these letters has never been seen by any one, and there can be little doubt but that these letters are a forgery made after the revival of letters. (Fabr. Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 373, &c.)

14. Of Syracuse, is mentioned by Pliny (J. N. Elench. lib. iii. and v.) among the authorities he consulted on geographical subjects.

15. Of Tarsus (Hesych. s. v. Διόδορος), a grammarian who is mentioned by Athenaeus (xi. p. 479) as the author of γυαλίστρον Ιταλαία, and of a work προς Ακρόπολιν (xi. p. 479). He appears to be the same as the Diodorus referred to in two other passages of Athenaeus (xi. p. 501, xiv. p. 642). It may also be that he is the same as the grammarian whom Suidas describes as a disciple or follower of Aristophanes of Byzantium. (Villois, Prod. 227.)

16. Sunamned TYPHOON, lived about a. d. 276, and is described by Epiphanius (de Mon. peond. 20) as a good man and of wonderful piety. He was presbyter in the village of Diodoris and a friend of bishop Archelaus. When Manes took refuge in his house, he was at first kindly received; but when Diodorus was informed, by a letter of Archelaus, of the heresies of Manes, and when he began to see through the cunning of the heretic, he had a dispute with him, in which he is said triumphantly to have refuted his errors. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 35.) A letter of Archelaus to Diodorus concerns a similar dispute and printed in Valesius's edition of Socrates, p. 200.

17. Of Tyre, a Peripatetic philosopher, a disciple and follower of Carneus, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school at Athens. He was still alive and active there in c. 110, when L. Crassus, during his quaestorship of Macedonia, visited Athens. Cicero denies to him the character of a genuine Peripatetic, because it was one of his ethical maxims, that the greatest good consisted in a combination of virtue with the absence of pain, whereby a reconciliation between the Stoics and Epicureans was attempted. (Cic. de Orat. 1. 11, Tusc. v. 39, de Fin. ii. 6, 11, iv. 18, v. 8, 25; Acad. iv. 42; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 301, ii. p. 415.)

There are some more persons of the name of Diodorus, concerning whom nothing of interest is known. See the list of them in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 578, &c. [L. S.]

DIODORUS (Διόδορος), of Sinope, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, is mentioned in an inscription (Bouchi, i. p. 354), which fixes his date at the epoch of Dithymia (c. 654–355), when he exhibited two plays entitled Νέρος and Μακρόσωμος, Aristocles being his actor. Suidas (s. v.) quotes Athenaeus as mentioning his Διοδόρις in the tenth book of the Deipnosophistai, and his Ερακαιοκρατός and Παντογραφικά in the twelfth book. The actual quotations made in our copies of Athenaeus are from the Διοδόρος (x. p. 431, c.), and a long passage from the Ερακαιοκρατία (vi. pp. 325, c. 326, b. not xii.), but of the Παντογραφικά there is no mention in Athenaeus. A play under that title is ascribed to Iktus or to Plato. There is another fragment from Diodorus in Stobaeus. (Serm. ixxii. 1.) In another passage of Stobaeus (Serm. cxxv. 6) the common reading, Διόδορος, should be retained. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Gr. i. pp. 418, 419, iii. pp. 543–546.) [P. S.]

DIODORUS ZONAS (Διοδόρος Ζωνας) and DIO of the Younger, both of Saura, and of the same family, were rhetoricians and epigrammatists. The elder was distinguished in the Mithridatic war. Strabo (xiii. pp. 637, 638) says, that he engaged in many contests on behalf of Asia, and when Mithridates invaded that province, Zonas was accused of inviting the cities to revolt from him, but was acquitted in consequence of the defence which he made. Strabo adds, that the younger Diodorus, who was his own friend, composed historical writings, lyrics, and other poems, which were written in an antique style (διοδόρου γραφὴν ἑπαξιαποίησαν). The epigrams of the Diodori, of which there are several, were included by Philip of Thessalonica in his collection, and they now form a part of the Greek Anthology. (Brunel, Anth. ii. 80, 185; Jacobs, ii. 67, 170.) There is considerable difficulty in assigning each of the epigrams to its proper author, and probably some of them belong to a third Diodorus, a grammarian of Taras, who is also mentioned by Strabo (xii. p. 676), and as it seems, by other ancient writers. (Jaccobs, xiii. 883, 884; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. pp. 300, 472, vi. pp. 363, 364.)

DIODORUS, comes and magister sermonis, one of the commissioners appointed by Theodosius the younger, in A.D. 435, to compile the Theodosian code. Theodosius originally intended that, as an historical monument for the use of the learned, there should be compiled a general code of constitutions, supplementary to the Gregorian and Hermogenian codes. These three codes taken together were intended to comprise all the general constitutions of the emperors, not such only as were in actual force, but such also as were superseded or had become obsolete. In order, however, that in case of conflict, the reader might be enabled to distinguish the more modern enactments, which was to prevail over the more ancient one, the arrangement under each subject was to be chronological, and dates were to be carefully added. From this general code, with the help of the works and opinions of jurists, was to be formed a select code, excluding every thing not in force and containing the whole body of practical law. In A.D. 429, nine commissioners were appointed, charged with the task of compiling, first, the general historical, and then, the select practical code. The nine named were Antiochus, ex-quaesator and prefect; another Antiochus, quaesitor Galatii; Theodosius, Eudocia, Eunuchus, Joanis, Comazon, Eubulus, and Apelles. This plan was not carried into execution. Theodosius changed his purpose, and contented himself with projecting a single code, which should contain imperial constitutions only, without admixture of the jus civile of the jurists, or, as an English lawyer would express it, which should exhibit a consolidation of the statute, but not of the common or unwritten law. For the changed plan sixteen commissioners were named in A.D. 435, who were directed to compile chronologically under the same title those constitutions, or parts of constitutions, which were connected in subject; and were empowered to remove what was superfluous, to add what was necessary, to change what was doubtful by substituting what was clear, and to correct what was inconsistent. The sixteen named were Antiochus, preceptorius and consularis; Eubulus, Maximinus, Spesantius, Martyrius, Alipius, Sebastamis, Appolefodorus, Theodosius, Oron, Maximus, Epigenesius, Diodorus, Procopius, Erotis, Neuterius. It will be observed that only three, (namely, Antiochus, Theodosius, and Eubulus) who belonged to the first commission were nominated upon the second. In the constitution concerning the authority of the Theodosian code, eight only of the sixteen named upon the second commission are signalized as having been actively employed in the composition of the code. These eight are Antiochus, Maximinus, Martyrius, Spesantius, Appolefodorus, Theodosius, Epigenesius, and Procopius. (Cod. Theod. l, tit. 1, ch. 5, ib. a. 6, § 2; Const. de Theod. in cod. expl. § 7.)

[1. T. G.]

DIODORUS (Αὐθόρος), a Greek physician, who must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Pliny. (H. N. xxix. 39.) He may perhaps be the same person who is said by Galen (de Med. Misc. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 142) to have belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, and whose medical formule he several times quotes. (De Compos. Medicae, sec. Locc, v. 3, vol. xii. p. 834; x. 3, vol. xii. p. 361.)

[2. W. A. G.]

DIODORUS, artists. 1. A silversmith, on whose silver image of Elopos satiricus there is an epigram by Plato in the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Plut. iv. 12, 248.) The idea contained in the similar work of STRATONICUS.

2. A worthless painter, who is ridiculed in an epigram. (Anth. Pal. xi. 213.)

[DIO.]

DIO DORUS (Αὐθόρος), the son of Eucrates (possibly, but not probably, the slave-seller of that name who is said to have preceded Cleon in influence with the Athenians), is only known as the orator who in the two discussions on the punishment to be inflicted on Mytilene (c. 427), took the most prolix part against Cleon's sanctuary in the epigram by Plato in the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Plut. iv. 41.) The substance of his speech on the second day we may suppose ourselves to have in the language of Thucydides (iii. 42—48). The expressions of his opponent lead us to take him for one of the rising class of professional orators, the earliest produce of the labours of the Sophists. If so, he is a singularly favourable specimen. Of his eloquence we cannot judge; but if, in other points, Thucydides represents him fairly, he certainly on this occasion displayed the ingenuity of the Sophists, the tact of the practised debater, and soundness of view of the statesman, in the service of a cause that deserved and needed them all. He emotively shifts the argument from the justice to the policy of the measure. Eutichus of Atilia was already excited; the people only wished a justification for indulging them. This he finds them in the certainty that revolt at any risk would be ventured; severities could not check, and would surely make it more obstinately persevered in; and in the exceeding inexpediency of confounding, by indiscriminate slaughter, their friends, the democratic party, with those who would in any case be their enemies,—a suggestion probably, at that time, far from obvious. To his skill we must ascribe the revocation of the preceding day's vote in Cleon's favour, and the preservation of Mytilene from massacre, and Athens from great crime. (Thuc. iv. 41.)

DIO DORUS (Αὐθόρος) I. King of Bactria, and founder of the Bactrian monarchy, which continued to subsist under a Greek dynasty for above one hundred and fifty years. This prince as well as his successor is called by Justin, Theodorus, but the form Diodorus, which occurs in Strabo (xi. p. 515) seems to have been that used by Trogus Pompeius (Pro. Trog. Pompeii, lib. xlii.), is confirmed by the evidence of an unique gold coin now in the museum at Paris. (See Wilson, Ariana, p. 219.)

Both the period and circumstances of the establishment of his power in Bactria are very uncertain. It seems clear, however, that he was at first satrap or governor of that province, under the Syrian monarch, and that he took advantage of his sovereign's being engaged in wars in distant parts of his dominions to declare himself independent. The remote and secluded position of his territories, and the revolt of the Parthians under Araxes, almost immediately afterwards, appear to have prevented any attempt on the part of the Syrian monarch to reduce him again to subjection. At a later period, when Seleucus Callinicus undertook his expedition against Parthia, he appears to have entered into alliance with Diodotus, and may perhaps have confirmed him in the possession of his sovereignty, to secure his co-operation against Tiridates. Diodotus, however, died apparently just about this time. (Justin. xii. 4; Strab. xi. p. 515; compare Wilson's Arrian. pp. 215-219; Droysen's Hellenismus, ii. pp. 325, 412, 760; Raoul Rotchette Journ. des Savans, Oct. 1835.) With regard to the date of the revolt of Diodotus, it appears from Strabo and Justin to have proceeded from his sympathies with Parthia. In this he may therefore be referred with much probability to the latter part of the reign of Antiochus II. in Syria. B.C. 261-248. [See Araxes, p. 354, n.] The date usually received is 256 B.C., but any such precise determination rests only on mere conjecture. Concerning the Bactrian kings in general see Beyer, Historia Regni Graecorum Bactriani, 4to. Petrop. 1733; Lassen, Zur Geschichte der Griechischen und Indo-Süchtlichen Könige in Bactriani, 8vo. Bonn, 1838; Wilson's Ariana Antiqua, 4to. Lond. 1841. [E. H. B.]

DIOGENES II., the son and successor of the preceding, is called by Justin Theodotus, as well as his father. According to that author, he abandoned his father's policy, and concluded a treaty with the king of Parthia, Tiridates, by which he joined him against Seleucus Callinicus. (Justin. xii. 4.) The total defeat of the Syrian king probably secured the independence of Bactria, as well as that of Parthia; but we know nothing more of the history of Diodotus. The commencement of his reign may be dated somewhere about 240 B.C. (Wilson's Ariana, p. 217.) [E. H. B.]

DIOGENES (Διόδοτος), literary. 1. Of Erythrai, was, according to Athenaeus (x. p. 434), the author of ἄρματης Ἀλκεδόσου, from which we may infer that he was a contemporary of Alexander the Great.

2. A Greek grammarian, who, according to Diogenes Laertius (ix. 15), commented on the writings of Heracleitus.

3. A PERIPTERUS philosopher, of Sidon, is mentioned only by Strabo (xvi. p. 757).

4. Surnamed PETRONIUS, was the author of Anthologies and other works. He is often referred to by Pliny, and is the same as the physician mentioned below.

5. A Stoic philosopher, who lived for many years at Rome in the house of Cicero, who had known him from his childhood, and who was educated, trained, and exercised his intellectual powers, especially in dialectics. In his later years, Diodotus became blind, but he nevertheless continued to occupy himself with literary pursuits and with teaching geometry. He died in Cicero's house, in B.C. 50, and left to his friend a property of about 100,000 sesterces. (Cic. ad. Fam. ix. 4, xii. 16, de Nat. Deor. i. 3, Brut. 90, Acad. ii. 36, Tus. v. 39, ad Att. ii. 20.) [L. S.]

DIOGENES (Διόδωρος), artists. 1. A statuary, to whom Strabo (iv. p. 396, e.) ascribes the Rhassanian Nemesis of Agrasias. There is no other mention of him.

2. A sculptor of Nicomedia, the son of Boitius, made, with his brother Magon, a statue of Hercules (Vitruv. De Arch. Works, vi. p. 38.) [P. S.] DIOGENES (Διόδωρος), a Greek physician, who is called by Pliny (H. N. xx. 32) Petronius Diodotus, though it is not unlikely that (as Fabricius conjectures) we should read Petronius et Diodotus, as Petronius is distinguished from Diodotus by Dioscorides (De Mat. Med. proef. p. 2), and S. Ephraemi. (Avic. Haeres. i. 1, 3, p. 5, ed. Colon. 1682.) He must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ, and wrote a work on botany. [W. A. G.]

DIOGAS (Διόγας), an introlaeta (see Diet. of Ant.), who lived in the first or second century after Christ, is mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. eccle. vii. 41, sec. Loco, vol. v. p. 104) as having used a medicine of Antonius Musa. [W. A. G.]

DIOGENES (Διόγενες), historical. 1. An ACRANIANIAN. When Popilius in B.C. 170 went as ambassador to the Actoliana, and several statesmen were of opinion that Roman garrisons should be stationed in Acarnania, Diogenes opposed their advice, and succeeded in inducing Popilius not to send any soldiers into Acarnania. (Polyb. xxviii. 3.)

2. A son of Archaeasios, the general of Mithridates, who fell in the battle of Chaeaemna, which his father lost against Sulla. (Appian, Mithrid. 49.)

3. A CARTHAGINIAN, who succeeded Hasdrubal in the command of a place called Nepetius, in Africa, where he was attacked by Scipio Africanus the Younger, who however left Iscaenus to continue the attack, while he himself marched against Carthage. However, Scipio soon returned, and after a siege of twenty-two days, the place was taken: 70,000 persons are said to have been killed on that spot, and this victory of Scipio was the first great step towards the taking of Carthage, which had been supplied with provisions from Nepetius. The capture of the place, moreover, broke the courage of the Africans, who still espoused the cause of Carthage. (Appian, Punic. 126.)

4. A person sent by Orobereus, together with Timothetus, as ambassador to Rome in B.C. 161, to carry to Rome a golden crown, and to renew the friendship and alliance with the Romans. The principal object of the ambassadors, however, was to support the accusation which was brought against Ariarathes; and Diogenes and his eud敕ctor, Milites, succeeded in their plan, and they and their friends gained the victory, as there was no one to undertake the defence of Ariarathes. (Polyb. xxvii. 20.)

5. A sect of SUSA in the reign of Antiochus the Great. During the rebellion of Melece he defended the arcus of Susa while the city itself was taken by the rebel. Mole ceased pushing his conquest further, and leaving a besieging corps behind him, he returned to Seleucia. When the insurrection was at length put down by Antiochus, Diogenes obtained the command of the military forces DIOGENES. There were two other Cynic philosophers of this name, one in the reign of Vespasian (Dion Cass. xvi. 15.), and the other in the reign of Julian, who praises him in one of his Epistles (35, p.410).

5. Of CYRUS. [DIOGENIANUS-]

6. The author of a work on PERSE, of which the first book is quoted by Clemens of Alexandria. (Proor. p. 19.) It is uncertain whether he is the same as the Diogenes who is mentioned by Parthenius (Erat. 6) as the author of a work on Pallene.

7. LACTANTIUS. See below.

8. SOLONIUS. See below.

9. A PHIENICIAN, a Peripatetic philosopher, who lived in the time of Simplicius. (Stud. et c. praebet.) Whether he is the same as Diogenes of Abila in Phoenicia, whom Suidas and Stephanus Byzantius (s. e. Αβίλα) call a distinguished sophist, cannot be ascertained.

10. A PHRYGIAN, is described as an atheist, but is otherwise unknown. (Aelian, V. H. ii. 31; comp. Bostath. ad Hom. Od. iii. 381.)

11. Of PYTHAEMUS in Egypt, a Stoic philosopher, who made ethics the basis of his philosophy. (Diog. Laert. vii. 41.)

12. Of PTOLEMAIS in Egypt, a Greek grammarian, who used to hold disputations at Rhodes every seventh day. Tiberius once wanted to hear him; but as it was not the usual day for disputing, the grammarian bade him come again on the seventh day. Afterwards Diogenes came to Rome, and when he asked permission to pay his homage, the emperor did not admit him, but requested him to come again after the lapse of seven years. (Suet. Tiber. 32.)

13. Of SELENEIA, an Epicurean philosopher, who has frequently been confounded with Diogenes the Babylonian, who was likewise a native of Seleucia. He lived at the court of Syria, and on terms of intimacy with king Alexander, the suppositional son of Antiochus Epiphanes. But he was put to death soon after the accession of Antiochus Theos, in B. C. 142. (Athen. v. p. 211.)

14. Of SERYN, is mentioned by Diogenes Laertius (viii. 61) as the author of a work on Peloponnesus.

15. Of SVMNA, an Elyctian philosopher, who was a disciple of Menodorus and Protagoras. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 301.)

16. Of TARKOS, an Epicurean philosopher, who is described by Strabo (xiv. p. 675) as a person clever in composing extempore tragedies. He was the author of several worls, which, however, are lost. Among them are mentioned: 1, ΕΙΣΑΓΩΓΗ, which was probably a collection of essays or dissertations on philosophical subjects. (Diog. Laert. x. 26, with Menage's note.) 2. An abridgement of the Ethics of Epicurus (ΚΤΙΣΜΑΤΩΝ ΤΩΝ ΕΙΣΑΓΩΓΩΝ ΦΙΛΩΝ ΣΥΡΜΩΝ), of which Diogenes Laertius (x. 118) quotes the 12th book. 3. ΠΕΙΡΑΜΑΤΩΝ ΕΙΣΑΓΩΓΗ, that is, onatical problems, which he endeavoured to solve, and which seem to have had especial reference to the Homerice poems. (Diog. Laert. vi. 81.) Further particulars are not known about him, though Cassiodorus (de Vita. Episc. ii. 2) represents him as a disciple of Demetrius the Laconian, an unknown. There are several more literary persons of the name of Diogenes, concerning whom nothing is known. A list of them is given by Thery, i. c. p. 97, &c.

DIOGENES.

DIOGENES APOLLONIATES (Διογένης ἡ Ἀπολλονίατη), an eminent natural philosopher, who lived in the fifth century B.C. He was a native of Apollonia in Crete, his father’s name was Apollonithus, and he was a pupil of Anaximenes. Nothing is known of the events of his life, except that he was once at Athens, and there got into trouble from some unknown cause, which is conjectured to have been the supposition that his philosophical opinions were dangerous to the religion of the state. (Diog. Laert. ix. § 47.) He wrote a work in the Ionic dialect, entitled Περὶ φύσεως, "On Nature," which consisted of at least two books, and in which he appears to have treated of physical science in the largest sense of the words. Of this work only a few short fragments remain, preserved by Aristotle, Diogenes Laertius, and Simplicius. The longest of these is that which is inserted by Aristotle in the third book of his History of Animals, and which contains an interesting description of the origin and distribution of the veins. The following is the account of his philosophical opinions given by Diogenes Laertius:—He maintained that air was the primal element of all things; that there was an infinite number of worlds, and an infinite void; that air, densified and rarified, produced the different members of the universe; that nothing was produced from nothing; or from itself, and that the whole universe was a round, supported in the middle, and had received its shape from the whirling round of the warm vapours, and its concetration and hardening from cold. The last paragraph, which is extremely obscure in the original, has been translated according to Panzerbeiter’s explanation, not as being entirely satisfactory, but as being the best that has hitherto been proposed. Diogenes also imputed to air an intellectual energy, though without recognizing any distinction between mind and matter. The fragments of Diogenes have been collected and published, with those of Anaxagoras, by Schorn, Bonn, 1829, 8vo; and alone by Panzerbeiter, Lips. 1830, 8vo, with a copious dissertation on his philosophy. Further information concerning him is found in Harvard’s edition of Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. ii.; Bayle’s Dict. Hist. et Crit.; Schleiermacher, in the Memoirs of the Berlin Academy for 1815; and in the different Histories of Philosophy. Some notices of his date by Mr. Clinton are given in an article "On the Early Ionic Philosophers," in the first volume of the Philological Museum. [W. A. G.]

DIOGENES (Διογένης), a Cynic of Sinope in Pontus, born about B.C. 412. His father was a banker named Icadas or Icetas, who was convicted of some swindling transaction, in consequence of which Diogenes quitted Sinope and went to Athens. His youth is said to have been spent in dissolute extravagance; but at Athens his attention was arrested by the character of Antisthenes, who at first drove him away, as he did all others who offered themselves as his pupils. [ANTISTHENES.] Diogenes, however, could not be prevented from attending him even by blows, but told him that he would find no stick hard enough to keep him away. Antisthenes at last relented, and his pupil soon plunged into the most frantic excesses of austerity and moroseness, and into practices not unlike those of the modern Trappists, or Indian gymnosophists. In summer he used to roll in hot sand, and in winter to embrace statues covered with snow; he wore coarse clothing, lived on the plainest food, and sometimes on raw meat (comp. Julius, Oracl. vi.), slept in porches or in the street, and finally, according to the common story, took up his residence in a tub belonging to the Metromus, or temple of the Mother of the Gods. The truth of this latter tale has, however, been reasonably disputed. The chief direct authorities for it are Seneca (Ep. 99), Lucian (Quomodo Conser. Hist. ii. p. 364), Diogenes Laertius (vi. 23), and the incidental allusion to it in Juvenal (xiv. 308, &c.), who says, Alexander testa vixit in ille magna habitationem, and Doth nudi non ardent Cyński. Besides these, Aristophanes (Epid. 769), speaks of the Athenian poor as living, during the stress of the Peloponnesian war, in cellars, tubs (σάπαρες), and similar dwellings. To these arguments is added the fact, that Plutarch, Arrian, Cicero, and Valerius Maximus, though they speak of Diogenes basking in the sun, do not allude at all to the tub; but more particularly that Epeleutus (ap. Arrian. iii. 24), in giving a long and careful account of his mode of life, says nothing about it. The great combatants on this subject in modern times are, against the tbh, Heumann (Act. Philos. vol. ii. p. 58), and for it, Hase, whose dissertation de Dorderti Habitatione Diogenis Cynici, was published by his rival. (Pazcv. vol. i. lib. iv. p. 526.) The story of the tub goes on to say that the Athenians voted to sacrifice the Loutrophorion when it was broken by a mischievousurchin. Lucian, in telling this anecdote, appeals to certain spurious epistles, falsely attributed to Diogenes. In spite of his strange eccentricities, Diogenes appears to have been much respected at Athens, and to have been privileged to rebuke anything of which he disapproved with the utmost possible licence of expression. He seems to have ridiculed and despised all intellectual pursuits which did not directly and obviously tend to some immediate practical good. He abused literary men for reading about the evils of Ulysses, and neglecting their own; musicians for stringing the lyre harmoniously while they left their minds discordant; men of science for troubling themselves with the moon and stars, while they neglected what lay immediately before them; creators for learning to say what was right, but not to practice it. Various sarcastic sayings of the same kind are handed down as his, generally shewing that unwise contempt for the common opinions and pursuits of men, which is so unlikely to reform them.

The removal of Diogenes from Athens was the result of a voyage to Aegina, in the course of which the ship was taken by pirates, and Diogenes carried to Crete to be sold as a slave. Here when he was asked what business he understood, he answered, "How to command men," and he begged to be sold to some one who needed a ruler. Such a purchaser was found in the person of Xenidias of Corinth, over whom he acquired such unbounded influence, that he soon received from him his freedom, was entrusted with the care of his children, and passed his old age in his house. During his residence among them he celebrated an interview with Alexander the Great is said to have taken place. The conversation between them is reported to have begun by the king's saying, "I am Alexander the Great," to which the philosopher replied, "And I am Diogenes the Cynic." Alexander then asked whether he could oblige him in any way, and received no answer except "Yes, you can stand out of the sunshine." Considering, however, that this must have happened soon after Alexander's accession, and before his Persian expedition, he could not have called himself the Great, which title was not conferred on him till he had gained his Eastern victories, after which he never returned to Greece. These considerations, with others, are sufficient to banish this anecdote, together with that of the tub, from the domain of history; and, considering what rich materials to perverseness and ridicule a person as Diogenes must have afforded for amusing stories, we need not wonder if a few have come down to us of somewhat doubtful genuineness. We are told, however, that Alexander admired Diogenes so much that he said, "If I were not Alexander, I should wish to be Diogenes." (Plut. Alex. c. 14.) Some say, that after Diogenes became a resident at Corinth, he still spent every winter at Athens, and is also accused of various scandalous offences, but of these there is no proof; and the whole bearing of tradition about him shews that, though a strange fanatic, he was a man of great excellence of life, and probably of real kindness, since Xenocrates compared his arrival to the entrance of a good genius into his house.

With regard to the philosophy of Diogenes there is little to say, as he was utterly without any scientific object whatever. His system, if it deserve the name, was purely practical, and consisted merely in teaching men to dispense with the simplest and most necessary wants (Diog. Laërt. vi. 70); and his whole style of teaching was a kind of caricature upon that of Socrates, whom he imitated in imparting instruction to persons whom he casually met, and with a still more supreme contempt for time, place, and circumstances. Hence he was sometimes called "the mad Socrates." He did not commit his opinions to writing, and therefore those attributed to him cannot be certainly relied on. The most peculiar, if correctly stated, was that all minds are air, exactly alike, and composed of similar particles, but that in the irrational animals and in infants, they are hindered from properly developing themselves by the arrangement and various humours of their bodies. (Plut. Plac. P. Hlit. v. 20.) This resembles the Ionic doctrine, and has been referred to Brucker (Hist. Crit. Phil. ii. 2. 1. § 21) to Diogenes of Apollonia. The statement in Suidas, that Diogenes was once called Cleon, is probably a false reading for Klesus. He died at the age of nearly ninety, b. c. 323, in the same year that Epictetus came to Athens to circulate opinions the exact opposite to his. It was also the year of Alexander's death, and as Plutarch tells us (Symp. vi. 717), both died on the same day. If so, this was probably the 6th of Thargelion. (Clinton, F. H. vol. ii.; Ritter, Gesch. der Philosophie, vii. 1. 4.)

DIOGENES LAËRTIUS (Διογένης ο Λαέρτιος or Λαέρτιος, sometimes also Λαέρτιος Διογένης), the author of a sort of history of philosophy, which alone has brought his name down to posterity. The surname, Laërtius, was derived according to some from the Roman family which bore the cognomen Laërtius, and one of the members of which is supposed to have been the patron of an ancestor of Diogenes. But it is more probable that he received it from the town of Laërite in Cilicia, which seems to have been his native place. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. v. p. 564, note.) A modern critic (Ranko, de Lex. Hesych. p. 59, &c. 61, &c.) supposes that his real name was Diogenianus, and that he was the same as the Diogenianus of Cyprius, who is mentioned by Suidas. This supposition is founded on a passage of Tzetzes, (Chil. iii. 61), in which Diogenes Laërtius is mentioned under the name of Diogenianus. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 265, ed. Westermann.) We have no information whatever respecting his life, his studies, or his age. Plutarch, Sextus Empiricus and Sallustius are the latest writers who quote, and he accordingly seems to have lived towards the close of the second century after Christ. Others, however, assign to him a still later date, and place him in the time of Alexander Severus and his successors, or even as late as Constantine. His work consists of ten books (φιλοσοφοι βιοι, in Phot. Bibl. Cod. cxxi; φιλοσοφοι λεγεινα in Steph. Byz., σωματων Βιοι in Basutal) and is called in MSS. by the long title of περι βιων, διομαχων και εφαινομενων των εν φιλοσοφια εκδηκομενων. According to some allusions which occur in it, he wrote it for a lady (P. L. x. 19), who occupied herself with philosophy, especially with Epicurus. According to some this lady was Arria, the philosophical friend of Galen (Ther. ad Pion. 8), and according to others Julia Domna, the wife of the Emperor Severus. (Menag. T. ad Procop. p. 1; Th. Reinsius, Var. Lect. ii. 12.) The dedication, however, and the proemium are lost, so that nothing can be said with certainty.

The plan of the work is as follows: He begins with an introduction concerning the origin and the earliest history of philosophy, in which he refutes the opinion of those who did not seek for the first beginnings of philosophy in Greece itself, but among the barbarians. He then divides the philosophy of the Greeks into the Ironic—which commences with Anaximander and ends with Cleitomachus, Chrysippos, and Theophrastus—and the Italian, which was founded by Pythagoras, and ends with Epicurus. He reckons the Socratic school, with its various ramifications, as a part of the Ionic philosophy, of which he treats in the first seven books. The Eleatics, with Henaeleus and the Sceptics, are included in the Italian philosophy, which occupies the eighth and ninth books. Epicurus and his philosophy, lastly, are treated of in the tenth book with particular minuteness, which has led some writers to the belief that Diogenes himself was an Epicurean. Considering the loss of all the numerous and comprehensive works of the ancients, in which the history of philosophers and of philosophy was treated of either as a whole or in separate portions, and a great number of which Diogenes himself had before him, the compilation of Diogenes is of inestimable value to us as a source of information concerning the history of Greek philosophy. About forty writers on the lives and doctrines of the Greek philosophers are mentioned in his work, and in all two hundred and eleven authors are cited whose works he made use of. His work has for a long time been the foundation of most modern histories of ancient philosophy; and the works of Brucker and Stanley, as far as the early history of philosophy is concerned, are little more than translations, and sometimes amplifications, of Diogenes Laërtius. The work of Diogenes contains a rich store of living features, which serve to illustrate the private life of the Greeks, and a considerable number of fragments of works which are lost. Montaigne (Essais, ii. 10) therefore justly wished, that we had a dozen Leãrtis, or that his work were more complete and better arranged. One must indeed confess, that he made bad use of the enormous quantity of materials which he had at his command in writing his work, and that he was unequal to the task. But it is a heritage for Greek philosophy. His work is in reality nothing but a compilation of the most heterogeneous, and often directly contradictory, accounts, put together without plan, criticism, or connexion. Even some early scholars, such as H. Stephens, considered these biographies of the philosophers to be anything but worthy of the philosophers. His object evidently was to furnish a book which was to amuse its readers by piquant anecdotes, for he had no conception of the value and dignity of philosophy, or of the greatness of the men whose lives he described. The traces of carelessness and mistakes are very numerous; much in the work is confused, and there is much also that is quite absurd; and as far as philosophy itself is concerned, Diogenes very frequently did not know what he was talking about, when he abridged the theories of the philosophers.

The love of scandal and anecdotes, which had arisen from petty views of men and things, at a time when all political freedom was gone, and among a people which had become demoralized, had crept into literature also, and such compilations as those of Philozenon Pindarion, Polesmaeus Chennus, Atheneus, Aelian, and Diogenes Laertius display this taste of a decaying literature. All the defects of such a period, however, are so glaring in the work of Diogenes, that in order to render the common sense of the reader applicable to the hypothesis, that the present work is a mutilated abridgment of the original production of Diogenes. (J. G. Schneider in F. A. Wolff's Lit. Anhal. iii. p. 297.) Guenterus Bureus, who lived at the close of the 18th century, wrote a work "De Vita et Moribus Philosophorum," in which he principally used Diogenes. Now Bureus makes many statements, and quotes sayings of the philosophers, which seem to be derived from no other sources than Diogenes, and yet are not to be found in our present text. Bureus, moreover, gives us several valuable various readings, a better order and plan, and several accounts which in his work are minute and complete, but which are abridged in Diogenes in a manner which renders them unintelligible. From these circumstances Schneider infers, that Bureus had a more complete copy of Diogenes. But the hope of discovering a more complete MS. has not been realized as yet.

The work of Diogenes became first known in western Europe through a Latin translation made by Ambrosius, a pupil of Chrysoloras, which, however, is rather a free paraphrase than a translation. It was printed after Ambrosius's death. (Rome, before a.d. 1475; reprinted Venice, 1475; Brixen, 1405; Venice, 1493; and Antwerp, 1566.) Of the Greek text only some portions were then printed in the editions of Aristotle, Theophrastus, Plato, and Xenophon. The first complete edition is that of Basel, 1533, 4to, ap. Frobenium. It was followed by that of H. Stephens, with notes, which, however, extend only to the ninth book, Paris, 1570, and of Isaac Casaubon, with notes, 1594. Stephens's edition, with the addition of Hesychius Milesius, de Vita Illustr. Platon. appeared again at Colon. Allobrog. 1515. Then fol-loved the editions of Th. Aldobrandini (Rome, 1594, fol.), corrected by a collation of new MSS., and of J. Pearson with a new Latin translation (London, 1694, 3v.), which contains the valuable commentary of Menage, and the notes of the earlier commentators. All these editions were surpassed in scope by a History of Athens (London, 1692, 2 vols.4to.), but the text is here treated carelessly, and altered by conjectures. This edition was badly reprinted in the editions of Longinus (1739 and 1759), in which only the preface of Longinus is of value. The best modern edition is that of H. G. Hubner, Leipzig, 2 vols. 8vo. 1828—1831. The text is here greatly improved, and accompanied by short critical notes. In 1831, the commentaries of Menage, Casaubon, and others, were printed in 2 vols. 8vo, uniformly with Hubner's edition. (Comp. F. Gessendi, Animad. in 6 libros Diog. Laert., Lugdun. 1649, 5 vols. 3rd edition, Lugdun. 1675; I. Bossius, Commentationes Leontianae, Rome, 1788, 4to; S. Batier, Observ. in Diog. Laert. in the Mus. Helvet. xv. p. 32, &c.; Fab. Bibl. Graec. v. p. 564.)

Diogenes seems to have taken the lists of the writings of his philosophers from Hermippus and Alexandrian authors. (Stahr, Aristot. ii. 68; Brandis, in the Rhein. Mus. i. 3, p. 249; Trendelenburg, ad Aristot. de Anim. p. 123.) Besides the work on Greek philosophers, Diogenes Laërtius also composed other works, to which he himself (ii. 65) refers with the words ẽς ἐστὶν ἀλλὰ τινὰ σημεία. The epigrams, many of which are interspersed in his biographies, and with reference to which Tzetzes (Chl. iii. 61) calls him an epigrammatic poet, are arranged separately, and divided into several books. (Diog. Laërt. i. 39, 63, where the first book is quoted.) It bore the title ἡ σπαργάδα, but, unfortunately, these poetical attempts, so far as they are extant, shew the same deficiencies as the history of philosophy, and the vanity with which he quotes them, does not give us a favourable notion of his taste. (F. H. Klippel, de Diogenes Laërtius Vita, Script. auct. autore init. Göttingen, 1631, 4to.) [A. S.]

DIOGENES ÖNO'MAUS, a tragic poet, who is said to have begun to exhibit at Athens in a. c. 404. Of his tragedies only a few titles remain, namely, Θησεύς, Ἀρχαῖος, Ἐλευ, Ἡρακλής, Μήδεια, Οἰκείους, Χριστιάνος, Ξενόπουλος; and it is remarkable that all of these, except the last, are ascribed by Diogenes Laërtius to Diogenes the Cynic. (vi. 80, or 73.) Others ascribe them to Philiscus of Aegina, a friend of Diogenes the Cynic (Menag., ad Disq. Laert. l. e.), and others to Pasiphaea. Melanthius in Platarch (de Aud. Post. 4, p. 41, d.) complains of the obscurity of a certain Diogenes. Aelian (V. H. iii. 30, N. vi. 1) mentions a tragic poet Diogenes, who seems, however, to be a different person from either Diogenes the Cynic or Diogenes Oenomaeus. (Suid. s..v.; Ath. xiv. p. 636, &c.; Fab. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 283.)

DIOGENES (Διογένης), a Greek physician who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Celsius. (De Med. v. 19, 27, pp. 90, 104.) Some of his medical formulas are preserved by Celsius (l.c.), Galen (de Conspons. Medic. soc. Locou. iii. 8, vol. ii. p. 636; ix. 7, vol. xiii. p. 313), and Alêtius (i. 3, 109, p. 135). He is probably not the same person with any of the other individuals of this name. [W. A. G.]
DIOGENES, artists. 1. A painter of some note, who lived in the time of Demosthenes Poliocetes. (Plin. xxv. 11, s. 40. § 42.)
2. Of Athens, a sculptor, who decorated the Pantheon of Agrippa with some Caryatids, which were greatly admired, and with statues in the pediment, which were no less admirable, but which were not so well seen, on account of their position.

It is very difficult to determine in what position the Caryatids stood. Pliny says, "in columnis," (Plin. xxxvi. 5, s. 4, § 11.)

DIOGENIANUS (Διόγενιανος), a grammarian of Cyzicus, who is also called Diogenes (Suid. s. v. Διόγενης), whence some have ventured upon the conjecture, that he is the same person as Diogenes Leukides, which seems to be supported by the fact, that Tzetzes (Chil. iii. 61) calls the latter Diogenianus; but all is uncertain and mere conjecture. Diogenianus of Cyzicus is called by Suidas the author of works on the seven islands of his native country, on the alphabet, on poetry, and other subjects. It cannot be determined whether the Diogenianus mentioned by Phutarch (Sympogos.
vi. 1), or the one from whom Eustathus (Proep.
Eathan. iv. 3; comp. Tholociet. Thesp. x. p. 130) quotes a fragment on the facility of vowels, is the same as the grammarian of Cyzicus or not. (Bern-hardy, ad Suid. i. p. 1378.)

DIOGENIANUS (Διόγενιανος or Διόγενης) of Heraclea on the Pontus, a distinguished grammanian, who flourished in the reign of Hadrian.
Suidas enumerates the following works of his:
1. Αἴτεις παντοτικὰ κατὰ στοιχεῖα, in five books,
being an abridgement of the Lexicon of Pamphilus.

[PAMPHILUS.] 2. An Anthology of epigrams, τῶν Συμφωνίων ἐπηγγειμένων καθολογίας; and several geographical works. Suidas is not certain whether he was a native of the Pontic Heraclea, or whether he was not the same person as the physician Diogenianus of Heraclea Alcane in Cera.
Nothing is known of the contents or arrangement of his Anthology. His Lexicon seems to have been much used by Suidas and Hesychius; and indeed some suppose the Lexicon of Hesychius to have been almost entirely taken from that of Diogenianus. A portion of it is still extant, containing a collection of proverbs, under the title Παράγοντε διαθέσεις εκ τῶν Διόγενους συναγωγῆς.
The work is in alphabetical order, and contains 775 proverbs. It was first printed by Schottus, with the proverbs of Zenobius and Suidas, in his παρα-γοντικόν Εὐλογίας, Antv. 1612, 4to. Better editions have been published by Gaisford, in his Parallel-ographia Graeca, Oxon. 1836, and by Lutsch and Schmidt, in their Parallelische Græcisch. There are passages in this work, which, unless they are interpolations, would point to a later date than Lutsch and Schmidt. Proef. p. xxvii.)

[DIOGENES.]

DIOGENETUS (Διογένης), 1. Ailam of Ato-chus the Great, was commissioned, in a. c. 222, to convey to Seleucia, on the Tigris, Laodicee, the intended wife of Antiochus and daughter of Mithricrates IV., king of Pontus. (Polyb. v. 43; comp.
Clint. F. H. iii. pp. 315, 424.) He commanded the fleet of Antiochus in his war with Ptolemy IV.
(Philopator) for the possession of Coele-Syria, and did him good and effectual service. (Polyb. v. 59 60, 62, 65–70.)
2. A general of the Elymrian forces which aided Miletus in a war with the Naxians. Being entrusted with the command of a fort for the annoyance of Naxos, he fell in love with Polycrate, a Naxian prisoner, and married her. Through her influence the Naxians became masters of the fort in question.
At the capture of it she saved her husband's life, but died herself of joy at the honours heaped on her by her countrymen. There are other editions of the story, varying slightly in the details. (Plut. de Mul. Vict. s. v. Polycrat.) Polyain. viii. 36; Purthen. Enol. 9.)

3. A man who measured distances in his marches for Alexander the Great, and wrote a work on the subject. He is mentioned by Pliny in conjunction with Bactron. (Plin. H. N. vi. 17.)

DIOGENETUS, artists. 1. An engineer, who aided the Rhodians in their resistance to Demetrius Poliocrates. (Vitr. x. 21, or 16. § 3, Schnieder.)
2. A painter, who instructed the emperor M.
Antonius in his art. (Capitolin. Auton. 4, and Salmacis's note.)

DIOMEDES (Διόμηδης), a daughter of Phorbas of Lemnos, was beloved by Achilles. (Hom. H.
ix. 605 ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 896, and Dict. Cret.
i. 19, where her name appears in the poetical form of Διομηδης.) There are three other mythical beings of this name. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3 ; Hy-gin. Fid. 97 ; comp. Diom.)

DIOMEDES (Διόμηδης). 1. A son of Tydeus and Deipyle, the husband of Aegialea, and the successor of Adrastus in the kingdom of Argos, though he was descended from an Aetolian family.
(Apollod. i. 8. § 5, &c.) The Homerian tradition about him is as follows:—His father Tydeus fell in the expedition against Thbes, while Diomedes was yet a boy (II. vi. 222); but he himself afterwards was one of the Epigoni who took Thbes. (II.
iv. 405; comp. Paus. ii. 20. § 4.) Diomedes went to Troy with Sthenus and Barylys, carrying with him in eighty ships warriors from Argos, Tiryns, Hermione, Asine, Troezen, Eionae, Epidauros, Aegina, and Mæs. (ii. 559, &c.) In the army of the Greeks before Troy, Diomedes was, next to Achilles, the bravest among the heroes;
and, like Achilles and Odysseus, he enjoyed the special protection of Athena, who assisted him in all dangerous moments. (v. 826, vi. 98, x. 340, xi. 312; comp. Virg. Aen. i. 96.) He fought with the most distinguished among the Trojans, such as Hector and Aeneas (viii. 110, &c., v.
310, &c.), and even with the gods who espoused
the cause of the Trojans. He thus wounded Aphrodite, and drove her from the field of battle (v.
335, 440), and Ares himself was likewise wounded by him. (v. 337.) Diomedes was wounded by Pandareus, whom, however, he afterwards slew with many other Trojans. (v. 97, &c.) In the attack of the Trojans on the Greek camp, he and Odysseus offered a brave resistance, but Diomedes
was wounded and returned to the ships. (v. 839, &c.) He wore a cuirass made by Hephæastes, but sometimes also a lion's skin. (viii. 195, x. 177.)
At the funeral games of Patroclus he conquered in the chariot-race, and received a woman and a tripod as his prize. (xviii. 373, &c.) He also conquered the Telamonian Ajax in single combat, and won the sword which Achilles had offered as the prize. (xviii. 811, &c.) He is described in the Iliad in general as brave in war and wise in council (ix. 53), in battle terrorized like a mountain torrent, and in the terror of the Trojans, whom he chases before him, as a lion chases goats. (v. 87, vi. 382.) He is strong like a god (v. 884), and the Trojan women during their sacrifice to Athena pray to her to break his spear and to make him fall. (vi. 306.) He himself knows no fear, and refuses his consent when Agamemnon proposes to take to flight, and he declares that, if all flee, he and his friend St Helenus will stay and fight till Troy shall fall. (ix. 32, &c., comp. vii. 398, viii. 151; Philostr. Hero. iv.)

The story of Diomedes, like those of other heroes of the Trojan time, has received various additions and embellishments from the hands of later writers, of which we shall notice the principal ones. After the expedition of the Epigoni he is mentioned among the suitors of Helen (Hygin. Fab. 81; Apollod. iii. 10, § 8), and his love of Helen induced him to join the Greeks in their expedition against Troy with 30 ships. (Hygin. Fab. 97.) Being a relative of Theseus, who was slain by Achilles, he did not permit the body of the Amazon Penthesileia to be honourably buried, but dragged her by the feet into the river Scamander. (Tzetza, ed Lycoph. 993; Dict. Cret. iv. 3.) Philoctetes was persuaded by Diomedes and Odysses to join the Greeks against Troy. (Sopha. Philoct. 570, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 102.) Diomedes conspired with Odysseus against Pala- medes, and under the pretence of having discovered a hidden treasure, they let him down into a well and there stoned him to death. (Dict. Cret. ii. 15; comp. Paus. x. 31, § 1.) After the death of Paris, Diomedes and Odysseus were sent into the city of Troy to negotiate for peace (Dict. Cret. v. 4), but he was afterwards one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse. (Hygin. Fab. 108.) When he and Odysseus had arrived in the arx of Troy by a subterraneous passage, they slew the guards and carried away the palladium (Virg. Aen. ii. 163), as it was believed that Ilium could not be taken so long as the palladium was within its walls. When, during the night, the two heroes were returning to the camp with their precious booty, and Odysseus was walking behind him, Diomedes saw by the shadow of his companion that he was drawing his sword in order to kill him, and thus drove him along before him to the camp. (Bustath. ed Hom. p. 822.) Diomedes, according to some, carried the palladium with him to Argos, where it remained until Erginus, one of his descendants, took it away with the assistance of the Laconian Lengrus, who conveyed it to Sparta. (Plut. Quest. Grce. 48.) According to others, Diomedes was robbed of the palladium by Demophon in Attica, where he landed one night on his return from Troy, without knowing where he was. (Tzetza, ed Lycoph. 175; Apollod. iii. 10. § 8.) Some ancient versions claimed that Diomedes restored the palladium and the remains of Anchises to Aeneas, because he was informed by an oracle, that he should be exposed to unc违章ing sufferings unless he restored the sacred image to the Trojans. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 166, iii. 407, iv. 427, v. 81.) On his return from Troy, he had like other heroes to suffer much from the enmity of Aprodite, but Athena still continued to protect him. He was first thrown by a storm on the coast of Lycia, where he was to be sacrificed to Ares by king Lycus; but Callirrhoe, the king's daughter, took pity upon him, and assisted him in escaping. (Plut. Perioll. Gr. et Rom. 23.) On his arrival in Argos he met with an evil reception which had been prepared for him either by Aprodite or Nauphus, for his wife Aegialeia was living in adultery with Hippolytus, or according to others, with Cometes or Cyllabarna. (Dict. Cret. vi. 2; Tzetza, ed Lycoph. 609; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 9.) He therefore quitted Argos either of his own accord, or he was expelled by the adulterers (Tzetza, ed Lyc. 692), and went to Aetolia. His going to Aetolia and the subsequent recovery of Argos are placed in some traditions immediately after the war of the Epigoni, and Diomedes is said to have gone with the Aetolians to assist his great kinsman Oeneus in Aetolia against his enemies. During the absence of Diomedes, Agamemnon took possession of Argos; but when the expedition against Troy was resolved upon, Agamemnon from fear invited Diomedes and Aeneas from Orchomenus back to Argos, and asked them to take part in the projected expedition. Diomedes alone accepted the proposal, and thus recovered Argos. (Strab. vii. p. 523, x. p. 462; comp. Hygin. Fab. 175; Apollod. l. 8, § 6; Paus. ii. 25, § 2.) According to another set of traditions, Diomedes did not go to Aetolia till after his return from Troy, when he was expelled from Argos, and it is said that he went first to Corinth; but being informed there of the distress of Oeneus, he hastened to Aetolia to assist him. Diomedes conquered and slew the enemies of his grandfather, and then took up his residence in Aetolia. (Dict. Cret. vi. 2.) Other writers make him attempt to return to Argos, but on his way home a storm threw him on the coast of Daunia in Italy. Daunus, the king of the country, received him kindly, and solicited his assistance in a war against the Messapians. He promised in return to give him a tract of land and the hand of his daughter Euphene. Diomedes defeated the Messapians, and distributed their territory among the Doriens who had accompanied him in Italy. Daomedes gave up his hostility against the Trojans, and even assisted them against Tarentum. (Paus. ii. 11; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 9.) He died in Daunia at an advanced age, and was buried in one of the islands off cape Garganus, which were called after him the Diomedean islands. Subsequently, when Daunus too had died, the Doriens were conquered by the Illyrians, but were metamorphosed by Zeus into birds. (Anton. Lib. 57; comp. Tzetza, ed Lyc. 602, 618.) According to Tzetzes, Diomedes was murdered by Daunus, whereas according to others he returned to Argos, or disappeared in one of the Diomedean islands, or in the country of the Heleni. (Strab. vi. p. 284.) A number of towns in the eastern part of Italy, such as Beneventum, Aquatunarium, Argus Hipponium (afterwards Argripia or Apul.) Venna or Aphrodisia, Veletri, Velitri, Sessoria, Muscari, Garganum, and Brundisium, were believed to have been founded by Diomedes. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 9, xi. 246; Strab. vi. pp. 283, 284; Plin. 3 v.) DIOMEDES.

H. N. iii. 20; Justin, xii. 2.) The worship and service of gods and heroes was spread by Diomedes far and wide; in and near Argos he caused temples of Athena to be built (Plut. de Flor. 18; Paus. ii. 24. § 9); his armor was preserved in a temple of Athena at Luceria in Apulia, and a gold chain of his was shown in a temple of Artemis in Peucetia. At Troezen he had founded a temple of Apollo Epibaterius, and instituted the Pythian games there. He himself was subsequently worshipped as a divine being, especially in Italy, where statues of him existed at Argyripa, Metapontum, Thurii, and other places. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. x. 12; Skylax, Peripl. p. 6; comp. Strab. v. p. 214, &c.) There are traces in Greece also of the worship of Diomedes, for I. Isid. Episc. Calp., 228; C. Daniel, Brandstätter, Die Gesch. des Aext. Land. p. 76, &c.

2. A son of the great Diomedes by Euphie, the daughter of Daunus. (Anton. Lib. 37.)

3. A son of Ares and Cyrene, was king of the Bistonae in Thrace, and was killed by Hercules on account of his mares, which he fed with human flesh. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 8; Dial. iv. 15; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 576.) Hyginus (Fab. 250) calls him a son of Atlas by his own daughter Asteria. [L. S.]

DIOMEDES (Διομήδης), a Greek grammarian, who wrote a commentary or scholia on the grammar of Dionysius Thrax, of which a few fragments are still extant. (Villoison, Anec. pp. 99, 126, 175, 183, 186; Bekker, Anec. ii.) He seems also to have written on Homer, for an opinion of his on Homer is refuted by the Venetian Scholiast on Homer (ad ii. ii. 259). [L. S.]

DIOMEDES, the author of a grammatical treatise "De Oratore et Partibus Orations et Varior Genere Motorum libri III." We are entirely ignorant of his history, but since he is frequently quoted by Priscian (e. g. lib. ix. pp. 861, 870, lib. x. 873, 889, 892), he must have lived before the commencement of the 6th century. The work is dedicated to a certain Athanasius, of whom we know nothing whatsoever. It is remarked elsewhere [Charisiu], that a close correspondence may be detected between the above work and many passages in the Institutiones Grammaticae of Charisius, and the same remark applies to Maximus Victorinus.

Diomedes was first published in a collection of Latin Grammarians printed at Venice by Nic. Jenson, about 1476. It is to be found in the Grammaticae Latinae Autorum Antiqui of Putschius, 4to. Hanov. 1605, pp. 170—527. For critical emendations, consult Sciglianus, Susept. Lect. and Reuena, Collectanea Litterarum, Leyden, 1815. See also Osann, Beiträge zur Griech. u. Röm. Lit. Gesch. ii. p. 331. [W. R.]

DIOMEDES, ST. (Διομήδης), a physician, saint, and martyr, was born at Tarus in Cilicia, of Christian parents. He lived at Tarsus for some time, and practised as a physician, but afterwards removed to Nicea in Bithynia, where he continued till his death. We are told that he practised with great success, and used to endeavour, whenever he had an opportunity, to convert his patients to Christianity. For his efforts in this cause he was ordered to be brought before the emperor Diocletian, who at that time happened to be at Nicomedia in Bithynia, but died on his way thither, about the beginning of the fourth century after Christ. A church was built at Constantinople in his honour by Constantine the Great, which was afterwards adorned and beautified by the emperors Basil I. in the ninth century, and is commemorated by the Roman and Greek churches on the 16th of August. (Acta Synod.; Bzovius, Nomenclator Sanctorum Professione Mediatorum, Carpzovius, de Medicis ab Ecclesia pro Sanetis habitis; Menolog. Graecorum.) [W. A. G.]

DIOMEDON (Διομήδων), an Athenian commander during the Peloponnesian war, came out early in the campaign of n. c. 412, the first after the Syracusean disaster, with a supply of 16 ships for the defence of Ionia. Chios and Miletus were already in revolt, and the Chians presently proceeded to attempt its extension to Lesbos. Diomedon, who had captured on his first arrival four Chian ships, was soon after joined by Leom with ten from Athens, and the two commanders with a squadron of 25 ships now sailed for Lesbos. They recovered Mytilene at once, defeating the Chian detachment in the harbour; and by this blow were enabled to drive out the enemy and secure the whole island, a service of the highest importance. They also regained Clazomenae, and from Lesbos and the neighbouring coast carried on a successful warfare against Chios. (Thuc. viii. 19—24.) In this service it seems likely they were permanently engaged until the occasion, in the following winter, when we find them, on the recommendation of Peisander, who with his oligarchical friends was then working for the recall of Alcibiades, placed in the chief command of the fleet. After acting against Rhodes, now in revolt, they remained, apparently, during the period of inaction at the commencement of the season of n. c. 411, subordinate to Peisander, then at Samos, superseding Phrynichus and Scironides. After acting against Rhodes, now in revolt, they remained, apparently, during the period of inaction at the commencement of the season of n. c. 411, subordinate to Peisander, then at Samos. Henceforth for some time they are not named, though they probably certainly were among the commanders of the centre in the battle of Cynossema.
and during the whole period of the command of Alcibiades were probably in active service. When after the battle of Notium, &c. 407, he was disgraced, they were among the ten generals appointed in his room. Diomedon in this command was employed at a distance from the main fleet; and when Callirrhetes chased Conon into Mytilene, on the information, perhaps, of the galley which made its escape to the Hellespont, he sailed for Lesbos, and lost 10 out of 12 ships in attempting to join his besieged colleague. In the subsequent glorious victory of Amphissa, he was among the commanders. So was he also among those unhappy six who returned to Athens and fell victims to the mysterious intrigues of the oligarchic party and the wild credulity of the people. It was in his behalf and that of Pericles, that his friend Euryptolemus made the attempt, so nearly successful, to put off the trial. According to the account given in his speech, Diomedon, after the engagement, when the commanders met, had given the advice to form in single file and pick up the castaways; and after Thermopylae and Thermopylae had been prevented by the storm from effecting their commission to the same purpose, he with Pericles had dissuaded his colleagues from examining those officers and this commission in their despatch, for fear of their incurring the displeasure which thus in the end fell on the generals themselves. (Xenoph. Hell. i. &c. 407, 16, 6. §§ 22, 29, 7. §§ 1, 16, 17, 29.) Diodorus, who hitherto had not mentioned his name, here relates that Diomedon, a man of great military skill, and distinguished for justice and other virtues, when sentence had been passed and he and the rest were now to be led to execution, came forward and bade the people he minded to perform, as he and his colleagues could not, the vows which before the engagement they had made to the gods. (Diod. xiii. 102.) [A. H. C.]

DIOMILUS (Διομιλος), an Andrian refugee, probably of military reputation, placed by the Syracuseans at the head of a force of 500 picked men in the spring of s. c. 414. He fell in the first exercise of his command, when the Athenians made their landing at Epipolae, in endeavouring to dislodge them from Euryelus. (Thuc. vi. 96.) [A. H. C.]

DIOMUS (Διόμος), a son of Clytius, a favourite and attendant of Hercules, from whom the Attic demos of Dionisia was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Κυλιτίς, Διομεδ.) [L. S.]

DIOMUS (Διόμος), a Sicilian shepherd, who is said to have invented bucolic poetry, and was mentioned as such in two poems of Ephicharmus. (Aeschin. i. 145.)

DION, a king in Laconia and husband of Iphiteia, the daughter of Prognus. Apollo, who had been kindly received by Iphiteia, rewarded her by conferring upon her three daughters, Orphe, Lyco, and Carya, the gift of prophecy, on condition, however, that they should not betray the gods nor seek after forbidden things. Afterwards Dionysus also came to the house of Dion; he was not only well received, like Apollo, but won the love of Carya, and therefore soon paid Dion a second visit, under the pretext of consecrating a temple, which the king had erected to him. Orphe and Lyco, however, guarded their sister, and when Dionysus had reminded them, in vain, of the command of Apollo, they were seized with raging madness, and having gone to the heights of Taygetus, they were metamorphosed into rocks. Carya, the beloved of Dionysus, was changed into a nut tree, and the Lacedaemonians, on being informed of it by Artemis, dedicated a temple to Artemis Carytis. (Serv. ad Virg. Eel. vili. 50; Carv.ius.) [L. S.]

DION (Διών), a Syracusean, son of Hippurinus. His father had been from the first a constant friend and supporter of the elder Dionysus, who had subsequently married his daughter Aristomache. These circumstances naturally brought Dion into friendly relations with Dionysus, and the latter having conceived a high opinion of his character and abilities, treated him with the greatest distinction, and employed him in many services of the utmost trust and confidence. Among others he sent him on an embassy to the Carthaginians, by whom he was received with the greatest distinction. (Plut. Dion. 3—5; Corn. Nep. Dion. 1.) Dion also married, during the lifetime of her father, Arete, the daughter of Dionysus by Aristomache. Of this close connexion and favour with the tyrant he seems to have availed himself to amass great wealth, so that on the death of Dionysus he offered to equip and maintain 50 triremes at his own cost to assist in the war against Carthage. (Plut. Dion. 6.) He made himself known to the succession of the younger Dionysus to all his father's power, but his near relationship to the sons of the latter by his wife Aristomache, as well as his dangerous pre-eminence in wealth and influence, rendered him an object of suspicion and jealousy to the youthful tyrant, to whom he also made himself personally disagreeable by the austerity of his manners. Dion appears to have been naturally a man of a proud and stern character, and having become an ardent disciple of Plato when that philosopher visited Syracuse in the reign of the elder Dionysus, he carried to excess the austerity of a philosopher, and viewed with undisguised contempt the debaucheries and dissolute pleasures of his nephew. From these he endeavoured to withdraw him by persuading him to invite Plato a second time to Syracuse; but the philosopher, though received at first with the utmost distinction, failed in obtaining a permanent hold on the mind of Dionysus; and the intrigues of the opposite party, headed by Philistus, were successful in procuring the banishment of Dion. (Plut. Dion. 7—14; Corn. Nep. Dion. 3, 4; Diod. xvi. 6.) The circumstances attending this are variously reported, but it seems to have been at first merely an honourable exile, and he was allowed to receive the produce of his vast wealth. According to Plutarch, he retired to Athens, where he had a house, with Plato and his disciples, at times also visiting the other cities of Greece, and displaying his magnificence on all public occasions. But Plato having failed in procuring his recall (for which purpose he had a third time visited Syracuse), and Dionysus having at length consoled his property and compelled his wife to marry another person, he finally determined on attempting the expulsion of the tyrant by force. (Plut. Dion. 15—21; Paus. Plut. Epist. 6; but compare Diod. xvi. 6.)

His knowledge of the general unpopularity of Dionysus and the disaffection of his subjects encouraged him to undertake this with much apparent air of insensibility. Very few of the numerous Syracuseans exiles then in Greece could be induced to join him, and he sailed from Zacynthos.
thus with only two merchant ships and less than 1000 mercenary troops. The absence of Dionysius and of his chief supporter Philistus, who were both in Italy at the time, favoured his enterprise; he landed at Minoa in the Carthaginian territory, and being speedily joined by volunteers from all parts, advanced without opposition to Syracuse, which he entered in triumph, the whole city being abandoned by the forces of Dionysius, except the citadel on the island. (Diod. xvi. 9, 10; Plat. Dion. 22—28.) Dion and his brother Megacles were now appointed by the Syracusans general-in-chief, and they proceeded to invest the citadel. Dionysius meanwhile returned, but having failed in a sally from the island, its overtures for peace being rejected, and Philistus, on whom he mainly depended, having been defeated and slain in a sea-battle, he determined to quit the city, and sailed away to Italy, leaving his son Apollocrates with a mercenary force in charge of the citadel. (b.c. 356.)

But dissensions now broke out among the besiegers: Hermelaides, who had lately arrived from the Peloponnesus with a reinforcement of tirunxes, and had been appointed commander of the Syracusean fleet, sought to undermine the power of Dion; and the latter, whose mercenary troops were discontented for want of pay, withdrew with them to Leontini. The disasters of the Syracusans, however, arising from the incapacity of their new leaders, soon led to the recall of Dion, who was appointed sole general autocrat. Not long after, Apollocrates was compelled by famine to surrender the citadel. (Diod. xvi. 11—13, 16—20; Plat. Dion. 29—50.)

Dion was now sole master of Syracuse: whether his former action was accused by his enemies, to restore the sovereign power in his own hands, or to establish an oligarchy with the assistance of the Corinthians, as asserted by Plutarch, we have no means of judging; but his government seems to have been virtually despotic. He caused his chief opponent, Hermelaides, to be put to death, and confiscated the property of his adversaries; but these measures only aggravated the discontent, which seems to have spread even to his own immediate followers. One of them, Callippus, an Athenian who had accompanied him from Greece, was induced by his increasing unpopularity to form a conspiracy against him, and having gained over some of his Zacynthian guards, caused him to be assassinated in his own house, b.c. 438. (Plut. Dion. 52—57; Corn. Nep. Dion. 6—9; Diod. xvi. 31.) According to Cornelius Nepos, he was about 55 years old at the time of his death.

There can be no doubt that the character of Dion has been immoderately praised by some ancient writers, especially by Plutarch. It is admitted even by his admirers that he was a man of a harsh and unyielding disposition, qualities which would easily degenerate into despotism when he found himself at the head of affairs. Even if he was sincere in the first instance in his intention of restoring liberty to Syracuse, he seems to have afterwards abandoned the idea, and there can be little doubt that the complaints of the people, that they had only exchanged one tyrant for another, were well founded. (Plutarch, Dion; comp. Tisch. c. P. Aemili. 2; Athen. xi. p. 508, e.) [E. H. B.]

DION (Διὸς). 1. Of Alexandria, an Academic philosopher and a friend of Antiochus. He was sent by his fellow-citizens as ambassador to Rome, to complain of the conduct of their king, Ptolemy Auletes. On his arrival at Rome he was poisoned by the king's secret agents, and the strongest suspicion of the murder fell upon M. Caecilius. (Cic. Acad. iv. 4, pro Cael. 10, 21; Strab. xvii. p. 798.)

2. Of Alexandria, apparently a writer on orators who is mentioned by Zenobius (v. 54) and Apostolius. (xii. 24; comp. Suid. s. v. τὸ Διὸς γέρος; Apostol. xv. 3; Suid. s. v. οἷς Ἀρκάδιος; Schneidevin, Corp. Paralipom. i. pp. 119, 142.)

3. Of Chios, a flute player, who is said to have been the first who played the Bacchic spondeon on the flute. (Athen. xiv. p. 638.) It may be that he is the same as Dion, the αἰτωναρχός, who is mentioned by Varro. (Fragm. p. 198, ed. Bipont.)

4. Of Colophon, is mentioned by Varro (de R. R. l. 1), Columella (l. 1), and Pliny among the Greek writers on agriculture; but he is otherwise unknown.

5. Of Hales in Sicily. Through the favour of Q. Metellus, he obtained the Roman franchise and the name of Q. Metellus Dion. His son had a large fortune left him, which invested the avareness of Verres, who annoyed him in various ways, and robbed him of his property. Dion is described as a very honest and trustworthy man. (Cic. in Ferr. i. 10, li. 7, 8.)

6. Of Pergamus, is mentioned as the seceret of Polemocrates. (Cic. pro Flacco. 30.) A few more persons of the name of Dion are enumerated by Reimar. (De Vit. Gr. iv. Cassius Dion. 2.) [L. S.]

DION CASSIUS COCCÆIANUS, the celebrated historian of Rome. He probably derived the gentile name of Cassius from one of his ancestors, who, on receiving the Roman franchise, had been called Cassius. In the meantime, Cassius Aprimanius, had already borne it. He appears to have adopted the cognomen of Cocceianus from Dion Charisyotos Cocceianus, the orator, who, according to Reimar, was his grandfather on his mother's side. Dion Cassius Cocceianus, or as he is more commonly called Dion Cassius, was born, about 165, at Nicaea in Bithynia. He was educated with great care, and was trained in the rhetorical schools of the time, and in the study of the classical writers of ancient Greece. After the completion of his literary studies, he appears to have accompanied his father to Cilicia, of which he had the administration, and after his father's death, about 136, he went to Rome; so that he arrived there either in the last year of the reign of M. Aurelius, or in the first of that of Commodus. He had then attained the senatorial age of twenty-five, and was raised to the rank of a Roman senator; but he did not obtain any honours under Commodus, except the aedileship and questorship, and it was not till A. D. 193, in the reign of Pertinax, that he gained the office of praetor. During the thirteen years of the reign of Commodus, Dion Cassius remained at Rome, and devoted his time partly to pleading in the courts of justice, and thus assisting his friends, and partly in collecting materials for a history of Commodus, of whose actions he was a constant eye-witness. After the fall of this emperor, Dion, with the other senators, voted for the elevation of Pertinax, A. D. 193, who was his friend, and who immediately promoted him to the praetorship, which however he did not enter upon till the year following, the first of the reign of Septimius Severus. During the short reign of Pertinax Dion Cassius enjoyed the emperor's friendship, and conducted himself on all occasions as an upright and virtuous man. The accession of Septimius Severus raised great hopes in Dion of being further promoted; but these hopes were not realized, notwithstanding the favour which Severus showed him in the beginning of his reign. Soon after the accession of Severus, Dion wrote a work on the dreams and prodigies which had announced the elevation of this emperor, and which he presented to Severus, who thanked him for it in a long epistle. The night after he had received this epistle, Dion was called upon in a dream to write the history of his own time, which induced him to work out the materials he had already collected for a history of Commodus. A similar dream or vision afterwards led him to write the history of Septimius Severus and Caracalla. When the history of Commodus was completed, Dion read it to the emperor, who received it with so much approbation, that Dion was encouraged to write a history of Rome from the earliest times, and to insert in it what he had already written about the reign of Commodus. The next ten years, therefore, were spent in making the preparatory studies and collecting materials, and twelve years more, during the greater part of which he lived in quiet retirement at Capua, were employed in composing the work. It was his intention to carry the history as far down as possible, and to add an account of the reigns of the emperors succeeding Severus, so far as he might witness them. Reimarus conceives that Dion began collecting his materials in A.D. 201, and that after the death of Severus, in A.D. 211, he commenced the composition of his work, which would thus have been completed in A.D. 229.

The reason why Severus did not promote Dion is probably owing to the emperor's change of opinion respecting Commodus; for, during the latter part of his reign, he admired Commodus as much as he had before detested him; and what Dion had written about him could not be satisfactory to an admirer of the tyrant. Dion thus remained in Italy for many years, without any new dignity being conferred upon him. In the reign of Caracalla it became customary for a select number of senators to accompany the emperor in his expeditions and travels, and Dion was chosen for this office. He considered theœconomia of having been compelled in consequence to spend immense sums of money, and not only to witness the tyrant's disgraceful conduct, but to some extent to be an accomplice in it. In the company of the emperor, Dion thus visited Nicomedea; but he does not appear to have gone any further; for of the subsequent events in Asia and Egypt he does not speak as an eye-witness, but only appeals to reports. Macrinus, however, appears to have again called him to Asia, and to have entrusted him to the administration of the free cities of Pergamus and Sicyrus, which had shortly before revolted. Dion went to this post about A.D. 218, and seems to have remained there for about three years, on account of the various points which had to be settled. At the expiration of his office, however, he did not return to Rome, but went to Nicaea in Bithynia. On his arrival there he was taken ill, but notwithstanding was raised, during his absence, to the consulship, either A.D. 219 or 220. After this he obtained the proconsulship of Africa, which, however, cannot have been earlier than A.D. 224. After his return to Italy, he was sent in A.D. 226, as legate to Dalmatia, and the year after to Pannonia. In the latter province he restored strict discipline among the troops; and on his return to Rome, the praetorians began to fear lest he should use his influence for the purpose of interfering with their conduct likewise, and in order to prevent this, they demanded of the emperor Alexander Severus to put him to death. But the emperor not only disregarded their clamour, but raised Dion, A.D. 229, to his second consulship, in which Alexander himself was his colleague. Alexander also conferred other distinctions upon him, and undertook to do his own purse to defray the expenses which the dignity of consul demanded of Dion. However, as Dion could not feel safe at Rome under these circumstances, the emperor requested him to take up his residence somewhere in Italy at a distance from the city. After the expiration of his consulship, Dion returned to Rome, and spent some time with the emperor in Campania; but he appears at length to have become tired of the precarious life at Rome, and under the pretext of suffering from a bad foot, he asked and obtained permission to return to his native place, and there to spend the remainder of his life in quiet retirement. At Nicaea Dion completed his history, and there he also died. The time of his death is unknown. Respecting his family nothing is recorded, except that in two passages he just mentions his wife and children; and it may be that the Dion Cassius whom we find consul in A.D. 201 was a grandson of our historian. The account we have given of the life of Dion Cassius is derived from scattered passages of his own work, and from a short article in Suidas.

The following list contains the works which are attributed by the ancients to Dion Cassius: 1. The work on dreams and prodigies, which we mentioned above, is lost. Dion had probably written it only to please the emperor, and he seems afterwards to have regretted its publication; for, although he is otherwise rather credulous and fond of relating prodigies, yet in his history he mentions those which have reference to Septimius Severus only very cursorily. 2. The history of the reign of Commodus, which he afterwards incorporated in his abridgment. 3. The history of the reign of the emperor Trajan. This work is mentioned only by Suidas; and, if it really was a distinct work, the substance of it was incorporated in his Roman history. 4. A history of Persia is likewise mentioned only by Suidas; but is probably a mistake, and Suidas confounds Dion with Deinon, who is known to have written a work on Persia. 5. Erdh, that is, Itineraries, is mentioned by Suidas; but it is very doubtful whether it was a work of Dion Cassius, or of his grandfather, Dion Chrysostomus, whose extensive travels may have led him to write such a work. 6. A life of Attian is altogether unknown, except through the mention of Suidas. 7. Oecita is attributed to Dion Cassius by Suidas, Jornandes, and Frenchelius; while from Philostorus (Vit. Soph. l. 7) we might infer, that Dion Chrysostomus was its author. 8. The History of Rome (Poarcion) isoria), the great work of Dion Cassius, consisted of 80 books, and was further divided into decades, like Livy's Roman history. It embraced the whole history of Rome from the earliest times, that is, from the landing of Aeneas in Italy down to A.D. 229, the year in which Dion quitted Italy and returned to Nicaea.
The excerpt, which A. Mai has published from a Vatican MS., and which belonged to a work containing the history from the time of Valerian down to the time of Constantine the Great, bears indeed the name of Dion Cassius, but are in all probability taken from the work of a Christian writer, whom the continued work of Dion, and A. Mai is inclined to think that this continuation was the work of Joannes Antiochenus. Dion Cassius himself (lxix. 18) intimates, that he treated the history of republic Rome briefly, but that he endeavoured to give a more minute and detailed account of some events of which he had himself been an eyewitness. Unfortunately, only a comparatively small portion of this work has come down to us entire. Of the first thirty-four books we possess only fragments, and the Excerpta, which Ursinus, Valesius, and A. Mai have successively published from the collections made by the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. A few more fragments have recently been published by F. Haase (Urania Cassici librorum desperatorum Fragmenta, Bonn, 1840, 8vo.), who found them in a Paris MS. It must further be observed, that Zonaras, in his Annals, chiefly, though not solely, followed the authority of Dion Cassius, so that, to some extent, his Annals may be regarded as an epitome of Dion Cassius. There is a considerable fragment commonly considered as a part of the 35th book, which however more probably belongs to the 36th, and from this book onward to the 54th the work is extant complete, and embraces the history from the wars of Lucullus and Ca. Pompey against Mithridates, down to the death of Agrippa, A. D. 10. The subsequent books, from 55 to 60, have not come to us in their original form, for there are several passages quoted from these books which are not now to be found in them; and we therefore have in all probability only an abridgment made by some one either before or after the time of Xiphilinus. From book 61 to 80 we have only the abridgment made by Xiphilinus in the eleventh century, and some other epitomes which were probably made by the same person who epitomized the portion from the 55th to the 60th book. A considerable fragment of the 71st book was found by A. Mai in a Latin translation in the library of the University of Mainz, deplorably, but published anonymously (Braunschweig, 1832, 8vo.); but its genuineness is not quite established. Another important fragment of the 75th book was discovered by J. Moreli, and printed first at Basano, and afterwards (1800) at Paris, in folio, uniform with Reimarus's edition of Dion Cassius.

Notwithstanding these great losses, we possess a sufficient portion of the work to enable us to form a correct estimate of its value. It contains an abundance of materials for the later history of the republic and for a considerable period of the empire, for some portions of which it is our only source. In the fragments, published by A. Mai, Dion distinctly states, that he had read nearly everything which had been written on the history of Rome, and that he did not, like a mere compiler, put together what he found in other writers, but that he weighed his authorities, and exercised his judgment in selecting what he thought fit for a place in his work. This assertion of the author himself is perfectly justified by the nature and character of his history, for it is manifest everywhere that he had acquired a thorough knowledge of his subject, and that his notions of Roman life and Roman institutions were far more correct than those of some of his predecessors, such as Dionysius of Halicarnassus. Whenever he is led into error, it is generally owing to his not having access to authentic sources, and to his being obliged to satisfy himself with secondary ones. It must also be borne in mind, as Dion himself observes (lxxi. 10), that the history of the empire presented much more difficulties to the historian than that of the republic. In those parts in which he relates contemporary events, his work forms a sort of medium between real history and mere memoirs of the emperors. His object was to give a record as complete and as accurate as possible of all the important events; but his work is not on that account a dry chronological catalogue of events, for he endeavours, like Thucydides, Polybius, and Tacitus, to trace the events to their causes, and to make us see the motives of men's actions. In his endeavours to make us see the connexions of occurrences he sometimes even neglects the chronological order, like his great models. But with all these excellencies, Dion Cassius is the equal neither of Thucydides nor of Tacitus, though we may admit that his faults are to a great extent rather those of his age than of his individual character as an historian. He had been trained in the schools of the rhetoricians, and the consequences of it are visible in his history, which is not free from a rhetorical tinge, especially in the speeches which are introduced in it. They may not be pure inventions, and may have an historical ground-work, but their form is rhetorical; though we must own that they are among the best rhetorical productions of the time. In the formation of his style he appears to have endeavoured to imitate the classic writers of ancient Greece; but his language is nevertheless full of peculiarities, barbarisms, and Latinisms, probably the consequence of his long residence in Italy; and the praise which Photius (Bibl. Cod. 71) bestows upon him for the clearness of his style, must be greatly modified, for it is often harsh and heavy, and Dion seems to have written as he spoke, without any attempt at elegance or refinement. (See the excellent essay of Reimarus, De vita et scriptis Cassii Dionysiatis, in Diss. de rebus et litteris hactenus prosp. Postibus et Academiae Dionis Cassii, Berlin, 1835, 8vo.; Schlosser, in a dissertation prefixed to Lorenz's German translation of Dion, Jena, 1826, 3 vols. 8vo.; and the brief but admirable characteristic of Dion by Niebuhr in his "Lectures on Roman Hist." edited by Dr. Schmitz, i. pp. 72-78.)

The work of Dion Cassius was first published in a Latin translation by N. Leonicensis, Venice, 1526; and the first edition of the Greek original is that of R. Stephens (Paris, 1548, fol.), which contains from book 35 to 60. H. Stephens then gave a new edition with a Latin translation by Xylander (Geneva, 1601, fol.). The epitome of Xiphilinus from book 60 to 80 was first printed in the edition of Leundavies. (Frankfort, 1592, and Hann, 1605, fol.). After the fragments and cologia collected by Ursinus and Valesius had been published, J. A. Fabricius formed the plan of preparing a complete and comprehensive edition of Dion Cassius; but his death prevented the completion of his plan, which was carried out by his son-in-law, H. S. Reimarus, who published his edition at Hamburg, 1750-52, in 2 vols. fol.
The Greek text is not much improved in this edition, but the commentary and the index are of very great value. The Latin translation which it contains is made up of those of Xylander and Leunclavius. A more recent edition is that of Sturz, in 9 vols. (Leipzig, 1824, 8vo.), the ninth volume of which (published in 1843) contains the "Excerpta Vaticanae," which had first been discovered and published by A. Mai. (Scrip. Vet. Nov. Collect. ii. p. 185, &c., p. 537, &c.)

DION CHRYSSOSTOMUS, that is, Dion the golden-mouthed, a surname which he owed to his great talents as an orator. He bore also the surname Coccinianus (Plin. Epist. x. 85, 86), which he derived from the emperor Cocceius Nerva, with whom he was connected by intimate friendship. (Orat. xlv. p. 513.) Dion Chrysostomus was born at Prusa in Bithynia, about the middle of the first century of our era, and belonged to a distinguished equestrian family. Reimarus has rendered it very probable that a daughter of his was the mother of Dion Cassius, the historian. His father, Pasiponos, seems to have bestowed great care on his son Dion's education and the early training of his mind; but he appears to have acquired part of his knowledge in travels, for we know that he visited Egypt at an early period of his life. At first he occupied himself in his native place, where he held important offices, with the composition of speeches and other rhetorical-sophistical essays, but on perceiving the futility of such pursuits he abandoned them, and devoted himself with great zeal to the study of philosophy: he did not, however, confine himself to any particular sect or school, nor did he give himself up to any profound speculations, his object being rather to apply the doctrines of philosophy to the purposes of practical life, and more especially to the administration of public affairs, and thus to bring about a better state of things. The Stoic and Platonic philosophies, however, appear to have had the greatest charms for him. Notwithstanding these useful and peaceful pursuits, he was looked upon in his native place with suspicion and hostility (Orat. xlv. p. 212, &c.), which induced him to go to Rome. Here he drew upon himself the hatred of Domitian, who had so great an aversion to philosophers, that by a semitum-consultum all were expelled from Rome and Italy, and Dion found himself obliged to quit Rome in secret. (Orat. xlv. p. 215, xlix. p. 410.) On the advice of the Delphic oracle, it is said, he put on the attire of a beggar, and with nothing in his pocket but a copy of Plato's Phaedon and Democritus's oration on the Embassy, he undertook a journey to the countries in the north and east of the Roman empire. He thus visited Thrace, Mytilus, Sesthia, and the country of the Getae, and owing to the power and wisdom of his orations, he met everywhere with a kindly reception, and did much good. (Orat. xxxvi. p. 74; comp. xlix. p. 418.) In A. D. 96, when Domitian was murdered, Dion used his influence with the army stationed on the frontier in favour of his friend Nerva, and seems to have returned to Rome immediately after his accession. (Orat. xlv. p. 402.) Nerva's successor, Trajan, entertained the highest esteem for Dion, and showed him the most marked favour, for he is said to have often visited him, and even to have allowed him to ride by his side in his golden triumphal car. Having thus received the most ample satisfaction for the meagre treatment he had ex-

Dion Chrysostomus is one of the most eminent among the Greek orators and sophists. This is the opinion not only of the ancients who have written about him, such as Philostratus, Synesius, and Photius, but it is also confirmed by the eighty orations of his which are still extant, and which were the only ones known in the time of Photius, who, however, enumerates them in a somewhat different order from that in which they now stand. These orations are for the most part the productions of his later years, when he was no longer young, if any, among them that can with certainty be attributed to the early period of his life. They are more like essays on political, moral, and philosophical subjects than real orations, of which they have only the form. We find among them ἄγων ἐπὶ βασιλεᾶς or ἄγων ἐπὶ βασιλεῶς, four orations addressed to Trajan on the virtues of a sovereign; ὀμογένες ἢ ἐπὶ τευχαίδος, on the troubles to which men expose themselves by deserting the path of nature, and on the difficulties which a sovereign has to encounter; essays on slavery and freedom; on the means of attaining eminence as an orator; further, political discourses addressed to various towns, in which he sometimes praises and sometimes blames, but always with great moderation and wisdom; on subjects of ethics and practical philosophy, which he treats in a popular and attractive manner; and lastly, orations on mythical subjects and show-speeces. Besides these eighty orations we have fragments of fifteen others. Suidas, in enumerating the works of Dion Cassius, mentions one on the Getae, which Cassiobon was inclined to attribute to Dion Chrysostomus, on account of a passage in Philostratus (Vit. Sophr. i. 7), who says, "how fit Dion (Chrysostomus) was for writing history, is evident from his Getica." There are extant also five letters under the name of Dion and addressed to one Rufus. They are published in Boissoneau's Ad Marini Vit. Proct. p. 35, &c., and some critics are inclined to consider them as productions of Dion Chrysostomus. All the extant orations of Dion are distinguished for their refined and elegant style; the author most successfully imitated the classic writers of Greece, such as Plato, Democritus, Hyperides, and Aeschines. His ardent study of those models, combined with his own eminent talents, his firm and pleasing voice, and his skill in extempore speaking, raised him at once above all contemporary rhetoricians. His style is throughout clear, and, generally speaking, free from pertinacity. (Orat. xlv. p. 412.) He was very rarely able to escape from the influence of the Asiatic school of rhetoric. His sentences are often interrupted by the insertion of parenthetical clauses, and his proemia are frequently too long in proportion to the other parts of his discourses. "Dion Chrysostomus," says Niebuhr (Lectures on Rom. Hist. ii. p. 263, ed. Schmitz), "was an author of uncommon talent, and it is much to be regretted that he belonged to the rhetoricians of that unfortunate age. It makes one sad to see him lose his brilliant oratorical powers on insignificant subjects. Some of his works are written in an excellent and beautiful language, which is pure Attic Greek and without affectation: it is clear that he had made the classical language of Athens his own, and he handled it as a master. He appears in all he wrote as a man of an amiable character, and free from the vanity of the ordinary rhetoricians, though one perceives the silent consciousness of his powers. He was an unaffected Platonist, and lived with his whole soul in Athens, which was to him a world, and which made him forget Rome, its emperor, and everything else. All this forms a very charming feature in his character. Whenever he touches upon the actual state of things in which he lived, he shows his master-mind. He was the first writer after Tiberius that greatly contributed towards the revival of Greek literature." (Comp. Philostratus, Vit. Soph. i. 7; Photius, Bibl. Cod. 209; Synesius, Διον ἰ περ τις κατ’ αὐτὸν διαγωγῆς; Suid. s. v. Διον; Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Beredsam. § 87, &c., and Beilage x. p. 317, &c.; Empiricus, de Æstio Dionis Chrissostomos, Bramschnegg, 1848, 8vo.)

Passing over the editions of separate orations of Dion Chrysostomus, we mention only those which contain all of them. The first was edited by D. Paravisius at Milan (1475, 4to), and was followed by that of Aldus Mannicius. (Venice, 1551, 8vo.) The next edition of importance is that of Ch. Morel (Paris, 1801), which was reprinted in 1828 with a Latin translation of Naogaorgius and notes by Morel. A very good critical edition is that of Reiske, Leipzig, 1874, 2 vols. 8vo. The first volume of a new critical edition by Empiricus appeared in 1844.

DIONAEA (Διώναε), a metronymic form of Dion, and applied to her daughter Aphrodite. (Orph. Arg. 1320; Virg. Aen. iii. 19.) The name is also applied as an epithet to things which were sacred to her, such as the dove. (Stat. Silv. iii. 5. 60.)

DIONE (Διόνη), a female Titan, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys (Hesiod. Theog. 333), and, according to some, to Oceanus and Ge. (Hygin. Fab. Praef.; Apollod. i. 1. § 3.) She was beloved by Zeus, by whom she became the mother of Aphrodite. (Apollod. i. 3. § 4.; Hom. II. v. 370, &c.) When Aphrodite was wounded by Diomedes, Dion received her daughter in Olympus, and pronounced the threat respecting the punishment of Diomedes. (Hom. II. v. 403.) Dion was present, with other divinities, at the birth of Apollo and Artemis in Delos. (Hom. Hyg. in Del. 93.) At the foot of Lepecon, on the western coast of Peloponnesus, there was a grave sacred to her (Strab. viii. p. 346), and in other places she was worshipped in the temples of Zeus. (Strab. vii. p. 322.) In some traditions she is called the mother of Dionysus. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 177; Hesych. s. v. Διώνης.) There are three more mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. i. 2. § 7; Hygin. Fab. 83; Pheroeyd. p. 115, ed. Sturz.)

DIONYSIADES or DIONYSIDES (Διὸνυσιά- δης, Διονυσίας). 1. Of Mallus in Cilicia, a tragic poet, of whom nothing more is known. (Suid. s. v.)

2. Of Tarsus, a tragic poet, was, according to Strabo (xiv. p. 675), the best of the poets in the "Tragic Pleiad" of the Alexandrian grammarians. (Fabric. ii. p. 296.)

DIONYSIODORUS (Διόνυσιδορός), a satyractor of Miletus, who made the statue of Democrates of Tenedos, a victor in wrestling at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 17. § 1.)

DIONYSIODORUS (Διόνυσιδορός), an Alexandrian grammarian of the school of Aristarchus, is quoted in the Venetian scholia on the Iliad (ii. 111), and probably wrote on the Homeric poems. (Villonos, Proleg. ad II. p. 30.)

DIONYSIODORUS. 1. A satyractor and writer in silver, and a disciple of Cratinus. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. 19. § 23.)

2. Of Colophon, a painter of some note. (Plin. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42.)

DIONYSIUS (Διόνυσιος), tyrant of Hieraclea on the Buxine. He was a son of Clearchus, who had assumed the tyranny in his native place, and was succeeded by his son Timothenes. After the death of the latter, Dionysius succeeded in the tyranny, about the time of the battle of Chorebon, B. C. 338. After the destruction of the Persian empire by Alexander the Great, Dionysius attempted to extend his dominions in Asia. In the meantime, some of the citizens of Hieraclea, who had been driven into exile by their tyrants, applied to Alexander to restore the republican government at Hieraclea, but Dionysius, with the assistance of Alexander's sister, Cleopatra, contrived to prevent any steps being taken to that effect. But still he does not appear to have felt very safe in his position, as we may conjecture from the extreme delight with which he received the news of Alexander's death, in consequence of which he erected a statue of σωφρονία, that is, joy or peace of mind. The exiled Hieracleans now applied to Pericles, against whom Dionysius endeavoured to secure himself by joining his enemies. Dionysius therefore married Amystratia, the former wife of Craterus, who seemed to him considerable advantages. A friendship with Antigonus was formed by assisting him in his war against Asander, and Ptolemy, the nephew of Antigonus, married Dionysius's daughter by his first wife. Dionysius thus remained in the undisturbed possession of the tyranny for many years. In B. C. 306, when the surviving generals of Alexander assumed the title of kings, Dionysius followed their example, but he died soon after. He was an unusually fat man, which increased at length to such a degree that he could take no food, which was therefore introduced into his stomach by artificial means. At last, however, he was choked by his own fat. He is said to have been the mildest and justest of all the tyrants that had ever lived. He was succeeded by his son Zathras, and, after the death of the latter, by his second son Clearchus 11. The death of Dionysius must have taken place in B. C. 306 or 305, as, according to Diodorus, he died at the age of 55, and after a reign of 92 years, for which others say 33 years. (Diod. xvi. 88, xx. 79; Athen. xii. p. 519; Aelian, V. H. ix. 13; Mommsen, op. Phot. Cod. 224.) [L. S.] DIONYSIUS (Διόνυσις) the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, must have been born in B.C. 451 or 450, as we are told that he was twenty-five years old when he first obtained the sovereignty of Syracuse. With Plutarch he was unfaithful to his family, but that his father's name was Hermocrates, and that he was born in a private but not low station, so that he received an excellent education, and began life in the capacity of a clerk in a public office. (Cic. Tusc. v. 20, 22; Diod. xiii. 91, 96, xiv. 66; Isocr. Philipp. § 73; Dem. c. Lepid. § 141, p. 506; Polyb. Strateg. v. 2, § 2.) He appears to have early taken part in the political dissensions which agitated Syracuse after the destruction of the great Athenian armament, and having joined in the attempt of Hermocrates, the leader of the aristocratical party, to effect by force his restoration from exile, was so severely wounded as to be left for dead upon the spot. (Diod. xiii. 71.) A short hint of him as serving with distinction in the great war against the Carthaginians, who had invaded Sicily under Hannibal, the son of Gisco, and successively reduced and destroyed Selinus, Himera, and Agrigentum. These disasters, and especially the failure of the Syracusan general, Daphnaeus, to relieve Agrigentum, had created a general spirit of discontent and alarm, both at Syracuse and among the allies, of which Dionysius skilfully availed himself. He came forward in the popular assembly as the accuser of the unsuccessful commanders, and, being supported by Philistus, the historian, and Hipparrhinus, men of wealth and influence, he succeeded in procuring a decree for deposing the existing generals, and appointing others in their stead, among whom was Dionysius himself. (Diod. xiii. 91, 92; Aristot. Polit. v. 5, 6.) His efforts seem from this time to have been directed towards supplanting his new colleagues and obtaining the sole direction of affairs. He persuaded the Syracusans to recall the exiles, most of whom were probably partisans of Hermocrates, and would readily admit him as their leader, and secretly accosted his colleagues in the command of holding intelligence with the enemy. Being soon after sent to Gela with the separate command of a body of auxiliaries, he there carried on similar intrigues, and when he thought that he had sufficiently secured to himself the favor both of the people of Gela and of his own troops, he returned abruptly to Syracuse, and brought before the assembled people distinct charges of corruption and treachery against his brother generals. These found ready belief, and it was determined to depose all the others and appoint Dionysius sole general, with full powers. (Diod. xiii. 92—94.) This was in the spring of the year B.C. 405, the first appointment of Dionysius as one of the generals having been in Dec. 406. Comp. Clinton, F. H. ii. p. 82; Diod. i.e.; Diony. vii. 1.) According to Plutarch, indeed, Hipparrhinus, who is represented by Aristotle (Polit. v. 6) as lending his aid to procure the elevation of Dionysius was at first appointed his colleague in the chief command (Plut. Dion. 3); but, if this be not a mistake, his authority could have been little more than nominal, as he plays no part in the subsequent transactions.

The position of general autocrat by no means implied in itself the exercise of sovereign power, but the measures of Dionysius soon rendered it such; and we may date from this period the commencement of his reign, or tyranny, which continued without interruption for 38 years. His first step was to procure, on the ground of an attempt on his life, whether real or pretended, the appointment of a body-guard, which he speedily increased to the number of 1000 men; at the same time he loaded the Syracusans with food and drink to double the pay of all the troops, and took every means to ingratiate himself with the mercenaries, taking care to replace those officers who were unfavourable to him by creatures of his own. By his marriage with the daughter of Hermocrates he secured to himself the support of all the remaining partisans of that leader, and he now found himself strong enough to procure the condemnation and execution of Daphnaeus and Demarchus, the heads of the opposite party. (Diod. xiii. 95, 96.)
His first operations in the war against the Carthaginians were, however, unsuccessful. Having advanced with a large army to the relief of Gela, then beset by Himilco, he was defeated, and deemed it prudent to retire, taking with him the inhabitants both of Gela itself and the neighbouring Camarina. This reverse gave a severe shock to his popularity, of which his enemies at Syracuse availed themselves to attempt to overthrow his power. For a moment they were masters of the city, but Dionysius disconcerted their plans by the suddenness of his return, and compelled them to quit the city, though not until his unfortunate wife had fallen a victim to their cruelty. (Diod. xiii. 108—113, xiv. 44; Plut. Dion, 8.) He soon afterwards gladly accepted the overtures of the Carthaginian general Himilco, whose army had suffered greatly from a pestilence, and concluded peace with Carthage B.C. 405. (Diod. xiii. 114.)
He was now able to devote his whole attention to strengthening and consolidating his power at home. He converted the island of Ortygia into a strong fortress, in which he took up his own residence, and allowed no one but his own immediate dependents to dwell; and while he courted the favour of the populace by assigning them lands and houses, he augmented their numbers by admitting many aliens and newly-freed slaves to the rights of citizenship. These measures naturally gave umbrage to the higher class of citizens who formed the heavy-armed infantry, and they took advantage of an expedition on which he led them against the Sicilians to break out into open revolt. They were instantly joined by the exiles who had established themselves at Acta, and Dionysius was compelled to take refuge in the island which he had so recently fortified. From this danger, however, he managed to extricate himself by the aid of a body of Campanian mercenaries, seconded by the dissensions which broke out among his enemies. Some of these submitted to him on favourable terms; the rest retired to Acta. (Diod. xiv. 7—9.) From this time his authority at Syracuse appears to have been undisputed. He soon after took advantage of the harvest time to disarm those citizens whom he had still cause to fear, and reduced the fortress of Acta, which, had been the stronghold of the exiles disaffected to his government. (Lb. cc. 10, 14.)
His arms were next directed against the Chaleidian cities of Sicily. Naxos, Catana, and Leontini, successively fell into his power, either by force or treachery. The inhabitants were either sold as slaves or compelled to migrate to Syracuse. Naxos was utterly destroyed, and Catana occupied by a colony of Campanian mercenaries, or Carthaginians, 403. (Diód. xiv. 14, 15.) For several years after this he appears to have been occupied in strengthening his power and in preparations for renewing the war with Carthage. Among these may be reckoned the great works which he at this time erected,—the docks adapted for the reception of several hundred ships, and the wall of 30 stadia in length, enclosing the whole extent of the Epploae, the magnificence of which is attested by its existing remains at the present day. (Diód. xiv. 16, 42; Smith’s Sicily, p. 167.)

It was not till c. 397 that Dionysius considered himself sufficiently strong, or his preparations enough advanced, to declare war against Carthage. He had, in the mean time, assembled a large army of auxiliary and mercenary troops, and a fleet of two hundred ships, remarkable for the number of quadriremes and quinqueremes which were seen in it for the first time. The Carthaginians had been greatly weakened by the ravages of a pestilence in Africa, and were unprepared for war. Dionysius was immediately joined not only by the Greeks of Gela, Agrigentum, Himera, and Selinus, which had become tributary to Carthage by the late treaty of 405, but by the Sicilians of the interior, and even the Sicanians, in general the firm allies of Carthage. He thus advanced without opposition from one end of Sicily to the other, and laid siege to Motya, one of the chief strongholds of the Carthaginians, which fell into his power after a long and desperate resistance, prolonged till near the close of the summer. Segesta, however, successfully resisted his efforts, and the next year (c. 396) the arrival of a great Carthaginian armament under Himilco changed the face of affairs. Motya was quickly recovered; the Sicilians and Sicanians abandoned the Syracusan alliance for that of the enemy, and Himilco advanced unopposed as far as Messana, which he carried by assault, and utterly destroyed. The Syracusan fleet under Leptines, the brother of Dionysius, was totally defeated; and the latter, not daring to risk a battle, withdrew with his land forces, and shut himself up within the walls of Syracuse. Abandoned by the Sicilians and the Greeks, and besieged by the Carthaginians both by sea and land, his situation appeared to be desperate. It is even said that he was on the point of giving up all for lost, and making his escape, but was deterred by one of his friends observing, "that sovereign power was an honourable winding-sheet." (Isocr. Archidam. § 49; Aelian. V. H. iv. 8; but compare Diód. xiv. 8.) A pestilence shortly after broke out in the Carthaginian camp, which a second time proved the salvation of Syracuse. Dionysius ably availed himself of the state of weakness to which the enemy was thus reduced, and by a sudden attack both by sea and land, defeated the Carthaginian army, and burnt great part of their fleet. Still he was glad to consent to a secret capitulation, by which the Carthaginians themselves were allowed to depart unmolested, abandoning both their allies and foreign mercenaries, who, thus left without a leader, were quickly dispersed. (Diód. xiv. 41—76.)

No peace was concluded with Carthage upon this occasion; but the effects of their late disastrous expedition, and the revolt of their subjects in Africa, prevented the Carthaginians from renewing hostilities against Syracuse until the summer of 393, when Nego, who had succeeded Himilco in the command, having renewed the alliance with the Sicilians, advanced towards Messana, but was defeated by Dionysius near Aegaeum. The next year (c. 392) he marched against the Syracusan territory with a much greater force; but Dionysius, having secured the alliance of Agyrus, tynam of Agyrus, was enabled to cut off the supplies of the enemy, and thus reduced them to such distress, that Mago was compelled to treat for peace. The Syracusans also were weary of the war, and a treaty was concluded, by which the Carthaginians abandoned their Sicelian allies, and Dionysius became master of Tauroctomus: in other respects, both parties remained nearly as before. (Diód. xiv. 40, 95, 96.)

This treaty left Dionysius at leisure to continue the ambitious projects in which he had previously engaged against the Greek cities in Italy. Already, before the Carthaginian war, he had secured the alliance of the Locrians by marrying Doris, the daughter of one of their principal citizens. Rhegium, on the contrary, had been uniformly hostile to him, and was the chief place of refuge of the Syracusan exiles. (Diód. xiv. 40.) Hence Dionysius established at Messana, after its destruction by Himilco, a colony of citizens from Locri and its kindred city of Medma, to be a stronghold against Rhegium. (xiv. 78.) His designs in this quarter attracted so much attention, that the principal Greek cities in Italy, which were at the same time hard pressed by the Locrians of the interior, concluded a league for their common defence at once against the barbarians and Dionysius. The latter retaliated by entering into alliance with the Locrians, and sending a fleet to their assistance under his brother Leptines, c. 390. (xiv. 91, 100—102.) The next year he gained a decisive victory over the combined forces of the Italian Greeks at the river Helorus; and this success was followed by the reduction of Caulonia, Hipponium, and finally, after a siege protracted for nearly eleven months, of Rhegium itself, c. 387. (xiv. 100—108, 111.) The inhabitants of the conquered cities, driven by their master part, remained to Syracusan, and their territory given to the Locrians.

Dionysius was now at the summit of his greatness, and during the twenty years that elapsed from this period to his death, possessed an amount of power and influence far exceeding those enjoyed by any other Greek before the time of Alexander. In Sicily he held undisputed rule over the eastern half of the island, while the principal cities of the interior and those along the north coast, as far as Cephaloedium, were either subject to him, or held by his close and dependent allies. (xiv. 78, 96.) In Italy it is difficult to estimate the precise extent of his influence; direct dominion he had apparently none. But his allies, the Locrians, were masters of the whole southern extremity of the peninsula, and his powerful fleets gave him the command both of the Tyrrenian and Adriatic seas. In the former he repressed the piracies of the Etruscans, and, under pretence of retaliation, led a fleet of 60 triremes against them, with which he took the town of Pyrgi, the port of Caere, and plundered its wealthy temple of Macta. (Diód. xiv. 14; Strab. v. 226; Paus.-Aristot. Oeconom. ii. 2.) On this occasion he is also said to have assaulted Corsica (Strab. L. c.), but probably did not form any permanent establishment there. The sovereignty of the Adriatic seems to have been a favourite object of his ambition. He endeavoured to secure it by establishing a colony on the island of Lissa, or, according to other accounts, at Lisac in Epirus (comp. Scymn. Chis, 1. 412; Diod. xv. 13, 14), where he kept up a considerable naval force, and another at Adria in Picenum. (Eutym. Magn. s. v. Ἀλβια.) Ancora too was probably founded by him at the same time. (Plin. H. N. ii. 13; Strab. v. p. 241; Arnold's Rome, vol. i. p. 437.) With the same view he sent a squadron to assist the Lucanians in conquering the Achaean Greeks from establishing themselves at Coreya, u. c. 373. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2, §§ 4, 53.) The extent of his commercial relations may be inferred from his importing horses for his chariots from the Venetian tribes at the head of the Adriatic, (Strab. v. p. 212.) As early as u. c. 402 he is mentioned as sending large supplies of corn to relieve a scarcity at Rome. (Liv. iv. 52; Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. ii. p. 564.) At the same time he took every opportunity of extending his relations with foreign powers, and strengthening himself by alliances. Thus we find him assisting the Illyrians against their neighbours the Moesians (Diod. xiv. 19), and concluding a treaty with the Gauls, the latterly made their appearance in Italy, and who continued from this time to furnish a considerable part of his mercenary troops. (Justin. xx. 5; Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 30, 31.) In Greece itself he cultivated the friendship of the Macedonians, to whose support he had been greatly indebted in the earlier days of his rule (Diod. xiv. 10, 70); and among the last acts of his reign was the sending an auxiliary force in two successive years to support them against the increasing power of the Thebans. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 26, 28; Diod. xiv. 70.) He also conciliated, but by what means we know not, the favour of the Athenians, so that they bestowed upon him the freedom of their city. (Epist. Philipp. op. Dion, p. 176, ed. Beka.) The peace with Carthage did not remain uninter rupted during the whole of this period, but the wars were not of any great importance, and are not known to us in detail. In u. c. 363 the intrigues of Dionysius with the subject allies of Carthage led to a renewal of hostilities. Two great battles, the sites of both of which are uncertain, decided the fortune of the war. In the first Dionysius was completely victorious, and Mago, the Carthaginian general, fell; but in the second the Syracusans were defeated with great slaughter. Peace was concluded soon after, by which the river Halycaus was fixed as the boundary of the two states (Xen. Hell. vii. 15, 16; Diod. xv. 15, 17.) Dionysius seems to have been again the aggressor in a fresh war which broke out in n. c. 368, and in which he a second time advanced with his army to the extreme western point of Sicily, and laid siege to Lilybaeum. Hostilities were however suspended on the approach of winter, and before they could be resumed Dionysius died at Syracuse, u. c. 367. His last illness is said to have been brought on by excessive feasting; but according to some accounts, his death was hastened by his medical attendants, in order to secure the succession for his son. (Diod. xvi. 74; Plut. Dion. 6; Corn. Nep. Dion, 2.) After the death of his first wife, Dionysius had married almost exactly at the same time—some said even on the same day—Doris, a Locrian of distinguished birth, and Aristomache, a Syracuse, the daughter of his old patron and supporter Hipparinus. (Diod. xiv. 44; Plut. Dion, 8.) By the former he had three children, of which the eldest was his successor, Dionysius. Aristomache bore him two sons, Hipparinus and Nyseus, and two daughters, Sophrosyne and Arato. (Plut. Dion, 6; Corn. Nep. Dion, 1; Athen. x. pp. 453—6.)

The character of Dionysius has been drawn in the blackest colours by many ancient writers; he appears indeed to have become a sort of type of a tyrant, in its worst sense, and it is probable that many of the anecdotes that he invented do not concern him. Cicero, Aelian, Polyaelus, and other later writers, are grossly exaggerated; but the very circumstance that he was so regarded in opposition to Gelon and others of the older tyrants (see Plut. Dion, 5) is in itself a proof that the opprobrium was not altogether undeserved. He was undoubtedly a man of great energy and activity of mind, as well as great personal courage; but he was altogether unscrupulous in the means which he employed to attain his ends, and had no thought beyond his own personal aggrandizement. Thus while he boasted that he left to his son an empire held together with bonds of iron (Plut. Dion, 7), he himself had exhausted his subjects of every resource by iron, and was obliged to have recourse to every kind of expedient to amass money. (Aristot. Pol. v. 11; Pseud-Aristot. Oecoon. ii. 2. The statements of the latter must be received with caution, but they are conclusive as to the general fact.) Diodorus tells us that, when his power became firmly established, he abated much of his former severity (xiv. 45), and he gave a signal instance of clemency in his treatment of the Italian Greeks who had fallen into his power at the battle of the Helorus. (Diod. xiv. 105.) But it is probable that the long possession of absolute power had an injurious effect upon his character, and much apparent inconsistence may be accounted for in this manner. In his latter years he became extremely suspicious, and apprehensive of treachery even from his nearest friends, and is said to have adopted the most excessive precautions to guard against it. Many of these stories have however an air of great exaggeration. (Cic. Tusc. v. 20; Plut. Dion. 9.)

Though his government was oppressive in a financial point of view, Dionysius seems to have contributed much to the greatness of Syracuse itself, both by increasing the population with the inhabitants removed from many conquered cities, and by adorning it with splendid temples and other public edifices, so as to render it unquestionably the most splendid and stately of all the Greek cities. It was extremely suspicious, and apprehensive of treachery even from his nearest friends, and is said to have adopted the most excessive precautions to guard against it. Many of these stories have however an air of great exaggeration. (Cic. Tusc. v. 20; Plut. Dion. 9.)

At the same time he displayed his magnificence by sending splendid deputations to the Olympic games, and rich presents both to Olympia and Delphi. (Diod. xiv. 109, xvi. 57.) Nor was he without literary ambition. In the midst of his political and military cares he devoted himself assiduously to poetry, and not only caused his poems to be publicly recited at the Olympic games, but repeatedly contended for the prize of tragedy at Athens. Here he several times obtained the second and third prizes; and, finally, just before his death, bore away the first prize at the Lenaea, with a play called "The Ransom of Hector." These honours seem to prove that his poetry could not have been altogether so contemplatable as it is represented by later writers; but only the titles of some of his dramas and a few detached lines are preserved to us. He is especially blamed for the use of far-fetched and unusual expressions. (Diod. xiv. 109; xv. 74; Tzetz. Chil. v. 176—183; Cic. Tusc. v. 22; Lucian, adv. Inde-"Ul.] (Hallerius, ap. Cicero, 304; p. 532. ed. Beck.) Some fragments of his works will be found in Stobæus (Flor. 38.2; 28.6; 48.9; 98.30; 105.2; 125.8; Eudoxas, i. 4.19) and in Athenaeus. (ix. p. 401. f.)

In accordance with the same spirit we find him seeking the society of men distinguished in literature and philosophy, entertaining the poet Philoxenus at his table, patronizing the Pythagorean philosophers, who were at this time numerous in Italy and Sicily, and inviting Plato to Syracuse. He however soon after sent the latter away from Sicily in disgrace; and though the story of his having caused him to be sold as a slave, as well as of his having sent Philoxenus to the stone quarries for ridiculing his political verses, are probably groundless, yet they may well have been so far founded in fact, that his intercourse with these persons was interrupted by some sudden burst of capricious violence. (Diod. xvi. 6.7; Plut. Dion. 5; Lucian, adv. Indec. § 15; Tzetz. Chil. v. 132, &c.; but compare Athen. i. p. 6, e.) He is also said to have avenged himself upon Plato in a more legitimate manner by writing a play against him. (Tzetz. Chil. v. 182—183.)

The history of Dionysius was written by his friend and contemporary Philistus, as well as by Biphorus and Timaeus; but none of these authors are now extant. Dioborus is our chief, indeed almost our sole, authority for the events of his reign. An excellent review of his government and character is given in Arnold's History of Rome. (Vol. i. c. 21.) Mitford's elaborate account of his reign is rather an apology than a history, and is very inaccurate as well as partial. [E. H. B.]

DIONYSIUS (Διόνυσις) the Younger, tyrant of Syracuse, son of the preceding, succeeded his father in the possession of supreme power at Syracuse, B.C. 357. Something like the form of a popular election, or at least the confirmation of his power by the people, appears to have been thought necessary; but it could have been merely nominal, as the amount of his mercenary force and the fortifications of the citadel secured him the virtual sovereignty. (Diod. xvi. 74.) Dionysius was at this time under thirty years of age; he had been brought up at his father's court in idleness and luxury, and studiously precluded from taking any part in public affairs. (Plut. Dion. 9.) The consequences of this education were quickly manifested as soon as he ascended the throne: the ascendency which Dion, and through his means Plato, obtained for a time over his mind was undermined by flatterers and the companions of his pleasures, who persuaded him to give himself up to the most unbounded dissipation. Of the public events of his reign, which lasted between eleven and twelve years (Diod. xv. 73; Clinton, F. H. ii. p. 268), we have very little information: he seems to have succeeded to his father's influence in the south of Italy, and to have doubled his possessions in Sicily, and to have followed up his views in regard to the Adriatic, for which end he founded two cities in Apulia. We also find him sending a third auxiliary force to the assistance of the Lacedæmonians. (Xen., Hell. vii. 4, § 12.) But his character was peaceable and indolent; he hastened to conclude by a treaty the war with the Carthaginians, in which he found himself engaged on his accession; and the only other war that he undertook was one against the Lucanians, probably in defence of his Italian allies, which he quickly bought off. (Diod. xvi. 5.) Philistus, the historian, who, after having been one of his father's chief supporters, had been subsequently banished by him, enjoyed the highest place in the confidence of the younger Dionysius, and appears to have been changed with the conduct of all his military enterprises. Notwithstanding his advanced age, he is represented as rather encouraging than repressing the excesses of Dionysius, and joining with the party who sought to overthrow the power of Dion, and ultimately succeeded in driving him into exile. The banishment of Dion contributed to render Dionysius unpopular among the Syracusans, who began also to despise him for his indolent and dissolute life, as well as for his habitual drunkenness. Yet his court seems to have been at this time a great place of resort for philosophers and men of letters; beside Plato, whom he induced by the most urgent entreaties to pay him a second visit, Aristippus of Cyrene, Eudosius of Cnidus, Spesippus, and others, are stated to have spent some time with him at Syracuse; and he cultivated a friendly intercourse with Archytas and the Pythagoreans of Magna Graecia. (Plut. Dion, 18—20; Diog. Laërt. iii. 21, 25; Aelian, V. H. iv. 18, vii. 17; Pseudo-Plut. Epist. 6.) Much doubt indeed attaches to all the stories related by Plutarch and other late writers concerning the intercourse of Plato with Dionysius, but they can hardly have been altogether destitute of foundation.

Dionysius was absent from Syracuse at the time that Dion landed in Sicily: the news of that event and of the sudden defection of the Syracusans reached him at Caulonia, and he instantly returned to Syracuse, where the citadel still held out for him. But his attempts at negotiation having proved abortive, the sallies of his troops having been repulsed, and the fleet which Philistus had brought to his succour having been defeated, he despaired of success, and sailed away to Italy with his most valuable property, leaving the citadel of Syracuse in charge of his son, Apollocrates, B.C. 355. (Diod. xvi. 11—13, 16, 17; Plut. Dion, 26—37.)

Dionysius now repaired to Locri, the native city of his mother, Doris, where he was received in the most friendly manner by the inhabitants—a confidence of which he availed himself to occupy the citadel with an armed force, and thus to establish himself as tyrant of the city. This position he continued to hold for several years, during which period he is said to have treated the inhabitants with the utmost cruelty, at the same time that he indulged in the most extravagant licentiousness. (Justin, xxi. 2, 3; Clearch. ap. Athen. xil. p. 541; Strab. vi. p. 259; Aristot. Pol. v. 7.) Meanwhile the revolutions which had taken place at Syracuse seem to have prepared the way for his return. The history of these is very imperfectly known to us: but, after the death of Dion, one tyrant followed another with almost equal rapidity. Cornelius, the murderer of Dion, was in his turn driven from the city by Hipparchus (son of the elder Dionysius by Aristomenes, and therefore nephew of Dion), who reigned but two years: another of Dion's nephews, DIONYSIUS.

Nysaeus, subsequently obtained the supreme power, and was in possession of it when Dionysius presented himself before Syracuse with a fleet, and became master of the city by treachery. According to Plutarch, this took place in the tenth year after his expulsion, B. C. 346. (Didot. xvi. 31; Justin, xxii. 3; Athen. xii. p. 508; Plut. Timol. 1.) The Locrians meanwhile took advantage of his absence to revolt against him: they drove out the garrison which he had left, and wreaked their vengeance in the most cruel manner on his wife and daughters. (Srab. vi. p. 260; Clearch. ap. Athen. xii. p. 541.) Dionysius was not however able to reestablish himself firmly in his former power. Most of the other cities of Sicily had shaken off the yoke of Syracuse, and were governed severally by petty tyrants: one of these, Hieron, who had established himself at Leontini, afforded a rallying point to the dissatisfied Syracusans, with whom he joined in making war on Dionysius, and succeeded in gaining possession of the greater part of the city, and blockading the tyrant anew in the fortress on the island. It was in this state of things that Timoleon arrived in Sicily. His arms were not indeed directed in the first instance against Dionysius, but against Hieron and his Carthaginian allies; but his rapid successes and the general respect entertained for his character induced Dionysius, who was still blockaded in the citadel, and appears to have abandoned all hope of ultimate success, to treat with him rather than the opposite party. He accordingly surrendered the fortress of Ortigia into the hands of Timoleon, on condition of being allowed to depart in safety to Corinth, B. C. 343. (Didot. xxii. 53-59; Plut. Timol. 8-12.) Here he spent the remainder of his life in a private condition, and is said to have frequented low company, and sunk gradually into a very degraded and abject state. According to some writers, he was reduced to support himself by keeping a school; others say, that he became one of the attendants on the rites of Cybèle, a set of mendicant priests of the lowest class. His weak and voluptuous character render these stories by no means improbable, although it seems certain that he was in the first instance allowed to take with him a considerable portion of his wealth, and must have occupied an honourable position, as we find him admitted to familiar intercourse with Philip of Macedon. Some anecdotes are preserved of him that indicate a ready wit and considerable shrewdness of observation. (Plut. Timol. 14, 15; Justin, xxi. 5; Clearch. ap. Athen. xii. p. 541; Aelian, V. H. vi. 12; Cic. Tusco. iii. 12.)

There are no authentic coins of either of the two Dionysii: probably the republican forms were still so far retained, notwithstanding their virtual despotism, that all coins struck under their rule bore the name of the city only. According to Müller (Archiv. d. K. Kunst. p. 128), the splendid silver coin, of the weight of ten drachms, commonly known as Syracuse medallions, belong for the most part to the period of their two reigns. Certain Purian coins, one of which is represented in the annexed cut, are commonly ascribed to the younger Dionysius, but only by the authority of Gultius (a noted falsifier of coins and their inscriptions), who has published a similar coin with the name DIONYSI. [E. H. B.]

DIONYSIUS, PAPPRIUS, prefectus annonae under Commodus. Having procured by his intrigues the destruction of the favourite Cleander [CLEANDER], he himself soon after fell a victim to the cruelty of the tyrant. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 13, 14.) [W. R.]

DIONYSIUS (Διονύσιος), literary. The number of persons of this name in the history of Greek literature is very great. Meursius was the first that collected a list of them and added some account of each (Gronov. Theor. Anti. Graec. x. p. 577, &c.); his list has been still further increased by Jonas (Hist. Philos. Script. iii. 6, p. 42, &c.), and by Fabritius (Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 405), so that at present upwards of one hundred persons of the name of Dionysius are known. The list given by Suidas is full of the utmost confusion. The following list contains all, with the exception of those mentioned in an isolated passage merely.

1. AElius DIONYSIUS, a Greek rhetorician of Halicarnassus, who lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian. He was a very skilful musician, and wrote several works on music and its history. (Suid. s. a. Διονύσιος.) It is commonly supposed that he was a descendant of the elder Dionysius of Halicarnassus, the author of the Roman Archaeology. Respecting his life nothing further is known. The Danaid of Theocritus is attributed to him by the ancients: 1. A Dictionary of Attic words (Accepted ἀνακαρά), in five books, dedicated to one Scymnus. Photius (Bibl. Cod. 152) speaks in high terms of its usefulness, and states, that Aelius Dionysius himself made two editions of it, the second of which was a great improvement upon the first. Both editions appear to have existed in the time of Photios. It seems to have been owing to this work that Aelius Dionysius was called sometimes by the surname of Atticist. Meursius was of opinion that our Dionysius was the author of the work περὶ ἀνακάρας τῶν ἔρωτων καὶ ἐγκακακαράνων λέξεων, which was published by Aelius Mammmius (Venice, 1406) in the volume entitled Ἡ Ἑρώταναῦ, but there is no evidence for this supposition. (Comp. Schol. V. n. H. x. 705; Villisoa, Prolegom. ad Hist. ii. p. xxix.) 2. A history of Music (μουσική ἴστορια) in 36 books, with accounts of citharedeo, aulete, and poets of all kinds. (Suid. l. c.) 3. Ρημαία ἔρευναι, in 24 books. (Suid. l. c.) 4. Μουσικής παιδ. ἡ ἐπιστείρα, in 22 books. (Suid. l. c.) 5. A work in 5 books on what Plato had said about music in his πολιτσία. (Suid. l. c.; Eudoc. p. 131.) 6. Bishop of ALEXANDRIA, was probably a native of the same city. He was born of pagan parents, who were persons of rank and influence. He studied the doctrines of the various philosophic sects, and this led him at last to embrace Christ. Dionysius, who was one of his teachers, had probably great influence upon this step of his pupil. After having been a presbyter for some time, he succeeded, about A. D. 232, Hermes as the head of the theological school at Alexandria, and after the death of Hermes, who had been raised to the bishopric of Alexandria, Dionysius succeeded him in the see, A.D. 247. During the persecution of the Christians by Decius, Dionysius was seized by the soldiers and carried to Taposiris, a small town between Alexandria and Canopus, probably with a view of putting him to death there. But he escaped from captivity in a manner which he himself describes very minutely (op. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 48). He had, however, to suffer still more severely in A.D. 257, during the persecution which the emperor Valerian instituted against the Christians. Dionysius made an open confession of his faith before the emperor's praetext Aemilianus, and was exiled in consequence to Cepho, a desert district of Libya, whither he was compelled to proceed forthwith, although he was severely ill at the time. After an exile of three years, an edict of Gallienus in favour of the Christians enabled him to return to Alexandria, where henceforth he was extremely zealous in combating heretical opinions. In his attacks against Sabellius he was carried so far by his zeal, that he uttered things which were themselves inconsistent with the orthodox faith; but when he heard the account by Dionysius, bishop of Rome, who convoyed a synod for the purpose, he readily owned that he had acted rashly and inconsiderately. In A.D. 265 he was invited to a synod at Antioch, to dispute with Paulus of Samosata, but being prevented from going thither by old age and infirmity, he wrote a letter to the synod on the subject of the controversy to be discussed, and soon after, in the same year, he died, after having occupied the see of Alexandria for a period of seventeen years. The church of Rome regards Dionysius as a saint, and celebrates his memory on the 18th of October. We learn from Epiphanius (Haeres. 69), that at Alexandria a church was dedicated to him. Dionysius wrote a considerable number of theological works, consisting partly of treatises and partly of epistles addressed to the heads of churches and to communities, but all that is left of us them consists of fragments preserved in Eusebius and others. A complete list of his works is given by Cave, from which we mention only the most important. 1. On Promises, in two books, was directed against Nepos, and two considerable fragments of it are still extant. (Euseb. P. E. ii. 28, vii. 24.) 2. A work addressed to Dionysius, bishop of Rome, in four books or epistles, against Sabellius. Dionysius here excused the hasty assertions of which he himself had been guilty in attacking Sabellius. A great number of fragments and extracts of it are preserved in the writings of Athanasius and Basilios. 3. A work addressed to Timotheus, "On Nature," of which extracts are preserved in Eusebius. (Proc. Eccle. iv. 23, 27.) Of his Epistles also numerous fragments are extant in the works of Eusebius. All that is extant of Dionysius, is collected in Gallandi's Bibli. Patri. iii. p. 481, &c., and in the separate collection by Simon de Magistris, Rome, 1796, fol. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 95, &c.) 3. Of Alexandria, a son of Chaeus, a Greek grammian, who flourished from the time of Nero to that of Trajan. He was secretary and librarian to the emperors in whose reign he lived, and was an active proselytizer. He was the teacher of the grammian Parthenius, and a pupil of the philosopher Charesemon, whom he also succeeded at Alexandria. (Athen. xi. p. 501; Suid. s. v. Θεάστρος; Eudoc. p. 123.)

4. Of Antioch, a sophist, who seems to have been a Christian, and to be the same person as the one to whom the fourteenth letter of Aeneas of Gaza is addressed. He himself is the reputed author of 40 letters, which are still extant. A Latin version of them was first printed by G. Cognatius in his Collectanea Gregoriana, 1554, 12mo. and afterwards in J. Buchler's "Thesaurus Epist. Lacon.," 1606, 12mo. The Greek original was first edited by H. Stephens, in his Collection of Greek Epistles, Paris, 1577, 8vo. Meursius is inclined to attribute these Epistles to Dionysius of Miletus, without, however, assigning any reason for it.

5. Surnamed Areopagita, an Athenian, who is called by Suidas a most eminent man, who rose to the height of Greek erudition. He is said to have first studied at Athens, and afterwards at Hellepolis in Egypt. When he observed in Egypt the eclipse of the sun, which occurred during the crucifixion of Jesus Christ, he is said to have exclaimed, "either God himself is suffering, or he is compensating himself with some one who is suffering." On his return to Athens he was made one of the council of the Areopagus, whence he derives his surname. About A.D. 50, when St. Paul preached at Athens, Dionysius became a Christian (The Acts, xvii. 34), and it is said that he was not the first bishop of Athens, but that he was installed in that office by St. Paul himself. (Euseb. H. E. iii. 4, iv. 23; Suidas.) He is further said to have died the death of a martyr under most cruel tortures. Whether Dionysius Areopagita ever wrote anything, is highly uncertain; but there exists under his name a number of works of a mystico-Christian nature, which contain ample evidence that they are the productions of some Neo-Platonist, and can scarcely have been written before the fifth or sixth century of our era. Without entering upon any detail about those works, which would be out of place here, we need only remark, that they exercised a very great influence upon the formation and development of Christianity in the middle ages. At the time of the Carolingian emperors, those works were introduced into western Europe in a Latin translation made by Sextus Erigena, and gave the first impulse to that mystic and scholastic theology which afterwards maintained itself for centuries. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. viii. 27. 23; &c.; Bahr, Gesch. der Röm. Lit. in Karoling. Zeitalter, § 187.)

6. A son of Areus, the teacher and friend of Augustine, who also profited by his intercourse with the sons of Areus, Dionysius, and Nicomai. (Sueton. Avg. 89; comp. Areus.)

7. Surnamed Ascaphus, seems to have written an exegesis of the Theodote, a melic poem on Eros. (Euth. M. s. v. Ασκαφος; Athen. xi. p. 475.)

8. Of Argos, seems to have been an historian, as he is quoted by Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 189) respecting the time at which Troy was taken. (Comp. Sophil. ad Find. Numa. i. 1.)

9. Of Athens, is quoted by the Scholarist on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 279) as the author of a work entitled 'Deorum. Rhetoricus.' He is a pupil of Isis, the reading κηριευς should be corrected into κηριευς, and not into κηριευς, as Sylburg proposes.

10. A freedman of Atticus, whose full name
DIONYSIUS.

therefore was T. Pomponius Dionysius. Both Cicero and Atticus were very much attached to him. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 6, 11, 13, 15.)

11. A native of Bithynia, a dactylic or Megarian philosopher, who was the teacher of Theodorus the Cynic. (Strab. xii. p. 566; Diog. Laërt. ii. 93.)

12. Of Byzantium, appears to have lived before the time of the emperor Severus, that is, before a. d. 197, and is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Θρησκείας) and Suidas as the author of αὐτάκειον Βοστάρων. Suidas further calls him an epic poet, and states that he also wrote on the species of poetry called Συθροτή. Some writers have believed that our Dionysius of Byzantium is the same as the one whose Periégesis is still extant, but this opinion is without foundation, and based only on the opinion of Suidas. The αὐτάκειον Βοστάρων seems to have existed complete down to the 16th century, for P. Gyllius in his work on the Thracian Bosporus gave a considerable portion of it in a Latin translation. G. J. Vossius obtained a copy of a fragment of it, which his son Isaac had taken at Florence, and that fragment, which is now only the part of the Anaplati-us Known to us, is printed in Du Cange's Constantiniopolis Christiana, in Hudson's Geogr. Minor. vol. iii., and in Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 664, note 1. (Comp. Bernhardy in his edition of Dionys. Periegy. p. 492.)

13. DIONYSIUS CAUSUS. [CAUSUS, p. 826.]

14. DIONYSIUS CATO. [CATO, p. 564.]

15. Of Chalcis, a Greek historian, who lived before the Christian era. He wrote a work on the foundation of towns (writer) in five books, which is frequently referred to by the ancients. A considerable number of fragments of the work have thus been preserved, but its author is otherwise unknown. (Marcian. Herod. Peripl. p. 5; Suid. s. v. Χαλκαδίην; Harmon. s. v. Ἡρακλείαν and Χαλκαί τέχνες; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 558, 1024, iv. 264, ad Aristoph. Nub. 397; Dionys. Hal. A. R. i. 72; Strab. xii. p. 566; Plut. de Med. Herod. 22; Seymuns, 115; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 144; Zenob. Prover. v. 64; Apostol. xviii. 25; Ploutius, s. v. Παραβίαν, Τελειατίων; Budoc. 438.)

16. Surnamed Chalcus (δ χαλκοῦς), an ancient Attic poet and orator, who derived his surname from his having advised the Athenians to coin money for the purpose of facilitating traffic. (Ath. xv. p. 669.) Of his oratory we know nothing: but his poems, chiefly elegies, are often referred to and quoted. (Plut. Nās. 5; Aristot. Rhét. iii. 2; Athen. xv. pp. 668, 702, x. p. 443, xiii. p. 602.) The fragments extant refer chiefly to symposiac subjects. Aristotle censures him for his bad metaphors, and in the fragments extant we still perceive a great fondness of raising the importance of common things by means of far-fetched images and allegories. The time at which he lived is accurately determined by the statement of Plutarch, that Nicias had in his house a highly accomplished man of the name of Chalcus, who gave himself out to be a son of Dionysius Chalcus, the leader of the Attic colony to Thurii in Italy, which was founded in n. c. 444. (Comp. Phot. s. v. Θρησκείαις, where we have probably to read χαλκοῦς instead of χαλκαδίην.) It is true, that other writers mention different persons as the leaders of that colony to Thurii, but Dionysius may certainly have been one of them. (Osim. Beiträge z. Griech. u. Röm. Lit. i. p. 79, &c.; Weale, in the Rhét. et Tægen. (Bonn.) viii. 186, p. 440, &c.; Herige, Poet. Gr. Grec. (Ant. 432), etc., where the fragments of Dionysius are collected.)

17. Of Charax, in Susiana on the Arabian gulf, lived in the time of Augustus, who sent him to the east that he might record all the exploits of his grandson on his Parthian and Arabian expedition. (Plin. H. N. vi. 31.)

18. A slave of Cicero, and a person of considerable literary attainments, for which reason Cicero employed him to instruct his son Marcus, and was greatly attached to him. Cicero praises him in several passages for his attachment, learning, and honesty, and appears to have rewarded his virtues by emancipating him. At a later period, however, he complains of his want of gratitude, and at last he felt obliged to dismiss him, though he very much regretted the loss of so able a teacher. Subsequently, however, the parties became reconciled. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, 17, 18, v. 3, ix. 3, 12, 15, vi. 1, 2, viii. 4, 5, 7, 8, 18, 26, viii. 4, 5, 10, x. 2, xiii. 2, 53, ad Fam. vii. 24. 50.) A son of this Dionysius is mentioned by Seneca. (Controv. i. 4.)

19. A slave of Cicero, who employed him as reader and librarian; but Dionysius robbed his master of several books, and then escaped to Lilyrium. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 3, ad Fam. v. 3, 10, 11, 13, xiii. 77.)

20. Of Colophon, forged conjointly with Zopyrus some works which they published under the name of Menaippus, the Cynic. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 100; Schol. ad Aristoph. An. 1260.)

21. Of Corinth, an epic poet, who wrote some metrical works, such as Advice for Life (μορφής), on Canace (είναι); Suid. s. v. Απολλοσίου; Plut. Amynt. 17), and Meteorologia. In prose he wrote a commentary on Herod. Suidas also mentions a periegesis of the earth, but this is in all probability the production of a different person, Dionysius Periegetes. (Eudoc. p. 152.) Some also believe that he was the author of a metrical work, Αδέρα, which was likewise the work of a different person. (Bernhardy, in his edition of Dionys. Periegy. p. 492, &c.)

22. Bishop of Corinna in the latter half of the second century after Christ, distinguished himself among the polemics of his time by his piety, his eloquence, and the holiness of his life. He not only watched with the greatest care over his own diocese, but shewed a deep interest in the welfare of other communities and provinces, to which he addressed admonitory epistles. He died the death of a martyr, about a. d. 178. None of his numerous epistles is now extant, but a list of them is preserved in Basilius (H. E. iv. 28) and Hieronymus (de Script. 27), and a few fragments of them are extant in Eusébius (ii. 25, iv. 29). In one of them Dionysius complains that during his lifetime some of his epistles had been interpolated by heretics for the purpose of supporting their own views. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 44.)

23. Bishop of Ephesus, who succeeded Polyclitus as the head of the Epicurean school at Athens. He himself was succeeded by Basilides, and must therefore have lived about n. c. 200. (Diog. Laërt. x. 25.) Brucker confounds him with the Stoic surnamed δ ομομελέων, who afterwards abandoned the Stoics and went over to the Cyrenaics. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 4.)
24. A Greek grammarian, who instructed Plato when a boy in the elements of grammar. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 5; Appuleius, de Dogmat. Plat. i. 2; Olympiod. Vitr. Plat. p. 6, ed. Fischer.) He is probably the same person as the Dionysius who is mentioned in the beginning of Plato's dialogue "E poerat."

25. Of Haliacarnassus, the most celebrated among the ancient writers of the name of Dionysius. He was the son of one Alexander of Haliacarnassus, and was born, according to the calculation of Dodwell, between b.c. 78 and 54. Strabo (xiv. p. 586) calls him his own contemporary. His death took place soon after b.c. 7, the year in which he completed and published his work on the geography of Rome. Respecting his parents and education we know nothing, nor any thing about his position in his native place before he emigrated to Rome; though some have inferred from his work on rhetoric, that he enjoyed a great reputation at Haliacarnassus. All that we know for certain is, the information which he himself gives us in the introduction to his history of Rome (i. 7), and a few more particulars which we may glean from his other works. According to his own account, he went to Italy immediately after the termination of the civil wars, about the middle of Oct. 187, that is, b.c. 29. Henceforth he resided at Rome, and the twenty-two years which followed his arrival at Rome were mainly spent by him in making himself acquainted with the Latin language and literature, and in collecting materials for his great work on Roman history, called Archaiologia. We may assume that, like other rhetoricians of the time, he had commenced his career as a teacher of rhetoric at Haliacarnassus; and his works bear strong evidence of his having been similarly occupied at Rome. (De Cons. Ver. 20, Rhetor. 10.) There he lived on terms of friendship with many distinguished men, such as Q. Aurelius Tiberio, and the rhetorician Caecilius; and it is not improbable that he may have received the Roman franchise, but his Roman name is not mentioned anywhere. Respecting the little we know about Dionysius, see F. M. Th. de Dionysii Heli. Wagenberg, 1778, 4to.; Dodwell, de Actae Diogen. in Reiske's edition of Dionysius, vol. i. p. xlv. &c.; and more especially C. J. Weissen, de Dionysii Heli. Vita et Script. Rinteln, 1837, 4to., and Busse, de Dionys. Ital. Vita et Ingenio, Berlin, 1841, 4to.

All the works of Dionysius, some of which are completely lost, must be divided into two classes: the first contains his rhetorical and critical treatises, all of which probably belong to an earlier period of his life—perhaps to the first years of his residence at Rome—than his historical works, which constitute the second class.

a. Rhetorical and Critical Works.—All the productions of this class shew that Dionysius was not only a rhetorician of the first order, but also a most excellent critic in the highest and best sense of the term. They abound in the most exquisite remarks and criticisms on the works of the classical writers of Greece, although, at the same time, they are not without their faults, among which we may notice his hypercritical severity. But we have to remember that they were the productions of an early age, in which the want of a sound philosophy and of a comprehensive knowledge, and a partiality for or against certain writers led him to express opinions which at a matureer age he undoubtedly regretted. Still, however this may be, he always evinces a well-founded contempt for the shallow sophistries of ordinary rhetoricians, and strives instead to make rhetoric something practically useful, and by his criticisms to contribute towards elevating and ennobling the minds of his readers. The following works of this class are still extant: 1. Τύχη τουρτική, addressed to one Echeocrates. The present condition of this work is by no means calculated to give us a correct idea of his merits and of his views on the subject of rhetoric. It consists of twelve, or according to some, of eleven chapters, which have no internal connection whatever, and have the appearance of being put together merely by accident. The treatise is therefore generally looked upon as a collection of rhetorical essays by different authors, some of which are genuine productions of Dionysius, who is expressly stated by Quintilian (iii. i. § 16) to have written a manual of rhetoric. Schott, the last learned editor of this work, divides it into four sections. Chap. 1 to 7, with the exclusion of the 6th, which is certainly spurious, may be entitled περὶ παραγγελίας, and contains some incoherent comments upon epidemic oratory, which are anything but the productions of one of the known views of Dionysius as developed in other treatises; in addition to which, Nicostatus, a rhetorician of the age of Aelius Aristides, is mentioned in chap. 2. Chapters 8 and 9, περὶ εγχαιματισμῶν, treat on the same subject, and chap. 3 may be the production of Dionysius; whereas the 9th certainly belongs to a later rhetorician. Chapter 10, περὶ τῶν ἐν μέλτας πλημμελημένων, is a very valuable treatise, and probably the work of Dionysius. The 11th chapter is only a further development of the 10th, just as the 9th chapter is of the 8th. The τύχη τουρτική is edited separately with very valuable prolegomena and notes by H. A. Schott, Leipzig, 1804, 8vo. 2. Περὶ συνδέσεως θρησκείας, addressed to Rufus Meltius, the son of a friend of Dionysius, was probably written in the first year or years of his residence at Rome, and at all events previous to any of the other works still extant. It is, however, notwithstanding this, one of high excellence. In it the author treats of eccentrical power, and on the combination of words according to the different species and styles of oratory. There are two very good separate editions of this treatise, one by G. H. Schaefer (Leipzig, 1809, 8vo), and the other by F. Gölker (Jena, 1815, 8vo), in which the text is considerably improved from MSS. 3. Περὶ μεθόδου, addressed to a Greek of the name of Demetrios. Its proper title appears to have been ἐνεργηματισμῷ περὶ τῆς μεθοδος. (Dionys. Juv. de Thaad. 1, Epist. ad Pom., p. 3.) The work as a whole is lost, and what we possess under the title of τῶν ἀρχαίων κριτών is probably nothing but a sort of epitome containing characteristics of poets, from Homer down to Euripides, of some historians, such as Herodotus, Thucy- dides, Philistus, Xenophon, and Theopompus, and lastly, of some philosophers and orators. This epitome is printed separately in Frotscher's edition of the tenth book of Quintilian (Leipzig, 1826, p. 271, &c.), who mainly follows the opinions of Dionysius. 4. Περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων ἀριθμῶν ἐνεργηματισμῷ, addressed to Ammaeus, contains criticisms on the most eminent Greek orators.
and historians, and the author points out their excellence as well as their defects, with a view to preserve a wide instruction of the classic models, and thus to preserve a pure taste in these branches of literature. The work originally consisted of six sections, of which we now possess only the first three, on Lysias, Isocrates, and Iasius. The other sections treated of Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Aeschines; but we have only the first part of the fourth section, which treats of the oratorical power of Demosthenes, and his superiority over other orators. This part is known under the title περὶ ακτιμίας Δαμοσθενέως διηνέκεσσας, which has become current ever since the times of Sylburg, though it is not found in any MS. The beginning of the treatise is mutilated, and the concluding part of it is entirely wanting. Whether Dionysius actually wrote on Hyperides and Aeschines, is not known; for in these, as in other instances, he may have intended and promised to write what he could not afterwards fulfill either from want of leisure or inclination. There is a very excellent German translation of the part relating to Demosthenes, with a valuable dissertation on Dionysius as an aesthetic critic, by A. G. Becker. (Wolfenbüttel and Leipzig, 1829, 8vo.) 5. A treatise addressed to Ammaeus, entitled Εἰστολή πρὸς Αμμακέους προφήτης, which title, however, does not occur in MSS., and instead of προφήτης it ought to be called Εἰστολή διηνέκειας. This treatise or epistle, in which the author shows that most of the orations of Demosthenes had been delivered before Aristotle wrote his Rhetoric, and that consequently Demosthenes had derived no instruction from Aristotle, is of great importance for the history and criticism of the works of Demosthenes. 6. Εἰστολή πρὸς Γνώμων Ποιμηνίων, was written by Dionysius with a view to justify the unfavourable opinion which he had expressed upon Plato, and which Pomponius had condemned. The latter part of this treatise is much mutilated, and did not perhaps originally belong to it. See Vitus Loers, de Dionys. Hol. judicio de Platoni oratione et genera discouri, Treves, 1840, 4to. 7. Περὶ τῶν Θουκυδίδου χαρακτηρῶν καὶ τῶν λογιῶν τὸν συγγράφους θεωροῦν, was written by Dionysius at the request of his friend Q. Aelius Tubero, for the purpose of explaining more minutely what he had written on Thucydides. As Dionysius in this work ... historian from his rhetorical point of view, his judgment is often unjust and incorrect. 8. Περὶ τῶν τοῦ Θουκυδίδου ιδιότητων, is addressed to Ammaeus. The last three treatises are printed in a very good edition by C. G. Kräger under the title Dionysii Historiographiae, i.e. Epistolae ad Ca. Pompeii, Q. Ael. Tubero, et Ammaeum, Halle, 1823, 8vo. The last of the writings of this class still extant is—9. Διαφοράς, a very valuable treatise on the life and orations of Demarchus. Besides these works Dionysius himself mentions some others, a few of which are lost, while others were perhaps never written; though at the time he mentioned them, Dionysius undoubtedly intended to compose them. Among the former we may mention χαρακτηριστικά τῆς Θουκυδίδου, de Comico. Ver. 11, of which a few fragments are still extant, and Προγνωτική ἐπὶ τῆς πολιτικῆς φιλοσοφίας πρὸς τοὺς καταρτίσασις αὑτῷ δίκαιο. (Dionys. Jud. de Thucydi. 2.) A few other works, such as „on the orations unjustly attributed to Lysias“ (Lys. 14), „on the tropical expressions in Plato and Demosthenes“ (Dem. 32), and περὶ τῆς ἐκλογῆς τῶν διομένων (de Com. Ver. 1), are probably never written, as an ancient writer before Dionysius himself makes any mention of them. The work περὶ ἐνθάμνων, which is extant under the name of Demetrius Phalerus, is attributed to some by Dionysius of Halicarnassus; but there is no evidence for this hypothesis, any more than there is for ascribing to him the βίος Ὀμούχου which is printed in Gale’s Opera omnia Mythologica. 10. b. Historical Works.—In this class of compositions, to which Dionysius appears to have devoted his later years, he was less successful than in his critical and rhetorical essays, inasmuch as we everywhere find the rhetorician gaining the ascendancy over the historian. The following historical works of his are known: 1. Χρόνοι απὸ τηριανοῦ. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 520; Suid. s. a. Ποιμηνιός; Dionys. A. R. i. 74.) This work, which is lost, probably contained chronologica investigations, though not concerning Roman history. Photius (Bibl. Cod. 34) mentions an abridgment (σανάφες) in five books, and Stephanos of Byzantium (s. v. Ἀρκετίας καὶ Κοριλαία) quotes the same under the name of ἐντομή. This abridgment, in all probability of the χρόνον, was undoubtedly the work of a late grammarian, and not, as some have thought, of Dionysius himself. The great historical work of Dionysius, of which we still possess a considerable portion, is — 2. Παρασκευὴ Ἀρχαίας, which Photius (Bibl. Cod. 86) styles ἑτορρηκτικά λόγια. It consisted of twenty books, and contained the history of Rome from the earliest or mythical times down to the year B.C. 264, in which the history of Polybius begins with the Punic wars. The first nine books alone are complete; of the tenth and eleventh we have only the greater part; and of the remaining nine we possess nothing but fragments and extemata, which were contained in the collections made at the command of the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and were first published by A. Mai from a MS. in the library of Milan (1816, 4to), and reprinted at Frankfurt, 1817, 8vo. Mai at first believed that these extracts were the abridgment of which Photius (Bibl. Cod. 84) speaks; but this opinion met with such strong opposition from Camphi (Bibl. Ital. viii. p. 225, &c.), Visconti (Journal des Savants, for June, 1817), and Struve (Ueber die Antiquitäten des Mai, condensé, Stieler de Philol. Univ. Hall. Königsberg, 1820, 8vo.), that Mai, when he reprinted the extracts in his Script. Vetus, Nova Collectio (ii. p. 475, &c., ed. Rome, 1827), felt obliged in his preface (p. xvii.) to recant his former opinion, and to agree with his critics in admitting that the extracts were remnants of the extemata of Constantine Porphyrogenitus from the Παρασκευὴ Ἀρχαίας. Respecting their value, see Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, ii. p. 419, note 916, iii. p. 824, note 934, Lectures on Rom. Hist. i. p. 47. Dionysius treated the early history of Rome with a minuteness which raises a suspicion as to his judgment on historical and mythical matters, and the eleven books extant do not carry the history beyond the year B.C. 441, so that the eleventh book breaks off very abruptly as the result of civil legislation. This peculiar minuteness in the early history, however, was in a great measure the consequence of the object he had proposed to himself, and which, as he himself states, was to remove the erroneous notions which the Greeks entertained with regard to Rome's greatness, and to show that Rome had not become great by accident or mere good fortune, but by the virtue and wisdom of the Romans themselves. With this object in view, he discusses most carefully everything relating to the constitution, the religion, the history, laws, and private life of the Romans; and his work is for this reason one of the greatest importance to the student of Roman history, at least so far as the substance of his discussions is concerned. But the manner in which he deals with his materials cannot always be approved of: he is unable to draw a clear distinction between a mere myth and history; and where he perceives inconsistencies in the former, he attempts, by a rationalistic mode of proceeding, to reduce it to what appears to him sober history. It is however a groundless assertion, which some critics have made, that Dionysius invented facts, and thus introduced direct forgeries into history. He had, moreover, no clear notions about the early constitution of Rome, and was led astray by the nature of the institutions which he saw in his own day; and he thus transferred to the early times the notions which he had derived from the actual state of things—a process by which he became involved in inextricable difficulties and contradictions. The numerous speeches which he introduces in his work are indeed written with great artistic skill, but they nevertheless show too manifestly that Dionysius was a rhetorician, not an historian, and still less a statesman. He used all the authors who had written before him on the early history of Rome, but he did not always exercise a proper discretion in choosing his guides, and we often find him following authorities of an inferior class in preference to better and sounder ones. Notwithstanding all this, however, Dionysius contains an inexhaustible treasure of materials for those who know how to make use of them. The style of Dionysius is very good, and, with a few exceptions, his language may be called perfectly pure. See Ph. F. Schulin, de Dionys. Hal. Historico, praecipue Historiae Jaci Ponte, Heidelberg, 1821, 4to.; A. Inquiry of the Credit due to Dionys. of Hal. as a Critic and Historian, in the Class. Journ. vol. xxi.; Krugger, Pragmat. ad Historiae p. 762, and 238, on the Hist. of the Hist. of the 1. pp. 46–53, ed. Schmitz.

The first work of Dionysius which appeared in print was his Archaeologia, in a Latin translation by Lupus Biragus (Troia, 1480), from a very good Roman MS. New editions of this translation, with corrections by Glareanus, appeared at Basel, 1533 and 1544; whereas R. Stephens first edited the Greek original, Paris, 1564, fol., together with some of the rhetorical works. The first complete edition of the Archaeologia and the rhetorical works together, is that of Fr. Syburg, Frankfurt, 1566, 2 vols. fol. (reprinted at Leipzig, 1691, 2 vols. fol.) Another reprint, with the introduction of a few alterations, was edited by Hudson, Oxford, 1704, 2 vols. fol.) which however is a very inferior performance. A new and much improved edition, though with many bad and arbitrary emendations, was made by J. J. Reiske, (Leipzig, 1774, &c.) in 6 vols. 8vo., the last of which was edited by Morus. All the rhetorical works, with the exception of the ἰώνια προτροπῆς and the περὶ συνθέσεως δραμάτων, were edited by E. Gross, (Paris, 1826, &c.) in 3 vols. 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 382, &c.; Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Bereds. § 68.)

26. Of Heliopolis in Egypt, is mentioned by Artemidorus (Oneir. ii. 71) as the author of a work on dreams.

27. Of Heraclitus, a son of Theophrastus. In early life he was a disciple of Hermetaides, Alexinus, and Menander, and afterwards also of Zeno the Stoic, who appears to have induced him to adopt the philosophy of the porch. At a later time he was afflicted with a disease of the eyes, or with a nervous complaint, and the unbearable pains which it caused him led him to abandon the Stoic philosophy, and to join the Eleatics, whose doctrine, that ἔσωθεν and the absence of pain was the highest good, had more charms for him than the more ascetic ethics of the Stoa. This renunciation of his former philosophical creed drew upon him the enmity of ἡμισθείμενοι, i.e. the renegades. During the time that he was a Stoic, he is praised for his modesty, abstinence, and moderation, but afterwards we find him described as a person greatly given to sensual pleasures. He died in his eightieth year of voluntary starvation. Diogenes Laërtius mentions a series of works of Dionysius, all of which, however, are lost, and Cicero censures him for having mixed up verses with his prose, and for his want of elegance and refinement. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 166, 167, v. 92; Athen. vii. p. 201, x. p. 457; Lucian, Bis Acus. 30; Gensorin. 15; Cic. Acad. iii. 22. de Fin. v. 31. Tusc. ii. 11, 35. iii. 6.)

28. A disciple of Heraclitus, is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 15) as the author of a commentary on the works of his master.

29. An Historian, who seems to have lived in the later period of the Roman empire, and is quoted by Jornandes. (De Reb. Got. 19.)

30. Summed Iambus, that is, the iambic poet, is mentioned by Suidas (ε. άροσφράγις) among the teachers of Aristophanes of Byzantium, from which we may infer the time at which he lived. Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. v. p. 674) quotes an hexameter verse of his, and according to Athenaeus (vii. p. 284), he also wrote a work on dialects. Plutarch (de Mus. 15) quotes him as an authority on harmony, from which it has been inferred that he is the author of a work on the history of music, of which Stephonius of Byzantium (α. de Mus. 15) speaks, and which Stephonius wrote a history of a second. Hydaspes in five books. Suidas further attributes to him a work entitled τά μετά Δάρκων in five books, and also a work Proséd, in the Ionic dialect. Whether they were actually three distinct works, or whether the two last were the same, and only a continuation of the first, cannot be ascertained on account of the inextricable confusion which prevails in the articles Δάρκων of Suidas, in consequence of which our Dionysius has often been confounded with DIONYSIUS.

DIONYSIUS.

Dionysius of Mytilene. Suidas ascribes to the Miletian, "Trieic,", in three books, "Mythaken," an "Historical Cycle," in seven books, and a "Periages of the whole world," all of which, however, probably belong to different authors. (Nitzsch, Hist. Honorii, l. p. 86; Bernhardy, in his edition of Dionysius, p. 498, &c., and ad Suidas, l. p. 1336; Lassus, p. 990, &c.; Welcker, Der Biopische Ciclo, p. 75, &c.;)

33. Of Miletus, a sophist of the time of the emperor Hadrian, he was a pupil of Isaeus the Assyrian, and distinguished for the elegance of his orations. He was greatly honoured by the cities of Asia, and more especially by the emperor Hadrian, who made him prefect of a considerable province, raised him to the rank of a Roman eques, and assigned to him a place in the museum of Alexandria. Notwithstanding these distinctions, Dionysius remained a modest and unassuming person. At one time of his life he taught rhetoric at Lesbos, but he died at Ephesus at an advanced age, and was buried in the marketplace at Ephesus, where a monument was erected to him. Philostratus has preserved a few specimens of his oratory. (Vit. Soph. i. 20, § 2, c. 22; Dion Cass. l. xiv. 3; Eudoc. p. 130; Suidas.)

34. Of Mytilene, he is named Scytobracchion, and seems to have lived shortly before the time of Cicero, if we may believe the report that he instructed M. Antonius Onupho at Alexandria (Suet. de illustr. Gr., 7), for Suetonius expresses a doubt as to its correctness for chronological reasons. Artemon (ap. Athen. xii. p. 415) states that Dionysius Scytobracchion was the author of the historical work which was commonly attributed to the ancient historian Xanthus of Lydia, who lived about c. 400. From this it has been inferred, that our Dionysius must have lived at a much earlier time. But if we conceive that Dionysius may have made a revision of the work of Xanthus, it does not follow that he must needs have lived very near the age of Xanthus. Suidas attributes to him a metrical work, the expedition of Dionysius and Athens (ἡ Διονυσίου καὶ Ἀθηνᾶς ἐπαρθή), and a prose work on the Argonauts in six books, addressed to Parmenon. He was probably also the author of the historical cycle, which Suidas attributes to Dionysius of Miletus. The Argonauta is often referred to by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, who likewise several times confounds the Mytilenean with the Miletian (i. 1298, ii. 207, 1144, iii. 208, 242, iv. 110, v. 220, 1153), and this work was also connected by Dioclesus Sicus. (iii. 52, 66.) See Bernhardy, Ad Dionys. Perig. p. 490; Welecker, Der Eph. Ciclo, p. 87.

36. Of Periages, summoned Atticus, a rhetorician, who is characterized by Stobaeus (xiii. p.265) as a clever sophist, an historian, and logographer, that is, a writer of orations. He was a pupil of Apollodorus, the rhetorician, who is mentioned among the teachers of Augustus. (Comp. Suidas. Controv. i. 1.) Weiske (ad Longin. p. 218) considers him to be the author of a work τοῦ Ἐνίπος commonly attributed to Longinus; but there is very little, if anything, to support this view. (Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Berol. 8 96, note 9.)

37. Of Philakes, is mentioned in the scholia on Pindar, and was probably a grammarian who wrote on Pindar. The anonymous author of the life of Nicander speaks of two works of his, viz. "on the Poetry of Antimachus," and "on Poets." (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. xi. p. 787, ed. Heyne; ad Pyth. ii. 1.)

38. Of Surnamed Periages, of his being the author of a περὶ ὑγείας περὶ ὕγειας, in hexameter verse, which is still extant. Respecting the age and country of this Dionysius the different opinions have been entertained, though all critics are agreed in placing him after the Christian era, or in the time of the Roman emperors, as must indeed be necessarily inferred from passages of the Periages itself, such as v. 355, where the author speaks of his διάκος, that is, his sovereign, which can only apply to the emperors. But the question as to which emperor or emperors Dionysius there alludes, has been answered in the most different ways; some writers have placed Dionysius in the reign of Augustus, others in that of Nero, and others again under M. Aurelius and his son, or under Septimius Severus, or under Eustathius, his commentator, was himself in doubt about the age of his author. But these uncertainties have been removed by Bernhardy, the last editor of Dionysius, who has made it highly probable, partly from the names of countries and nations mentioned in the Periages, partly from the mention of the Huns in v. 730, and partly from the general character of the poem, that its author must have lived either in the latter part of the third, or in the beginning of the fourth, century of our era. With regard to his native country, Suidas infers from the enthusiastic manner in which Dionysius speaks of the river Rheticus (793, &c.), that he was born at Byzantium, or somewhere in its neighbourhood; but Eustathius (ad s. r.) and the Scholiast (ad s. 8) expressly call him an African, and these authorities certainly seem to deserve more credit than the mere inference of Suidas. The Periages of Dionysius contains a description of the whole earth, so far as it was known in his time, in hexameter verse, and the author appears chiefly to follow the views of Erastosthenes. It is written in a terse and neat style, and enjoyed a high degree of popularity in ancient times, as we may infer from the fact, that two translations or paraphrases of it were made by Romans, one by Rufus Festus Avianus (Avienus), and the other by the grammarian Priscianus. (Priscianus.) Eustathius wrote a very valuable commentary upon it, which is still extant, and we further possess a Greek paraphrase and scholia. The first edition of the Periages appeared at Ferrara, 1512, 4to, with a Latin translation. A. Mambin printed it at Venice, 1513, 8vo, together with Pindar, Callimachus, and Lyceophron. II. Stephens incorporated it in his "Poetae Principes Heroici Carolina," Paris, 1506, fol. One of the most useful among the subsequent editions is that of Edw. Thwaites, Oxford, 1697, 8vo, with the commentary of Eustathius, the Greek scholia and paraphrase. It is also printed in the fourth volume of Hudson's Geogr. Minor, 1712, 8vo, from which it was reprinted separately, Oxford, 1710 and 1717, 8vo. All the previous editions are superseded by that of G. Bernhardy (Leipzig, 1828, 8vo), which forms vol. i. of a contemplated collection of the minor Greek geographers; it is accompanied by a very excellent and learned dissertation and the ancient commentators. Besides the Periplus, Eustathius states that other works also were attributed to our Dionysius, viz. ἀρχαῖον, ἐρασιμίαν, and Μαορισμόν. Concerning the first, compare the Scholiast on v. 714; Maxim. ad Dionys. Aesopag. de Myst. Theol. 2; and Bernhardy (L. c.), p. 503. Respecting the ἐρασιμία, which some attribute to Dionysius of Philadelphia, see Bernhardy, p. 503. The Μαορισμόν, which means the same as Διονυσίου (Suid. s. v. Σοριφυς) is very often quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium. (See Bernhardy, pp. 507, 6c. and 512.)

39. Bishop of Rome, is called a Μηνύτης τοῦ καὶ κοινῆς δῆρος by his contemporary, Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria. (Ep. Epist. H. E. vii. 7.) He is believed to have been a Greek by birth, and after having been a presbyter, he was made bishop of Rome in A. D. 259, and retained this high dignity for ten years, till A. D. 269. During his administration of the Roman diocese, some bishops brought before him charges against Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, for being guilty of heretical opinions in his controversies with Sabellius. The bishop of Rome therefore convened a synod, and with its consent he declared, in a letter to the accused, that he was guilty of heresies, and gave him a gentle reprimand. A fragment of this letter is preserved in Athanasius (de Doctr. Sympl. N. c. x. p. 421), and it was this letter which induced Dionysius of Alexandria to write his work against Sabellius, which was addressed to the bishop of Rome. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 97.)

40. Surnamed Sycophanta. See No. 34.

41. Of Sidon, a Greek grammarian, who is sometimes simply called Sidonius. (Schol. Venet. ad Hom. II. i. 424, xiv. 40.) He seems to have lived shortly after the time of Aristarchus, and to have founded a school of his own. (Schol. ad II. i. 6.) He is frequently referred to in the Venetian Scholia, and also by Eustathius on Homer, as one of the critical commentators of the poet. (Comp. Varro, de L. L. x. x. ed. Müller; Villarres, Prolog. ad Hom. R. p. xxix.)

42. Of Sidon. See below.

43. Of Sidon. See below.

44. Surnamed Thrax, or the Thracian, a celebrated Greek grammarian, who unquestionably derived his surname from the fact of his father Teres being a Thracian (Suidas); and it is absurd to believe, with the author of the Etymologium Magnum (p. 277-55), that he received it from his rough voice or any other circumstance. He himself, according to some, a native of Alexandria (Suidas), and, according to others, of Byzantium; but he is also called a Rhodian, because at one time he resided at Rhodes, and gave instructions there (Suidas, xiv. p. 655; Athen. x. p. 489), and it was at Rhodes that Tychonion was among the pupils of Dionysius. Dionysius also stud for some time at Rome, where he was engaged in teaching, about A. D. 80. Further particulars about his life are not known. He was the author of numerous grammatical works, manuals, and commentaries. We possess under his name a Νευτήρια γραμματική, a small work, which however became the basis of all subsequent grammars, and was a standard book in grammar schools for many centuries. Under such circumstances we cannot wonder that, in the course of time, such a work was much interpolated, sometimes abridged, and sometimes extended or otherwise modified. The form therefore, in which it has come down to us, is not the original one, and hence its great difference in the different MSS. It was first printed in Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. iv. p. 20 of the old edition. Villarres (Aec. ad ii. 99) then added some excerpts and scholia from a Venetian MS., together with which the grammar was afterwards printed in Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. vi. p. 311 of Harleian's edition, and somewhat better in Bekker's Aecanota, ii. p. 627, &c. It is remarkable that an Armenian translation of this grammar, which has recently been brought to light, and was probably made in the fourth or fifth century of our era, is more complete than the Greek original, having five additional chapters. This translation, which was published by Cirband in the Memoires et Dissertation sur les Antiquités nationales et étrangères, 1824, viii., vol. vi., has increased the doubts about the genuineness of our Greek text; but it would be going too far to consider it, with Göttling, (Proef. ad Theodos. Grum. p. v. &c. comp. Lersch, de Sprachphil. der Alter, ii. p. 61, &c.) as a more complete compilation made by some Byzantine grammarian at a very late period. The groundwork of what we have is unquestionably the production of Dionysius Thrax. The interpolations mentioned above appear to have been introduced at a very early time, and it was probably owing to them that some of the ancient and most important grammarian of the fragment found in it things which could not have been written by a disciple of Aristarchus, and that therefore they doubted its genuineness. Dionysius did much also for the explanation and criticism of Homer, as may be inferred from the quotations in the Venetian Scholia (ad Hom. II. ii. 262, ix. 460, xii. 20, 130, xv. 86, 741, xvii. 207, xxiv. 110), and Eustathius. (Ad Hom. pp. 854, 869, 1040, 1299.) He does not, however, appear to have written a regular commentary, but to have inserted his remarks on Homer in several other works, such as that against Ctesis, and the τείχος τονουκρατ. (Schol. Ven. ad Hom. II. ii. 5.) In some MSS. there is an Εὐτυχία of his, which seems to have been wrongly attributed to our grammarian: it is, further, more than doubtful whether he wrote a commentary on Euripides, as has been inferred from a quotation of the Scholiast on that poet. His chief merit consists in the impulse he gave to the study of systematic grammar, and in what he did for a correct understanding of Homer. The Byz. M. contains several examples of his etymological, prosodical, and exegetical attempts, (pp. 308. 18, 747. 20, 365. 20.) Dionysius is also mentioned as the author of μελέτων and of a work on Rhodes. (Steph. Byz. s. a. τοῦδε; comp. Græf:land. Gesch. der Kla. Philol. i. p. 402, &c.) A son or disciple of Tychonion, a Greek grammarian, who lived about A. D. 50. (Steph. Byz. s. a. ΟΔΙΣΥΣ, Μελέτων, &c.) He was the author of a work τείχος τονουκρατ, which consisted of at least eleven books, and is often referred to by Stephanus of Byzantium and Harpocration. (Comp. Athen. viii. p. 285, xi. p. 503, xiv. p. 641.) [L. S.] to have lived till the establishment of the Macedonian supremacy in Greece. We have the titles and some fragments of his Aperiomena (Ath. xiv. p. 664, d.), which appears to have been translated by Naevius, Odeis (a long passage in Athen. ix. p. 494,c.), Oedipus (Athen. viii. p. 381, c., xiv. p. 615, c.), Andros (Schol. Hom. II. xi. 515; Rastath. p. 639,49), Zephyrus or Zéptuis (Athen. x. pp. 467, d., 457, d.; Stob. *Cont. cxxv. 6.) Meursius and Fabricius are wrong in assigning the Aperiomena to Dionysius. It belongs to Euhocis. (Metsikos, *Frag. Comm. Graec. i. pp. 419, 420, ii. pp. 547—555.)

[4] DIONYSIUS, artists. 1. Of Argos, a statuary, who was employed together with Giannik in making the works which Smicythus dedicated at Olympia. This fixes the artist's time; for Smicythus succeeded Anaxilas as tyrant of Rhegium in b. c. 476. The works executed by Dionysius were statues of Contest (Aγων) carrying axileis (Dist. of Ant. s. v.), of Dionysius, of Orpheus, and of Zeus without a beard. (Paus. v. 26. §§ 3—6.) He also made a horse and charioteer in bronze, which were among the works dedicated at Olympia by Pharniss of Maenius, the contemporary of Gelon and Hiero. (Paus. v. 27. § 1.)

2. A sculptor, who made the statue of Hera which Octavian afterwards placed in the portico of Octavia. (Plin. xxxvi. 5, s. 4. § 10.) Junius takes this artist to be the same as the former, but Silius argues, that in the time of the elder Dionysius the art of sculpturing marble was not brought to sufficient perfection to allow us to ascribe one of its masterpieces to him.

3. Of Colophon, a painter, contemporary with Polycrates of Thasos, whose works he imitated in their accuracy, expression (παράθεσις), manner (φόρος), in the treatment of the form, in the delicacy of the drapery, and in every other respect except in grandeur. (Aelian. V. H. iv. 3.) Plutarch (Timoq. 30) speaks of his works as having strength and tone, but as forced and laboured. Aristotle (Poet. 2) says that Polycrates painted the likenesses of men better than the original. Pearson makes them wondrous, and Dionysius like them (παράθεσις). It seems from this that the pictures of Dionysius were deficient in the ideal. It was no doubt for this reason that Dionysius was called Anthropographus, like Demetrios. It is true that Pliny, from whom we learn the fact, gives a different reason, namely, that Dionysius was so called because he painted only men, and not landscapes (xxxiv. 10. s. 37); but this is only one case out of many in which Pliny's ignorance of art has caused him to give a false interpretation of a true fact. Silius applies this passage to the later Dionysius (No. 4), but without any good reason.

4. A painter, who flourished at Rome at the same time as Soplias and Lata of Cyzicus, about B. C. 84. Pliny says of him and Soplias, that they were the most renowned painters of that age, except Lata, and that their works filled the picture galleries (xxxiv. 11, s. 40. § 43).

[5] DIONYSIUS (Διόνυσιος), the name of several physicians and surgeons, whom it is sometimes difficult to distinguish with certainty. 1. A native of Argos (but of which place of this name does not appear), who must have lived in or before the ninth century after Christ, as he is quoted by Photius (Biblioth. §§ 185, 211, pp. 129, 168, ed. Bekker), but how much earlier he lived is uncertain. It is not known whether he was himself a physician, but he wrote a work entitled Διώνυσός, in which he discussed various medical questions. It consisted of one hundred chapters, the heads of which have been preserved by Photius, and shew that he wrote both in favour of each proposition, and also against it. The title of his book has been supposed to allude to his teaching his readers to argue on both sides of a question, and thus to catch their hearers, as it were, in a net.

2. A native of Cyrrhus (Κυρρός) in Egypt, who was mentioned by Herennius Philo in his lost History of Medicine. Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Κυρρός) calls him Δίονυσίος λατρής. His date is uncertain, but if (as Meursius conjectures) he is the same person who is quoted by Cassius Arelaninus (De Morb. Chron. ii. 13, p. 416), he may be supposed to have lived in the third century B.C. (Meursius, Dionys. s. c. in Opera, vol. v.)

3. A native of Milesus, in Caucis, must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, as he is quoted by Galen, who has preserved some of his medical formulæ. (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. iv. 7, vol. xii. p. 741; De Anim. ii. 11, vol. xiv. p. 171.) He may perhaps be the same person who is mentioned by Galen without any distinguishing epithet. (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. iv. 8, vol. xii. p. 760.)

4. Son of Oxygmacus, appears to have written some anatomical work, which is mentioned by Rufus Ephesiou. (De Appell. Part. Corp. Hum. p. 42.) He was either a contemporary or predecessor of Eudemus, and therefore lived probably in the fourth or third century B.C.

5. Of Samos, whose medical formulae are quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. iv. 13, vol. xiii. p. 745), is supposed by Meursius (L. e.) to be the same person as the son of Musonius; but, as Kuhn observes (Addita ad Echlion. Medicar. Vet. a Fabrieto in Biblioth. Graecos, cahib. facie. xiv. p. 7), from no other reason, than because both are said to have been natives of Samos (though this quite certain), whereas from the writings of the son of Musonius there is no ground for believing him to have been a physician, or even a collector of medical prescriptions.

6. Sallustius Dionysius, is quoted by Pliny (H. N. xxxii. 26), and therefore must have lived in or before the first century after Christ.

7. Cassius Dionysius. (Cassius, p. 626.)

8. Dionysius, a surgeon, quoted by Serbonius Longus (Compos. Medicam. c. 212, ed. Rodt.), who lived probably at or before the beginning of the Christian era.

9. A physician, who was a contemporary of Galen in the second century after Christ, and is mentioned as attending the son of Cassius, to whom Galen wrote a letter full of medical advice, which is still extant. (Galen, Pro Puer. Epist. Consil. in Opera, vol. xi. p. 357.)

10. A fellow-pupil of Heraclides of Tarentum, who must have lived probably in the third century B.C., and one of whose medical formulæ is quoted by Galen. (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. v. 3, vol. xii. p. 835.)

12. The physician mentioned by Galen (Comment in Hippocr. "Aphor." iv. 69, vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 751) as a commentator on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, but cannot certainly be identified with any other physician of that name.

13. A physician whose medical formulae are mentioned by Celsus (De Med. vi. 6. 4; 16. 9, pp. 119, 152) must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, and may perhaps be the same person as No. 3, or 8.

14. A physician at Rome in the fifth century after Christ, who was also in Deyon's orders, and a man of great piety. When Rome was taken by Alaric, A.D. 410, Dionysius was carried away prisoner, but was treated with great kindness, on account of his virtues and his medical skill. An epitaph on him in Latin elegiac verse is to be found in Baronius, Annu. Eccles. ad ann. 410, § 41. [W. A. G.]

DIONYSOCLES (Διονυσοκλῆς), of Tralles, is mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 649) among the distinguished rhetoricians of that city. He was probably a pupil of Apollodorus of Pergamum, and consequently lived shortly before or at the time of Strabo. [L.S.]

DIONYSODORUS (Διονύσωδορος). 1. A Boeotian, who is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus (xxv. 95) as the author of a history of Greece, which came down as far as the reign of Philip of Macedonia, the father of Alexander the Great. It is usually supposed that he is the same person as the Dionysodorus in Diogenes Laëritius (iv. 42), who denied that the poem which went by the name of Socrates, was the production of the philosopher. (Comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 917.) It is uncertain whether he is the author of a work on rivers (ἐρημοτ. Schol. ad Euph. Hippol. 122), and of another entitled ναύαρχεσ περὶ γεωγραφίας μυθοματικά, which is quoted by a Scholiast. (Ad Euph. Rhis. 504.)

2. A Greek rhetorician, who is introduced in Lucian's Symposium (c. 6). Another person of the same name is mentioned, in the beginning of Plato's dialogue "Enthydemus," as a brother of Ruthydemus. (Comp. Xenoph. Mem. iii. 1. § 1.)

3. Of Troezen, a Greek grammarian, who is referred to by Plutarch (Aral. i.) and in the work of Apollonius Dyscolus on Pronouns. [L.S.]

DIONYSODORUS (Διονύσωδορος), a geometer of Cydnum, whose mode of cutting a sphere by a plane in a given ratio is preserved by Eutocius, in his comment on book ii. prop. 5, of the sphere and cylinder of Archimedes. A species of conical solid is attributed to him, and Pliny (H. N. ii. 109) says, that he had an inscription placed on his tomb, addressed to the world above, stating that he had been to the centre of the earth and found it 42 thousand stadia distant. Pliny calls this a striking instance of Greek vanity; but, as Weidler remarks, it is as near a guess as any that was made for a long time afterwards. [Weidler, Hist. Astron, p. 138; Heibremmer, I. c. ver.] [A. D. M.]

DIONYSODORUS. [Mochison.]

DIONYSODOTUS (Διονύσωδωτος), a lyric poet of Lacedaemon, who is mentioned along with Alcman, and whose poems were very popular at Spartan banquets. [L.S.]

DIONYSUS (Διόνυσος or Διώνυσος), the youthful, beautiful, but effeminate god of wine. He is also called both by Greeks and Romans Bacchus (Βακχός), that is, the noisy or riotous god, which was originally a mere epithet or surname of Dionysus, but does not occur till after the time of Herodotus. According to the common tradition, Dionysus was the son of Zeus and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus of Thebes (Hom. Hymn. vi. 65; Eurip. Bacch. init.; Apoll. iii. 4. § 3); whereas others describe him as a son of Zeus by Demeter, Io, Dione, or Arge. (Comp. Diod. ii. 19, 42, and other passages from Plut. de Fam. 16.) Diodorus (iii. 67) further mentions a tradition, according to which he was a son of Ammon and Amaltheia, and that Ammon, from fear of Rhoe, carried the child to a cave in the neighbourhood of mount Nysa, in a lonely island formed by the river Triton. Ammon there entrusted the child to Nysa, the daughter of Aristaeus, and Athena likewise undertook to protect the boy. Others again represent him as a son of Zeus by Persephone or Iris, or describe him simply as a son of Lethe, or of Indus. (Diod. iv. 4; Plut. Symp. vil. 5; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. ii. 9.) The same diversity of opinions prevails in regard to the native place of the god, which in the common tradition was Mount Lycaon, and afterwards transferred to Libya, Crete, Dracamus in Samos, Nauss, Elias, Eleutherae, or Teos, mentioned as his birthplace. (Hom. Hymn. xxv. 8; Diod. iii. 65, v. 75; Nonnas, Dionys. i. 6; Theocr. xxvi. 33.) It is owing to this diversity in the traditions that ancient writers were driven to the supposition that there were originally several divinities which were afterwards identified under the one name of Dionysus. Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 23) distinguishes five Dionysii, and Diodorus (iii. 63, &c.) three.

The common story, which makes Dionysus a son of Semele by Zeus, runs as follows: Hera, jealous of Semele, visited her in the disguise of a friend, or an old woman, and persuaded her to request Zeus to appear to her in the same glory and majesty in which he was accustomed to approach his own wife, Hem. When all entreaties to dissuad from this request were fruitless, Zeus at length complied, and appeared to her in thunder and lightning. Semele was terrified and overpowered by the sight, and being seized by the fire, she gave premature birth to a child. Zeus, or according to others, Hermes (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1187) saved the child from the flames: it was sewed up in the thigh of Zeus, and thus came to maturity. Various epitaphs which are given to the god refer to that occurrence, such as ἀνακάρτις, ἀναμόρφωσθαι, ἀναμορφώσθαι, and ἀνακαλέσθαι. (Strab. xxii. p. 628; Diod. iv. 5; Eurip. Bacch. 293; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 310; Ot. Mel. iv. 11.) After the birth of Dionysus, Zeus entrusted him to Hermes, or, according to others, to Persephone or Rhen (Orph. Hymn. xiv. 6; Steph. Byz. s. a. Μητρότατος), who took the child to Ino and Athamas at Oechalmenus, and persuaded them to bring him up as a girl. Hem was now urged on by her jealousy to throw Ino and Athamas into a state of madness, and Zeus, in order to save his child, changed him into a ram, and carried him to the nympha of mount Nysa, who brought him up in a cave, and were afterward rewarded for it by Zeus, by being placed as Hyadus among the stars. (Hygin. Fab. 102; Theon, ad Astra. Paeon. 177; comp. Hyades.)

The inhabitants of Brasae, in Ionia, according to Pausanias (iii. 54, § 3), told a different story about the birth of Dionysus. When Cadmus heard, they said, that Semele was mother of a son by Zeus, he put her and her child into a chest, and threw it into the sea. The chest was carried by the wind and waves to the coast of Braia. Semele was found dead, and was solemnly buried, but Dionysus was brought up by Ino, who happened at the time to be at Braia. The plain of Braia was, for this reason, afterwards called the garden of Dionysus.

The traditions about the education of Dionysus, as well as about the personages who undertook it, differ as much as those about his parentage and birthplace. Besides the nymphs of Mount Nysa in Thrace, the muses, Lycae, Bessarac, Macae, Mimalliones (Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 992, 1816), the nymph Nysa (Diod. iii. 60), and the nymphs Phil., Coronis, and Cleis, in Naxos, whither the child Dionysus was said to have been carried by Zeus (Diod. iv. 52), are named as the beings to whom the care of his infancy was entrusted. Mystics, moreover, is said to have instructed him in the mysteries (Nomn. Dionys. xili. 140), and Hippa, on mount Tmolus, nursed him (Orig. Hymn. xiii. 4); Macris, the daughter of Aristaeus, received him from the hands of Hermes, and fed him with honey. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1131.) On mount Nysa, Bromle and Bacche too are called her nurses. (Serv. ad Virg. B e c o g . vi. 15.) Mount Nysa, from which the god was believed to have derived his name, was not only in Thrace and Libya, but mountains of the same name are found in different parts of the ancient world where he was worshipped, and where he was believed to have introduced the cultivation of the vine. Hermes, however, is mixed up with most of the stories about the infancy of Dionysus, and he was often represented in works of art, in connexion with the infant god. (Comp. Paus. iii. 18, § 7.)

When Dionysus had grown up, Hera threw him also into a state of madness, in which he wandered about through many countries of the earth. A tradition in Hyginus (Post. Astr. ii. 23) makes him go first to the land of Dodona, but on his way thither he came to a lake, which prevented his proceeding any further. One of the two ashes he met there carried him across the water, and the grateful god placed both animals among the stars, and asess henceforth remained sacred to Dionysus. According to the common tradition, Dionysus first wandered through Egypt, where he was hospitably received by king Potonas. He thence proceeded through Syria, where he played Damascans alive, for opposing the introduction of the vine, which Dionysus was believed to have discovered (ἐπισταὶ ἐκπλησσοῦ). He now traversed all Asia. (Strab. xv. p. 687; Eurip. Bacch. 13.) When he arrived at the Euphrates, he built a bridge to cross the river, but a tiger sent to him by Zeus surmounted it across the river Tigris. (Paus. x. 29; Plut. de Pla. 41.) Part of his wanderings in Asia is his expedition to India, which is said to have lasted three, or, according to some, even 52 years. (Diod. iii. 63, iv. 3.) He did not in those distant regions meet with a kindly reception everywhere, for Myrrhabus and Deriades, with their three chiefs Blenys, Orontes, and Orundes, fought against him. (Steph. Byz. s. t. B E λι η α τε ι s, Ρ Ρ θ e σ s, Π θ ι ρ e σ s, Δ e θ δ i α τ ί s, Κ ι ν ι s, Ζ η ς ι o i η s, Μ α ά λ ι o i, Π ι Ω o ι i a, Σ i ι θ a s.) But Dionysus and the host of Pans, Satyrs, and Bacchic women, by whom he was accompanied, conquered his enemies, taught the Indians the cultivation of the vine and of various fruits, and the worship of the gods; he also founded towns among them, gave them laws, and left behind him pillars and monuments in the happy land which he had thus conquered and civilized, and the inhabitants worshipped him as a god. (Comp. Strab. xii. p. 505; Arrian. Ind. 5; Diod. ii. 38; Plut. de Pla. 41; Pig. de Apollon. ii. 9; Virg. Aen. vi. 805.) Dionysus also visited Phrygia and the goddess Cybele or Rhea, who purified him and taught him the mysteries, which according to Apollodorus (ii. 5, § 1) took place before he went to India. With the assistance of his companions, he drove the Amazons from Ephysea to Samos, and there killed a great number of them on a spot which was, from that occurrence, called Pammene. (Plut. Quaest. Gr. 66.) According to another legend, he united with the Amazons to fight against Cronus and the Titans, who had expelled Ammon from his dominions. (Diod. iii. 70, &c.) He is even said to have gone to Iberia, which, on leaving, he entrusted to the government of Pan. (Plut. de Flam. 16.) On his passage through Thrace he was ill received by Lycurgus, king of the Edones, and leaped into the sea to seek refuge with Theseus, whom he afterwards rewarded for her kind reception with a golden urn, a present of Hephaestus. (Hom. ii. vi. 135, &c.; Od. xxvii. 74; Schol. ad Hom. II. xiii. 91. Comp. Paus. iii. 65.) All the host of Bechantic women and Satyrs, who had accompagnied him, were taken prisoners by Lycurgus, but the women were soon set free again. The country of the Edones thereupon ceased to bear fruit, and Lycurgus became mad and killed his own son, whom he mistook for a vine, or, according to others (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 14) he cut off his own legs in the belief that he was cutting down some vines. When this was done, his madness ceased, but the country still remained barren, and Dionysus declared that it would remain so till Lycurgus died. The Edones, in despair, took their king and put him in chains, and Dionysus had him torn to pieces by horses. After then proceeding through Thrace without meeting with any further resistance, he returned to Theseus, where he compelled the women to quit their houses, and to celebrate Bacchic festivals on mount Githaeon, or Parussus. Penthacus, who then ruled as Theseus, endeavoured to check the riotous proceedings, and went out to the mountains to seek the Bacchic women; but his own mother, Agave, in her Bacchic fury, mistook him for an animal, and tore him to pieces. (Theocrit. Id. xxvi.; Eurip. Bacch. 1142; Od. Met. iii. 714, &c.)

After Dionysus had thus proved to the Thebans that he was a god, he went to Argo. As the people there also refused to acknowledge him, he made the women mad to such a degree, that they killed their own babies and devoured their flesh. (Apoth. iii. 5, § 2.) According to another statement, Dionysus with a host of women came from the islands of the Aegean to Argo, but was conquered by Perseus, who slew many of the women. (Paus. ii. 20. § 3, 22. § 1.) Afterwards, however, Dionysus and Perseus became reconciled, and the Argives adopted the worship of the god, and built temples to him. One of these was called the temple of Dionysus Crenus, because the god was believed to have buried on that spot Ariadne, his beloved, who was a Cretan. (Paus. ii. 23. § 7.)

The last fest of Dionysus was performed on a voyage from Icaria to Naxos. He hired a ship which belonged to Tyrrhenian pirates; but the men, men. Nida, instead of going to Naxos, passed by and steered towards Asia to sell him there. The god, however, on perceiving this, changed the mast and sails as the god of wine, he is also both an inspired and an inspiring god, that is, a god who has the power of revealing the future to man by oracles. Thus, it is said, that he had as great a share in the Delphic oracle as Apollo (Eurip. Bacch. 200), and he himself had an oracle in Thrace. (Paus. ix. 30. § 3.) Now, as prophetic power is always combined with the healing art, Dionysus is, like Apollo, called ἱερός, or ἱερέως (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1692), and at his oracle of Amphicleia, in Phociæ, he cured diseases by revealing the remedies to the sufferers in their dreams. (Paus. x. 33. § 5.) Hence he is invoked as ἄ μας ὁράσεως γιαγίναι ῥέψεως. (Sophr. Oed. Tyr. 210; Lyceoph. 206.) The notion of his being the cultivator and protector of the vine was easily extended to that of his being the protector of trees in general, which is alluded to in various epithets and surnames given him by the poets of antiquity. (Paus. i. 31. § 21, vii. 21. § 2), and he thus comes into close connexion with Demeter. (Paus. vii. 20. § 1; Pind. Isthm. viii. 3; Theocrit. xx. 39; Pind. viii. 64; Ov. Fast. ii. 736; Plut. Quaest. Gr. 265.) This character is still further employed in the notion of his being the promoter of civilization, a law-giver, and a lover of peace. (Eurip. Bacch. 420; Strab. x. p. 408; Dion. iv. 4.) As the Greek drama had grown out of the dithyrambic choruses at the festivals of Dionysus, he was also regarded as the god of tragic art, and as the protector of theatres. In later times, he was worshipped also as a θεὸς ἄδωνας, which may have arisen from his resemblance to Demeter, or have been the result of an amalgamation of Phrygian and Lydian forms of worship with those of the ancient Greeks. (Paus. viii. 37. § 5; Arno. adv. Gentes. v. 19.) The orgiastic worship of Dionysus seems to have been first established in Thrace, and to have thence spread southward to Mount Helicon and Parnassus, to Thebes, Naxos, and throughout Greece, Sicily, and Italy, though some writers derive it from Egypt. (Paus. i. 2. § 4; Dion. i. 97.) Respecting his festivals and the mode of their celebration, and especially the introduction and suppression of his worship at Rome, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Αἰγύπτιος, Αἰγύπτιος, Αἰγύπτιος, and Dionysus. In the earliest times the Greeks, or Charites, were the companions of Dionysus (Pind. Od. xiii. 20; Phut. Quaest. Gr. 38; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 424), and at Olympia he and the Charites had an altar in common. (Schol. ad Pind. Od. v. 10; Paus. vi. 14 in fin.) This circumstance is of great interest, and point out the great change which took place in the course of time in the mode of his worship, for afterwards we find him accompanied in his expeditions and travels by Bactrian women, called Λαμά, Μαμάδα, Τύλιαδα, Μιαλόνα, ζώνες, Βασαρα, and Basarides, all of whom are represented in works of art as raving with madness or enthusiasm, in vehement motions, their heads thrown backwards, with dishevelled hair, and carrying in their hands thymiastics (entwined with ivy, and headed with pine-cones), cymbals, swords, or serpents. Sileni, Pans, sa- tyrs, centaurs, and other beings of a like kind, are also the constant companions of the god. (Strab. x. 33. 4, &c.; Catull. 64. 298; Athen i. p. 23; Paus. i. 2. § 7.) The temples and statues of Dionysus were very numerous in the ancient world. Among the sa-DIOPHANTES.

DIOPHANTES (Διοφάντος). 1. A half- Asiat, half-impostor, who made at Athens an apparently thriving trade of oracles. He was much Matrix by the comic poets, and may perhaps be identified with the Lucian juggling mentioned in Athenaeus.

(i. p. 20, a.) If so, he must be distinguished from the Diophantes of whom we read in Suidas as the author of a law which made it a capital offence for an inhabitant of the city to spend the night in the Peiraeus, and who was brought to trial for an involuntary breach of his own enactment. (Aristoph. Eq. 1081, Vesp. 330, Av. 338; Schol. ad II. cc.; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Gr. i. p. 154, ii. pp. 364, 583, 704; Suid. s. v. Πορφύριος, Διοφάντος, Ενδυκτής, Σμύρνης, Θεσσαλίας.)

2. An Athenian general, father of the poet Menander, was sent out to the Thracian Chersonesus about n. c. 344, at the head of a body of Athenian settlers or κληρωματίς. (Dem, de Chers. p. 91, Philipp. iii. p. 114; Pseud.-Dem. de Halton, pp. 86, 87.) Disputes having arisen between these settlers and the Cardians, the latter were supported, but not with arms in the first instance, by Philip of Macedon, who, when the Athenians unaided, proposed that their quarrell with Carthage should be referred to arbitration. This proposal being indignantly rejected, Philip sent troops to the assistance of the Cardians, and Diophantes retaliated by ravaging the maritime district of Thrace, which was subject to the Macedonians, while Philip was absent in the interior of the same country on his expedition against Teres and Cersobolotes. Philip sent a letter of remonstrance to Athens, and Diophantes was armed by the Macedonian party, not only for his aggression on the king's territory, but also for the means (unjust and useless and violent, but compelled through all Athenians for his sake, in the time), to which he resorted for the support of his mercenaries. He was defended by Demosthenes in the eminence, still extant, on the Chersonese, n. c. 341, and the defense was successful, for he was permitted to retain his command. After this, and probably during the war of Philip with Byzantion (n. c. 340), Diophantes again invaded the Macedonian territory in Thrace, took the towns of Crobyze and Tiristasia and enslaved the inhabitants, and when an ambassador, named Amphileucus, came to negotiate for the release of the prisoners, he seized his person in defiance of all international law, and compelled him to promise that he would make no further incursions upon Macedonia.

(A. v.腺. de Chers.; Dem. de Chers. passim; Phil. Ep. ad Ael. pp. 159, 160, 161.) The enmity of Diophantes to Philip appears to have recommended him to the favour of the king of Persia (Arataxes III.), who, as we learn from Aristotle, sent him some valuable presents, which did not arrive, however, till after his death. (Arist. Rhet. ii. 8. 11; comp. Phil. Ep. ad Ael. p. 160; Dem. Philipp. iii. p. 129, in Ep. Phil. p. 153; Pseudo-Dem. Philipp. iv. p. 160; Diod. xvi. 75; Arr. Anab. ii. 14; Paus. i. 29.)

DIOPHANTES (Διοφάντος). 1. Of Mytilene, one of the most distinguished Greek rhetoricians of the time of the Gracchi. For reasons unknown to us, he was obliged to quit his native place, and went to Rome, where he instructed Tiberius Gracchus, and became his intimate friend. After T. Gracchus had fallen a victim to the oligarchical faction, Diophantes and many other friends of Gracchus were also put to death. (Cic. Brut. 27; Strab. xiii. p. 617; Plut. T. Gracch. 8. 20.) Another much later rhetorician of the same name occurs in Porphyry's life of Plotinus.

2. Is quoted as the author of a history of Pontus, in several books. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 241; Eudoc. p. 31.)

DIOPHANTES (Διοφάντος) a native of Nicaea, in Bithynia, in the first century n. c., who abridged the agricultural work of Cassius Dionysius for the use of king Deidouros. (Varr. De Re Rust. l. 1. 10; Colum. De Re Rust. l. i. 1. 10; Plin. H. N. Dedic. to lib. viii.) His work consisted of six books, and was afterwards further abridged by Annaeus Pollio. (Suid. s. v. Πολιούχος.) Diophantes is quoted several times in the Collection of Greek Writers, De Re Rustica.

[W. A. G.]

DIOPHANTES MYRINAUS, the author of a worthless epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anot. ii. 259; Jacobs, ii. 236.) Jacobs thinks, that he is a late writer, and ought not to be identified with the Diophantes who is mentioned by Cicero and Plutarch as the instructor of Tiber-DIOPHANTUS.

It is singular that, though his date is uncertain to a couple of centuries, at least, we have some reason to suppose that he married at the age of 33, and that in five years a son was born of this marriage, who died at the age of 42, four years before his father: so that Diophantus lived to 84. Bachet, his editor, found a problem proposed in verse, in an unpublished Greek anthology, like some of those which Diophantus himself proposed in verse, and composed in the manner of an epigram. The unknown quantity is the age at which Diophantus lived, and the simple equation of condition to which it leads gives, when solved, the preceding information. But it is just as likely as not that the maker of the epigram invented the dates.

When the manuscripts of Diophantus came to light in the 16th century, it was said that there were thirteen books of the "Arithmetica": but no more than six have ever been produced with that title; besides which we have one book, "De Multiangulis Numeris," on polygonal numbers. These books contain a system of reasoning on numbers by the aid of general symbols, and with some use of symbols of operation; so that, though the demonstrations are very much conducted in words at length, and arranged so as to remind us of Euclid, there is no question that the work is algebraical: not a treatise on algebra, but an algebraical treatise on the relations of integer numbers, and on the solution of equations of more than one variable in integers.

Hence such questions obtained the name of Diophantine, and the modern words on that peculiar branch of numerical analysis which is called the theory of numbers, such as those of Gauss and Legendre, would have been said, a century ago, to be full of Diophantine analysis. As there are many classical students who will not see a copy of Diophantus in their lives, it may be desirable to give one simple proposition from that writer in modern words and symbols, annexing the algebraical phrases from the original.

Book i. qu. 50. Having given the sum of two numbers (20) and their product (96), required the numbers. Observe that the square of the half sum should be greater than the product. Let the difference of the numbers be 2r (isol β); then the sum 20 (σ) and the half sum 10 (δ) the greater number will be 20 + 10 (επετηκαι αδέλφοι) and the less will be 10 - r (μω) which he would often write μω δ σιζ δ. But the product is 96 (ρημα) which is also 100 - ρ (ρ + 05). Hence s = 2 (γινεται δ σιζ μω δ) &c.

A young algebraist of our day might hardly be inclined to give the name of algebraical notation to the preceding, though he might admit that there was algebraical reasoning. But if he had consulted the Hindu or Mahomedan writers, or Cardan, Tartaglia, Stevinus, and the other European algebraists, who preceded Vieta, he would see that he must either give the name to the notation above exemplified, or reduce it to everything which preceded the seventeenth century. Diophantus declines his letters, just as we now speak of m th or (m+1) th; and μω is an abbreviation of ωος or μονος, as the case may be.

The question whether Diophantus was an original inventor, or whether he had received a hint from India, the only country we know of which could then have given one, is of great difficulty. We cannot enter into it at length: the very great similarity of the Diophantine and Hindu algebra (as far as the former goes) makes it almost certain that the two must have had a common origin, or have come one from the other; though it is clear that Diophantus, if a borrower, has completely recast the subject by the introduction of Euclid's form of demonstration. On this point we refer to the article of the Penny Cyclopaedia already cited.

There are many paraphrases, so-called translations, and abbreviations of Diophantus, but very few editions. Joseph Asius prepared an edition (Gr. Lat.) of the whole, with the Scholia of the most Maximus Phanudes on the first two books; but it was never printed. The first edition is that of Xylander, Basle, 1575, folio, in Latin only, with the Scholia and notes. The first Greek edition, with Latin, and (original notes, the Scholia being rejected as useless,) is that of Bachel de Meziric, Paris, 1621, folio. Fermat left materials for the second and best edition (Gr. Lat.), in which is preserved all that was good in Bachel, and in particular his Latin version, and most valuable comments and additions of his own (it being peculiarly his subject). These materials were collected by J. de Billy, and published by Fermat's son, Toulouse, 1670, folio. An English lady, the late Mrs. Abigail Branch Louis, whose successful cultivation of mathematics and close attention to this writer for many years was well known to scientific persons, left a complete translation of Diophantus, with notes; it has not yet been published, and we trust, will not be lost.

DIOPHANTUS or DIOPHANTIDES (Διόφαντος or Διόφαντος), a medical writer of Lyceum (Galeni, De Compos. Medic. sec. Loco. ix. 4, vol. xiii. p. 281), several of whose medical formulae are quoted by Galen (vol. xii. p. 843; xiii. 597, 805; xiv. 175, 181), and who must, therefore, have lived in or before the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

DIO/BIS, a pointer, which is mentioned by Varro with Micon, the contemporary of Polygnotus, in such a manner as to imply that Polygnotus used the same instrument. The text of the passage, however, is so corrupt, that the name is not made out with certainty. (Varro, L. L. ix. 12, ed. Müller; Micon.) [P.S.]

DIOSCOURIDES (Διόσκουριδης). 1. A Byzantine grammarian, a brother of Hipparchus and Nicolas, and a disciple of Lecuanes at Athens. He lived in the reign of the emperors Marcianus and Leo. (Suid. s. v. Νίκαιας; Ædouc. p. 309.)

2. Of Cyprus, a sceptic philosopher, and a pupil of Timon. (Diog. Laer. ix. 114, 115.)

3. A disciple of Isocrates, who is said by Athenaeus (l. p. 11) to have interpolated the Homeric poems. Suidas (s. v. Ἐσώρα) assigns him a work entitled Περὶ Ὀσωρά σεβάς. As he is thus known to have been engaged in the study of Homer, it is not improbable that he was also the author of the περὶ τῶν τῶν ἡμῶν καὶ Ὀσωρῶν βιῶν, from which a fragment is quoted by Athenaeus (l. p. 8; comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1270.) The ἄγωγοςτικά, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (l. 68) and Athenaeus (xii. p. 507), may likewise have been his work, though everything is uncertain. We have further mention of a work on the constitution of Lacedaemon ascribed to Dioscorides ( Athen. iv. p. 140; Plut. Lyca. 11, Ages. 55; and of another περὶ νάυσιν (Schol. ad Aristoph. Aes. 1263; Suid. and Plut. s. v. σκυράνδα; Ædouc. p. 280), but whether they were the productions of the pupil of Isocrates, or of the Stoic Dioscorides is uncertain.

4. The father of Zeno of Tarsus, the Stoic, who succeeded Chrysippos. The latter dedicated to Dioscorides several of his works, as we learn from Diogenes (vii. 190, 193, 198, 200, 202) and Suidas (s. v. Ζήνος).

5. A writer on astrology, an opinion of whose is quoted by Censorinus. (De Diis Nat. 17; comp. Varro, de L. L. Fragment. p. 308, ed. Dipont.) [L.S.]

DIOSCOURIDES (Διοσκουρίδης), the author of thirty-nine epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Braneck, Anál. i. 493; Jacobus, i. 244; xiii. 706; No. 142) seems, from the internal evidence of his epigrams, to have lived in Egypt, about the time of Ptolemy Euergetes. His epigrams are chiefly upon the great men of antiquity, especially the poets. One of them (No. 35) would seem, from its title in the Vatican MS., Διοσκουρίδης Νεκταρίου, to be the production of a later writer. The epigrams of Dioscorides were included in the Garland of Meleager. (Jacobus, xii. pp. 806, 807.) [P.S.]

DIOSCOURIDES, artists. [DIOSCOURIDES.]

DIOSCOURIDES (Διοσκουρίδης or Διοσκορίδης), the name of several physicians and botanical writers, whom it is not easy to distinguish from each other with certainty.

1. PEDACIUS OF PEDANUS (Πεδάκιος ου Πεδάνου) DIOSCOURIDES, the author of the celebrated Treatise on Materia Medica, that bears his name. It is generally supposed, says Dr. Dostock, that he was a native of Acanzares, in Cilicia Campestris, and that he was a physician by profession. It appears pretty evident, that he lived in the first or second century of the Christian era, and as he is not mentioned by Pliny, it has been supposed that he was a little posterior to him. The exact age of Dioscorides has, however, been a question of much critical discussion, and we have nothing but conjecture which can lead us to decide upon it. He has left behind him a Treatise on Materia Medica, Ἡ ϑεά Ἱατρική, in five books, a work of great labour and research, and which for many ages was received as a standard production. The greater correctness of modern science, and the new discoveries which have been made, cause it now to be regarded rather as a work of curiosity than of absolute utility; but in drawing up a history of the state and progress of medicine, it affords a most valuable document for our information. His treatise consists of a description of all the articles then used in medicine, with an account of their supposed virtues. The descriptions are brief, and not unfrequently so little characterized as not to enable us to ascertain with any degree of accuracy to what they refer; while the practical part of his work is in a great measure empirical, although his general principles (so far as they can be detected) appear to be those of the Dogmatic school. The great importance which was for so long a period attached to the works of Dioscorides, has rendered them the subject of almost innumerable commentaries and criticisms, and even some of the most learned of our modern naturalists have not thought it an unworthy task to attempt the illustration of his Materia Medica. Upon the whole, we must attribute to him the merit of great industry and patient research; and it seems but just to ascribe a large portion of the errors and inaccuracies into which he has fallen, more to the imperfect state of science when he wrote, than to any defect in the character and talents of the writer.
His work has been compared with that of Theophrastus, but this seems to doing justice to neither party, as the objects of the two authors were totally different, the one writing as a scientific botanist, the other merely as a herbalist; and accordingly we find each of these celebrated men superior to the other in his own department. With respect to the ancient writers on Materia Medica who succeeded Dioscorides, they were generally content to quote his authority without presuming to correct his errors or supply his deficiencies. That part of his work which relates to the plants growing in Greece has been very much illustrated by the late Dr. John Sibthorp, who, when he selected time of the Radcliffe Travelling Fellow of the University of Oxford, travelled in Greece and the neighbouring parts for the purpose of collecting materials for a Flora Graeca. This magnificent work was begun after his death, under the direction of the late Sir J. E. Smith (1806), and has been lately finished, in ten volumes folio, by Professor Lindley. With respect to the plants and other productions of the East mentioned by Dioscorides, much still remains to be done towards their illustration, and identification with the articles met with in those countries in the present day. A few specimens of this are given by Dr. Royle, in his Essay on the Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine (Lond. 1819), and probably no man in England is more fitted to undertake the task than himself.

Besides the celebrated treatise on Materia Medica, the following works are generally attributed to Dioscorides: Peri Διαληγωρων Φαρμακων, De Venenis; Περι Τοξεων, De Venenatis Animalibus; Περὶ Ακαταστασεως Παραβιωσεως των Συνθεων Φαρμακων, De facile Parabiblis tam Simplichis quam Compositis Medicinis; and a few smaller works, which are considered curious. His first work appeared in a Latin translation (supposed to be by Petrus de Abano) in 1478, fol. Colloco, in black letter. The first Greek edition was published by Aldus Manutius, Venet. 1493, fol., and is said to be very scarce. Perhaps the most valuable edition is that by J. A. Smeemans, Greek and Latin, Francfort. 1508, fol., with a copious and learned commentary. The last edition is that by C. Sprengel, in two vols. Ipsi. 1829, 1830, in Greek and Latin, with a useful commentary, forming the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth vols. of Kühn's Collection of the Greek Medical Writers. The work of Dioscorides has been translated and published in the Italian, German, Spanish, and French languages; there is also an Arabic Translation, which is still in MS, in several European libraries. For further information respecting Dioscorides and the editions of his work, see Le Clerc, Hist. de la Méd.; Haller, Biblioth. Botan.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Fabre, Biblioth. Graecæ; Boston's History of Medicine; Cloutain, Handbuch der Bücherwunde für die Ärzte Medicin. 2. Dioscorides Pachas (Σπάκης) a physician who was one of the followers of Herophilus (Galien, Gloss. Hippocr. proem. vol. xix. p. 68), and lived in the second or first century B.C. According to Suidas (s. v. Διοκρ.,) who, however, confounds him with Dioscorides of Anazarba, he lived at the court of Cleopatra in the time of Antony, B.C. 41-30, and was summoned Pachas on account of the moles or freckles on his face. He is probably the same physician who is mentioned by Galien (Gloss. Hippocr. s. v. Τευτον, vol. xix. p. 163), and Paulinus Aegi-
The famous life of the Dioscuri is marked by three great events: 1. Their expedition against Athens. Theseus had carried off their sister Helen from Sparta, or, according to others, he had promised Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphaeus, who had carried her off, to guard her, and he kept her in confinement at Aphaeus, under the superintendence of his mother Aethra. While Theseus was absent from Attica and Menestheus was endeavouring to usurp the government, the Dioscuri marched into Attica, and ravaged the country round the city. Academus revealed to them that Helen was kept at Aphaeus (Hom. Il. ix. 73), and the Dioscuri took the place by assault.

They carried away their sister Helen, and Aethra was made their prisoner. (Apollod. iii. 14.) Menestheus then opened to them also the gates of Athens, and Aphaeus adopted them as his sons, in order that, according to their desire, they might become initiated in the mysteries, and the Athenians paid divine honours to them. (Plut. Thes. 1. &c.; Lycoph. 499.) 2. Their part in the expedition of the Argonauts, as they had before taken part in the Calydonian hunt. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 149; Paus. iii. 24. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 173.) During the voyage of the Argo, it once happened, that when the heroes were detained by a vehement storm, and Orpheus prayed to the Samothracian gods, the storm suddenly subsided and the heroes went on to the bisc. (Diod. iii. 43; Plut. de Nat. Philos. ii. 18; Sene. Quast. Nat. i. 1.) On their arrival in the country of the Bebryces, Polydectes fought against Augeas, the gigantic son of Poseidon, and conquered him. During the Argonautic expedition they founded the town of Drosina. (Hygin. Fab. 175; P. Mela, i. 19; comp. Strab. xi. p. 496; Justin. xiii. 3; Plin. H. N. vi. 5.) 3. Their battle with the sons of Aphaeus. The Dioscuri were charmed with the beauty of the daughters of Leneceus, Phoebe, a priestess of Athens, and Hileira or Elseira, a priestess of Artemis; the Dioscuri carried them off, and married them. (Hygin. Fab. 80; Ov. Fast. x. 279; Schol. on Pind. Nem. x. 112.) Polydectes became by Phoebe, the father of Mnasoeus, Mnesinous, or Asinous, and Castor, by Hileira, the father of Anogn, Anaxis, or Aulethus. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 511.) Once the Dioscuri, in conjunction with Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphaeus, had carried away a herd of oxen from Arcadia, and it was left to Idas to divide the booty. He cut up a bull into four parts, and declared, that-whichever of them should first succeed in eating his share should receive half the oxen, and the second should have the other half. Idas, therefore, not only ate his own quarter, but devoured that of his brother's in addition, and then drove the whole herd to his home in Messene. (Pind. Nem. x. 60; Apollod. iii. 11. § 2; Lycoph. i. c.) The Dioscuri then invaded Messene, drove away the cattle of which they had been deprived, and much more in addition. This became the occasion of a war between the Dioscuri and the sons of Aphaeus, which was carried on in Messene, or Laconia. In this war, the details of which are related differently, Castor, the mortal, fell by the hands of Idas, but Pollux slew Lynceus, and Zeus killed Idas by a flash of lightning. (Pind. Apoll. iii. 14; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 1314; Theocrit. xxii.; Hygin. Fab. 80, Post. Astr. ii. 22.) Polydectes then returned to his brother, whom he found breathing his last, and he prayed to Zeus, to be permitted to die with him. Zeus left him the option, either to live as his immortal son in Olympus, or to share his brother's fate, and to live, alternately, one day under the earth, and the other in the heavenly abodes of the gods. (Hom. II. vii. 243; Pind. Nem. x. 53; Hygin. Fab. 251.) According to a different form of the story, Zeus rewarded the attachment of the two brothers by placing them among the stars as Gemini. (Hygin. Post. Astr. i. c.; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 469.)

These heroic youths, who were also believed to have reigned as Kings of Sparta (Paus. iii. 1 § 5), received divine honours at Sparta, though not till forty years after their war with the sons of Aphaeus. (Paus. iii. 13. § 1.) Müller (Dor. ii. 10. § 9) conceives that the worship of the Dioscuri had a double source, viz. the heroic honours of the human Tyndaridae, and the worship of some ancient Peloponnesian deities, so that in the process of time the attributes of the latter were transferred to the former, viz. the name of the sons of Zeus, the birth from an egg, and the like. Their worship spread from Peloponnesus over Greece, Sicily, and Italy. (Paus. x. 33. § 2, 38. § 2.) Their principal characteristic was that of Σέλωνων, that is, mighty helpers of man; and their altar was shaped like the prow of a ship or δρόντας. (Plut. Thes. 33; Strab. v. 232; Aelian, V. H. i. 60, iv. 5; Aristoph. Lysistr. 1301; Paus. i. 31. § 1, viii. 21, in fin.) They were, however, worshipped more especially as the protectors of travellers by sea, for Poseidon had rewarded their brotherly love by giving them power over wind and waves, that they might assist the shipwrecked. (Hygin. Post. Astr. loc.; Eurip. Helen. ii. 1401; Hom. Hymn. xii. 9; Strab. i. p. 48; Horat. Carm. i. 3. 2.) Out of this idea arose that of their being the protectors of travellers in general, and consequently of the law of hospitality also, the violation of which was punished severely by them. (Paus. iii. 16. § 3; Böckh, Rec. post. ad Pind. p. 135.) Their chariots as τέταρτα and τερτάρια were combined into one, and both, whenever they did appear, were seen riding on magnificent white steeds. They were further regarded, like Hermes and Heracles, as the presidents of the public games (Pind. Ol. iii. 30, Nem. x. 53), and at Sparta their statues stood at the entrance of the race-course. (Paus. iii. 14. § 7.) They were further believed to have invented the war-dance, and warlike music, and poets and bards were favoured by them. (Cic. de Ort. ii. 86; Val. Maxim. i. 8. § 7.) Owing to their warlike character, it was customary at Sparta for the two kings, whenever they went out to war, to be accompanied by symbolic representations of the Dioscuri (ἡματεία) ;
DIOTIMA.

_Diet. of Ant. s. v._, and afterwards, when one king only took the field, he took with him only one of those synoikoi. (Herod. v. 75.) Sepulchral monuments of Castor existed in the temple of the Dioscuri near Thermopylae (Plin. Nat. Hist. xvi. 56; Paus. iii. 20. § 1), at Sparta (Paus. iii. 13. § 1; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 5.), and at Argos, (Plut. Ques. Gr. 28.) Temples and statues of the Dioscuri were very numerous in Greece, though more particularly in Peloponnesus. Respecting their festivals, see _Diet. of Ant. s. v._ Aristeia, Αἰσθάνεσθαι. Their usual representation in works of art is that of two youthful horsemen, with greaved hats, or helmets, crowned with stars, and with spears in their hands. (Paus. iii. 18. § 8, v. 19. § 1; Catull. 37. 2; Val. Flacc. v. 367.)

At Rome, the worship of the Dioscuri or Castores was introduced at an early time. They were believed to have assisted the Romans against the Latins in the battle of Lake Regillus; and the dictator, A. Postumius Albus, during the battle, vowed a temple to them. It was erected in the Forum, on the spot where they had been seen after the battle, opposite the temple of Vesta. It was consecrated on the 15th of July, the anniversary day of the battle of Regillus. (Dionys. vi. 13.; Liv. ii. 40. 42.) Subsequently, two other temples of the Dioscuri were built, one in the Circus Maximus, and the other in the Circus Flamininus. (Vitruv. iv. 7.; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. xi.) From that time the equites regarded the Castores as their patrons, and after the year n. c. 305, the equites went every year, on the 15th of July, in a magnificent procession on horseback, from the temple of Mars through the main streets of the city, across the Forum, and by the ancient temple of the Dioscuri. In this procession the equites were adorned with olive wreaths and dressed in the trabea, and a grand sacrifice was offered to the twin gods by the most illustrious persons of the equestrian order. (Dionys. l.c.; Liv. iv. 46.; Val. Max. ii. 3.; Aurel. Vic. de Vit. iulius ii. 32.)

DIOSCORIDES or DIOΣΟΧΟΙΔΕΣ (Διώσοχόηδες). 1. Of Samos, the maker of two mosaic pavements found at Pompeii, in the so-called villa of Cicero. They both represent comic scenes, and are inscribed with the artist's name, ΔΙΟΧΟΤΡΙΑΣ ΣΑΜΙΟΣ ΕΠΙΟΧΕ. They are entirely of glass, and are among the most beautiful of ancient mosaics. They are fully described by Winckelmann. (Geschichte d. Kunst, bk. vii. c. 4. §§ 18, br. xii. c. 1. §§ 9-11, Nachricht. v. d. monument. Herold, Entdecker, § 54, 55.) A woodcut of one of them is given in the Useful Knowledge Society's "Pompeïi," ii. p. 41. (See also Miss. Diborn. iv. 34.)

2. An engraver of gems in the time of Augustus, engraved a gem with the likeness of Augustus, which was used by that emperor and his successors as their ordinary signet. (Plin. xxxvii. i. 8, 4; Suet. Oct. 50.) In these passages most of the editions give Dioscorides; but the true reading, which is preserved in some MSS., is confirmed by existing gems bearing the name ΔΙΟΧΟΤΡΙΑΥΟΥ. There are several of these gems, but only six are considered genuine. (Meyer's note on Winckelmann, Geschichte d. Kunst, bk. xii. c. 2. §§ 8.)

DIOTIMA (Διότιμα), a priestess of Mantinea, and the reputed imitator of Socrates. Plato, in his Symposium (p. 201, d.), introduces her opinions on the nature, origin, and objects of life, which in fact form the nucleus of that dialogue. Some critics believe, that the whole story of Diotima is a mere fiction of Plato's, while others are inclined to see in it at least some historical foundation, and to regard her as an historical personage. Later Greek writers call her a priestess of the Lycenian Zeus, and state, that she was a Pythagorean philosopher who resided for some time at Athens. (Lucian,_Bezw. 7, Incer. 18.; Max. Tyr. Dissert. 8.; comp. Hermann, Gesch. s. v. System. d. Plut. Philos. i. p. 523, note 591.)

DIOTIMUS (Διότιμος). 1. A grammaticus of Adramyttium in Asia Minor, exercised the profession of a teacher at Gargara in the Troades—a hard lot, which Amatus, who appears to have been contemporary with him, bemoans in an extant epigram. He is probably the same whose voluminous common-place book (παντοδέκα εἰκοσιομιστά) is quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Παντοδεκαομιστα). Schneider would refer to him the epigrams under the name of Diotimus in the Anthology. See below. (Anthol. i. p. 253; Jacobs, ad loc.; Macrob. Sat. v. 20; Steph. Byz. s. v. Γαργαρά; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 651, iv. p. 473.)

2. An Athenian, who wrote a history of Alexander the Great. The period at which he lived is not known. He is quoted, together with Aristus of Salamis, by Athenaeus (x. p. 436, c.).

3. The author of a Greek poem, called Ηράκλεια, in hexameter verse, on the labours of Heracles.

Three verses of it are preserved by Suidas (s. v. Ἑράκλεως), and by Michael Apostolius, the Byzantine, in his collection of proverbs. (Jacobs, Anthol. vol. xiii. p. 888; see Athen. xiii. p. 603, d.)

4. Of Olympia, an author or collector of riddles (γρίφοι), is mentioned by one of the interlocutors in the Πραξικοποιήθαι of Athenaeus (s. v. 440, e.) as ὁ έρατις ἡμῖος, and lived therefore at the beginning of the third century of our era.

5. A Stoic philosopher, who is said to have accused Epicurus of profligacy, and to have forged fifty letters, professing to have been written by Epicurus, to prove it. (Diog. Laërt. x. 3; Menag. ad loc.) According to Athenaeus, he is evidently alluding to the same story in a passage in which Διότιμος appears to have been given for Θεότιμος, he was convicted of forgery, at the suit of Zeno the Epicurean, and put to death. (Ath. xiii. p. 611, b.) We learn from Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 21), that he considered happiness or well-being (εὐεργεία) to consist, not in any one good, but in the perfect accumulation of blessings (παντελέως τῶν σωμάτων), which looks like a departure from strict Stoicism to the more sober view of Aristotle. (Eh. Nicom. i. 7, 8; E. E.)

DIOTIMUS (Διότιμος). Under this name there are several epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Bruneck, Anal. i. 260; Jamblich. i. 183), which seem, however, to be the productions of different authors, for the first epigram is entitled Διότιμος Μακράτωρ, and the eighth Διότιμος Αδραμύτης τοῦ Διοτιμίου. This latter person would seem to be the same as the Athenian orator, Diotimus, who was one of the ten orators given up to Antipater. (Suid. s. v. Άριστομάκρος; Pseudo-Plut. Vit. Α' Οραλ. p. 845, a.) How many of the epigrams belong to this Diotimus, and to whom the rest ought to be assigned, is quite uncertain. Schneider refers them to the grammaticus Diotimus, of Adramyttium.
The epigrams under the name of Diotimus were included in the "Carmina Melengar." (Jacobs, xiii, 388.)

DIOTIMUS (Διότιμος), a physician of Thbes, whose absurd and superstitions remedies are quoted by Pliny (H. N. xxvii. 23), and who must, therefore, have lived in or before the first century after Christ. [W. G. S.]

DIOTYGENES (Διοτυγένης), a Pythagorean philosopher, who wrote a work περί δεδομένων, of which three fragments are preserved in Stobaeus (tib. v. 69, xili. 93, 130), and another περί βασιλείας, of which two considerable fragments are likewise preserved in Stobaeus (xlviii. 61, 69). [L. S.]

DIOTREPHEES (Διοτρέφης, Thucyd. viii. 64), was sent, n. c. 411, by the oligarchical revolutionists in the Athenian army at Samos, to take charge of the subject states in the neighbourhood of Thrace, and to have taken the first step in pursuance of their policy towards the allies by establishing oligarchy at Thasos. Nicostatus, the general who fell at Mantinea, was son of a Diotrephes (Thuc. iv. 119): this therefore perhaps was a Diotrephes, of Nicostathus, i.e. it is an adjectival form for thinking him distinct from Diotrephes, the destroyer of Mycenaeans. [Diotrephes.] [A. H. C.]

DIOTREPHES (Διοτρέφης), a rhetorician of high repute in his day (συρρητής έν διάγωρον), born at Antioch on the Maeander. Hybrax, who was contemporaneous with Strabo, was his pupil. (Strab. xiii. p. 630, xiv. p. 659.)

DIOXIPPE, (Διοξίπη) the name of four mythological beings. (Hygin. Ραεως, Fab. 154, 163, 181; Apollod. ii. 2. § 5.) [L. S.]

DIOXIPPUS (Διοξίππος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy (Suid. s. v.), wrongly called D'exiprus in another passage of Suidas, (s. v. Κάρυον) and by Eudocia (p. 132). Suidas and Eudocia mention his Αγαζύπροον, of which a line and a half are preserved by Athenaeus (iii. p. 100, c. 1), Πιθηκοφόρος (Ath. i. 5), which Vossius conjectures was intended to ridicule the fabulous Greek historians (de Hist. Graec. pp. 433, 434, ed. Westermann), Διαδίκτυων, of which nothing remains, and Φαδράγων. (Ath. ix. p. 472, β. xi. pp. 496, β. 502, d.) To these must be added, from Suidas and Photius (s. v. Κάρυον), the Θηραύος. (Meinek. Προγ. Com. Graec. p. 483, iv. pp. 541-548.) [P. S.]

DIOXIPPUS, physician. (Dexippus.)

DIPHILUS (Διφίλος), commanded the thirty-three Athenian ships which, at the time of the passage of the second armament to Sicily, were posted at Narucas to prevent, if possible, the transport of reinforcements to the Syracusans. He was attacked near Erineus by a squadron, chiefly Corinthian, of slighter inferior numbers; and though the victory, in a technical sense, was, if anywhere, on his side, yet he sank but three of the enemy's ships, and had six of his own disabled; and that Phormio's countrymen should, in the scene of his achievements, effect no more, was, as was felt by both parties, a severe moral defeat. (Thuc. vii. 35.)

2. One of the principal Athenian comic poets of the new comedy, and a contemporary of Menander and Philoxen, was a native of Sineope. (Strab. xii. p. 546; Anon. de Com. p. xxx. xxxi.) He was a lover of the courteous Grathana, and seems sometimes to have attacked her in his comedies, when under the influence of jealousy. (Macheon, p. 566, n. 833, f.) He was not, however, perfectly constant. (Ael. Ep. i. 37.) He is said to have exhibited a hundred plays (Anon. l. a.), and sometimes to have acted himself. (Athen. xiii. p. 583, f.)

Though, in point of time, Diphilus belonged to the new comedy, his poetry seems to have had more of the character of the middle. This is shown, among other indications, by the frequency with which he chooses mythological subjects for his plays, and by his bringing on the stage the poets Archilochus, Hippias, and Sappho. (Ath. x. p. 487, n. xiii. p. 589, d.) His language is simple and elegant, but it contains many departures from Attic purity. Respecting his metre, see Schucke, (Hist. d. Dichtk. d. Griech. v. p. 48.)

The states that were friendly to Spartan, and prosecute the war with Struthus. With manners no less agreeable than those of his predecessor, he had more steadiness and energy of character. He therefore soon retrieved the affairs of Lacedaemon, and, having captured Tigranes, the son-in-law of Struthus, together with his wife, he obtained a large ransom for their release, and was thus enabled to raise and support a body of mercenaries. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8 §§ 21, 22) Diphridas, the Ephor, who is mentioned by Plutarch (Ages. 17) as being sent forward to meet Aegothus, then at Northenium in Thessaly, and to desire him to advance at once to Boeotia, n. c. 394. (Comp. Xen. Hell. iv. 3 § 9) The name Diphridas, as it seems, should be substituted for Diphas in Diod. xiv. 37. [B. R.]

DIPOENUS and SCYLLIS (Ἀποενος καὶ Σκῆλιος), very ancient Greek stock-owners, who are always mentioned together. They belonged to the style of art called Daedalian. [DADAULUS.]

Pausanias says that they were disciples of Daedalus, and, according to some, his sons. (ii. 15 § 1, iii. 17 § 6.) There is, however, no doubt that they were real persons; but they lived near the end, instead of the beginning, of the period of the Daedalids. Pliny says that they were born in Crete, during the time of the Median empire, and before the reign of Cyrus, about the 50th Olympiad (n. c. 560): the accession of Cyrus was in n. c. 559. From Crete they went to Scyros, which was for a long time the chief seat of Greek art. They were employed on some statues of the gods, but before these statues were finished, the artists, complaining of some wrong, betook themselves to the Aetolians. The Sicyonians were immediately attacked by a famine and drought, which, they were informed by the Delphic oracle, would only be removed when Dipoenus and Scyllis should finish the statues of the gods, which they were induced to do by great rewards and favours. The statues were those of Apollo, Artemis, Hercules, and Athena (Plin. H.N. xxxvi. 4.5.1), whose existence, if indeed the whole group represented the seizure of the tripod, like that of Amaryklos. Pliny adds that Ambracia, Argos, and Cleone, were full works of Dipoenus. (§ 2.) He also says (§ 1.2.), that these artists were the first of the sculptors who entered into marble, and that they used the white marble of Paros. Pausanias mentions, as their works, a statue of Athena, at Cleone (l. c.), and at Argos a group representing Castor and Pollux with their wives, Eleneira and Phoebe, and their sons, Anaxis and Mnasioi. The group was in ebony, except some few parts of the horses, which were of ivory. (Paus. ii. 22 § 6.) Clement of Alexandria mentions these statues of the Dioscuri, and also statues of Hercules of Tyrins and Artemis of Myrmich, at Sicyon. (Protre. p. 42. 15 comp. Plin. l. c.) The disciples of Dipoenus and Scyllis were Teoan, and Anguian, Learchus of Rhigium, Dorycles and his brother Medon, Dantes, and Theocles, who were all four Lacedaemonians. (Paus. ii. 32 § 4, iii. 17 § 6, r. 17 § 1, iv. 19 § 9.) [P. S.]

DIRCE (Δίρης), a daughter of Helios and wife of Lyceus. Respecting her story, see APHRODITE. She was, 151. a. Her body was changed by Dionysus, in whose service she had been engaged, into a well on mount Chiteron. (Hygim. Fab. 7.) A small river near Thebes likewise received its name from her, (Paus. ix. 23 § 3.) [L. S.] DIVITIACUS.

DIS, contracted from Dives, a name sometimes given to Pluto, and hence also to the lower world. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 26; Virg. Aen. vi. 127; comp. Pluto.)

[L. S.]

DISARIAUS, a physician, who may be supposed to have lived in the fifth century after Christ, and who is introduced by Macrobius in his Saturnalia (vii. 4) as discussing on dietetics and the process of digestion. [W. A. G.]

DITALCO, VIRIATHUS.

DIVES, L. BAR.BIIUS, was praetor in n. c. 189, and obtained the southern part of Spain for his province. On his way thither he was surrounded by Ligurians, who cut to pieces a great part of his forces: he himself was wounded, and escaped to Massalia, where however he died on the third day after. (Liv. xxxvi. 47, 50, 57.) [L. S.]

DIVES, L. CANULEIUS, was appointed praetor in n. c. 171, and obtained Spain for his province. But before he went to his post, several Spanish tribes sent embassies to Rome to complain of the avarice and insolence of their Roman governors. Hereupon L. Canuleius, Dives was commissioned to appoint five rectores communium to inspect into each particular case of extortion, and to allow the accused to choose their own pleaders. In consequence of the investigations which were thus commenced, two men who had been praetors in Spain withdrew into voluntary exile. The pleaders, probably bribed by the guilty, contrived to suppress the whole inquiry, as men of rank and influence were involved in it. L. Canuleius likewise is not free from the suspicion of having assisted the pleaders, for he joined them in dropping the matter, and forthwith assembled his troops, and proceeded to his province. After his arrival in Spain, another interesting embassy was sent to Rome. Roman armies had for many years been stationed in Spain, and numbers of the soldiers had married Spanish women. At the time when Canuleius was in Spain, the number of persons who had sprung from such marriages is said to have amounted to upwards of 4000, and they now petitioned the senate to assign to them a town, where they might settle. The senate decreed that they should give in their names to Canuleius, and that, if he would manumit them, they were to settle as colonists at Carteia, where they were to form a colonia libertorum. (Liv. xiii. 28, 31, xiii. 2, 5.) [L. S.]

DIVICO, a commander of the Helvetians in the war against L. Cassius, in n. c. 107. Nearly fifty years later, n. c. 58, when J. Caesar was preparing to attack the Helvetians, they sent an embassy to him, headed by the aged Divico, whose courageous speech is recorded by Caesar. (B. G. i. 13; comp. Oros. v. 15; Liv. Epit. 63.) [L. S.]

DIVITIACUS, an Aeduan noble, and brother of Dumnorix, is mentioned by Cicero (de Div. i. 41) as belonging to the order of Druids, and professing much knowledge of the secrets of nature and of divination. He was a warm adherent of the Romans and of Caesar, who, in consideration of his earnest entreaties, pardoned the treason of Dumnorix in n. c. 58. In the same year he took the most prominent part among the Gallic chiefs in reconciling Caesar and Ambiorix (see p. 287); he had, some time before, gone even to Rome to ask the senate for their interference, but without success. It was probably during this visit that he was the guest of Cicero (de Div. i. 46). Throughout, Caesar placed the greatest confidence in him, and in n. c. 57, pardoned, at his intercession, the Bellovaci, who had joined with the rest of the Belgians in their conspiracy. (Cas. B. G. i. 3, 16-20, 31, 32, ii. 3, 14, 15, vi. 15, vii. 39; Plut. Cas. 19; Dion Cass. xxxix. 34, &c.) [E. B.]

DIURANUS. [DIURANUS.]

DIVUS (Δίυς), the author of a history of the Phycicians, of which fragments concerning Solomon and Haman is preserved in Josephus. (c. Apion. i. 17.) There was also a Pythagorean philosopher Dius, who wrote a work περί καλολογίας, of which two fragments are preserved in Stobaeus. (Tit. lv. 16, 17.) [L. S.]

DIYLLUS (Διϊλλος), an Athenian, who wrote a history of Greece and Sicily in 26 or 27 books. It was divided apparently into several parts, the first of which extended from the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philemon (where the history of Callisthenes ended) to the siege of Perinthus, by Philip (B. G. c. 337-340), and the second from n. c. 340 to 329, the date of Philip's death. The work was continued to n. c. 298, from which period Psion, of Plateae, continued it. If we need to Ceanthos's substitution of Διϊλλος for Διϊλλος, in Diog. Laërt. v. 76, we must reckon also a work on drinking parties (οἰκοτοιχίαι) among the writings of Diyllus. The exact period at which he flourished cannot be ascertained, but he belongs to the age of the Ptolemies. (Diod. xvi. 14, 76, xxii. 4, 359, p. 490; Plut. de Herod. Mcd. 26; Ath. iv. p. 155, a. xiii. p. 393, f; Maussenee ad Herpeton, s. r. 'Aπησπιίου; Wesseling, ad Diod. xvi. 15; Clinton, F. H. v. ii. sub ann. 357, 365, 298, 387.) [E. E.]

DIYLLUS (Διϊλλος), a Corinthian satirist, who, in conjunction with Amyclaeas, excelled the greater part of the comic group which the Phocians dedicated at Delphi. (Paus. x. 13. 4 § 4; Amyclaeus; Chonius.)

DOBICONUS (Δοβίκονος), one of the officers in the Macedonian army, who after the death of Alexander supported the party of Pericles. After the death of Pericles he united with Attalus and Alcetas, and was taken prisoner together with the former when their combined forces were defeated by Antigonus in Pisidia, n. c. 320. (Diod. xviii. 45, Polyen. iv. 6 § 7.) The captives were confined in a strong fort, but, during the expedition of Antigonus against Eumenes, they contrived to overpower their guards, and make themselves masters of the fortress. Docimus, however, having quit the castle to carry on a negotiation with Simonio, the wife of Antigonus, was again made prisoner. (Diod. xix. 16.) He appears after this to have entered the service of Antigonus, as we find him in 313 B. C. sent by that prince with an army to establish the freedom of the Greek cities in Caria. (Diod. xix. 75; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. i. p. 588.) In the campaign preceding the battle of Ipsus, he held the strong fortress of Symmela in Phrygia in charge for Antigonus, but was induced to surrender it into the hands of Lysimachus. (Diod. xx. 107; Paus. i. 8 § 1.) It is probable that he held the government of the adjoining district for some time: and he had founded there the city called after him Docimeium. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Δουκλακος, Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii. p. 665; Eckhel, iii. p. 151.) His name is not mentioned after the fall of Antigonus. [E. H. B.]

3 v DOLABELLA.

DOCIMUS or DOCUIMIUS. To a supposed Graeco-Roman jurist of this name has been sometimes attributed the authorship of a legal work in alphabetical order, called by Harmenopoulus (§ 49) Të μυρον κατά στοιχεῖον, and usually known by the name of Synopsis Minor. It is principally borrowed from a work of Michael Attalista. A fragment of the work relating to the authority of the Leges Rhodiae, was published by S. Schardius (Basel 1851), at the end of the Naval Laws, and the same fragment appears in the collection of Lecclavais (J. G. R. ii. p. 472). Porcileus has published some further fragments of the Synopsis Minor (Collection de Lois Maritimes, i. pp. 164, 195—204), and Zachariae has given some extracts from it (Hist. Jur. G. R. p. 75); but the greater part of the work is still in manuscript. Such conjectures that the compilation of the Rhodian laws themselves was made by Docimus (Hist. Jur. Rom. lib. iv. c. 1, sect. 3. § 26, p. 688); but Zachariae is of opinion, that the only reason for attributing to him the authorship of the Synopsis Minor was, that the manuscript of Vienna, from which the fragment in Zachariae belonged, once belonged to a person named Docimua. [J. T. G.]

DODON (Δόδων), a son of Zeus by Europe, from whom the oracle of Dodona was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Δόδων.) Other traditions traced the name to a nymph of the name of Dodone. [L. S.]

DOLABELLA, sometimes written Dolabella, the name of a family of the patrician Cornelii gens. (Rukenh., ad Vell. Pat. iii. 43.)

1. P. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA MAXIMUS, was consul in b. c. 263 with Cn. Domitius Calvisius, and in that year conquered the Sequani, who had defeated the praetor L. Cassius, and murdered the Roman ambassadors. Owing to the loss of the consul Fasti for that time we do not hear of his triumph, though he undoubtedly celebrated his victory by a triumph. In b. c. 279 he, together with C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius, went to Pyrrhus as ambassadors to effect an exchange of prisoners. (Eutrop. ii. 6; Florus, i. 13; Appian, Samn. 6, Coll. 11; Dionys. Aedep., p. 2344, ed. Reiske, and p. 75, ed. Frankfurt.)

2. CN. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, was inaugurated b. c. 206 as rex sacrorum in the place of M. Marcius, and he held this office until his death in b. c. 180. (Livy xxvi. 36, xli. 42.)

3. L. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, was duumvir naves in b. c. 190. In that year his kinsman, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, the rex sacrorum, died, and our Dolabella wanted to become his successor. But C. Servilius, the pontifex maximus, before inaugurating him, demanded of him to resign his office of duumvir navalis. When Dolabella refused to obey this command, the pontifex inflicted a fine upon him. Dolabella appealed against it to the people. Several tribes had already given their vote that Dolabella ought to obey, and that he should be released from the fine if he would resign the office of duumvir navalis, when some sign in the heavens broke up the assembly. This was a foreshadowing of his attempt to inaugurate Dolabella. As duumvir navalis he and his colleague, C. Furius, had to protect the eastern coast of Italy with a fleet of twenty sail against the Illyrians. (Livy xlii. 42; xliii. 5.)

4. CN. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, was curule

necile in b. c. 165, in which year he and his colleague, Sex. Julius Caesar, laid the Heycyn of Terence performed at the festival of the Megaloesia. In b. c. 159 he was consul with M. Fulvius Nobilior. (Title of Terent. Heeyn.; Suet. Vit. Ter- reni. 5.)

5. CN. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, a grandson of No. 4, and a son of the Cn. Cornelius Dolabella who was put to death in b. c. 100, together with the tribune Appuleius Saturnius. During the civil war between Marius and Sulla, Dolabella sided with the latter, and in b. c. 81, when Sulla was dictator, Dolabella was raised to the consulship, and afterwards received Macedonia for his province. He there carried on a successful war against the Thracians, for which he was rewarded on his return with a triumph. In b. c. 77, however, young Julius Caesar charged him with having been guilty of extortion in his province, but he was acquitted. (Oras. v. 17; Plut. Sull. 28, 62; Appian, B. C. i. 100; Suet. Cael. 4, 49, 55; Vell. Pat. ii. 49; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. RIt. 73; Val. Max. viii. 9, 8; Plutar. de Clar. Periphr. cap. viii. 14; Tact. de Orn. 84; Gallia, xxv. 38; Ascon. in Sueton. p. 29, in Coriol. p. 73, ed. Orelli.)

6. CN. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, was praetor urbanus, in b. c. 81, when the cause of P. Quintius was tried. Cicero charges him with having acted on that occasion unjustly and against all established usages. The year after he had Cilicia for his province, and C. Malleolus was his quaestor, and the notorious Verres his legate. Dolabella not only tolerated the extortions and robberies committed by them, but shared in their booty. He was especially indulgent towards Verres, and, after Malleolus was murdered, he made Verres his proconsul. After his return to Rome, Dolabella was accused by M. Aemilius Seurna on of extortion in his province, and on that occasion Verres not only deserted his accomplice, but furnished the accuser with all the necessary information, and even spoke himself publicly against Dolabella. Many of the crimes committed by Verres himself were thus put to the account of Dolabella, who was therefore condemned. He was sent to exile, and left his wife and children behind him in great poverty. (Cic. pro Quinct. 2, 6; in Fest. i. 4, 15, 17, 29; Ascon. in Coriol. p. 110, ed. Orelli, who however confounds him with No. 5.)

7. P. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, was praetor urbanus in n. c. 67; if, as is usually supposed, this be the year in which Cicero spoke for Aulus Cæcina. (Cic. pro Cæcin. 8.) He seems to be the same person as the Dolabella who is mentioned by Valerius Maximus, (viii. 1, Ambuscatae, § 2.) as governor of Asia, with the title of procensor. (Comp. Gell. xii. 7, where he bears the praenomen Cæcina; Amm. Marc. xxvii. 2.)

8. P. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, perhaps a son of No. 7, was one of the most profligate men of his time. He was born about b. c. 70, and is said to have been guilty, even in early youth, of some capital offences, which might have cost him his life; but Cicero defended and saved him with great exertions. In b. c. 51, he was appointed a member of the college of the quindecimviri, and the year following he accepted Appius Claudius of having violated the sovereign rights of the people. While this trial was going on, Fabius, the wife of Dolabella, left her husband. She had been compelled to take this step by the conduct of her husband, who hoped by a marriage with Tullia, the daughter of Ciceró, to prevent Ciceró from assisting App. Claudius in his trial by favourable testimonies from Cicilia. Ciceró himself, on the other hand, was anxious to oblige App. Claudius, and was therefore by no means inclined to give his own daughter in marriage to the accuser of Claudius; he had, besides, been contemplating to bring about a marriage between Tullia and Thb. Claudius Nero. But Ciceró's wife was gained over by Dolabella; and, before Ciceró could interfere, the engagement was made, and the marriage soon followed. Ciceró seems to have been grieved by the affair, for he knew the vicious character of his son-in-law; but Clodius endeavoured to console him by saying, that the vices of Dolabella were mere youthful ebullitions, the time of which was now gone by; and that if there remained any traces of them, they would soon be corrected by Ciceró's influence, and the virtuous conduct of Tullia. App. Claudius was acquainted in the mean time, and as thus the great outward obstacle was removed, Ciceró tried to make the best of what he had been unable to prevent. In his letters written about that time, and afterwards, Ciceró speaks of Dolabella with admiration and affection, and he may have really hoped that his son-in-law would improve; but the consequences of his former recklessness and licentiousness, even if he had wished to mend, drove him to new acts of the same kind. The great amount of debts which he had contracted, and the urgent demands of his creditors, compelled him in n. c. 49 to seek refuge in the camp of Caesar. This was a severe blow to Ciceró, who speaks of the step with great sorrow. When Caesar marched into Spain against Pompey's legates, Dolabella had the command of Caesar's fleet in the Adriatic, but was unable to effect anything of consequence. After the battle of Pharsalia, in which he was taken prisoner with his vessels, he was sent to Rome. He had hoped that Caesar would liberally reward his services, or that proscriptions, like those of Sullá, would afford him the means of obtaining money; but in vain. His creditors were as loud and troublesome in their demands as before, and he at last had recourse to a new expedient. He caused himself to be adopted into the plebeian family of Cn. Lentulus—whence he is afterwards sometimes called Lentulus—in order to be able to obtain the tribunsipship. He was accordingly made tribune in n. c. 48; and, in spite of the decree of the senate, that everything at Rome should remain unchanged till Caesar's return from Alexandria, Dolabella continued to hold the tribunsipship. He was, however, with a resoluteness, that all debts should be cancelled, and with some other measures of a similar character. His colleagues, Asinius and L. Trebellius, opposed the scheme, and vehement and bloody struggles ensued between the two parties which were thus formed at Rome. Antony, who had been left behind by Caesar as his vicegerent, and bore no hostility towards Dolabella, did not take any strong measures against him till he was informed of an amours existing between his wife Antonia and Dolabella. The day on which Dolabella's intrigues were to be put to the vote, a fresh tumult broke out in the city, in which the party of Dolabella was defeated; but peace was nevertheless not quite restored till the autumn, when Causar returned to Rome. Caesar of course greatly disapproved of Dolabella's conduct, but he did not think it prudent to bring him to account, or to punish him for it. However, he got him away from Rome by taking him with him to Africa about the close of the year, and afterwards also in his Spanish campaign against the two sons of Pompey. In the course of the latter of these expeditions Dolabella was wounded. Caesar promised him the consulship for the year n. c. 44, although Dolabella was then only twenty-five years old, and had not yet held the praetorship; but Caesar afterwards altered his mind, and engaged himself upon the consulship for that year; however, as he had resolved upon his campaign against the Parthians, he promised Dolabella the consulship, in his absence, on the 1st of January, b. c. 44. Antony, who was then augur, threatened to prevent such an appointment, and when the comitia were held, he carried his threat into effect. On the 16th of March the senate was to have decided upon the opinion of Antony; but the murder of Caesar on that day changed the aspect of everything. Dolabella immediately took possession of the consular fasces, and not only approved of the murder, but joined the assassins, and thus obtained the office of which he had already usurped the insignia. In order to make a still greater display of his hatred of Caesar, he caused the altar which had been erected to his honour and the column in the forum to be pulled down; and many persons who went thither with the intention of offering sacrifices to Caesar, and of paying him divine honours, were thrown from the Tarpeian rock, or nailed on the cross. These apparent republican sentiments and actions gave great delight to Ciceró and the republican party; but no sooner did Antony open the treasury to Dolabella, and give him Syria for his province, with the command against the Parthians, than all his republican enthusiasm disappeared at once. As Cassius had likewise a claim to the province of Pontus, he began to think that the favor of his consulship had come to its close. But he did not proceed straightforwardly to Syria; for, being greatly in want of money, he marched through Greece, Macedonia, Thrace, and Asia Minor, collecting and extorting as much as he could on his way. C. Trebonius, one of Caesar's murderers, who had then arrived at Smyrna as praefect of Asia, did not admit Dolabella into the city, but sent him provisions outside the place, Dolabella pretended to go to Ephesus, and Trebonius gave him an escort to conduct him thither; but when the escort returned to Smyrna, Dolabella too went back, and entered Smyrna by night. Trebonius was murdered by Dolabella himself, and, after Trebonius's murder, Dolabella founding to Ciceró, he was tortured for two days before he was put to death. Dolabella now began extorting money and troops from the towns of Asia Minor with a recklessness which knew no scruples whatever in regard to the means for securing his end. When his proceedings became known at Rome, he was outlawed and declared a public enemy. Cassius, who had in the mean time arrived in Asia, made war upon him, and took Laodicea, which Dolabella had occupied. The latter, in order not to fall into the hands of his enemies, ordered one of his soldiers to kill him, b. c. 43. It is extraordinary to see the forbearance with which Ciceró treated Dolabella, who, after his marriage with Tullia, b. c. 49, improved so little in his conduct, that two years after, Tullia left him when she was expecting to become mother of a second child by him. Cicero, who certainly loved his daughter most tenderly, and was aware of the unworthy and contemptible conduct of Dolabella, yet kept up his connexion with him after the divorce, and repeatedly assures him of his great attachment. It is difficult to account for this mode of acting on the part of Cicero, unless we suppose that his desire to keep upon good terms with a man who possessed influence with Caesar outweighed all other considerations. Cicero's fondness for him continued for a short time after Caesar's murder, that is, so long as Dolabella played the part of a republican; but a change took place in Cicero's feelings as soon as Dolabella allied himself with Antony, and at the time when his crimes in Asia became known, Cicero spoke of him with the utmost bitterness and contempt. (See the numerous passages of Cicero relating to Dolabella in Orelli, Oeuv. ii. p. 175, &c.; comp. Fabric. Vit. Cie. p. 91, with Orelli's note: Dion Cass. xli. 40, xliii. 29, &c. xliii. 51, &c. xlii. 33, &c. xlii. 36, &c. Liv. xlix. 17, 58, &c. xlii. 33; Appian, B. C. ii. 41, 122, 129, iii. 8, 7, &c. 24, 26; Liv. Epit. 113, 119; Vell. Pat. ii. 58, 59, 69; Plut. Anton. 9, 10, 11; Cass. Bell. Alex. 65; Oros. vi. 16.)

9. P. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, a son of No. 8 by his first wife, Fabia. In b. c. 50 he was with Octavianus at Alexandria, and feeling himself attracted by the charms of Cleopatra, he betrayed to her that it was her conqueror's intention to carry her to Italy. In a. d. 10, he was consul with C. Junius Silanus. On coins he is designated as triumviri monetali. (Plut. Anton. 84; Fast. Cap.; Vaillant, Cornel. 63.)

10. P. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, a son of No. 9, was proconsul of Africa in the reign of Tiberius, a. d. 23 and 24. In the course of the administration of his province he gained a complete victory over the Numidian Taufarimus; but although he had formerly been a very great flatterer of Tiberius, yet he did not obtain the ornaments of a triumph, in order that his predecessor in the province of Africa, Junius Bluusius, an uncle of Sejanus, might not be thrown into the shade. In a. d. 27 he joined Domitius Afer in the accusation against his own relatives, Quintilius Varus. (Tac. Ann. iii. 47, 68, iv. 23, &c. 66.)

11. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA, was sent in a. d. 70 by the emperor Otho into the colony of Aquin- num, to be kept there in a sort of liberum custodi- num, for no other reason, but because he belonged to an ancient family, and was related to Galba. After the death of Otho he came back to Rome, but one of his most intimate friends, Plancius Varus, denounced him to the prefect of the city, who being a man of a mild but weak tempera- ment, was inclined to pardon him, until Triaria, the wife of Vitellius, prevailed upon him to sac- rifice the safety of the princes to his feeling of clemency. Vitellius, too, became alarmed through her, as Dolabella had married Petronia, a former wife of Vitellius. The emperor, therefore, enticed him to Interamnia, and there ordered him to be put to death. This was the first act of pre- vented cruelty in the reign of Vitellius. (Tac. Hist. i. 88, ii. 63.)

DOLIUS, (Αδύνας), an aged slave of Peneleus, whom she had received from her father on her mar- rying Odysseus, and who took care of her garden. On the return of Odysseus from his wanderings, Dolius and his six sons welcomed him, and was ready to join his master against the relatives of the suitors. (Hom. Od. iv. 735; xxiv. 498.) [L. S.]

DOLON (Δόλων), the name of two mythical persons, both Trojans. (Hom. Ili. x. 314, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 90.)

DOLOPS (Δόλως), a son of Hermon, had a sepulchral monument in the neighbourhood of Peirsae and Magnes, which was visible at a great distance, and at which the Argonauts landed and offered up sacrifices. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 584; Orph. Arg. 459.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Hom. II. xx. 525, &c.; Hygin. Fab. Pref. p. 2.)

DOMATITES (Δοματιίδες), that is, the domestic, a surname of Poseidon, at Sparta, which is, perhaps, synonymous with ἐνέργειοι. (Paus. iii. 14. § 7.)

DOMIDUCA and DOMIDUCUS, Roman surnames of Jupiter and Juno, who, as the gods of marriage, were believed to conduct the bride to the bridegroom. (August. de Civ. Dei, vii. 3, 8.)

DOMITIA, a sister of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus [Ahenobarbus, No. 10], and consequently an aunt of the emperor Nero. She was the wife of Cn. Crispus Passienus, who afterwards deserted her and married Agrippina, the mother of Nero. It is natural, therefore, that Tactius should call her an enemy of Agrippina. After the murder of his mother, Nero ordered Domitia, who was already of an advanced age, to be poisoned, in order that he might get possession of the property, which she possessed at Baiae, and in the neighbour- bourhood of Ravena, on which estate he built magnificent gymnasia. (Tac. Ann. xliii. 10, 21; Suet. Ner. 54; Dion Cass. xxi. 17; Quintil. vi. § 50, 3. § 74, x. § 24.)

DOMITIA, LEPIDA, a sister of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus [Ahenobarbus, No. 10], and of Domitia, and, consequently, like her an aunt of the emperor Nero. She was married to M. Valerius Messalla Barbatu, by whom she became the mother of Messallina, the wife of the emperor Claudius. There existed a rivalry of female vanity between her and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. Both women were equally bad and vicious in their conduct; Agrippina however succeeded, in a. d. 53, in inducing her son to sentence his aunt to death. (Tac. Ann. xi. 37, &c. xii. 64, &c.; Suet. Claud. 26, Ner. 7.)

DOMITIA LONGINA, a daughter of Domitius Carbulo, was married to L. Lania Aemilius, from whom she was carried away by Domitian about the time of Vespasian's accession. Immediately after Vespasian's return from the east, Domitian lived with her and his other mistresses on an estate near the Mons Albanus. Subse- quently, however, he married her, and in a. d. 73 she bore him a son. But she was unfaithful to him, and kept up an adulterous intercourse with Paris, an actor. When this was discovered, in a. d. 83, Domitian repudiated her on the advice of Ursus, and henceforth lived with Julia, the daughter of his brother. Soon after, however, he formed a reconciliation with Domitia, because he said the people wished it; but he nevertheless continued his intercourse with Julia. Domitia never loved Domi- tian, and she knew of the conspiracy against his life; as she was informed that her own life was in DOMITIANUS.

When his father at length arrived at Rome, Domitian, who was conscious of his evil conduct, is said not to have ventured to meet him, and to have pretended not to be in the perfect possession of his mind. Vespasian, however, knew his disposition, and throughout his reign kept him as much as possible away from public affairs; but in order to display his rank and station, Domitian always accompanied his father and brother when they appeared in public, and when they celebrated their triumph after the Jewish war, he followed them in the procession riding on a white war-steed. He lived partly in the same house with his father, and partly on an estate near the Mona Albanus, where he was surrounded by a number of courtiers. While he thus led a private life, he devoted a great part of his time to the composition of poetry and the recitation of his productions.

Vespasian, who died in A.D. 79, was succeeded by his elder son Titus, and Domitian used publicly to say, that he was deprived of his share in the government by a forgery in his father's will, for that it had been the wish of the latter that the two brothers should reign in common. But this was mere calumny; Domitian hated his brother, and made several attempts upon his life. Titus behaved with the utmost forbearance towards him, but followed the example of his father in not allowing Domitian to take any part in the administration of public affairs, although he was invested with the consulsiphip seven times during the reigns of his father and brother. The early death of Titus, in A.D. 81, was in all probability the work of Domitian. Suetonius states that Domitian ordered the sick Titus to be left entirely alone, before he was quite dead; Dion Cassius says that he accelerated his death by ordering him while in a fever to be put into a vessel filled with snow; and other writers plainly assert, that Titus was poisoned or murdered by Domitian.

On the Ides of September, A.D. 81, the day on which Titus died, Domitian was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers. During the first years of his reign he continued, indeed, to indulge in strange passions, but Suetonius remarks that he manifested a proper mixture of vices and virtues. Among the latter we must mention, that he kept a very strict superintendence over the governors of provinces, so that in his reign they are said to have been juster than they ever were afterwards. He also enacted several useful laws: he forbade, for example, the castration of male children, and restricted the increasing cultivation of the vine, whereby the growth of corn was neglected. He endeavoured to correct the frivolous and licentious conduct of the higher classes, and showed great liberality and moderation on many occasions. He further took an active part in the administration of justice; which conduct, praiseworthy as it then was, became disgusting afterwards, when, assisted by a large class of delatores, he openly made justice the slave of his cruelty and tyranny; for, during the latter years of his reign he acted as one of the most cruel tyrants that ever disgraced a throne, and as Suetonius remarks, his very virtues were turned into vices. The cause of this change in his conduct appears, independent of his natural bias for what was bad, to have been his boundless ambition, injured vanity, jealousy of others, and cowardice, which were awakened and roused by the failure of his undertakings and other occurrences of the time. In A.D. 84 he undertook an expedition against the Chatti, which does not seem to have been altogether unsuccessful, for we learn from Frontinus (Strateg. I. 3), that he constructed the frontier wall between the free Germans and those who were subject to Rome, so that he must at any rate have succeeded in confusing the barbarians within their own territory. After his return to Rome he celebrated a triumph, and assumed the name of Germanicus. In the same year Agricola, whose success and merit excited his jealousy, was recalled to Rome, overthrown the purpose of celebrating a triumph; but he was never sent back to his post, which was given to another person.

Agricola. The most dangerous enemy of Rome at that time was Drusus, the son of Germanicus. Germanicus had fitted out the troops under his command, and now that the news of the death of the emperor had reached him, he prepared to set out for Rome. As he was about to embark his men, the Roman senate refused to grant him the necessary supplies, and so he returned to Germany. Drusus, who had been left in charge of the war, sent word to the Roman people that he would not return to Rome unless he were granted the necessary supplies. The Roman people were convinced of Drusus's sincerity, and they gave him what he asked. Drusus, however, did not return to Rome, but continued to fight against the barbarians. When Drusus died, his son, Germanicus, succeeded him as commander-in-chief.

Domitian. As in all similar cases, the tyrant's own cruelty brought about his ruin. Three officers of his court, Parthius, Sigerius, and Battius, whom Domitian intended to put to death (this secret was betrayed to them by Domitian, the emperor's wife, who was likewise on the list), formed a conspiracy against his life. Stephamus, a freedman, who was employed by the conspirators, contrived to obtain admission to the emperor's bed-room, and gave him a letter to read. While Domitian was reading the letter, in which the conspirators' plot was revealed to him, Stephamus plunged a dagger into his abdomen. A violent struggle ensued between the two, until the other conspirators arrived. Domitian fell, after having received seven wounds, on the 18th of September, A.D. 96. Apollonius of Tyana, who was then at Athens, at the moment Domitian was murdered at Rome, is said to have run across the market-place, and to have exclaimed, "That is right, Stephamus, slay the murderer!"

There are few rulers who better deserve the name of a cruel tyrant than Domitian. The last three years of his reign form one of the most frightful periods that ever occur in the history of man; but he cannot be called a brutal monster or a madman like Caligula and Nero, for he possessed talent and a cultivated mind; and although Pliny and Quintilian, who place his poetic productions by the side of those of the greatest masters, are obviously guilty of servile flattery, yet his poetical works cannot have been entirely without merit. His fortune and esteem for literature are attested by the quinquennial contest which he instituted in honour of the Capitoline Jupiter, and one part of which consisted of a musical contest. Both prose writers and poets in Greek as well as in Latini resisted their productions, and the victors were rewarded with golden crowns. He further instituted the pension for distinguished rhetoricians, which Quintilian enjoyed; and if we look at the comparatively flourishing condition of Roman literature during that time, we cannot help thinking that it was, at least in great measure, the consequence of the influence which he exercised and of the encouragement which he afforded. It is extremely probable that we still possess one of the literary productions of Domitian in the Latin paraphrase of Aesopus's Phaenomena, which is usually attributed to Germanicus, the grandson of Augustus. The arguments for this opinion have been clearly set forth by Rutgers (Var. Lat. iii. p. 276), and it is
DOMITIUS,

DOMITIANUS. L. DOMITIUS. A few coins are extant in second brass, which exhibit on the obverse a laurelled head, with the legend, IMP. C. L. DOMITIUS. DOMITIANUS AVG.; on the reverse, the representation of a Genius, with GENIO POPULI ROM., and below, the letters ALE, indicating that they were struck at Alexandria. We find also a very rare Alexandrian third brass, with a rayed head, and the words DOMITIANOC. CEB. These pieces have been generally supposed to belong to the Domitians mentioned by Trebellius Pollio, as the general who vanquished the two Macriani, who is described as a man of lofty ambition, deducing his origin from the son of Vespasian, and is believed to be the same with the Domitianus put to death by Aurelian, according to Zosimus, in consequence of a suspicion that he was meditating rebellion. Eckhel, however, has demonstrated, from numismatic considerations, that the Latin medals, at least, cannot be earlier than the epoch of Diocletian, or his immediate successors, and therefore must commemorate the usurpation of some pretender unknown to history. (Trebell. Poll. Cal. in. dom., c. 2; Frugint. Tyrr. c. 12; Zosim. i. 49; Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 41.) [W. R.]

DOMITILLA, FLAVIA. 1. The first wife of Vespasian, by whom he had three children, Titus, Domitian, and a daughter Domitia. She had originally been the mistress of a Roman eques, Statilius Capella, and a freedwoman. Subsequently however she received the Claudii, and was at last made ingenia. She as well as her daughter died before Vespasian was proclaimed emperor. (Suet. Vesp. 3.) Her portrait is given in the coin annexed, which was struck after her death.

2. The wife of Flavius Clemens. [Clemens, T. FLAVIUS.] Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. viii. 25) calls her a sister of the emperor Domitian, which is impossible, as Domitia, the sister of Domitian, had died even before Vespasian's accession. Dion Cassius (liv. 14) calls her merely a συμγενής of Domitian, and it has been conjectured that in Philostratus we must read δίδυμος instead of δίδυμην. It may be that our Domitia was a daughter of Vespasian's daughter of the same name. After the murder of her husband Clemens, Stephanus, the freedman and murderer of Domitian, was her procurator. DOMNA, JUP'TIA, daughter of Bassiannus, wife of the emperor Septimius Severus, mother of Cæcilia and Geta, grand-aunt of Elagabalus and Alexander. (See the statue of Caracalla.) Both of obscure parents in Emaea, she attracted the attention of her future husband long before his elevation to the purple, in consequence, we are told, of an astrological prediction, which declared that she was destined to be the wife of a sovereign. Already cherishing ambitious hopes, and trusting implicitly to the infallibility of an art in which he possessed no mean skill, Severus, after the death of Marcius, wedded the humble Syrian damsel, with no other dowry than her horoscope. The period at which this union took place has been a matter of controversy among chronologists, since the statements of ancient authorities are contradictory and irreconcilable. Following Dion Cassius as our surest guide, we conclude that it could not have been later than A. D. 175, for he records that the marriage couch was spread in the temple of Venus, adjoining the palatium, by the empress Faustina, who in that year quitted Rome to join M. Aurelius in the east, and never returned. Julia, being gifted with a powerful intellect and with a large measure of the inmost cunning for which her countrywomen were so celebrated, exercised at all times a powerful sway over her superstitious husband, persuaded him to take up arms against Pescennius Niger and Claudius Albinus, thus pointing out the direct path to the Augusta, and, after the decease of her husband, had completely fulfilled, maintained her dominion unimpaired to the last. At one period, when hard pressed by the enmity of the all-powerful Plautianus, she is said to have devoted her time almost exclusively to philosophy. By her commands Philostratus undertook to write the life of Apollonius, of Tyana, and she was wont to pass whole days surrounded by troops of grammarians, rhetoricians, and sophists. But if she studied wisdom she certainly did not practice virtue, for her profligacy was a matter of common notoriety and reproach, and she is said even to have conspired against the life of her husband, who from gratitude, weakness, fear, or apathy, quietly tolerated her enormities. After his death, her influence became greater than ever, and Cæcilia enquired the most important affaires of state to her administration. At the same time, she certainly possessed no control over his darker passions, for it is well known that he murdered his own brother, Geta, in her arms, and when she ventured to give way to grief for her child, the fratricide was scarcely withheld from turning the dagger against his mother also. Upon learning the successful issue of the rebellion of Macrinus, Julia at first resolved not to survive the loss of her son and of her dignity, but having been kindly treated by the conqueror, she for a while indulged in bright anticipations. Her proceedings, however, excited a suspicion that she was tamper, with the other. She therefore contrived to send a messenger to quell Antonine, and, returning to her former resolution, she abstained from food, and perished. A. D. 217. Her body was transported to Rome, and deposited in the aquarius of Cæsars and Lucius Caesar, but afterwards removed by her sister, DOMNINUS.

Maesa, along with the bones of Gotu, to the cemetery of the Antonines. There can be little doubt that Domna was her proper Syrian name, analogous to the designations of Maea, Soenemius, and Macmaces, borne by other members of the same family. The idea that it is to be regarded as a contraction for domina, and was employed because the latter would have been offensive to a Roman ear, scarcely requires refutation. (See Reimarus on Dion Cass. Ixxiv. 3.)

One accusation, of the foulest description, has been brought against this princess by several ancient historians. Spartianus and Aurelius Victor expressly affirm that Julia not only formed an incestuous connexion with Caracalla, but that they were positively joined in marriage: the story is repeated by Eutropius and Orosius also, while Herodian hints at such a report (iv. 16), when he relates that she was named Jocasta by the licentious rabble of Alexandria. But the silence of Dion Cassius, who was not only alive, but occupied a prominent public station during the whole reign, on the subject, is a sufficient reason for rejecting the tale altogether. It is absolutely impossible that he should have been ignorant of such a rumour, if actually in circulation, and it is equally certain, from the tone of his narrative, that he would not have suppressed it had it been deserving of the slightest credit.

On the other hand, the vouchers for the fact are in themselves totally destitute of authority upon all points which admit of doubt or controversy, and in the present case were so ill-informed as to suppose that Julia was only the step-mother of Caracalla. (Dion Cass. Ixxiv. 3, Ixxv. 15, Ixxvi. 4, 16, Ixxvii. 2, 10, 18, Ixviii. 4, 23, 24; Herodian, iv. 13, 16, v. 3; Spartian. Sept. Sec. 3, 18, Caracal. 3, 19; Capitolin. Cod. DONATUS.

DOMNINUS, a Graeco-Roman jurist, who probably flourished shortly before Justinian, or in the commencement of that emperor's reign. He may be the same as the person whom was addressed a rescript of the emperor Zeno, (Basil. vii. p. 711, Cod. 10, tit. 3, s. 7.) He was a commentator upon the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodosian Codes. (Reis. ad Theophylact. pp. 1248, 1245.) Theodorus, a contemporary of Justinian, calls him his "very learned teacher" (Basil. vi. p. 217); but Zachariae imagines that Domninus could scarcely have been, in a literal sense, the teacher of Theodorus, who survived Justinian, and lived under Tiberius. (Zachariae, Anecdota, p. xviii.) By Suarrez (Notit. Basil. § 42), Domninus is called Leo Dominus; but this seems to be a mistake. (Assenm. Bibl. Jur. Orient. lib. ii. c. 29, p. 405.) By Nie. Comnenus Paulyg. (Novell. An. 1272, 402), a Domninus, Nenimius, Jctus, is quoted as having commented upon the Novellae Constitutions of Constantinus and Leo; but the untrustworthiness of Papadopoli, in this case, is exposed by Heimbach. (Anecdota, i. p. 229.)

The names Domnus and Domninus are sometimes confounded in manuscripts. They are formed from the word Dominus, and, like other words denoting title, (as Patricius), became converted into family names. (Ménage, Aenon. Jur. p. 171.) A jurist Domnus is mentioned by Libanius, who addressed letters to him. (Liban. Ep. iii. 277, 1124, ed. Wolf.) [J. T. G.]

DOMNUS. [DOMNINUS.]

DOMNUS (Δομνύς), is mentioned in the Commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates that are incorrectly ascribed to Orasius (p. 8, ed. Basil. 1535), as having written a commentary on this work. He was probably quite a late author, perhaps living in the fifth or sixth century after Christ; but it is uncertain whether he was the same person as either of the following physicians of the same name.

2. A Jewish physician, the tutor to Gesius, in the fourth century after Christ, by whom his own reputation was eclipsed, and his pupils enticed away. (Suid. s. v. Φερος.)

3. A heathen physician at Constantinople, in the fourth century after Christ, of whose death, in the time of the plague, an account is given by St. Ephraem Syrus. (Opera, vol. i. p. 91, ed. Rom. 1589, ed.) [W. A. G.]

DONATIUS VALENS. [VALENS.]

DONATUS, was bishop of Casa Nigrn, in Numidia, in the early part of the fourth century (A. D. 312), and from him, together with another prelate of the same name, the successor of Majorinus in the disputed election to the see of Carthage, the Donatists derived their appellation. This was the first important schism which distracted the Christian church; and, although in a great measure confined within the limits of Africa, proved, for three centuries, the source of great confusion, scandal, and bloodshed. The circumstances which gave rise to the division, and the first steps in the Dispute, are given in another article. [Cæcilius. Condemned, punished, but eventually tolerated by Constantine, fiercely persecuted by Constans, and favoured by Julian, the followers of this sect appear to have attained to their highest point of prosperity at the commencement of the fifth century, about which period they were ruled by four hundred bishops, and were little inferior in numbers to the Catholics of the province. The genius and perseverance of Augustin, supported by the stringent edict of Honorius (A. D. 414), vigorously enforced by the civil magistrates, seems to have crushed the life out of the heresy; but they revived upon the invasion of Geuseric, to whom, from their disaffection to a hostile government, they lent a willing support; they were of sufficient importance, at a later date, to attract the attention, and call forth the angry denunciations of Pope Gregory the Great, and are believed to have kept their ground, and existed as an independent community, until the final triumph of the Saracens and Mohammedanism. We ought to observe, that even the most violent enemies of the Donatists were unable to convict them of any serious errors in doctrine or discipline. Agreeing with their opponents upon all general principles and points of faith, they commenced simply by refusing to acknowledge the authority of Cæcilius, and were gradually led on to maintain, that salvation was restricted to their own narrow pale, because they alone had escaped the profanation of receiving the sacraments from the hands of traitors, or of those who, having connived at such apostasy, had forfeited all claim to the character of Christians. Asserting that they alone constituted the true universal church, they excommunicated not only those with whom they were directly at variance, but all who maintained any spiritual connexion with their adversaries; and adopting to the full extent the high pretensions of Cyprian with regard to ecclesiastical unity and episcopal power, insisted upon repudiating every one who became a proctor of their communion. Nor did the Donatists ever fail to point out and condemn all places of public worship which had been contaminated by the presence of their opponents, and upon casting forth the very corpses and bones of the Catholics from their cemeteries. This uncharitable spirit met with a fitting retribution; for, at the epoch when their influence was most widely extended, disseensions arose within their own body; and about one-fourth of the whole party, separating from the sect under the denomination of Maximianists, arrogated to themselves, exclusively, the prerogatives claimed by the larger faction, and hurled perdition against all who denied or doubted their infallibility.

Our present concern is to treat of all that concerns the Donatists. The works of Optatus Milevitanus and Augustin. In the edition of the former, published by the learned and industrious Du Pin, will be found a valuable appendix of ancient documents relating to this controversy, together with a condensed view of its rise and progress, while the most important passages in the writings of Augustin have been collected by Tillemon, in that portion of his Ecclesiastical Memoirs (vol. vi.) devoted to this subject. For the series of Imperial Laws against the Donatists from A.D. 400 to 426, see Cod. Theod. xvi. tit. 5. [W. K.]

DONATUS AELIUS, or, with all his titles as they are found in MSS, Actius Donatus Vir Clarus

Orator Urbis Romae, was a celebrated grammarian and rhetorician, who taught at Rome in the middle of the fourth century, and was the preceptor of Saint Jerome. His most famous work is a system of Latin Grammar, which has formed the groundwork of most elementary treatises upon the same subject, from the period when he flourished down to our own times. It has usually been published in the form of two or more distinct and separate tracts: 1. Ars s. Edito Prima, de litteris, syllabis, rubris, et tonis; 2. Edito Secundo, de octo partibus orationis; to which are commonly annexed, De elocutione; De lectorum virtute; De elocutio; De metopoeia; De schematibus; De trigonis; but in the recent edition of Lindemann these are all more correctly considered as constituting one connected whole, and are combined under one general title, taken from the Santenian MS. preserved in the Royal Library of Berlin, Donati Ars Grammatica tribus liberis comprehensa. It was the common school-book of the middle ages; inasmuch, that in the English of Longlande and Chaucer a donat or donat is equivalent to a lesson of any kind, and hence came to mean an introduction in general. Thus among the works of Bishop Pecock are enumerated The Donat in Christian Religion, and The Gloucer in the Donats, while Cotgrave quotes an old French proverb, Les donats estroitence encouru a leur dona, i.e. the devils were but yet in their grammar. These, and other examples, are collected in Warton's History of English Poetry, sect. viii.

In addition to the Ars Grammatica, we possess introductions (enarrationes) and scholia, by Donatus, to five out of the six plays of Terence, those to the Heautontimorumenos having been lost. The prefaces contain a succinct account of the source from which each piece was derived, and of the class to which it belongs; a statement of the time at which it was exhibited; notices respecting the distribution of the characters; and sundry particulars connected with stage technicalities. The commentaries are full of interesting and valuable remarks and illustrations; but from the numerous repetitions and contradictions, and, above all, the absurd and puerile traits here and there foisted in, it is manifest that they have been unmercifully interpolated and corrupted by later and less skilful hands. Some critics, indeed, have gone so far as to believe that Donatus never committed his observations to writing, and that these scholia are merely scraps, compiled from the notes of pupils, of dictata or lectures delivered vivæ voce; but this idea does not well accord with the words of St. Jerome in the first of the passages to which a reference is given at the end of this article.

Servius, in his annotations upon Virgil, refers, in upwards of forty different places, to a Donatus, who must have composed a commentary upon the Eclogues, Georgics, and Aeneid. "Scholia in Aenide" bearing the name of Donatus, and corresponding, for the most part, with the quotations of Servius, are still extant, but, from their inferior tone and character, have been generally ascribed to Tiberius Claudius Donatus, who is noticed below. They are divided into twelve books, to which a supplemental thirteenth was to have been added; the concluding portions of the fourth and eighth, and the commencement of the sixth and twelfth, are wanting. Their chief object is to point out the beauties and skill of the poet, rather than to explain his difficulties; but the writer, in a letter subjoined to the twelfth book, announces his intention, should a life already far advanced be prolonged, of compiling, from ancient authorities, a description of the persons, places, herbs, and trees, enumerated in the poem.

The popularity of the "Ars Grammatica," especially of the second part, "De octo partibus Ora- donis," is sufficiently evinced by the prodigious number of editions which appeared during the infancy of printing, most of them in gothic characters, without date, or name of place, or of printer, and the typographical history of no work, with the exception of the Scriptures, has excited more interest among bibliographers, or given them more trouble. Even before the invention of printing from moveable types, several editions seem to have been thrown off from blocks, and fragments of these have been preserved in various collections. The three parts will be found in the collection of Putzchi (Grammatische Latinae Antiquae Antiquae, Hanov. 4to. 1605), together with the commentary of Sergius on the prima and secunda edition; and that of Servius Maris Homerorum, on the secunda edition of 1573, 1548, 1577, 1773, 1774 (285, 286), and also in Lende- ncamer's "Corpus Grammaticum Latinorum Veterum," vol. i. Lips. 1831.

Of the commentary on Terence, at least four editions, separate from the text, appeared during the fifteenth century. That which is believed to be the first is a folio, in Roman characters, without place, date, or printer's name, but was probably published at Cologne, about 1470—1472; the second at Venice, by Spira, fol. 1472; the third at Rome, by Sweynheym and Pannartz, fol. 1472; the fourth at Milan, by Zaratol, fol. 1476. It will be found attached to all complete editions of the dramatist.

The commentaries upon the Aeneid were first discovered by Jo. Gioviani Pontanus, were first published from the copy in his library, by Scipio Capucius, Neap, fol. 1515, and were inserted by G. Fabricius in the "Corpus Interpretum Virgiliani- norum." The text is very corrupt and imperfect, but it would appear that MSS. still exist which present it in a more pure and complete form, although these have never been collated, or at least given to the world. (See Burmann, in the pref. to his ed. of Virgil.) (Hieron. advers. Ref. vol. iii. p. 92, ed. Bas., in Euseb. Chron. ad ann. cccv. p. c.; in Eccles. c. 1. ; see also Lud. Schopen, De Tertio et Damo, 8vo, Bonn. 1824, and Specimen emend. in Ael. Donati commenum, Terent. 4to, Bonn. 1826. Ossn. Beitraege zur Griechischen und Römischen Literaturgeschichte, Leip. 1839.)

DORIUS, TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS. We find prefixed to all the more complete editions of Virgil a life of the poet, in twenty-five chapters, bearing the title, "Tibieri Claudii Donati et Tiberii Claudium Maximum Domitiun filium de P. Virgili Maronis Vita." Nothing whatsoever is known with regard to this Donatus; but it has been conjectured that some grammarian, who flourished about the commencement of the fifth century, may have drawn up a biography which formed the groundwork of the piece we now possess, but which, in its actual shape, exhibits a worthless farrago of childish anecdotes and frivolous fables, compounded by ignorant and mendacious hands. Indeed, scarcely two MSS. can be found in which it does not wear a different aspect, and the earlier editors seem to have moulded it into its present form, by collecting and combining these various and often heterogene- nous materials. [W. R.]

DONTAS (Δοντας), a Lacedaemonian satyrus, was the disciple of Dipoenus and Scyllis, and therefore flourished about B.C. 550. He made the statues which were afterwards placed in the treasury of the Megarians at Olympia. They were of cedar inlaid with gold and silver. The statue of one of the heroines of the river Achelous, and containing figures of Zeus, Demetrae, Acheloës, and Hercules, with Ares assisting Acheloës, and Athena supporting Hercules. The latter statue seems, however, not to have been part of the original group, but a separate work by Medon. (Comp. Paus. v. 17. 1.) The group in the pedi- ment of the Meagrian treasury, representing the war of the gods and the giants, seems also to have been the work of Donatas; but the passage in Pan- sanus is not quite clear. (Paus. vi. 19. § 9; Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. i. p. 47, &c.)

DORCERUS (Δόρκερος), a son of Hippocoon, who had a heroism at Sparta conjointly with his brother Orchomene. The well near the same spot was called Dorceris, and the place around it Sebronion. (Paus. iii. 15. § 2.) It is probable that Dorceus is the same personage as the Dorcyelus in Apo- llo- dorus (iii. 10. § 8), where his brother is called Tebus. [L. S.]

DORIEUS (Δόριευς), eldest son of Axanax- drides, king of Sparta, by his first wife [AXANAX- DRIDES], was however born after the son of the second marriage, Cleomenes, and therefore ex- cluded from immediate succession. He was ac- counted the first in personal qualities of Sparta's young men, and feeling it an indignity to remain under the rule of one so inferior to him in worth, and so narrowly before him in claim to the throne, he left his country hastily, and without consulting the oracle of Delphi, to establish for himself a king- dom elsewhere. He led his colony first, under the guidance of some Theraeans, to Libya: the spot he here chose, Cinyps by name, was excellent; but he was driven out ere long by the Libyans and Carthaginians, and led the survivors home. He now, under the sanction of the oracle, set forth to found a Heracleum in the district pronounced to be the property of Hercules, and to have been reserved by him for any descendant who might come to claim it, Eryx, in Sicily. In his passage thitherward, along the Italian coast, he found the people of Croton preparing (B.C. 510) for their conflict with Sybaris, and induced, it would seem, by the connexion between Croton and Sparta (Müller, Dor. lxx. 3, § 12), he joined in the expedition, and received, after the fall of the city, a plot of land, on which he built a temple to Athena, of the Crathis. Such was the story given to Herodotus by the remnants of the Sybarites, who were his fellow-citizens at Thurii, denied however by the Crotoniates, on the evidence, that while Callias, the Elean prophet, had received from them various re- wards, still enjoyed there by his postercity, in return of his service in the war, nothing of the sort recalled the name of Dorieus. This, however, if Dorieus was bent on his Sicilian colony, is quite intelligible. He certainly pursued his course to Eryx, and there seems to have founded his Hor- clea; but ere long, he and all his brother Spartans with him, a single man excepted [Euryklon], were cut off in a battle with the Egestaeans, and, as it seems, the Carthaginians. He left however behind him a son, Euryanax, who accompanied his cousin Pausanias in the campaign (v. c. 479) against Mardonius. Why this son did not succeed rather than Leonidas, on the death of Cleomenes, is not clear; Mller suggests, comparing Phlt. Agis, c. 11, that a Heracleid, leaving his country to settle elsewhere lost his rights at home. (Hercul. v. 41—60; ix. 10, 53, 55; Diod. iv. 29; Paus. iii. 19, 6, 4, and 3 69, 82.)

DORIEUS (Δωριέας), the son of Diogoras [DIOGORAS], one of the nearest of the noble Heracleid family, the Eutids of Iasylus, in Rhodes. He was victor in the pentathlon in three successive Olympic Games, the 87th, 88th, and 89th, b. c. 432, 428 and 424, the second of which is mentioned by Thucydides (iii. 8); at the Nemean Games he won seven, at the Isthmian eight victories. He and his kinsman, Peisodorus, were styled in the announcement as Thurians, so that, apparently, before 424 at least, they had left their country. (Paus. vi. 7.) The whole family were outlawed as heads of the aristocracy by the Athenians (Xen. Hellen. i. 5. § 10), and took refuge in Thrace, and from Thracia, after the Athenian disaster at Sphacteria had re-established there the Peloponnesian interest, Dorius led thirty galleys to the aid of the Spartan cause in Greece. He arrived with them at Cnidus in the winter of 412. (Thuc. viii. 35.) He was, no doubt, active in the revolution which, in the course of the same winter, was effected at Rhodes (Thuc. viii. 44); its revolt from the Athenians was of course accompanied by the restoration of the family of Diogoras. (b. c. 411.) We find him early in the summer at Miletus, joining in the expostulations of his men to Astyochus, who, in the Spartan fashion, raised his staff as if to strike him, and by this act so violently excited the Thuriian sailors that he was saved from violence only by flying to an altar. (Thuc. viii. 84.) And shortly after, when the new commander, Mbindar, sailed for the Hellespont, he was sent with thirteen ships to crush a democratic movement in Rhodes. (Diod. xiii. 38.) Some little time after the battle of Cynossema he entered the Hellespont with his squadron, now fourteen in number, to join the main body; and being despatched and attacked by the Athenians with twenty, was forced to run his vessels ashore, near Rhoeas. Here he vigorously maintained himself until Mbindar came to his succour, and, by the advance of the rest of the Athenian fleet, the action became general: it was decided by the sudden arrival of Alcibiades with reinforcements. (Xen. Hellen. i. 1. § 2; Diod. xiii. 45.) Four years after, at the close of b. c. 407, he was captured, with two Thuriian galleys, by the Athenians, and sent, no doubt, to Athens: but the people, in admiration of his athletic size and noble beauty, dismissed their ancient enemy, though already under sentence of death, without so much as exacting a ransom. (Xen. Hellen. i. 5. § 19.) Pausanias, (i. c.) on the authority of Androtion, further relates, that at the time when Rhodes joined the Athenian league formed by Conon, Dorius chanced to be somewhere in the reach of the Spartans, and was by them seized and put to death. [A. H. C.]

DORIMACHUS (Δωριμαχος), the author of an epigram upon Milo, which is preserved, by Athenaeus (x. p. 412, f.) and in the Greek Anthology. (Bruckn, Anth. ii. 63; Jacobs, ii. 62.) Nothing more is known of him.

[Ps.]

37; xx. 1; Frangm. Hist. 68; Liv. xxvi. 24; Brandstätter, Gesch. des Aetol. Lauten, p. 342, &c.) [E. E.]

DORION (Δορίων). 1. A critic and grammarian in the time of Hadrian. He lived at Sardis, and was a friend of Dionysius of Miletus, the rhetorician. (Philol. 77. Sóp. i. 22. § 4.)

2. A rhetorician referred to by the elder Seneca. (Suas. 2. Contr. i. 8. iv. 4.)

A native of Egypt, is recorded by Atheneaus, from whom alone our knowledge of him is derived, as a musician, a wit, a bon vivant, and the author of a treatise on his favourite delicacy—fish. His profession and his propensities are together marked by the name λαοδειαφινις, applied to him by the comic poet Mnaicmacus, in his play of Ὀ τιπ (Ap. Athen. viii. p. 338, b.; Meineke, Frangm. Com. vol. iii. p. 578.) He is mentioned too in a fragment of Machon, also preserved by Atheneaus (vii. p. 337, c.; Casaub. ad loc.) and there is an anecdotc of him at the court of Nicocreon of Salamis (Ath. vii. p. 337, f.), which shews that he did not lose anything for want of asking. He was in favour with the king of Macedon, who transferred him to his retinue at Chaeronea, in b. c. 338. (Ath. iii. p. 118, b., vii. pp. 282, d. 287, c., 297, c., 800, f., 304, f., 306, f., 309, f., 312, d., 315, b., 319, d., 330, d., 322, f., 327, f., x. p. 455, c.). There was a Dorion too, probably a different person, from whose work, called Γαυρωκος, a mythological account of the origin of the word σκύθ is quoted by Atheneaus (iii. p. 78, a.).

[D. E.]

DORIS (Δορίς), a daughter of Oceanus and Theis, and the wife of her brother Nerus, by whom she became the mother of the Nereides. (Apollod. i. 2. § 2; Hesiod. Theog. 240, &c.; Óv. Met. ii. 269.) The Latin poets sometimes use the name of this marine divinity for the sea itself. (Virg. Òd. x. 5.) One of Doris's daughters, or the Nereides, likewise bore the name of Doris. (Hom. U. xvi. 45.)

[L. S.]

DORIS (Δορίς), a Lucian, daughter of Xeneus, wife of the elder, and mother of the younger Dionysius. (Diod. xiv. 44; Plut. Dion. 2.) She died before her husband, who seems to have lamented her loss in one of his tragedies. (Lucian. adv. Inedict. § 15.)

DOROTHEUS (Δορώθηος). A considerable number of works are mentioned by ancient writers as the productions of Dorotheus, without our being able to determine whether they belong to one or to different persons. The following, however, must be distinguished:

1. The author of a work on the history of ALEXANDER the Great, of which Atheneaus (vii. p. 276) quotes the sixth book. As Atheneaus mentions no characteristic to distinguish him from other persons of the same name, we cannot say who he was, or whether he is the author of any of the other works which are known only as the productions of Dorotheus: viz. a Sicilian history (Ιουρακτ), from the first book of which a fragment is preserved in Stobaeus (Plor. xii. 49) and Apollonius (Proverb. xx. 13); a history of Italy (Ἰουρακτ), from the fourth book of which a statement is quoted by Plutarch (Parall. Min. 20; comp. Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 12); Παράθυρος, of which Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 144) quotes the beginning; Βιβλία, of which a manuscript was known to Plutarch, (Parall. Min. 25.)

2. Of ASCALON, a Greek grammarian frequently referred to by Atheneaus, who quotes the 108th book of a work of his, entitled λαοδειαφινις. (Ath. vii. p. 329, ix. p. 410, xi. p. 481, xiv. p. 628; comp. Schol. ad Hom. Il. ix. 90, x. 222; Eustath. ad Hom. Il. xxiii. 230, 1297.) This work may be the same as the Περὶ τῆς ἀναγκαίου τῆς λειτουργίας τῶν Φαραών mice (Plut. Vesp. 116), which seems to have been only a chapter or section of the great work. Another work of his bore the title τοίχων τοῖς τῆς ἀναγκαίου τῆς λειτουργίας τῶν Φαραών καμίας. (Ath. xiv. p. 662.)

3. Of ATECHIS, is mentioned among the authors consulted by Pliny. (H.N. Elench. lib. xii. and xiii.)

4. A CHALDARAN, is mentioned as the author of a work περὶ τῶν λαθών by Plutarch (de Fum. 23), who quotes the second book of it. He may be the same as the Dorotheus referred to by Pliny (H. N. xiii. 22), though the latter may also be identical with the Athenian, No. 3.

5. Bishop of MARTIANOPLE, lived about A. D. 431, and was a most obstinate follower of the party and heresy of Nestorius. He was also a long time before the synod of Ephesus, he declared that any man who believed that the Virgin Mary was the mother of God was deserving of eternal damnation. He took part in the synod of Ephesus, which deposed him on account of his insisting upon the correctness of the Nestorian views; and a synod which was held soon after at Constantinople expelled him from his see. When Saturninus was appointed his successor, a popular tumult broke out at Martianople, in consequence of which Dorotheus was exiled by an imperial edict to Caesarea in Cappadocia. There are extant by him four Epistles printed in a Latin translation in Lupus. (Epistol. Ephesinum, No. 46, 78, 115, 137; comp. Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 232.)

6. Archimandrite of Palesitne, lived about A. D. 600, and is said to have been a disciple of Johnnes Monachus, on whom he waited during an illness, which lasted for several years. He is believed to have afterwards been made bishop of Brixia on account of his great learning. He wrote a work, in three books, on obscure passages in the Old and New Testament, which however is a mere compilation made from the works of Gregory the Great, for which reason it is printed among the works of the latter, in the Roman edition of 1591, and the subsequent ones. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 444; Fabr. Bibl. Gr. xi. p. 103.)

7. Of SIDON, was the author of astrological poems (Δορώθηος), of which a few fragments are still extant. They are collected in Iovian's Catalog. Cod. MSS. Biblioth. Met. i. p. 234, and in Cranmer's Anecdot. iii. pp. 167, 185. Manilius, among the Romans, and several Arab writers on astrology, have made considerable use of these Apotelesmata. Some critics are inclined to consider Dorotheus of Sidon as identical with the Chaldarain.

8. Of TYRE, has been frequently confounded with Dorotheus, a presbyter of Antioch in the reign of Diocletian, who is spoken of by Eusebius. (H. E. vii. 32.) He must further be distinguished from another Dorotheus, who was likewise a contemporary of Diocletian. (Euseb. H. E. viii. 1. 6.) Our Dorotheus is said to have flourished about A. D. 305, to have suffered much from the persecutions of Diocletian, and to have been exiled. When this persecution ceased, he returned to his see, in which he seems to have remained till the time of the emperor Julian, by whose emissary DOROTHUS.

Some have believed that a jurist of the same name flourished in a later age, for the untrustworthy Nie. Commenius Papadopeduli (Proeul. Myth. p. 408) cites a scholiast of Dorotheus Monachi on the title de testibus in the Compendium Legum Leonis et Constantinii. [J. T. G.] DOROTHUS (Δορόθεος) a Greek physician, who wrote a work entited "Γραμματικαι, Commentarii", which is quoted by Phlegon Thrallionus (De Mirab. c. 26), but is no longer in existence. He must have lived sometime in or before the second century after Christ, and may perhaps be the same person who is mentioned by Pliny, and said to have been a native of Athens, and also the same as Dorotheus Helius, who is twice mentioned by Galen. (De inf. II. 14; vol. xiv. pp. 166, 167.)

2. A physician of this name, who was a Christian, and also in deacon's orders, appears to have consulted Isidorus Pelasigites, in the fifth century after Christ, on the reason why incorporeal beings are less subject to injury and corruption than corporeal; to which question he received an answer in a letter, which is still extant. (Isid. Pelus. Epist. v. 191, ed. Paris, 1633.) [W. A. G.]

DOROTHUS, a painter, who executed for Nero a copy of the Aphrodite Anadyomene of Apelles. He lived therefore about a. d. 60. (Plin. xxxv. 10, s. 30, § 15; Apelles.) [P. S.]

DORPANBUS. [Doscanus.]

DORIS, the name of a family of the patrician Fabius gens.

1. C. FABIUS DORSO, greatly distinguished himself when the Capitol was besieged by the Gauls. (B. c. 300.) The Fabian gens was accustomed to celebrate a sacrifice at a fixed time on the Quirinal hill, and accordingly, at the appointed time, C. Dorso, who was then a young man, descended from the Capitol, carrying the sacred things in his hands, passed in safety through the enemy's posts, and, after performing the sacrifice, returned in safety to the Capitol. (Liv. v. 46, 52; Val. Max. l. I. § 11.) The tale is somewhat differently related by other writers. Dion Cassius (Fragm. 29, ed. Reimar.) speaks of the sacrifice as a public one, which Fabius, whom he calls Cæsio Fabius, had to perform. One of the Fabii, L. Florus (I. 13) also calls him a pontifex, who was sent by Manlius, the commander on the Capitol, to celebrate the sacred rite on the Quirinal. Appian, on the other hand, who quotes Cassius Heminia as his authority, says that the sacrifice was performed in the temple of Vesta. (C. L. 6.)

2. M. FABIUS DORSO, son probably of No. 1, was consul in B. c. 345 with Sen. Sulpius Camerinus Rufus, in which year Camillus was appointed dictator to carry on the war with the Aurunci. He made war with his colleague against the Volsci and took Sorci. (Liv. vii. 28; Dion. xvi. 66.)

3. C. FABIUS DORSO LUCINUS, son or grandson of No. 2, was consul in B. c. 273 with C. Claudius Canina, but died in the course of this year. It was in his consulship that colonies were founded at Cosa and Paestum, and that an embassy was sent by Ptolemy Philadelphus to Rome. (Vell. Pat. i. 14; Dertop. ii. 15.)

DORUS (Δορός), the mythical ancestor of the Dorians; he is described either as a son of Hellen, by the nymph Orseis, and a brother of Xuthus and Aeolus (Apollod. i. 7. § 3; Dion. iv. 60;) or as a son of Apollo, by Pithia, and a brother of Laodocus and Polypoites (Apollod. i. 7. § 6), DOSEITHUS.

whereas Svorius (ad Athen. ii. 37) calls him a son of Poseidon. He is said to have assembled the people which derived its name from him (the Dorians) around him in the neighbourhood of Parnassus. (Samb. viii. p. 303; Herod. i. 56, comp. Müller, Dor. i. § 1.)

DORCELEIDAS (Δορκέλειδας), a Lacedaemonian statuary, the brother of Medon, made the gold and ivory statue of Themis, in the temple of Hera at Olympia. He was a disciple of Dipoenos and Scyllis, and therefore flourished about b.c. 550. (Paus. v. 17, § 1.)

DORCYCLUS (Δορκύλκος), the name of two mythical personages. (Hom. H. xi. 489; Virg. Aen. vi. 630.)

DORYLAS, the name of two mythical personages. (Ov. Met. vi. 130, xii. 380.)

DORIAUS (Δορίας). 1. A general of Mithridates, who conducted an army of 40,000 men into Greece in B.C. 86 to assist Archelaus in the war with the Romans. (Appian, Mithr. 17, 43; Plut. Sall. 29; comp. above, p. 262, n.) 2. An ambassador of Deiotarus. (Cic. pro Deiot. 15.)

DORYPHORUS (Δορυφόρος), one of the most influential freedmen and favourites of the emperor Nero, who employed him as his secretary, and lavished enormous sums upon him. But in A.D. 63 Nero is said to have poisoned him, because he opposed his marriage with Poppea. (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 65; Dion Cass. 13. 5.)

DOSITHUS (Δοσίθεος), of Rhodes, the author of two encomiastic poems in the Greek Anthology, the verses of which are so arranged that each poem presents the profile of an altar, whence each of them is entitled Δοσίθους ἄρσεν. (Bruckn., Anh. i. 412; Jacob, i. 202.) The language of these poems is justly censured by Lucian. (Lexiph. 25.) Dosithas is also one of the authors to whom the "Egg of Simias" is ascribed. (Besant.)

The time at which he lived is unknown. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. 810—812; Jacob, Anth. Graec. vii. pp. 211—224, xiii. pp. 883, 889.)

DOSTHESUS (Δοσιθέος), a Greek historian, of whom four works are mentioned: 1. Μαρακλαίος, of which the third book is quoted. (Plut. Parallel. Min. 19.) 2. Περί Μαρακλαίας, of which little is known. (Plut. Parallel. Min. 20.) 3. Περί Λακ. (Ibid. 33, 34, 37, 40), and 4. Πελοποικίλα. (Ibid. 33; Steph. Byz. s. v. Δοσιθέος.) But nothing further is known about him.

DOSTHEUS (Δοσιθέος), of Colonae, a geometer, to whom Archimedes dedicates his book on the sphere and cylinder, and that on spirals. Censorinus is held to say (c. 18), that he improved the octa-eteris of Eudoxus; and both Geminus and Polymyius made use of the observations of the times of appearance of the fixed stars, which he made in the year B.C. 300. Pliny (H. N. xvii. 31) mentions him. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. P. 15.)

DOSTHEUS, summoned, probably from his occupation, MAGISTER, was a schoolmaster and grammarian, teaching Greek to Roman youths. He lived under Septimius Severus and Ant. Caracalla, about the beginning of the third century of our era. This appears by a passage in his Εγκυκλόπεια, where he states that he copied the Genealogy of Hyginus in the consilium of Maximus and Apus, which occurred A.D. 207.

There is extant of this author, in two manuscripts, a work entitled Εγκυκλόπεια divided into three books. Parts of it have never been published, and do not deserve to be published; for all that is the author's own is worthless, ill-expressed, and disfigured by excessive boastfulness. The first book (unpublished) consists of a Greek grammar, written in Latin, and treating of the parts of speech. The second book consists chiefly of imperfect vocabularies and glossaries, Greek-Latin and Latin-Greek. The glossaries were published by H. Stephanus, fol. 1573, and have since been several times reprinted. The third book contains translations from Latin authors into Greek, and vice versa, the Latin and Greek being placed on opposite columns. From the extracts thus preserved this part of the work deserves attention. It consists of six divisions, or chapters: 1. The first chapter is entitled Διττι Ηυδριουαν Σαλευτην και Επιστολα, and contains legal anecdotes of Hadrian, mostly without much point, his answers to petitioners, a letter written by him to his mother, and a notice of a law concerning paricide. The law referred to directs the murderer of his father to be sown alive in a sack, along with a dog, a cock, and an ape, and to be thrown into the nearest sea or river. Reinsius (Defens. Variar. Lect. p. 90) refers this law to a later age than that of Hadrian, and thinks that it was first introduced by Constantine, A.D. 319 (Cod. 6, tit. 17), but this supposition is inconsistent either with the genuineness of the fragment, or with the date when Dosithus lived, as collected from his own testimony. The Διττι Ηυδριουαν Σαλευτην και Επιστολαe were first published by Goldastus, 8vo, 1601, and may be found in Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. xii. pp. 514—554, edit. 1724.) The same work has been edited by Schulting, in his Jurisprudentia Antiquissima, and by Böcking in the Bonn Corpus Juris Romani Antejustianum. 2. The second chapter contains eighteen fables of Aesop. 3. The third chapter has been usually entitled, after Pithoeus, Fragmentum Regulorum, or, after Roever, Fragmentum veteris iuris justiculi de jure speciebus et de manumissionibus. Of this, the Latin text alone was first published by Pithoeus, 4to, Paris, 1736, at the end of his edition of the Collect. Juris Romani Justiniani. The Greek and Latin text together were published by Roever, 8vo, Lug. Bat. 1739. The Latin text appears in the Jurispr. Antiqu. of Schulting. The Greek and Latin together (revised by Beck, not, as is commonly stated, by Böcking) are given in the Berlin Jus Civile Antejustianenum, and by Böcking in the Bonn Corp. Jur. Rom. Antejust. There are able observations on this fragment by Cujas (Observ. xiii. 31), and by Vaienkar (Miscell. Observ. x. 108). It has also beenlearnedly criticized by Schilling, in his unfinished Dissertatio Critica de Fragmento Juris Romanorum Dositheae, Lips. 1819, and by Lucimann, in his Versuch über Dositheos, 4to, Berlin, 1837. This fragment, which has recently excited considerable attention, contains some remarks upon the division of jux tecito, naturale, and justicula, the division of persons into freedmen and freedmen, and the law of manumissions. It cannot be doubted that the Greek text has been translated from a Latin original. Schilling, against the probable inference to be derived from internal evidence, supposes it to have been a compilation, by Dositheus, from several jurists, and in this opinion is followed by Zimmern (R. R.}

DOSSENUS.

G. i. § 72). The fragment resembles the commencement of elementary legal works, as those of Ulpian and Gaius, with which we are already acquainted; and it is not likely that a petty grammarian would have employed himself in making a legal compilation. By Cujas and others, it has been attributed to Ulpian, but it seems, from some reasons, to have been of rather earlier date. It is, however, at least as late as Hadrian, for the author quotes Narsisius Priscus and Julianus. As Deriii them himself calls the work Regulac, it is supposed by Lachmann, who supports his conjecture by strong arguments, to have been an extract from Pseudo-Regulac, Elibii vii. The Latin text that has come down to us appears to be a mischievous transcription from the Greek, and many have been the conjectures as to the mode in which it was formed. Lachmann seems to have been successful in solving the enigma. He thinks that the Greek text was intended as a theme for re-transcription into Latin by the pupil of Dosithaeus, and that the present Latin text was formed by placing the words of the original text out of their original order, under the corresponding words of the Greek version. Proceeding on this idea, Lachmann has attempted, and, on the whole, with success, out of the disjointed Latin, to restore the original. 4. The fourth chapter is imperfect, but contains extracts from the Genealogy of Hyginus, published by Augustijn van Staveren. 5. The fifth chapter, which wants the commencement, contains a narrative of the Trojan war, formed from summaries of books vii.—xxiv. of Homer's Iliad. 6. The sixth chapter contains a scholiastic conversation of no value. The whole of the third book was published separately by Buckling, 16mo. Bonn, 1832.

J. T. G.

DOSITTIEUS (Δοσιττιεύς), a Greek physician, who must have lived in or before the sixth century after Christ, as Aetius has preserved (Tetrab. ii. Ser. iv. cap. 63, p. 424) one of his medical formulas, which is called "αιθαλίσ τελεον," and which is also inserted by Nicolaus Myrepanus in his Antidotarium. (Sect. xii. cap. 78, p. 792.) Another of his prescriptions is quoted by Paulus Aegineta. (De Re Medic. lib. i. 169.) [W. A. G.]

DOSSENNUS FABIIUS, or DORSENNUS, an ancient Latin comic dramatist, censured by Horace on account of the exaggerated buffoonery of his characters, and the mercenary carelessness with which his pieces were hastily produced. Two lines of this author, one of them from a play named Achæivistia, are quoted by Pliny in proof of the estimation in which the Romans of the olden time held perfumed wines, and his epitaph has been preserved by Seneca—

"Hospes resit est at phaini Dossenni lega."

Munk, while he admits the existence of a Dossennus, whom he believes to have composed Paquot, maintains that this name (like that of Macceus) was appropriated to one of the standard characters in the Atellane farces. (Hor. Epict. ii. 1. 173, where some of the oldest MSS. have Dossennus; Plin. H. N. xiv. 15; Senec. Epict. 89; Munk, de Fabulis Atellan. pp. 28, 35, 192.) [W. R.]

DOSSENNUS, L. RUBRIUS, of whom there are several coins extant, but who is not mentioned by any ancient writer. A specimen of one of these coins is given below, containing on the obverse a head of Jupiter, and on the reverse a quadriga, resembling a triumphal carriage, from which it may be inferred that this Dossenus had obtained a triumph for some victory.

DOTIS (Δοτίς), a daughter of Eulatos or Aestos, by Amyclea (ýmkeía), from whom the Dodon plain, in Thessaly, was believed to have derived its name. Dodis was the mother of Philegys, by Arese. (Apollod. H. B. 5, § 5, where in some editions we have a wrong reading, Xestos, who resided at Diophori; Step. Bys. x. 7. 7. 7.)

DOXAPATER, GREGORIUS, a Grecian-Roman jurist, who is occasionally mentioned in the scholia on the Basilica. (Basil. vol. iii. p. 440, vii. 16. 317.) He is probably the same person with the Gregorius of Basil. ii. p. 565, and vii. p. 607.

Montfauccon (Palaestina Graeca. lib. i. c. 6, p. 62, lib. iv. c. 6, p. 303; Dier. Ital. p. 217; Bild. MSS. p. 196), shows that a Doxapater, who was Diacussus Magnus Ecclesiae and Nomophylax (besides other titles and offices), edited a Nomolicon, or synopsis of ecclesiastical law, at the command of Johannes Comnenus, who resided at A.D. 1118-1143. The manuscript of this work is in the library of the fathers of St. Basil, at Rome. Pohl (ad Sacros Notit. Basil. p. 139, n. 3) seems to make Montfauccon identify the author of this Nomolicon with the Lord Gregorius Doxapater, the jurist of the Basilica, who is not mentioned by Montfauccon.

Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. lib. v. c. 25) attributes the authorship of this Nomolicon to Doxapater Nilius, who, under Rogerius, in Sicily, about A.D. 1143, wrote a tracts, de quinque Patriarchalibus Sedibus, first published by Stephen Io. Myone, in his Varia Sacra, i. p. 211. Fabricius is probably correct, and it is not likely that Doxapater Nilius and Gregorius Doxapater were the same person.

The untrustworthy Papastephan (Papastephan. Mystag. p. 372), speaks of a Doxapater, Saccarrius, as the last of the Greek jurists, and cites his scholia upon the Novellae of Isaccus Angelus, who resided at A.D. 1185-1195. (Heimbad, de Basil. Orig. p. 81.) [J. T. G.]

DOXIPATER (Δοξιπάτερ), or DOXOPATER, JOANNEIS, a Greek grammarian or rhetorician, under whose name we possess an extensive commentary on Aphthonius, which was printed for the first time by Aldus, in 1509, and again by Walz in his Rhetor Graecus, vol. ii. The commentary bears the title ομιλείας Αφθονίου, and is extremely diffuse, so that it occupies upwards of 400 pages. It is full of long quotations from Plato, Theocritus, Diodorus, Plutarch, and from several of the Christian Fathers. The explanations given seem to be derived from earlier commentators of Aphthonius. There is another work of a similar character which bears the name of Doxipater. It is entitled Περιλαμβάνει τῆς θρησκείας, and, as its author mentions the emperor Michael Calaphates, he must have lived after the year A.D. 1041. It is printed in the Biblioth. Costin. p. 590, &c.; in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ix. p. 585 of the old edition, and in Walz, Rhetor. Graec. vol. vi. (Walz, Prolegomen. ad vol. ii. p. ii., and vol. vi. p. xi.) [L. S.]
DRACON (Δράκων), the author of the first written code of laws at Athens, which were called Serçeís, as distinguished from the ἱκύα of Solon. (Andoc. de Myst. p. 11; Ael. V. H. viii. 10; Per. zon. ad loc.; Momms. de Diog. Laert. i. 53.) In this code he affixed the penalty of death to almost all crimes—to petty thefts, for instance, as well as to sacrilege and murder—which gave occasion to the remarks of Herodicus and Demades, that his laws were not those of a man, but of a dragon (δράκων), and that they were written not in ink, but in blood. We are told that he himself defended this extreme harshness by saying that small offenses deserved death, and that he knew no other punishment for great ones. (Plut. Men. 69; Plut. Sol. 17; Gell. vi. 18; Fabric. Bibl. Graeca. vol. ii. p. 23, and the authorities there referred to.) Aristotle, if indeed the chapter be genuine (Pol. ii. ii. ad fin.; Götting. ad loc.), says, that Dracon did not change the constitution of Athens, and that the only remarkable characteristic of his laws was their severity. Yet we know from Aeschines (c. Timarch. §§ 6, 7) that he provided in them for the education of the citizens from their earliest years; and, according to Pollux (viii. 125) he made the Epheto a court of appeal from the ἱκύα ἑαυτόδοκοι in cases of unintentional homicide. On this latter point Richter (ad Festor. 1. c.) Selinunus, and C. F. Hermann (Pol. Ant. § 103) are of opinion that Dracon established the Epheto, taking away the cognizance of homicide entirely from the Areopagus; while Müller thinks (Equum. §§ 64, 65), with more probability, that the two courts were united until the legislation of Solon. From this period (b. c. 594) most of the laws of Dracon fell into disuse (Gell. i. c.; Plut. Sol. i. c.); but Andocides tells us (i. c.), that some of them were still in force at the end of the Peloponnesian war; and we know that there remained unenacted, not only the law which inflicted death for murder, and which of course was not peculiar to Dracon's code, but that too which permitted the injured husband to slay the adulterer, if taken in the act. (Lys. de Cleist. Estrat. p. 94; Paus. ix. 33; Xenarch. ap. Athan. xiii. p. 566 B.) Demosthenes speaks of (c. Thes. p. 755) that, in his time, Dracon and Solon were justly held in honour for their good laws; and Pausanias and Suidas mention an enactment of the former legislator adopted by the Thasians, providing that any inanimate thing which had caused the loss of human life should be cast out of the country. (Paus. vi. 11; Suid. s. v. Νικέω.) From Suidas we learn that Dracon died at Aegina, being smothered by the number of hats and clocks showered upon him as a popular mark of honour in the theatre. (Suid. s. v. Δράκων, παράγειαρχεῖς; Kestor, ad Suid. s. v. Ἀρέσχης.) His legislation is referred by general testimony to the 39th Olympiad, in the fourth year of which (b. c. 621) Clinton is disposed to place it, so as to bring Enuèios into exact agreement with the other authorities on the subject. Of the immediate occasion which led to these laws we have no account. C. F. Hermann (l. c.) and Thirlwall (Greece, vol. ii. p. 18) are of opinion, that the people demanded a written code to replace the mere customary law, of which the Empatriades were the sole expositors; and that the latter, unable to resist the demand, gladly sanctioned the rigorous enactments of Dracon as adapted to check the democratic movement which had given rise to them. This theory certainly gets rid of what Thirlwall considers the difficulty of conceiving how the legislator could so confound the gradations of moral guilt, and how also (as we may add) he could fall into the error of making moral guilt the sole rule of punishment, as his own defence of his laws above mentioned might lead us to suppose he did. Yet the former of these errors is but the distortion of an important truth (Aristot. Eth. Nīc. vi. 13. § 6); while the latter has actually been held in modern times, and was more natural in the age of Dracon, especially if, with Wachsmuth, we suppose him to have regarded his laws in a religious aspect as instruments for appeasing the anger of the gods. And neither of these errors, after all, is more strange than his not foreseeing that the severity of his enactments would defeat its own end, and would surely lead (as was the case till recently in England) to impunity. (E. E.)

DRACON (Δράκων), an Achaean of Pullene, to whom Dercylidas (a. c. 398) entrusted the government of Attalus, which had been occupied by a body of Chian exiles, and which he had reduced after a siege of eight months. Here Dracon gathered a force of 3500 targets, and acted successively against the enemy by the ravage of Myasia. (Xen. Hell. iii. 2. § 11; Isocr. Pan. 70.)

DRACON (Δράκων). 1. A musician of Athens, who was a disciple of Damon, and the instructor of Plato in music. (Plut. de Mus. 17; Olympiad. Vit. Plat.)

2. A grammarian of Stratonicus, flourished in the reign of Hadrian. Suidas mentions several works of his, of which only one (πειλέν μέτρον) is extant. It is said to be an extract from a larger work, and has been edited by Godfr. Hermann, Leipzig, 1812.

3. Of Corycyra, a writer, whose work πειλέν Ἀλβων is quoted by Athenaeus (xv. p. 692, d.). Casaubon (ad loc.) proposes πειλέν Σευρων as a conjecture. (E. E.)

DRACON II. Was, according to Suidas (s. v. Δράκων), the son of Thessalus, and the father of Hippocrates (probably Hippocrates IV.). If this be correct, he was the nineteenth of the family of the Aesopiadae, the brother of Gorgias and Hippocrates III., and lived probably in the fourth century b. c.

DRACON III. Is said by Suidas (s. v. Δράκων) to have been the son of Hippocrates (probably Hippocrates IV.), and to have been one of the physicians to Roxana, the wife of Alexander the Great, in the fourth century b. c.

There is, however, certainly some confusion in Suidas, and perhaps the origin of the mistakes.
may be his making Draco I. and Draco II. two distinct persons, by calling Draco II. the oradadem, instead of the son of Hypereutes II. [W.A.G.J.]

DROCATIDES (Δρακότιδης), one of the thirty tyrants established at Athens in B.C. 404. [Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2.] He is in all probability the same whom Lysias mentions (ἀ. Ἐρατ. p. 126), as having framed at that time the constitution, according to which the Athenians were to be governed under their new rulers; and he is perhaps also the disputable person alluded to by Aristophanes as having been frequently condemned in the Athenian courts of justice. [Pep. 157; Schol. ad loc., comp. 483.]

DROCATIUS, a Christian poet, of whose personal history we know nothing, except that he was a Spanish presbyter, flourished during the first half of the fifth century, and died about A.D. 450. His chief production, entitled Hexæmeron, in heroic measure, extending to 575 lines, combines a description of the six days of the creation, in addition to which we possess a fragment in 190 elegiac verses addressed to the younger Theodotus, in which the author implores forgiveness of God for certain errors in his greater work, and excuses himself to the emperor for having neglected to celebrate his victories. Although the Hexæmeron is by no means destitute of spirit, and plainly indicates that the writer had studied carefully the models of classical antiquity, we can by no means adopt the criticism of Isidorus: "Dracotius composed hisodic versification Hexæmeron creationis mundi et hanceter, quod composit, scripsit; if we do not understand that any degree of clearness or perspicuity is implied by the word ascoletor, for nothing is more characteristic of this piece than obscurity of thought and perplexity of expression. Indeed these defects are sometimes pushed to such extravagant excess, that we feel disposed to agree with Barthius (Adv. ad. xxiii. 19), that Dracotius did not always understand himself. It is to be observed that the Hexæmeron exists under two forms. It was published in its original shape along with the Geniza of Claudius Marius Victor, at Paris, 8vo. 1569; in the "Corpus Christianorum Patrum," edited by G. Fabricius, Basil. 4to. 1564; with the notes of Weitzmann, Franc. 8vo. 1650; in the "Magnum Bibliothecum Patrum," Colen. fol. 1618, vol. i. par. 1; and in the "Bibliotheca Patrum," Paris, fol. 1624, vol. viii.

In the course of the seventh century, however, Eugenius, bishop of Toledo, by the orders of king Chindasbumus, undertook to revise, correct, and improve the Six Days; and, not content with repairing and perfecting the old structure, supplied what he considered a defect in the plan by adding an account of the Seventh Day. In this manner the performance was extended to 654 lines. The enlarged edition was first published by Simond along with the Opuscula of Eugenius, Paris, 8vo. 1619. In the second volume of Simond's works (Vol. i. 1780), we read the letter of Eugenius to Chindasbumus, from which we learn that the prelate engaged in the task by the commands of that prince; and in p. 903 we find the Elegy addressed to Theodosius. The Eugenian version was reprinted by Rivinus, Lips. 8vo. 1651, and in the "Bibliotheca Maxima Patrum," Lugdun. vol. ix. p. 724. More recent editions have appeared by F. Arevalus, Rom. 4to. 1791, and by J. B. Carpovius, Helm. 8vo. 1794.

(ISIDORUS, de Scriptor. Excl. c. 24; Honorius, de Scriptor. Eccles. lib. iii. c. 20; Ileionomus, de Scriptor. Eccles. c. 14, all of whom will be found in the Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica of Fabricius.)

The Dracotius mentioned above must not be confounded with the Dracotius to whom Athenæus addressed an epistle; nor with the Dracotius on whom Palladius bestowed the epithets of ἵππος and ἵμματοσ; nor with the Dracotius, bishop of Pergamus, named by Sozomen and Sozomenus. [W. R.]

DREPAELUS. It became a common practice, in the times of Diocletian and his immediate successors, for provincial states, especially the cities of Gaul, at that period peculiarly celebrated as the nursing-mother of orators, to despatch deputations from time to time to the imperial court, for the purpose of presenting congratulatory addresses upon the occurrence of any auspicious event, of returning thanks for past benefits, and of soliciting a renewal or continuance of favour and protection. The individual in each community most renowned for his rhetorical skill would naturally be chosen to draw up and deliver the complimentary harangue, which was usually recited in the presence of the prince himself. Eleven pieces of this description have been transmitted to us, which have been generally put together, under the title of "Duodecim Panegyrici Veteres," the speech of Pliny in honour of Trajan being included to round off the number, although belonging to a different age, and possessing very superior claims upon our notice, while some editors have added also the poem of Coremus in praise of the younger Justin. [CORIPPUS.] Of the eleven which may with propriety be classed together, the first bears the name of Claudius Maximinus, who was probably the composer of the second also [MAMERTINUS]; the third, fourth, sixth, seventh are all ascribed to Eumenius, with what justice is discussed elsewhere [BOMNUS]; the ninth is the work of Nazarius, who appears to have written the eighth likewise; the tenth belongs to a Mammertinus different from the personage mentioned above; the eleventh is the production of Drepanius, but the author of the fifth, in honour of the nuptials of Constantine with Fausta, the daughter of Maximinus (A. D. 307), is almost unknown.

Discourses of this description must for the most part be as devoid of all sincerity and truth as they are, from their very nature, destitute of all genuine feeling or passion, and hence, at best, resolve themselves into a mere cold display of artistic dexterity, where the attention of the audience is kept alive by a succession of epigrammatic points, carefully balanced antitheses, elaborate metaphors, and well-timed cadences, where the manner is everything, the matter nothing. To look to such sources for historical information is obviously absurd. Success would in every case be grossly exaggerated, defeat carefully concealed, or interpreted to mean victory. The true and straightforward soul would be banished with fulsome praise, his enemies overwhelmed by a host of the loudest calumnies. We cannot learn what the course of events really was, but merely under what aspect the ruling powers desired that those events should be viewed, and frequently the misrepresentations are so flagrant that we are unable to detect even a vestige of truth lurking below. We derive from these effusions some knowledge with regard to the personal history of particular individuals which is not to be obtained elsewhere, and from the style we can draw some conclusions with regard to the state of the language and the tone of literary taste at the commencement of the fourth century; but, considered as a whole, antiquity has bequeathed to us nothing more worthless.

Latinus Pacatus Dreyanus was a native of Aquitania, as we learn from himself and from Sidonius, the friend of Ausonius, who inscribes to him several pieces in very complimentary dedications, and the correspondent of Symmachus, by whom he is addressed in three epistles still extant. He was sent from his native province to congratulate Theodosius on the victory achieved over Maximus, and delivered the panegyric which stands last in the collection described above, at Rome, in the presence of the emperor, probably in the autumn of A.D. 391. If we add to these particulars the facts, that he was elevated to the rank of proconsul, enjoyed great celebrity as a poet, and was descended from father who bore the same name with himself, the sources from which our information is derived are exhausted.

The oration, while it partakes of the vices which disfigure the other members of the family to which it belongs, is less extravagant in its hyperboles than many of its companions, and although the language is a sort of hybrid progeny, formed by the union of poetry and prose, there is a certain splendour of diction, a flowing copiousness of expression, and even a vigour of thought, which remind us at times of the florid graces of the Asiatic school. How far the merits of Dreyanus as abard may have justified the decimation of the classics, and pronounces him second to Virgil only (Auson. Prof. Epigramm. Idyll. viii.), it is impossible for us to determine, as not a fragment of his efforts in this department has been preserved. He must not be confounded with Flores Dreyanus, a writer of hymns.

The Edito Princeps of the Panegyrici Veteres is in quarto, in Roman characters, without place, date, or printer's name, but is believed to have appeared at Milan about 1482, and includes, in addition to the twelve orations usually associated together, the life of Agricola by Tacitus, and fragments of Petronius Arbiter, with a preface by Francisco, author, addressed to Jacobus Antiquarius. Another very ancient impression in 4to, without place, date, or printer's name, containing the twelve orations alone, probably belongs to Venice, about 1499. The most useful editions are those of Schenckius, 4to., Ven. 1738, of Joannes, which presents a new recension of the text, with a valuable commentary, and comprehends the poem of Corippus, 2 tom. 8vo. Novem. 1779; and of Arrivanziana, which excludes Dreyanus, with very copious notes and apparatus criticus, 2 tom. 4to., Traj. ad Rhem. 1790—97. The edition published at Paris, 12mo. 1643, with notes by many commentators, bears the title XIV Panegyrici Veteres, in consequence of the addition of Panegyricus Ausonii, a work of Dreyanus.

In illustration we have T. G. Walch, Dissertatio de Panegyrici veterem, 4to., Jenæ, 1721; T. G. Moerlin, de Panegyrici veterem programmata, 4to., Norimb. 1738; and Hucne, Consensa XII Panegyricorum veteran, in his Opuscula Academica, vol. vi. p. 80. (Sidon. Apollon. Epist. viii. 12; comp. Panegy.

Driacus (Δρίμακος), a fabulous leader of revolted slaves in Chios. The Chians are said to have been the first who purchased slaves, for which they were punished by the gods, for many of the slaves thus obtained escaped to the mountains of the island, and from thence made destructive incursions into the possessions of their former masters. After a long and useless warfare, the Chians concluded a treaty with Driacus, the brave and successful leader of the slaves, who put an end to the ravages. Driacus now received among his band only those slaves who had run away through the bad treatment they had experienced. But afterwards the Chians offered a prize for his head. The noble slave-leader, on hearing this, said to one of his men, "I am old and weary of life; but you, whom I love above all men, are young, and may yet be happy. Therefore take my head, carry it into the town, and receive the prize for it." This was done accordingly; but, after the death of Driacus, the disturbances among the slaves became worse than ever; and the Chians then, seeing of what service he had been to them, built him a heroon, which they called the heroon of the ἄγαμος ἱεροῦ. The slaves sacrificed to him a portion of their boot; and whenever the slaves meditated any outrage, Driacus appeared to them in a dream to caution them. (Ath. vi. p. 265.) [L. S.]

Drimo (Δρίμος), the name of two mythical personages. (Hygin. Fab. Proem. p. 2; Esth. ad Is. 2.) [L. S.]

Dromeus (Δρόμεος). 1. Of Magnesia, a victor in the Olympic games, who gained the prize in the pankration in 0L 75. (Paus. vi. § 2, 11, § 2.)

2. Of Smyrna, twice won the prize at Olympia in the dolichos, but it is not known in what years. He also gained two prizes at the Pythian, three at the Isthmian, and five at the Nemean games. He is said to have first introduced the custom of feeding the athletes with meat. There was a statue of his at Olympia, which was the work of Pythagoras. (Paus. vi. § 3; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8, 13.) [L. S.]

Dromichaetes (Δρομιχαῖτης). 1. A king of the Geatae, contemporary with Lycurgus, king of Thrace, and known to us only by his victory over that monarch. He first defeated and took prisoner Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus, but sent him back to his father without ransom, hoping thus to gain the favour of Lysimachus. The latter, however, thereupon invaded the territories of Dromichaetes in person, with a large army; but soon became involved in great difficulties, and was ultimately taken prisoner with his whole force. Dromichaetes treated his captive in the most generous manner, and after entertaining him in regal style, set him at liberty again on condition of Lysimachus giving him his daughter in marriage and restoring the cemeteries which he had made from the Geatae to the north of the Danube. (Dion. B. P. xxxiv. p. 559, ed. Wess., Exc. V. xxi. p. 49, ed. Din.); Strab. viii. pp. 309, 305; Plut. Demet. 39, 52; Poly. vii. 25; Memnon, c. 5, ed. Orell.) Pausanias, indeed, gives a different account of the transaction, according to which Lysimachus himself escaped, but his son Agathocles having fallen into the power of the enemy, he was compelled to purchase his liberty by conceding a treaty on the terms already mentioned. (Paus. i. 9. § 6.)

The dominions of Dromichetes appear to have extended from the Danube to the Carpathians, and his subjects are spoken of by Pausanias as both numerous and warlike. (Paus. i. c.; Stumb. vii. pp. 304, 305; Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, p. 379; Drayson, Nachfolge. Alex. p. 509.)

2. A leader of Thracian mercenaries (probably of the tribe of the Getea) in the service of Antiochus III. (Poly. iv. 18.)

3. One of the followers of Mithridates, probably a Thracian by birth, who was sent by him with an army to the support of Archelaus in Greece. (Appian. Mithr. 32, 41.)

[4. H. B.]

DROMOCRIDES, or, as some read, Dromocleides, is mentioned by Fulgentius (Mythol. ii. 17) as the author of a Theogony, but is otherwise unknown. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. p. 36.)

[5. L. S.]

DROMON (Δρόμων) was an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, from whose θέατρα two fragments are quoted by Athenaeus (vi. p. 249, d., ix. p. 409, e.). In the former of these fragments mention is made of the parasite Tithynalus, who is also mentioned by Alexis, Timocles, and Antiphanes, who are all poets of the middle comedy, to which therefore it is inferred that Dromon also belonged. A play of the same title is ascribed to Rubulus. (Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græc. i. p. 418, iii. pp. 541, 542.)

2. A slave of the Periattic philosopher, Straton, who emancipated him by his will. (Dig. Læbt. v. 63.) He is included in the lists of the Periattics. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iii. p. 492.)

[D.S.]

DRUSILLA. 1. LIVIA DRUSILLA, the mother of the emperor Tiberius and the wife of Augustus. (Liv. I.)

2. DRUSILLA, a daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, was brought up in the house of her grandmother Antonia. Here she was deflowered by her brother Caius (afterwards the emperor Caligula), before he was of age to assume the toga virilis, and Antonia had once the misfortune to be an eye-witness of the incest of these her grandchildren. (Suet. Caligula, 24.) In A. D. 33, the emperor Tiberius disposed of her in marriage to L. Caesius Longinus (Tac. Ann. vi. 15), but he died soon afterwards carried away her from her husband's house, and openly lived with her as if she were his wife. In the beginning of his reign, we find her married to M. Acemillus Lepidus, one of his minions. The emperor had debauched all his sisters, but his passion for Drusilla exceeded all bounds. When seized with illness, he appointed her heir to his property and kingdom; but she died early in his reign, whereupon his grief became frantic. He buried her with the greatest pomp, gave her a public tomb, set up her golden image in the forum, and commanded that she should be worshipped, by the name Panthea, with the same honours as Venus. Livius Geminus, a senator, aware that he saw her ascending to heaven in the company of the gods, and was rewarded with a million sesterces for his story. Men knew not what to do. It was impious to mourn the goddess, and it was death not to mourn the woman. Several suffered death for entertaining a relative or guest, or saluting a friend, or taking a bath, in the days that followed her funeral. (Dion Cass. lxi. 11; Seneç. Consol. ad Polyg. 86.)

3. JULIA DRUSILLA, the daughter of the emperor Caligula (Caligula, 25), on the day of her mother's marriage, or, according to Dio (lx. 29), thirty days afterwards. On the day of her birth, she was carried by her father round the temples of all the goddesses, and placed upon the knee of Minerva, to whose patronage he commended her maintenance and education. Josephus (Ant. Jud. xix. 2) relates, that Caligula pronounced it to be a doubtful question whether he or Jupiter had the greater share in her paternity. She gave early proof of her legitimacy by the ferocity and cruelty of her disposition, for, while yet an infant, she would tear with her little nails the eyes and faces of the children who played with her. On the day that her father was assassinated, she was killed by being dashed against a wall. A. D. 41, when she was about two years old.

4. DRUSILLA, daughter of Herodes Agrippa I., king of the Jews, by his wife Cyprus, and sister of Herodes Agrippa II., was only six years old when her father died in A. D. 44. She had been already promised in marriage to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Commagene, but the match was broken off in consequence of Epiphanes refusing to perform his promise of conforming to the Jewish religion. Hereupon Azizus, king of Emesa, obtained Drusilla as his wife, and performed the condition of becoming a Jew. Afterwards, Felix, the procurator of Judæa, fell in love with her, and induced her to leave Azizus—a course to which she was prompted not only by the fair promises of Felix, but by a desire to escape the annoyance to which she was subjected by the envy of her sister Bernice, who, though ten years older, vied with her in beauty. She thought, perhaps, that Felix, whom she accepted as a second husband, would be better able to protect her than Azizus, whom she divorced. In the Acts of the Apostles (xxiv. 24), she is mentioned in such a manner that she may naturally be supposed to have been present when St. Paul preached before her second husband in A. D. 60. Felix and Drusilla had a son, Agrippa, who perished in an explosion of Vesuvius. (Josephus, Ant. Jud. xix. 7, xx. 5.)

Tuciæus (Hist. v. 9) says, that Felix married Drusilla, a granddaughter of Cleopatra and Antony. The records of any such person ever existed, must have been a daughter of Juba and Cleopatra Solena, for the name and fate of all the other descendants of Cleopatra and Antony are known from other sources; but the account given by Josephus of the parentage of Drusilla is more consistent than that of Tuciæus with the statement of Holy Writ, by which it appears that Drusilla was a Jewess. Some have supposed that Felix married in succession two Drusillæ, and conjecture is lent to this otherwise improbable conjecture by an expression of Suetonius (Clnfnd. 26), who calls Felix frons regum syncreti. [T. T. G.]

DRUSUS, the name of a distinguished family of the Liúia gens. It is said by Suetonius (Plb. 3), that the first Livius Drusus acquired the cognos-men Drusus for himself and his descendants, by having slain in close combat one Drusus, a chieftain of the enemy. This Livius Drusus, he goes on to say, was praefectus in Gallic, and, according to one tradition, on his return to Rome, brought from his province the gold which had been paid to the Senones at the time when the Capitol was besieged. This account seems to be as little deserving of credit as the story that Camillus prevented the gold from being paid, or obliged it to be restored in the first instance.

Of the time when the first Livius Drusus flour-rished, nothing more precise is recorded than that M. Livius Drusus, who was tribune of the plebs with C. Gracchus in B.C. 122, was his adnepos. This word, which literally means grandson's grandson, may possibly mean indefinitely a more distant descendent, as atavus in Horace (Car. 1. 1) is used indefinitely for an ancestor.

Piglius (Annales R. p. 416) conjectures, that the first Livius Drusus was a son of M. Livius Denter, who was consul in B.C. 392, and that Livius Denter, the son, acquired the agnomen of Drusus in the campaign against the Senones under Cornelius Dolabella, in B.C. 283. He thinks that the descendants of this Livius Denter Drusus assumed Drusus as a family cognomen in place of Denter. There is much probability in this conjecture, if the origin of the name given by Suetonius be correct; for the Senones were so completely subdued by Dolabella and Domitius Calvinus (Ap-pian, Gall. iv. fr. 11, ed. Schweigh.), that they seem to have been annihilated as an independent people, and we never afterwards read of them as being engaged in war against Rome. On this supposition, however, according to the ordinary duration of human life, M. Livius Drusus, the patronus senatus of B.C. 122, must have been, not the adnepos, but the adnepos, or grandson's grandson's son, of the first Drusus, and hence Piglius
(i. c.) proposes to read in Suetonius adnepos in place of adnepos.

Suetonius (Tib. 2) mentions a Claudius Drusus, who erected in his own honour a statue with a diadem at Appii Forum, and endeavoured to get all Italy within his power by overrunning it with his clientela. If we may judge from the position which this Claudius Drusus occupies in the text of Suetonius, he was not later than P. Claudius Pulcher, who was consul in B.C. 249. It is not easy to imagine any rational origin of the cogno-men Drusus in the case of this early Claudius, which would be consistent with the account of the origin of the cognomen given by Suetonius in the case of the first Livius Drusus. The asserted origin from the chiefman Drusus may be, as Byale (Dictionnaire, s. v. Drusus) surmises, one of those fables by which genealogists strive to increase the importance of families. The connexion of the family of Drusus with the first emperors probably reflected a retrospective lustre upon its republican greatness. (Vig. Ann. vi. 825.)

STemma DRUSORUM.

4. M. Livius Drusus, Cos. B.C. 112; married Cornelia.

5. C. Livius Drusus.

6. M. Livius Drusus, Trib. Pl.; killed in B.C. 91; married Servilia, sister of Q. Servilius Caepio.

7. Livius Drusus Claudianus, adopted by No. 6.

8. M. Livius Drusus Libo, Consul B.C. 15;
adopted by No. 7?; married Pompeia?

9. Livia Drusilla, afterwards named Julia Augusta;
m. 1. Tiberius Claudius Nero [2. Augustus Caesar].

10. L. Saturninus Libo Drusus, son of No. 8?

11. Nero Claudius Drusus
(senior), afterwards Drusus Germanicus; married Antonia, minor.

12. Tiberius Nero Caesar
(emperor Tiberius); m.
1. Vipsania Agrippina.

13. Germanicus
Caesar; m. 1. C. Caesar;
2. No. 16.

14. Livia;
m. 1. C. Caesar;
2. No. 16.

15. Tiberius Claudius Drusus Caesar (emperor Claudius);
m. 1. Urgulailla.

16. Drusus Caesar (juner); died A.D. 28,
leaving a daughter Julia.
DRUSUS.
17. Nero, m. Julia, son (emperor of No. 16; died A. D. 30.)
19. Caius Crassus (emperor, mother of Agrippina; died A. D. 38.)
20. Agrippina, mother of the emperor.
26. D. Drusus, Consul successus B. C. 137.? (Dig. 1. tit. 13. § 2.)
27. C. Drusus, historian. (Suet. Augustus, 94.)

OTHER DRUSUS.

1. M. Livius Drusus, the father, natural or adoptive, of No. 2. (Fast. Capit.)
2. M. Livius M. F. Drusus Aemilius, the father of No. 3. (Fast. Capit.) Some modern writers call him Mamilius instead of Aemilius, for transcribers are not agreed as to the correct reading of the Capitoline marble, which is broken into three fragments in the place where his name is mentioned under the year of his son’s consulship. (Compare the respective Fasti of Marcellus, the founder of Colatus, Sertorius, and Pirnieus, ad A. D. 605.)
3. C. Livius M. Aemilius M. N. Drusus, was consul in B. C. 147 with P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus. Of his father nothing is known, but it may be inferred with much probability that M. Drusus Aemilius belonged to the Aemilia gens, and was adopted by some M. Livius Drusus. It is possible, however, that M. Livius Drusus, the grandfather, had by different wives two sons named Marcus, and that one of them was the son of Aemilia, and was called, from his mother, Aemilius. (Dict. of Ant. p. 641, s. v. Nomen.)

There was a Roman jurist, named C. Livius Drusus, who has, by many writers, been identified with the subject of the present article. Cicero (Tusc. Qua. v. 36) mentions Drusus the jurist before mentioning Cn. Aufidius, and speaks of Drusus as from tradition (accessus), whereas he remembered having seen Aufidius. The jurist Drusus, in his old age, when deprived of sight, continued to give advice to the crowds who used to throng his house for the purpose of consulting him. Hence it has been rather hastily inferred, that Drusus the jurist was anterior to Aufidius, and was never seen by Cicero, and could not have been the son of the Drusus who was consul in B. C. 147. Others are disposed to identify the jurist with the son, No. 3, and there is certainly no absurdity in supposing the son of one who was consul in B. C. 147 to have died at an advanced age before Cicero (born B. C. 106) happened to meet him, or was old enough to remember him. Seeing, however, that Cicero was an active and inquisitive student at 16, and considering the inferences as to age that may be collected from the years when No. 4 and No. 6, the brother and nephew of No. 5, held offices, the argument founded upon Tusc. Qua. v. 36 seems to be rather in favour of identifying the jurist with our present No. 3; but, in truth, there are not sufficient data to decide the question. (Rutilius, Vitae Jilorum 19; Guili. Grutius, de Vit. Jilorum, l. 4. § 8.)

The jurist, whether father or son, composed works of great use to students of law (Val. Max. viii. 7), although his name is not mentioned by Pomponius in the fragment de Origine Juris. There is a passage in the Digest (19. tit. 1. a. 37, § 1), where Celsus cites and approves an opinion, in which Sex. Aelianus and Drusus coincide, to the effect that the seller might bring an equitable action for damages (arbitrium) against the buyer, to recover the expenses of the keep of a slave, whom the buyer, without due cause, had refused to accept. (Manius, ad XXX Jil. ii. p. 33.) Friscian (Are Gron. lib. viii. p. 127, ed. Colon. 1226) attributes to Livius the sentence, “Empulerbubris non potes, acque extolasti.” It is probable that the jurist Livius Drusus is here meant, not only from the legal character of the fragment, but because Friscian, whenever he quotes Livius Andronicus or the historian Livy, gives a circumstantial reference to the particular work. (Dirksen, Bruchstücke aus den Schriften der Römischen Juristen, p. 45.)

4. M. Livius C. F. M. Aemilius M. N. Drusus, son of No. 3, was tribune of the plebs in the year B. C. 122, when C. Gracchus was tribune for the second time. The senate, alarmed at the progress of Gracchus in the favour of the people, employed his colleague Drusus, who was noble, well educated, wealthy, eloquent, and popular, to oppose his measures and undermine his influence. Against some of the laws proposed by Gracchus, Drusus interposed his veto without assigning any reason. (Appian, B. C. i. 28.) He then adopted the unfair and crooked policy of proposing measures like those which he had thwarted. He steered by the side of Gracchus, merely in order to take the wind out of his sails. Drusus gave to the senate the credit of every popular law which he proposed, and gradually impressed the populace with the belief that the optimates were their best friends. The success of this system earned for him the designation patrosum suorum. (Suet. Tull. 5.) Drusus was able to do with applause that which Gracchus could not attempt without success. Gracchus was blamed for proposing that the Latins should have full rights of citizenship. Drusus was lauded for proposing that no Latin should be dis-honoured by rods even in time of actual military service. Gracchus, in his agrarian laws, reserved a rent payable into the public treasury, and was traduced. Drusus relieved the grants of public land from all payment, and was held up as a patriot. Gracchus proposed a law for sending out two colonies, and named among the founders some of the most respectable citizens. He was abused as a popularly-hunter. Drusus introduced a law for establishing no fewer than twelve colonies, and for settling 3000 poor citizens in each. He was applauded, and was assisted in carrying the measure. These twelve colonies are supposed by Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, iv. p. 349) to be the same with those mentioned by Cicero (pro Cæc. 35). In all these measures, the conduct of Drusus was seen to be exempt from sordid motives of gain. He took no part in the foundation of colonies, reserved no portions of land to himself, and left to others the management of business in which the disbursement of money was concerned. Gracchus, on the other hand, was anxious to have the handling of money, and got himself appointed one of the founders of an intended colony at Carthage. The populace, ever suspicious in pecuniary matters, when they saw this, thought that all his fine professions were pretenses for private jobs. Besides, Drusus cleverly took advantage of his absence to wound him through the side of Fulvius Placcus. Placcus was hot-headed and indiscreet, and Drusus contrived to throw the obloquy of his indiscretion and misconduct upon Gracchus. Thus was the policy of the senate and Drusus completely successful, and the short but brilliant career of the Caesars was a constant reproach to all his successors, and his power was for ever gone. (Pint. C. Gracchus, 8—11; C. Brut. 28, do Fin. iv. 24.)

The policy and legislation of Drusus in his tribunate bear some resemblance to those of his son, who was killed in his tribunate 31 years afterwards. Hence it is sometimes difficult to determine whether passages in the classical authors relate to the father or the son, and in some cases it is probable that the father and the son have been confounded by ancient writers. In a case of doubt the presumption is that the son [No. 6] is intended, since his tragic death, followed close by the Marse war, has rendered the year of his tribunate a conspicuous era in Roman history.

We read nothing more of Drusus, until he obtained the consulship in B. C. 112. He probably passed through the regular gradations of office as aedile and praetor. He may be the praetor urbanus, whose decision, that an action of mandatum lay against an auctor as such, is mentioned ad Heron. ii. 13, and he may be the Drusus praetor, an instance of whose legal stature is recorded in a letter of Cicero to Atticus (vates illud Drusi praetoris, Soc. v. 2); but we should rather be disposed to refer these passages to some member of the family (perhaps No. 2 or No. 1), who obtained the praetorship, but did not reach the higher office of consul.

Drusus obtained Macedonia as his province, and proceeded to make war upon the Scordisci. He was so successful in his military operations, that he not only repelled the incursions of this cruel and formidable enemy upon the Roman territory in Macedonia, but drove them out of part of their own country, and even forced them to retire from Thrace to the further or Dacian side of the Danube. (Florus, iii. 4.) Upon his return, he was welcomed with high honours (Liv. Eqv. ix. 35.), and his victory was received with the warmer satisfaction from its following close upon the severe defeat of Cato in the same quarters. (Dion Cass. Frag. Philerc. 23, ed. Reimai; p. 40.) It is very likely that he obtained a triumph, for Suetonius (Tib. 8) mentions three triumphs of the Livia gens, and only two (of Livius Salinator) are positively recorded. There is, however, no proof that Drusus triumphed. The Fasti Triumphales of this year are wanting, and Vaillant (Num. Ant. Fam. Rom. ii. p. 52) has been misled into the quotation of a conjectural supplement as an authority. In a passage in Pliny (H. N. xxxix. 50), which has been relied upon as proving that Drusus triumphed, the words triumphalem senem do not refer to the Drusus mentioned immediately before.

Plutarch (Quœst. Rom. vi. p. 119, ed. Reiske) mentions a Drusus who died in his office of censor, upon which his colleague, Aemilius Scaurus, refused to abdicate, until the tribunes of the plebs ordered him to be taken to prison. It is highly probable that our Drusus is intended, and that his censorship fell in the year B. C. 109, when the remains of the Capitoline marbles show that one of the censors died during his magistracy. (Fustis, p. 297, Basil. 1550.)

5. C. LIVIUS C. F. M. AEMILIANI N. DRUSUS, was a son of No. 3. Pigthius (Annales, iii. 20), contrary to all probability, confounds him with L. Livius Drusus Claudius, the grandfather of Tiberius. [See No. 7.] He says that he was the son of No. 1, and that his character and the weight of his eloquence. (C. Brut. 28.)

Some have supposed him to be the jurist C. Livius Drusus, referred to by Cicero (Tusq. Qu. v. 38) and Valerius Maximus (vii. 7), but see No. 3. Didoros (Scip. Vét. Noct. Colli. ii. p. 115, ed. Mai) mentions the great power which the two Drusi acquired by the nobility of their family, their good feeding, and their courteous demeanour. It seems to have been thought, that they could do anything they liked for, after a certain law had been passed, some one wrote under it in jest, "This law binds all the people but the two Drusi." It is far more likely that two brothers than that, as Mai supposes, a father and son (viz. No. 4 and No. 6) should be thus referred to; and, from the context, we doubt not that No. 4 and the present No. 5, contemporaries of the Gracchi, are designated.

6. M. LIVIUS M. F. C. N. DRUSUS, was a son of No. 4. His ambitious temper manifested itself with precocious activity. From boyhood he never allowed himself a holiday, but, before he was of an age to assume the toga virilis, he frequented the forum, busied himself in trials, and sometimes exerted his influence so effectually with the judges as to induce them to give sentence according to his wish. (Senec. de Brev. Vét. 6.) His character and morals in his youth were pure and severe (Cic. de Qu. i. 80), but a self-sufficient conceit was conspicuous in his actions. When quaeator in Asia, he would not wear the insignia of office: "ne quid ipsa est insignis." (Aurel. Vict. de Vit. Ill. 66.) When he was building a house upon the Palatine mount, the architect proposed a plan to prevent it from being overlooked. "No," said he, "rather construct it so that all my fellow-citizens may see everything I do." This house has a name in history: it passed from Drusus into the family of Cæsarius, and can be traced successively into the hands of Cicero, Censorinus, and Rustius Siscena. (Vell. Patric. ii. 15.) Velleius Paterculus slightly differs from Plutarch (Rome. Gener. Prop. ix. p. 194, ed. Reiske) in relating this anecdote, and the reply to the architect has been erroneously attributed to an imaginary Julius Drusus Publicola, from a false reading in Plutarch of οὐ τινὲς for οὐδὲν, and a false translation of the epitaph δυνατούργος.
DRUSUS.

Drausus inherited a large fortune from his father, the consul; but, in order to obtain political influence, he was profuse and extravagant in his expenditure. The author of the treatise de Vitis Illustribus, usually ascribed to Aurelius Victor, says that, from want of money, he sometimes stooped to unworthy practices. Magnulis, a prince of Mauretanis, had taken refuge in Rome from the resentment of Bocchus, and Drausus was induced by a bribe to betray him to the king, who threw the wretched prince to an elephant. When Adherbal, son of the king of the Numidianis (Mellipa), fled to Rome, Drausus kept him a prisoner in his house, hoping that his father would pay a ransom for his release. These two statements occur in no other author, and the second is scarcely reconcileable with the narrative of Sallust. The same author states, that Drausus was noiled, and gave magni-

DRUSUS. 1079

Drausus was early an advocate of the party of the optimates. When Saturninus was killed in n. c. 100, he was one of those who took up arms for the safety of the state (Cic. pro Rubr. Perd. reo. 7), and supported the consul Marius, who was now, for once, upon the side of the senate. (Livy. Epit. xix.) In the dispute between the senate and the equites for the possession of the judicia, Caepio took the part of the equites, while Drausus advocated the cause of the senate with such earn- nestness and impetuousness, that, like his father, he seems to have been termed patroon en se neRTI. (Cic. pro Mil. 7; Diod. xxxvi. fr. fin. ed. Bipont., p. 480.) The equites had now, by a lex Sem- pronia of G. Gracchus, enjoyed the judicia from n. c. 122, with the exception of the short interval during which the lex Servilia removed the exclusion of the senate [see p. 880, a.]. It must be remembered that the Q. Servilius Caepio who proposed this short- lived law (repealed by another lex Servilia of Ser- vilius Glacina) was perhaps the father of Q. Servi- lius Caepio, the brother-in-law of Drausus, but was certainly a different person and of different politics. [See p. 553, a.] The equites abused their power, as the senate had done before them. As farmers of the public revenues, they committed peculation and extortion with an habitual impunity, which assumed in their own view the complexion of a right. When accused, they were tried by accomp- lices, and when convicted, they were permitted to hang a banner when wolf devours wolf.” On the other hand, in prosecutions against senators of the opposite faction, the equites had more regard to political animosity than to justice. Even in ordinary cases, where party feeling was not concerned, they allowed their judicial votes to be purchased by bribery and corrupt influence. The recent unjust condemnation of Rutilius Rufus had weakened the senate and encouraged the violence of the equites, when, in n. c. 91, Drausus was made tribune of the plebs in the consulate of L. Marcus Philippus and Sex. Julius Caesar. (Flor. L.c.)

Under the plea of an endeavour to strengthen the party of the senate, Drausus determined to gain over the plebs, the Latins, and theItalic socii. The success of his measure was increased by the ability with which his enemy Caepio directed against the nobility by prosecuting some of their leaders. From the conflicting statements and opposite views of Roman writers as to his motives and conduct, his character is in some respects a problem. Even party-spirit was at fault in estimating a man whose measures were regarded as revolutionary, while his political sentiments were supposed to be profoundly aristocratic. Velleius Paterculus (ii. 13; compare what is said by the Pseudo-Sallust in Epist. 2 ad C. Cae. de Rep. Ord.) applauds him for the tortuous policy of attempting to wheedle the mob, by minor concessions to their demands, into a surrender of impor- tant claims to the optimates; but we cannot help thinking (comp. Flor. iii. 18; Livy. Epit. Ixxi. lxxi.), that he cared as much for self as for party—that personal rivalries mingled with honest plans for his country’s good and enlightened views above the capacity of the times—that, at last, he was sorely by disappointment into a dangerous con- spirator,—and that there were moments when visions of sole domination floated, however indis- tinctly, before his eyes. He was eager in the pur- suit of popularity, and indefatigable in the endeav- our to gain and exercise influence. It was one

It appears from Cicero (Brut. 62, pro Mil. 7.), that Drausus was the uncle of Cató of Utica, and the great-uncle of Brutus. Those relationships were occasioned by successive marriages of his sister Livia. We agree with Manutius (ad Cic. de Fin. iii. 2) in thinking, in opposition to the common opinion, that she was first married to Q. Ser- vilius Caepio [Caepio, No. 8, p. 535, a.], whose daughter was the mother of Brutus, that she was divorced from Caepio, and then married the father of Cató of Utica; for Caepio, according to Plutarch (Cató Min. 1) was brought up in the house of his uncle Drausus along with the children of Livia and Caepio, who was then living, and who survived Dra- usus. (Livy. Epit. Ixxiii.) As Cató of Utica was born n. c. 95 (Plut. Cat. Min. 2, 3, 75; Liv. Epit. 114; Salust. Catil. 54), and as Drausus, who died n. c. 91, survived his sister, we must suppose, unless his account is correct, that an extraordinary combination of events was crowded into the years n. c. 95—91: viz. 1st. the birth of Cató; 2nd. the death of his father; 3rd. the sec- ond marriage of Livia; 4th. the births of at least three chidren by her second husband; 5th. her death; 6th. the rearing of her children in the house of Drausus; 7th. the death of Drausus.

Q. Servilius Caepio was the rival of Drausus in birth, fortune, and influence. (Flor. iii. 17.) Origi-inally they were warm friends. As Caepio mar- ried Livia, the sister of Drausus, so Drausus married Servilia, the sister of Caepio (γάμος ἑπαλλείγη, Dion Cass. Frag. Poëses, 116, ed. Reimac, vol. i. p. 45.) Dion Cassius may be understood to refer to domestic causes of quarrel; but, according to Pliny, a rupture was occasioned between them from com- petition in bidding for a ring at a public auction; and to this small event have been attributed the struggles of Drausus for pre-eminence, and ulti- mately the kindling of the social war. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 6.) The mutual jealousy of the brothers-in-law proceeded to such great lengths, that on one occasion Drausus declared he would throw Caepio down the Tarpeian rock. (De Vir. Ill. 66.) of the objects of his restless and self-sufficient spirit to become the arbiter of parties, and he acted from immediate impulses, without considering neither the result of his conduct. There was deep meaning in the witticism of Granius, the public crier, who, when Drusus saluted him in the ordinary phrase, "Quid agis, Grani?" asked in reply, "Immo vero, tu Drusus, quid agis?" (Cic. pro Flone. 14.)

To conciliate the people, Drusus renewed several of the propositions and imitated the measures of the Gracchi. He proposed and carried laws for the distribution of corn, or for its sale at a low price, and for the assignation of public land (leges Farnesianae, agrariae. Liv. Epit. lxxi.). The establishment of several colonies in Italy and Sicily, which had long been voted, was now effectuated. (Appian, de Bell. Civ. i. 85.) Nothing could surpass the extravagance of the largesses to which he persuaded the senate to accede. (Tac. Ann. iii. 27.) He declared that he had been so bountiful, that nothing was left to be given, by any one else, but air and dirt, "coelum aut eodem." (De Vir. Ill. 66; Flor. iii. 17.) It was probably the exhaustion of the public treasury produced by such lavish expenditures that induced him to debase the silver coinage by the alloy of one-eighth part of brass. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 18.) Presumptuous, arrogant, and rash, he assumed a station to which he was not entitled by authority and experience, notwithstanding the splendour of his birth and the power of his eloquence. But his energy went far (as energy like his always will do) in silencing opposition, and beguiling submission to his will. Once, when the senate invited his attendance at their place of meeting, he sent a message in answer: "Let them come to me—to the Curia Hostilia, near the Rostra," and they were so abject as to obey. (Val. Max. ix. 5. § 2: Cun. senatus ad quam missus est, ut in Curiam veniret. Quae non petissim, inquit, ipsius in Hostiliis, propinquum Rostris, id est, ad me venit?) This passage is remarkable for the opposition between Curia and Hostilia; whereas it is ordinarily stated that, in classical writers, Curia, without more, denotes the Curia Hostilia.

Such conduct naturally produced a repletion of feeling among some proud men, who had a high sense of their own importance, saw the false position in which their party was placed, and disliked pushing effrontery. In Cicero (de Orat. iii. 1, 2) we find a description of a scene full of turbulence and indecorum, where Philippus, the consul, inveighs against the senate, while Drusus and the orator dispute with him. From the known policies of the persons concerned, this scene is exceedingly difficult to explain; but we believe that it occurred at a period in the career of Drusus when he had not yet identified himself with the formidable cabals of the Latins and Italians, and when, in spite of his popular measures, he still retained the confidence of the senate, from his resistance to the equites. We believe that the haughty Philippus upbraided the senate for their complaisance to Drusus in favouring the plebs, and that it was the unmeasured rebuke of the aristocrat which roused the spirit de corps of the senator Cassius. We know from other sources that Philippus opposed and passed the equitan laws of Drusus, and interrupted the tribune while he was haranguing the assembly; whereupon Drusus sent one of his clients, instead of the regular vintor, to arrest the consul. (Val. Max. ix. 5. § 2; Florus, iii. 17, and Auson. de Vir. Ill. vary slightly from each other and from Valerius Maximus.) This order was executed with extreme violence, and Philippus was collared so tightly, that the blood started from his nostrils; upon which Drusus, taunting the luxurious epicurean of the consul, cried out, "Pala! it is only the gravy of thrushes." (Schenius, ad Auson. de Vir. Ill. 66.)

Having thus bought over the people (who used to rise and shout when he appeared), and having, by promising to procure for them all the rights of citizenship, induced the Latini and Italici socii to assist him, Drusus was able, by force and intimidation, to carry through his measures concerning the judicium ("legem judiciumarum portandam," Liv. Epit. lxxi.). Some writers, following Liv. Epit. lxxi., speak of his sharing the judicium between the senate and the equites; but his intention seems to have been entirely to transfer the judicium to the senate; for, without any positive exclusion of the equites and lower orders, as long as senators were eligible, it is probable that no names but those of senators would be placed on the praetors upon the lists of judges. (Poehla, Institutionen. i. § 71.) We accept the circumstantial statement of Appian (B. C. i. 35), according to which the law of Drusus provided that the senate, now reduced below the regular number of 360, should be reinforced by the introduction of an equal number of new members selected from the most distinguished of the equites; and enacted that the senate, thus doubled in number, should possess the judicium. The law seems to have been silent as to any express exclusion of the equites; but it might be implied from its language that such exclusion was contemplated, and, so far as its positive enactment referred to the new members, they were entitled to be placed on the list of judges, qua senators, not qua equites. Nor was there any prospective regulation for supplying from the equestrian order vacancies in the judicial lists. To this part of the law was added a second part, appointing a commission of inquiry into the bribery and corruption which the equites had practised while in exclusive possession of the judicium. (Appian, s. c.; compare Cic. pro Rabir. Post. 7, pro Cluent. 56.)

After Drusus had so far succeeded, the reaction set in rapidly and strongly. The Romans, who were usually led as much by feeling as by calculation, required to be managed with peculiar tact and delicacy; but Drusus had a rough way of going to work, which, even in the moment of success, set in array against him the vanity and prejudices of public men; and in his measures themselves there appeared to be a species of trimming, which, while it seemed intended to displease none, was ultimately found to be unsatisfactory to all. It may be that he was actuated by a single-minded desire to do equal justice to all, and to remedy abuses wherever they might lurk, careless of the offence which his reforms might give; but even his panegyrists among the ancients do not view his character in this light. Whatever else were his motives (and we believe them to have been complex—sunt quin valetudinariorum), he appeared to be the slave of many masters. Mob-popularity is at least fleeting, and those who were pleased had not been favoured with the distribution of lands were discontented at the lack of their mere fortunate competitors. The Roman populace hated the foreigners who were striving to obtain equal franchise with themselves. The great body of the equites, who were very numerous, felt all the inviducosity of raising a select few to the rank of senators, while the rest would not only suffer the mortification of exclusion, but he practically deprived of that profitable share which they had previously enjoyed in the administration of justice. But worse than all was the apprehended inquisition into their past misdeeds. The senators viewed with dislike the proposed expedition to their own level of nearly 300 equites, now far below them in rank, and dreaded the addition of a heterogeneous mass, which was likely to harmonize badly with the ancient body. Moreover, they now suspected the ambition of Drusus, and did not choose to accept the transfer of the judicia at his hands.
The Latins and speci demanded of him with stern
importunity the price of their recent assistance;
and their murmurs at delay were deepened when they saw the Roman populace dividing the aeger publicus, and depriving them of those possessions which they had hitherto occupied by stealth or force. They even began to tremble for their private property. (Appian, l. c., An. de Vic. III. 66.)

In this state of affairs, the united dissatisfaction of all parties enabled the senate, upon the proposition of Philippus, who was anger as well as counsul, to undo, by a few short lines, what had lately been done. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 6, 12.)

The senate now, in pursuance of that anomalous constitution which practically allowed a plurality of supreme legislative powers, voted that all the laws of Dra-
sus, being carried against the auspices, were null and void from the beginning. "Sacratum videtur,
M. Drusus legibus populum non teneri." (Cic. pro Cornel. fr. ii. vol. iv. p. ii. p. 419; Asconius, in Cic. pro Cornel. p. 68, ed. Grolli.) The lex Cacellia Didia required that a law, before being put to the vote in the comitia, should be promulgated for three manidies (17 days), and directed that several distinct clauses should not be put to the vote in a lump. If we may trust the suspected oration pro Domine (c. 16 and c. 20), the senate resolved that, in the passing of the laws of Drusus, the provisions of the lex Caelicilia Didia had not been observed.

It is difficult to suppose that the largesses of corn and land, so far as they had been carried into effect, were revoked; but probably the establishment of colonies was stopped in its progress, and undoubtedly the lex judicaria was completely de-fected. From the expressions of some ancient authors, it might be imagined that the lex judicaria had never been carried; but this is to be explained by considering that, during the short apparent existence, it never came into actual operation,
and that, according to the resolution of the senate,
it was null ab initio for want of essential prequities of validity. From the narrative of Vellidius Paterculus (ii. 13, 14) and Asconius (l. c.), it might be inferred (contrary to the opinion of several modern scholars), that it was in the lifetime of Drusus that the senate declared his laws null, and the fact is now established by a fragment of Didorus Siculus brought to light by Mai (Script. Vet.
Nova Collectio, ii. p. 116); from which we learn that Drusus told the senate, that he could have prevented them from passing the resolutions, had he chosen to exert his power, and that the hour would come when they would rue their suicidal act. As to the precise order of these events, which took place within the period of a few months, we are in want of detailed information. The 70th and 71st books of Livy are unfortunately lost, and the abbreviated accounts of minor historians are not always easily reconcilable with each other and with the incidental notices contained in other classical authors.

Drusus, who had been sincere in his promises,
felt grievously the difficulty of performing them.
Weariness and vexation of spirit overtook him.
He found that, with all his followers, he had not one true friend. He repeated him of his ineffect life, and longed for repos.; but it was too late to retreat. The monstrous powers that he had brought into life urged him onward, and he became giddy with the prospect of danger and confusion that lay before him. (Sene. de Brut. Vet. 5.) Then came the news of strange portents and fearful auguries from all parts of Italy to perplex and confound his stupendous soul. (Oros. v. 16; Obsequ. 11.) He was himself an augur and pontifex; pro Domine. 46.
Hence the expression socius mens in the month of Costa; Cic. de Nat. Decr. iii. 92.) Then came the exasperating thought of the ingratitude of the se-name, and the determination to make them feel the everything which they had slighted. Thus agitated by unceasing passions, he scrupled not to meddle with the two-edged weapons of intrigue, sedition, and conspiracy, which he had neither force nor skill to wield. He was like the Gracchi with their lustre faded. (Gracchorum obsolueti nitor, Auct. ad Heren.
iv. 34.) He adopted the fictitious practice (of which the example was first set by C. Gracchus), of holding separate meetings of his followers, and he made distinctions among them according to their supposed fidelity. One he would admit to a priate interview, another he would invite to a conference where several were present, and there were some whom he did not ask to attend except on those occasions when all his adherents were assominated in a body. In furtherance of a common object, the secret conclave plotted, and the more general association worked and organized, while the crowd meeting and the armed mob intimidating by the demonstration and excrusion of physical force. (Sene. de Dom. vi. 31; Liv. Epli.
Ixxxii.) In Mat's extracts from Diodorus (l. c.) is preserved a remarkable oath (unaccountably headed δορας Φιλάνθρωπον), by which members of the association bound themselves together. After calling by name the Roman gods, deities, and heroes, the oath proceeds: "I swear that I will have the same friends and foes with Drusus; that I will spare neither substance, nor parent, nor child, nor life of any, so it be not for the good of Drusus and of those who have taken this oath; that if I be come a citizen by the law of Drusus, I will hold Rome my country, and Drusus my greatest benefciator; and that I will administer this oath as many more as I be able. So may weal or woe be mine as I keep this oath or not." The ferment soon became so great, that the public peace was more than threatened. Standards and eagles were seen in the streets, and Rome was like a battlefield, in which the contending armies were encamped. (Florus, l. c.)

The end could not much longer be postponed.
At a public meeting of the tribes, when the impatience and disappointment of the multitude were loudly expressed, Drusus was seized with a faint-

ing fit, and carried home apparently lifeless. Some said that his illness was a pretext to gain time. It did in fact give him a brief respite, and public prayers for his recovery were put up throughout Italy. Some said, that the fit was occasioned by an overdose of galea-blood, which he had swallowed, in order, by his pale countenance, to accrue a report that Caesar had attempted to poison him. Feverish anxiety, coupled with great mental and bodily exertion, had probably brought on a return of his old disorder, epilepsy, which was supposed to have been cured by a voyage he once made to Anticyra, for the purpose of taking heliobore upon the spot where it grew. (De Vit. Ill. 66; Plin. HN. XXVIII. 41; XXV. 26; Gell. XVII. 15.)

Affairs now approached a crisis. The social war was manifestly bursting into flame; and the consuls, looking upon Drusus as a chief conspirator, resolved to meet his plots by counterplots. He knew his danger, and, whenever he went into the city, kept a strong body-guard of attendants close to his person. The accounts of his death vary in several particulars. Appian says, that the consuls invited it in person to the Etruscans and the Umbrians into the city to lay him under pretext of urging their claims to citizenship; that he became afraid to appear abroad, and received his partisans in a dark passage in his house; and that, one evening at dusk, when dismissing the crowds who attended, he suddenly cried out that he was wounded, and fell to the ground with a leather-cutter's knife sticking in his groin. The writer de Viris Illustrius relates that, at a meeting on the Alban mount, the Latins conspired to kill Philippus; that Drusus, though he warned Philippus to beware, was accosted in the senate of plotting against the consul's life; and that he was stabbed upon entering his house on his return from the Capitol. (Compare also Vell. Patre. ii. 14.)

Assassinated as he was in his own hall, the image of his father was sprinkled with his blood; and, while he was dying, he turned to those who surrounded him, and asked, with characteristic arrogance, based perhaps upon conscious honesty of purpose, "Friends and neighbours, when will the commonwealth have a citizen like me again?" Though he was cut off in the flower of manhood, no one considered his death premature. It was even rumoured that, to escape from inextricable embarrassments, he had died by his own hand. The assassin was never discovered, and no attempts were made to discover him. Caesar and Philippus (Ampelius, 26) were both suspected of having harboured the crime; and when Cicero (De Nat. Deor. iii. 33) accuses Q. Varus of the murder, he probably does not mean that it was the very hand of Varus which perpetrated the act.

Cornelius, the mother of Drusus, a matron worthy of her illustrious name, was present at the death-scene, and bore her calamity—a calamity the more bitter because unsweetened by vengeance—with the same high spirit, says Seneca (Cons. ad Marc. 16), with which her son had carried his laws.

After the fall of Drusus, his political opponents treated his death as a just retribution for his injuries to the state. This sentiment breathes through a fragment of a speech of C. Carbo, the younger (Cic. Orat. 63) to the Senate, quoted by Cicero (Orat. 63) for the peculiarity of its tetrach rhythm: "O Marce Druse (patrem appello), tu dicere solutum esse rempublicam: quicumque cam violasset, ab omnibus esse et poenas per solutus. Patriis dictum sapiens temerariis fili cum pro coelis." (Niebuhr, History of Rome, vol. iv. Lecture xxxii; Bayle, Dict. s. v. Drusus; De Brasae, Vie du Consul Philippe in Memoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, xxvii. p. 406.)

7. LIVIUS DRUSUS CLAUDIANUS, the father of Livia, was the son of the emperor Tiberius. He was one of the gens Claudia, and was adopted by a Livia Drusus. (Suet. Tib. 3; Vell. Patre. ii. 75.) It was through this adoption that the Drusi became connected with the imperial family. Figius (Annalen, iii. p. 21), by some oversight which is repugnant to dates and the ordinary laws of human mortality, makes him the adopted son of No. 3, and confounds him with No. 5, and, in this error, has been followed by Vaillant. (Num. Ant. Fam. Rom. i. 51.) There is no such inconsistency in the supposition that he was adopted by No. 7, who is spoken of by Suetonius as if he were an ancestor of Tiberius. (Augustins, Fam. Rom. (Vit) p. 77; Fabretti, Excer. c. 6, No. 38.)

The senate of Rome persuaded Tiberius, who desired to see Caesar, to send up Brutus and Cassius, and, after the battle of Philippi, being proscribed by the conquerors, he followed the example of others of his own party, and killed himself in his tent. (Dion Cass. xxvi. 44; Vell. Patre. ii. 71.) It is likely that he is the Drusus who, in B. C. 43, encouraged Decimus Brutus in the vain hope that the fourth legion and the legion of Mars, which had fought under Caesar, would go over to the side of his murderers. (Cic. ad Fam. xi. 19. § 2.)

In other parts of the correspondence of Cicero, the name Drusus occurs several times, and the person intended may be, as Manatus conjectured, identical with the father of Livia. In B. C. 59, it seems that a lucrative legation was intended for a Drusus, who is called, perhaps, in allusion to some discreditable occurrence, the Pisaurian. (Ad Att. ii. 7. § 3.) A Drusus, in B. C. 54, was accused by Lucretius of procerectaris, or corrupt collusion in betraying a cause which he had undertaken to prosecute. Cicero defended Drusus, and he was acquitted by a majority of four. The tribuni aerarii saved him, though the greater part of the senators and equites were against him; for though by the lex Fufia each of the three orders of judges voted separately, it was the majority of single votes, not the majority of majorities, that decided the judgment. (Ad Att. iv. 16. §§ 5, 6, ib. 15. § 9, ad Qn. Fr. ii. 16. § 3. As to the mode of counting votes, see Ascon. in Cic. pro Mil., p. 53, ed. Orelli.) In B. C. 50, M. Caecilius Rufus, who was accused of an offence against the Scipionic law, thinks it ridiculous that Drusus, who was then probably praetor, should be appointed to preside at the trial. Upon this ground it has been imagined that there was some stigma of impurity upon the character of Drusus. (Ad Fam. viii. 12. § 3, 14. § 4.) He possessed gardens, which Cicero was very anxious to purchase. (Ad Att. xii. 21. § 2, 22. § 3, 23. § 3, xii. 26. § 1.)

3. M. LIVIUS DRUSUS LIDO was probably a recluse about B. C. 26, shortly before the completion of the Pantheon, and may be the person who is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxvii. 18, s. 24) as having been present at Rome when the theatre was covered by Vatelian, the architect of Oslanum. He was consul in B. C. 15. As his name denotes, he was originally a Scribonius Lido, and was adopted by a Livius Drusus. Hence he is supposed to have been adopted by Livius Drusus Claudianus [No. 7], whose name, date, want of male children, and political associations with the party opposed to Caesar, favour the conjecture. He is also supposed to have been the father of the Libo Drusus, or Drusus Libo [No. 10], who conspired against Tiberius. As Pompey the Great would appear from Tacitus (Ann. ii. 27) to have been the pro-avus of the conspirator, Scribonia his amia, and the young Caesars (Caesius and Lucius) his consobrini, Drusus Libo, the father, is supposed to have married a granddaughter of Pompey. Still there are difficulties in the pedigree, which have perplexed Lipsius, Gronovius, Ryckius, and other learned commentators on the cited passage in Tacitus. M. de la Nauze thinks that the father was a younger brother of Scribonia, the wife of Augustus, and that he married his grandniece, the daughter of Sextus Pompeius. According to this Explanation, he was about 26 years younger than his elder brother, L. Scribonius Libo, who was consul A.D. 34, and whose daughter was married to Sextus Pompeius. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 16; Appian, B. C. v. 139.)

There is extant a rare silver coin of M. Drusus Libo, bearing on the obverse a naked head, supposed by some to be the head of his natural, by others of his adoptive, father. On the reverse is a villa curialis, between corners of which was the head of a horse, with the legend M. LIVI L. F. DRUSUS LIBO, headed by the words EX. S. C. It may be doubted whether the letters L. F. do not denote that Lucius was the praenomen of the adoptive father. (Morell, Thes. Num. ii. p. 506; Dru-mann's Rom. iv. p. 591, n. 63; De la Nauze, in Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, xxxv. p. 600.)

9. LIVIA DRSUSILLA. [LIVIA.]

10. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO DRUSUS, or, as he is called by Velleius Paterculus (ii. 130), DRUSUS LIBO, is supposed to have been the son of No. 8, to which article we refer for a statement of the difficulty experienced by commentators in attempting to explain his family connections. Firmius Catus, a senator, in a. D. 18, taking advantage of the facility and clemency of his disposition, his taste for pleasure and expense, and his family pride, induced him to seek empire with its attendant wealth, and to consult soothsayers and magicians as to his chances of success. He was betrayed by Catus through Flaccus Vescularius to the emperor Tiberius, who nevertheless made him praetor, and continued to receive him at table without any mark of suspicion or resentment. At length he was openly denounced by Fulcius Trio, for having required one Junius to summon shades from the infernal regions. Hereupon he strived at first to excite compassion by a parade of grief, illness, and supplication. As if he were too unwilling to walk, he was carried in a woman's litter to the senate on the day appointed for opening the prosecution, and stretched his suppliant hands to the emperor, who received him with an unmoved countenance, and, in stating the case to be proved against him, affected a desire neither to suppress nor to exaggerate aught. Finding that there was no hope of pardon, he put an end to his own life, though his aunt Scribonia had tried in vain to dissuade him from thus doing another's work; but he thought that to keep himself alive till it pleased

Tiberius to have him slain would rather be doing another's work. Even, after his death, the prosecution was continued by the emperor. His property was forfeited to his accusers. His memory was dishonoured, and public rejoicings were voted upon his death. Cn. Lentulus proposed that therefor-se Scribonius should assume the cognomen Drusus. (Tac. Ann. ii. 27—32; Suet. Tito. 25; Dion Cass. vii. 15; Senec. Epist. 70.)

11. NERO CLAUDIUS DRUSUS (commonly called by the modern Drusus Senior, to distinguish him from his nephew, the son of Tiberius), had originally the praenomen Decimus, which was afterwards exchanged for Nero; and, after his death, received the honourable agnome Germanicus, which is appended to his name in colin. His cares should be taken not to confound him with the celebrated Germanicus, his son. His parents were Livia Drusilla (afterwards Julia Augusta) and Tiberius Claudius Nero, and through both of them he inherited the noble blood of the Claudii, who had never yet admitted an adoption into their gens. From the adoption of his maternal grandfather [No. 7] by a Livius Drusus, he became legally one of the representatives of another illustrious race. He was a younger brother of Tiberius Nero, who was afterwards emperor. Augustus, having fallen in love with his mother, procured a divorce between her and her husband, and married himself to his mother. Tiberius was born in the house of Augustus three months after this marriage, in A. D. 38, and a suspicion prevailed that Augustus was more than a step-father. Hence the satirical verse was often in men's mouths, Tēs εὐσεβεύων καὶ ἀμήνων παθία. Augustus took up the boy, and sent him to Nero his father, who soon after died, having appointed Augustus guardian to Tiberius and Drusus. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 44; Vell. Pat. ii. 62; Suet. Aug. 62, Claud. 1; Prudentius, de Simulacro Luteo.)

Drusus, as he grew up, was more liked by the people than was his brother. He was free from dark reserve, and in him the character of the Claudian race assumed its most attractive, as in Tiberius its most odious, type. In everything he did, there was an air of high breeding, and the noble courtesy of his disposition was set off by singular beauty of person and dignity of form. He possessed in a high degree the winning quality of always exhibiting towards his friends an even and constant demeanour, without capricious alternations of familiarity and distance, and he seemed adapted by nature to sustain the character of a prince and statesman. (Tac. Ann. vi. 61; Vell. Pat. iv. 97.) It was known that he had a desire to see the commonwealth restored, and the people cherished the hope that he would live to give them back their ancient liberties. (Suet. Claud. 1; Tac. Ann. i. 33.) He wrote a letter to his brother, in which he broached the notion of compelling Augustus to resign the empire; and this letter was betrayed by Tiberius to Augustus (Suet. Tib. 50.) But notwithstanding this indication that the affection of Tiberius was either a hollow pretence, or yielded to his sense of duty to Augustus, the brothers maintained during their lives an appearance, at least, of fraternal tenderness, which, according to Vale-rius Maximus (v. 5, § 8), had only one parallel—the friendship of Castor and Pollux! In the do-meric relations of life, the conduct of Drusus was exemplary. He married the beautiful and illus-

1083
DRUSUS.

Drusus, the elder son of Germanicus, became the friend of Scipio Aemilianus and was brought up to love the Roman people. He was a soldier by birth, and a general by nature. He was one of the bravest and ablest soldiers of his time. He was a man of great energy and determination, and he was always ready to risk his life for the good of his country. He was a man of great courage and a man of great honor. He was a man of great patience and a man of great endurance. He was a man of great wisdom and a man of great wisdom.

DRUSUS.

Drusus was the first Roman general who penetrated to the German ocean. It is probable that he united the military design of remonstrating the coast with the spirit of adventure and scientific discovery. (Tac. Germ. 34.) From the migratory character of the tribes he subdued, it is not easy to fix their locality with precision; and the difficulty of geographical exactness is increased by the alterations which time and the elements have made in the face of the country. Mannert and others identify the Dollart with the place where the fleet of Drusus went ashore; but the Dollart first assumed its present form in A.D. 1277; and Wilhelm (Feldzuge der Nero Claudius Drusus im Nordlichen Deutschland) makes the Jadebo, westward of the mouth of the Weser, the scene of this misadventure. It is by no means certain by what course Drusus reached the ocean, although it is the general opinion that he had already constructed a canal uniting the eastern arm of the Rhine with the Yssel, and to had opened himself a way by the Zuyderzee. This opinion is confirmed by a passage in Tacitus (Ann. ii. 8), where Germanicus, upon entering the Fossa Drusiana, prays for the protection of his father, who had gone the same way before him, and then sails by the Zuyderzee (Lucus Flevis) to the ocean, up to the mouth of the Ems (Amisia). To this expedition of Drusus may perhaps be referred the naval battle in the Ems mentioned by Stephano (vii. iv.), in which the Bructeri were defeated, and the subjugation of the islands on the coast, especially Borkum (Borkum). (Strab. vii. 34; Plin. H. N. iv. 13.) Ferdinand Wachter (Eich und Gruber's Eryclopavide, s. v. Drusus) thinks, that the canal of Drusus must have been too great a work to be completed at so early a period, and that Drusus could not have had time to run up the Ems. He supposes, that Drusus sailed to the ocean by one of the natural channels of the river, and that the inconvenience he experienced and the geographical knowledge he gained led him to employ himself of the capabilities afforded by the Locus Flevis for a safer junction with the ocean; that his works on the Rhine were probably begun in this campaign, and were not finished until some years afterwards. The precise nature of those works cannot now be determined. They appear to have consisted not only of a canal (fossa), but of a dyke or mound (aeger, moles) across the Rhine. Guentherius seems to use even the word fossa in the sense of a mound, not a canal. "Fossa Turbina fossa novi et immensi operis effect, quae nunc adhibe Drusinac vacantur. (Claud. i.) Tacitus (Ann. xiii. 55) says, that Paulinus Pompeius, in the year 80, erected a mole in Schleswig, which had been begun by Drusus sixty-three years before; and afterwards relates that Civilians, by destroying the moles formed by Drusus, allowed the waters of the Rhine to rush down and inundate the side of Gaul. (Hist. v. 19.) The most probable opinion seems to be, that Drusus dug a canal from the Rhine near Arnhem to the Yssel, near Doesberg (which bears a trace of his name), and that he also widened the bed of the narrow outlet which at that time connected the Lacus Felix with the ocean. These were his fossae. With regard to hisanger or male, it is supposed that he partly dammed up the south-western arm of the Rhine (the Vahalis or Waal), in order to allow more water to flow into the north-eastern arm, upon which his canal was situated. But this hypothesis as to the situation of the dyke is very doubtful. Some modern authors hold that the Yssel ran into the Rhine, and did not run into the Zuyderzee, and that the chief work of Drusus consisted in connecting the Yssel with a river that ran from Zutphen into the Zuyderzee.

Hence an army was sent to Rome. On the commencement of spring he returned to Germany, subdued the Usipetes, built a bridge over the Lippe, invaded the country of the Sambuci, and passed on through the territory of the Cherusci as far as the Visurgis (Weser). This he was able to effect from meeting with no opposition from the Sambuci, who were engaged with all their forces in fighting against the Chatti. He would have gone on to cross the Weser had he not been deterred (such were the ostensible reasons) by scarcity of provisions, the approach of winter, and the evil omen of a swarm of bees which settled upon the lances in front of the tent of the prefectus castrorum. (Jul. Obsequens, i. 152.) Ptolomy (ii. 11) mentions the τρόπαια Δρόσου, which, to judge from the longitude and latitude he assigns to them (viz. long. 33° 45', lat. 50° 45'), were probably erected on the spot where the army reached the Weser. No doubt Drusus found it prudent to retreat. In retiring, he was often in danger from the stratagems of the enemy, and once was nearly shut up in a dangerous pass near Arbalio, and narrowly escaped perishing with his whole army. But the cautious bravery of the Germans saved him. His enemies had already by anticipation divided the spoil. The Cherusci chose the horses, the Suevi the gold and silver, and the Sambuci the prisoners. Thinking that the Romans were as good as taken, after immolating twenty Roman centurions as a preparatory sacrifice, they rushed on without order, and were repulsed. It was now they, and their horses, and sheep, and neck-chains (torques), that were sold by Drusus. Henceforward they confined themselves to distant attacks. (Dion Cass. liv. 20; Florus, iv. 12; Plin. H.N. xi. 13.) Drusus had breathing time to build two castles, one at the confluence of the Luppia and the Aliso, and the other near the country of the Chatti on the Rhine. The latter is probably the modern Cassel over against Mayence. The former is thought by some who identify the Aliso with the Alm, to be the modern Ilmen Neuhaus in the district of Paderborn; by others, who identify the Aliso with the Lase, to be Lissarn near Lippscheid in the district of Münster. Drusus now returned to Rome with the reputation of having conquered several tribes beyond the Rhine (Liv. Epit. cxxviii.), and received as his reward a vote of the senate granting him an ovation with the insignia of a triumph, and decreeing that at the end of his praetorship he should have proconsular authority. But Augustus would not allow him to bear the title of emperor, which had been conferred upon him by the army in the field.

In the next year, n. c. 16, Drusus was again at his post. The Chatti left the territory which had been assigned to them by the Romans. After having long refused to become allies of the Sambuci, they now consented to join that powerful people; but their united forces were not a match for Drusus. Some of the Chatti he subdued; others he could do no more than harass and annoy. He attacked the Nervi, who were headed by Senecitus and Aneciatus (Liv. Epit. cxxxix); and it was probably in this campaign that he built a castle upon the Taunus. (Tac. Amm. i. 56.) He then returned to Rome with Augustus and Tiberius, who had been in Logudrian Gaul, watching the result of the war in Germany, and upon his arrival he was elected consul, the consulship, which was to commence on the Kalends of January, was actually conferred on him. It could not rest in peace at Rome. To worry and subjugate the Germans appeared to be the main object of his life. Without waiting for the actual commencement of his consulship (Ped. Albin. l. 139) he returned to the scene of battle, undeterred by evil forebodings, of which there was no lack. There had been horrible storms and inundations in the winter months, and the lightning had struck three temples at Rome. (Ib. l. 401; Dion Cass. iv.) He attacked the Chatti, won a hard-fought battle, penetrated to the country of the Suevi, gave the Marcomanni (who were a portion of the Suevi) a signal defeat, and with the arms taken at a spoil erected a mound as a trophy. It was now perhaps that he gave the Suevi Vannius as their king. (Tac. Ann. xii. 29.) He then turned his forces against the Cherusci, crossed the Weser (?), and carried all before him to the Elbe. (Messala Corvin. de Aeg. Prog. 89; Ped. Albin. l. 17, 113; Aur. Vict. Epit. i.; Oros. iv. 21.) The course that Drusus took on his way to the Elbe cannot be determined. Florus (iv. 12) speaks of his making roads through (pat(se) dat) the Hercynian forest, and Wilhelm (Pol Ediburg. sc. p. 50) thinks that he advanced through Thuringia. Drusus endeavoured in vain to cross the Elbe. (Dion Cass. iv. init.; Eutrop. iv. 12.) A miraculous event occurred: a woman of dimensions greater than human appearance in human form appeared and stood upon a whirlwind. “Whither goest thou, insatiable Drusus? The Fates forbid thee to advance. Away! The end of thy deeds and thy life is nigh.” Dion Cassius cannot help believing the fact of the apparition, seeing that the prophetic warning was so soon fulfilled! Thus deterred by the guardian Genius of the land, Drusus hastened back to the Rhine, after erecting trophies on the banks of the Elbe. Suetonius (Claud. 1) varies from Dion Cassius in the particulars of this legend, and some of the moderns endeavour to explain it by referring the demumication to a German prophetess or Wals. On his retreat, wolves howled round the camp, two strange youths appeared on horseback among the intercomings, the screams of women were heard, and the stars raced about in the sky. (Ped. Albin. l. 405.) Such were the supernatual fears which oppressed the minds of the Romans, who would rather flatter themselves that they were submitting to supernatural forces than avoiding the human might of dangerous enemies. Between the Elbe and the Saale (probably the Thuringian Saale), death overtook Drusus. According to the Epitomiser of Livy (excl.) (whose last books contained a full account of these transactions), the horse of Drusus fell upon his leg, and Drusus died of the fracture on the thirtieth day after the accident. Of the numerous writers who mention the death of Drusus, no one besides alludes to the broken leg. Suetonius, whose history is a rich receptacle of scandal, mentions the incredible report that Drusus was poisoned by Augustus, after having disobeyed an order of the emperor for his recall. It is indeed probable enough that the emperor thought he had advanced far enough, and that it would be unwise to exasperate into hostility the inoffensive tribes beyond the Elbe. Tiberius, Augustus, and Livia were in Pavia (Ticinum) when the tidings of the dangerous illness of Drusus reached them. Tiberius with extraordinary speed crossed the Alps, performing a journey of 200 Roman miles through a difficult and dangerous country, without stopping day or night, and arrived in time to close the eyes of his brother. (Plin. H. N. xii. 29; Val. Max. v. 5; Ped. Albin. l. 69; Senec. Consol. ad Paul. 84.) Drusus, though at the point of death, had yet presence of mind enough to command, that Tiberius should be received with all the distinction due to a consular and an imperator.

The summer camp where Drusus died was called Scelerata, the Accursed. The corpse was carried in a marching military procession to the winter-quarters of the army at Moguntiacum (Mayence) upon the Rhine, Tiberius walking all the way as chief mourner. The troops wished the funeral to be celebrated there, but Tiberius brought the body to Italy. It was burnt in the field of Minre, and the ashes deposited in the tomb of Augustus, who composed the verses that were inscribed upon his sepulchral monument, and wrote in prose a memorial of his life. In a funeral oration held by Augustus in the Flaminian Circus, he exclaimed, "I pay the gods to make my adopted sons Caius and Lucius like Drusus, and to vouchsafe to me as honourable a death as his.

Among the honours paid to Drusus the cognomen Germanicus was decreted to him and his posterity. A marble arch with trophies was erected to his memory on the Appian Way, and the representation of this arch may be seen upon extant coins, as for example, in the coin annexed, which was struck by order of Augustus. He had a cenotaph on the Rhine, an altar near the Lippe (Tac. Ann. ii. 7), and Euschius (Chronicon ad A.D. 43) speaks of a Drusus, the nephew of the emperor Claudius, who had a monument at Mayence; but here Drusus Senior seems to be meant, and there is probably a confusion between the son and the father of Germanicus. It is to the latter that the anecdotes of Mayence refer the Eshelstein and the Druselstein, the haunts of the Cossacks of Drusus; several ancient signet-rings with his effigy have been preserved (Lippert, Druckstätten, i. No. 610-12, ii. No. 241 and No. 258); and among the bronzes found at Herculaneum there is one which is supposed to contain a full-length likeness of Drusus.

In the preceding narrative the dates have been collected from Dion Cassius and the Epitomiser of Livy. In assigning the precise date of events not mentioned by those writers, it is often necessary to have recourse to uncertain conjecture. The misery that Drusus must have occasioned among the German tribes was undoubtedly excessive. Some antiquaries have imagined that the German inscription "Das dich der Drus holte" may be traced to the traditional dread of this terrible conqueror. The country was widely devastated, and immense multitudes were carried away from their homes and transplanted to the Gallic bank of the Rhine. Such was the horror occasioned by the advance of the Romans, that the German women often dashed their babes against the ground, and then flung their mangled bodies in the faces of the soldiers. (Oros. vi. 21.) Drusus himself possessed great animal courage. In battle he endeavoured to engage in personal combat with the chiefestans of the enemy, in order to earn the glory of the spolia opima. He had no contemptible foe to contend against, and though he did not escape unsanctified—though, as Varus soon had occasion to feel, the Germanic spirit was not quelled—he certainly accomplished an important work in subjugating the tribes between the Rhine and the Weser, and creating fortresses to preserve his conquests. According to Florus, he erected upwards of fifty fortresses along the banks of the Rhine, besides building two bridges across that river, and establishing garrisons and guards on the Mosse, the Weser, and the Elbe. He impressed the Germans not less by the opinion of his intellect and character than by the terror of his arms. They who resisted had to dread his unflinching firmness and security, but they who submitted might rely on his good faith. He did not, like his successor Varus, pursue and inflame opposition by tyrannous insolence or wanton cruelty to the conquered. Whether, educated as he was in scenes of bloodshed, he would have fulfilled the expectations of the people, had he lived to attain the empire, it is impossible to pronounce. He was undoubtedly, in his kind, one of the great men of his day. To require that a Roman general, in the heat of conquest, should shew mercy to people who, according to Roman ideas, were ferocious and dangerous barbarians, or should pause to balance the cost against the glory of success, would be to ask more than could be expected of any ordinary mortal in a similar position. It is not fair to view the characters of our age by the light of another; for he who has lived, says Schiller, so as to satisfy the best of his own time, has lived for all times. 15. TI. CLAUDIUS DRUSUS CAESAR, the emperor Claudius. [CLAUDIUS, p. 775, b.] 16. NERVA CAESAR, commonly called by modern writers Drusus Caesar, on account of his friendship with his uncle Drusus, the brother of Tiberius (No. 11), was the son of the emperor Tiberius by his first wife, Vitellia, who was the daughter of Agrippa by Pomponia, the daughter of Atticus. Thus, his great-grandfather was only a Roman knight, and his descent on the mother's side was by no means so splendid as that of his cousin Germanicus, who was a grandson of the triumvir Antony and great-nephew of Augustus. He married Livia, the sister of Germanicus, after the death of her first husband, Caius Caesar, the son of Augustus and Scribonia; but his wife was neither so popular nor so prolific as Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus. However, she bore him three children—two sons, who were twins, and a daughter. Of the twins, one died shortly after his father, and the other, Tiberius, was murdered by the emperor Caligula. The daughter, Julia, was first married to Nero, son of Germanicus, and, after his death, she carried the noble blood of the Livia into the Vespasian family of the Flavians, by uniting herself with C. Rabellius Blandus. (Tac. Ann. vi. 27; Juv. Sat. viii. 40.) As long as Germanicus lived, the court was divided between the parties of Germanicus and Drusus, and Tiberius artfully held the balance of favour even between them, taking care not to declare which should be his successor. Notwithstanding so many circumstances which were likely to produce alienation and jealousy, it is one of the best traits in the character of Drusus, that he always preserved a cordial friendship for Germanicus, and, upon his death, was kind to his children. (Tac. Ann. iii. 43, iv. 4.) When Pliny relied on the ordinary baseness of human nature, after the death of Germanicus, endeavoured to secure the protection of Drusus, Drusus replied to his overtures with a studied ambiguity, which appeared to be a lesson of the emperor's craft, for his own disposition was naturally frank and un guarded. (Ann. iii. 8.) Though he had not the dissimulation of Tiberius, he was nearly his equal in impudence and cruelty. He delighted in slaughter, and such was his ferocity, that the sharpest sword-blades took from him the name of Drusine blades. (Dion Cass. liv. 13.) He was not only a drunkard himself, but he forced his guests to drink to excess. Plutarch relates how a physician was treated, who was detected in an attempt to keep himself sober by taking bitter almonds as an antidote to the effects of wine. (Sympos. i. 6.) Tiberius behaved turbulently to his son, and often upbraided him, both in public and private, for his debaucheries, mingling threats of disinheritance with his upbraiding.

In A.D. 10 he was quaestor. After the death of Augustus, A.D. 14, (in whose praise he read a funeral oration before the rostra,) he was sent into Pannonia to quell the mutiny of the legions. This task he performed with address, and with the vigour of innate nobility. He ordered the execution of the leaders, and the superstitious fears produced in the minds of the soldiers by an opportune eclipse of the moon aided his efforts. (Tac. Ann. i. 24-30.) After his return to Rome, he was made consul in A.D. 15, and, at the gladiatorial games which he gave in conjunction with Germanicus (his brother by adoption), he made himself so remarkable by his sangui nary taste for vulgar blood, as even to offend the squeamishness of Roman spectators. (Ann. i. 76.) He degraded the dignity of his office by his excesses, and by his fondness for players, whom he encouraged in their factional riots, in opposition to his father's laws. In one of his extraordinary edifications of passion, he humiliated a Roman knight, and, from this exhibition of his pagulitie propensities, obtained the nickname of Castor. (Dion Cass. iv. 14.) In the following year Tiberius sent him to Illyricum, not only to teach him the art of war, and to make him popular with the soldiery, but to remove him from the dissipations of the city. It is not easy to determine the exact scene of his operations, but he succeeded in fomenting dissension among the Germanic tribes, and destroyed the power of Marobudus. For these successes an ovation was decreed to him by the senate. In the year A.D. 21, he was consul a second time, and the emperor was his colleague. In A.D. 22, he was promoted to the still higher dignity of the "tribunician potestas," a title devised by Augustus to avoid the obloquy attending the name of king or dictator. By this title subsequent emperors continued the years of their reign upon their coins. It rendered the power of intercession and the sacrosanct character of tribunis plebis compatible with patrician birth. To confer it upon Drusus was clearly to point him out as the intended successor to the empire. (Ann. iii. 56.)

On one occasion Drusus, who regarded Sejanus as a rival, gave way to the impetuousity of his temper, and struck the favourite upon the face. The ambition of Sejanus had taught him to aspire to the empire, and to plot against all who stood in his way. The desire of vengeance was now added to the stimulus of ambition. He turned to Livia, the wife of Drusus, seduced her affections, persuaded the adulteress to become the murderer of her husband, and promised that he would marry her when Drusus was got rid of. Her physician Eudemus was made an accomplice in the conspiracy, and a poison was administered to Drusus by the enmarched Lygus, which terminated his life by a lingering disease, that was supposed at the time to be the consequence of intemperance. (Suet. Tib. 62.) This occurred in A.D. 23, and was first brought to light eight years afterwards, upon the information of Apicata, the wife of Sejanus, supported by the confessions, elicited by torture, of Eudemus and Lygus. (Ann. iv. 3, 8, 11.)

The funeral of Drusus was celebrated with the greatest external honours, but the people were pleased at heart to see the chance of succession revert to the house of Germanicus. Tiberius bore the death of his only son with a cool equanimity which indicated a want of natural affection.

the favour of Agrippina, and stood between him and the hope of succession to the empire. This produced a deep hatred of Nero in the envious and ambitious mind of Drusus. Sejanus, too, was anxious to succeed Tiberius, and sought to remove out of the way all who from their parentage would be likely to oppose his schemes. Though he already meditated the destruction of Drusus, he first chose to take advantage of his estrangement from Nero, and engaged him in the plots against his elder brother, which ended in the banishment and death of that wretched prince. (Ann. iv. 60.) Tiberius had witnessed with displeasure the marks of public favour which were exhibited towards Nero and Drusus as members of the house of Germanicus, and gladly forwarded the plans that were contrived for their destruction. He declared in the senate his disappropiation of the public prayers which had been offered for their health, and this indication was enough to encourage assassins. Acilia Lepida, the wife of Drusus, a woman of the most abandoned character, made frequent charges against him. (Ann. vi. 40.) The words which he spoke, when heated with wine or roused to anger, were reported to the palace, and represented by the emperor to the senate, in a.d. 30, in a document which contained every charge that could be collected, heightened by inventive. Drusus, like his elder brother, was condemned to death as an enemy of the state; but Tiberius kept him for some years imprisoned in a small chamber in the lowest part of the palace, intending to put him forward as a leader of the people, in case any attempt to seize the supreme command should be made by Sejanus. Finding, however, that a belief prevailed that he was privy to his discomfiture, he borrowed the name of Agrippina and her son, with his usual love of baffling expectations, and veiling his intentions in impenetrable obscurity, he gave orders, in a.d. 33, that Drusus should bestarved to death. Drusus lived for nine days after this cruel sentence, having prolonged his miserable existence by devouring the tow with which his mattress was stuffed. (Suet. Tib. 54; Tac. Ann. vi. 23.)

An exact account had been kept by Actius, a centurion, and Difymus, a freedman, of all that occurred in his dungeon during his long incarceration. In this journal were set down the names of the slaves who had beaten or terriified him when he attempted to leave his chamber, the savage rebukes administered to him by the centurion, the secret murrains, and the words he uttered when perishing with hunger. Tiberius, after his death, went to the senate, inveighed against the shameful profanity of his life, his desire to destroy his relatives, and his disaffection to the state; and proceeded, in proof of these charges, to order the journal of his sayings and doings to be read. This was too much, even for the Roman senate, degraded as it was. The senators were struck with astonishment and alarm at the contemptuous indecency of such an exposure by a tyrant formerly so dark, and deep, and wary in the concealment of his crimes; and they turned to the horrors recited, under the pretence of uttering exclamations of detestation at the misconduct of Drusus. (Ann. vii. 24.)

In a.d. 31, a pretender had appeared among the Cycydes and in Greece, whose followers gave out that he was Drusus, the son of Germanicus, escaped from prison, and that he was proceeding to join the armies of his father, and to invade Egypt and Syria. This affair might have had serious consequences, had it not been for the activity of Poppaea Sabina, who, after a sharp pursuit, caught the false Drusus at Nicopolis, and extracted from him a confession that he was the son of M. Silanus. (Ann. v. 10; Dion Cass. viii. 7.)

23. DRUSUS, one of the two children of the emperor Claudius by his wife Urgula. He died at Pompilia before attaining puberty, in a.d. 20, being choked by a pear which, in play, he had been throwing up and catching in his mouth. This occurred but a few days after he had been engaged to marry a daughter of Sejanus, and yet there were people who reported that he had been fraudulently put to death by Sejanus. (Suet. 26. DECIMUS DRUSUS. In Dig. i. tit. 13, § 2, the following passage is quoted from Ulpius.—

Ex generisibus quidem solent precautiones sortiri ex Senatus-consulto, quod factum est Decimus Drusus et Porcius Cesonius. It has been commonly supposed that Ulpius here refers to a general decree of the senate, unde in the consulship he names, and directing the mode of allotting provinces to quaeestors in general. We rather believe him to mean that it was usual for the senate, from time to time, to make special decrees relating to the allotment of provinces to particular quaestors, and that the reference in the text is to one of an earlier instance of this, of which this was now. (Comp. Cic. Philippi, ii. 20.)

Had the former meaning been intended, Ulpius would probably have said ex Senatus-consulto, quod factum est. It is uncertain who Decimus Drusus was, and when he was consul. The brothers Kriigel, in the Leipzig edition of the Corpus Juris, erroneously refer his consulship to a.d. 745 (v. 9), when Nero Claudius Drusus (the brother of the emperor Tiberius) and Catinus were consuls. Pisiglio (Iann. ad a. u. c. 767) proposes the unauthorized reading D. Druto d'Aemilio for D. Drusus et Porcius, and in this conjecture is followed by Brach. (Hist. Jur. Rom. p. 206, ed. 62a.) Ant. Augustinianus (de Nom. Prop. Pandent. in Otto's Theesaurus, i. p. 265) thinks the consulship must have occurred in the time of the emperors, but it is certain that provices were assigned to quaestors, ex S. C., during the republic. The most probable opinion is that of Zepelnick (Ad Scevasmum de Jucundio Centumvaria, p. 100, n.), who holds that D. Drusus was consul successively with Lepidus Porcius in B.C. 127, after the forced abdication of Hostilius Marcellus.

27. C. DRUSUS. Suetonius (August, 94) gives a miraculous anecdote of the infancy of Augustus, for which he cites an extant work of C. Drusus,—

Ut serius opus C. Drusum ariet. Of this writer nothing is known, but it is not unlikely that he was connected with the imperial family. [J.T.G.]

DRYADES. [NYMPHAE.]

DRYAS (Aphas), a son of Ares, and brother of Tereus, was one of the Calydonian hunters. He was murdered by his own brother, who had received an oracle, that his son Irys should fall by the hand of a relative. (Apoll. i. 8 § 2; Hygin.
DUBIUS.

There are five other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Hom. ii. vi. 130 ; Apollod. iii. 5. § 1 ; Hom ii. i. 263; Hesiod. Sent. Herc. 179.)

[LS.]

DURMONT (Δυσμόντ). There are two persons of this name; the one is mentioned by Tzetzes (p. 137, ed. Oxford, 1700) and Eusebius (Præp. Evang. x. p. 485) as an author who lived before the time of Homer. But the reading in Tzetzes is uncertain, and we have no clue to any further investigation about him. The second Durmont is mentioned by Iamblichus among the celebrated Pythagoreans. (De Vit. Pyth. 38; comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 29, &c.)

[LS.]

DURYOP (Δυρυόπ), a daughter of king Dryops, or, according to others, of Eurytus. While she tended the flocks of her father on Mount Oeta, she became the playmate of the Hamadryades, who taught her to sing hymns to the gods and to dance. On one occasion she was seen by Apollo, who, in order to gain possession of her, metamorphosed himself into a tortoise. The nymphs played with the animal, and Dryope took it into her lap. The god then changed himself into a serpent, which frightened the nymphs away, so that he remained alone with Dryope. Soon after she married Aedraemon, the son of Oxytus, but she became, by Apollo, the mother of Amphissus, who, after he had grown up, built the town of Otea, and a temple to Apollo. Once, when Dryope was in the temple, the Hamadryades carried her off and concealed her in a forest, and in her stead there was seen in the temple a well and a poplar. Dryope now became a nymph, and Amphissus built a temple to the nymphs, which no woman was allowed to approach. (Ov. Met. ix. 325, &c.; Anton. Lib. 32; Steph. Byz. s. v. Δυρυόπ.) Virgil (Aen. x. 551) mentions another personage of this name.

[LS.]

DURYOPS (Δυρύόπ), a son of the river-god Spercheus, by the Danaid Polydora (Anton. Lib. 32), or, according to others, a son of Lycaon (probably a mistake for Apollo) by Dia, the daughter of Lycaon, who concealed her newborn infant in a hollow oak tree (δρῦς; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1233; Taost. ad Icoph. 480). The Asinaeans in Messenia worshipped him as their ancestral hero, and as a son of Apollo, and celebrated a festival in honour of him every other year. His heroism there was adorned with a very archaic statue of the hero. (Paus. iv. 54. § 6.) He had been king of the Dryopes, who derived their name from him, and were believed to have occupied the country from the valley of the Spercheus and Thermopylae, as far as Mount Parnassus. (Anton. Lib. 4; Hom. Hymn. vi. 34.)

There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Hom. ii. xx. 454; Dict. Cret. iv. 7; Virg. Aen. xx. 345.)

[LS.]

DURPETIS (Δυρπετίς or Δυρπέτις), daughter of Dareios, the last king of Persia, was given in marriage to Hephaestion by Alexander, at the same time that he himself married her sister, Statira, or Bersine. (Arrian, Anab. vii. 4. § 6; Dio. Rom. xvii. 107.) She was murdered, together with her sister, soon after the death of Alexander, by the orders of Roxana and her accomplices, the Parthiacs. (Plut. Alex. c. ult.)

[EB. B.]

DUBIUS AVITUS, was prefect of Gaul and Lower Germany in the reign of the emperor Nero, and the successor of Paulinus in that post.

When the Frisians had occupied and taken into cultivation a tract of land near the banks of the Rhine, Dubius Avitus demanded of them to quit it, or to obtain the sanction of the emperor. Two ambassadors accordingly went to Rome; but, although they themselves were honoured and distinguished by the Roman franchise, the Frisians were determined to preserve the country they had occupied, and those who resisted were cut down by the Roman cavalry. The same tract of country was then occupied by the Ambiani, who had been driven out of their own country by the Chauci, and implored the Romans to allow them a peaceful settlement. Dubius Avitus gave them a haughty answer, but offered to their leader, Boioecus, who was a friend of Rome, a piece of land. Boioecus declined the offer, which he looked upon as a bribe to betray his countrymen; and the Ambiani immediately formed an alliance with the Tecteiri and Bructeri to resist the Romans by force of arms. Dubius Avitus then called in the aid of Curtius Mancia and his army. He received the Tecteiri, who, however, were so frightened that they remained at a distance from the Ambiani, and their example was followed by the Bructeri, whereby the Ambiani were obliged to yield. (Tact. Ann. xiii. 54, 56; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 18.)

DUCAS, MICHAEL (Μιχαήλ δο Αῦκις), the grandson of another Michael Ducas, who lived during the reign of John Palaeologus the younger, and a descendant of the imperial family of the Ducas, lived before and after the capture of Constantinople by Sultan Mohammed II. in 1453. This Michael Ducas was a distinguished historian, who held probably some high office under Constantinople XIX., the last emperor of Constantinople. After the capture of this city, he fled to Dorino Gattaluzi, prince of Lesbos, who employed him in various diplomatic functions, which he continued to discharge under Domenico Gatteluze, the son and successor of Dorino. In 1455 and 1456, he brought the tribute of the princes of Lesbos and Lemnos to Adrianople, and he also accompanied his master Domenico to Constantinople, where he was going to pay homage to Sultan Mohammed II. Owing to the prudence of Dorino and Domenico, and the diplomatic skill of Ducas, those two princes enjoyed a happy dependence; but Domenico having died, his son and successor, Nicholas, incurred the hatred of Mohammed, who conquered Lesbos and united it to the Turkish empire in 1462. Ducas survived this event, but his further life is not known. The few particulars we know of him are obtained from his "History." This work begins with the death of John Palaeologus I., and goes down to the capture of Lesbos in 1462; it is divided into forty-five extensive chapters; the first begins with a very short chronicle from Adam to John Palaeologus I., which seems to have been prefixed by some monk; it finishes abruptly with some details of the conquest of Lesbos; the end is mutilated. Ducas wrote most barbarous Greek, for he not only made use of an extraordinary number of Turkish and other foreign words, but he introduced grammatical forms and peculiarities of style similar to the Greek at all. He is the most difficult among the Byzantine historians, and it seems that he was totally unacquainted with the classical Greek writers. His defects, however, are merely in his language and style. He is a most faithful historian, grave, judicious, prudent, and impartial, and his account of the causes of the ruin of the Greek empire is full of sagacity and wisdom. Ducaus, Chalcidondylas, and Platarch are the chief sources for the last period of the Greek empire; but Ducaus surpasses both of them by his clear narrative and the logical arrangement of his matters. He was less learned than Chalcidondylas, but, on the other hand, he was without doubt thoroughly acquainted with the Turkish language, no small advantage for a man who wrote the history of that time. The editio princeps of the work is by Bulliard (Bulliana), "Historia Byzantina & Ioanne Palaiologo I. ad Mehomotum II. Accessit Chronicon breve (χρονικὸν σύντομο), etc. Versione Latina et Notis ab Ismael Bulliardo," Paris, 1640, fol, reprinted at Venice, 1759, fol. It has been also edited by Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1834, 8vo. Bekker perused the same Pariisin codex as Bullianda, but he was enabled to correct many errors by an Italian MS., being an Italian translation of Ducaus, with a continuation in the same language, which was found about twenty years ago by Leopold Ranko in one of the libraries at Venice. This MS. was first published by Mastodocius in the 19th volume of the "Antologia." It also forms a valuable addition to the edition of Bekker. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vi. pp. 23, 34; Hainke, Script. Byzant. pp. 640—644; Hammer, Geschichte des Osman. Reiches, vol. ii. p. 68, not b. P. 398. Ed. W. 7.)

DUCENNIUS GEMINUS. [Geminius.] DUCETIUS (Ἀπόστατος), a chief of the Sicilians, or Sicels, the native tribes in the interior of Sicily. He is styled king of the Sicelians by Diocletian (xi. 79), and is said to have been of illustrious descent. After the expulsion of the family of Gelon from Syracuse (b. c. 466), Ducetius succeeded in uniting all the Sicelians of the interior into one nation, and in order to give them a common centre founded the city of Palice in the plain below Menaeum. (Diod. xi. 88.) He had previously made war on the Catanians, and expelled from that city the new colonists who had been sent there by Hiero, who therupon took possession of Messina, the name of which they changed to Agrigentum, but Ducaus subsequently restored the city also. (Diod. xi. 76, 91.) An attack upon a small place in the territory of Agrigentum involved him in hostilities not only with the Agrigentines, but the Sicans also, who defeated him in a great battle. The consequence of this was that he was deserted by all his followers, and fearing to be betrayed into the hands of the enemy, he took the daring resolution of repairing at once to Syracuse as a suppliant, and placing himself at their mercy. The Sicans spared his life, but sent him into an honourable exile at Corinth. (Diod. xi. 91, 92.) Here however he did not remain long, but having assembled a considerable band of colonists, returned to Sicily, and founded the city of Calcite on the north coast of the island. He was designing again to assert his supremacy over all the Sicelian tribes when his projects were interrupted by his death, about 440, b. c. (Diod. xii. 6, 29; Wesseling, ad loc.) [E. H. B.]

DULLIA or DULLIA GENS, plebeian. The plebeian character of this gens is attested by the fact of M. Duillius being tribune of the plebs in b. c. 471, and further by the statement of Dionysius (x. 59), who expressly says, that the decemvir K. Duillius and two of his colleagues were plebeians. In Livy (iv. 3) we indeed read, that all the decemvirs had been patricians; but this must be regarded as a mere hasty assertion which Livy puts into the mouth of the tribune Camellus, for Livy himself in another passage (v. 13) expressly states, that C. Duillius, the military tribune, was a plebeian. The only cognomen that occurs in this gens is Longus. [L. S.]

DULLIUS. 1. M. Dullius, was tribune of the plebs in b. c. 471, in which year the tribunes were for the first time elected in the comitia of the tribes. In the year following, M. Duillius and his colleagues, C. Sicinus, summoned Appius Claudius Sabinus, the consul of the year previous, before the assembly of the people, for the violent opposition he made to the agrarian law of Sp. Cassius. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 4.) Twenty-two years later, in b. c. 449, when the commonalty rose against the tyranny of the decemvirs, he acted as one of the champions of his order, and it was on his advice that the plebeians migrated from the Aventine to the Mons Sacer. When the decemvirs at length were obliged to resign, and the commonalty had returned to the Aventine, M. Duillius and C. Sicinus were invested with the tribunate a second time, and Duillius immediately proposed and carried a resolution, that consuls should be elected, from whose sentence an appeal to the people should be left open. He then carried a plebeian tribune at whom should be left the titulus of their tribunal or magistrates without leaving an appeal to the people upon against his verdicts, should be scourged and put to death. M. Duillius was a noble and high-minded champion of his order, and acted throughout that turbulent period with a high degree of moderation and wisdom. He kept the commonalty as well as his more vehement colleagues within proper bounds, for after sentence had been passed on the decemvirs, and when the tribunes appeared to wish to carry their revenge still further, Duillius declared that there had been enough punishment and hostility, and that, in the course of that year, he would not allow any fresh accusation to be brought forward, nor any person to be thrown into prison. This declaration at once cooled the fever of the patriots.

When the tribunes for the next year were to be elected, the colleagues of Duillius agreed among themselves to continue in office for another year; but Duillius, who happened to preside at the election, refused to accept any votes for the re-election of his colleagues. They were obliged to submit to the law, and M. Duillius resigned his office and withdrew. (Livy ii. 58, 61, iii. 52—54, 59, 64; Diod. xi. 68; Dionys. x. 46; Cic. de Re Publ. ii. 31.)

2. K. Duillius, was elected together with two other plebeians as decemvir for the year b. c. 450, and as in that year a war broke out with the Aeacians and Sabines, K. Duillius and four of his colleagues were sent to Mount Algidus against the Aquians. After the abolition of the decemvirs, and when some of the decemvirs had been punished, Duillius escaped from sharing their fate by going into voluntary exile, whereupon his property, like that of the others who withdrew from Rome, was publicly sold by the questores. (Livy iii. 55. 41, 58; Dionys. x. 58, xi. 28, 46.)

3. K. Duillius, was consul in b. c. 336, and two years later tribunvir for the purpose of conducting a colony to Cales, a town of the Aequians against which a war had been carried on during his consulship, and which had been reduced the year after. (Liv. viii. 16; Dio. xvi. 28, where he is erroneously called Katoes Ofiakoïs; Cic. ad Fam. ii. 21.)

5. C. DULIUS, was tribune of the plebs in b.c. 357, in which year he and his colleague, L. Masernius, carried a resolution, exspector Romarum, and another which prevented the irregular proceedings in the camps of the soldiers, such as the enactment of a law by the soldiers out of Rome, on the proposal of a consul. (Liv. vii. 16, 19.)

5. C. DULIUS, perhaps a brother of No. 4, was appointed, in b.c. 352, by the consuls one of the quinquemarii munarii, for the liquidation of debts, and he and his colleague conducted their business with such skill and moderation, that they gained the gratitude of all parties. (Liv. vii. 21.)

6. C. DULIUS, probably a grandson of No. 4, was consul with Cn. Cornelius Asina in b.c. 250. In that year the coast of Italy was repeatedly ravaged by the Carthaginians, and it was feared the Romans could do nothing, as they were yet without a navy. The Romans then built their first fleet of one hundred quinqueremes and twenty triremes, using for their model a Carthaginian vessel which had been thrown on the coast of Italy. The sum total of the Roman ships is stated differently, for, according to Orosius (iv. 7), it amounted to 130, and according to Florus (ii. 2) to 160. This fleet is said to have been built in the short space of sixty days. According to some authorities (Zonar. viii. 10; Aurel. Vict. de Civ. Illust. 30; Oros. l. c.), Dullius obtained the command of this fleet, whereas, according to Polybius (i. 53), it was given to his colleague Cn. Cornelius. The same writer states, that at first Cn. Cornelius sailed with 17 ships to Massalia, but allowed himself to be drawn towards Lipium, and there fell into the hands of the Carthaginians. (Comp. Polyain. vi. 16. § 5.) Soon after, when the Roman fleet approached Sicily, Hannibal, the admiral of the Carthaginians, sailed out against it with 50 ships, but he fell in with the enemy before he was aware of it, and, after having lost most of his ships, he escaped with the rest. The Romans then, on hearing of the misfortune of Cn. Cornelius, sent to Dullius, who commanded the land army, and entrusted to him the command of their fleet. According to Zonar. (viii. 11), Dullius, who commanded the fleet from the beginning, when he perceived the disadvantage under which the chumsy ships of the Romans were labouring, devised the well-known grappling-irons (esparcos), by means of which the enemy's ships were drawn towards his, so that the sea-fight was, as it were, changed into a land-fight. (Polyb. i. 22, &c.; Frontin. Strateg. ii. 3. 34.) When Dullius was informed that the Carthaginians were ravaging the coast of Myce in Sicily, he sailed thither with his whole armament, and soon met the Carthaginians, whose fleet consisted of 150, or, according to Diodorus (xxiiil. 2, Excerpt. Vatic.), of 200 sail. The battle which ensued off Myce and near the Liparion islands, ended in a glorious victory of the Romans, which they delivered to the general triumph. In the first attack the Carthaginians lost 30, and in the second 50 more ships, and Hannibal escaped with difficulty in a little boat. According to Eutropius and Orosius, the loss of the Carthaginians was as great as Polybius states. After the victory was completed, Dullius landed in Sicily, relieved the town of Egessa, which was closely besieged by the enemy, and took Macellis by assault. Another town on the coast seems likewise to have been taken by him. (Frontin. Strateg. iii. 2, 2.) Hereupon he visited the several cities of Rome in Sicily, and sailed away, having heard that when he wanted to return home, the Carthaginians endeavoured to prevent his sailing out of the harbour of Syracuse, though without success. (Frontin. Strateg. i. 5. § 6.)

On his return to Rome, Dullius celebrated a splendid triumph, for it was the first naval victory that the Romans had ever gained, and the memory of it was perpetuated by a column which was erected in the forum, and adorned with the beaks of the conquered ships (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 5; Sil. Ital. Pan. vi. 658, &c.; Quintil. i. 7, § 12), while Dullius himself showed his gratitude to the gods by erecting a temple to Janus in the forum Olitorium. (Dess. Ann. iii. 49. l. c.) Later he was made governor of Servia, in Pict. Geo. iii. 28, who says, that Dullius erected two columnae resvalae, one in the forum and the other at the entrance of the circus.) The column in the forum existed in the time of Pliny and Quintilian, but whether it was the original one has been questioned. It is generally believed that the original inscription which adorned the basis of the column is still extant. It was dug out of the ground in the 16th century, in a mutilated condition, and it has since often been printed with attempts at restoration. There are, however, in that inscription some orthographical peculiarities, which suggest, that the present inscription is a later restoration of the original one. This suspicion was expressed by the first editor, P. Ciaconius, and has been repeated by Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 579), who, in a later publication (Lectures on Rom. Hist. i. p. 118, ed. Schmitz) remarks, "The present table which contains the inscription is not the original one, for it is a piece of Greek marble, which was unknown at Rome in the time of Dullius. The original column was struck by lightning in the time of Tiberius, and was faithfully restored by Germanicus." Dullius was further rewarded for this victory, by being permitted, whenever he returned home from a banquet at night, to be accompanied by a torch and a flute-player. One more interesting fact is mentioned in connexion with his consulship, viz. in that year the senate of Rome forbade the interment of dead bodies within the city. (Sern. ad Avi. xi. 206.) According to the Capitoline Fasti, Dullius was censor in b.c. 258, and in 231 dictator for the purpose of holding the comitiun, (Comp. Liv. Epit. 17, Cie. de Senect. 13, Orat. 45, pro Pianu. 25.) [L. S.]

DUMNORIX, a chieftain of the Aedui, entered into the ambitious designs of Orgetorix, the Helvetian, whose daughter he married. After the death of Orgetorix, the Helvetians still continuing their plan of migration and conquest, Dumnorix, who, with a view to sovereign power among his own people, was anxious to extend his influence in all possible quarters, obtained for them a passage through the territory of the Sequani. Caesar soon discovered that he had done so, and also that he had prevented the Aedui from supplying the provisions they were bound to furnish to the Roman army. In consequence, however, of the entreaties of his brother, Divitiacus, his life was spared, though Caesar had him closely watched. This occurred in B.C. 56. When Caesar was on the point of setting out on his second expedition into Britain, in B.C. 58, he suspected Dumnonior too much to leave him behind in Gaul, and he insisted therefore on his accompanying him. Dumnonior, upon this, fled from the Roman camp with the Aeduan cavalry, but was overtaken and slain.

DURIS (Δούρις), of Samos, a descendant of Aleibides (Plut. Aleib. 32), and brother of Lynceus, lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphia. The early part of his life fell in the period when the Athenians sent 2000 drachmi to Samos, by whom the inhabitants of the island were expelled, B.C. 352. During the absence from his native country, Duris, when yet a boy, gained a victory at Olympia in boxing. for which a statue was erected to him there with an inscription (Paus. vi. 13. S. 3). The year of that victory is unknown, but it took place previous to the return of the Samians to their island, in B.C. 324. He must have been staying for some time at Athens, as he and his brother Lynceus are mentioned among the pupils of Theophrastus. (Athen. iv. p. 128.) After his return to Samos, he obtained the tyranny, though it is unknown by what means and how long he maintained himself in that position. He must, however, have survived the year B.C. 261, as in one of his works (ap. Phln. H. N. viii. 40) he mentioned an occurrence which belongs to that year.

Duris was the author of a considerable number of works, most of which were of an historical nature, but none of them has come down to us, and all we possess of his productions consists of a number of scattered fragments. His principal work was—1. A history of Greece, μετα τε ων ἐκλεγμένη ἱστορία (Diod. xvi. 60), or, as others simply call it, ἱστορία. It commenced with the death of the three princes, Amynatas, the father of Philip of Macedon, Agesipolis of Sparta, and Jason of Pherae, that is, with the year B.C. 370, and carried the history down to at least B.C. 241, so that it embraced a period of at least 90 years. The number of books of which it consisted is not known, though their number seems to have amounted to about 28. Some ancient writers speak of a work of Duris entitled Macedoniv, and the question is as to whether this was a distinct work, or merely a part of or identical with the ἱστορία, has been much discussed in modern times. Grenet (Hist. Analect. p. 217) and Clinton maintain, that it was a separate work, whereas Vossius and Droysen (Geschr. d. Nachfolg. Alex. p. 671, &c.) have proved by the strongest evidence, that the Macedoniv is the same work as the ἱστορία. 2. Περὶ Ἀγαθοκλῆς ἱστορίας, in several books, the fourth of which is quoted by Suidas. 3. Σάμων ἄροι, that is, Annals of the history of Samos, is frequently referred to by the ancients, and consisted of at least twelve books. 4. Περὶ Ἐλευσίτων καὶ Αἰγαλεόπων (Athen. iv. p. 184), seems to be the same as νεωτερονα (Athen. xiv. p. 636). 5. Περὶ θυσίων. (Etym. M. p. 469. 49.) 6. Περὶ διόκκων. (Texts. ad Libr. 617; Photius, s. v. Σαμικῶν στέφανος.) 7. Περὶ ξυγοροφών. (Ding. Lært. i. 38, ii. 19.) 8. Περὶ τοιχωρισμῶν (Plin. Echel. lib. 33, 34), may, however, have been the same as the preceding work. 9. Λευκών, (Plin.  s. v. Λευκά; Schol. ad Aristoph. Vesp. 1030.) Duris as an historian does not appear to have enjoyed any very great reputation among the ancients. Cicero (ad Att. vi. 1) says of him merely hons in historiis satis diligentis, and Dionysius (s. Doxopag. Var. 4) reckons him among those historians who bestowed no care upon the form of their compositions. His historical veracity also is questioned by Plutarch (Peri. 28; comp. Demosth. 19, Aleib. 32, Dem. 1), but he does not give any reasons for it, and it may be that Plutarch was merely struck at finding in Duris things which no other writer had mentioned, and was thus led to the consideration of his credibility. The fragments of Duris have been collected by J. G. Hullemen, "Duridis Samii quae superant," Traject. ad Rhen. 1814, 1vo. (Comp. W. A. Schmidt, de Fontib. vet. auctori. in nova.rum expedit. a Gallis in Maced. et Graec. scriptis, p. 17, &c.; Panofka, Res Seminarii, p. 98, &c.; Hullemen, L. e. pp. 1—66.)

[LS.]

DURIS ELAITIES (Δούρις Ελαετής), that is, of Elaea in Aelia, the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology (i. 59, Brunck and Jacobs) on the inundation of Ephesus, which happened in the time of Lydamachus, about 322 B.C. It is probably, from the nature of the event, that the poet lived near the time when it took place. Nothing more is known of him. He is a different person from Duris of Samos. (Jacobs, xiii. p. 889.) Diogenes Laërtius (i. 38) mentions a Duris who wrote on painting, whom Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 134, ed. Westermann) supposes to be the same who is mentioned by Pliny (xxvii. III.), and in another passage of Diogenes (i. 19). P. S.]

M. DURMIIUS, a tribune of the mint under Augustus, of whom there are several coins extant. The first two given below contain on the obverse the head of Augustus; and the bœr and the lion feeding upon the stag, in the reverses, have reference to the shows of wild beasts, in which Augustus took great delight. The reverse of the third coin contains a youthful head, and the inscription Honoroxi probably refers to the games in honour of Virtus and Honor celebrated in the reign of Augustus. (Comp. Dion Cass. liv. 18; Eckhel, v. pp. 208, 204.) DYSPONTIUS. 1033

DYSPONTIUS, a son of Poseidon and Melissa, from whom the town of Dyspontium derived its name; for formerly it was called Epidamus, after the father of Melissa. (Paus. vi. 10, in fin.; Steph. Byz. a. v. Δυσπόντιος.) [L.S.]

DYSPONTIUS or DYSPONTIUS (Δυσπόντιος or Δυσπόντιος), according to Pausanias (vi. 22, § 6), a son of Oenomaus, but according to Stephanus of Byzantium (a. v. Δυσπόντιος), a son of Pelops, was believed to be the founder of the town of Dyspontium, in Pisatis. [L.S.]

'I have been for some time in the habit of using the Dictionaries of Antiquity and Ancient Biography, as well as the Dictionary of Ancient Geography, and I have no hesitation in saying, from my knowledge of them, that they are far superior to any other publications of the same sort in our language. They are works which every student of ancient literature ought to consult habitually, and which are indispensable to every person engaged in original researches into any department of antiquity.'

Sir G. Cornwell Lewis, Bart.

'The Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography, edited by Dr. William Smith, is a work of so much utility to the study of ancient history, and of such general importance to classical education and the progress of knowledge, that its extensive circulation, whereby the English language is spoken or read, may confidently be anticipated.'

William Martin Leake, Esq., F.R.S.

'I have much pleasure in expressing my sense of the invaluable services rendered to the cause of Greek and Latin literature, and of classical education generally, by the great and laborious works of Dr. William Smith, which are extensively used, and with great profit, at Eton and Harrow, as in all the public schools of England.'

SMALLER CLASSICAL DICTIONARIES FOR SCHOOL USE.

I

The old Classical Dictionaries having become obsolete, from the vastly increased information which the researches of modern scholars have attained on historical subjects, this Dictionary is presented to the student as embodying the accurate particulars which recent discoveries have arrived at, respecting the manners, customs, history, and literature of antiquity.

The work contains articles on the most important names, Biographical, Mythological, and geographical, occurring in the Greek and Roman classics. The biographical portion contains further data on the various departments of History, of Literature, and of Art. All names of note are included, up to A.D. 476, and a few remarkable ones beyond that epoch. The Literary and artistic subjects have been treated with a careful consideration of all that is known or probable; and the geographical and historical articles are based on the latest researches in history, geography, and archaeology.

In the Mythological articles, care has been taken to exclude all indiscriminate allusions: and the Greek and Roman Mythology are kept distinct, by treating separately of the Greek divinities under their Greek names, and the Roman under the Roman names—a method adopted by modern authorities, both here and on the Continent, and calculated to remove and prevent many errors and misconceptions.

In the geographical portion, have been embodied all the latest discoveries of geographers relating to the localization of modern localities with ancient sites.

The work will also be found of great use to Biblical Students in elucidating points connected with the Geography of the Scriptures, and explaining the numerous allusions to classical subjects contained in the Sacred Writers.

The illustrations have reference to the Mythological, Biographical, and geographical articles, and will, it is believed, add considerably to the value and usefulness of the work.

II

This work is designed for junior students, and contains so much of the subjects of the larger Classical Dictionary as is necessary for understanding the Greek and Roman Classics generally read in schools. It is more adapted, in size as well as in price, to younger pupils; and, for their benefit, not only has the quantity of the syllables of each name been carefully marked, but the genitive cases have been inserted.

A new and pleasing feature is introduced into this volume, viz., the illustration of the Mythological articles by drawings from ancient works of art. These will give the young beginner a more vivid and adequate conception of the symbols and figures typical of the deities and heroes than he could possibly obtain in any other manner; and will thus enlist his interest in the objects of ancient Greek and Roman worship.

III

This work, intended to illustrate the classical authors usually read in schools, exhibits the results of the labours of modern scholars on the various subjects included under the general term of Greek and Roman antiquities. Such information, contained in the larger Dictionary of Antiquities, as is not suited to junior students, is here omitted; and whatever articles are susceptible of it have been illustrated by woodcuts from ancient works of art.

The book, however, is designed not only for school use, but for the general English reader who, although unacquainted with the ancient classics in the original, frequently needs instruction on points connected with Greek and Roman antiquities.

The woodcuts are calculated to give a correct idea of the numerous objects described, of which but a vague notion could be conceived from the most minute verbal description; and these cuts have the advantage of authenticity, being taken exclusively from ancient inscriptions, paintings on vases, gems, coins, and pictures found at Pompeii, as well as from actual relics of antiquity still existing. The pupil thus acquires a knowledge of the forms of the various kinds of ancient armour and weapons, instruments of music, apparatus for cooking and banqueting, articles of dress, plans of houses &c.

The Appendix consists of extensive tables of Greek and Roman coins, weights, and measures; the years corresponding to the Olympiads, the calendar, &c.
